In treason, join'd the death-song and the dance

Some, too, there were, believing what they fear'd,
Who yielded to their old idolatry,
And mingled in the worship. Round and round
The accursed minister of murder whirl'd
His senseless victim; they, too, round and round
In maddening motion, and with maddening cries Revolving, whirl'd and wheel'd. At length, when now,

According to old rites, he should have dash'd
On the stone Idol's head the wretch's brains,
Neolin stopp'd, and once again began
The long, shrill, piercing, modulated cry.
The Serpent knew the call, and, rolling on,
Wave above wave, his rising length, advanced
His open jaws: then, with the expected prey,
Glides to the dark recesses of his den.

VII.

THE SNAKE-GOD.

MEANTIME Erillyab's messenger had girt
His loins, and, like a roebuck, o'er the hills
He sped. He met Cadwallon and the Prince
In arms, so quickly Madoc had obey'd
Lincoya's call; at noon he heard the call;
And still the sun was riding high in heaven,
When up the valley where the Hoamen dwelt
He led his twenty spears. O welcome, friend
And brother! cried the Queen. Even as thou saidst,
So hath it proved; and those accursed schemes
Of treachery, which that wretched boy reveal'd
Under the influence of thy potent drink,
Have ripen'd to effect. From what a snare
The timely warning saved me! for, be sure,
What I had seen I else should have believed,
In utter fear confounded. The Great Spirit,
Who taught thee to foresee the evil thing,
Will give thee power to quell it.

On they went

Toward the dell, where now the Idolaters
Had built their dedicated fire, and still
With feast, and fits of song, and violent dance,
Pursued their rites. When Neolin perceived
The Prince approach, fearlessly he came forth,
And raised his arm, and cried, Strangers, away!
Away, profane! hence to your mother-land!
Hence to your waters; for the God is here;—
He came for blood, and he shall have his fill!
Impious, away!

Seize him! exclaim'd the Prince;
Nor had he time for motion nor for flight,
So instantly was that command obey'd.
Hoamen, said Madoc, hear me!—I came here
Stranger alike to Aztlan and to you;
I found ye an oppress'd and wretched race,
Groaning beneath your chains; at your request,
For your deliverance, I unsheathed the sword,
Redeem'd ye from your bondage, and preserved
Your children from the slaughter. With those foes
Whose burden ye for forty years endured,
This traitor hath conspired, against yourselves,

Your Queen, and me, your friend; the solemn faith
Which in the face of yonder sun we pledged,
Each to the other, this perfidious man
Hath broken, and hath stain'd his hands this day
With innocent blood. Life must atone for life;
Ere I destroy the Serpent, whom his wiles
Have train'd so well, last victim, he shall glut
The monster's maw.

Strike, man! quoth Neolin.

This is my consummation! the reward
Of my true faith! the best that I could ask,
The best the God could give:—to rest in him,
Body with body be incorporate,
Soul into soul absorb'd, and I and He
One life, inseparable, for evermore.
Strike; I am weary of this mortal part;
Unite me to the God!

Triumphantly

He spake; the assembled people, at his words,
With rising awe gazed on the miscreant;
Madoc himself, when now he would have given
The sign for death, in admiration paused;
Such power hath fortitude. And he perceived
The auspicious moment, and set up his cry.
Forth, from the dark recesses of the cave,
The Serpent came: the Hoamen at the sight
Shouted, and they who held the Priest, appall'd, Relax'd their hold. On came the mighty Snake,
And twined, in many a wreath, round Neolin,
Darting aright, aleft, his sinuous neck,
With searching eye, and lifted jaw, and tongue
Quivering, and hiss as of a heavy shower
Upon the summer woods. The Britons stood
Astounded at the powerful reptile's bulk,
And that strange sight. His girth was as of man,
But easily could he have overtopp'd
Goliath's helmed head, or that huge King
Of Basan, hugest of the Anakim:
What then was human strength, if once involved
Within those dreadful coils?—The multitude
Fell prone, and worshipp'd; pale Erillyab grew,
And turn'd upon the Prince a doubtful eye;
The Britons too were pale, albeit they held
Their spears protended; and they also look'd
On Madoc, who the while stood silently
Contemplating how wiseliest he might cope
With that surpassing strength.

But Neolin,

Well hoping now success, when he had awed
The general feeling thus, exclaim'd aloud—
Blood for the God! give him the Stranger's blood!
Avenge him on his foes! And then, perchance,
Terror had urged them to some desperate deed,
Had Madoc ponder'd more, or paused in act
One moment. From the sacrificial flames
He snatch'd a firebrand, and with fire and sword,
Rush'd at the monster; back the monster drew
His head upraised recoiling, and the Prince
Smote Neolin; all circled as he was,
And clipp'd in his false Deity's embrace,
Smote he the accursed Priest; the avenging sword Fell on his neck; through flesh and bone it drove Deep in the chest: the wretched criminal
Totter'd, and those huge rings a moment held
His bloody corpse upright, while Madoc struck

The Serpent: twice he struck him, and the sword
Glanced from the impenetrable scales; nor more
Avail'd its thrust, though driven by that strong arm;
For on the unyielding skin the temper'd blade
Bent. He sprung upward then, and in the eyes
Of the huge monster flashed the fiery brand.
Impatient of the smoke and burning, back
The reptile wreathed, and from his loosening clasp
Dropp'd the dead Neolin, and turn'd, and fled
To his dark den.

The Hoamen, at that sight,
Raised a loud wonder-ery, with one accord,
Great is the Son of Ocean, and his God
Is mightiest! But Erillyab silently
Approach'd the great Deliverer; her whole frame
Trembled with strong emotion, and she took
His hand, and gazed a moment earnestly,
Having no power of speech, till with a gush
Of tears her utterance came, and she exclaim'd,
Blessed art thou, my brother! for the power
Of God is in thee! — and she would have kissed
His hand in adoration; but he cried,
God is indeed with us, and in his name
Will we complete the work! — then to the cave
Advanced, and call'd for fire. Bring fire! quoth he;
By his own element this spawn of hell
Shall perish! and he enter'd, to explore
The cavern depths. Cadwallon follow'd him,
Bearing in either hand a flaming brand;
For sword or spear avail'd not.

Far in the hill,
Cave within cave, the ample grotto pierced,
Three chambers in the rock. Fit vestibule
The first to that wild temple, long and low,
Shut out the outward day. The second vault
Had its own daylight from a central chasm
High in the hollow; here the Image stood,
Their rude idolatry, — a sculptured snake,
If term of art may such misshapen form
Beseem, — around a human figure coil'd,
And all begrimed with blood. The inmost cell
Dark; and far up within its blackest depth
They saw the Serpent's still small eye of fire.
Not if they thin'd the forest for their pile,
Could they, with flame or suffocating smoke,
Destroy him there; for through the open roof
The clouds would pass away. They paused not long;
Drive him beneath the chasm, Cadwallon cried,
And hem him in with fire, and from above
We crush him.

Forth they went, and climb'd the hill
With all their people. Their united strength Loosen'd the rocks, and ranged them round the brink,
Impending. With Cadwallon on the height
Ten Britons wait; ten with the Prince descend,
And with a firebrand each in either hand,
Enter the outer cave. Madoc advanced,
And at the entrance of the inner den,
He took his stand alone. A bow he bore,
And arrows round whose heads dry tow was twined,
In pine-gum dipp'd; he kindled these, and shot
The fiery shafts. Upon the scaly skin,
As on a rock, the bone-tipp'd arrows fell,

But at their bright and blazing light effray'd,
Ont rush'd the reptile. Madoc from his path
Retired against the side, and call'd his men,
And in they came, and circled round the Snake;
And shaking all their flames, as with a wheel
Of fire, they ring'd him in. From side to side
The monster turns! — where'er he turns, the flame
Flares in his nostrils and his blinking eyes;
Nor aught against the dreaded element
Did that brute force avail, which could have crush'd
Milo's young limbs, or Theban Hercules,
Or old Manoah's mightier son, ere yet Shorn of his strength. They press him now, and now

Give back, here urging, and here yielding way,
Till right beneath the chasm they centre him.
At once the crags are loosed, and down they fall
Thundering. They fell like thunder, but the crash
Of scale and bone was heard. In agony
The Serpent writhed beneath the blow; in vain,
From under the incumbent load essay'd
To drag his mangled folds. One heavier stone
Fasten'd and flatten'd him; yet still, with tail
Ten cubits long, he lash'd the air, and foined
From side to side, and raised his raging head
Above the height of man, though half his length
Lay mutilate. Who then had felt the force
Of that wild fury, little had to him
Buckler or corselet profited, or mail,
Or might of human arm. The Britons shrunk
Beyond its arc of motion; but the Prince
Took a long spear, and springing on the stone
Which fix'd the monster down, provoked his rage.
Uplifts the Snake his head retorted, high
He lifts it over Madoc, then darts down
To seize his prey. The Prince, with foot advanced,
Inclines his body back, and points the spear
With sure and certain aim, then drives it up,
Into his open jaws; two cubits deep
It pierced, the monster forcing on the wound.
He closed his teeth for anguish, and bit short
The ashen hilt. But not the rage which now
Clangs all his scales, can from its seat dislodge
The barbed shaft; nor those contortions wild,
Nor those convulsive shudderings, nor the throes
Which shake his inmost entrails, as with the air
In suffocating gulps the monster now
Inhales his own life-blood. The Prince descends;
He lifts another lance; and now the Snake,
Gasping, as if exhausted, on the ground
Reclines his head one moment. Madoc seized
That moment, planted in his eye the spear,
Then setting foot upon his neck, drove down Through bone, and brain, and throat, and to the earth

Infix'd the mortal weapon. Yet once more
The Snake essay'd to rise; his dying strength
Fail'd him, nor longer did those mighty folds
Obey the moving impulse, crush'd and scotch'd;
In every ring, through all his mangled length,
The shrinking muscles quiver'd, then collapsed
In death.

Cadwallon and his comrades now
Enter the den; they roll away the crag
Which held him down, pluck out the mortal spear,

Then drag him forth to day ; the force conjoin'd
Of all the Britons difficultly drag
His lifeless bulk. But when the Hoamen saw
That form portentous trailing in its gore,
The jaws, which, in the morning, they had seen
Purpled with human blood, now in their own
Blackening, — aknee they fell before the Prince,
And in adoring admiration raised
Their hands with one accord, and all in fear
Worshipped the mighty Deicide. But he,
Recoiling from those sinful honors, cried,
Drag out the Idol now, and heap the fire,
That all may be consumed !

Forthwith they heap'd

The sacrificial fire, and on the pile
The Serpent, and the Image, and the corpse
Of Neolin were laid ; with prompt supply
They feed the raging flames, hour after hour,
Till now the black and nauseous smoke is spent,
And mingled with the ruins of the pile,
The undistinguishable ashes lay.
Go ! cried Prince Madoc, cast them in the stream,
And scatter them upon the winds, that so
No relic of this foul idolatry
Pollute the land. To-morrow meet me here,
Hoamen, and I will purify yon den
Of your abominations. Come ye here
With humble hearts ; for ye, too, in the sight
Of the Great Spirit, the Beloved One, Must be made pure, and cleansed from your offence,
And take upon yourselves his holy law.

VIII.

THE CONVERSION OF THE HOAMEN.

How beautiful, O Sun, is thine uprise,
And on how fair a scene ! Before the Cave
The Elders of the Hoamen wait the will
Of their Deliverer ; ranged without their ring
The tribe look on, thronging the narrow vale,
And what of gradual rise the shelving combe
Displayed, or steeper eminence of wood,
Broken with crags and sunny slope of green,
And grassy platform. With the Elders sat
The Queen and Prince, their rank's prerogative,
Excluded else for sex unfit, and youth
For counsel immature. Before the arch,
To that rude fane, rude portal, stands the Cross,
By Madoc's hand victorious planted there.
And lo, Prince Madoc comes ! no longer mail'd
In arms of mortal might ; the spear and sword,
The hauberk and the helmet laid aside,
Gorget and gauntlet, greaves and shield, — he comes

In peaceful tunic clad, and mantle long ;
His hyacinthine locks now shadowing
That face, which late, with iron overbrow'd,
Struck from within the aventayle such awe
And terror to the heart. Barcheaded he,
Following the servant of the altar, leads

The reverential train. Before them, raised
On high, the sacred images are borne ;
There, in faint semblance, holiest Mary bends
In virgin beauty o'er her babe divine, —
A sight which almost to idolatry
Might win the soul by love. But who can gaze
Upon that other form, which on the rood
In agony is stretch'd ? — his hands transfix'd,
And lacerate with the body's pendent weight ;
The black and deadly paleness of his face,
Streak'd with the blood which from that crown of scorn

Hath ceased to flow ; the side-wound streaming still ;

And open still those eyes, from which the look
Not yet hath pass'd away, that went to Heaven,
When, in that hour, the Son of Man exclaim'd,
Forgive them, for they know not what they do !
And now arrived before the cave, the train
Halt : to the assembled elders, where they sat
Ranged in half circle, Madoc then advanced,
And raised, as if in act to speak, his hand.
Thereat was every human sound suppress'd ;
And every quicken'd ear and eager eye
Were centred on his lips.

The Prince began, —

Hoamen, friends, brethren, — friends we have been long,

And brethren shall be, ere the day go down, —
I come not here propounding doubtful things
For counsel, and deliberate resolve
Of searching thought ; but with authority
From Heaven, to give the law, and to enforce Obedience. Ye shall worship God alone,
The One Eternal. That Beloved One
Ye shall not serve with offer'd fruits, or smoke
Of sacrificial fire, or blood, or life ;
Far other sacrifice he claims, — a soul
Resign'd, a will subdued, a heart made clean
From all offence. Not for your lots on earth,
Menial or mighty, slave or highly-born,
For cunning in the chase, or strength in war,
Shall ye be judged hereafter ; — as ye keep
The law of love, as ye shall tame your wrath,
Forego revenge, forgive your enemies,
Do good to them that wrong ye, ye will find
Your bliss or bale. This law came down from Heaven.

Lo, ye behold Him there by whom it came ;
The Spirit was in Him, and for the sins
Of man He suffered thus, and by His death
Must all mankind be blest. Not knowing Him,
Ye wander'd on in error ; knowing now,
And not obeying, what was error once
Is guilt and wilful wrong. If ever more
Ye bow to your false deities the knee ;
If ever more ye worship them with feast,
Or sacrifice, or dance ; whoso offends
Shall from among the people be cut off,
Like a corrupted member, lest he taint
The whole with death. With what appointed rites

Your homage must be paid, ye shall be taught ;
Your children in the way that they shall go

Be train'd from childhood up. Make ye, meantime,
Your prayer to that Beloved One, who sees
The secrets of all hearts; and set ye up
This the memorial of his chosen Son,
And Her, who, blessed among women, fed
The Appointed at Her breast, and by His cross
Endured intenser anguish; therefore sharing
His glory now, with sunbeams robed, the Moon
Her footstool, and a wreath of stars her crown.

Hoamen, ye deem us children of a race
Mightier than ye, and wiser, and by Heaven
Beloved and favor'd more. From this pure law
Hath all proceeded, — wisdom, power, whate'er
Here elevates the soul, and makes it ripe
For higher powers and more exalted bliss.
Share then our law, and be with us, on earth,
Partakers of these blessings, and in Heaven,
Co-heritors with us of endless joy.

Ere yet one breath or motion had disturb'd
The reverential hush, Erillyab rose.
My people, said the Queen, their God is best
And mightiest. Him to whom we offered up
Blood of our blood and of our flesh the flesh,
Vainly we deem'd divine; no spirit he
Of good or evil, by the conquering arm
Of Madoc mortal proved. What then remains
But that the blessing proffer'd thus in love,
In love we take? — Deliverer, Teacher, Friend,
First in the fellowship of faith I claim
The initiatory rite.

I also, cried
The venerable Priest Ayayaca,
Old as I am, I also, like a child,
Would learn this wisdom yet before I die.
The Elders rose and answer'd, We and all!
And from the congregated tribe burst forth
One universal shout, — Great is the God
Of Madoc, — worthy to be served is He!

Then to the mountain rivulet, which roll'd
Like amber over its dark bed of rock,
Did Madoc lead Erillyab, in the name
Of JESUS, to his Christian family
Accepted now. On her and on her son,
The Elders and the People, Llorien
Sprinkled the sanctifying waters. Day
Was scarcely two hours old when he began
His work, and when he ceased, the sun had past
The heights of noon. Ye saw that blessed work,
Sons of the Cymry, Cadog, Deiniol,
Padarn, and Teilo! ye whose sainted names
Your monumental temples still record;
Thou, David, still revered, who in the vale,
Where, by old Hatteril's wintry torrents swollen,
Rude Hodney rolls his raging stream, didst choose
Thy hermit home; and ye who by the sword
Of the fierce Saxon, when the bloodier Monk
Urged on the work of murder, for your faith
And freedom fell, — Martyrs and Saints, ye saw
This triumph of the Cymry and the Cross,
And struck your golden harps to hymns of joy.

IX.

TLALALA.

As now the rites were ended, Caradoc
Came from the ships, leading an Azteca
Guarded and bound. Prince Madoc, said the Bard,
Lo! the first captive of our arms I bring.
Alone, beside the river I had stray'd,
When, from his lurking-place, the savage hurl'd
A javelin. At the rustle of the reeds,
From whence the blow was aim'd, I turn'd in time,
And heard it whizz beside me. Well it was,
That from the ships they saw and succor'd me;
For, subtle as a serpent in my grasp,
He seemed all joint and flexure; nor had I
Armor to ward, nor weapon to offend,
To battle all unused and unprepared;
But I, too, here upon this barbarous land,
Like Elnur and like Aronan of old,
Must lift the ruddy spear.

This is no day
For vengeance, answered Madoc, else his deed
Had met no merey. Freely let him go!
Perchance the tidings of our triumph here
May yet reclaim his country. — Azteca,
Go, let your Pabas know that we have crush'd
Their complots here; beneath our righteous sword
The Priest and his false Deity have fallen;
The idols are consumed, and, in their stead,
The emblems of our holy faith set up,
Whereof the Hoamen have this day been made
Partakers. Say to Aztlan, when she, too,
Will make her temples clean, and put away
Her foul abominations, and accept
The Christian Cross, that Madoc then accords
Forgiveness for the past, and peace to come.
This better part let her, of her free-will
And wisdom, choose in time.

Till Madoc spake,
The captive reckless of his peril stood,
Gazing with resolute and careless eye,
As one in whom the lot of life or death
Moved neither fear nor feeling; but that eye
Now sparkling with defiance, — Seek ye peace?
He cried: O weak and woman-hearted man!
Already wouldst thou lay the sword to rest?
Not with the burial of the sword this strife
Must end, for never doth the Tree of Peace
Strike root and flourish, till the strong man's hand
Upon his enemy's grave hath planted it.
Come ye to Aztlan then in quest of peace?
Ye feeble souls, if that be what ye seek,
Fly hence! our Aztlan suffers on her soil
No living stranger.

Do thy bidding, Chief!
Calmly Cadwallon answered. To her choice
Let Aztlan look, lest what she now reject
In insolence of strength, she take upon her,
In sorrow, and in suffering, and in shame,
By strong compulsion, penitent too late.
Thou hast beheld our ships with gallant men
Freighted, a numerous force, — and for our arms, —

Surely thy nation hath acquired of them
Disastrous knowledge.

Curse upon your arms!
Exclaim'd the savage:—Is there one among you
Dare lay that cowardly advantage by,
And meet me, man to man, in honest strife?
That I might grapple with him, weaponless,
On yonder rock, breast against breast, fair force
Of limb, and breath, and blood, — till one, or both,
Dash'd down the shattering precipice, should feed
The mountain eagle! — Give me, I beseech you,
That joy!

As wisely, said Cynetha's son,
Thy foe might challenge thee, and bid thee let Thy strong right hand hang idle in the fray,
That so his weakness with thy strength might cope
In equal battle! — Not in wrongful war,
The tyrants of our weaker brethren,
Wield we these dreadful arms, — but when assail'd
By fraud and force, when call'd upon to aid
The feeble and oppressed, shall we not
Then put our terrors forth, and thunder-strike
The guilty?

Silently the Savage heard;
Joy brighten'd in his eyes, as they unloosed
His bonds; he stretched his arms at length, to feel
His liberty, and like a greyhound then
Slipp'd from the leash, he bounded o'er the hills.
What was from early morning till noon day
The steady travel of a well-girt man,
He with fleet feet and unfatiguable,
In three short hours hath traversed; in the lake
He plunged, now shooting forth his pointed arms,
Arrow-like darting on; recumbent now,
Forces with springing feet his easier way;
Then with new speed, as freshen'd by repose,
Again he breasts the water. On the shore
Of Aztlan now he stands, and breathes at will,
And wrings his dripping locks; then through the gate
Pursued his way.

Green garlands deck the gate;
Gay are the temples with green boughs affix'd;
The door-posts and the lintels hung with wreaths;
The fire of sacrifice, with flames bedimm'd,
Burns in the sun-light, pale; the victims wait
Around, impatient of their death delay'd.
The Priest, before Tezcalipoca's shrine,
Watches the maize-strown threshold, to announce
The footsteps of the God; for this the day,
When to his favor'd city he vouchsafes
His annual presence, and, with unseen feet,
Imprints the maize-strown threshold; follow'd soon
By all whose altars with eternal fires
Aztlan illumed, and fed with human blood; —
Mexitli, woman-born, who from the womb,
Child of no mortal sire, leap'd terrible,
The arm'd avenger of his mother's fame;
And he whose will the subject winds obey,
Quetzalcoal; and Tlaloc, Water-God,
And all the host of Deities, whose power
Requites with bounty Aztlan's pious zeal,
Health and rich increase giving to her sons,
And withering in the war her enemies.
So taught the Priests; and therefore were the gates

Green-garlanded, the temples green with boughs,
The door-posts and the lintels hung with wreaths;
And yonder victims, ranged around the fire,
Are destin'd, with the steam of sacrifice,
To greet their dreadful coming.

With the train
Of warrior Chiefs Coanacotzin stood,
That when the Priest proclaim'd the enter'd God,
His lips before the present Deity
Might pour effectual prayer. The assembled Chiefs
Saw Tlalala approach, more welcome now,
As one whose absence from the appointed rites
Had waken'd fear and wonder. — Think not ye,
The youth exclaim'd, careless impiety
Could this day lead me wandering. I went forth
To dip my javelin in the Strangers' blood —
A sacrifice, methought, our Gods had loved
To scent, and sooner hasten'd to enjoy.
I fail'd, and fell a prisoner; but their fear
Released me — coward fear, or childish hope,
That, like Yuhidthiton, I might become
Their friend, and merit chastisement from Heaven,
Pleading the Strangers' cause. They bade me go
And proffer peace. — Chiefs, were it possible
That tongue of mine could win you to that shame,
Out would I pluck the member, though my soul
Followed its bloody roots. The Stranger finds
No peace in Aztlan, but the peace of death!

'Tis bravely said! Yuhidthiton replied,
And fairly mayst thou boast, young Tlalala,
For thou art brave in battle. Yet 'twere well
If that same fearless tongue were taught to check
Its boyish license now. No law forbade
Our friendship with the Stranger, when my voice
Pleaded for proffered peace; that fault I shared
In common with the King, and with the Chiefs,
The Pabas, and the People, none foreseeing
Danger or guilt; but when at length the Gods
Made evident their wrath in prodigies,
I yielded to their manifested will
My prompt obedience. — Bravely hast thou said,
And brave thou art, young Tiger of the War!
But thou hast dealt with other enemies
Than these impenetrable men, — with foes,
Whose conquered Gods lie idle in their chains,
And with tame weakness brook captivity.
When thou hast met the Strangers in the fight,
And in the doings of that fight outdone
Yuhidthiton, revile him then for one
Slow to defend his country and his faith;
Till then, with reverence, as beseems thy youth,
Respect thou his full fame!

I wrong it not!
I wrong it not! cried the young Azteca;
But truly, as I hope to equal it,
Honor thy well-earn'd glory. — But this peace! —
Renounce it! — say that it shall never be! —
Never, — as long as there are Gods in Heaven,
Or men in Aztlan!

That, the King replied,
The Gods themselves have answer'd. Never yet
By holier ardor were our countrymen
Possess'd; peace-offerings of repentance fill
The temple courts; from every voice ascends

The contrite prayer ; daily the victim's heart
Sends its propitiatory steam to Heaven ;
And if the aid divine may be procured
By the most dread solemnities of faith,
And rigor of severest penitence,
Soon shall the present influence strengthen us,
And Aztlan be triumphant.

While they spake,
The ceaseless sound of song and instrument
Rung through the air, now rising like the voice
Of angry ocean, now subsiding soft,
As when the breeze of evening dies away.
The horn, and shrill-toned pipe, and drum, that gave

Its music to the hand, and hollow'd wood,
Drum-like, whose thunders, ever and anon,
Commingle with the sea-shell's spiral roar,
Closed the full harmony. And now the eve
Past on, and, through the twilight visible,
The frequent fire-flies' brightening beauties shone.
Anxious and often now the Priest inspects
The maize-strown threshold ; for the wonted hour
Was come, and yet no footstep of the God !
More radiant now the fire of sacrifice,
Fed to full fury, blazed ; and its red smoke
Imparted to the darker atmosphere
Such obscure light, as, o'er Vesuvio seen,
Or pillared upon Etna's mountain-head,
Makes darkness dreadful. In the captives' cheeks
Then might a livid paleness have been seen,
And wilder terror in their ghastly eyes,
Expecting momentarily the pang of death.
Soon in the multitude a doubt arose,
Which none durst mention, lest his neighbor's fears,
Divulged, should strengthen his ; — the hour was past,
And yet no foot had mark'd the sprinkled maize !

THE ARRIVAL OF THE GODS.

Now every moment gave their doubts new force,
And every wondering eye disclosed the fear
Which on the tongue was trembling, when to the Emaciate like some bare anatomy, [King,
And deadly pale, Tezozomoc was led,
By two supporting Priests. Ten painful months,
Immured amid the forest had he dwelt,
In abstinence and solitary prayer
Passing his nights and days : thus did the Gods
From their High Priest exact, when they enforced,
By danger or distress, the penance due
For public sins ; and he had dwelt ten months,
Praying and fasting, and in solitude,
Till now might every bone of his lean limbs
Be told, and in his starved and bony face
The living eye appeared unnatural, —
A ghostly sight.

In breathless eagerness
The multitude drew round as he began, —
O King, the Gods of Aztlan are not come ;
They will not come before the Strangers' blood

Smoke on their altars ; but they have beheld
My days of prayer, and nights of watchfulness,
And fasts austere, and bloody disciplines,
And have reveal'd their pleasure. Who is here,
Who to the White King's dwelling-place dare go,
And execute their will ?

Scarcely had he said,
When Tlalala exclaim'd, I am the man.

Hear then ! Tezozomoc replied. — Ye know
That self-denial and long penance purge
The film and foulness of mortality,
For more immediate intercourse with Heaven
Preparing the pure spirit ; and all eyes
May witness that with no relaxing zeal
I have perform'd my duty. Much I fear'd
For Aztlan's sins, and oft, in bitterness,
Have groan'd and bled for her iniquity ;
But chiefly for this solemn day the fear
Was strong upon me, lest her Deities,
Estranged, should turn away, and we be left
A spiritless and God-abandoned race,
A warning to the earth. Ten weary months
Have the raw maize and running water been
My only food ; but not a grain of maize
Hath stay'd the gnawing appetite, nor drop
Of water cool'd my parch'd and painful tongue,
Since yester-morn arose. Fasting I pray'd,
And, praying, gash'd myself ; and all night long,
I watch'd, and wept, and supplicated Heaven,
Till the weak flesh, its life-blood almost drain'd,
Sunk with the long austerity : a dread
Of death came over me ; a deathly chill
Ran through my veins, and loosen'd every limb ;
Dim grew mine eyes ; and I could feel my heart,
Dying away within me, intermit
Its slow and feeble throbs, then suddenly
Start, as it seem'd exerting all its force
In one last effort. On the ground I fell,
I know not if entranced, or dead indeed,
But without motion, hearing, sight, or sense,
Feeling, or breath, or life. From that strange state,
Even in such blessed freedom from all pain
That sure I thought myself in very Heaven,
I woke, and raised my eyelids, and beheld
A light which seemed to penetrate my bones
With life and health. Before me, visible,
Stood Coatlantona ; a wreath of flowers
Circled her hair, and from their odorous leaves
Arose a lambent flame ; not fitfully,
Nor with faint flash or spark of earthly flowers ;
From these, forever flowing forth, there play'd,
In one perpetual dance of pointed light,
The azure radiance of innocuous fire.
She spake — Hear, Aztlan ! and give ear, O King
She said. Not yet the offended Gods relax
Their anger ; they require the Strangers' blood,
The foretaste of their banquet. Let their will Be known to Aztlan, and the brave perform
Their bidding ; I, meantime, will seek to soothe,
With all a mother's power, Mexitli's wrath.
So let the maidens daily with fresh flowers
Garland my temple ! — Daily with fresh flowers
Garland her temple, Aztlan ! and revere
The gentle mother of thy guardian God !

And let the brave, exclaim'd young Tlalala,
Perform her bidding! Servant of the Gods,
Declare their will! — Is it, that I should seek
The strangers, in the first who meets my way
To plunge the holy weapon? Say thou to me,
Do this! — and I depart to do the deed,
Though my life-blood should mingle with the foe's.

O brave young Chief! Tezozomoc replied,
With better fortune may the grateful Gods
Reward thy valor! deed so hazardous
They ask not. Couldst thou from the mountain holds

Tempt one of these rash foemen to pursue
Thine artful flight, an ambush'd band might rise
Upon the unsuspecting enemy,
And intercept his way; then hitherward
The captive should be led, and Aztlan's Gods
On their own altars see the sacrifice,
Well pleased, and Aztlan's sons, inspirited,
Behold the omen of assured success.
Thou know'st that Tlaloc's annual festival
Is close at hand. A stranger's child would prove
A victim, whose rare value would deserve
His certain favor. More I need not say.
Choose thou the force for ambush; and thyself
Alone, or with a chosen comrade, seek
The mountain dwellers.

Instant as he ceased,
Ocellopan began: I go with thee,
O Tlalala! My friend! — If one alone
Could have the honor of this enterprise,
My love might yield it thee; — but thou wilt need
A comrade. — Tlalala, I go with thee!
Whom, the Chief answer'd, should my heart select,

Its tried companion else, but thee, so oft
My brother in the battle? We will go,
Shedder of blood! together will we go,
Now, ere the midnight!

Nay! the Priest replied,
A little while delay; and ere ye go,
Devote yourselves to Heaven! Feebly he spake,
Like one exhausted; gathering then new force,
As with laborious effort, he pursued, —
Bedew Mexitli's altar with your blood,
And go beneath his guidance. I have yet
Strength to officiate, and to bless your zeal.

So saying, to the Temple of the God
He led the way. The warriors follow'd him;
And with his chiefs, Coanocotzin went,
To grace with all solemnity the rite.
They pass the Wall of Serpents, and ascend
The massive fabric; four times they surround
Its ample square; the fifth, they reach the height.
There, on the level top, two temple-towers
Were rear'd; the one Tezcalipoca's fane,
Supreme of Heaven, where now the wily Priest
Stood, watchful for his presence, and observed
The maize-strown threshold. His other pile,
By whose peculiar power and patronage
Aztlan was blest, Mexitli, woman-born.
Before the entrance, the eternal fire
Was burning; bare of foot they enter'd there.

On a blue throne, with four huge silver snakes,
As if the keepers of the sanctuary,
Circled, with stretching neck and fangs display'd,
Mexitli sat; another graven snake
Belted with scales of gold his monster bulk.
Around the neck a loathsome collar hung,
Of human hearts; the face was mask'd with gold;
His specular eyes seem'd fire; one hand uprear'd
A club; the other, as in battle, held
The shield; and over all suspended hung
The banner of the nation. They beheld
In awe, and knelt before the Terrible God.

Guardian of Aztlan! cried Tezozomoc,
Who to thy mortal mother hast assign'd
The kingdom o'er all trees, and arborets,
And herbs, and flowers, giving her endless life,
A Deity among the Deities;
While Coatlantona implores thy love
To thine own people, they in fear approach
Thy awful fane, who know no fear beside,
And offer up the worthiest sacrifice,
The blood of heroes!

To the ready Chiefs
He turn'd, and said, Now stretch your arms, and make
The offering to the God. They their bare arms
Stretched forth, and stabbed them with the aloe-
Then in a golden vase Tezozomoc [point.
Received the mingled streams, and held it up
Toward the giant Idol, and exclaim'd,
Terrible God! Protector of our realm!
Receive thine incense! Let the steam of blood
Ascend to thee, delightful! So mayst thou
Still to thy chosen people lend thine aid;
And these blaspheming strangers from the earth
Be swept away; as erst the monster race
Of Mammuth, Heaven's fierce ministers of wrath,
Who drain'd the lakes in thirst, and for their food
Exterminated nations. And as when,
Their dreadful ministry of death fulfill'd,
Ipalnemoani, by whom we live,
Bade thee go forth, and with thy lightnings fill
The vault of Heaven, and with thy thunders rock
The rooted earth, till of the monster race
Only their monumental bones remain'd, —
So arm thy favor'd people with thy might,
Terrible God! and purify the land
From these blaspheming foes!

He said, and gave
Ocellopan the vase. — Chiefs, ye have pour'd
Your strength and courage to the Terrible God,
Devoted to his service; take ye now
The beverage he hath hallow'd. In your youth
Ye have quaff'd manly blood, that manly thoughts
Might ripen in your hearts; so now with this,
Which mingling from such noble veins hath flowed,
Increase of valor drink, and added force.
Ocellopan received the bloody vase,
And drank, and gave in silence to his friend
The consecrated draught; then Tlalala
Drain'd off the offering. Braver blood than this
My lips can never taste! quoth he; but soon
Grant me, Mexitli, a more grateful cup, —
The Stranger's life!

Are all the rites perform'd?
Ocellopan inquired. Yea, all is done,
Answer'd the Priest. Go! and the guardian God
Of Aztlan be your guide!

Lo! as Tezozomoc was passing by
The eternal fire, the eternal fire shot up
A long blue flame. He started; he exclaim'd,
The God! the God! Tezalipoca's Priest
Echoed the welcome cry, The God! the God!
For lo! his footsteps mark the maize-strawn floor.
A mighty shout from all the multitudes
Of Aztlan rose; they cast into the fire
The victims, whose last shrieks of agony
Mingled unheeded with the cries of joy.
Then louder from the spiral sea-shell's depth
Swell'd the full roar, and from the hollow wood
Peal'd deeper thunders. Round the choral band,
The circling nobles, gay with gorgeous plumes,
And gems which sparkled to the midnight fire,
Moved in the solemn dance; each in his hand,
In measured movements lifts the feathery shield,
And shakes a rattling ball to measured sounds.
With quicker steps, the inferior chiefs without,
Equal in number, but in just array,
The spreading radii of the mystic wheel,
Revolve; and, outermost, the youths roll round,
In motions rapid as their quicken'd blood.
So thus with song and harmony the night
Past on in Aztlan, and all hearts rejoiced.

XI.

THE CAPTURE.

MEANTIME from Aztlan, on their enterprise,
Shedder of Blood and Tiger of the War,
Ocellopan and Tlalala set forth.
With chosen followers, through the silent night,
Silent they travell'd on. After a way
Circuitous and far through lonely tracks,
They reach'd the mountains, and amid the shade
Of thickets covering the uncultured slope,
Their patient ambush placed. The chiefs alone
Held on, till, winding in ascent, they reach'd
The heights which o'er the Briton's mountain hold
Impended; there they stood, and by the moon,
Who yet, with undiminished lustre, hung
High in the dark blue firmament, from thence Explored the steep descent. Precipitous
The rock beneath them lay, a sudden cliff,
Bare and unbroken; in its midway holes,
Where never hand could reach, nor eye intrude,
The eagle built her eyrie. Farther on,
Its interrupted crags and ancient woods
Offered a difficult way. From crag to crag,
By rocky shelf, by trunk, or root, or bough,
A painful toil and perilous, they past;
And now, stretch'd out amid the matted shrubs,
Which, at the entrance of the valley, clothed
The rugged bank, they crouch'd.

By this the stars
Grew dim; the glow-worm hath put out her lamp;

The owls have ceased their night-song. On the top
Of yon magnolia the loud turkey's voice
Is heralding the dawn; from tree to tree
Extends the wakening watch-note, far and wide,
Till the whole woodlands echo with the cry.
Now breaks the morning; but as yet no foot
Hath mark'd the dews, nor sound of man is heard.
Then first Ocellopan beheld, where, near,
Beneath the shelter of a half-roof'd hut,
A sleeping stranger lay. He pointed him
To Tlalala. The Tiger look'd around:
None else was nigh. — Shall I descend, he said,
And strike him? Here is none to see the deed.
We offered to the Gods our mingled blood
Last night; and now, I deem it, they present
An offering which shall more propitiate them,
And omen sure success. I will go down
And kill!

He said, and, gliding like a snake,
Where Caradoc lay sleeping, made his way.
Sweetly slept he, and pleasant were his dreams
Of Britain, and the blue-eyed maid he loved.
The Azteca stood over him; he knew
His victim, and the power of vengeance gave Malignant joy. Once hast thou 'scaped my arm:
But what shall save thee now? the Tiger thought,
Exulting; and he raised his spear to strike.
That instant, o'er the Briton's unseen harp
The gale of morning past, and swept its strings
Into so sweet a harmony, that sure
It seem'd no earthly tone. The savage man
Suspends his stroke; he looks astonish'd round:
No human hand is near: — and hark! again
The aerial music swells and dies away.
Then first the heart of Tlalala felt fear:
He thought that some protecting spirit watch'd
Beside the Stranger, and, abash'd, withdrew.

A God protects him! to Ocellopan, Whispering, he said. Didst thou not hear the sound
Which enter'd into me, and fix'd my arm
Powerless above him?

Was it not a voice
From thine own Gods to strengthen thee, replied
His stern comrade, and make evident
Their pleasure in the deed?

Nay! Tlalala
Rejoin'd; they speak in darkness and in storms.
The thunder is their voice, that peals through heaven,
Or, rolling underneath us, makes earth rock
In tempest, and destroys the sons of men.
It was no sound of theirs, Ocellopan!
No voice to hearten, — for I felt it pass
Unmanning every limb; yea, it relax'd
The sinews of my soul. Shedder of Blood,
I cannot lift my hand against the man.
Go, if thy heart be stronger!

But meantime
Young Caradoc arose, of his escape
Unconscious; and by this the stirring sounds
Of day began, increasing now, as all
Now to their toil betake them. Some go fell
The stately tree; some from the trunk low-laid

How the huge boughs; here round the fire they char
The stake-points; here they level with a line
The ground-plot, and infix the ready piles,
Or, interknitting them with osiers, weave
The wicker wall; others along the lake,
From its shoal waters, gather reeds and canes, —
Light roofing, suited to the genial sky.
The woodman's measured stroke, the regular saw,
The wain slow-creaking, and the voice of man
Answering his fellow, or in single toil,
Cheering his labor with a cheerful song,
Strange concert made to those fierce Aztecas,
Who, beast-like, in their silent lurking-place
Couch'd close and still, observant for their prey.

All overseeing, and directing all,
From place to place moved Madoc, and beheld
The dwellings rise. Young Hoel at his side
Ran on, best pleased when at his Uncle's side
Courting indulgent love. And now they came Beside the half-roof'd hut of Caradoc;
Of all the mountain-dwellings that the last.
The little boy, in boyish wantonness,
Would quit his Uncle's hold, and haste away,
With childhood's frolic speed, then laugh aloud,
To tempt pursuit; now running to the huts,
Now toward the entrance of the valley straits.
But wheresoe'er he turned, Ocellopan,
With hunter's eye, pursued his heedless course,
In breath-suspending vigilance. Ah me!
The little wretch toward his lurking-place
Draws near, and calls on Madoc; and the Prince
Thinks of no danger nigh, and follows not
The childish lure! nearer the covert now
Young Hoel runs, and stops, and calls again;
Then like a lion, from his couching-place,
Ocellopan leap'd forth, and seized his prey.

Loud shriek'd the affrighted child, as in his arms
The savage grasp'd him; startled at the cry,
Madoc beheld him hastening through the pass.
Quick as instinctive love can urge his feet
He follows, and he now almost hath reach'd
The encumber'd ravisher, and hope inspires
New speed, — yet nearer now, and nearer still,
And lo! the child holds out his little arms!
That instant, as the Prince almost had laid
His hand upon the boy, young Tlalala
Leap'd on his neck, and soon, though Madoc's strength,
With frantic fury, shook him from his hold,
Far down the steep Ocellopan had fled.
Ah! what avails it now, that they, by whom
Madoc was standing to survey their toil,
Have miss'd their Chief, and spread the quick alarm?
What now avails it, that, with distant aid,
His gallant men come down? Regarding nought
But Hoel, but the wretched Llaian's grief,
He rushes on; and ever as he draws
Near to the child, the Tiger Tlalala
Impedes his way; and now they reach the place
Of ambush, and the ambush'd band arise,
And Madoc is their prisoner.

Caradoc,

In vain thou leadest on the late pursuit!
In vain, Cadwallon, hath thy love alarm'd
Caught the first sound of evil! They pour out
Tumultuous from the vale, a half-arm'd troop;
Each with such weapons as his hasty hand
Can seize, they rush to battle. Gallant men,
Your valor boots not! It avails not now,
With such fierce onset that ye charge the foe,
And drive with such full force the weapon home!
They, while ye slaughter them, impede pursuit;
And far away, meantime, their comrades bear
The captive Prince. In vain his noble heart
Swells now with wild and suffocating rage;
In vain he struggles: — they have bound his limbs
With the tough osier, and his struggles now
But bind more close and cuttingly the band.
They hasten on; and while they bear the prize,
Leaving their ill-doomed fellows in the fight
To check pursuit, foremost afar of all,
With unabating strength, by joy inspired,
Ocellopan to Aztlan bears the child.

XII.

HOEL.

Good tidings travel fast. — The chief is seen;
He hastens on; he holds the child on high;
He shouts aloud. Through Aztlan spreads the news;
Each to his neighbor tells the happy tale, —
Joy, — joy to Aztlan! the Blood-shedder comes!
Tlaloc has given his victim.

Ah, poor child!

They from the gate swarm out to welcome thee:
Warriors, and men grown gray, and youths, and maids,
Exulting, forth they crowd. The mothers throng
To view thee, and, while thinking of thy doom,
They clasp their own dear infants to the breast
With deeper love, delighted think that thou
Shalt suffer for them. He, poor child, admires
The strange array! with wonder he beholds
Their olive limbs, half bare, their plummy crowns,
And gazes round and round, where all was new,
Forgetful of his fears. But when the Priest
Approach'd to take him from the Warrior's arms,
Then Hoel scream'd, and from that hideous man
Averting, to Ocellopan he turn'd,
And would have clung to him, so dreadful late,
Stern as he was, and terrible of eye,
Less dreadful than the Priest, whose dark aspect
Which nature with her harshest characters Had featured, art made worse. His cowl was white;
His untrimm'd hair, a long and loathsome mass,
With cotton cords intertwined, clung with gum,
And matted with the blood, which, every morn,
He from his temples drew before the God,
In sacrifice; bare were his arms, and smear'd
Black. But his countenance a stronger dread
Than all the horrors of that outward garb,
Struck with quick instinct to young Hoel's heart.

It was a face whose settled sullenness
No gentle feeling ever had disturb'd ;
Which, when he probed a victim's living breast,
Retained its hard composure.

Such was he

Who took the son of Llaian, heeding not
His cries, and screams, and arms in suppliant guise
Stretch'd out to all around, and strugglings vain.
He to the Temple of the Water-God
Convey'd his victim. By the threshold, there
The ministering Virgins stood, a comely band
Of high-born damsels, to the temple rites
By pious parents vow'd. Gladly to them
The little Hoel leap'd ; their gentle looks
No fear excited ; and he gazed around,
Pleased and surprised, unconscious to what end
These things were tending. O'er the rush-strown floor

They to the azure Idol led the boy,
Now not reluctant, and they raised the hymn.

God of the Waters ! at whose will the streams
Flow in their wonted channel, and diffuse
Their plenty round, the blood and life of earth ;
At whose command they swell, and o'er their banks

Burst with resistless ruin, making vain
The toils and hopes of man, — behold this child !
O strong to bless, and mighty to destroy,
Tlaloc ! behold thy victim ! so mayst thou
Restrain the peaceful streams within their banks,
And bless the labors of the husbandman.

God of the Mountains ! at whose will the clouds
Cluster around the heights ; who sendest them
To shed their fertilizing showers, and raise
The drooping herb, and o'er the thirsty vale Spread their green freshness ; at whose voice the hills

Grow black with storms ; whose wrath the thunder speaks ;

Whose bow of anger shoots the lightning shafts,
To blast the works of man ; — behold this child !
O strong to bless, and mighty to destroy,
Tlaloc ! behold thy victim ! so mayst thou
Lay by the fiery arrows of thy rage,
And bid the genial rains and dews descend.

O thou, Companion of the powerful God,
Companion and Beloved ! — when he treads
The mountain-top, whose breath diffuses round
The sweets of summer ; when he rides the waves,
Whose presence is the sunshine and the calm, —
Aiauh, O green-robed Goddess, see this child !
Behold thy victim ! so mayst thou appease
The sterner mind of Tlaloc when he frowns,
And Aztlan flourish in thy fostering smile.
Young Spirits ! ye whom Aztlan's piety
Hath given to Tlaloc, to enjoy with him,
For aye, the cool delights of Tlalocan, —
Young Spirits of the happy ; who have left
Your Heaven to-day, unseen assistants here, —
Behold your comrade ! see the chosen child,
Who through the lonely eave of death must pass,
Like you, to join you in eternal joy.

Now from the rush-strown temple they depart.
They place their smiling victim in a car,
Upon whose sides of pearly shell there play'd,
Shading and shifting still, the rainbow light.
On virgin shoulders is he borne aloft,
With dance before, and song and music round ;
And thus they seek, in festival array,
The water-side. There lies the sacred bark,
All gay with gold, and garlanded with flowers :
The virgins with the joyous boy embark ;
Ten boatmen urge them on ; the Priests behind
Follow, and all the long solemnity.
The lake is overspread with boats ; the sun
Shines on the gilded prows, the feathery crowns,
The sparkling waves. Green islets float along,
Where high-born damsels, under jasmine bowers,
Raise the sweet voice, to which the echoing oars,
In modulated motion, rise and fall.
The moving multitude along the shore
Flows like a stream ; bright shines the unclouded sky ;

Heaven, earth, and waters wear one face of joy.
Young Hoel with delight beholds the pomp ;
His heart throbs joyfully ; and if he thinks
Upon his mother now, 'tis but to think
How beautiful a tale for her glad ear
He hath when he returns. Meantime the maids
Weave garlands for his head, and raise the song.

Oh ! happy thou, whom early from the world
The Gods require ! not by the wasting worm
Of sorrow canker'd, nor condemn'd to feel
The pang of sickness, nor the wound of war,
Nor the long miseries of protracted age ;
But thus in childhood chosen of the God,
To share his joys. Soon shall thy rescued soul,
Child of the Stranger ! in his blissful world,
Mix with the blessed spirits ; for not thine,
Amid the central darkness of the earth,
To endure the eternal void ; — not thine to live,
Dead to all objects of eye, ear, or sense,
In the long horrors of one endless night,
With endless being curs'd. For thee the bowers
Of Tlalocan have blossom'd with new sweets ;
For thee have its immortal trees matured
The fruits of Heaven ; thy comrades even now
Wait thee, impatient, in their fields of bliss ;
The God will welcome thee, his chosen child,
And Aiauh love thee with a mother's love.
Child of the Stranger, dreary is thy way !
Darkness and Famine through the cave of Death
Must guide thee. Happy thou, when on that night
The morning of the eternal day shall dawn.

So as they sung young Hoel's song of death,
With rapid strength the boatmen plied their oars,
And through the water swift they glided on ;
And now to shore they drew. The stately bank
Rose with the majesty of woods o'erhung,
And rocks, or peering through the forest shade,
Or rising from the lake, and with their bulk
Glassing its dark, deep waters. Half way up,
A cavern pierced the rock ; no human foot
Had trod its depths, nor ever sunbeam reach'd
Its long recesses and mysterious gloom ;

To Tlaloc it was hallowed ; and the stone,
Which closed its entrance, never was removed,
Save when the yearly festival return'd,
And in its womb a child was sepulchred,
The living victim. Up the winding path,
That to the entrance of the cavern led,
With many a painful step the train ascend :
But many a time, upon that long ascent,
Young Hoel would have paused, with weariness
Exhausted now. They urge him on, — poor child !
They urge him on ! — Where is Cadwallon's aid ?
Where is the sword of Ririd ? where the arm
Of Madoc now ? — Oh ! better had he lived,
Unknowing and unknown, on Arvon's plain,
And trod upon his noble father's grave,
With peasant feet, unconscious ! — They have reach'd

The cavern now, and from its mouth the Priests
Roll the huge portal. Thitherward they force
The son of Llaian. A cold air comes out ; —
It chills him, and his feet recoil ; — in vain
His feet recoil ; — in vain he turns to fly,
Affrighted at the sudden gloom that spreads
Around ; — the den is closed, and he is left

COATEL.

THAT morn from Aztlan Coatel had gone,
In search of flowers, amid the woods and crags,
To deck the shrine of Coatlantona ;
Such flowers as in the solitary wilds
Hiding their modest beauty, made their worth
More valued for its rareness. 'Twas to her
A grateful task ; not only for she fled
Those cruel rites, to which nor reverent use
Nor frequent custom could familiarize
Her gentle heart, and teach it to put off
All womanly feeling ; — but that from all eyes
Escaped, and all obtrusive fellowship,
She in that solitude might send her soul
To where Lincoya with the Strangers dwelt.
She from the summit of the woodland heights
Gazed on the lake below. The sound of song
And instrument, in soften'd harmony,
Had reach'd her where she stray'd ; and she beheld
The pomp, and listen'd to the floating sounds,
A moment, with delight : but then a fear
Came on her, for she knew with what design
The Tiger and Ocellopan had sought
The dwellings of the Cymry. — Now the boats
Drew nearer, and she knew the Stranger's child.
She watch'd them land below ; she saw them wind
The ascent ; — and now from that abhorred cave
The stone is roll'd away, — and now the child
From light and life is cavern'd. Coatel
Thought of his mother then, of all the ills
Her fear would augur, and how worse than all
Which even a mother's maddening fear could feign,
His actual fate. She thought of this, and bow'd
Her face upon her knees, and closed her eyes,

Shuddering. Suddenly in the brake beside,
A rustling startled her, and from the shrubs,
A Vulture rose.

She moved toward the spot,
Led by an idle impulse, as it seem'd,
To see from whence the carrion bird had fled.
The bushes overhung a narrow chasm
Which pierced the hill : upon its mossy sides
Shade-loving herbs and flowers luxuriant grew,
And jutting crags made easy the descent.
A little way descending, Coatel [heard,
Stoop'd for the flowers, and heard, or thought she
A feeble sound below. She raised her head,
And anxiously she listen'd for the sound,
Not without fear. — Feebly again, and like
A distant cry, it came ; and then she thought,
Perhaps it was the voice of that poor child,
By the slow pain of hunger doom'd to die.
She shudder'd at the thought, and breathed a groan
Of unavailing pity ; — but the sound
Came nearer, and her trembling heart conceived
A dangerous hope. The Vulture from that chasm
Had fled, perchance accustomed in the cave
To seek his banquet, and by living feet
Alarm'd : — there was an entrance then below ;
And were it possible that she could save
The Stranger's child, — Oh, what a joy it were To tell Lincoya that !

It was a thought
Which made her heart with terror and delight
Throb audibly. From crag to crag she past,
Descending, and beheld a narrow cave
Enter the hill. A little way the light
Fell ; but its feeble glimmering she herself
Obstructed half, as stooping in she went.
The arch grew loftier, and the increasing gloom
Fill'd her with more affright ; and now she paused ;
For at a sudden and abrupt descent
She stood, and fear'd its unseen depth ; her heart
Fail'd, and she back had hasten'd ; but the cry
Reach'd her again, the near and certain cry
Of that most pitiable innocent.
Again adown the dark descent she look'd,
Straining her eyes ; by this the strengthen'd sight
Had grown adapted to the gloom around,
And her dilated pupils now received
Dim sense of objects near. Something below,
White in the darkness, lay ; it mark'd the depth ;
Still Coatel stood dubious ; but she heard
The wailing of the child, and his loud sobs ; —
Then, clinging to the rock with fearful hands,
Her feet explored below, and twice she felt
Firm footing, ere her fearful hold relax'd.
The sound she made, along the hollow rock
Ran echoing. Hoel heard it, and he came Groping along the side. A dim, dim light
Broke on the darkness of his sepulchre ;
A human form drew near him ; — he sprang on,
Screaming with joy, and clung to Coatel,
And cried, Oh, take me from this dismal place !
She answer'd not ; she understood him not ;
But clasp'd the little victim to her breast,
And shed delightful tears.

But from that den
Of darkness and of horror, Coatel

Durst not convey the child, though in her heart
 There was a female tenderness which yearn'd,
 As with maternal love, to cherish him.
 She hush'd his clamors, fearful lest the sound
 Might reach some other ear; she kiss'd away
 The tears that stream'd adown his little cheeks;
 She gave him food, which in the morn she brought,
 For her own wants, from Aztlan. Some few words
 Of Britain's ancient language she had learn'd
 From her Lineoya, in those happy days
 Of peace, when Aztlan was the Stranger's friend:
 Aptly she learnt, what willingly he taught,
 Terms of endearment, and the parting words
 Which promised quick return. She to the child
 These precious words address'd; and if it chanced
 Imperfect knowledge, or some difficult sound,
 Check'd her heart's utterance, then the gentle tone,
 The fond caress, intelligibly spake
 Affection's language.

But when she arose,
 And would have climb'd the ascent, the affrighted boy
 Fast held her, and his tears interpreted
 The prayer to leave him not. Again she kiss'd
 His tears away; again of soon return
 Assured and soothed him; till reluctantly
 And weeping, but in silence, he unloosed
 His grasp; and up the difficult ascent
 Coatel climb'd, and to the light of day
 Returning, with her flowers she hasten'd home.

 XIV.

THE STONE OF SACRIFICE.

Who comes to Aztlan, bounding like a deer
 Along the plain? — The herald of success;
 For, lo! his locks are braided, and his loins
 Cinctured with white; and see, he lifts the shield,
 And brandishes the sword. The populace
 Flock round, impatient for the tale of joy,
 And follow to the palace in his path.
 Joy! joy! the Tiger hath achieved his quest!
 They bring a captive home! — Triumphantly
 Coanocotzin and his Chiefs go forth
 To greet the youth triumphant, and receive
 The victim, whom the gracious gods have given,
 Sure omen and first fruits of victory.
 A woman leads the train, young, beautiful, —
 More beautiful for that translucent joy
 Flushing her cheek, and sparkling in her eye; —
 Her hair is twined with festal flowers, her robe
 With flowing wreaths adorn'd; she holds a child,
 He, too, bedeck'd and garlanded with flowers,
 And, lifting him, with agile force of arm,
 In graceful action, to harmonious step
 Accordant, leads the dance. It is the wife
 Of Tlalala, who, with his child, goes forth
 To meet her hero husband.

And behold,
 The Tiger comes! and ere the shouts and sounds
 Of gratulation cease, his followers bear
 The captive Prince. At that so welcome sight,

Loud rose the glad acclaim; nor knew they yet
 That he who there lay patient in his bonds,
 Expecting the inevitable lot,
 Was Madoc. Patient in his bonds he lay,
 Exhausted with vain efforts, hopeless now,
 And silently resign'd. But when the King
 Approach'd the prisoner, and beheld his face,
 And knew the Chief of Strangers, at that sound
 Electric joy shot through the multitude,
 And, like the raging of the hurricane,
 Their thundering transports peal'd. A deeper joy,
 A nobler triumph, kindled Tlalala,
 As, limb by limb, his eye survey'd the Prince,
 With a calm fierceness. And, by this, the Priests
 Approach'd their victim, clad in vestments white
 Of sacrifice, which from the shoulders fell,
 As from the breast, unbending, broad, and straight,
 Leaving their black arms bare. The blood-red robe,

The turquoise pendent from his down-drawn lip,
 The crown of glossy plumage, whose green hue
 Vied with his emerald ear-drops, mark'd their Chief,

Tezozomoc: his thin and ghastly cheek,
 Which — save the temple serpents, when he brought

Their human banquet, — never living eye
 Rejoiced to see, became more ghastly now,
 As in Mexitli's name, upon the Prince
 He laid his murderous hand. But, as he spake,
 Up darted Tlalala his eagle glance. —
 Away! away! he shall not perish so!
 The warrior cried. — Not tamely, by the knife,
 Nor on the jasper stone, his blood shall flow!
 The Gods of Aztlan love a Warrior Priest!
 I am their Priest to-day!

A murmuring
 Ran through the train; nor waited he to hear
 Denial thence; but on the multitude
 Aloud he call'd: — When first our fathers seized
 This land, there was a savage chief who stopp'd
 Their progress. He had gained the rank he bore,
 By long probation: stripes, which laid his flesh
 All bleeding bare, had forced not one complaint;
 Not when the working bowels might be seen,
 One movement; hand-bound, he had been confin'd

Where myriad insects on his nakedness
 Infix'd their venomous anger, and no start,
 No shudder, shook his frame; last in a net
 Suspended, he had felt the agony
 Of fire, which to his bones and marrow pierc'd,
 And breathed the suffocating smoke which 'T'd
 His lungs with fire, without a groan, a breath,
 A look betokening sense; so gallantly
 Had he subdued his nature. This brave man
 Met Aztlan in the war, and put her Chiefs
 To shame. Our Elders have not yet forgot
 How from the slaughtered brother of their King
 He stripp'd the skin, and formed of it a drum,
 Whose sound affrighted armies. With this man
 My father coped in battle; here he led him,
 An offering to the God; and man to man,
 He slew him here in fight. I was a child,
 Just old enough to lift my father's shield;

But I remember, on that glorious day,
When from the sacred combat he return'd,
His red hands reeking with the hot heart's blood,
How in his arms he took me, and besought
The God whom he had served, to bless his boy,
And make me like my father. Men of Aztlan, Mexitli heard his prayer; — here I have brought
The Stranger-Chief, the noblest sacrifice
That ever graced the altar of the God;
Let then his death be noble! so my boy
Shall, in the day of battle, think of me;
And as I follow'd my brave father's steps,
Pursue my path of glory.

Ere the Priest
Could frame denial, had the Monarch's look
Given his assent. — Refuse not this, he said,
O servant of the Gods! He hath not here
His arms to save him; and the Tiger's strength
Yields to no mortal might. Then for his sword
He call'd, and bade Yuhidthiton address
The Stranger-Chief.

Yuhidthiton began, —
The Gods of Aztlan triumph, and thy blood
Must wet their altars. Prince, thou shalt not die
The coward's death; but, sworded, and in fight,
Fall as becomes the valiant. Should thine arm
Subdue in battle six successive foes,
Life, liberty, and glory, will repay
The noble conquest. Madoc, hope not this!
Strong are the brave of Aztlan!

Then they loosed
The Ocean Chieftain's bonds; they rent away
His garments; and with songs and shouts of joy,
They led him to the Stone of Sacrifice.
Round was that Stone of blood; the half-raised arm
Of one of manly growth, who stood below,
Might rest upon its height; the circle small,
An active boy might almost bound across.
Nor needed for the combat ampler space;
For in the centre was the prisoner's foot
Fast fetter'd down. Thus fetter'd, Madoc stood.
He held a buckler, light and small, of eane
O'erlaid with beaten gold; his sword, the King,
Honoring a noble enemy, had given,
A weapon tried in war, — to Madoc's grasp
Strange and unwieldy: 'twas a broad, strong staff,
Set thick with transverse stones, on either side
Keen-edged as Syrian steel. But when he felt
The weapon, Madoc call'd to mind his deeds
Done on the Saxon in his father's land,
And hope arose within him. Nor, though now
Naked he stood, did fear for that assail
His steady heart; for often had he seen
His gallant countrymen, with naked breasts,
Rush on their iron-coated enemy,
And win the conquest.

Now hath Tlalala
Array'd himself for battle. First he donn'd
A gipion, quilted close of gossampine;
O'er that a jointed mail of plates of gold,
Bespotted like the tiger's speckled pride,
To speak his rank; it clad his arms half-way,
Half-way his thighs; but cuishes had he none,
Nor gauntlets, nor feet-armor. On his helm
There yawn'd the semblance of a tiger's head,

The long, white teeth extended, as for prey;
Proud crest, to blazon his proud title forth.
And now toward the fatal stage equipp'd
For fight he went; when, from the press behind,
A warrior's voice was heard, and clad in arms,
And shaking in his angry grasp the sword,
Ocellopan rush'd on, and cried aloud,
And for himself the holy combat claim'd.
The Tiger, heedless of his clamor, sprung
Upon the stone, and turn'd him to the war.
Fierce leaping forward came Ocellopan,
And bounded up the ascent, and seized his arm: —
Why wouldst thou rob me of a deed like this?
Equal our peril in the enterprise,
Equal our merit; — thou wouldst reap alone
The guerdon! Never shall my children lift
Their little hands at thee, and say, Lo! there
The Chief who slew the White King! — Tlalala, Trust to the lot, or turn on me, and prove,
By the best chance to which the brave appeal,
Who best deserves this glory!

Stung to wrath,
The Tiger answer'd not; he raised his sword,
And they had rushed to battle; but the Priests
Came hastening up, and by their common Gods,
And by their common country, bade them cease
Their impious strife, and let the lot decide
From whom Mexitli should that day receive
His noble victim. Both unsatisfied,
But both obedient, heard. Two equal shafts,
As outwardly they seem'd, the Paba brought;
His mantle hid their points; and Tlalala
Drew forth the broken stave. A bitter smile
Darken'd his cheek, as angrily he cast
To earth the hostile lot. — Shedder of Blood,
Thine is the first adventure! he exclaim'd;
But thou mayst perish here! — and in his heart
The Tiger hoped Ocellopan might fall,
As sullenly retiring from the stage,
He mingled with the crowd.

And now opposed
In battle, on the Stone of Sacrifice,
Prince Madoc and the Life-Destroyer stood.
This clad in arms complete, free to advance
In quick assault, or shun the threaten'd blow,
Wielding his wonted sword; the other, stripp'd,
Save of that fragile shield, of all defence;
His weapon strange and cumbrous; and pinn'd
down,
Disabled from all onset, all retreat.

With looks of greedy joy, Ocellopan
Survey'd his foe, and wonder'd to behold
The breast so broad, the bare and brawny limbs,
Of matchless strength. The eye of Madoc, too,
Dwelt on his foe; his countenance was calm,
Something more pale than wonted; like a man
Prepared to meet his death. The Azteca
Fiercely began the fight; now here, now there,
Aright, aloft, above, below, he wheel'd
The rapid sword: still Madoc's rapid eye
Pursued the motion, and his ready shield,
In prompt interposition, caught the blow,
Or turn'd its edge aside. Nor did the Prince
Yet aim the sword to wound, but held it forth,

Another shield, to save him, till his hand,
Familiar with its weight and shape uncount,
Might wield it well to vengeance. Thus he stood,
Baffling the impatient enemy, who now
Wax'd wrathful, thus to waste, in idle strokes,
Reiterate so oft, his bootless strength.

And now yet more exasperate he grew;
For from the eager multitude was heard,
Amid the din of undistinguish'd sounds,
The Tiger's murmur'd name, as though they thought,

Had he been on the Stone, ere this, besure,
The Gods had tasted of their sacrifice,
Now all too long delayed. Then fiercelier,
And yet more rapidly, he drove the sword;
But still the wary Prince or met its fall,
And broke the force, or bent him from the blow;
And now retiring, and advancing now,
As one free foot permitted, still provoked,
And baffled still the savage; and sometimes
With cautious strength did Madoc aim attack,
Mastering each moment now with abler sway
The acquainted sword. But, though as yet unharm'd

In life or limb, more perilous the strife
Grew momentarily; for with repeated strokes,
Battered and broken now, the shield hung loose;
And shouts of triumph from the multitude
Arose, as piecemeal they beheld it fall,
And saw the Prince exposed.

That welcome sight,
Those welcome sounds, inspired Ocellopan;
He felt each limb new-strung. Impatient now
Of conquest long delay'd, with wilder rage
He drives the weapon; Madoc's lifted sword
Received its edge, and shiver'd with the blow.
A shriek of transport burst from all around;
For lo! the White King, shieldless, weaponless,
Naked before his foe! That savage foe,
Dallying with the delight of victory,
Drew back a moment to enjoy the sight,
Then yell'd in triumph, and sprang on to give
The consummating blow. Madoc beheld
The coming death; he darted up his hand
Instinctively to save, and caught the wrist
In its mid fall, and drove with desperate force
The splintered truncheon of his broken sword
Full in the enemy's face. Beneath his eye
It broke its way, and where the nasal nerves
Branch in fine fibrils o'er their mazy seat,
Burst through, and, slanting upward, in the brain
Buried its jagged point.

Madoc himself
Stood at his fall astonished, at escape
Unhoped, and strange success. The multitude
Beheld, and they were silent, and they stood
Gazing in terror. But far other thoughts
Rose in the Tiger's heart; it was a joy
To Tlalala; and forth he sprung, and up
The Stone of Sacrifice, and call'd aloud
To bring the Prince another sword and shield,
For his last strife. Then, in that interval,
Upon Ocellopan he fixed his eyes,
Contemplating the dead, as though thereby

To kindle in his heart a fiercer thirst
For vengeance. Nor to Madoc was the sting
Of anger wanting, when in Tlalala
He knew the captive whom his mercy freed,
The man whose ambush had that day destroyed
Young Hoel and himself; — for sure he deem'd
Young Hoel was with God, and he himself
At his death day arrived. And now he grasp'd
A second sword, and held another shield;
And from the Stone of Blood Ocellopan
Was borne away; and, fresh in arms, and fierce
With all that makes a savage thirst for war, —
Hope, vengeance, courage, superstitious hate, —
A second foe came on. By this the Prince
Could wield his weapon well; and dreading now
Lest, in protracted combat, he might stand
Again defenceless, he put forth his strength,
As oft assailing as assailed, and watch'd
So well the Tiger's motions, and received
The Tiger's blows so warily, and aimed
His own so fierce and fast, that in the crowd
Doubt and alarm prevailed. Ilanquel grew
Pale at her husband's danger; and she clasp'd
The infant to her breast, whom late she held
On high, to see his victory. The throng
Of the beholders silently look'd on;
And in their silence might at times be heard
An indrawn breath of terror; and the Priests
Angrily murmured, that in evil hour,
Coanocotzin had indulged the pride
Of vaunting valor, and from certain death
Reprived the foe.

But now a murmur rose
Amid the multitude; and they who stood
So thickly throng'd, and with such eager eyes
Late watch'd the fight, hastily now broke up.
And with disorder'd speed and sudden arms,
Ran to the city gates. More eager now,
Conscious of what had chanced, fought Tlalala
And hope invigorated Madoc's heart;
For well he ween'd Cadwallon was at hand,
Leading his gallant friends. Aright he ween'd;
At hand Cadwallon was! His gallant friends
Came from the mountains with impetuous speed,
To save or to revenge. Nor long endured
The combat now: the Priests ascend the stone,
And bid the Tiger hasten to defend
His country and his Gods; and, hand and foot,
Binding the captive Prince, they bear him thence,
And lay him in the temple. Then his heart
Resign'd itself to death, and Madoc thought
Of Llaian and Goervyl; and he felt
That death was dreadful. But not so the King
Permitted; but not so had Heaven decreed;
For noble was the King of Aztlan's heart,
And pure his tongue from falsehood: he had said,
That by the warrior's death should Madoc die;
Nor dared the Pabas violently break
The irrevocable word. There Madoc lay
In solitude; the distant battle reach'd
His ear; inactive and in bonds he lay,
Expecting the dread issue, and almost Wish'd for the perils of the fight again.

XV.

THE BATTLE.

Nor unprepared Cadwallon found the sons
Of Aztlan, nor defenceless were her walls;
But when the Britons' distant march was seen,
A ready army issued from her gates,
And dight themselves to battle: these the King
Coanocotzin had, with timely care,
And provident for danger, thus arrayed.
Forth issuing from the gates, they met the foe,
And with the sound of sonorous instruments,
And with their shouts, and screams, and yells, drove back

The Britons' fainter war-cry, as the swell
Of ocean, flowing onward, up its course
Repels the river-stream. Their darts and stones
Fell like the rain drops of the summer-shower,
So fast, and on the helmet and the shield,
On the strong corselet and the netted mail,
So innocent they fell. But not in vain
The bowmen of Deheubarth sent, that day,
Their iron bolts abroad; those volant deaths
Descended on the naked multitude,
And through the chieftain's quilted gossampine,
Through feathery breastplate and effulgent gold,
They reach'd the life.

But soon no interval
For archers' art was left, nor scope for flight
Of stone from whirling sling: both hosts, alike
Impatient for the proof of war, press on;
The Aztecas, to shun the arrowy storm,
The Cymry, to release their Lord, or heap
Aztlan in ruins, for his monument.
Spear against spear, and shield to shield, and breast
To breast, they met; equal in force of limb,
And strength of heart, in resolute resolve
And stubborn effort of determined wrath:
The few, advantaged by their iron mail;
The weaklier arm'd, of near retreat assured
And succor close at hand, in tenfold troops
Their foemen overnumbering. And of all
That mighty multitude, did every man
Of either host, alike inspired by all
That stings to will and strengthens to perform,
Then put forth all his power; for well they knew
Aztlan that day must triumph or must fall.
Then sword and mace on helm and buckler rang,
And hurtling javelins whirr'd along the sky.
Nor when they hurled the javelin, did the sons
Of Aztlan, prodigal of weapons, loose
The lance, to serve them for no second stroke;
A line of ample measure still retain'd
The missile shaft; and when its blow was spent,
Swiftly the dexterous spearman coiled the string,
And sped again the artificer of death.
Rattling, like summer hailstones, they descend,
But from the Britons' iron panoply,
Baffled and blunted, fell; nor more avail'd
The stony falchion there, whose broken edge
Inflicts no second wound; nor profited,
On the strong buckler or the crested helm,
The knotty club; though fast, in blinding showers,

Those javelins fly, those heavy weapons fall
With stunning weight. Meantime, with wonted
strength,

The men of Gwyneth through their fenceless foes
Those lances thrust, whose terrors had so oft Affrayed the Saxons, and whose home-driven points

So oft had pierced the Normen's knightly arms.
Little did then his pomp of plumes bestead
The Azteca, or glittering pride of gold,
Against the tempered sword; little his casque,
Gay with its feathery coronal, or dress'd
In graven terrors, when the Britons' hand
Drove in through helm and head the short-piked mace;

Or swung its iron weights with shattering sway,
Which, where they struck, destroyed. Beneath those arms

The men of Aztlan fell; and whoso dropp'd
Dead or disabled, him his comrades bore
Away with instant caution, lest the sight
Of those whom they had slaughtered might inspire
The foe with hope and courage. Fast they fell,
And fast were resupplied, man after man
Succeeding to the death. Nor in the town
Did now the sight of their slain countrymen,
Momentarily carried in and piled in heaps,
Awake one thought of fear. Hark! through the streets

Of Aztlan, how from house to house, and tower
To tower, reiterate, Paynalton's name
Calls all her sons to battle! at whose name
All must go forth, and follow to the field
The Leader of the Armies of the Gods,
Whom, in his unseen power, Mexitli now
Sends out to lead his people. They, in crowds,
Throng for their weapons to the House of Arms,
Beneath their guardian Deity preserved,
Through years of peace; and there the Pabas stood
Within the temple-court, and dealt around
The ablution of the Stone of Sacrifice,
Bidding them, with the holy beverage,
Lubibe diviner valor, strength of arm
Not to be wearied, hope of victory,
And certain faith of endless joy in Heaven,
Their sure reward. — Oh, happy, cried the Priests,
Your brethren who have fallen! already they
Have joined the company of blessed souls;
Already they, with song and harmony,
And in the dance of beauty, are gone forth,
To follow down his western path of light
Yon Sun, the Prince of Glory, from the world
Retiring to the Palace of his rest.
Oh, happy they, who, for their country's cause,
And for their Gods, shall die the brave man's death!

Them will their country consecrate with praise!
Them will the Gods reward! — They heard the Priests

Intoxicate, and from the gate swarmed out,
Tumultuous, to the fight of martyrdom.

But when Cadwallon every moment saw
The enemies increase, and with what rage
Of drunken valor to the fight they rush'd,

He, against that impetuous attack,
As best he could, providing, form'd the troops
Of Britain into one collected mass:
Three equal sides it offered to the foe,
Close and compact; no multitude could break
The condensed strength; its narrow point press'd on,

Entering the throng's resistance, like a wedge,
Still from behind impell'd. So, thought the Chief,
Likeliest the gates of Aztlan might be gain'd,
And Hoel and the Prince preserved, if yet
They were among mankind. Nor could the force
Of hostile thousands break that strength condensed,

Against whose iron sides the stream of war
Roll'd unavailing, as the ocean waves
Which idly round some insulated rock
Foam furious, warning with their silvery smoke
The mariner far off. Nor could the point
Of that compacted body, though it bore
Right on the foe, and with united force
Press'd on to enter, through the multitude
Win now its difficult way; as where the sea
Pours through some strait its violent waters, swoln
By inland fresh, vainly the oarmen there
With all their weight and strength essay to drive
Their galley through the pass, the stress and strain
Availing scarce to stem the impetuous stream.

And hark! above the deafening din of fight
Another shout, heard like the thunder-peal,
Amid the war of winds! Lincoya comes,
Leading the mountain-dwellers. From the shock
Aztlan recoil'd. And now a second troop
Of Britons to the town advanced, for war
Impatient and revenge. Cadwailon these,
With tidings of their gallant Prince enthral'd,
Had summoned from the ships. That dreadful tale
Roused them to fury. Not a man was left
To guard the fleet; for who could have endured
That idle duty? who could have endured
The long, inactive, miserable hours,
And hope, and expectation, and the rage
Of maddening anguish? Ririd led them on;
In whom a brother's love had call'd not up
More spirit-stirring pain, than trembled now
In every British heart; so dear to all
Was Madoc. On they came; and Aztlan then
Had fled appall'd; but in that dangerous hour
Her faith preserved her. From the gate her Priests
Rush'd desperate out, and to the foremost rank
Forced their wild way, and fought with martyr zeal.
Through all the host contagious fury spread;
Nor had the sight that hour enabled them
To mightier efforts, had Mexitli, clad
In all his imag'd terrors, gone before
Their way, and driven upon his enemies
His giant club destroying. Then more fierce
The conflict grew; the din of arms, the yell
Of savage rage, the shriek of agony,
The groan of death, commingled in one sound
Of undistinguished horrors: while the Sun,
Retiring slow beneath the plain's far verge,
Shed o'er the quiet hills his fading light.

XVI.

THE WOMEN.

SILENT and solitary is thy vale,
Caermadoc, and how melancholy now
That solitude and silence! — Broad noon-day,
And not a sound of human life is there!
The fisher's net, abandoned in his haste,
Sways idly in the waters; in the tree,
Where its last stroke had pierced, the hatchet hangs:

The birds, beside the mattock and the spade,
Hunt in the new-turn'd mould, and fearlessly
Fly through the cage-work of the imperfect wall;
Or through the vacant dwelling's open door,
Pass and repass secure.

In Madoc's house,
And on his bed of reeds, Goeryvl lies,
Her face toward the ground. She neither weeps,
Nor sighs, nor groans; too strong her agony
For outward sign of anguish, and for prayer
Too hopeless was the ill; and though, at times,
The pious exclamation past her lips,
Thy will be done! yet was that utterance
Rather the breathing of a broken heart,
Than of a soul resigned. Mervyn, beside,
Hangs over his dear mistress silently,
Having no hope or comfort to bestow,
Nor aught but sobs and unavailing tears.
The women of Caermadoc, like a flock
Collected in their panic, stand around
The house of their lost leader; and they too
Are mute in their despair. Llaian alone
Is absent; wildly hath she wander'd forth
To seek her child; and such the general woe,
That none hath mark'd her absence. Yet have they,

Though unprotected thus, no selfish fear;
The sudden evil had destroyed all thought,
All sense, of present danger to themselves,
All foresight.

Yet new terrors! Malinal,
Panting with speed, bursts in, and takes the arms
Of Madoc down. Goeryvl, at that sound,
Started in sudden hope; but when she saw
The Azteca, she uttered a faint scream
Of wrongful fear, remembering not the proofs
Of his tried truth, nor recognizing aught
In those known features, save their hostile hue.
But he, by worse fear abating soon
Her vain alarm, exclaim'd, I saw a band
Of Hoamen conning up the straits, for ill,
Besure, for Amalabta leads them on.
Buckle this harness on, that, being arm'd,
I may defend the entrance.

Scarce had she
Fastened the breastplate with her trembling hands,
When, flying from the sight of men in arms,
The women crowded in. Hastily he seized
The shield and spear, and on the threshold took
His stand; but, waken'd now to provident thought,
Goeryvl, following, helm'd him. There was now

No time to gird the bauldric on ; she held
Her brother's sword, and bade him look to her
For prompt supply of weapons ; in herself
Being resolved not idly to abide,
Nor unprepared of hand or heart to meet
The issue of the danger, nor to die
Reluctant now.

Rightly had they divined
The Hoaman's felon purpose. When he heard
The fate of Madoc, from his mother's eye
He mask'd his secret joy, and took his arms,
And to the rescue, with the foremost band,
Set forth. But soon upon the way, he told
The associates of his crime, that now their hour
Of triumph was arrived ; Caermadoc, left
Defenceless, would become, with all its wealth,
The spoiler's easy prey — raiment, and arms,
And iron ; skins of that sweet beverage,
Which to a sense of its own life could stir
The joyful blood ; the women, above all,
Whom to the forest they might bear away,
To be their slaves, if so their pleasure was :
Or, yielding them to Aztlan, for such prize
Receive a royal guerdon. Twelve there were,
Long leagued with him in guilt, who turn'd aside :
And they have reach'd Caermadoc now, and now
Rush onward where they see the women fly ;
When, on the threshold, clad in Cimbric arms,
And with long lance protended, Malinal
Rebuffs them from the entrance. At that sight
Suddenly quail'd, they stood, as midnight thieves
Who find the master waking ; but ere long,
Gathering a boastful courage, as they saw
No other guard, press'd forward, and essay'd
To turn his spear aside. Its steady point,
True to the impelling strength, held on, and thrust
The foremost through the breast, and breath and blood

Followed the re-drawn shaft. Nor seem'd the strife
Unequal now, though, with their numbers, they Beleaguer'd in half-ring the door, where he,
The sole defender, stood. From side to side
So well and swiftly did he veer the lance,
That every enemy beheld its point
Aim'd at himself direct. But chief on one
Had Malinal his deadly purpose fix'd,
On Amalahta ; by his death to quell
The present danger, and cut off the root
Of many an evil, certain else to spring
From that accursed stock. On him his eye
Turn'd with more eager wilfulness, and dwelt
With keener ken ; and now, with sudden step
Bending his body on, at him he drives
The meditated blow ; but that ill Princee,
As chiefly sought, so chiefly fearing, swerved
Timely aside ; and ere the Azteca
Recovered from the frustrate aim, the spear
Was seized, and from his hold by stress and weight
Of numbers wrench'd. He, facing still the foe,
And holding at arm's length the targe, put back
His hand, and called Goervyl, and from her
Received the sword ; — in time, for the enemy
Press'd on so near, that, having now no scope
To raise his arm, he drove the blade straight on.
It entered at the mouth of one who stood

With face aslant, and glanced along the teeth
Through to the ear, then, slivering downward, left
The cheek-flap dangling. He, in that same point
Of time, as if a single impulse gave Birth to the double action, dash'd his shield
Against another's head, with so fierce swing
And sway of strength, that his third enemy
Fell at his feet. Astounded by such proof
Of prowess, and by unexpected loss
Dismayed, the foe gave back, beyond the reach
Of his strong arm ; and there awhile they stood,
Beholding him at bay, and counselling
How best to work their vengeance upon him,
Their sole opponent. Soon did they behold
The vantage, overlook'd by hasty hope,
How vulnerable he stood, his arms and thighs
Bare for their butt. At once they bent their bows ;
At once ten arrows fled ; seven, shot in vain,
Rung on his shield ; but, with unhappier mark,
Two shafts hung quivering in his leg ; a third
Below the shoulder pierced. Then Malinal
Groan'd, not for anguish of his wounds, but grief
And agony of spirit ; yet resolved
To his last gasp to guard that precious post,
Nor longer able to endure afoot,
He, falling on his knees, received unharm'd
Upon the shield, now ample for defence,
Their second shower, and still defied the foe.
But they, now sure of conquest, hasten'd on
To thrust him down ; and he too felt his strength
Ebbing away. Goervyl, in that hour
Of horror and despair, collected still,
Caught him, and by the shoulders drew him in ;
And, calling on her comrades, with their help
Shut to the door in time, and with their weight
Secured it, not their strength ; for she alone,
Found worthy of her noble ancestry,
In this emergence felt her faculties
All present, and heroic strength of heart,
To cope with danger and contempt of death.
Shame on ye, British women ! shame ! exclaim'd
The daughter of King Owen, as she saw
The trembling hands and bloodless countenance
Pale as sepulchral marble ; silent some ;
Others with womanish cries lamenting now
That ever, in unhappy hour, they left
Their native land ; — a pardonable fear ;
For hark, the war-whoop ! sound, whereto the
Of tigers or hyenas, heard at night [howl
By captive from barbarian foes escaped,
And wandering in the pathless wilderness,
Were music. Shame on ye ! Goervyl cried ;
Think what your fathers were, your husbands what
And what your sons should be ! These savages
Seek not to wreak on ye immediate death ;
So are ye safe, if safety such as this
Be worth a thought ; and in the interval
We yet may gain, by keeping to the last
This entrance, easily to be maintain'd
By us, though women, against foes so few ; —
Who knows what succor chance, or timely thought
Of our own friends may send, or Providence,
Who slumbereth not ? — While thus she spake, a hand

In at the window came, of one who sought
That way to win the entrance. She drew out
The arrow through the arm of Malinal,
With gentle care, — the readiest weapon that, —
And held it short above the bony barb,
And, adding deeds to words, with all her might
She stabbed it through the hand. The sudden pain

Provoked a cry, and back the savage fell,
Loosening his hold, and main'd for further war.
Nay! leave that entrance open! she exclaim'd
To one who would have closed it, — who comes next

Shall not go thence so cheaply! — for she now
Had taken up a spear to guard that way,
Easily guarded, even by female might.
O heart of proof! what now avails thy worth
And excellent courage? for the savage foe,
With mattock and with spade, for other use
Design'd, hew now upon the door, and rend
The wattled sides; and they within shrink back,
For now it splinters through, — and lo, the way
Is open to the spoiler!

Then once more,
Collecting his last strength, did Malinal
Rise on his knees, and over him the maid
Stands with the ready spear, she guarding him
Who guarded her so well. Roused to new force
By that example'd valor, and with will
To achieve one service yet before he died, —
If death indeed, as sure he thought, were nigh, —
Malinal gathered up his fainting powers;
And reaching forward, with a blow that threw
His body on, upon the knee he smote
One Hoaman more, and brought him to the ground.
The foe fell over him; but he, prepared,
Threw him with sudden jerk aside, and rose
Upon one hand, and with the other plunged
Between his ribs the mortal blade. Meantime
Amalahta, rushing in blind eagerness
To seize Goervyl, set at nought the power
Of female hands, and stooping as he came,
Beneath her spear-point, thought with lifted arm
To turn the thrust aside. But she drew back,
And lowered at once the spear, with aim so sure,
That on the front it met him, and ploughed up
The whole scalp-length. He, blinded by the blood,
Staggered aside, escaping by that chance
A second push, else mortal. And by this,
The women, learning courage from despair,
And by Goervyl's bold example fired,
Took heart, and rushing on with one accord,
Drove out the foe. Then took they hope; for then
They saw but seven remain in plight for war;
And, knowing their own number, in the pride
Of strength, caught up stones, staves, or axe, or spear,

To hostile use converting whatsoe'er
The hasty hand could seize. Such fierce attack
Confused the ruffian band; nor had they room
To aim the arrow, nor to speed the spear,
Each now beset by many. But their Prince,
Still mindful of his purport, call'd to them —
Secure my passage while I bear away
The White King's Sister; having her, the law

Of peace is in our power. — And on he went Toward Goervyl, and, with sudden turn,
While on another foe her eye was fix'd,
Ran in upon her, and stoop'd down, and clasp'd
The maid above the knees, and throwing her
Over his shoulder, to the valley straits
Set off; — ill seconded in ill attempt;
For now his comrades are too close beset
To aid their Chief, and Mervyn hath beheld
His lady's peril. At the sight, inspired
With force, as if indeed that manly garb
Had clothed a manly heart, the Page ran on,
And with a bill-hook striking at his ham,
Cut the back sinews. Amalahta fell;
The Maid fell with him: and she first hath risen,
While, grovelling on the earth, he gnash'd his teeth
For agony. Yet, even in those pangs,
Remembering still revenge, he turn'd and seized
Goervyl's skirt, and pluck'd her to the ground,
And roll'd himself upon her, and essayed
To kneel upon her breast; but she clinch'd fast
His bloody locks, and drew him down aside,
Faint now with anguish, and with loss of blood;
And Mervyn, coming to her help again,
As once again he rose, around the neck
Seized him, with throttling grasp, and held him
down, —

Strange strife and horrible, — till Malinal
Crawl'd to the spot, and thrust into his groin
The mortal sword of Madoc; he himself,
At the same moment, fainting, now no more
By his strong will upheld, the service done.
The few surviving traitors, at the sight
Of their fallen Prince and Leader, now too late
Believed that some diviner power had given
These female arms strength for their overthrow,
Themselves proved weak before them, as, of late,
Their God, by Madoc crush'd.

Away they fled
Toward the valley straits; but in the gorge
Erillyab met their flight: and then her heart,
Boding the evil, smote her, and she bade
Her people seize, and bring them on in bonds,
For judgment. She herself, with quicken'd pace,
Advanced, to know the worst; and o'er the dead
Casting a rapid glance, she knew her son.
She knew him by his garments, by the work
Of her own hands; for now his face, besmeared
And black with gore, and stiffened in its pangs,
Bore of the life no semblance. — God is good!
She cried, and closed her eyelids, and her lips
Shook, and her countenance changed. But in her heart

She quell'd the natural feeling. — Bear away
These wretches! to her followers she exclaim'd;
And root them from the earth. Then she approach'd

Goervyl, who was pale and trembling now,
Exhausted with past effort; and she took
Gently the maiden's tremulous hand, and said,
God comfort thee, my Sister! At that voice
Of consolation, from her dreamy state,
Goervyl to a sense of all her woe
Awoke, and burst into a gush of tears
God comfort thee, my Sister! cried the Queen,

Even as He strengthens me. I would not raise
Deceitful hope, — but in His Hand, even yet,
The issue hangs, and He is merciful.

Yea, daughter of Aberfraw, take thou hope!
For Madoc lives! — he lives to wield the sword
Of righteous vengeance, and accomplish all.

XVII.

THE DELIVERANCE.

MADOC, meantime, in bonds and solitude,
Lay listening to the tumult. How his heart
Panted! how then, with fruitless strength, he strove
And struggled for enlargement, as the sound
Of battle from without the city came;
While all things near were still, nor foot of man,
Nor voice, in that deserted part, were heard.
At length one light and solitary step
Approach'd the place; a woman cross'd the door;
From Madoc's busy mind her image pass'd
Quick as the form that caused it; but not so
Did the remembrance fly from Coatel,
That Madoc lay in bonds. That thought possess'd
Her soul, and made her, as she garlanded
The fane of Coatlantona with flowers,
Tremble in strong emotion.

It was now

The hour of dusk; the Pabas all were gone,
Gone to the battle; — none could see her steps;
The gate was nigh. A momentary thought
Shot through her; she delay'd not to reflect,
But hastened to the Prince, and took the knife
Of sacrifice, which by the altar hung,
And cut his bonds, and with an eager eye,
Motioning haste and silence, to the gate
She led him. Fast along the forest way,
And fearfully, he followed to the chasm.
She beckon'd, and descended, and drew out
From underneath her vest, a cage, or net
It rather might be called, so fine the twigs
Which knit it, where, confined, two fire-flies gave Their lustre. By that light did Madoc first
Behold the features of his lovely guide;
And through the entrance of the cavern gloom,
He followed in full trust.

Now have they reach'd

The abrupt descent; there Coatel held forth
Her living lamp, and turning, with a smile
Sweet as good Angels wear when they present
Their mortal charge before the throne of Heaven,
She show'd where little Hoel slept below.
Poor child! he lay upon that very spot,
The last whereto his feet had follow'd her;
And, as he slept, his hand was on the bones
Of one who years ago had perish'd there,
There, on the place where last his wretched eyes Could catch the gleam of day. But when the voice,

The well-known voice of Madoc wakened him, —
His Uncle's voice, — he started, with a scream
Which echoed thro' the cavern's winding length,

And stretch'd his arms to reach him. Madoc hush'd

The dangerous transport, raised him up the ascent,
And followed Coatel again, whose face,
Though tears of pleasure still were coursing down,
Betokened fear and haste. Adown the wood
They went; and, coasting now the lake, her eye
First what they sought beheld, a light canoe, Moor'd to the bank. Then in her arms she took
The child, and kiss'd him with maternal love,
And placed him in the boat; but when the Prince,
With looks, and gestures, and imperfect words,
Such as the look, the gesture, well explain'd,
Urged her to follow, doubtfully she stood:
A dread of danger, for the thing she had done,
Came on her, and Lincoya rose to mind.
Almost she had resolved; but then she thought
Of her dear father, whom that flight would leave
Alone in age: how he would weep for her,
As one among the dead, and to the grave
Go sorrowing; or, if ever it were known
What she had dared, that on his head the weight
Of punishment would fall. That dreadful fear
Resolved her, and she waved her head, and raised
Her hand, to bid the Prince depart in haste,
With looks whose painful seriousness forbade
All further effort. Yet unwillingly,
And boding evil, Madoc from the shore
Push'd off his little boat. She on its way
Stood gazing for a moment, lost in thought,
Then struck into the woods.

Swift through the lake

Madoc's strong arm impell'd the light canoe.
Fainter and fainter to his distant ear
The sound of battle came; and now the Moon
Arose in heaven, and poured o'er lake and land
A soft and mellowing ray. Along the shore
Llaian was wandering with distracted steps,
And groaning for her child. She saw the boat
Approach; and as on Madoc's naked limbs,
And on his countenance, the moonbeam fell,
And as she saw the boy in that dim light,
It seemed as though the Spirits of the dead
Were moving on the waters; and she stood
With open lips that breathed not, and fix'd eyes,
Watching the unreal shapes: but when the boat
Drew nigh, and Madoc landed, and she saw
His step substantial, and the child came near,
Unable then to move, or speak, or breathe,
Down on the sand she sank.

But who can tell,

Who comprehend, her agony of joy,
When, by the Prince's care restored to sense,
She recognized her child, she heard the name
Of mother from that voice, which, sure, she thought

Had pour'd upon some Priest's remorseless ear
Its last vain prayer for life? No tear relieved
The insupportable feeling that convulsed
Her swelling breast. She look'd, and look'd, and felt

The child, lest some delusion should have mock'd
Her soul to madness; then the gushing joy
Burst forth, and with caresses and with tears
She mingled broken prayers of thanks to Heaven

And now the Prince, when joy had had its course,
Said to her, Knowest thou the mountain path?
For I would to the battle. But at that,
A sudden damp of dread came over her.
O leave us not! she cried; lest haply ill
Should have befallen; for I remember, now,
How in the woods I spied a savage band
Making towards Caernadoc. God forefend
The evil that I fear! — What! Madoc cried,
Were ye then left defenceless? — She replied,
All ran to arms: there was no time for thought,
Nor counsel, in that sudden ill; nor one
Of all thy people, who could, in that hour,
Have brook'd home-duty, when thy life or death
Hung on the chance.

Now God be merciful!

Said he; for of Goervyl then he thought,
And the cold sweat started at every pore.
Give me the boy! — he travels all too slow.
Then in his arms he took him, and sped on,
Suffering more painful terrors than of late
His own near death provoked. They held their way

In silence up the heights; and, when at length
They reached the entrance of the vale, the Prince
Bade her remain, while he went on, to spy
The footsteps of the spoiler. Soon he saw
Men, in the moonlight, stretch'd upon the ground;
And quickening then his pace, in worst alarm,
Along the shade, with cautious step, he moved
Toward one, to seize his weapons: 'twas a corpse;
Nor whether, at the sight, to hope or fear
Yet knew he. But anon, a steady light,
As of a taper, seen in his own home,
Comforted him; and, drawing nearer now,
He saw his sister on her knees, beside
The rushes, ministering to a wounded man.
Safe that the dear one lived, then back he sped
With joyful haste, and summon'd Llaian on,
And in loud talk advanced. Erillyab first Came forward at the sound; for she had faith
To trust the voice. — They live! they live! she cried;

God hath redeem'd them! — Nor the Maiden yet
Believed the actual joy; like one astound,
Or as if struggling with a dream, she stood,
Till he came close, and spread his arms, and call'd,
Goervyl! — and she fell in his embrace.

But Madoc lingered not; his eager soul
Was in the war: in haste he donn'd his arms;
And as he felt his own good sword again,
Exulting played his heart. — Boy, he exclaim'd
To Mervyn, arm thyself, and follow me!
For in this battle we shall break the power
Of our blood-thirsty foe: and, in thine age,
Wouldst thou not wish, when young men crowd around,

To hear thee chronicle their fathers' deeds,
Wouldst thou not wish to add, — And I, too, fought
In that day's conflict?

Mervyn's cheek turn'd pale
A moment, then, with terror all suffused,
Grew fever-red. Nay, nay, Goervyl cried,

He is too young for battles! — But the Prince,
With erring judgment, in that fear-flush'd cheek
Beheld the glow of enterprising hope,
And youthful courage. I was such a boy,
Sister! he cried, at Counsylvt; and that day,
In my first field, with stripling arm, smote down
Many a tall Saxon. Saidst thou not but now,
How bravely, in the fight of yesterday,
He flesh'd his sword, — and wouldst thou keep him here,
And rob him of his glory? See his cheek!
How it hath crimson'd at the unworthy thought!
Arm! arm! and to the battle!

How her heart

Then panted! how, with late regret, and vain,
Senena wished Goervyl then had heard
The secret, trembling on her lips so oft,
So oft by shame withheld. She thought that now
She could have fallen upon her Lady's neck,
And told her all; but when she saw the Prince,
Imperious shame forbade her, and she felt
It were an easier thing to die than speak.
Avail'd not now regret or female fear!
She mail'd her delicate limbs; beneath the plate
Compress'd her bosom; on her golden locks
The helmet's overheavy load she placed;
Hung from her neck the shield; and, though the sword,

Which swung beside her, lightest she had chosen,
Though in her hand she held the slenderest spear,
Alike unwieldy for the maiden's grasp,
The sword and ashen lance. But as she touch'd
The murderous point, an icy shudder ran
Through every fibre of her trembling frame;
And, overcome by womanly terror, then,
The damsel to Goervyl turn'd, and let
The breastplate fall, and on her bosom placed
The Lady's hand, and hid her face, and cried,
Save me! The warrior, who beheld the act,
And heard not the low voice, with angry eye
Glow'd on the seemly boy of feeble heart.
But, in Goervyl, joy had overpower'd
The wonder; joy, to find the boy she loved
Was one to whom her heart with closer love
Might cling; and to her brother she exclaim'd,
She must not go! We women in the war
Have done our parts.

A moment Madoc dwelt

On the false Mervyn, with an eye from whence
Displeasure did not wholly pass away.
Nor loitering to resolve Love's riddle now,
To Malinal he turn'd, where on his couch
The wounded youth was laid — True friend, said he,
And brother mine, — for truly by that name
I trust to greet thee, — if in this near fight,
My hour should overtake me, — as who knows
The lot of war? — Goervyl hath my charge
To quite thee for thy service with herself;
That so thou mayest raise up seed to me
Of mine own blood, who may inherit here
The obedience of thy people and of mine —
Malinal took his hand, and to his lips
Feebly he press'd it, saying, One boon more,
Father and friend, I ask! — if thou shouldst meet
Yuhidthiton in battle, think of me

XVIII.

THE VICTORY.

MERCIFUL God! how horrible is night
 Upon the plain of Aztlan! there the shout
 Of battle, the barbarian yell, the bray
 Of dissonant instruments, the clang of arms,
 The shriek of agony, the groan of death,
 In one wild uproar and continuous din,
 Shake the still air; while, overhead, the Moon,
 Regardless of the stir of this low world,
 Holds on her heavenly way. Still unallay'd
 By slaughter raged the battle, unrelax'd
 By lengthened toil; anger supplying still Strength undiminish'd for the desperate strife.
 And lo! where, yonder, on the temple top,
 Blazing aloft, the sacrificial fire,
 Scene more accurst and hideous than the war,
 Displays to all the vale; for whosoe'er
 That night the Aztecas could bear away,
 Hoaman or Briton, thither was he borne;
 And as they stretch'd him on the stone of blood,
 Did the huge tambour of the God, with voice
 Loud as the thunder-peal, and heard as far,
 Proclaim the act of death, more visible
 Than in broad day-light, by those midnight fires
 Distinctlier seen. Sight that with horror fill'd
 The Cymry, and to mightier efforts roused.
 Howbeit, this abhorred idolatry
 Work'd for their safety; the deluded foes,
 Obstinate in their faith, forbearing still
 The mortal stroke, that they might to the God
 Present the living victim, and to him
 Let the life flow.

And now the orient sky
 Glow'd with the ruddy morning, when the Prince
 Came to the field. He lifted up his voice,
 And shouted, Madoc! Madoc! They who heard
 The cry, astonish'd, turn'd; and when they saw
 The countenance his open helm disclosed,
 They echoed, Madoc! Madoc! Through the host
 Spread the miraculous joy — He lives! he lives!
 He comes himself in arms! — Lincoya heard,
 As he had raised his arm to strike a foe,
 And stay'd the stroke, and thrust him off, and cried,
 Go tell the tidings to thy countrymen,
 Madoc is in the war! Tell them his God
 Hath set the White King free! Astonishment
 Seized on the Azteca; on all who heard,
 Amazement and dismay; and Madoc now
 Stood in the foremost battle, and his sword —
 His own good sword — flash'd like the sudden death
 Of lightning in their eyes.

The King of Aztlan
 Heard and beheld, and in his noble heart
 Heroic hope arose. Forward he moved,
 And in the shock of battle, front to front,
 Encountered Madoc. A strong-statured man
 Coanocotzin stood, one well who knew
 The ways of war, and never yet in fight
 Had found an equal foe. Adown his back
 Hung the long robe of feathered royalty;

Gold fenced his arms and legs; upon his helm
 A sculptured snake protends the arrowy tongue;
 Around a coronal of plumes arose,
 Brighter than beam the rainbow hues of light,
 Or than the evening glories which the sun
 Slants o'er the moving, many-color'd sea —
 Such their surpassing beauty; bells of gold
 Emboss'd his glittering helmet, and where'er
 Their sound was heard, there lay the press of war,
 And Death was busiest there. Over the breast
 And o'er the golden breastplate of the King,
 A feathery cuirass, beautiful to eye,
 Light as the robe of peace, yet strong to save;
 For the sharp falchion's baffled edge would glide
 From its smooth softness. On his arm he held
 A buckler overlaid with beaten gold;
 And so he stood, guarding his thighs and legs,
 His breast and shoulders also, with the length
 Of his broad shield.

Opposed, in mail complete,
 Stood Madoc in his strength. The flexile chains
 Gave play to his full muscles, and displayed
 How broad his shoulders, and his ample breast.
 Small was his shield, there broadest where it fenced
 The well of life, and gradual to a point
 Lessening, steel-strong, and wieldy in his grasp.
 It bore those blazoned eaglets, at whose sight,
 Along the Marches, or where holy Dec
 Through Cestrian pastures rolls his tamer stream,
 So oft the yeoman had, in days of yore,
 Cursing his perilous tenure, wound the horn,
 And warden from the castle-tower rung out
 The loud alarum-bell, heard far and wide.
 Upon his helm no sculptured dragon sat,
 Sat no fantastic terrors; a white plume
 Nodded above, far-seen, floating like foam
 Upon the stream of battle, always where
 The tide ran strongest. Man to man opposed,
 The Sea Lord and the King of Aztlan stood.

Fast on the intervening buckler fell
 The Azteca's stone falchion. Who hath watch'd
 The midnight lightnings of the summer storm,
 That with their awful blaze irradiate heaven,
 Then leave a blacker night? So quick, so fierce,
 Flash'd Madoc's sword, which, like the serpent's tongue,
 Seemed double, in its rapid whirl of light.
 Unequal arms! for on the British shield
 Avail'd not the stone falchion's brittle edge,
 And in the golden buckler, Madoc's sword
 Bit deep. Coanocotzin saw, and dropp'd
 The unprofitable weapon, and received [force,
 His ponderous club, — that club, beneath whose Driven by his father's arm, Tepollomi
 Had fallen subdued, — and fast and fierce he drove
 The massy weight on Madoc. From his shield,
 The deadening force communicated ran
 Up his stunn'd arm; anon, upon his helm,
 Crashing, it came; — his eyes shot fire, his brain
 Swam dizzy, — he recoils, — he reels, — again
 The club descends.

That danger to himself
 Recall'd the Lord of Ocean. On he sprung,
 Within the falling weapon's curve of death,

Shunning its frustrate aim, and breast to breast
He grappled with the King. The pliant mail
Bent to his straining limbs, while plates of gold,
The feathery robe, the buckler's amplitude,
Cumbered the Azteca, and from his arm,
Clinch'd in the Briton's mighty grasp, at once
He dropp'd the impeding buckler, and let fall
The unfastened club; which when the Prince beheld,

He thrust him off, and drawing back, resumed
The sword that from his wrist suspended hung,
And twice he smote the King; twice from the quilt
Of plumes the iron glides; and lo! the King —
So well his soldiers watch their monarch's need —
Shakes in his hand a spear.

But now a cry

Burst on the ear of Madoc, and he saw
Through opening ranks, where Urien was convey'd,
A captive, to his death. Grief, then, and shame,
And rage, inspired him. With a mighty blow
He cleft Coanocotzin's helm; exposed
The monarch stood; — again the thunder-stroke
Came on him, and he fell. — The multitude,
Forgetful of their country and themselves,
Crowd round their dying King. Madoc, whose eye
Still follow'd Urien, call'd upon his men,
And through the broken army of the foe,
Press'd to his rescue.

But far off the old man

Was borne with furious speed. Rigid alone
Pursued his path, and through the thick of war
Close on the captors, with avenging sword,
Follow'd right on, and through the multitude,
And through the gate of Aztlan, made his way,
And through the streets, till from the temple-mound,
The press of Pabas and the populace
Repell'd him, while the old man was hurried up.
Hark! that infernal tambour! o'er the lake
Its long, loud thunders roll, and through the hills,
Awakening all their echoes. Ye accurs'd,
Ye blow the fall too soon! Ye Dogs of Hell,
The Hart is yet at bay! — Thus long the old man,
As one exhausted or resign'd, had lain,
Resisting not; but at that knell of death,
Springing with unexpected force, he freed
His feet, and shook the Pabas from their hold,
And, with his armed hand, between the eyes
Smote one so sternly, that to earth he fell,
Bleeding, and all astound. A man of proof
Was Urien in his day, thought worthiest,
In martial thewes and manly discipline,
To train the sons of Owen. He had lost
Youth's supple sleight; yet still the skill remain'd,
And in his stiffen'd limbs a strength, which yet
Might put the young to shame. And now he set
His back against the altar, resolute
Not as a victim by the knife to die,
But in the act of battle, as became
A man grown gray in arms; and in his heart
There was a living hope; for now he knew
That Madoc lived, nor could the struggle long Endure against that arm.

Soon was the way

Laid open by the sword; for side by side
The brethren of Aberfraw mow'd their path;

And, following close, the Cymry drive along.
Till on the summit of the mound their cry
Of victory rings aloud. The temple floor,
So often which had reek'd with innocent blood,
Reeks now with righteous slaughter. Frantiely,
In the wild fury of their desperate zeal,
The Priests crowd round the God, and with their knives

Hack at the foe, and call on him to save; —
At the Altar, at the Idol's feet they fall.
Nor with less frenzy did the multitude
Flock to defend their God. Fast as they fell,
New victims rush'd upon the British sword;
And sure that day had rooted from the earth
The Aztecas, and on their conquerors drawn
Promiscuous ruin, had not Madoc now
Beheld from whence the fearless ardor sprang; —
They saw Mexitli; momentarily they hoped
That he would rise in vengeance. Madoc seized
A massy club, and from his azure throne
Shattered the giant idol.

At that sight

The men of Aztlan pause; so was their pause
Dreadful, as when a multitude expect [saw
The Earthquake's second shock. But when they Earth did not open, nor the temple fall,
To crush their impious enemies, dismay'd,
They felt themselves forsaken by their Gods;
Then from their temples and their homes they fled,
And, leaving Aztlan to the conqueror,
Sought the near city, whither they had sent
Their women, timely saved.

But Tlalala,

With growing fury as the danger grew,
Raged in the battle; but Yuhidthiton
Still with calm courage, till no hope remain'd,
Fronted the rushing foe. When all was vain,
When back within the gate Cadwallon's force
Resistless had compell'd them, then the Chief
Call'd on the Tiger — Let us bear from hence
The dead Ocellopan, the slaughter'd King;
Not to the Strangers should their bones be left,
O Tlalala! — The Tiger wept with rage,
With generous anger. To the place of death,
Where, side by side, the noble dead were stretch'd,
They fought their way. Eight warriors join'd their shields;

On these — a bier which well bescem'd the dead —
The lifeless Chiefs were laid. Yuhidthiton
Call'd on the people — Men of Aztlan! yet
One effort more! Bear hence Ocellopan;
Bear hence the body of your noble King!
Not to the Strangers should their bones be left!
That whoso heard, with wailing and loud cries,
Press'd round the body-bearers; few indeed,
For few were they who in that fearful hour
Had ears to hear, — but with a holy zeal,
Careless of death, around the bier they ranged
Their bulwark breasts. So toward the farther gate
They held their steady way, while outermost,
In unabated valor, Tlalala
Faced, with Yuhidthiton, the foe's pursuit.
Vain valor then, and fatal piety,
As the fierce conquerors bore on their retreat,
If Madoc had not seen their perilous strife:

Remembering Malinal, and in his heart
 Honoring a gallant foe, he call'd aloud,
 And bade his people cease the hot pursuit.
 So, through the city gate, they bore away
 The dead; and, last of all their countrymen,
 Leaving their homes and temples to the foe,
 Yuhidhiton and Tlalala retired.

THE FUNERAL.

SOUTHWARD of Aztlan stood, beside the Lake,
 A city of the Aztecas, by name
 Patamba. Thither, from the first alarm,
 The women and infirm old men were sent,
 And children: thither they who from the fight,
 And from the fall of Aztlan, had escaped,
 In scattered bands, repair'd. Their City lost,
 Their Monarch slain, their Idols overthrow'n,—
 These tidings spread dismay; but to dismay
 Succeeded horror soon, and kindling rage;
 Horror, by each new circumstance increased,
 By numbers, rage imbolden'd. Lo! to the town,
 Lamenting loud, a numerous train approach,
 Like mountain torrents, swelling as they go.
 Borne in the midst, upon the bier of shields,
 The noble dead were seen. To tenfold grief
 That spectacle provoked, to tenfold wrath
 That anguish stung them. With their yells and groans
 Curses are mix'd, and threats, and bitter vows
 Of vengeance full and speedy. From the wreck
 Of Aztlan who is saved? Tezozomoe,
 Chief servant of the Gods, their favored Priest,
 The voice by whom they speak; young Tlalala,
 Whom even defeat with fresher glory crowns;
 And full of fame, their country's rock of strength,
 Yuhidhiton: him to their sovereign slain
 Allied in blood, mature in wisdom him,
 Of valor unsurpassable, by all
 Beloved and honor'd, him the general voice
 Acclaims their King; him they demand, to lead
 Their gathered force to battle, to revenge
 Their Lord, their Gods, their kinsmen, to redeem
 Their altars and their country.

But the dead

First from the nation's gratitude require
 The rites of death. On mats of mountain palm,
 Wrought of rare texture and of richest hues,
 The slaughter'd warriors, side by side, were laid;
 Their bodies wrapp'd in many-color'd robes
 Of gossampine, bedeck'd with gems and gold.
 The livid paleness of the countenance,
 A mask conceal'd, and hid their ghastly wounds.
 The Pabas stood around, and one by one,
 Placed in their hands the sacred aloe leaves,
 With mystic forms and characters inscribed;
 And as each leaf was given, Tezozomoe
 Address'd the dead—So may ye safely pass
 Between the mountains, which in endless war
 Hurtle, with horrible uproar, and crush
 Of rocks that meet in battle. Arm'd with this,

In safety shall ye walk along the road,
 Where the Great Serpent from his lurid eyes
 Shoots lightning, and across the guarded way
 Vibrates his tongue of fire. Receive the third,
 And cross the waters where the Crocodile
 In vain expects his prey. Your passport this Through the Eight Deserts; through the Eight Hills this;

And this be your defence against the Wind,
 Whose fury sweeps like dust the uprooted rocks,
 Whose keenness cuts the soul. Ye noble Dead,
 Protected with these potent amulets,
 Soon shall your Spirits reach triumphantly
 The Palace of the Sun!

The funeral train
 Moved to Mexitli's temple. First on high
 The noble dead were borne; in loud lament
 Then follow'd all by blood allied to them,
 Or by affection's voluntary ties
 Attach'd more closely, brethren, kinsmen, wives.
 The Peers of Aztlan, all who from the sword
 Of Britain had escaped, honoring the rites,
 Came clad in rich array, and bore the arms
 And ensigns of the dead. The slaves went last,
 And dwarfs, the pastime of the living chiefs,
 In life their sport and mockery, and in death
 Their victims. Wailing and with funeral hymns,
 The long procession moved. Mexitli's Priest,
 With all his servants, from the temple-gate
 Advanced to meet the train. Two piles were built
 Within the sacred court, of odorous wood,
 And rich with guns; on these, with all their robes,
 Their ensigns, and their arms, they laid the dead,
 Then lit the pile. The rapid light ran up;
 Up flamed the fire; and o'er the darken'd sky
 Sweet clouds of incense curl'd.

The Pabas then
 Perform'd their bloody office. First they slew
 The women whom the slaughter'd most had loved,
 Who most had loved the dead. Silent they went Toward the fatal stone, resisting not,
 Nor sorrowing, nor dismay'd, but, as it seem'd, Stunn'd, senseless. One alone there was, whose cheek

Was flush'd, whose eye was animate with fire:
 Her most in life Coanocotzin prized,
 By ten years' love endear'd, his counsellor,
 His friend, the partner of his secret thoughts;
 Such had she been, such merited to be.
 She, as she bared her bosom to the knife,
 Call'd on Yuhidhiton—Take heed, O King!
 Aloud she cried, and pointed to the Priests;
 Beware these wicked men! they to the war
 Forced my dead Lord—Thou knowest, and I know,
 He loved the Strangers; that his noble mind,
 Enlighten'd by their lore, had willingly
 Put down these cursed altars!—As she spake,
 They dragg'd her to the stone.—Nay! nay! she cried,

There needs not force! I go to join my Lord!
 His blood and mine be on you!—Ere she ceased,
 The knife was in her breast. Tezozomoe,
 Trembling with rage, held up toward the Sun
 Her reeking heart.

The dwarfs and slaves died last

That bloody office done, they gathered up
 The ashes of the dead, and coffer'd them
 Apart; the teeth with them, which unconsumed
 Among the ashes lay, a single lock
 Shorn from the corpse, and his lip-emerald,
 Now held to be the Spirit's flawless heart,
 In better worlds. The Priest then held on high
 The little ark which shrimed his last remains,
 And call'd upon the people; — Aztecas,
 This was your King, the bountiful, the brave,
 Coanocotzin! Men of Aztlan, hold
 His memory holy! learn from him to love
 Your country and your Gods; for them to live
 Like him, like him to die. So from yon Heaven,
 Where in the Spring of Light his Spirit bathes,
 Often shall he descend; hover above
 On evening clouds, or plumed with rainbow wings,
 Sip honey from the flowers, and warble joy.
 Honor his memory! emulate his worth!
 So saying, in the temple-tower he laid
 The relics of the King.

These duties done,
 The living claim their care. His birth, his deeds,
 The general love, the general voice, have mark'd
 Yuhidthiton for King. Bareheaded, bare
 Of foot, of limb, scarfed only round the loins,
 The Chieftain to Mexitli's temple moved,
 And knelt before the God. Tezozomoc
 King over Aztlan there anointed him,
 And over him, from hallowed cedar-branch,
 Sprinkled the holy water. Then the Priest
 In a black garment robed him, figured white
 With skulls and bones, a garb to emblem war,
 Slaughter, and ruin, his imperial tasks.
 Next in his hand the Priest a censer placed;
 And while he knelt, directing to the God
 The steaming incense, thus address'd the King:
 Chosen by the people, by the Gods approved,
 Swear to protect thy subjects, to maintain
 The worship of thy fathers, to observe
 Their laws, to make the Sun pursue his course,
 The clouds descend in rain, the rivers hold
 Their wonted channels, and the fruits of earth
 To ripen in their season; Swear, O King!
 And prosper, as thou holdest good thine oath.
 He raised his voice, and swore. Then on his brow
 Tezozomoc the crown of Aztlan placed;
 And in the robe of emblem'd royalty,
 Preceded by the golden wands of state,
 Yuhidthiton went forth, anointed King.

XX.

THE DEATH OF COATEL.

WHEN now the multitude beheld their King,
 In gratulations of reiterate joy
 They shout his name, and bid him lead them on
 To vengeance. But to answer that appeal
 Tezozomoc advanced. — Oh! go not forth,
 Cried the Chief Paba, till the land be purged
 From her offence! No God will lead ye on,
 While there is guilt in Aztlan. Let the Priests

Who from the ruined city have escaped,
 And all who in her temples have perform'd
 The ennobling service of her injured Gods,
 Gather together now.

He spake; the train
 Assembled, priests and matrons, youths and maids.
 Servants of Heaven! aloud the Arch-Priest began,
 The Gods had favor'd Aztlan; bound for death
 The White King lay: our countrymen were strong
 In battle, and the conquest had been ours, —
 I speak not from myself, but as the Powers,
 Whose voice on earth I am, impel the truth, —
 The conquest had been ours; but treason lurk'd
 In Aztlan, treason and foul sacrilege;
 And therefore were her children in the hour
 Of need abandon'd; therefore were her youth
 Cut down, her altars therefore overthrown.
 The White King, whom ye saw upon the Stone
 Of Sacrifice, and whom ye held in bonds,
 Stood in the foremost fight and slew your Lord.
 Not by a God, O Aztecas, enlarged
 Broke he his bondage! by a mortal hand,
 An impious, sacrilegious, traitorous hand,
 Your city was betray'd, your King was slain,
 Your shrines polluted. The insulted Power,
 He who is terrible, beheld the deed;
 And now he calls for vengeance.

Stern he spake,
 And from Mexitli's altar bade the Priest
 Bring forth the sacred water. In his hand
 He took the vase, and held it up, and cried,
 Accurs'd be he who did this deed! Accurs'd
 The father who begat him, and the breast
 At which he fed! Death be his portion now,
 Eternal infamy his lot on earth,
 His doom eternal horrors! Let his name,
 From sire to son, be in the people's mouth,
 Through every generation! Let a curse
 Of deep, and pious, and effectual hate,
 Forever follow the detested name;
 And every curse inflict upon his soul
 A stab of mortal anguish.

Then he gave
 The vase. — Drink one by one! the innocent
 Boldly; on them the water hath no power;
 But let the guilty tremble! it shall flow
 A draught of agony and death to him,
 A stream of fiery poison.

Coatel!
 What were thy horrors when the fatal vase
 Pass'd to thy trial, — when Tezozomoc
 Fixed his keen eye on thee! A deathiness
 Came over her, — her blood ran back, — her joints
 Shook like the palsy, and the dreadful cup Dropp'd from her conscious hold. The Priest ex-
 claim'd,
 The hand of God! the avenger manifest!
 Drag her to the altar! — At that sound of death,
 The life forsook her limbs, and down she fell,
 Senseless. They dragg'd her to the Stone of Blood,
 All senseless as she lay; — in that dread hour
 Nature was kind.

Tezozomoc then cried,
 Bring forth the kindred of this wretch accurs'd,
 That none pollute the earth! An aged Priest

Came forth, and answered, There is none but I,
The father of the dead.

To death with him!
Exclaim'd Tezozomoc; to death with him;
And purify the nation! — But the King
Permitted not that crime. — Chief of the Priests,
If he be guilty, let the guilty bleed,
Said he; but never, while I live and reign,
The innocent shall suffer. Hear him speak!

Hear me! the old man replied. That fatal day
I never saw my child. At morn she left
The city, seeking flowers to dress the shrine
Of Coatlantona; and that at eve
I stood among the Pabas in the gate,
Blessing our soldiers, as they issued out,
Let them who saw bear witness. — Two came forth,
And testified Aculhua spake the words
Of truth.

Full well I know, the old man pursued,
My daughter loved the Strangers, — that her heart
Was not with Aztlan; but not I the cause!
Ye all remember how the Maid was given, —
She being, in truth, of all our Maids the flower, —
In spousals to Lincoya, him who fled
From sacrifice. It was a misery
For me to see my only child condemn'd
In early widowhood to waste her youth, —
My only, and my beautifullest girl!
Chief of the Priests, you order'd; I obey'd.
Not mine the fault, if, when Lincoya fled,
And fought among the enemies, her heart
Was with her husband.

He is innocent!
He shall not die! Yuhidthiton exclaim'd.
Nay, King Yuhidthiton! Aculhua cried,
I merit death. My country overthrown,
My daughter slain, alike demand on me
That justice. When her years of ministry,
Vow'd to the temple, had expired, my love,
My selfish love, still suffer'd her to give
Her youth to me, by filial piety
In widowhood detain'd. That selfish crime
Heavily, — heavily, — do I expiate!
But I am old; and she was all to me.
O King Yuhidthiton, I ask for death;
In mercy, let me die! cruel it were
To bid me waste away alone in age,
By the slow pain of grief. — Give me the knife
Which pierced my daughter's bosom!

The old man
Moved to the altar; none opposed his way;
With a firm hand he buried in his heart
The reeking flint, and fell upon his child.

THE SPORTS.

A TRANSITORY gloom that sight of death
Impress'd upon the assembled multitude;
But soon the brute and unreflecting crew
Turn'd to their sports. Some bare their olive limbs,

And in the race contend; with hopes and fears
Which rouse to rage, some urge the mimic war.
Here one upon his ample shoulders bears
A comrade's weight, upon whose head a third
Stands poised, like Mercury in act to fly.
Two others balance here on their shoulders
A bifork'd beam, while on its height a third
To nimble cadence shifts his glancing feet,
And shakes a plume aloft, and wheels around
A wreath of bells with modulating sway.
Here round a lofty mast the dancers move
Quick, to quick music; from its top affix'd,
Each holds a colored cord, and as they weave
The complex crossings of the mazy dance,
The checker'd network twists around the tree
Its intertexture of harmonious hues.

But now a shout went forth; the Fliers mount,
And from all meaner sports the multitude
Flock to their favorite pastime. In the ground,
Branchless and bark'd, the trunk of some tall vine
Is planted; near its summit a square frame;
Four cords pass through the perforated square,
And fifty times and twice around the tree,
A mystic number, are entwined above.
Four Aztecas, equip'd with wings, ascend,
And round them bind the ropes; anon they wave
Their pinions, and upborne on spreading plumes,
Launch on the air, and wheel in circling flight,
The lengthening cords untwisting as they fly.
A fifth above, upon the perilous point
Dances, and shakes a flag; and on the frame,
Others the while maintain their giddy stand,
Till now, with many a round, the wheeling cords Draw near their utmost length, and toward the ground

The aerial circlers speed; then down the ropes
They spring, and on their way from line to line
Pass, while the shouting multitude endure
A shuddering admiration.

On such sports,
Their feelings centred in the joy of sight,
The multitude stood gazing, when a man,
Breathless, and with broad eyes, came running on,
His pale lips trembling, and his bloodless cheek
Like one who meets a lion in his path.
The fire! the fire! the temple! he exclaim'd;
Mexitli! — They, astonish'd at his words,
Hasten toward the wonder, — and behold!
The inner fauce is sheeted white with fire.
Dumb with affright they stood; the inquiring King
Look'd to Tezozomoc; the Priest replied,
I go! the Gods protect me; — and therewith
He entered boldly in the house of flame.
But instant bounding with inebriate joy,
He issues forth — The God! the God! he cries,
Joy! — joy! — the God! — the visible hand of Heaven!

Repressing then his transport — Ye all know
How that in Aztlan Madoc's impious hand
Destroyed Mexitli's image; — it is here,
Unbroken, and the same! — Toward the gate
They press; they see the Giant Idol there,
The serpent girding him, his neck with hearts
Beaded, and in his hand the club, — even such

As oft in Aztlan, on his azure throne,
They had adored the God, they see him now,
Unbroken and the same! — Again the Priest
Enter'd; again a second joy inspired
To frenzy all around; — for forth he came,
Shouting with new delight, — for in his hand
The banner of the nation he upheld,
That banner to their fathers sent from Heaven,
By them abandoned to the conqueror.

He motion'd silence, and the crowd were still.
People of Aztlan! he began, when first
Your fathers from their native land went forth,
In search of better seats, this banner came
From Heaven. The Famine and the Pestilence
Had been among them; in their hearts the spring
Of courage was dried up: with midnight fires
Radiate, by midnight thunders heralded,
This banner came from Heaven; and with it came Health, valor, victory. Aztecas! again
The God restores the blessing. To the God
Move now in solemn dance of grateful joy;
Exalt for him the song.

They form'd the dance,
They raised the hymn, and sung Mexitli's praise.
Glory to thee, the Great, the Terrible,
Mexitli, guardian God! — From whence art thou,
O Son of Mystery? From whence art thou,
Whose sire thy Mother knew not? She at eve
Walk'd in the temple court, and saw from heaven
A plume descend, as bright and beautiful,
As if some spirit had embodied there
The rainbow hues, or dipp'd it in the light
Of setting suns. To her it floated down;
She placed it in her bosom, to bedeck
The altar of the God; she sought it there;
Amazed she found it not; amazed she felt
Another life infused. — From whence art thou,
O Son of Mystery? From whence art thou,
Whose sire thy Mother knew not?

Grief was hers,
Wonder and grief, for life was in her womb,
And her stern children with revengeful eyes Beheld their mother's shame. She saw their frowns,
She knew their plots of blood. Where shall she look
For succor, when her sons conspire her death?
Where hope for comfort, when her daughter whets
The impious knife of murder? — From her womb
The voice of comfort came, the timely aid:
Already at her breast the blow was aim'd,
When forth Mexitli leap'd, and in his hand
The angry spear, to punish and to save.
Glory to thee, the Great, the Terrible,
Mexitli, guardian God!

Arise and save,
Mexitli, save thy people! Dreadful one,
Arise, redeem thy city, and revenge!
An impious, an impenetrable foe,
Hath blacken'd thine own altars with the blood
Of thine own priests; hath dash'd thine Image
down.
In vain did valor's naked breast oppose
Their mighty arms; in vain the feeble sword

On their impenetrable mail was driven.
Not against thee, Avenger, shall those arms
Avail, nor that impenetrable mail
Resist the fiery arrows of thy wrath.
Arise, go forth in anger, and destroy!

XXII.

THE DEATH OF LINCOYA.

AZTLAN, meantime, presents a hideous scene
Of slaughter. The hot sunbeam, in her streets, Parch'd the blood pools; the slain were heap'd in hills;
The victors, stretch'd in every little shade,
With unhelm'd heads, reclining on their shields,
Slept the deep sleep of weariness. Erelong,
To needful labor rising, from the gates
They drag the dead; and with united toil,
They dig upon the plain the general grave,
The grave of thousands, deep, and wide, and long.
Ten such they delved, and o'er the multitudes
Who levell'd with the plain the deep-dug pits,
Ten monumental hills they heap'd on high.
Next, horror heightening joy, they overthrew
The skull-built towers, the files of human heads,
And earth to earth consign'd them. To the flames
They cast the idols, and upon the wind
Scatter'd their ashes; then the temples fell,
Whose black and putrid walls were sealed with
blood,
And not one stone of those accursed piles
Was on another left.

Victorious thus
In Aztlan, it behoved the Cymry now
There to collect their strength, and there await,
Or thence with centred numbers urge, the war.
For this was Ririd missioned to the ships;
For this Lincoya from the hills invites Erillyab and her tribe. There did not breathe,
On this wide world a happier man that day
Than young Lincoya, when from their retreat
He bade his countrymen come repossess
The land of their forefathers; proud at heart
To think how great a part himself had borne
In their revenge, and that beloved one,
The gentle savior of the Prince, whom well
He knew his own dear love, and for the deed
Still dearer loved the dearest. Round the youth,
Women and children, the infirm and old,
Gather to hear his tale; and as they stood
With eyes of steady wonder, outstretch'd necks,
And open lips of listening eagerness,
Fast play'd the tide of triumph in his veins,
Flush'd his brown cheek, and kindled his dark eye.

And now, reposing from his toil awhile,
Lincoya, on a crag above the straits,
Sat underneath a tree, whose twinkling leaves
Sung to the gale at noon. Ayayaca
Sat by him in the shade; the old man had loved
The youth beside him from his boyhood up,
And still would call him boy. They sat and watch'd

The laden bisons winding down the way,
The multitude who now with joy forsook
Their desolated dwellings; and their talk
Was of the days of sorrow, when they groan'd
Beneath the intolerable yoke, till sent
By the Great Spirit o'er the pathless deep Prince Madoc the Deliverer came to save.
As thus they communed, came a woman up,
Seeking Lineoya; 'twas Aculhua's slave,
The nurse of Coatel. Her wretched eye,
Her pale and livid countenance, foretold
Some tale of misery, and his life-blood ebb'd
In ominous fear. But when he heard her words
Of death, he seized the lance, and raised his arm
To strike the blow of comfort.

The old man
Caught his uplifted hand — O'erhasty boy,
Quoth he, regain her yet, if she was dear!
Seek thy beloved in the Land of Souls,
And beg her from the Gods. The Gods will hear,
And, in just recompense of love so true,
Restore their charge.

The miserable youth
Turned at his words a hesitating eye.
I knew a prisoner, — so the old man pursued,
Or hoping to beguile the youth's despair
With tales that suited the despair of youth,
Or credulous himself of what he told, —
I knew a prisoner once who welcomed death
With merriment, and songs, and joy of heart,
Because, he said, the friends whom he loved best
Were gone before him to the Land of Souls;
Nor would they, to resume their mortal state,
Even when the Keeper of the Land allowed,
Forsake its pleasures; therefore he rejoiced
To die and join them there. I question'd him
How of these hidden things unknowable
So certainly he spake. The man replied,
One of our nation lost the maid he loved,
Nor would he bear his sorrow, — being one
Into whose heart fear never found a way, —
But to the Country of the Dead pursued
Her spirit. Many toils he underwent,
And many dangers gallantly surpass'd,
Till to the Country of the Dead he came.
Gently the Guardian of the Land received
The living suppliant; listen'd to his prayer,
And gave him back the Spirit of the Maid.
But from that happy country, from the songs
Of joyance, from the splendor-sparkling dance,
Unwillingly compell'd, the Maiden's Soul
Loathed to return; and he was warn'd to guard
The subtle captive well and warily,
Till, in her mortal tenement relodged,
Earthly delights might win her to remain
A sojourner on earth. Such lessoning
The Ruler of the Souls departed gave;
And mindful of his charge, the adventurer brought
His subtle captive home. There underneath
The shelter of a hut, his friends had watch'd
The Maiden's corpse, secured it from the sun,
And fann'd away the insect swarms of heaven.
A busy hand marr'd all the enterprise;
Curious to see the Spirit, he unloosed
The knotted bag which held her, and she fled.

Lineoya, thou art brave; where man has gone
Thou wouldst not fear to follow!

Silently
Lineoya listen'd, and with unmoved eyes;
At length he answered, Is the journey long?
The old man replied, A way of many moons.
I know a shorter path! exclaimed the youth;
And up he sprung, and from the precipice
Darted: a moment, — and Ayayaca heard
His body fall upon the rocks below.

XXIII.

CARADOC AND SENENA.

MAID of the golden locks, far other lot
May gentle Heaven assign thy happier love,
Blue-eyed Senena! — She, though not as yet
Had she put off her boy-habiliments,
Had told Goeryvl all the history
Of her sad flight, and easy pardon gain'd
From that sweet heart, for guile which meant no ill,
And secrecy, in shame too long maintain'd.
With her dear Lady now, at this still hour
Of evening is the seeming page gone forth,
Beside Caernadoc mere. They loitered on,
Along the windings of its grassy shore,
In such free interchange of inward thought
As the calm hour invited; or at times,
Willingly silent, listening to the bird
Whose one repeated melancholy note,
By oft repeating melancholy made,
Solicited the ear; or gladder now
Harkening that cheerful one, who knoweth all
The songs of all the winged choristers,
And in one sequence of melodious sounds
Pours all their music. But a wilder strain
At fits came o'er the water; rising now,
Now with a dying fall, in sink and swell
More exquisitely sweet than ever art
Of man evoked from instrument of touch,
Or beat, or breath. It was the evening gale,
Which, passing o'er the harp of Caradoc,
Swept all its chords at once, and blended all
Their music into one continuous flow.
The solitary Bard, beside his harp,
Lean'd underneath a tree, whose spreading boughs,
With broken shade that shifted to the breeze,
Play'd on the waving waters. Overhead
There was the leafy murmur, at his foot
The lake's perpetual ripple; and from far,
Borne on the modulating gale, was heard
The roaring of the mountain cataract —
A blind man would have loved the lovely spot.

Here was Senena by her Lady led,
Trembling, but not reluctant. They drew nigh,
Their steps unheard upon the elastic moss,
Till playfully Goeryvl, with quick touch,
Ran o'er the harp-strings. At the sudden sound
He rose. — Hath, then, thy hand, quoth she, O
Bard,

S. B. & W. Y. Co.

Forgot its cunning, that the wind should be Thine harper?—Come! one strain for Britain's sake;

And let the theme be Woman!—He replied,
But if the strain offend, O Lady fair,
Blame thou the theme, not me!—Then to the harp
He sung,—Three things a wise man will not trust,

The Wind, the Sunshine of an April day,
And Woman's plighted faith. I have beheld
The Weathercock upon the steeple-point
Steady from morn till eve; and I have seen
The bees go forth upon an April morn,
Secure the sunshine will not end in showers;
But when was Woman true?

False Bard! thereat,
With smile of playful anger, she exclaim'd, False Bard! and slanderous song! Were such thy thoughts

Of woman, when thy youthful lays were heard
In Heilyn's hall?—But at that name his heart
Leap'd, and his cheek with sudden flush was fired;
In Heilyn's hall, quoth he, I learn'd the song.
There was a Maid, who dwelt among the hills
Of Arvon, and to one of humbler birth
Had pledged her troth—nor rashly, nor beguiled;—

They had been playmates in their infancy,
And she in all his thoughts had borne a part,
And all his joys. The Moon and all the Stars
Witness'd their mutual vows; and for her sake
The song was framed; for, in the face of day,
She broke them.—But her name? Goervyl ask'd;
Quoth he, The poet loved her still too well,
To couple it with shame.

O fate unjust
Of womankind! she cried; our virtues bloom,
Like violets, in shade and solitude,
While evil eyes hunt all our failings out
For evil tongues to bruit abroad in jest,
And song of obloquy!—I knew a Maid,
And she, too, dwelt in Arvon, and she too,
Loved one of lowly birth, who ill repaid
Her spotless faith; for he to ill reports,
And tales of falsehood cunningly devised,
Lent a light ear, and to his rival left
The loathing Maid. The wedding-day arrived;
The harpers and the gleemen, far and near,
Came to the wedding-feast; the wedding-guests
Were come, the altar dress'd, the bridemaids met,
The father, and the bridegroom, and the priest,
Wait for the bride. But she the while did off
Her bridal robes, and clipp'd her golden locks,
And put on boy's attire, through wood and wild
To seek her own true love; and over sea,
Forsaking all for him, she followed him,—
Nor hoping nor deserving fate so fair;
And at his side she stood, and heard him wrong
Her faith with slanderous tales; and his dull eye,
As it had learn'd his heart's forgetfulness,
Knows not the trembling one, who even now
Yearns to forgive him all!

He turn'd; he knew
The blue-eyed Maid, who fell upon his breast.

XXIV.

THE EMBASSY.

HARK! from the towers of Aztlan how the shouts
Of clamorous joy re-ring! the rocks and hills
Take up the joyful sound, and o'er the lake
Roll their slow echoes.—Thou art beautiful,
Queen of the Valley! thou art beautiful!
Thy walls, like silver, sparkle to the sun;
Melodious wave thy groves; thy garden-sweets
Enrich the pleasant air; upon the lake
Lie the long shadows of thy towers; and high
In heaven thy temple-pyramids arise,
Upon whose summit now, far visible
Against the clear blue sky, the Cross of Christ
Proclaims unto the nations round the news
Of thy redemption. Thou art beautiful,
Aztlan! O City of the Cymric Prince!
Long mayst thou flourish in thy beauty, long
Prosper beneath the righteous conqueror,
Who conquers to redeem! Long years of peace
And happiness await thy Lord and thee,
Queen of the Valley!

Hither joyfully
The Hoamen came to repossess the land
Of their forefathers. Joyfully the youth
Come shouting, with acclaim of grateful praise,
Their great Deliverer's name; the old, in talk
Of other days, which mingled with their joy
Memory of many a hard calamity,
And thoughts of time and change, and human life
How changeful and how brief. Prince Madoc met
Erillyab at the gate.—Sister and Queen,
Said he, here let us hold united reign,
O'er our united people; by one faith,
One interest bound, and closer to be link'd
By laws, and language, and domestic ties,
Till both become one race, for evermore
Indissolubly knit.

O friend, she cried,
The last of all my family am I;
Yet sure, though last, the happiest, and by Heaven
Favored abundantly above them all.
Dear Friend, and Brother dear! enough for me
Beneath the shadow of thy shield to dwell,
And see my people, by thy fostering care,
Made worthy of their fortune. Graciously
Hath the Beloved One appointed all,
Educing good from ill, himself being good.
Then to the royal palace of the Kings
Of Aztlan, Madoc led Erillyab,
There where her sires had held their ruder reign,
To pass the happy remnant of her years,
Honor'd and loved by all.

Now had the Prince
Provided for defence, disposing all
As though a ready enemy approach'd.
But from Patamba yet no army moved:
Four Heralds only, by the King despatch'd,
Drew nigh the town. The Hoamen, as they came,
Knew the green mantle of their privilege,
The symbols which they bore, an arrow-point
Depress'd, a shield, a net, which, from the arm

Suspended, held their food. They through the gate
 Pass with permitted entrance, and demand
 To see the Ocean Prince. The Conqueror
 Received them, and the elder thus began:
 Thus to the White King, King Yuhidthiton
 His bidding sends; such greeting as from foe
 Foe may receive, where individual hate
 Is none, but honor and assured esteem,
 And what were friendship, did the Gods permit,
 The King of Aztlan sends. Oh, dream not thou
 That Aztlan is subdued; nor in the pride
 Of conquest tempt thy fortune! Unprepared
 For battle, at an hour of festival,
 Her children were surprised; and thou canst tell
 How perilously they maintain'd the long
 And doubtful strife. From yonder temple-mount Look round the plain, and count her towns, and mark

Her countless villages, whose habitants
 All are in arms against thee! Thinkest thou
 To root them from the land? Or wouldst thou live,
 Harass'd by night and day with endless war,
 War at thy gates; and to thy children leave
 That curse for their inheritance? — The land
 Is all before thee: Go in peace, and choose
 Thy dwelling-place, North, South, or East, or West;
 Or mount again thy houses of the sea,
 And search the waters. Whatsoe'er thy wants
 Demand, will Aztlan willingly supply,
 Prepared with friendly succor, to assist
 Thy soon departure. Thus Yuhidthiton,
 Remembering his old friendship, counsels thee;
 Thus, as the King of Aztlan, for himself
 And people, he commands. If obstinate,
 If blind to your own welfare, ye persist,
 Woe to ye, wretches! to the armed man,
 Who in the fight must perish; to the wife,
 Who vainly on her husband's aid will call;
 Woe to the babe that hangs upon the breast;
 For Aztlan comes in anger, and her Gods
 Spare none.

The Conqueror calmly answer'd him —
 By force we won your city, Azteca;
 By force we will maintain it: — to the King
 Repeat my saying. — To this goodly land
 Your fathers came for an abiding-place,
 Strangers, like us, but not, like us, in peace.
 They conquer'd and destroyed. A tyrant race,
 Bloody and faithless, to the hills they drove
 The unoffending children of the vale,
 And, day by day, in cruel sacrifice
 Consumed them. God hath sent the Avengers
 here!

Powerful to save we come, and to destroy,
 When Mercy on Destruction calls for aid.
 Go tell your nation that we know their force,
 That they know ours; that their Patamba soon
 Shall fall like Aztlan; and what other towns
 They seek in flight, shall like Patamba fall;
 Till, broken in their strength and spirit-crush'd,
 They bow the knee, or leave the land to us,
 Its worthier Lords.

If this be thy reply,
 Son of the Ocean! said the messenger,
 I bid thee, in the King of Aztlan's name,

Mortal defiance. In the field of blood,
 Before our multitudes shall trample down
 Thy mad and miserable countrymen,
 Yuhidthiton invites thee to the strife
 Of equal danger. So may he avenge
 Coanocotzin, or like him in death
 Discharge his duty.

Tell Yuhidthiton,
 Madoc replied, that in the field of blood
 I never shunn'd a foe. But say thou to him,
 I will not seek him there, against his life
 To raise the hand which hath been join'd with his
 In peace. — With that the Heralds went their way;
 Nor to the right nor to the left they turn,
 But to Patamba straight they journey back.

 XXV.

THE LAKE FIGHT.

THE mariners, meantime, at Ririd's will,
 Unreeve the rigging, and the masts they strike;
 And now ashore they haul the lighten'd hulks,
 Tear up the deck, the severed planks bear off,
 Disjoin the well-scarfed timbers, and the keel
 Loosen asunder; then to the lake-side
 Bear the materials, where the Ocean Lord
 Himself directs their work. Twelve vessels there,
 Fitted alike to catch the wind, or sweep
 With oars the moveless surface, they prepare:
 Lay down the keel, the stern-post rear, and fix
 The strong-curved timbers. Others from the wood
 Bring the tall pines, and from their hissing trunks
 Force, by the aid of fire, the needful gum;
 Beneath the close-calk'd planks its odorous stream
 They pour; then, last, the round-projecting prows
 With iron arm, and launch, in uproar loud
 Of joy, anticipating victory,
 The galleys long and sharp. The masts are rear'd,
 The sails are bent, and lo! the ready barks
 Lie on the lake.

It chanced the Hoamen found
 A spy of Aztlan, and before the Prince
 They led him. But when Madoc bade him tell,
 As his life-ransom, what his nation's force,
 And what their plans, the savage answered him,
 With dark and sullen eye and smile of wrath,
 If aught the knowledge of my country's force
 Could profit thee, be sure, ere I would let My tongue play traitor, thou shouldst limb from limb

Hew me, and make each separate member feel
 A separate agony of death. O Prince!
 But I will tell ye of my nation's force,
 That ye may know and tremble at your doom;
 That fear may half subdue ye to the sword
 Of vengeance. — Can ye count the stars of Heaven?
 The waves which ruffle o'er the lake? the leaves
 Swept from the autumnal forest? Can ye look
 Upon the eternal snows of yonder height,
 And number each particular flake that formed
 The mountain-mass? — So numberless they come,
 Whoe'er can wield the sword, or hurl the lance,

Or aim the arrow ; from the growing boy,
Ambitious of the battle, to the old man,
Who to revenge his country and his Gods
Hastens, and then to die. By land they come ;
And years must pass away ere on their path
The grass again will grow : they come by lake ;
And ye shall see the shoals of their canoes
Darken the waters. Strangers ! when our Gods
Have conquered, when ye lie upon the Stone
Of Sacrifice, extended one by one,
Half of our armies cannot taste your flesh,
Though given in equal shares, and every share
Minced like a nestling's food !

Madoc replied,
Azteca, we are few ; but through the woods
The Lion walks alone. The lesser fowls
Flock multitudinous in heaven, and fly
Before the Eagle's coming. We are few ;
And yet thy nation hath experienced us
Enough for conquest. Tell thy countrymen,
We can maintain the city which we won.

So saying, he turn'd away, rejoiced at heart
To know himself alike by lake or land
Prepared to meet their power.

The fateful day
Draws on ; by night the Aztecas embark.
At day-break from Patamba they set forth,
From every creek and inlet of the lake,
All moving towards Aztlan ; safely thus
Weening to reach the plain before her walls,
And fresh for battle. Shine thou forth, O Sun !
Shine fairly forth upon a scene so fair !
Their thousand boats, and the ten thousand oars
From whose broad bowls the waters fall and flash,
And twice ten thousand feathered helms, and shields,
Glittering with gold and scarlet plumery.
Onward they come with song and swelling horn ;
While, louder than all voice and instrument,
The dash of their ten thousand oars, from shore
To shore, and hill to hill, reëchoing rolls,
In undistinguishable peals of sound
And endless echo. On the other side
Advance the British barks ; the freshening breeze
Fills the broad sail ; around the rushing keel
The waters sing ; while proudly they sail on,
Lords of the water. Shine thou forth, O Sun !
Shine forth upon their hour of victory !

Onward the Cymry speed. The Aztecas,
Though wondering at that unexpected sight,
Bravely made on to meet them, seized their bows,
And showered, like rain, upon the pavaised barks
The rattling shafts. Strong blows the auspicious gale ;

Madoc, the Lord of Ocean, leads the way ;
He holds the helm ; the galley where he guides
Flies on, and full upon the first canoe
Drives shattering ; midway its long length it struck,
And o'er the wreck with unimpeded force
Dashes among the fleet. The astonished men
Gaze in inactive terror. They behold
Their splinter'd vessels floating all around,
Their warriors struggling in the lake, with arms

Experienced in the battle vainly now.
Dismay'd they drop their bows, and east away
Their unavailing spears, and take to flight,
Before the Masters of the Elements,
Who rode the waters, and who made the winds
Wing them to vengeance ! Forward now they bend,
And backward then, with strenuous strain of arm,
Press the broad paddle. — Hope of victory
Was none, nor of defence, nor of revenge,
To sweeten death. Toward the shore they speed ;
Toward the shore they lift their longing eyes : —
O fools, to meet on their own element
The Sons of Ocean ! — Could they but a land
Set foot, the strife were equal, or to die
Less dreadful. But, as if with wings of wind,
On fly the British barks ! — the favoring breeze
Blows strong ; — far, far, behind their roaring keels
Lies the long line of foam ; the helm directs
Their force ; they move as with the limbs of life,
Obedient to the will that governs them.
Where'er they pass, the crashing shock is heard,
The dash of broken waters, and the cry
Of sinking multitudes. Here one plies fast
The practised limbs of youth, but o'er his head
The galley drives ; one follows a canoe
With skill availing only to prolong
Suffering ; another, as with wiser aim
He swims across, to meet his coming friends,
Stunn'd by the hasty and unheeding oar,
Sinks senseless to the depths. Lo ! yonder boat Grasp'd by the thronging strugglers ; its light length
Yields to the overbearing weight, and all
Share the same ruin. Here another shows
Crueler contest, where the crew hack off
The hands that hang for life upon its side,
Lest all together perish ; then in vain
The voice of friend or kinsman prays for mercy :
Imperious self controls all other thoughts :
And still they deal around unnatural wounds,
When the strong bark of Britain over all
Sails in the path of death. — God of the Lake,
Tlaloe ! and thou, O Aiauh, green-robed Queen !
How many a wretch, in dying agonies,
Invoked ye in the misery of that day !
Long after, on the tainted lake, the dead
Weltered ; there, perch'd upon his floating prey,
The vulture fed in daylight ; and the wolves,
Assembled at their banquet round its banks,
Disturb'd the midnight with their howl of joy.

 XXVI.

THE CLOSE OF THE CENTURY.

THERE was mourning in Patamba ; the north wind
Blew o'er the lake, and drifted to the shore
The floating wreck and bodies of the dead.
Then on the shore the mother might be seen
Seeking her child ; the father to the tomb,
With limbs too weak for that unhappy weight,
Bearing the bloated body of his son ;

The wife, who, in expectant agony,
Watch'd the black carcass on the coming wave.

On every brow terror was legible,
Anguish in every eye. There was not one
Who, in the general ruin, did not share
Peculiar grief, and in his country's loss
Lament some dear one dead. Along the lake
The frequent funeral-piles, for many a day,
With the noon-light their melancholy flames
Dimly commingled; while the mourners stood
Watching the pile, to feed the lingering fire,
As slowly it consumed the watery corpse.

Thou didst not fear, young Tlalala! thy soul,
Unconquered and unconquerable, rose
Superior to its fortune. When the Chiefs
Hung their dejected heads, as men subdued
In spirit, then didst thou, Yuhidhithon,
Calm in the hour of evil, still maintain
Thy even courage. They from man to man
Go, with the mourners mourning, and by grief
Exciting rage, till, at the promised fight,
The hope of vengeance, a ferocious joy
Flash'd in the eyes which glisten'd still with tears
Of tender memory. To the brave they spake
Of Aztlan's strength, — for Aztlan still was strong: —

The late defeat, — not there by manly might,
By honorable valor, by the force
Of arms subdued, shame aggravated loss;
The White Men from the waters came, perchance
Sons of the Ocean, by their parent Gods
Aided, and conquerors not by human skill.
When man met man, when in the field of fight
The soldier on firm earth should plant his foot,
Then would the trial be, the struggle then,
The glory, the revenge.

Tezozomoc,

Alike unbroken by defeat, endured
The evil day; but in his sullen mind [King
Work'd thoughts of other vengeance. He the Summon'd apart from all, with Tlalala,
And thus advised them: We have vainly tried
The war; these mighty Strangers will not yield
To mortal strength; yet shall they be cut off,
So ye will heed my counsel, and to force
Add wisdom's aid. Put on a friendly front;
Send to their Prince the messenger of peace;
He will believe our words; he will forgive
The past; — the offender may. So days and months,

Yea, years, if needful, will we wear a face
Of friendliness, till some some fit hour arrive,
When we may fire their dwellings in the night,
Or mingle poison in their cups of mirth.
The warrior, from whose force the Lion flies,
Falls by the Serpent's tooth.

Thou speakest well,

Tlalala answer'd; but my spirit ill
Can brook revenge delay'd.

The Priest then turn'd

His small and glittering eye toward the King;
But on the Monarch's mild and manly brow
A meaning sat, which made that crafty eye

Bend, quickly abash'd. While yet I was a child,
Replied the King of Aztlan, on my heart
My father laid two precepts. Boy, be brave!
So, in the midnight battle, shalt thou meet,
Fearless, the sudden foe. Boy, let thy lips
Be clean from falsehood! In the mid-day sun,
So never shalt thou need from mortal man
To turn thy guilty face. Tezozomoc,
Holy I keep the lessons of my sire.

But if the enemy, with their dreadful arms,
Again, said Tlalala, — If again the Gods
Will our defeat, Yuhidhithon replied,
Vain is it for the feeble power of man
To strive against their will. I augur not
Of ill, young Tiger! but if ill betide,
The land is all before us. Let me hear
Of perfidy and serpent-wiles no more!
In the noon-day war, and in the face of Heaven,
I meet my foes. Let Aztlan follow me;
And if one man of all her multitudes
Shall better play the warrior in that hour,
Be his the sceptre! But if the people fear
The perilous strife, and own themselves subdued,
Let us depart! The universal Sun
Confines not to one land his partial beams;
Nor is man rooted, like a tree, whose seed
The winds on some ungenial soil have cast,
There where he cannot prosper.

The dark Priest

Conceal'd revengeful anger, and replied,
Let the King's will be done! An awful day
Draws on; the Circle of the Years is full;
We tremble for the event. The times are strange;
There are portentous changes in the world;
Perchance its end is come.

Be it thy care,

Priest of the Gods, to see the needful rites
Duly perform'd, Yuhidhithon replied.
On the third day, if yonder Lord of Light
Begin the Circle of the Years anew,
Again we march to war.

One day is past;

Another day comes on. At earliest dawn
Then was there heard through all Patamba's streets
The warning voice, — Woe! woe! the Sun hath reach'd

The limits of his course; he hath fulfill'd
The appointed cycle! — Fast, and weep, and pray;
Four Suns have perish'd, — fast, and weep, and Lest the fifth perish also. On the first [pray, —
The floods arose; the waters of the heavens,
Bursting their everlasting boundaries,
Whelm'd in one deluge earth, and sea, and sky,
And quench'd its orb of fire. The second Sun
Then had its birth, and ran its round of years;
Till, having reach'd its date, it fell from heaven,
And crush'd the race of men. Another life
The Gods assign'd to Nature; the third Sun
Form'd the celestial circle; then its flames
Burst forth, and overspread earth, sea, and sky,
Deluging the wide universe with fire,
Till all things were consumed, and its own flames
Fed on itself, and spent themselves, and all
Was vacancy and darkness. Yet again

The World had being, and another Sun
Roll'd round the path of Heaven. That perish'd too :

The mighty Whirlwinds rose, and far away
Scattered its dying flames. The fifth was born ;
The fifth to-day completes its destined course,
Perchance to rise no more. O Aztlan, fast
And pray ! the Cycle of the Years is full !

Thus through Patamba did the ominous voice
Exhort the people. Fervent vows all day
Were made, with loud lament ; in every fane,
In every dwelling-place of man, were prayers,
The supplications of the affrighted heart,
Earnestly offered up with tears and groans.
So past the forenoon ; and when now the Sun
Sloped from his southern height the downward way
Of Heaven, again the ominous warner cried,
Woe ! woe ! the Cycle of the Years is full !
Quench every fire ! Extinguish every light !
And every fire was quenched, and every light

Meantime the Priests
Began the rites. They gash'd themselves, and plunged

Into the sacred pond of Ezapan,
Till the clear water, on whose bed of sand
The sunbeams sparkled late, opaque with blood,
On its black surface mirror'd all things round.
The children of the temple, in long search,
Had gather'd, for the service of this day,
All venomous things that fly, or wind their path
With sinuous trail, or crawl on reptile feet.
These, in one caldron, o'er the sacred fire
They sear'd, till of the loathsome living tribes,
Who, writhing in their burning agonies,
Fix on each other ill-directed wounds,
Ashes alone are left. In infants' blood
They mix the infernal unction, and the Priests
Anoint themselves therewith.

Lo ! from the South
The Orb of Glory his regardless way
Holds on. Again Patamba's streets receive
The ominous voice, — Woe ! woe ! the Sun pursues
His journey to the limits of his course !
Let every man in darkness veil his wife ;
Veil every maiden's face ; let every child
Be hid in darkness, there to weep and pray,
That they may see again the birth of light !
They heard, and every husband veil'd his wife
In darkness ; every maiden's face was veil'd ;
The children were in darkness led to pray,
That they might see the birth of light once more.

Westward the Sun proceeds ; the tall tree casts
A longer shade ; the night-eyed insect tribes
Wake to their portion of the circling hours ;
The water-fowl, retiring to the shore,
Sweep in long files the surface of the lake.
Then from Patamba to the sacred mount
The Priests go forth ; but not with songs of joy,
Nor cheerful instruments they go, nor train
Of festive followers ; silent and alone,
Leading one victim to his dreadful death,
They to the mountain-summit wend their way.

On the south shore, and level with the lake,
Patamba stood ; westward were seen the walls
Of Aztlan rising on a gentle slope ;
Southward the plain extended far and wide ;
To the east the mountain-boundary began,
And there the sacred mountain rear'd its head ;
Above the neighboring heights, its lofty peak
Was visible far off. In the vale below,
Along the level borders of the lake,
The assembled Aztecas, with wistful eye,
Gaze on the sacred summit, hoping there
Soon to behold the fire of sacrifice
Arise, sure omen of continued light.
The Pabas to the sacred peak begin
Their way, and, as they go, with ancient songs
Hymn the departed Sun.

O Light of Life,
Yet once again arise ! yet once again
Commence thy course of glory ! Time hath seen
Four generations of mankind destroy'd,
When the four Suns expired ; oh, let not thou,
Human thyself of yore, the human race
Languish, and die in darkness !

The fourth Sun
Had perish'd ; for the mighty Whirlwinds rose,
And swept it, with the dust of the shatter'd world,
Into the great abyss. The eternal Gods
Built a new World, and to a Hero race
Assign'd it for their goodly dwelling-place ;
And shedding on the bones of the destroy'd
A quickening dew, from them, as from a seed,
Made a new race of human-kind spring up,
The menials of the Heroes born of Heaven.
But in the firmament no orb of day
Perform'd its course ; Nature was blind ; the fount
Of light had ceased to flow ; the eye of Heaven
Was quenched in darkness. In the sad obscure,
The earth-possessors to their parent Gods
Pray'd for another Sun, their bidding heard,
And in obedience raised a flaming pile.
Hopeful they circled it, when from above
The voice of the Invisible proclaim'd,
That he who bravely plunged amid the fire
Should live again in Heaven, and there shine forth
The Sun of the young World. The Hero race
Grew pale, and from the fiery trial shrunk.
Thou, Nahuaztin, thou, O mortal born,
Heardest ! thy heart was strong, the flames received

Their victim, and the humbled Heroes saw
The orient sky, with smiles of rosy joy,
Welcome the coming of the new-born God.
O human once, now let not human-kind
Languish, and die in darkness !

In the East
Then didst thou pause to see the Hero race
Perish. In vain, with impious arms, they strove
Against thy will ; in vain against thine orb
They shot their shafts ; the arrows of their pride
Fell on themselves ; they perish'd, to thy praise.
So perish still thine impious enemies,
O Lord of Day ! But to the race devout,
Who offer up their morning sacrifice,
Honoring thy godhead, and with morning hymns,
And with the joy of music and of dance,

Welcome thy glad uprise, — to them, O Sun,
Still let the fountain-streams of splendor flow,
Still smile on them propitious, thou whose smile
Is light, and life, and joyance! Once again,
Parent of Being, Prince of Glory, rise,
Begin thy course of beauty once again!

Such was their ancient song, as up the height
Slowly they wound their way. The multitude
Beneath repeat the strain; with fearful eyes
They watch the spreading glories of the west!
And when at length the hastening orb hath sunk
Below the plain, such sinking at the heart
They feel, as he who, hopeless of return,
From his dear home departs. Still on the light,
The last green light that lingers in the west,
Their looks are fasten'd, till the clouds of night
Roll on, and close in darkness the whole heaven.
Then ceased their songs; then o'er the crowded vale

No voice of man was heard. Silent and still
They stood, all turn'd toward the east, in hope
There on the holy mountain to behold
The sacred fire, and know that once again
The Sun begins his stated round of years.

The Moon arose; she shone upon the lake,
Which lay one smooth expanse of silver light;
She shone upon the hills and rocks, and east
Upon their hollows and their hidden glens
A blacker depth of shade. Who then look'd round,
Beholding all that mighty multitude,
Felt yet severer awe, — so solemnly still
The thronging thousands stood. The breeze was heard

That rustled in the reeds; the little wave,
That rippled to the shore and left no foam,
Sent its low murmurs far.

Meantime the Priests
Have stretch'd their victim on the mountain-top;
A miserable man, his breast is bare,
Bare for the death that waits him; but no hand
May there inflict the blow of mercy. Piled
On his bare breast, the cedar boughs are laid;
On his bare breast, dry sedge and odorous gums
Laid ready to receive the sacred spark,
And blaze, to herald the ascending Sun,
Upon his living altar. Round the wretch
The inhuman ministers of rites accurs'd
Stand, and expect the signal when to strike
The seed of fire. Their Chief, Tezozomoe,
Apart from all, upon the pinnacle
Of that high mountain, eastward turns his eyes;
For now the hour draws nigh, and speedily
He looks to see the first faint dawn of day
Break through the orient sky.

Impatiently
The multitude await the happy sign.
Long hath the midnight pass'd, and every hour,
Yea, every moment, to their torturing fears
Seem'd lengthen'd out, insufferably long.
Silent they stood, and breathless in suspense.
The breeze had fallen; no stirring breath of wind
Rustled the reeds. Oppressive, motionless,
It was a labor and a pain to breathe

The close, hot, heavy air. — Hark! from the woods
The howl of their wild tenants! and the birds, —
The day-birds, in blind darkness fluttering,
Fearful to rest, uttering portentous cries!
Anon, the sound of distant thunders came;
They peal beneath their feet. Earth shakes and yawns, —

And lo! upon the sacred mountain's top,
The light — the mighty flame! A cataract
Of fire bursts upward from the mountain-head, —
High, — high, — it shoots! the liquid fire boils out,
It streams in torrents down! Tezozomoe
Beholds the judgment: wretched, — wretched man,
On the upmost pinnacle he stands, and sees
The lava floods beneath him: and his hour
Is come. The fiery shower, descending, heaps
Red ashes round; they fall like drifted snows,
And bury and consume the accursed Priest.

The Tempest is abroad. Fierce from the North
A wind uptears the lake, whose lowest depths
Rock, while convulsions shake the solid earth.
Where is Patamba? where the multitudes
Who throng'd her level shores? The mighty Lake
Hath burst its bounds, and yon wide valley roars,
A troubled sea, before the rolling storm.

 XXVII.

THE MIGRATION OF THE AZTECAS.

THE storm hath ceased; but still the lava-tides
Roll down the mountain-side in streams of fire;
Down to the lake they roll, and yet roll on,
All burning, through the waters. Heaven above
Glow round the burning mount, and fiery clouds
Scour through the black and starless firmament.
Far off, the Eagle, in her mountain-nest,
Lies watching in alarm, with steady eye,
The midnight radiance.

But the storm hath ceased;
The earth is still; — and lo! while yet the dawn
Is struggling through the eastern cloud, the barks
Of Madoc on the lake!

What man is he
On yonder crag, all dripping from the flood,
Who hath escaped its force? He lies along,
Now near exhaust with self-preserving toil,
And still his eye dwells on the spreading waves,
Where late the multitudes of Aztlan stood,
Collected in their strength. It is the King
Of Aztlan, who, extended on the rock,
Looks vainly for his people. He beholds
The barks of Madoc plying to preserve
The strugglers; — but how few! upon the crags
Which verge the northern shore, upon the heights
Eastward, how few have refuged! Then the King
Almost repented him of life preserved,
And wished the waves had whelmed him, or the sword

Fallen on him, ere this ill, this wretchedness,
This desolation. Spirit-troubled thus,
He call'd to mind how, from the first, his heart

Inclined to peace, and how reluctantly,
Obedient to the Pabas and their Gods,
Had he to this unhappy war been driven.
All now was ended: it remain'd to yield,
To obey the inevitable will of Heaven,
From Aztlan to depart. As thus he mused,
A Bird, upon a bough which overhung
The rock, as though in echo to his thought,
Cried out, — Depart! depart! — for so the note,
Articulately in his native tongue,
Spake to the Azteca. The King look'd up;
The hour, the horrors round him, had impress'd
Feelings and fears well fitted to receive
All superstition; and the voice which cried,
Depart! depart! seem'd like the voice of fate.
He thought, perhaps Coanocotzin's soul,
Descending from his blissful halls in the hour
Of evil, thus to comfort and advise,
Hover'd above him.

Lo! toward the rock,
Oaring with feeble arms his difficult way,
A warrior struggles: he hath reach'd the rock,
Hath grasp'd it, but his strength, exhausted, fails
To lift him from the depth. The King descends
Timely in aid; he holds the feeble one
By his long locks, and on the safety-place
Lands him. He, panting, from his clotted hair
Shook the thick waters, from his forehead wiped
The blinding drops; on his preserver's face
Then look'd, and knew the King. Then Tlalala
Fell on his neck, and groan'd. They laid them down
In silence, for their hearts were full of woe.

The sun came forth; it shone upon the rock;
They felt the kindly beams; their strengthen'd
blood

Flow'd with a freer action. They arose,
And look'd around, if aught of hope might meet
Their prospect. On the lake the galleys plied
Their toil successfully, ever to the shore
Bearing their rescued charge: the eastern heights,
Rightward and leftward of the fiery mount,
Were throng'd with fugitives, whose growing crowds

Speckled the ascent. Then Tlalala took hope,
And his young heart, reviving, reassumed
Its wonted vigor. Let us to the heights,
He cried; — all is not lost, Yuhidhithon!
When they behold thy countenance, the sight
Will cheer them in their woe, and they will bless
The Gods of Aztlan.

To the heights they went;
And when the remnant of the people saw
Yuhidhithon preserved, such comfort then
They felt, as utter wretchedness can feel,
That only gives grief utterance, only speaks
In groans and recollections of the past.
He look'd around; a multitude was there, —
But where the strength of Aztlan? where her hosts?

Her marshall'd myriads where, whom yester Sun
Had seen in arms array'd, in spirit high,
Mighty in youth and courage? — What were these,
This remnant of the people? Women most,
Who from Patamba, when the shock began,

Ran with their infants; widow'd now, yet each
Among the few who from the lake escaped,
Wandering, with eager eyes and wretched hope.
The King beheld and groan'd; against a tree
He lean'd, and bow'd his head, subdued of soul.

Meantime, amid the crowd, doth Tlalala
Seek for his wife and boy. In vain he seeks Hauquel there; in vain for her he asks;
A troubled look, a melancholy eye,
A silent motion of the hopeless head, —
These answer him. But Tlalala repress'd
His anguish, and he call'd upon the King; —
Yuhidhithon! thou seest thy people left;
Their fate must be determined; they are here
Houseless, and wanting food.

The King look'd up, —
It is determined, Tlalala! the Gods
Have crush'd us. Who can stand against their wrath?

Have we not life and strength? the Tiger cried.
Disperse these women to the towns which stand
Beyond the ruinous waters; against them
The White Men will not war. Ourselves are few,
Too few to root the invaders from our land,
Or meet them with the hope of equal fight;
Yet may we shelter in the woods, and share
The Lion's liberty; and man by man
Destroy them, till they shall not dare to walk
Beyond their city walls, to sow their fields,
Or bring the harvest in. We may steal forth
In the dark midnight, go and burn and kill,
Till all their dreams shall be of fire and death,
Their sleep be fear and misery.

Then the King
Stretch'd forth his hand, and pointed to the lake
Were Madoc's galleys still to those who clung
To the tree-tops for life, or faintly still
Were floating on the waters, gave their aid. —
O think not, Tlalala, that evermore
Will I against those noble enemies
Raise my right hand in war, lest righteous Heaven
Should blast the impious hand and thankless heart!
The Gods are leagued with them; the Elements
Banded against us! For our overthrow
Were yonder mountain-springs of fire ordain'd;
For our destruction the earth-thunders loosed,
And the everlasting boundaries of the lake
Gave way, that these destroying floods might roll
Over the brave of Aztlan! — We must leave
The country which our fathers won in arms;
We must depart.

The word yet vibrated
Fresh on their hearing, when the Bird above,
Flapping his heavy wings, repeats the sound,
Depart! depart! — Ye hear! the King exclaim'd;
It is an omen sent to me from Heaven;
I heard it late in solitude, the voice
Of fate! — It is Coanocotzin's soul
Who counsels our departure. — And the Bird
Still flew around, and in his wheeling flight
Pronounced the articulate note. The people heard
In faith, and Tlalala made no reply;
But dark his brow, and gloomy was his frown.

Then spake the King, and called a messenger,
And bade him speed to Aztlan.—Seek the Lord
Of Ocean; tell him that Yuhidthiton
Yields to the will of Heaven, and leaves the land
His fathers won in war. Only one boon,
In memory of our former friendship, ask—
The Ashes of my Fathers,—if indeed
The conqueror have not east them to the winds.

The herald went his way circuitous,
Along the mountains,—for the flooded vale
Barr'd the near passage; but before his feet
Could traverse half their track, the fugitives
Beheld canoes from Aztlan, to the foot
Of that protecting eminence, whereon
They had their stand, draw nigh. The doubtful sight
Disturb'd them, lest perchance with hostile strength
They came upon their weakness. Wrongful fear,—

For now Cadwallon, from his bark unarm'd,
Set foot ashore, and for Yuhidthiton
Inquired, if yet he lived. The King receives
His former friend.—From Madoc come I here,
The Briton said: Raiment and food he sends,
And peace; so shall this visitation prove
A blessing, if it knit the bonds of peace,
And make us as one people!

Tlalala!

Hearst thou him? Yuhidthiton exclaim'd.
Do thou thy pleasure, King! the Tiger cried:
My path is plain.—Thereat Yuhidthiton,
Answering, replied, Thus humbled, as thou seest,
Beneath the visitation of the Gods,
We bow before their will! To them we yield;
To you, their favorites, we resign the land
Our fathers conquer'd. Never more may Fate
In your days or your children's, to the end
Of time, afflict it thus!

He said, and call'd
The Heralds of his pleasure.—Go ye forth
Throughout the land: north, south, and east, and west,
Proclaim the ruin. Say to all who bear
The name of Azteca, Heaven hath destroy'd
Our nation: say, the voice of Heaven was heard,—
Heard ye it not?—bidding us leave the land,
Who shakes us from her bosom. Ye will find
Women, old men, and babes; the many, weak
Of body, and of spirit ill prepared,
With painful toil, through long and dangerous ways
To seek another country. Say to them,
The White Men will not lift the arm of power
Against the feeble; here they may remain
In peace, and to the grave in peace go down.
But they who would not have their children lose
The name their fathers bore, will join our march.
Ere ye set forth, behold the destined way.

He bade a pile be raised upon the top
Of that high eminence, to all the winds
Exposed. They raised the pile, and left it free
To all the winds of Heaven; Yuhidthiton
Alone approach'd it, and applied the torch.
The day was calm, and o'er the flaming pile

The wavy smoke hung lingering, like a mist
That in the morning tracks the valley-stream.
Swell over swell it rose, erect above,
On all sides spreading like a stately palm.
So moveless were the winds. Upward it roll'd,
Still upward, when a stream of upper air
Cross'd it, and bent its top, and drove it on,
Straight over Aztlan. An acclaiming shout
Welcomed the will of Heaven; for lo, the smoke
Fast travelling on, while not a breath of air
Is felt below. Ye see the appointed course,
Exclaim'd the King. Proclaim it where ye go!
On the third morning we begin our march.

Soon o'er the lake a winged galley sped,
Wafting the Ocean Prince. He bore, preserved
When Aztlan's bloody temples were east down,
The Ashes of the Dead. The King received
The relics, and his heart was full; his eye
Dwelt on his father's urn. At length he said,
One more request, O Madoc!—If the lake
Should ever to its ancient bounds return,
Shrined in the highest of Patamba's towers
Coanocotzin rests.—But wherefore this?
Thou wilt respect the ashes of the King.

Then Madoc said, Abide not here, O King,
Thus open to the changeful elements;
But till the day of your departure come,
Sojourn with me.—Madoc, that must not be!
Yuhidthiton replied. Shall I behold
A stranger dwelling in my father's house?
Shall I become a guest, where I was wont
To give the guest his welcome?—He pursued,
After short pause of speech,—For our old men,
And helpless babes, and women; for all those Whom wisely fear and feebleness deter
To tempt strange paths, through swamp, and wilderness,

And hostile tribes, for these Yuhidthiton
Entreats thy favor. Underneath thy sway,
They may remember me without regret,
Yet not without affection.—They shall be
My people, Madoc answer'd.—And the rites
Of holiness transmitted from their sires,—
Pursued the King,—will these be suffered them?—
Blood must not flow, the Christian Prince replied;
No Priest must dwell among us; that hath been
The cause of all this misery!—Enough,
Yuhidthiton replied: I ask no more.
It is not for the conquered to impose
Their law upon the conqueror.

Then he turn'd,
And lifted up his voice, and call'd upon
The people:—All whom fear or feebleness
Withhold from following my adventurous path,
Prince Madoc will receive. No blood must flow,
No Paba dwell among them. Take upon ye,
Ye who are weak of body or of heart,
The Strangers' easy yoke: beneath their sway
Ye may remember me without regret.
Soon take your choice, and speedily depart,
Lest ye impede the adventurers.—As he spake, Tears flow'd, and groans were heard. The line was drawn,

Which whoso would accept the Strangers' yoke
Should pass. A multitude o'erpass the line ;
But all the youth of Aztlan crowded round
Yuhidthiton, their own beloved King.

So two days long, with unremitting toil,
The barks of Britain to the adventurers
Bore due supply ; and to new habitants
The city of the Cymry spread her gates ;
And in the vale around, and on the heights,
Their numerous tents were pitch'd. Meantime the tale

Of ruin went abroad, and how the Gods
Had driven her sons from Aztlan. To the King, Companions of his venturous enterprise,
The bold repair'd ; the timid and the weak,
All whom, averse from perilous wanderings,
A gentler nature had disposed to peace,
Beneath the Strangers' easy rule remain'd.
Now the third morning came. At break of day
The mountain echoes to the busy sound
Of multitudes. Before the moving tribe
The Pabas bear, enclosed from public sight,
Mexitli ; and the ashes of the Kings
Follow the Chair of God. Yuhidthiton
Then leads the marshall'd ranks, and by his side,
Silent and thoughtfully, went Tlalala.

At the north gate of Aztlan, Malinal,
Borne in a litter, waited their approach ;
And now alighting, as the train drew nigh,
Propp'd by a friendly arm, with feeble step
Advanced to meet the King. Yuhidthiton,
With eye severe and darkening countenance,
Met his advance. I did not think, quoth he,
Thou wouldst have ventured this ! and liefer far
Should I have borne away with me the thought
That Malinal had shunn'd his brother's sight,
Because their common blood yet raised in him
A sense of his own shame ! — Comest thou to show
Those wounds, the marks of thine unnatural war
Against thy country ? Or to boast the meed
Of thy dishonor, that thou tarriest here,
Sharing the bounty of the Conqueror,
While, with the remnant of his countrymen,
Saving the Gods of Aztlan and the name,
Thy brother and thy King goes forth to seek
His fortune !

Calm and low the youth replied,
Ill dost thou judge of me, Yuhidthiton !
And rashly doth my brother wrong the heart
He better should have known ! Howbeit, I come Prepared for grief. These honorable wounds
Were gain'd when, singly, at Caermadoc, I
Opposed the ruffian Hoamen ; and even now,
Thus feeble as thou seest me, come I thence,
For this farewell. Brother, — Yuhidthiton, —
By the true love which thou didst bear my youth,
Which ever, with a love as true my heart
Hath answer'd, — by the memory of that hour
When at our mother's funeral pile we stood,
Go not away in wrath, but call to mind
What thou hast ever known me ! Side by side
We fought against the Strangers, side by side
We fell ; together in the council-hall

We counsell'd peace, together in the field
Of the assembly pledged the word of peace.
When plots of secret slaughter were devised,
I raised my voice alone ; alone I kept
My plighted faith ; alone I prophesied
The judgment of just Heaven : for this I bore
Reproach, and shame, and wrongful banishment,
In the action self-approved, and justified
By this unhappy issue.

As he spake,
Did natural feeling strive within the King,
And thoughts of other days, and brotherly love,
And inward consciousness that had he too
Stood forth, obedient to his better mind,
Nor weakly yielded to the wily priests,
Wilfully blind, perchance even now in peace
The kingdom of his fathers had preserved
Her name and empire. — Malinal, he cried,
Thy brother's heart is sore ; in better times
I may with kindier thoughts remember thee,
And honor thy true virtue. Now farewell !

So saying, to his heart he held the youth,
Then turn'd away. But then cried Tlalala,
Farewell, Yuhidthiton ! the Tiger cried ;
For I too will not leave my native land, —
Thou who wert King of Aztlan ! Go thy way ;
And be it prosperous. Through the gate thou seest
Yon tree that overhangs my father's house ;
My father lies beneath it. Call to mind
Sometimes that tree ; for at its foot in peace
Shall Tlalala be laid, who will not live
Survivor of his country.

Thus he said,
And through the gate, regardless of the King,
Turn'd to his native door. Yuhidthiton
Follow'd, and Madoc ; but in vain their words
Essay'd to move the Tiger's steady heart ;
When from the door a tottering boy came forth,
And elung around his knees with joyful cries,
And called him father. At the joyful sound
Out ran Ilanquel ; and the astonish'd man
Beheld his wife and boy, whom sure he deem'd
Whelm'd in the flood ; but them the British barks,
Returning homeward from their merciful quest,
Found floating on the waters. — For a while,
Abandoned by all desperate thoughts, he stood.
Soon he collected, and to Madoc turn'd,
And said, O Prince, this woman and her boy
I leave to thee. As thou hast ever found
In me a fearless, unrelenting foe,
Fighting with ceaseless zeal his country's cause,
Respect them ! — Nay, Ilanquel ! hast thou yet
To learn with what unshakable resolve
My soul maintains its purposes ? I leave thee
To a brave foe's protection. — Lay me, Madoc,
Here in my father's grave.

With that he took
His mantle off, and veil'd Ilanquel's face : —
Woman, thou mayst not look upon the Sun,
Who sets to rise no more ! — That done, he placed
His javelin-hilt against the ground ; the point
He fitted to his heart ; and, holding firm
The shaft, fell forward, still with steady hand
Guiding the death-blow on.

So in the land
 Madoc was left sole Lord; and far away
 Yuhidhilton led forth the Aztecas,
 To spread in other lands Mexitli's name,
 And rear a mightier empire, and set up
 Again their foul idolatry; till Heaven,
 Making blind Zeal and bloody Avarice
 Its ministers of vengeance, sent among them
 The heroic Spaniard's unrelenting sword.

NOTES TO MADOC IN AZTLAN.

We neighbor nearer to the Sun! — I. p. 375, col. 2.

Columbus inferred this from the elevation of the Pole at Paria. "How it cometh to pass," says Pietro Martire, "that at the beginning of the evening twilight it is elevate in that region only five degrees in the month of June, and in the morning twilight to be elevate fifteen degrees by the same quadrant, I do not understand, nor yet do the reasons which he bringeth in any point satisfy me. For he saith that he hereby conjectured that the Earth is not perfectly round, but that, when it was created, there was a certain heap raised thereon, much higher than the other parts of the same. So that, as he sayth, it is not round after the form of an apple or a ball, as others think, but rather like a pear as it hangeth on the tree, and that Paria is the region which possesseth the supereminent or highest part thereof, nearest unto heaven. In so much, that he earnestly contendeth the earthly Paradise to be situate in the tops of those three hills which the Watchmen saw out of the top castle of the ship; and that the outrageous streams of the fresh waters which so violently issue out of the said gulfs, and strive so with the salt water, fall headlong from the tops of the said mountains." — PIETRO MARTIRE, Dec. 1, Book 6.

Tezcalipoca. — II. p. 376, col. 2.

A devout worshipper of this Deity once set out to see if he could find him; he reached the sea-coast, and there the God appeared to him, and bade him call the Whale, and the Mermaid, and the Tortoise, to make a bridge for him, over which he might pass to the house of the Sun, and bring back from thence instruments of music and singers to celebrate his festivals. The Whale, the Mermaid, and the Tortoise accordingly made the bridge, and the man went over it, singing, as he went, a song which the God taught him. As soon as the Sun heard him, he cautioned all his servants and people not to answer to the song, for they who answered would be obliged to abandon his House and follow the Singer. Some there were, however, who could not resist the voice of the charmer, and these he brought back with him to earth, together with the drum called Huahuneth and the Tepunnatli. — TORQUEMADA, l. 6, c. 43.

The particular sacrifice related in the poem is described by this author, l. 10, c. 14. It is sufficient merely to refer to my authorities in such instances as these, where no other liberty has been taken than that of omission.

*She gathered herbs, which, like our poppy, bear
 The seed of sleep.* — II. p. 377, col. 1.

The expression is Gower's:

Poppy, which beareth the sede of sleepe

The Spanish name for the poppy is adornidera.

The Field of the Spirit. — III. p. 378, col. 2.

Every Spring the Akanceas go in a body to some retired place, and there turn up a large space of land, which they do with the drums beating all the while. After this they take care to call it the Desert, or the Field of the Spirit. And thither they go in good earnest when they are in their enthusiastic fits, and there wait for inspiration from their pretended Deity. In the mean while, as they do this every year, it proves of no small advantage to them, for by this means they turn up all their land insensibly, and it becomes abundantly fruitful — TONTI.

Before these things I was. — III. p. 378, col. 2.

"The manner in which, he says, he obtained the spirit of divination was this: He was admitted into the presence of a Great Man, who informed him that he loved, pitied, and desired to do him good. It was not in this world that he saw the Great Man, but in a world above, at a vast distance from this. The Great Man, he says, was clothed with the Day, yea with the brightest Day, he ever saw; a Day of many years, yea of everlasting continuance! This whole world, he says, was drawn upon him, so that in him the Earth and all things in it might be seen. I asked him if rocks, mountains, and seas were drawn upon or appeared in him? he replied, that every thing that was beautiful and lovely in the earth was upon him, and might be seen by looking on him, as well as if one was on the earth to take a view of them there. By the side of the Great Man, he says, stood his Shadow or Spirit, for he used chichung, the word they commonly make use of to express that of the man which survives the body, which word properly signifies a shadow. This shadow, he says, was as lovely as the Man himself, and filled all places, and was most agreeable as well as wonderful to him. Here, he says, he tarried some time, and was unspeakably entertained and delighted with a view of the Great Man, of his Shadow, and of all things in him. And what is most of all astonishing, he imagines all this to have passed before he was born; he never had been, he says, in this world at that time, and what confirms him in the belief of this is, that the Great Man told him, that he must come down to earth, be born of such a woman, meet with such and such things, and in particular that he should once in his life be guilty of murder; at this he was displeased, and told the Great Man he would never murder. But the Great Man replied, I have said it, and it shall be so; which has accordingly happened. At this time, he says, the Great Man asked him what he would choose in life; he replied, first to be a Hunter, and afterwards to be a Powwoc, or Divine; whereupon the Great Man told him, he should have what he desired, and that his Shadow should go along with him down to earth, and be with him for ever. There was, he says, all this time no word spoken between them; the conference was not carried on by any human language, but they had a kind of mental intelligence of each other's thoughts, dispositions, and proposals. After this, he says, he saw the Great Man no more, but supposes he now came down to earth to be born; but the Shadow of the Great Man still attended him, and ever after continued to appear to him in dreams and other ways. This Shadow used sometimes to direct him in dreams to go to such a place and hunt, assuring him he should there meet with success, which accordingly proved so; and when he had been there some time, the Spirit would order him to another place, so that he had success in hunting, according to the Great Man's promise, made to him at the time of his choosing this employment.

"There were some times when this Spirit came upon him in a special manner, and he was full of what he saw in the Great Man, and then, he says, he was all light, and not only light himself, but it was light all around him, so that he could see through men, and knew the thoughts of their hearts. These depths of Satan I leave to others to fathom or to dive into as they please, and do not pretend, for my own part, to know what ideas to affix to such terms, and cannot well guess what conceptions of things these creatures have at these times when they call themselves all light." — DAVID BRAINERD'S Journal.

Had Brainerd been a Jesuit, his superiors would certainly have thought him a fit candidate for the crown of martyrdom, and worthy to be made a Saint.

He found one of the Indian conjurers who seemed to have something like grace in him, only he would not believe in the Devil. "Of all the sights," says he, "I ever saw among them, or indeed any where else, none appeared so frightful, or so near akin to what is usually imagined of infernal powers! none ever excited such images of terror in my mind as the appearance of one, who was a devout and zealous reformer, or rather restorer, of what he supposed was the ancient religion of the Indians. He made his appearance in his pontifical garb, which was a coat of bears' skins, dressed with the hair on, and hanging down to his toes, a pair of bear-skin stockings, and a great wooden face, painted the one half black, and the other tawny, about the color of an Indian's skin, with an extravagant mouth, cut very much awry; the face fastened to a bear-skin cap, which was drawn over his head. He advanced towards me with the instrument in his hand that he used for music in his idolatrous worship, which was a dry tortoise-shell, with some corn in it, and the neck of it drawn on to a piece of wood, which made a very convenient handle. As he came forward, he beat his tune with the rattle, and danced with all his might, but did not suffer any part of his body, not so much as his fingers, to be seen; and no man would have guessed, by his appearance and actions, that he could have been a human creature, if they had not had some intimation of it otherwise. When he came near me, I could not but shrink away from him, although it was then noon-day, and I knew who it was, his appearance and gestures were so prodigiously frightful. He had a house consecrated to religious uses, with divers images cut out upon the several parts of it; I went in, and found the ground beat almost as hard as a rock, with their frequent dancing on it. I discoursed with him about Christianity, and some of my discourse he seemed to like, but some of it he disliked entirely. He told me that God had taught him his religion, and that he never would turn from it, but wanted to find some that would join heartily with him in it; for the Indians, he said, were grown very degenerate and corrupt. He had thought, he said, of leaving all his friends, and travelling abroad, in order to find some that would join with him; for he believed God had some good people somewhere, that felt as he did. He had not always, he said, felt as he now did, but had formerly been like the rest of the Indians, until about four or five years before that time; then, he said, his heart was very much distressed, so that he could not live among the Indians, but got away into the woods, and lived alone for some months. At length, he said, God comforted his heart, and showed him what he should do, and since that time he had known God, and tried to serve him; and loved all men, be they who they would, so as he never did before. He treated me with uncommon courtesy, and seemed to be hearty in it; and I was told by the Indians, that he opposed their drinking strong liquor with all his power; and if, at any time, he could not dissuade them from it by all he could say, he would leave them, and go crying into the woods. It was manifest he had a set of religious notions that he had looked into for himself, and not taken for granted upon bare tradition; and he relished or disrelished whatever was spoken of a religious nature, according as it either agreed or disagreed with his standard. And while I was discoursing, he would sometimes say, "Now, that I like; so God has taught me;" and some of his sentiments seemed very just. Yet he utterly denied the being of a Devil, and declared there was no such creature known among the Indians of old times, whose religion, he supposes, he was attempting to revive. He likewise told me, that departed souls all went southward, and that the difference between the good and bad was this, that the former were admitted into a beautiful town with spiritual walls, or walls agreeable to the nature of souls; and that the latter would for ever hover round those walls, and in vain attempt to get in. He seemed to be sincere, honest, and conscientious in his own way, and according to his own religious notions, which was more than I ever saw in any other Pagan; and I perceived he was looked upon and derided by most of the Indians as a precise zealot, who made a needless noise about religious matters. But I must say, there was something in his temper and disposition, that looked more like true religion than any thing I ever observed amongst other heathens." — BRAINERD.

Why should we forsake

The worship of our fathers? — III. p. 379, col. 1.

Olearius mentions a very disinterested instance of that hatred of innovation which is to be found in all ignorant persons, and in some wise ones.

"An old country fellow in Livonia being condemned, for faults enormous enough, to lie along upon the ground to receive his punishment, and Madam de la Barre, pitying his almost decrepit age, having so far interceded for him, as that his corporal punishment should be changed into a pecuniary mulct of about fifteen or sixteen pence; he thanked her for her kindness, and said, that, for his part, being an old man, he would not introduce any novelty, nor suffer the customs of the country to be altered, but was ready to receive the chastisement which his predecessors had not thought much to undergo; put off his clothes, laid himself upon the ground, and received the blows according to his condemnation." — Ambassador's Travels.

A good description of Welsh beauty is given by Mr. Yorke, from one of their original chronicles, in the account of Gruffydd ab Cynan and his Queen.

"Gruffydd, in his person, was of moderate stature, having yellow hair, a round face, and a fair and agreeable complexion; eyes rather large, light eyebrows, a comely beard, a round neck, white skin, strong limbs, long fingers, straight legs, and handsome feet. He was, moreover, skilful in divers languages, courteous and civil to his friends, fierce to his enemies, and resolute in battle; of a passionate temper, and fertile imagination. — Angharad, his wife, was an accomplished person: her hair was long, and of a flaxen color; her eyes large and rolling; and her features brilliant and beautiful. She was tall and well proportioned; her leg and foot handsome; her fingers long, and her nails thin and transparent. She was good-tempered, cheerful, discreet, witty, and gave good advice as well as aims to her needy dependents, and never transgressed the laws of duty."

This ceremony of declaring war with fire and water is represented by De Bry, in the eleventh print of the description of Florida, by Le Moyne de Morgues.

The Council Hall. — VI. p. 381, col. 2.

"The town-house, in which are transacted all public business and diversions, is raised with wood and covered over with earth, and has all the appearance of a small mount, at a little distance. It is built in the form of a sugar-loaf, and large enough to contain 500 persons, but extremely dark, having (besides the door which is so narrow that but one at a time can pass, and that, after much winding and turning) but one small aperture to let the smoke out, which is so ill-contrived, that most of it settles in the roof of the house. Within, it has the appearance of an ancient amphitheatre, the seats being raised one above another, leaving an area in the middle, in the centre of which stands the fire: the seats of the head warriors are nearest it." — Memoirs of Lieutenant HENRY TIMBERLAKE, who accompanied the Cherokee Indians to England, in 1762.

The Sarbacan. — VI. p. 381, col. 2.

"The children, at eight or ten years old, are very expert at killing birds and smaller game with a sarbacano, or hollow cane, through which they blow a small dart, whose weakness obliges them to shoot at the eye of the larger sort of prey, which they seldom miss." — TIMBERLAKE.

The pendent string of shells. — VI. p. 381, col. 2.

“The doors of their houses and chambers were full of diverse kinds of shells, hanging loose by small cordes, that being shaken by the wind they make a certaine ratteling, and also a whisteling noise, by gathering their wind in their hollowe places; for herein they have great delight, and impute this for a goodly ornament.” — PIETRO MARTIRE.

*Still do your shadows roam dissatisfied,
And to the cries of wailing woe return
A voice of lamentation.* — VI. p. 381, col. 2.

“They firmly believe that the Spirits of those who are killed by the enemy, without equal revenge of blood, find no rest, and at night haunt the houses of the tribe to which they belonged; but when that kindred duty of retaliation is justly executed, they immediately get ease and power to fly away.” — ADAIR.

“The answering voices heard from caves and hollow holes, which the Latines call Echo, they suppose to be the Soules wandering through these places.” — PIETRO MARTIRE. This superstition prevailed in Cumana, where they believed the Echo to be the voice of the Soul, thus answering when it was called. — HERRERA, 3, 4, 11.

The word by which they express the funeral wailing in one of the Indian languages is very characteristic — Máuo: which bewailing, says Roger Williams, is very solemn amongst them morning and evening, and sometimes in the night, they bewail their lost husbands, wives, children, &c.; sometimes a quarter, half, yea, a whole year and longer, if it be for a great Princee.

*Their happy souls
Pursue, in fields of bliss, the shadowy deer.* — VI. p. 382, col. 2.

This opinion of the American Indians may be illustrated by a very beautiful story from Carver's Travels: —

“Whilst I remained among them, a couple, whose tent was adjacent to mine, lost a son of about four years of age. The parents were so much affected at the death of their favorite child, that they pursued the usual testimonies of grief with such uncommon rigor, as through the weight of sorrow and loss of blood to occasion the death of the father. The woman, who had hitherto been inconsolable, no sooner saw her husband expire, than she dried up her tears, and appeared cheerful and resigned. As I knew not how to account for so extraordinary a transition, I took an opportunity to ask her the reason of it; telling her, at the same time, that I should have imagined the loss of her husband would rather have occasioned an increase of grief than such a sudden diminution of it.

“She informed me, that as the child was so young when it died, and unable to support itself in the country of spirits, both she and her husband had been apprehensive that its situation would be far from being happy; but no sooner did she behold its father depart for the same place, who not only loved the child with the tenderest affection, but was a good hunter, and would be able to provide plentifully for its support, than she ceased to mourn. She added, that she now saw no reason to continue her tears, as the child, on whom she doted, was under the care and protection of a fond father, and she had only one wish that remained ungratified, which was that of being herself with them.

“Expression so replete with unaffected tenderness, and sentiments that would have done honor to a Roman matron, made an impression on my mind greatly in favor of the people to whom she belonged, and tended not a little to counteract the prejudices I had hitherto entertained, in common with every other traveller, of Indian insensibility and want of parental tenderness. Her subsequent conduct confirmed the favorable opinion I had just imbibed, and convinced me that, notwithstanding the apparent suspension of her grief, some particles of that reluctance to be separated from a beloved relation, which is implanted by nature or custom in every human heart, still lurked in hers. I observed that she went almost every evening to the foot of the tree, on a branch of which the bodies of her husband and child were laid, and after cutting off a lock of her hair, and throwing it on the ground, in a plaintive melancholy song bemoaned its fate. A recapitulation of the actions he might have performed, had his life been spared, appeared to be her favorite theme; and whilst she foretold the fame that would have attended an imitation of his father's virtues, her grief seemed to be suspended. ‘If thou hadst continued with us, my dear Son,’ would she cry, ‘how well would the bow have become thy hand, and how fatal would thy arrows have proved to the enemies of our bands! thou wouldst often have drunk their blood and eaten their flesh, and numerous slaves would have rewarded thy toils. With a nervous arm wouldst thou have seized the wounded buffalo, or have combated the fury of the enraged bear. Thou wouldst have overtaken the flying elk, and have kept pace on the mountain's brow with the fleetest deer. What feats mightst thou not have performed, hadst thou staid among us till age had given thee strength, and thy father had instructed thee in every Indian accomplishment!’ In terms like these did this untutored savage bewail the loss of her son, and frequently would she pass the greatest part of the night in the affectionate employ.”

*The spirit of that noble blood which ran
From their death-wounds, is in the ruddy clouds
Which go before the Sun, when he comes forth
In glory.* — VI. p. 382, col. 2.

Among the last comers, one Avila, a cacique, had great authority, who understanding that Valdivia affirmed the God of the Christians was the only Creator of all things, in a great rage cried out, he would never allow Pillan, the God of the Chilenians, to be denied the power of creating. Valdivia inquired of him concerning this imaginary deity. Avila told him that his God did, after death, translate the chief men of the nation and soldiers of known bravery to places where there was dancing and drinking, there to live happy forever; that the blood of noble men slain in battle was placed about the Sun, and changed into red clouds, which sometimes adorn his rising. — Hist. of Paraguay, &c. by F. A. DEL TECHO.

*O my people,
I, too, could tell ye of the former days.* — VI. p. 383, col. 1.

The mode of sowing is from the 21st plate of De Bry to J. Le Moyne de Meigues; the common store-houses are mentioned by the same author; and the ceremony of the widows strowing their hair upon their husbands' graves is represented in the 19th plate.

The Snake Idol. — VI. p. 383, col. 1.

Snake-worship was common in America. Bernal Diaz, p. 3, 7, 125. The idol described VII. p. 246, somewhat resembles what the Spaniards found at Campeche, which is thus described by the oldest historian of the Discoveries. “Our men were conducted to a broad crosse-way, standing on the side of the towne. Here they shew them a square stage or pulpit foure steppes high, partly of clammy bitumen, and partly of small stones, whereto the image of a man cut in marble was joyned two foure-footed unknown beastes fastening upon him, which, like madde dogges, seemed they would tear the marble man's guts out of his belly. And by the Image stood a Serpent, besmeared all with goare bloud, devouring a marble lion, which Serpent, compacted of bitumen and small stones incorporated together, was seven and fortie feet in length, and as thicke as a great oxe. Next unto it were three rafters or stakes fastened to the ground, which three others crossed underpropped with stones; in which place they punish malefactors condemned, for proof whereof they saw innumerable broken arrows, all blouidie, scattered on the ground, and the bones of the dead cast into an inclosed courte neere unto it." — PIETRO MARTIRE.

It can scarcely be necessary to say, that I have attributed to the Hoamen such manners and superstitions as, really existing among the savage tribes of America, were best suited to the plan of the poem.

... piously a portion take
Of that cold earth, to which forever now
Consign'd, they leave their fathers, dust to dust.

VI. p. 383, col. 1.

Charlevoix assigns an unworthy motive for this remarkable custom, which may surely be more naturally explained; he says they fancy it procures luck at play.

... from his head
Plucking the thin gray hairs, he dealt them round.

VI. p. 388, col. 2.

Some passages in Mr. Mackenzie's Travels suggested this to me.

"Our guide called aloud to the fugitives, and entreated them to stay, but without effect; the old man, however, did not hesitate to approach us, and represented himself as too far advanced in life, and too indifferent about the short time he had to remain in the world, to be very anxious about escaping from any danger that threatened him; at the same time he pulled the gray hairs from his head by handfuls to distribute among us, and implored our favor for himself and his relations.

"As we were ready to embark, our new recruit was desired to prepare himself for his departure, which he would have declined; but as none of his friends would take his place, we may be said, after the delay of an hour, to have compelled him to embark. Previous to his departure, a ceremony took place, of which I could not learn the meaning; he cut off a lock of his hair, and having divided it into three parts, he fastened one of them to the hair on the upper parts of his wife's head, blowing on it three times with all the violence in his power, and uttering certain words. The other two he fastened with the same formalities on the heads of his two children." — MACKENZIE.

Forth, from the dark recesses of the cave,
The Serpent came. — VII. p. 381, col. 2.

Of the wonderful docility of the Snake one instance may suffice.

"An Indian belonging to the Menomouie, having taken a rattle-snake, found means to tame it; and when he had done this, treated it as a Deity; calling it his great Father, and carrying it with him in a box wherever he went. This he had done for several summers, when Monsieur Pinnisance accidentally met with him at this carrying-place, just as he was setting off for a winter's hunt. The French gentleman was surprised one day to see the Indian place the box which contained his God on the ground, and opening the door, give him his liberty; telling him, whilst he did it, to be sure and return by the time he himself should come back, which was to be in the month of May following. As this was but October, Monsieur told the Indian, whose simplicity astonished him, that he fancied he might wait long enough, when May arrived, for the arrival of his great Father. The Indian was so confident of his creature's obedience, that he offered to lay the Frenchman a wager of two gallons of rum, that at the time appointed he would come and crawl into his box. This was agreed on, and the second week in May following fixed for the determination of the wager. At that period they both met there again; when the Indian set down his box, and called for his great Father. The Snake heard him not; and the time being now expired, he acknowledged that he had lost. However, without seeming to be discouraged, he offered to double the bet if his father came not within two days more. This was further agreed on; when, behold, on the second day, about one o'clock, the snake arrived, and of his own accord crawled into the box, which was placed ready for him. The French gentleman vouched for the truth of this story, and, from the accounts

I have often received of the docility of those creatures, I see no reason to doubt its veracity." — CARVER'S Travels.

We have not taken animals enough into alliance with us. In one of the most interesting families which it was ever my good fortune to visit, I saw a child suckled by a goat. The gull should be taught to catch fish for us in the sea, the otter in fresh water. The more spiders there were in the stable, the less would the horses suffer from the flies. The great American fire-fly should be imported into Spain to catch musquitoes. Snakes would make good mousers; but one favorite mouse should be kept to rid the house of cockroaches. The toad is an excellent fly-catcher, and in hot countries a reward should be offered to the man who could discover what insect feeds upon fleas; for, say the Spaniards, no ay criatura tan li bre, a quien falta su Alguacil.

... that huge King
Of Basan, hugest of the Anakim. — VII. p. 381, col. 2.

Og, the King of Basan, was the largest man that ever lived: all Giants, Titans, and Oggers are but dwarfs to him; Garagantua himself is no more compared to Og, than Tom Thumb is to Garagantua. For thus say the Rabbis; Moses chose out twelve Chiefs, and advanced with them till they approached the land of Canaan, where Jericho was, and there he sent those chiefs that they might spy out the land for him. One of the Giants met them; he was called Og the son of Anak, and the height of his stature was twenty-three thousand and thirty-three cubits. Now Og used to catch the clouds and draw them towards him and drink their waters; and he used to take the fishes out of the depths of the sea, and toast them against the orb of the Sun and eat them. It is related of him by tradition, that in the time of the deluge he went to Noah and said to him, Take me with thee in the Ark; but Noah made answer, Depart from me, O thou enemy of God! And when the water covered the highest mountains of the earth, it did not reach to Og's knees. Og lived three thousand years, and then God destroyed him by the hand of Moses. For when the army of Moses covered a space of nine miles, Og came and looked at it, and reached out his hand to a mountain, and cut from it a stone so wide, that it could have covered the whole army, and he put it upon his head, that he might throw it upon them. But God sent a lapwing, who made a hole through the stone with his bill so that it slipped over his head, and hung round his neck like a necklace, and he was borne down to the ground by its weight. Then Moses ran to him; Moses was himself ten cubits in stature, and he took a spear ten cubits long, and threw it up ten cubits high, and yet it only reached the heel of Og, who was lying prostrate, and thus he slew him. And then came a great multitude with scythes, and cut off his head, and when he was dead his body lay for a whole year, reaching as far as the river Nile in Egypt. His mother's name was Enac, one of the daughters of Adam, and she was the first harlot; her fingers were two cubits long, and upon every finger she had two sharp nails, like two sickles. But because she was a harlot, God sent against her lions as big as elephants, and wolves as big as camels, and eagles as big as asses, and they killed her and eat her.

When Og met the spies who were sent by Moses, he took them all twelve in his hand and put them in his wallet; and carried them to his wife and said to her, Look, I beseech you, at these men who want to fight with us! and he emptied them out before her, and asked her if he should tread upon them; but she said, Let them go and tell their people what they have seen. When they were got out they said to each other, If we should tell these things to the children of Israel they would forsake Moses; let us therefore relate what we have seen only to Moses and Aaron. And they took with them one grape stone from the grapes of that country, and it was as much as a camel could carry. And they began to advise the people that they should not go to war, saying what they had seen; but two of them, namely, Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun, concealed it. — MARRACCI.

Even if the grapes had not been proportioned to Og's capacious mouth, the Rabbis would not have let him starve. There were Behemoths for him to roast whole; and Bar-Cha na saw a fish to which Whales are but sprats, and Leviathan but a herring. "We saw a fish," says he, "into whose nostrils the worm called Tioma had got and killed it; and it was cast upon the shore with such force by the sea, that it overthrew sixty maritime cities: sixty other cities fed upon its flesh, and what they left was salted for the food of sixty cities more."

From one of the pupils of his eyes they filled thirty barrels of oil. A year or two afterwards, as we past by the same place, we saw men cutting up his bones, with which the same cities were built up again. — MARACCI.

*Arrows, round whose heads dry tow was twined,
With pine-gum dipp'd.* — VII. p. 385, col. 1.

This mode of offence has been adopted wherever bows and arrows were in use. De Bry represents it in the 31st plate to Le Moyne de Morgues.

"The Modes poisoned their arrows with a bituminous liquor called naphta, whereof there was great plenty in Media, Persia, and Assyria. The arrow, being steeped in it, and shot from a slack bow, (for swift and violent motion took off from its virtue,) burnt the flesh with such violence, that water rather increased than extinguished the malignant flame: dust alone could put a stop to it, and, in some degree, allay the unspeakable pain it occasioned." — Universal History.

They are informed in some places that the Kings and Noblemen have immortal souls, and believe that the souls of the rest perish together with their bodies, except the familiar friends of the Princes themselves, and those only who suffer themselves to be buried alive together with their masters' funerals: for their ancestors have left them so persuaded, that the souls of Kings, deprived of their corporeal clothing, joyfully walk to perpetual delights through pleasant places always green, eating, drinking, and giving themselves to sports, and dancing with women after their old manner while they were living, and this they hold for a certain truth. Thereupon many, striving with a kind of emulation, cast themselves headlong into the sepulchres of their Lords, which, if his familiar friends defer to do, they think their souls become temporary instead of eternal. — PIETRO MARTIRE.

When I was upon the Sierras of Guaturo, says Oviedo, and had taken prisoner the Cacique of the Province who had rebelled, I asked him whose graves were those which were in a house of his; and he told me, of some Indians who had killed themselves when the Cacique his father died. But because they often used to bury a quantity of wrought gold with them, I had two of the graves opened, and found in them a small quantity of maize, and a small instrument. When I inquired the reason of this, the Cacique and his Indians replied, that they who were buried there were laborers, who had been well skilled in sowing corn and in gathering it in, and were his and his father's servants, who, that their souls might not die with their bodies, had slain themselves upon his father's death, and that maize with the tools was laid there with them that they might sow it in heaven. In reply to this, I bade them see how the Tuyra had deceived them, and that all he had told them was a lie: for though they had long been dead, they had never fetched the maize, which was now rotten and good for nothing, so that they had sown nothing in heaven. But the Cacique answered, that was because they found plenty there, and did not want it. — Relacion sumaria de la Historia Natural de las Indias, par el Capitan GONZALO FERNANDEZ DE OVIEDO

The Tlascallans believed that the souls of Chiefs and Princes became clouds, or beautiful birds, or precious stones, whereas those of the common people would pass into beetles, rats, mice, weasels, and all vile and stinking animals. — TORQUEMADA, L. 6, c. 47.

*Cadog, Deiniol,
Padarn, and Teilo.* — VIII. p. 387, col. 1.

The two first of these Saints with Madog Morvyn, are called the three holy bachelors of the Isle of Britain. Cadog the Wise was a Bard who flourished in the sixth century. He is one of the three protectors of innocence; his protection was through the church law: Blas's by the common law; and Pedrogly's by the law of arms; these three were also called the just Knights of the Court of Arthur. Cadog was the first of whom there is any account, who collected the British Proverbs. There is a church dedicated to him in Caermarthenshire, and two in Monmouthshire. Deiniol has churches dedicated to him in Monmouth, Cardigan, and Pembrokeshire. In the year 525 he founded a college at Bangor, where he was Abbot, and when it was raised to the dignity of Bishopric he was the first Bishop. Padarn and Teilo rank with Dewi or David, as the three blessed Visitors, for they went about preaching the faith to all degrees of people, not only without reward, but themselves alleviating the distresses of the poor as far as their means extended. Padarn found a congregation at a place called from him Llanbadarn Vawr, where he had the title of Archbishop. Teilo established the college at Llandaff; the many places called Llandeilo were so named in honor of him. He and Cadog and David were the three canonical Saints of Britain. — Cambrian Biography.

Teilo, or Teliau, as he is called by David Williams, took an active part against the heresy of Pelagius, the great Welshman. "Such was the lustre of his zeal, that by something like a pun on his name, he was compared to the sun and called Ηλιον; and when slain at the altar, devotees contended with so much virulence for the reputation of possessing his body, that the Priests, to avoid scandalous divisions, found three miraculous bodies of the Saint, as similar, according to the phrase used on the occasion, as one egg to another; and miracles were equally performed at the tombs of all the three." — D. WILLIAMS'S Hist. of Monmouthshire.

This miracle is claimed by some Agiologists for St. Baldred, Confessor; "whose memory in ancient times hath byn very famous in the kingdom of Scotland. For that he having sometyms preached to the people of three villages neere adjoining one to the other in Scotland, called Aldham, Tiningham, and Preston, was so holy a man of life, that when he was dead, the people of each village contended one with another which of them should have his body; in so much, that at last, they not agreeing thereabout, took armes, and each of them sought by force to enjoy the same. And when the matter came to issue, the said sacred body was found all whole in three distinct places of the house where he died; so as the people of each village coming thither, and carrying the same away, placed it in their churches, and kept it with great honor and veneration for the miracles that at each place it pleased God to worke." — English Martyrology.

The story may be as true of the one Saint as of the other, a solution in which Romanists and Protestants will agree. Godwin (in Catal. Ep. Landar.) says that the Churches which contended for the Welsh Saint, were Pennalun, the burial-place of his family, Llandeilo Vawr, where he died, and Llandaff, where he had been Bishop; and he adds, in honor of his own church, that by frequent miracles at his tomb it was certain Llandaff possessed the true body. Yet in such a case as this the fac simile might have been not unreasonably deemed more curious than the original.

The polypus's power of producing as many heads, legs, and arms as were wanted, has been possessed by all the great Saints:

St. Teilo left his own country for a time because it was infested by an infectious disorder, called the Yellow Plague, which attacked both men and beasts. — Capgrave, quoted in Cressy's Church History of Brittany.

David. — VIII. p. 387, col. I.

'Mongst Hatterill's lofty hills, that with the clouds are crown'd,
The valley Ewias lies, immured so deep and round,
As they below who see the mountains rise so high,
Might think the straggling herds were grazing in the sky :
Which in it such a shape of solitude doth bear,
As Nature at the first appointed it for prayer.
Where in an aged cell, with moss and ivy grown,
In which not to this day the Sun hath ever shone,
That reverend British Saint, in zealous ages past,
To contemplation lived ; and did so truly fast,
As he did only drink what crystal Hodney yields,
And fed upon the leeks he gathered in the fields ;
In memory of whom, in each revolving year,
The Welshmen on his day that sacred herb do wear.

* * * * *

Of all the holy men whose fame so fresh remains,
To whom the Britons built so many sumptuous fanes,
This saint before the rest their patron still they hold,
Whose birth their ancient bards to Cambria long foretold ;
And seated here a see, his bishopric of yore,
Upon the farthest point of this unfruitful shore,
Selected by himself, that far from all resort
With contemplation seemed most fitly to comport,
That void of all delight, cold, barren, bleak, and dry,
No pleasure might allure, nor steal the wandering eye.

DRAYTON.

"A. D. 462. It happened on a day, as Gildas was in a sermon, (Reader, whether smiling or frowning, forgive the digression,) a Nunne big with child came into the congregation, whereat the preacher presently was struck dumb, (would not a maid's child amaze any man?) and could proceed no farther. Afterwards he gave this reason for his silence, because that Virgin bare in her body an infant of such signal sanctity as far transcended him. Thus, as lesser load stones are reported to lose their virtue in the presence of those that are bigger, so Gildas was silenced at the approach of the Welsh St. David, (being then but Hans in Kelder,) though afterwards, like Zachary, he recovered his speech again." — FULLER'S Church History of Great Britain.

"David one day was preaching in an open field to the multitude, and could not be well seen because of the concourse, (though they make him four cubits high, a man and a half in stature,) when behold the Earth whereon he stood, officiously heaving itself up, mounted him up to a competent visibility above all his audience. Whereas our Savior himself, when he taught the people, was pleased to choose a mountain, making use of the advantage of Nature without improving his miraculous power." — FULLER

David is indebted to the Romancers for his fame as a Champion of Christendom: how he came by his leek is a question which the Antiquarians have not determined. I am bound to make grateful mention of St. David, having in my younger days been benefited by his merits at Westminster, where the first of March is an early play.

But I, too, here upon this barbarous land,
Like Elmur and like Aronan of old,
Must lift the ruddy spear. — IX. p. 387, col. 2.

Elmur, Cynbaval, and Avaon the son of Taliesin, all deserted the Bardic principles to bear arms, and were called the three Chiefs like Bulls in conflict. Avaon, Aronan, and Dygunnelw are the three Bards of the ruddy spear.

..... for this the day,
When to his favor'd city he nochsafes
His annual presenc. — IX. p. 388, col. 1

Esta fiesta, ó espera de estos diabolicos Dioses, era muy solemne, y muy creida de estas barbaras naciones; porque el Demonio los tenia persuadidos á ser verdad que entonces venian de otras partes, y querian descansar allí en aquel día de su gran fiesta. La causa de tenerlo tan creído estos ciegos y desatinados hombres, era porque les daba señal de su llegada, en forma visible, aunque por invisible modo, en esta manera. Aquella noche, que era la vigilia de el festival día, en la qual el Demonio los tenia persuadido que llegaba el Dios mancebo Tezcaltipuca, ponian una estera que llamaban petate, en el suelo y entrada de la Capilla Mayor de su abominable Templo; sobre la qual cernian y polvoreaban una poca de harina de maíz, que es su trigo; y esto era al principio de la noche, la qual pasaba el Sumo Sacerdote en vela, iendo, y viniendo muy á menudo á vér la estera, si por ventura hallaba impresa, en la harina alguna huella de el Dios que aguardaban. Yu las mas horas pasadas de la noche, (que ordinariamente era de media noche abajo,) veia la señal de su llegada, que era una pisada, ó huella de pie humano estampada, y señolada en la harina. Luego que el Satrapa y Sacerdote la veia comenzaba á decir á voces, "Yu llegó nuestro Dios! Yu llegó nuestro Dios! nuestro Gran Dios es venido!" A esta vez acudia todo el Pueblo, que ya la estaban aguardando, unos en los Templos, y otros en sus casas, velando; y luego sonaban todos los instrumentos musicos, y comenzaban grandes regocijos, y bailaban, y cantaban, muy concertadamente, con mucha solemnidad y contento, celebrando la veuida y llegada de su falso y mentiroso Dios. Y procedian en su baile hasta el día, en todo el qual creian que llegaban todos los demás. — Porque fingian ser unos mas mozos que otros, y tener unos mas vigor y fuerzas que otros, y por esta razon no ser á una su llegada, sino en diferentes tiempos.

TORQUEMADA, l. X. c. 24.

Tezalipoca was believed to arrive first, because he was the youngest of the Gods, and never waxed old: Telpnetli, the Youth, was one of his titles. On the night of his arrival a general carousal took place, in which it was the custom, particularly for old people, men and women alike, to drink immoderately; for they said the liquor which they drank would go to wash the feet of the God, after his journey. And I, says the Franciscan provincial, — who, if he had been a philosopher, would perhaps have not written a book at all, or certainly not so interesting a one, — I say, that this is a great mistake, and the truth is, that they washed their own stripes and filled them with liquor, which made them merry, and the fumes got up into their heads and overset them; with which fall it is not to be wondered at that they fell into such errors and foolishness.

In the reign of Rajah Chundrumund, a Brahmin woman came to sue for justice, against the unknown murderer of her husband. The Rajah demanded, whether she had reason to suspect any one of the deed. She replied, that her husband was a man of a very fair character, and that she had never known any one bear him ill-will, excepting one man, with whom he was continually disputing upon points of philosophy. This person being brought before the Rajah, denied the charge; and the wife was not satisfied with the cause being determined by the ordeal trial, from the dread that he might escape by means of witchcraft. The Rajah was so much perplexed how to decide upon the case, that he could neither eat nor sleep. At length he saw in a dream a sage, who taught him an incantation, which he should utter over a heap of rice flour, and then scatter the meal upon the ground, and direct the suspected person to walk over it; if there appeared upon the meal the impression of the feet of two persons, then the accused was certainly the murderer. When the Rajah awoke, he did as the vision had commanded him, and the Brahmin was proved guilty. — Aycen-Akbery.

It was thought that Tezea often visited the Mexicans, but except on this occasion, he always came incognito. A stone seat was placed at every crossing, or division, of a street, called Momoztli or Ichialoca, where he is expected; and this was continually hung with fresh garlands and green boughs, that he might rest there. — TORQUEMADA, l. 6, c. 20.

Mexitli, woman-born — IX. p. 388, col. 1.

The history of Mexitli's birth is related in the Poem, Part II. Sect. XXI. Though the Mexicans took their name from him, he is more usually called Huitzilpuchtli, or corruptly Vitzliputzli. In consequence of the vengeance, which he exercised as soon as born, he was styled Tetzahuitl Terror, and Tetzahueotl, the Terrible God. — CLAVIGERO. TORQUEMADA, l. 6, c. 21.

Quetzalcoatl. — IX. p. 388, col. 1.

God of the Winds: his temple was circular, "for even as the ayre goeth rounde about the heavens, even for that consideration they made his temple round. The entrance of that temple had a dore made lyke unto the mouth of a serpent, and was paynted with foule and devilish gestures, with great teeth and gummies wrought, which was a thing to feare those that should enter thereat, and especially the Christians, unto whom it represented very Hell with that ougly face and monstrous teeth." — GOMANA.

Some history is bleeded with fable in the legend of Quetzalcoatl, for such is the uglyography of his name. He was chief of a band of strangers who landed at Panuco, coming from the North: their dress was black, long, and loose, like the Turkish dress, or the Cassack, says Torquemada, open before, without hood or cape, the sleeves full, but not reaching quite to the elbow; such dresses were, even in his time, used by the natives in some of their dances, in memory of this event. Their leader was a white man, florid, and having a large beard. At first he settled in Tullan, but left that province in consequence of the vices of its Lords Huemac and Tezcalipoca, and removed to Cholullan. He taught the natives to cut the green stones, called chalcilhuites, which were so highly valued, and to work silver and gold. Every thing flourished in his reign; the head of maize was a man's load, and the cotton grew of all colors; he had one palace of emeralds, another of silver, another of shells, one of all kinds of wood, one of turquoises, and one of feathers; his commands were proclaimed by a cryer from the Sierra of Tzatzatepec, near the city of Tulla, and were heard as far as the sea-coast, and for more than a hundred leagues round. Fr. Bernardino de Sahagun heard such a voice once in the dead of the night, far exceeding the power of any human voice: he was told that it was to summon the laborer to the maizes fields; but both he and Torquemada believed it was the Devil's doing. Notwithstanding his power, Quetzalcoatl was driven out by Tezcalipoca and Huemac: before he departed he burnt or buried all his treasures, converted the cocoa-trees into others of less worth, and sent off all the sweet singing birds, who had before abounded, to go before him to Tlapallan, the land of the Sun, whither he himself had been summoned. The Indians always thought he would return, and when first they saw the Spanish ships, thought he was come in these moving temples. They worshipped him, for the useful arts which he had taught, for the tranquillity they had enjoyed under his government, and because he never suffered blood to be shed in sacrifice, but ordered bread and flowers, and incense to be offered up instead. — TORQUEMADA, l. 3, c. 7; l. 6, c. 24.

Some authors have supposed that these strangers came from Ireland, because they scarred their faces and eat human flesh: this is no compliment to the Irish, and certainly does not accord with the legend. Others that they were Carthaginians, because New Spain was called Anahuac, and the Phœnicians were children of Anak. That the Carthaginians peopled America, is the more likely, say they, because they bored their ears, and so did the Incas of Peru. One of these princes, in process of time, says Garcilasso, being willing to enlarge the privileges of his people, gave them permission to bore their ears also, — but not so wide as the Incas.

This much may legitimately be deduced from the legend, that New Spain, as well as Peru, was civilized by a foreign adventurer, who, it seems, attempted to destroy the sanguinary superstition of the country, but was himself driven out by the priests.

Tlaloc. — IX. p. 388, col. 1.

God of the Waters: he is mentioned more particularly in Section XII. Tlalocatecuhli, the Lord of Paradise, as he is also called, was the oldest of the country Gods. His Image was that of a man sitting on a square seat, with a vessel before him, in which a specimen of all the different grains and fruit seeds in the country was to be offered; it was a sort of pumice stone, and, according to tradition, had been found upon the mountains. One of the Kings of Tetzeuco ordered a better Idol to be made, which was destroyed by lightning, and the original one in consequence replaced with fear and trembling. As one of the arms had been broken in removing, it was fastened with three large golden nails; but in the time of the first Bishop Zumarraga, the golden nails were taken away and the idol destroyed.

Tlaloc dwelt among the mountains, where he collected the vapors and dispensed them in rain and dew. A number of inferior Deities were under his command.

Some of my readers will stumble at this name; but to those who would accuse me of designing to Hottentotify the language by introducing one of the barbarous clacks, I must reply, that the sound is Grecian. The writers who have supposed that America was peopled from Plato's Island, observe that the tl, a combination so remarkably frequent in the Mexican tongue, has probably a reference to Atlantis and the Atlantic, Atl being the Mexican word for water, and Tlaloc the God of the waters — an argument quite worthy of the hypothesis. — FR. GREGORIO GARCIA. Origen de los Indios, Lib. 4, c. 8, § 2.

The quaintest opinion ever started upon this obscure subject is that of Fr. Pedro Simon, who argued that the Indians were of the tribe of Issachar, because he was "a strong ass in a pleasant land, who bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute." If the Hebrew word, which is rendered tribute, may mean taxes as well, I humbly submit it to consideration, whether Issachar doth not typify John Bull.

Tiger of the War. — IX. p. 388, col. 2.

This was one of the four most honorable titles among the Mexicans; the others were Shedder of Blood, Destroyer of Men, and Lord of the Dark House. Great Slayer of Men was also a title among the Natchez; but to obtain this it was necessary that the warrior should have made ten prisoners, or brought home twenty scalps.

The Chinese have certain soldiers whom they call Tigers of War. On their large round shields of basket-work are painted monstrous faces of some imaginary animal, intended to frighten the enemy. — BARROW'S Travels in China.

And with tame weakness brook captivity.* — IX. p. 388, col. 2

The Gods of the conquered nations were kept fastened and caged in the Mexican temples. They who argued for the Phœnician origin of the Indians, might have compared this with the triumph of the Philistines over the Ark, when they placed it in the temple of Dagon.

Before the Mexican temples were large courts, kept well cleansed, and planted with the trees which they call Ahuehuetl, which are green throughout the year, and give a pleasant shade, wherefore they are much esteemed by the Indians; they are our saviu, (sabiuos de Espana.) In the comfort of their shade the priests sit, and await those who come to make offerings or sacrifice to the idol. — Historia de la Fundacion y Discurso de la Provincia de Santiago de Mexico de la orden de Predicadores; por el Maestro FRAY AUGUSTIN DAVILA PADILLA. Brussels, 1625.

The most painful penance to which any of these Priests were subjected, was that which the Cholultecas performed every four years, in honor of Quetzalcoatl. All the Priests sat round the walls in the temple, holding a censer in their hands:

from this posture they were not permitted to move, except when they went out for the necessary calls of nature; two hours they might sleep at the beginning of the night, and one after sunrise; at midnight, they bathed, smeared themselves with a black unction, and pricked their ears to offer the blood: the twenty-one remaining hours they sat in the same posture incensing the idol, and in that same posture took the little sleep permitted them; this continued sixty days; if any one slept out of his time, his companions pricked him: the ceremony continued twenty days longer, but they were then permitted more rest. — TORQUEMADA, l. 10, c. 32.

Folly and madness have had as much to do as knavery in priestcraft. The knaves, in general, have made the fools their instruments, but they not unfrequently have suffered in their turn.

Mammoth. — X. p. 390, col. 2.

Mr. Jefferson informs us, that a late governor of Virginia, having asked some delegates of the Delawares what they knew or had heard respecting this animal, the chief speaker immediately put himself into an oratorical attitude, and, with a pomp suited to the elevation of his subject, informed him, that it was a tradition handed down from their fathers, that in ancient times, a herd of them came to the Big-bone-licks, and began a universal destruction of the bears, deer, elks, buffaloes, and other animals which had been created for the use of the Indians; that the Great Man above, looking down, and seeing this, was so enraged, that he seized his lightning, descended to the earth, and seated himself upon a neighboring mountain on a rock, on which his seat and the print of his feet are still to be seen, and hurled his bolts among them, till the whole were slaughtered, except the big bull, who, presenting his forehead to the shafts, shook them off as they fell; but at length missing one, it wounded him on the side, whereon, springing around, he bounded over the Ohio, the Wabash, the Illinois, and, finally, over the great lakes, where he is living at this day.

Colonel G. Morgan, in a note to Mr. Morse, says, "These bones are found only at the Salt Licks, on the Ohio; some few scattered grinders have, indeed, been found in other places; but it has been supposed these have been brought from the above-mentioned deposit by Indian warriors and others, who have passed it, as we know many have been spread in this manner. When I first visited the Salt Licks," says the Colonel, "in 1766, I met here a large party of the Iroquois and Wyandot Indians, who were then on a war expedition against the Chicasaw tribe. The head chief was a very old man to be engaged in war; he told me he was eighty-four years old; he was probably as much as eighty. I fixed on this venerable chief, as a person from whom some knowledge might be obtained. After making him some acceptable presents of tobacco, paint, ammunition, &c., and complimenting him upon the wisdom of his nation, their prowess in war, and rudeness in peace, I intimated my ignorance respecting the great bones before us, which nothing but his superior knowledge could remove, and accordingly requested him to inform me what he knew concerning them. Agreeably to the customs of his nation, he informed me in substance as follows:

"Whilst I was yet a boy, I passed this road several times to war against the Catawbas; and the wise old chiefs, among whom was my grandfather, then gave me the tradition, handed down to us, respecting these bones, the like to which are found in no other part of the country; it is as follows: After the Great Spirit first formed the world, he made the various birds and beasts which now inhabit it. He also made man; but having formed him white, and very imperfect and ill-tempered, he placed him on one side of it where he now inhabits, and from whence he has lately found a passage across the great water, to be a plague to us. As the Great Spirit was not pleased with this his work, he took of black clay, and made what you call a negro, with a woolly head. This black man was much better than the white man: but still he did not answer the wish of the Great Spirit; that is, he was imperfect. At last the Great Spirit, having procured a piece of pure, fine red clay, formed from it the red man, perfectly to his mind; and he was so well pleased with him that he placed him on this great island, separate from the white and black men, and gave him rules for his conduct, promising happiness in proportion as they should be observed. He increased exceedingly, and was perfectly happy for ages; but the foolish young people, at length forgetting his rules, became exceedingly ill-tempered and wicked. In consequence of this the Great Spirit created the Great Buffalo, the bones of which you now see before us; these made war upon the human species alone, and destroyed all but a few, who repented and promised the Great Spirit to live according to his laws, if he would restrain the devouring enemy: whereupon he sent lightning and thunder, and destroyed the whole race, in this spot, two excepted, a male and a female, which he shut up in yonder mountain, ready to let loose again, should occasion require."

The following tradition, existing among the natives, we give in the very terms of a Shawanee Indian, to show that the impression made on their minds by it must have been forcible. "Ten thousand moons ago, when nought but gloomy forests covered this land of the sleeping sun, long before the pale men, with thunder and fire at their command, rushed on the wings of the wind to ruin this garden of nature; when nought but the untamed wanderers of the woods, and men as unrestrained as they were the lords of the soil; a race of animals were in being, huge as the frowning precipice, cruel as the bloody panther, swift as the descending eagle, and terrible as the angel of night. The pines crashed beneath their feet, and the lake shrunk when they slaked their thirst; the forceful javelin in vain was hurled, and the barbed arrow fell harmless from their side. Forests were laid waste at a meal; the groans of expiring animals were every where heard; and whole villages inhabited by men were destroyed in a moment. The cry of universal distress extended even to the region of peace in the west, and the Good Spirit interposed to save the unhappy. The forked lightnings gleamed all around, and loudest thunder rocked the globe. The bolts of heaven were hurled upon the cruel destroyers alone, and the mountains echoed with the bellows of death. All were killed except one male, the fiercest of the race, and him even the artillery of the skies assailed in vain. He ascended the bluest summit which shades the source of the Monongahela, and, roaring aloud, bid defiance to every vengeance. The red lightning scorched the lofty firs, and rived the knotty oaks, but only glanced upon the enraged monster. At length, maddened with fury, he leaped over the waves of the west at a bound, and this moment reigns the uncontrolled monarch of the wilderness, in despite of even Omnipotence itself." — WINTERBOTHAM. The tradition probably is Indian, but certainly not the bombast.

There is a more remarkable tale of kindred barbarity in Irish history. The royal family had been all cut off except one girl, and the wise men of the country fed her upon children's flesh to make her the sooner marriageable. I have not the book to refer to, and cannot therefore give the names; but the story is in Keating's history.

"I was awakened in the morning early, by the cheering converse of the wild turkey-cock (Mitlagris occidentalis) saluting each other, from the sun-brightened tops of the lofty Cupressus disticha and Magnolia grandiflora. They begin at early dawn, and continue till sunrise, from March to the last of April. The high forests ring with the noise, like the crowing of the domestic cock, of these social sentinels, the watch-word being caught and repeated, from one to another, for hundreds of miles around; inasmuch, that the whole country is, for an hour or more, in an universal shout. A little after sunrise, their crowing gradually ceases, they quit their high lodging places, and alight on the earth, where, expanding their silver-bordered train, they strut and dance round about the coy female, while the deep forests seem to tremble with their shrill noise." — BARTRAM.

DIAZ. Such is the description of the Mexican priests by one who had seen them.

Tlalocan. — XII. p. 393, col. 1.

The Paradise of Tlaloc.

"They distinguished three places for the souls when separated from the body: Those of soldiers who died in battle or in captivity among their enemies, and those of women who died in labor, went to the House of the Sun, whom they considered as the Prince of Glory, where they led a life of endless delight; where, every day, at the first appearance of the sun's rays, they hailed his birth with rejoicings; and with dancing, and the music of instruments and of voices, attended him to his meridian; there they met the souls of the women, and with the same festivity accompanied him to his setting: they next supposed, that these spirits, after four years of that glorious life, went to animate clouds, and birds of beautiful feathers and of sweet song, but always at liberty to rise again to heaven, or to descend upon the earth, to warble and suck the flowers. — The souls of those that were drowned or struck by lightning, of those who died of dropsy, tumors, wounds, and other such diseases, went along with the souls of children, at least of those which were sacrificed to Tlaloc, the God of Water, to a cool and delightful place called Tlalocan, where that God resided, and where they were to enjoy the most delicious repasts, with every other kind of pleasure. — Lastly, the third place allotted to the souls of those who suffered any other kind of death was Mictlan, or Hell, which they conceived to be a place of utter darkness, in which reigned a God, called Mictlantecuhtli, Lord of Hell, and a Goddess, named Mictlancihuatl. I am of opinion that they believed Hell to be a place in the centre of the earth, but they did not imagine that the souls underwent any other punishment there than what they suffered by the darkness of their abode. Sigüenza thought the Mexicans placed Hell in the northern part of the earth, as the word Mictlampa signified towards both." — CLAVIGERO.

When any person whose manner of death entitled him to a place in Tlalocan was buried, (for they were never burnt,) a rod or bough was laid in the grave with him, that it might bud out again and flourish in that Paradise. — TORQUEMADA, l. 13, c. 48.

The souls of all the children who had been offered to Tlaloc, were believed to be present at all after sacrifices, under the care of a large and beautiful serpent, called Xiuhcoatl. — TORQUEMADA, l. 8, c. 14.

Green islets float along. — XII. p. 393, col. 2.

Artificial islands are common in China as well as in Mexico.

"The Chinese fishermen, having no houses on shore, nor stationary abode, but moving about in their vessels upon the extensive lakes and rivers, have no inducement to cultivate patches of ground, which the pursuits of their profession might require them to leave for the profit of another; they prefer, therefore, to plant their onions on rafts of bamboo, well interwoven with reeds and long grass, and covered with earth; and these floating gardens are towed after their boats." — BARROW'S China.

*To Tlaloc it was hallowed; and the stone,
Which closed its entrance, never was removed,
Save when the yearly festival returned,
And in its womb a child was sepulchred,
The living victim.* — XII. p. 394, col. 1.

There were three yearly sacrifices to Tlaloc. At the first, two children were drowned in the Lake of Mexico; but in all the provinces they were sacrificed on the mountains; they were a boy and girl, from three to four years old: in this last case the bodies were preserved in a stone chest, as relics, I suppose, says Torquemada, of persons whose hands were clean from actual sin; though their souls were foul with the original stain, of which they were neither cleansed nor purged, and therefore they went to the place appointed for all like them who perish unbaptized. — At the second, four children, from six to seven years of age, who were brought for the purpose, the price being contributed by the chiefs, were shut up in a cavern, and left to die with hunger: the cavern was not opened again till the next year's sacrifice. — The third continued during the three rainy months, during all which time children were offered up on the mountains; these also were bought; the heart and blood were given in sacrifice, the bodies were feasted on by the chiefs and priests. — TORQUEMADA, l. 7, c. 21.

"In the country of the Mistecas was a cave sacred to the Water God. Its entrance was concealed, for though this Idol was generally revered, this his temple was known to few; it was necessary to crawl the length of a musket-shot, and then the way, sometimes open and sometimes narrow, extended for a mile, before it reached the great dome, a place 70 feet long, and 40 wide, where were the idol and the altar; the Idol was a rude column of stalactites, or incrustations, formed by a spring of petrifying water, and other fantastic figures had thus grown around it. The ways of the cave were so intricate, that sometimes those who had unwarily bewildered themselves there perished. The Friar who discovered this Idol destroyed it, and filled up the entrance." — PADILLA, p. 643.

The Temple Serpents. — XIV. p. 395, col. 2.

"The head of a sacrificed person was strung up; the limbs eaten at the feast; the body given to the wild beasts which were kept within the temple circuits; moreover, in that accursed house they kept vipers and venomous snakes, who had something at their tails which sounded like morris-bells, and they are the worst of all vipers; these were kept in cradles, and barrels, and earthen vessels, upon feathers, and there they laid their eggs, and nursed up their snakelings, and they were fed with the bodies of the sacrificed and with dog's flesh. We learnt for certain, that, after they had driven us from Mexico, and slain above 850 of our soldiers and of the men of Narvaez, these beasts and snakes, who had been offered to their cruel idol to be in his company, were supported upon their flesh for many days. When these lions and tigers roared, and the jackals and foxes howled, and the snakes hissed, it was a grim thing to hear them, and it seemed like hell." — BERNAL DIAZ.

Some of the Orinoco tribes required these severe probations, which are described by Gumilla, c. 35; the principle upon which they acted is strikingly stated by the Abbé Marigny in an Arabian anecdote.

"Ali having been chosen by Nasser for Emir, or general of his army, against Makan, being one day before this prince, whose orders he was receiving, made a convulsive motion with his whole body on feeling an acute bite: Nasser perceived it not. After receiving his orders, the Emir returned home, and taking off his clothes to examine the bite, found the scorpion that had bitten him. Nasser, learning this adventure, when next he saw the Emir, reproved him for having sustained the evil, without complaining at the moment, that it might have been remedied. "How, sir," replied the Emir, "should I be capable of braving the arrow's point, and the sabre's edge, at the head of your armies, and far from you, if in your presence I could not bear the bite of a scorpion!"

"In the Palazzo Caprea at Bologna are several Turkish bucklers lined with human skin, dressed like leather; they told us it was that of the backs of Christian prisoners taken in battle; and the Turks esteem a buckler lined with it to be a particular security against the impression of an arrow, or the stroke of a sabre." — LADY MILLER'S Letters from Italy.

"James Reid, who had acted as piper to a rebel regiment in the Rebellion, suffered death at York, on Nov. 15, 1746, as a rebel. On his trial it was alleged in his defence, that he had not carried arms. But the court observed that a Highland regiment never marched without a piper, and therefore his bagpipe, in the eye of the law, was an instrument of war." — WALKER'S Irish Bards.

The construction was too much in the spirit of military law. Æsop's trumpeter should not have served as a precedent. Croxall's fables have been made of much practical consequence: this poor piper was hung for not remembering one, and Gilbert Wakefield imprisoned for quoting another

A retractile weapon of tremendous effect was used by the Gothic tribes. Its use is thus described in a very interesting poem of the sixth century.

*At nonus pugna Helmod successit, et ipse

Quem post terga quidem stantes socii tenuerunt;

Quid moror? umbonem sciundit, peltaque resultat.
Clamorem Franci tollunt, soltusque resultat;
Obnirique trahunt restim simul atque vicissim;
Nec dubitat princeps tali se aptare labori;

Sed tamen hic intra velut esculus astitit heros,
Qui non plus petit astra comis, quam tartara fibris,

This weapon, such is described by Suidas, Eustatius, and Agathias, was called Ango, and was a barbed trident; if it entered the body, it could not be extracted without certain death, and if it only pierced the shield, the shield became unmanageable, and the enemy was left exposed.

The Cataia, which Virgil mentions as a Teutonic weapon, was also retractile. This was a club of about a yard long, with a heavy end worked into four sharp points; to the thin end, or handle, a cord was fixed, which enabled a person, well trained, to throw it with great force and exactness, and then by a jerk to bring it back to his hand, either to renew his throw, or to use it in close combat. This weapon was called Cat and Catai. — Cambrian Register.

The ablation of the Stone of Sacrifice. — XV. p. 398, col. 2.

An old priest of the Tlatelucas, when they were at war with the Mexicans, advised them to drink the holy beverage before they went to battle: this was made by washing the Stone of Sacrifice; the king drank first, and then all his chiefs and soldiers in order; it made them eager and impatient for the fight. — TORQUEMADA, l. 2, c. 58.

To physic soldiers before a campaign seems an odd way of raising their courage, yet this was done by one of the fiercest American tribes.

"When the warriors among the Natchez had assembled in sufficient numbers for their expedition, the Medicine of War was prepared in the chief's cabin. This was an emetic, composed of a root boiled in water. The warriors, sometimes to the number of three hundred, seated themselves round the kettles or caldrons; about a gallon was served to each; the ceremony was to swallow it at one draught, and then discharge it again with such loud eructations and efforts as might be heard at a great distance." — HERIOT'S History of Canada.

Odd as this method of administering medicine may appear, some tribes have a still more extraordinary mode of dispensing it.

"As I was informed there was to be a physic dance at night, curiosity led me to the town-house to see the preparation. A vessel of their own make, that might contain twenty gallons, (there being a great many to take the medicine,) was set on the fire, round which stood several gourds filled with river water, which was poured into the pot. This done, there arose one of the beloved women, who, opening a deer-skin filled with various roots and herbs, took out a small handful of something like fine salt, part of which she threw on the head man's seat, and part on the fire close to the pot; she then took out the wing of a swan, and, after flourishing it over the pot, stood fixed for near a minute, muttering something to herself; then taking a shrub like laurel, which I supposed was the physic, she threw it into the pot, and returned to her seat. As no more ceremony seemed to be going on, I took a walk till the Indians assembled to take it. At my return I found the house quite full; they danced near an hour round the pot, till one of them, with a small gourd that might hold about a gill, took some of the physic, and drank it, after which all the rest took in turn. One of their head men presented me with some, and in a manner compelled me to drink, though I would willingly have declined. It was, however, much more palatable than I expected, having a strong taste of sassafras; the Indian who presented it told me it was taken to wash away their sins, so that this is a spiritual medicine, and might be ranked among their religious ceremonies. They are very solicitous about its success; the conjurer, for several mornings before it is drank, makes a dreadful howling, yelling, and hollowing from the top of the town-house, to frighten away apparitions and evil spirits." — TIMRELAKE.

..... two fire-flies gave
Their lustre. — XVII. p. 402, col. 1.

It is well known that Madame Merian painted one of these insects by its own light.

"In Hispaniola and the rest of the Ocean Isles, there are plashy and marshy places, very fit for the feeding of herds of cattel. Gnattes of divers kinds, engendered of that moyste heate, grievously afflict the colonies seated on the brinke thereof, and that not only in the night, as in other countries; therefore the inhabitants build low houses, and make little doores therein, scarce able to receive the master, and without holes, that the gnatts may have no entrance. And for that cause also, they forbore to light torches or candles, for that the gnatts by natural instinct follow the light; yet nevertheless they often finde a way in. Nature hath given that pestilent mischief, and hath also given a remedy; as she hath given us cates to destroy the filthy progeny of mice, so hath she given them pretty and commodious hunters, which they call Cucuij. These be harmless winged worms, somewhat less than batters or reere mice, I should rather call them a kind of beetles, because they have other wings after the same order under their hard-winged sheath, which they close within the sheath when they leave flying. To this little creature (as we see flies shine by night, and certaine sluggish worms lying in thick hedges) provident nature hath given some very cleere looking-glasses; two in the seate of the eyes, and two lying hid in the flank, under the sheath, which he then sheweth, when, after the manner of the beetle, un-sheathing his thin wings, he taketh his flight into the ayre; whereupon every Cucuius bringeth four lights or candles with him. But how they are a remedy for so great a mischief, as is the stinging of these gnatts, which in some places are little less than bees, it is a pleasant thing to hear. Hee who understandeth he hath those troublesome guesstes (the goattes) at home, or feareth lest they may get in, diligently hunteth after the Cucuij, which he deceiveth by this means and industry, which necessity (effecting wonders) hath sought out: whose wanteth Cucuij, goeth out of the house in the first twilight of the night, carrying a burning fire-brande in his hande, and ascendeth the next hillock, that the Cucuij may see it, and hee swingeth the fire-brande about calling Cucuius aloud, and beateth the ayre withal, often calling and crying out, Cucuij, Cucuij. Many simple people suppose that the Cucuij, delighted with that noise, come flying and flocking together to the hellowiog sound of him that calleth them, for they come with a speedy and headlong course: but I rather thinke the Cucuij make haste to the brightness of the fire-brande, because swarms of gnatts fly unto every light, which the Cucuij eat in the very ayre, as the martlets and swallowes doe. Behold the desired number of Cucuij, at what time the hunter casteth the fire-brande out of his hand. Some Cucuius sometimes followeth the fire-brande, and lighteth on the grounde; then is he easily taken, as travellers may take a beetle if they have need thereof, walking with his wings shut. Others denie that the Cucuij are wont to be taken after this manner, but say, that the hunters especially have boughs full of leaves ready prepared, or broad linnen cloaths, wherewith they smite the Cucuius flying about on high, and strike him to the ground, where he lyeth as it were astonished, and suffereth himself to bee taken; or, as they say, following the fall of the fly, they take the preye, by casting the same bushie bough or linnen cloath upon him: howsoever it bee, the hunter havinge the hunting Cucuij, returneth home, and shutting the doore of the house, letteth the preye goe. The Cucuij loosed, swiftly flyeth about the whole house seeking gnatts, under their hanging bedds, and about the faces of them that sleepe, whiche the gnatts used to assaile: they seem to execute the office of watchmen, that such as are shut in may quietly rest. Another pleasant and profitable commodity proceedeth from the Cucuij. As many eyes as every Cucuius openeth, the hoste enjoyeth the light of so many candles; so that the inhabitants spinne, sewe, weave, and dance by the light of the flying Cucuij. The inhabitants thinke that the Cucuius is delighted with the harmony and melody of their singing, and that hee also exerciseth his motion in the ayre according to the action of their dancing; but hee, by reason of the divers circuit of the gnatts, of necessity swiftly flyeth about divers ways to seek his food. Our men also reade and write by that light, which always continueth until he have gotten enough whereby he may be well fedd. The gnatts beinge cleansed, or driven out of doores, the Cucuius beginning to famish, the light beginneth to faile; therefore when they see his light to waxe dim, opening the little doore, they set him at libertie, that he may seeke his foode.

"In sport and merriment, or to the intent to terrifie such as are afrayd of every shadow, they say, that many wanton wild fellows sometimes rubbed their faces by night with the flesh of a Cucuius, being killed, with purpose to meet their neighbors with a flaming countenance, as with us sometimes wanton young men, putting a gaping toothed vizard over their face, endeavor to terrifie children, or women, who are easily frightened; for the face being anointed with the lump or fleshy part of the Cucuius, shineth like a flame of fire; yet in short space that fiery virtue wavereth feeble and is extinguished, seeing it is a certain bright humour received in a thin substance. There is also another wonderful commodity proceeding from the Cucuius; the islanders appointed by our men, goe with their good will by night, with two Cucuij tied to the great toes of their feet; for the traveller goeth better by the direction of these lights, than if he brought so many candles with him as their open eyes; he also carryeth another in his hand to seek the Utia by night, a certain kind of cony, a little exceeding a mouse in bignesse and bulke of bodie: which four-footed beast they onely knewe before our coming thither, and did eate the same. They also go a fishing by the light of the Cucuij."—PIETRO MARTIRE.

Bells of gold

Among the presents which Cortes sent to Spain were "two helmets covered with blue precious stones; one edged with golden belles and many plates of gold, two golden knobbes sustaining the belles. The other covered with the same stones, but edged with 25 golden belles, crested with a greene foule sitting on the top of the helmet, whose feet, bill, and eyes were all of gold, and several golden knobbes sustained every bell."—PIETRO MARTIRE.

The fighting mountains of the Mexicans are less absurd than the moving rocks of the Greeks, as they are placed not in this world, but in the road to the next.

"L. Martio et Scz. Julio consulibus, in agro Mutinensi duo montes inter se concurrerunt, crepitu maximo assultantes et recedentes, et inter eos flammâ fumoque creunte. Quo concursu villa omnes elisâ sunt; animalia permulta quæ intra fuerant, exanimata sunt."—J. RAVISHI TEXTORIS Officina, f. 210.

A fiery mountain is a bad neighbor, but a quarrelsome one must be infinitely worse, and a dancing one would not be much better. It is a happy thing for us, who live among the mountains, that they are now-a-days very peaceable, and have left off "skipping like rains."

This coronation oath resembles in absurdity the language of the Chinese, who, in speaking of a propitious event occurring, either in their own or any other country, generally attribute it to the joint will of Heaven and the Emperor of China.—BARROW.

I have no other authority for attributing this artifice to Tezozumoc, than that it has been practised very often and very successfully.

"A Chief of Dsjedda," says Niebuhr, "informed me that two hundred ducats had been stolen from him, and wanted me to discover the thief. I excused myself, saying, that I left that sublime science to the Mahomedan sages; and very soon afterwards a celebrated Scheeh showed, indeed, that he knew more than I did. He placed all the servants in a row, made a long prayer, then put into the mouth of each a bit of paper, and ordered them all to swallow it, after having assured them that it would not harm the innocent, but that the punishment of Heaven would fall on the guilty; after which he examined the mouth of every one, and one of them, who had not swallowed the paper, confessed that he had stolen the money."

A similar anecdote occurs in the old Legend of Pierre Faifeu.

Comment la Dame de une grosse Maison ou il hantoit, perdit un Dyamant en sa maison, qu'il luy fist subtilement recouvrer. — Chap. 22, p. 58.

*Ung certain jour, la Dame de l'hostel

The trial by ordeal more probably originated in wisdom than in superstition. The Water of Jealousy is the oldest example. This seems to have been enjoined for enabling women, when unjustly suspected, fully to exculpate themselves; for no one who was guilty would have ventured upon the trial.

I have heard an anecdote of John Henderson, which is characteristic of that remarkable man. The maid servant, one evening, at a house where he was visiting, begged that she might be excused from bringing in the tea, for he was a conjurer, she said. When this was told him, he desired the mistress would insist upon her coming in; this was done: he fixed his eye upon her, and after she had left the room said, Take care of her; she is not honest. It was soon found that he had rightly understood the cause of her alarm.

There was a young man in despair for the death of his sister, whom he loved with extreme affection. The idea of the departed recurred to him incessantly. He resolved to seek her in the Land of Souls, and flattered himself with the hope of bringing her back with him. His voyage was long and laborious, but he surmounted all the obstacles, and overcame every difficulty. At length he found a solitary old man, or rather genius, who, having questioned him concerning his enterprise, encouraged him to pursue it, and taught him the means of success. He gave him a little empty calabash to contain the soul of his sister, and promised on his return to give him the brain, which he had in his possession, being placed there, by virtue of his office, to keep the brains of the dead. The young man profited by his instructions, finished his course successfully, and arrived in the Land of Souls, the inhabitants of which were much astonished to see him, and fled at his presence. Tharonhiaouagon received him well, and protected him by his counsel from the old woman his grandmother, who, under the appearance of a feigned regard, wished to destroy him by making him eat the flesh of serpents and vipers, which were to her delicacies. The souls being assembled to dance, as was their custom, he recognized that of his sister; Tharonhiaouagon assisted him to take it by surprise, without which help he never would have succeeded, for when he advanced to seize it, it vanished like a dream of the night, and left him as confounded as was Æneas when he attempted to embrace the shade of his father Anchises. Nevertheless he took it, and in spite of the attempts and stratagems of this captive soul, which sought but to deliver itself from its prison, he brought it back the same road by which he came to his own village. I know not if he recollected to take the brain, or judged it unnecessary; but as soon as he arrived, he dug up the body, and prepared it according to the instructions he had received, to render it fit for the reception of the soul, which was to reanimate it. Every thing was ready for this resurrection, when the impertinent curiosity of one of those who were present prevented its success. The captive soul, finding itself free, fled away, and the whole journey was rendered useless. The young man derived no other advantage than that of having been at the Land of Souls, and the power of giving certain tidings of it, which were transmitted to posterity. — LAFITAU sur les Mœurs de Sauvages Américains. Tom. I. p. 401.

“One, I remember, affirmed to me that himself had been dead four days; that most of his friends in that time were gathered together to his funeral; and that he should have been buried, but that some of his relations at a great distance, who were sent for upon that occasion, were not arrived, before whose coming he came to life again. In this time he says he went to the place where the sun rises, (imagining the earth to be a plain,) and directly over that place, at a great height in the air, he was admitted, he says, into a great house, which he supposes was several miles in length, and saw many wonderful things, too tedious as well as ridiculous to mention. Another person, a woman, whom I have not seen, but been credibly informed of by the Indians, declares she was dead several days; that her soul went southward, and feasted and danced with the happy spirits; and that she found all things exactly agreeable to the Indian notions of a future state.” — BRAINERD.

*..... that cheerful one, who knoweth all

The Mocking Bird is often mentioned, and with much feeling, in Mr. Davis's Travels in America, a very singular and interesting volume. He describes himself in one place as listening by moonlight to one that usually perched within a few yards of his log hut. A negress was sitting on the threshold of the next door, smoking the stump of an old pipe. Please God Almighty, exclaimed the old woman, how sweet that Mocking Bird sing! he never tire. By day and by night it sings alike; when weary of mocking others, the bird takes up its own natural strain, and so joyous a creature is it, that it will jump and dance to its own music. The bird is perfectly domestic, for the Americans hold it sacred. Would that we had more of these humane prejudices in England! — if that word may be applied to a feeling so good in itself and in its tendency.

A good old Protestant missionary mentions another of the American singing-birds very technically.

"Of black birds there be millions, which are great devourers of the Indian corn as soon as it appears out of the ground: unto this sort of birds, especially, may the mystical fowls, the Divells, be well resembled, (and so it pleaseth the Lord Jesus himself to observe, Matt. 13,) which mystical fowl follow the sowing of the word, pick it up from loose and careless hearers, as these black birds follow the material seed: against these they are very careful, both to set their corn deep enough, that it may have a strong root, not so apt to be plucked up, as also they put up little watch-houses in the middle of their fields, in which they or their biggest children lodge."

Gascoigne's Good-morrow.

But of all the songsters in America who warble their wood-notes wild, the frogs are the most extraordinary.

"Prepared as I was," says a traveller, "to hear something extraordinary from these animals, I confess the first frog concert I heard in America was so much beyond any thing I could conceive of the powers of these musicians, that I was truly astonished. This performance was al fresco, and took place on the 18th, (April instant,) in a large swamp, where there were at least ten thousand performers, and, I really believe, not two exactly in the same pitch, if the octave can possibly admit of so many divisions, or shakes of semitones. An Hibernian musician, who, like myself, was present for the first time at this concert of antimusic, exclaimed, 'By Jasad, but they stop out of tune to a nicety!'

"I have been since informed by an amateur who resided many years in this country, and made this species of music his peculiar study, that on these occasions the treble is performed by the Tree Frogs, the smallest and most beautiful species; they are always of the same color as the bark of the tree they inhabit, and their note is not unlike the chirp of a cricket: the next in size are our counter-tenors; they have a note resembling the setting of a saw. A still larger species sing tenor, and the under part is supported by the Bull Frogs, which are as large as a man's foot, and bellow out the bass in a tone as loud and sonorous as that of the animal from which they take their name." — Travels in America by W. PRIEST, Musician.

"I have often thought," says this lively traveller, "if an enthusiastic cockney of weak nerves, who had never been out of the sound of Bow-bell, could suddenly be conveyed from his bed in the middle of the night, and laid fast asleep in an American swamp, he would, on waking, fancy himself in the infernal regions: his first sensations would be from the stings of a myriad of mosquitoes; waking with the smart, his ears would be assailed with the horrid noises of the frogs; on lifting up his eyes, he would have a faint view of the night-hawks, flapping their ominous wings over his devoted head, visible only from the glimmering light of the fire-flies, which he would naturally conclude were sparks from the bottomless pit. Nothing would he wanting at this moment to complete the illusion, but one of those dreadful explosions of thunder and lightning, so extravagantly described by Lee in Œdipus. 'Call you these peals of thunder but the yawn of bellowing clouds? By Jove, they seem to me the world's last groans, and those large sheets of flame its last blaze!'"

My excuse for this insignificant agency, as I fear it will be thought, must be, that the fact itself is historically true; by means of this omen the Aztecas were induced to quit their country, after a series of calamities. The leader who had address enough to influence them was Huitziton, a name which I have altered to Yuhidhiton for the sake of euphony; the note of the bird is expressed in Spanish and Italian thus, tihui; the cry of the peewhit cannot be better expressed. — TORQUEMADA, l. 2, c. 1. The hideous figures of their idols are easily accounted for by the Historian of the Dominicans in Mexico.

"As often as the Devil appeared to the Mexicans, they made immediately an idol of the figure in which they had seen him; sometimes as a lion, other times as a dog, other times as a serpent; and as the ambitious Devil took advantage of this weakness, he assumed a new form every time to gain a new image in which he might be worshipped. The natural timidity of the Indians aided the design of the Devil, and he appeared to them in horrible and affrighting figures, that he might have them the more submissive to his will; for this reason it is that the idols which we still see in Mexico, placed in the corners of the streets as spoils of the Gospel, are so deformed and ugly. — FR. It will scarcely be believed that the resemblance between Mexico and Messiah should have been adduced as a proof that America was peopled by the ten tribes. Fr. Ballads and Metrical Tales.

VOL. I

PREFACE.

Most of the pieces in this volume were written in early life, a few are comparatively of recent date, and there are some of them which lay unfinished for nearly thirty years.

Upon reading, on their first appearance, certain of these Ballads, and of the lighter pieces now comprised in the third volume of this collective edition,* Mr. Edgeworth said to me, "Take my word for it, Sir, the bent of your genius is for comedy." I was as little displeas'd with the intended compliment as one of the most distinguished poets of this age was with Mr. Sheridan, who, upon returning a play which he had offer'd for acceptance at Drury Lane, told him it was a comical tragedy.

My late friend, Mr. William Taylor of Norwich, whom none who knew him intimately can ever call to mind without affection and regret, has this passage in his Life of Dr. Sayers:—"Not long after this, (the year 1800,) Mr. Robert Southey visited Norwich, was introduced to Dr. Sayers, and partook those feelings of complacent admiration which his presence was adapted to inspire.—Dr. Sayers pointed out to us in conversation, as adapted for the theme of a ballad, a story related by Olaus Magnus of a witch, whose coffin was confined by three chains, sprinkled with holy water; but who was, nevertheless, carried off by demons. Already, I believe, Dr. Sayers had made a ballad on the subject; so did I, and so did Mr. Southey; but after seeing the Old Woman of Berkeley, we agreed in awarding to it the preference. Still, the very different manner in which each had employed the same basis of narration might render welcome the opportunity of comparison; but I have not found among the papers of Dr. Sayers a copy of his poem."

There is a mistake here as to the date. This, my first visit to Norwich, was in the spring of 1798; and I had so much to interest me there in the society of my kind host and friend Mr. William Taylor, that the mention at Dr. Sayers's table of the story in Olaus Magnus made no impression on me at the time, and was presently forgotten. Indeed, if I had known that either he or his friend had written or intended to write a ballad upon the subject, that knowledge, however much the story might have pleased me, would have withheld me from all thought of versifying it. In the autumn of the same year, I passed some days at Hereford with Mr. William Bowyer Thomas, one of the friends with whom, in 1796, I had visited the Arrabida Convent near Setubal. By his means I obtained permission to make use of the books in the Cathedral Library; and accordingly I was locked up for several mornings in that part of the Cathedral where the books were kept in chains. So little were these books used at that time, that, in placing them upon the shelves, no regard had been had to the length of the chains; and when the volume which I wished to consult was fastened to one of the upper shelves by a short chain, the only means by which it was possible to make use of it was, by piling upon the reading desk as many volumes with longer chains as would reach up to the length of its tether; then, by standing on a chair, I was able to effect my purpose. There, and thus, I first read the story of the Old Woman of Berkeley, in Matthew of Westminster, and transcribed it into a pocket-book. I had no recollection of what had passed at Dr. Sayers's; but the circumstantial details in the monkish Chronicle impressed me so strongly, that I began to versify them that very evening. It was the last day of our pleasant visit at Hereford; and on the following morning the remainder of the Ballad was pencilled in a post-chaise on our way to Abberley.

Mr. Wathen, a singular and obliging person, who afterwards made a voyage to the East Indies, and published an account of what he saw there, traced for me a fac simile of a wooden cut in the Nuremberg Chronicle, (which was among the prisoners in the Cathedral.) It represents the Old Woman's forcible abduction from her intended place of burial. This was put into the hands of a Bristol artist; and the engraving in wood which he made from it was prefixed to the Ballad when first published, in the second volume of my poems, 1799. The Devil alludes to it in his Walk, when he complains of a certain poet as having "put him in ugly ballads, with libellous pictures, for sale."

The passage from Matthew of Westminster was prefixed to the Ballad when first published, and it has continued to be so in every subsequent edition of my minor poems from that time to the present; for whenever I have founded either a poem, or part of one, upon any legend, or portion of history, I have either extracted the passage to which I was indebted, if its length allowed, or have referred to it. Mr. Payne Collier, however, after the Ballad, with its parentage affixed, had been twenty years before the public, discovered that I had copied the story from Heywood's Nine Books of various History concerning Women, and that I had not thought proper to acknowledge the obligation.

* Juvenile and Minor Poems, Vol. II., pp. 158—223 of this edition.

The discovery is thus stated in that gentleman's Poetical Decameron, (vol. i. p. 323.) Speaking of the book, one of his Interlocutors says, "It is not of such rarity or singularity as to deserve particular notice now; only, if you refer to p. 443, you will find the story on which Mr. Southey founded his mock-ballad of the Old Woman of Berkeley. You will see, too, that the mode in which it is told is extremely similar.

"MORTON. Had Mr. Southey seen Heywood's book?

"BOURNE. It is not improbable; or some quotation from it, the resemblance is so exact; you may judge from the few following sentences."

Part of Heywood's narration is then given; upon which one of the speakers observes, "The resemblance is exact, and it is not unlikely that Heywood and Southey copied from the same original."

"BOURNE. Perhaps so; Heywood quotes Guille-rimus in Special. Histor. lib. xxvi. c. 26. He afterwards relates, as Southey, that the Devil placed the Old Woman of Berkeley before him on a black horse, and that her screams were heard four miles off."

It cannot, however, be disputed, that Mr. Payne Collier has made one discovery relating to this subject; for he has discovered that the Old Woman of Berkeley is a mock-ballad. Certainly this was never suspected by the Author or any of his friends.
It obtained a very different character in Russia, where, having been translated and published, it was prohibited for this singular reason, that children were said to be frightened by it. This I was told by a Russian traveller who called upon me at Kes-wick.

KESWICK, 8th March, 1833.

MARY, THE MAID OF THE INN.

The circumstances related in the following Ballad were told me, when a school-boy, as having happened in the north of England. Either Furnes or Kirkstall Abbey (I forget which) was named as the scene. The original story, however, is in Dr. Plot's History of Staffordshire.

"Amongst the unusual accidents," says this amusing author,
"that have attended the female sex in the course of their lives, I think I may also reckon the narrow escapes they have made from death. Whereof I met with one mentioned with admiration by every body at Leek, that happened not far off at the Black Meer of Morridge, which, though famous for nothing for which it is commonly reputed so, (as that it is bottomless, no cattle will drink of it, or birds fly over or settle upon it, all which I found false,) yet is so, for the signal deliverance of a poor woman enticed thither in a dismal, stormy night, by a bloody ruffian, who had first gotten her with child, and intended, in this remote inhospitable place, to have despatched her by drowning.
The same night (Providence so ordering it) there were several persons of inferior rank drinking in an al-house at Leek, whereof one having been out, and observing the darkness and other ill circumstances of the weather, coming in again, said to the rest of his companions, that he were a stout man indeed that would venture to go to the Black

Meer of Morridge in such a night as that; to which one of them replying, that, for a crown, or some such sum, he would undertake it, the rest, joining their purses, said he should have his demand. The bargain being struck, away he went on his journey with a stick in his hand, which he was to leave there as a testimony of his performance. At length, coming near the Meer, he heard the lamentable cries of this distressed woman, begging for mercy, which at first put him to a stand; but being a man of great resolution and some policy, he went boldly on, however, counterfeiting
the presence of divers other persons, calling Jack, Dick, and Tom, and crying, Here are the rogues we look'd for,
&c.; which being heard by the murderer, he left the woman and fled; whom the other man found by the Meer side almost stripped of her clothes, and brought her with him to Leek as an ample testimony of his having been at the Meer, and of God's providence too."—P. 291.

The metre is Mr. Lewis's invention; and metre is one of the few things concerning which popularity may be admitted as a proof of merit. The ballad has become popular owing to the metre and the story; and it has been made the subject of a fine picture by Mr. Barker.

1.

Who is yonder poor Maniac, whose wildly-fix'd eyes

Seem a heart overcharged to express?
She weeps not, yet often and deeply she sighs;
She never complains, but her silence implies
The composure of settled distress.

2.

No pity she looks for, no alms doth she seek;
Nor for raiment nor food doth she care:
Through her tatters the winds of the winter blow bleak
On that wither'd breast, and her weather-worn
cheek
Hath the hue of a mortal despair

3.

Yet cheerful and happy, nor distant the day,
Poor Mary the Maniac hath been;
The Traveller remembers who journey'd this way
No damsel so lovely, no damsel so gay,
As Mary, the Maid of the Inn.

4.

Her cheerful address fill'd the guests with delight
As she welcomed them in with a smile;
Her heart was a stranger to childish affright,
And Mary would walk by the Abbey at night
When the wind whistled down the dark aisle.

5.

She loved, and young Richard had settled the day,
And she hoped to be happy for life;
But Richard was idle and worthless, and they
Who knew him would pity poor Mary, and say
That she was too good for his wife.

6.

'Twas in autumn, and stormy and dark was the night,
And fast were the windows and door;
Two guests sat enjoying the fire that burnt bright,
And smoking, in silence, with tranquil delight,
They listen'd to hear the wind roar.

7.

"'Tis pleasant," cried one, "seated by the fireside,
To hear the wind whistle without."
"What a night for the Abbey!" his comrade replied;
"Methinks a man's courage would now be well tried
Who should wander the ruins about.

8.

"I myself, like a school-boy, should tremble to hear
The hoarse ivy shake over my head;
And could fancy I saw, half persuaded by fear,
Some ugly old Abbot's grim spirit appear;
For this wind might awaken the dead!"

9.

"I'll wager a dinner," the other one cried,
"That Mary would venture there now."
"Then wager and lose! with a sneer he replied;
"I'll warrant she'd fancy a ghost by her side,
And faint if she saw a white cow."

10.

"Will Mary this charge on her courage allow?"
His companion exclaim'd, with a smile;
"I shall win, — for I know she will venture there
now,
And earn a new bonnet by bringing a bough
From the elder that grows in the aisle."

11.

With fearless good-humor did Mary comply,
And her way to the Abbey she bent;
The night was dark, and the wind was high,
And as hollowly howling it swept through the sky,
She shiver'd with cold as she went.

12.

O'er the path so well known still proceeded the Maid
Where the Abbey rose dim on the sight;
Through the gateway she enter'd; she felt not afraid,
Yet the ruins were lonely and wild, and their shade
Seem'd to deepen the gloom of the night.

13.

All around her was silent, save when the rude blast
Howl'd dismally round the old pile;
Over weed-cover'd fragments she fearlessly pass'd,
And arrived at the innermost ruin at last,
Where the elder-tree grew in the aisle.

14.

Well pleased did she reach it, and quickly drew near,
And hastily gather'd the bough;
When the sound of a voice seem'd to rise on her ear,
She paused, and she listen'd intently, in fear,
And her heart panted painfully now.

15.

The wind blew; the hoarse ivy shook over her head;
She listen'd — nought else could she hear;

The wind fell; her heart sunk in her bosom with dread,
For she heard in the ruins distinctly the tread
Of footsteps approaching her near.

16.

Behind a wide column, half breathless with fear,
She crept to conceal herself there:
That instant the moon o'er a dark cloud shone clear,
And she saw in the moonlight two ruffians appear,
And between them a corpse did they bear.

17.

Then Mary could feel her heart-blood curdle cold;
Again the rough wind hurried by;
It blew off the hat of the one, and, behold,
Even close to the feet of poor Mary it roll'd;
She felt, and expected to die.

18.

"Curse the hat!" he exclaims. "Nay, come on till we hide
The dead body," his comrade replies.
She beholds them in safety pass on by her side;
She seizes the hat, — fear her courage supplied, —
And fast through the Abbey she flies.

19.

She ran with wild speed; she rush'd in at the door;
She gaz'd in her terror around;
Then her limbs could support their faint burden
no more,
And exhausted and breathless she sank on the
Unable to utter a sound. [floor,

20.

Ere yet her pale lips could the story impart,
For a moment the hat met her view; —
Her eyes from that object convulsively start,
For — what a cold horror then thrilled through her heart
When the name of her Richard she knew!

21.

Where the old Abbey stands, on the common hard by,
His gibbet is now to be seen;
His irons you still from the road may espy;
The traveller beholds them, and thinks with a sigh
Of poor Mary, the Maid of the Inn.

DONICA.

"In Finland there is a Castle which is called the New Rock moated about with a river of unsounded depth, the water black, and the fish therein very distasteful to the palate
In this are spectres oiten seen, which foreshow either the death of the Governor, or of some prime officer belonging to the place; and most commonly it appeareth in the shape of a harper, sweetly singing and dallying and playing under the water."

"It is reported of one Donica, that after she was dead, the Devil walked in her body for the space of two years, so that none suspected but she was still alive; for she did both speak and eat, though very sparingly; only she had a deep paleness on her countenance, which was the only sign of death. At length, a Magician coming by where she was then in the company of many other virgins, as soon as he beheld her, he said, 'Fair Maids, why keep you company with this dead Virgin, whom you suppose to be alive?' when, taking away the magic charm which was tied under her arm, the body fell down lifeless and without motion."

The following Ballad is founded on these stories. They are to be found in the notes to the Hierarchies of the Blessed Angels; a Poem by Thomas Heywood, printed in folio by Adam Islip, 1635.

HIGH on a rock whose castled shade
Darken'd the lake below,
In ancient strength majestic stood
The towers of Arlinkow.

The fisher in the lake below
Durst never cast his net,
Nor ever swallow in its waves
Her passing wing would wet.

The cattle from its ominous banks
In wild alarm would run,
Though parch'd with thirst, and faint beneath
The summer's scorching sun; —

For sometimes, when no passing breeze
The long, lank sedges waved,
All white with foam, and heaving high,
Its deafening billows raved; —

And when the tempest from its base
The rooted pine would shake,
The powerless storm unruffling swept Across the calm dead lake; —

And ever, then, when death drew near
The house of Arlinkow,
Its dark, unfathom'd waters sent
Strange music from below.

The Lord of Arlinkow was old;
One only child had he;
Donica was the Maiden's name,
As fair as air might be.

A bloom as bright as opening morn
Suffused her clear, white cheek;
The music of her voice was mild;
Her full, dark eyes were meek.

Far was her beauty known, for none
So fair could Finland boast;
Her parents loved the Maiden much,
Young Eberhard loved her most.

Together did they hope to tread
The pleasant path of life;
For now the day drew near to make Donica Eberhard's wife.

The eve was fair, and mild the air;
Along the lake they stray;
The eastern hill reflected bright
The tints of fading day.

And brightly o'er the water stream'd
The liquid radiance wide;
Donica's little dog ran on,
And gamboll'd at her side.

Youth, health, and love bloom'd on her cheek,
Her full, dark eyes express,
In many a glance, to Eberhard
Her soul's meek tenderness.

Nor sound was heard, nor passing gale
Sigh'd through the long, lank sedge;
The air was hush'd; no little wave
Dimpled the water's edge; —

When suddenly the lake sent forth
Its music from beneath,
And slowly o'er the waters sail'd
The solemn sounds of death.

As those deep sounds of death arose,
Donica's cheek grew pale,
And in the arms of Eberhard
The lifeless Maiden fell.

Loudly the Youth in terror shriek'd,
And loud he call'd for aid,
And with a wild and eager look
Gazed on the lifeless Maid.

But soon again did better thoughts
In Eberhard arise;
And he with trembling hope beheld
The Maiden raise her eyes.

And, on his arm reclined, she moved
With feeble pace and slow,
And soon, with strength recover'd, reach'd
The towers of Arlinkow.

Yet never to Donica's cheeks
Return'd their lively hue;
Her cheeks were deathly white and wan,
Her lips a livid blue.

Her eyes, so bright and black of yore,
Were now more black and bright,
And beam'd strange lustre in her face,
So deadly wan and white.

The dog that gamboll'd by her side,
And loved with her to stray,
Now at his alter'd mistress howl'd,
And fled in fear away.

Yet did the faithful Eberhard
Not love the Maid the less;
He gazed with sorrow, but he gazed
With deeper tenderness.

And when he found her health unharmed,
He would not brook delay,
But press'd the not unwilling Maid
To fix the bridal day.

And when at length it came, with joy
He hail'd the bridal day,
And onward to the house of God
They went their willing way.

But when they at the altar stood,
And heard the sacred rite,
The hallow'd tapers dimly stream'd
A pale, sulphureous light.

And when the Youth, with holy warmth,
Her hand in his did hold,
Sudden he felt Donica's hand
Grow deadly damp and cold.

But loudly then he shriek'd, for lo'
A spirit met his view,
And Eberhard in the angel form
His own Donica knew

That instant from her earthly frame
A Demon howling fled,
And at the side of Eberhard
The livid corpse fell dead.

RUDIGER.

"Divers Princes and Noblemen being assembled in a beautiful and fair Palace, which was situate upon the river Rhine, they beheld a boat or small barge make toward the shore, drawn by a Swan in a silver chain, the one end fastened about her neck, the other to the vessel; and in it an unknown soldier, a man of a comely personage and graceful presence, who stepped upon the shore; which done, the boat guided by the Swan, left him, and floated down the river. This man fell afterward in league with a fair gentlewoman, married her, and by her had many children. After some years, the same Swan came with the same barge unto the same place; the soldier, entering into it, was carried thence the way he came, left wife, children, and family, and was never seen amongst them after."

"Now who can judge this to be other than one of those spirits that are named Incubi?" says Thomas Heywood. I have adopted his story, but not his solution, making the unknown soldier not an evil spirit, but one who had purchased prosperity from a malevolent being, by the promised sacrifice of his first-born child.

BRIGHT on the mountain's heathy slope
The day's last splendors shine,
And rich, with many a radiant hue,
Gleam gayly on the Rhine.

And many a one from Waldhurst's walls
Along the river stroll'd,
As ruffling o'er the pleasant stream
The evening gales came cold.

So as they stray'd, a swan they saw
Sail stately up and strong,
And by a silver chain he drew
A little boat along, —

Whose streamer, to the gentle breeze,
Long floating, flutter'd light
Beneath whose crimson canopy
There lay reclined a knight.

With arching crest and swelling breast,
On sail'd the stately swan,
And lightly up the parting tide
The little boat came on.

And onward to the shore they drew,
Where, having left the knight,
The little boat adown the stream
Fell soon beyond the sight.

Was never a knight in Waldhurst's walls
Could with this stranger vie;
Was never a youth at aught esteem'd
When Rudiger was by.

Was never a maid in Waldhurst's walls
Might match with Margaret;
Her cheek was fair, her eyes were dark,
Her silken locks like jet.

And many a rich and noble youth
Had sought to win the fair;
But never a rich and noble youth
Could rival Rudiger.

At every tilt and tourney he
Still bore away the prize;
For knightly feats superior still,
And knightly courtesies.

His gallant feats, his looks, his love,
Soon won the willing fair;
And soon did Margaret become
The wife of Rudiger.

Like morning dreams of happiness,
Fast roll'd the months away;
For he was kind, and she was kind;
And who so bless'd as they?

Yet Rudiger would sometimes sit
Absorb'd in silent thought,
And his dark, downward eye would seem
With anxious meaning fraught; —

But soon he raised his looks again,
And smiled his cares away;
And mid the hall of gayety
Was none like him so gay.

And onward roll'd the waning months,
The hour appointed came,
And Margaret her Rudiger
Hail'd with a father's name.

But silently did Rudiger
The little infant see ;
And darkly on the babe he gazed, --
A gloomy man was he.

And when to bless the little babe
The holy Father came,
To cleanse the stains of sin away
In Christ's redeeming name, —

Then did the cheek of Rudiger
Assume a death-pale hue,
And on his clammy forehead stood
The cold, convulsive dew ; —

And faltering in his speech, he bade
The Priest the rites delay,
Till he could, to right health restored,
Enjoy the festive day.

When o'er the many-tinted sky
He saw the day decline,
He called upon his Margaret
To walk beside the Rhine ; —

“ And we will take the little babe ;
For soft the breeze that blows,
And the mild murmurs of the stream
Will lull him to repose.”

And so together forth they went ;
The evening breeze was mild ;
And Rudiger upon his arm
Pillow'd the little child.

Many gay companies that eve
Along the river roam ;
But when the mist began to rise,
They all betook them home.

Yet Rudiger continued still
Along the banks to roam ;
Nor aught could Margaret prevail
To turn his footsteps home.

“ Oh, turn thee, turn thee, Rudiger ;
The rising mists behold ;
The evening wind is damp and chill ;
The little babe is cold ! ”

“ Now hush thee, hush thee, Margaret ,
The mists will do no harm ;
And from the wind the little babe
Is shelter'd on my arm.”

“ Oh, turn thee, turn thee, Rudiger ;
Why onward wilt thou roam ?
The moon is up ; the night is cold ;
And we are far from home.”

He answer'd not ; for now he saw
A Swan come sailing strong ;
And by a silver chain he drew
A little boat along.

To shore they came, and to the boat
Fast leap'd he with the child ;
And in leap'd Margaret, breathless now,
And pale with fear, and wild.

With arching crest and swelling breast
On sail'd the stately Swan,
And lightly down the rapid tide
The little boat went on.

The full-orb'd moon, that beam'd around
Pale splendor through the night,
Cast through the crimson canopy
A dim, discolor'd light.

And swiftly down the hurrying stream
In silence still they sail,
And the long streamer, fluttering fast,
Flapp'd to the heavy gale.

And he was mute in sullen thought,
And she was mute with fear ;
Nor sound but of the parting tide
Broke on the listening ear.

The little babe began to cry ;
Then Margaret raised her head,
And with a quick and hollow voice,
“ Give me the child ! ” she said.

“ Now hush thee, hush thee, Margaret ,
Nor my poor heart distress ;
I do but pay perforce the price
Of former happiness.

“ And hush thee too, my little babe ,
Thy cries so feeble cease ;
Lie still, lie still ; — a little while,
And thou shalt be at peace.”

So, as he spake, to land they drew,
And swift he stepp'd on shore ;
And him behind did Margaret
Close follow evermore.

It was a place all desolate ;
Nor house nor tree was there ,
But there a rocky mountain rose,
Barren, and bleak, and bare ; —

And at its base a cavern yawn'd ;
No eye its depth might view ;
For in the moonbeam shining round
That darkness darker grew.

Cold horror crept through Margaret's blood ;
Her heart it paused with fear,
When Rudiger approach'd the cave,
And cried, “ Lo, I am here ! ”

A deep, sepulchral sound the cave
Return'd — “ Lo, I am here ! ”
And black from out the cavern gloom
Two giant arms appear.

And Rudiger approach'd, and held
The little infant nigh ;
Then Margaret shriek'd, and gather'd then
New powers from agony.

And round the baby fast and close
Her trembling arms she folds,
And with a strong, convulsive grasp
The little infant holds.

"Now help me, Jesus!" loud she cries,
And loud on God she calls ;
Then from the grasp of Rudiger
The little infant falls.

The mother holds her precious babe ;
But the black arms clasp'd him round,
And dragg'd the wretched Rudiger
Adown the dark profound.

J A S P A R .

JASPAR was poor, and vice and want
Had made his heart like stone ;
And Jaspas look'd with envious eyes
On riches not his own.

On plunder bent, abroad he went
Toward the close of day,
And loiter'd on the lonely road
Impatient for his prey.

No traveller came — he loiter'd long,
And often look'd around,
And paused and listen'd eagerly
To catch some coming sound.

He sat him down beside the stream
That cross'd the lonely way ;
So fair a scene might well have charm'd
All evil thoughts away.

He sat beneath a willow-tree,
Which cast a trembling shade ;
The gentle river, full in front,
A little island made, —

Where pleasantly the moonbeam shone
Upon the poplar-trees,
Whose shadow on the stream below
Play'd slowly to the breeze.

He listen'd — and he heard the wind
That waved the willow-tree ;
He heard the waters flow along,
And murmur quietly.

He listen'd for the traveller's tread ;
The nightingale sung sweet ; —

He started up, for now he heard
The sound of coming feet ; —

He started up, and grasp'd a stake,
And waited for his prey ;
There came a lonely traveller,
And Jaspas cross'd his way.

But Jaspas's threats and curses fail'd
The traveller to appall ;
He would not lightly yield the purse
Which held his little all.

Awhile he struggled ; but he strove
With Jaspas's strength in vain ;
Beneath his blows he fell, and groan'd,
And never spake again.

Jaspas raised up the murder'd man,
And plunged him in the flood,
And in the running water then
He cleansed his hands from blood.

The waters closed around the corpse,
And cleansed his hands from gore ;
The willow waved, the stream flow'd on,
And murmured as before.

There was no human eye had seen
The blood the murderer spilt,
And Jaspas's conscience never felt
The avenging goad of guilt.

And soon the ruffian had consumed
The gold he gain'd so ill ;
And years of secret guilt pass'd on,
And he was needy still.

One eve, beside the alehouse fire
He sat, as it befell,
When in there came a laboring man
Whom Jaspas knew full well.

He sat him down by Jaspas's side,
A melancholy man ;
For, spite of honest toil, the world
Went hard with Jonathan.

His toil a little earn'd, and he
With little was content ;
But sickness on his wife had fallen,
And all was wellnigh spent.

Long with his wife and little ones
He shared the scanty meal,
And saw their looks of wretchedness,
And felt what wretches feel.

Their Landlord, a hard man, that day
Had seized the little left :
And now the sufferer found himself
Of every thing bereft.

He lean'd his head upon his hand,
His elbow on his knee ;

And so by Jaspar's side he sat,
And not a word said he.

"Nay, — why so downcast?" Jaspar cried,
"Come — cheer up, Jonathan!
Drink, neighbor, drink! 'twill warm thy heart;
Come! come! take courage, man!"

He took the cup that Jaspar gave,
And down he drain'd it quick;
"I have a wife," said Jonathan,
"And she is deadly sick.

"She has no bed to lie upon;
I saw them take her bed —
And I have children — would to God
That they and I were dead!

"Our Landlord he goes home to-night,
And he will sleep in peace —
I would that I were in my grave,
For there all troubles cease.

"In vain I pray'd him to forbear,
Though wealth enough has he!
God be to him as merciless
As he has been to me!"

When Jaspar saw the poor man's soul
On all his ills intent,
He plied him with the heartening cup,
And with him forth he went.

"This Landlord on his homeward road
'Twere easy now to meet.
The road is lonesome, Jonathan! —
And vengeance, man! is sweet."

He listen'd to the tempter's voice;
The thought it made him start; —
His head was hot, and wretchedness
Had harden'd now his heart.

Along the lonely road they went,
And waited for their prey;
They sat them down beside the stream
That cross'd the lonely way.

They sat them down beside the stream,
And never a word they said;
They sat and listen'd silently
To hear the traveller's tread.

The night was calm; the night was dark;
No star was in the sky;
The wind it waved the willow boughs;
The stream flow'd quietly.

The night was calm; the air was still;
Sweet sung the nightingale;
The soul of Jonathan was soothed;
His heart began to fail.

"'Tis weary waiting here," he cried,
"And now the hour is late;
Methinks he will not come to-night;
No longer let us wait."

"Have patience, man!" the ruffian said;
"A little we may wait;
But longer shall his wife expect
Her husband at the gate."

Then Jonathan grew sick at heart;
"My conscience yet is clear;
Jaspar — it is not yet too late —
I will not linger here."

"How now!" cried Jaspar; "why, I thought
Thy conscience was asleep;
No more such qualms; the night is dark;
The river here is deep."

"What matters that," said Jonathan,
Whose blood began to freeze,
"When there is One above, whose eye
The deeds of darkness sees?"

"We are safe enough," said Jaspar then,
"If that be all thy fear;
Nor eye above, nor eye below,
Can pierce the darkness here."

That instant, as the murderer spake,
There came a sudden light;
Strong as the mid-day sun it shone,
Though all around was night.

It hung upon the willow-tree;
It hung upon the flood;
It gave to view the poplar isle,
And all the scene of blood.

The traveller who journeys there,
He surely hath espied
A madman who has made his home
Upon the river's side.

His cheek is pale; his eye is wild;
His looks bespeak despair;
For Jaspar, since that hour, has made
His home, unshelter'd, there.

And fearful are his dreams at night,
And dread to him the day;
He thinks upon his untold crime,
And never dares to pray.

The summer suns, the winter storms,
O'er him unheeded roll;
For heavy is the weight of blood
Upon the maniac's soul.

LORD WILLIAM.

An imitation of this Ballad, in French verse, by J. F. Chate-lain, was printed at Tournay, about 1820.

No eye beheld when William plunged
Young Edmund in the stream ;
No human ear but William's heard
Young Edmund's drowning scream.

Submissive all the vassals own'd
The murderer for their Lord ;
And he as rightful heir possess'd
The house of Erlingford.

The ancient house of Erlingford
Stood in a fair domain,
And Severn's ample waters near Roll'd through the fertile plain.

And often the wayfaring man
Would love to linger there,
Forgetful of his onward road,
To gaze on scenes so fair.

But never could Lord William dare
To gaze on Severn's stream ;
In every wind that swept its waves
He heard young Edmund's scream.

In vain, at midnight's silent hour,
Sleep closed the murderer's eyes ;
In every dream the murderer saw
Young Edmund's form arise.

In vain, by restless conscience driven,
Lord William left his home,
Far from the scenes that saw his guilt,
In pilgrimage to roam ;—

To other climes the pilgrim fled,
But could not fly despair ;
He sought his home again, but peace
Was still a stranger there.

Slow were the passing hours, yet swift
The months appeared to roll ;
And now the day return'd that shook
With terror William's soul ;—

A day that William never felt
Return without dismay ;
For well had conscience calendar'd
Young Edmund's dying day.

A fearful day was that ; the rains
Fell fast, with tempest roar,
And the swollen tide of Severn spread
Far on the level shore.

In vain Lord William sought the feast ;
In vain he quaff'd the bowl,
And strove with noisy mirth to drown
The anguish of his soul.

The tempest, as its sudden swell
In gusty howlings came,
With cold and deathlike feeling seem'd
To thrill his shuddering frame.

Reluctant now, as night came on,
His lonely couch he press'd ;
And, wearied out, he sunk to sleep,—
To sleep,—but not to rest.

Beside that couch his brother's form,
Lord Edmund, seem'd to stand,
Such and so pale as when in death
He grasp'd his brother's hand ;

Such and so pale his face as when,
With faint and faltering tongue,
To William's care, a dying charge,
He left his orphan son.

“I bade thee with a father's love
My orphan Edmund guard ;—
Well, William, hast thou kept thy charge ?
Take now thy due reward.”

He started up, each limb convulsed
With agonizing fear ;
He only heard the storm of night,—
'Twas music to his ear

When lo ! the voice of loud alarm
His inmost soul appalls ;
“What ho ! Lord William, rise in haste !
The water saps thy walls !”

He rose in haste ; beneath the walls
He saw the flood appear ;
It hemm'd him round ; 'twas midnight now ;
No human aid was near.

He heard a shout of joy ; for now
A boat approach'd the wall ;
And eager to the welcome aid
They crowd for safety all.

“My boat is small,” the boatman cried ;
“'Twill bear but one away ;
Come in, Lord William, and do ye
In God's protection stay.”

Strange feeling filled them at his voice,
Even in that hour of woe,
That, save their Lord, there was not one
Who wish'd with him to go.

But William leap'd into the boat,
His terror was so sore ;
“Thou shalt have half my gold,” he cried ;
Haste — haste to yonder shore.”

The boatman plied the oar ; the boat
Went light along the stream ;
Sudden Lord William heard a cry
Like Edmund's drowning scream.

The boatman paused — "Methought I heard
A child's distressful cry !"
'Twas but the howling wind of night,"
Lord William made reply.

"Haste — haste — ply swift and strong the oar ;
Haste — haste across the stream !"
Again Lord William heard a cry
Like Edmund's drowning scream.

"I heard a child's distressful voice,"
The boatman cried again.
"Nay, hasten on — the night is dark —
And we should search in vain."

"O God ! Lord William, dost thou know
How dreadful 'tis to die ?
And canst thou without pity hear
A child's expiring cry ?

"How horrible it is to sink
Beneath the closing stream,
To stretch the powerless arms in vain,
In vain for help to scream !"

The shriek again was heard ; it came
More deep, more piercing loud ;
That instant o'er the flood the moon
Shone through a broken cloud ; —

And near them they beheld a child,
Upon a crag he stood,
A little crag, and all around
Was spread the rising flood.

The boatman plied the oar ; the boat
Approach'd his resting-place ;
The moonbeam shone upon the child,
And show'd how pale his face.

"Now reach thine hand !" the boatman cried,
"Lord William, reach and save !"
The child stretch'd forth his little hands
To grasp the hand he gave.

Then William shriek'd ; the hands he felt
Were cold, and damp, and dead !
He held young Edmund in his arms,
A heavier weight than lead.

The boat sunk down ; the murderer sunk
Beneath the avenging stream :
He rose ; he shriek'd ; no human ear
Heard William's drowning scream.

ST. PATRICK'S PURGATORY.

This Ballad was published (1801) in the Tales of Wonder, by Mr. Lewis, who found it among the wefts and strays of the Press. He never knew that it was mine ; but after his death, I bestowed some pains in recomposing it, because he had thought it worth preserving.

It is founded upon the abridged extract which M. Le Grand has given in his Fabliaux of a Metrical legend, by Marie de France.

"ENTER, Sir Knight," the Warden cried,
"And trust in Heaven, whate'er betide,
Since you have reach'd this bourn ;
But first receive refreshment due ;
'Twill then be time to welcome you
If ever you return."

2.

Three sops were brought of bread and wine ;
Well might Sir Owen then divine
The mystic warning given,
That he against our ghostly Foe
Must soon to mortal combat go,
And put his trust in Heaven.

3.

Sir Owen pass'd the convent gate ;
The warden him conducted straight
To where a coffin lay ;
The Monks around in silence stand,
Each with a funeral torch in hand,
Whose light bedimm'd the day.

4.

"Few Pilgrims ever reach this bourn,"
They said, "but fewer still return ;
Yet, let what will ensue,
Our duties are prescribed and clear ;
Put off all mortal weakness here ;
This coffin is for you.

5.

"Lie there, while we, with pious breath,
Raise over you the dirge of death ;
This comfort we can give ;
Belike no living hands may pay
This office to your lifeless clay ;
Receive it while you live !"

6.

Sir Owen in a shroud was dress'd,
They placed a cross upon his breast,
And down he laid his head ;
Around him stood the funeral train,
And sung, with slow and solemn strain,
The Service of the Dead.

7.

Then to the entrance of the Cave
They led the Christian warrior brave ;

Some fear he well might feel,
For none of all the Monks could tell
The terrors of that mystic cell,
Its secrets none reveal.

8.

"Now enter here," the Warden cried,
"And God, Sir Owen, be your guide!
Your name shall live in story:
For of the few who reach this shore,
Still fewer venture to explore

9.

Adown the Cavern's long descent,
Feeling his way, Sir Owen went,
With cautious feet and slow;
Unarm'd, for neither sword nor spear,
Nor shield of proof, avail'd him here
Against our ghostly Foe.

10.

The ground was moist beneath his tread;
Large drops fell heavy on his head;
The air was damp and chill;
And sudden shudderings o'er him came,
And he could feel through all his frame
An icy sharpness thrill.

11.

Now steeper grew the dark descent;
In fervent prayer the Pilgrim went;
'Twas silence all around,
Save his own echo from the cell,
And the large drops that frequent fell
With dull and heavy sound.

12.

But colder now he felt the cell;
Those heavy drops no longer fell;
Thin grew the piercing air;
And now upon his aching sight
There dawn'd, far off, a feeble light;
In hope he hasten'd there.

13.

Emerging now once more to day,
A frozen waste before him lay,
A desert wild and wide,
Where ice-rocks, in a sunless sky,
On ice-rocks piled, and mountains high,
Were heap'd on every side.

14.

Impending as about to fall
They seem'd; and, had that sight been all,
Enough that sight had been
To make the stoutest courage quail;
For what could courage there avail
Against what then was seen?

15.

He saw, as on in faith he past,
Where many a frozen wretch was fast

Within the ice-clefts pent,
Yet living still, and doom'd to bear,
In absolute and dumb despair,
Their endless punishment.

16.

A voice then spake within his ear,
And filled his inmost soul with fear, —
"O mortal Man," it said,
"Adventurers like thyself were these!
He seem'd to feel his life-blood freeze,
And yet subdued his dread.

17.

"O mortal Man," the Voice pursued,
"Be wise in time! for thine own good
Alone I counsel thee;
Take pity on thyself; retrace
Thy steps, and fly this dolorous place,
While yet thy feet are free.

18.

"I warn thee once! I warn thee twice
Behold! that mass of mountain-ice
Is trembling o'er thy head!
One warning is allow'd thee more;
O mortal Man, that warning o'er,
And thou art worse than dead!"

19.

Not without fear, Sir Owen still Held on with strength of righteous will,
In faith and fervent prayer;
When at the word, "I warn thee thrice!"
Down came the mass of mountain ice,
And overwhelm'd him there

20.

Crush'd though, it seem'd, in every bone,
And sense for suffering left alone,
A living hope remain'd;
In whom he had believed he knew,
And thence the holy courage grew
That still his soul sustain'd.

21.

For he, as he beheld it fall,
Fail'd not in faith on Christ to call —
"Lord, Thou canst save!" he cried;
Oh, heavenly help vouchsafed in need,
When perfect faith is found indeed!
The rocks of ice divide.

22.

Like dust before the storm-wind's sway
The shivered fragments roll'd away,
And left the passage free;
New strength he feels; all pain is gone;
New life Sir Owen breathes; and on
He goes rejoicingly.

23.

Yet other trials he must meet;
For soon a close and piercing heat

Relax'd each loosen'd limb ;
The sweat stream'd out from every part ;
In short, quick beatings toil'd his heart ;
His throbbing eyes grew dim.

24.

Along the wide and wasted land
A stream of fire, through banks of sand,
Its molten billows spread ;
Thin vapors, tremulously light,
Hung quivering o'er the glowing white ;
The air he breathed was red.

25.

A Paradise beyond was seen,
Of shady groves and gardens green,
Fair flowers and fruitful trees,
And flowing fountains cool and clear,
Whose gurgling music reach'd his ear,
Borne on the burning breeze.

26.

How should he pass that molten flood
While gazing wistfully he stood,
A Fiend, as in a dream,
"Thus!" answer'd the unutter'd thought,
Stretch'd forth a mighty arm, and caught
And cast him in the stream.

27.

Sir Owen groan'd ; for then he felt
His eyeballs burn, his marrow melt,
His brain like liquid lead ;
And from his heart the boiling blood
Its agonizing course pursued
Through limbs like iron red.

28.

Yet, giving way to no despair,
But mindful of the aid of prayer,
"Lord, Thou canst save!" he said ;
And then a breath from Eden came ;
With life and healing through his frame
The blissful influence spread.

29.

No Fiends may now his way oppose ;
The gates of Paradise unclose ;
Free entrance there is given ;
And songs of triumph meet his ear,
Enrapt, Sir Owen seems to hear
The harmonies of Heaven.

30.

"Come, Pilgrim! take thy foretaste meet,
Thou who hast trod with fearless feet
St. Patrick's Purgatory ;
For after death these seats divine,
Reward eternal, shall be thine,
And thine eternal glory."

31.

Inebriate with the deep delight,
Dim grew the Pilgrim's swimming sight ;

His senses died away ;
And when to life he woke, before
The Cavern-mouth he saw once more
The light of earthly day.

THE CROSS ROADS.

The tragedy related in this Ballad happened about the year 1760, in the parish of Bedminster, near Bristol. One who was present at the funeral told me the story and the circumstances of the interment, as I have versified them.

1.

THERE was an old man breaking stones
To mend the turnpike way ;
He sat him down beside a brook,
And out his bread and cheese he took ;
For now it was mid-day.

2.

He lean'd his back against a post ;
His feet the brook ran by ;
And there were water-cresses growing,
And pleasant was the water's flowing,
For he was hot and dry.

3.

A soldier, with his knapsack on,
Came travelling o'er the down ;
The sun was strong, and he was tired ;
And he of the old man inquired
"How far to Bristol town?"

4.

"Half an hour's walk for a young man,
By lanes, and fields, and stiles ;
But you the foot-path do not know ;
And if along the road you go,
Why, then 'tis three good miles."

5.

The soldier took his knapsack off,
For he was hot and dry ;
And out his bread and cheese he took,
And he sat down beside the brook
To dine in company.

6.

"Old friend! in faith," the soldier says,
"I envy you, almost ;
My shoulders have been sorely press'd,
And I should like to sit, and rest
My back against that post.

7.

"In such a sweltering day as this,
A knapsack is the devil ;
And if on t'other side I sat,
It would not only spoil our chat,
But make me seem uncivil."

8.

'The old man laugh'd and moved.—“I wish
It were a great-arm'd chair!
But this may help a man at need;—
And yet it was a cursed deed
That ever brought it there.

9.

“There's a poor girl lies buried here,
Beneath this very place;
The earth upon her corpse is press'd,
This post was driven into her breast,
And a stone is on her face.”

10.

The soldier had but just lean'd back,
And now he half rose up.
“There's sure no harm in dining here,
My friend? and yet, to be sincere,
I should not like to sup.”

11.

“God rest her! she is still enough
Who sleeps beneath my feet!”
The old man cried. “No harm I trow,
She ever did herself, though now
She lies where four roads meet.

12.

“I have past by about that hour
When men are not most brave;
It did not make my courage fail,
And I have heard the nightingale
Sing sweetly on her grave.

13.

“I have past by about that hour
When ghosts their freedom have
But here I saw no ghastly sight;
And quietly the glow-worm's light
Was shining on her grave.

14.

“There's one who, like a Christian, lies
Beneath the church-tree's shade;
I'd rather go a long mile round,
Than pass at evening through the ground
Wherein that man is laid.

15.

“A decent burial that man had,
The bell was heard to toll,
When he was laid in holy ground;
But for all the wealth in Bristol town
I would not be with his soul!

16.

“Didst see a house below the hill
Which the winds and the rains destroy?
In that farm-house did that man dwell,
And I remember it full well
When . was a growing boy.

17

“But she was a poor parish girl,
Who came up from the west:
From service hard she ran away,
And at that house, in evil day,
Was taken into rest.

“A man of a bad name was he;
An evil life he led;
Passion made his dark face turn white,
And his gray eyes were large and light,
And in anger they grew red.

19.

“The man was bad, the mother worse,
Bad fruit of evil stem;
'Twould make your hair to stand on end
If I should tell to you, my friend,
The things that were told of them!

20.

“Didst see an out-house standing by?
The walls alone remain;
It was a stable then, but now
Its mossy roof has fallen through,
All rotted by the rain.

21.

“This poor girl she had served with them
Some half-a-year or more,
When she was found hung up one day,
Stiff as a corpse, and cold as clay,
Behind that stable door.

22.

“It is a wild and lonesome place;
No hut or house is near;
Should one meet a murderer there alone,
'Twere vain to scream, and the dying groan
Would never reach mortal ear.

“And there were strange reports about;
But still the coroner found
That she by her own hand had died,
And should be buried by the way-side,
And not in Christian ground.

24.

“This was the very place he chose,
Just where these four roads meet,
And I was one among the throng
That hither follow'd them along;
I shall never the sight forget!

25.

“They carried her upon a board
In the clothes in which she died,
I saw the cap blown off her head;
Her face was of a dark, dark red;
Her eyes were starting wide:

26.

"I think they could not have been closed,
So widely did they strain.
O Lord, it was a ghastly sight,
And it often made me wake at night,
When I saw it in dreams again.

27.

"They laid her where these four roads meet,
Here in this very place.
The earth upon her corpse was press'd,
This post was driven into her breast,
And a stone is on her face.'

Westbury, 1793.

GOD'S JUDGMENT ON A WICKED BISHOP.

Here followeth the History of HATTO, Archbishop of Mentz.

It hapned in the year 914, that there was an exceeding great famine in Germany, at what time Otho surnamed the Great was Emperor, and one Hatto, once Abbot of Fulda, was Archbishop of Mentz, of the Bishops after Crescens and Crescentius the two and thirtieth, of the Archbishops after St. Bonifacius the thirteenth. This Hatto in the time of this great famine afore-mentioned, when he saw the poor people of the country exceedingly oppressed with famine, assembled a great company of them together into a Barne, and, like a most accursed and merciless caitiff, burnt up those poor innocent souls, that were so far from doubting any such matter, that they rather hoped to receive some comfort and relief at his hands. The reason that moved the prelat to commit that execrable impiety was, because he thought the famine would the sooner cease, if those unprofitable beggars that consumed more bread than they were worthy to eat, were dispatched out of the world. For he said that those poor folks were like to Mice, that were good for nothing but to devour corne. But God Almighty, the just avenger of the poor folks' quarrel, did not long suffer this hainous tyranny, this most detestable fact, unpunished. For he mustered up an army of Mice against the Archbishop, and sent them to persecute him as his furious Alastors, so that they afflicted him both day and night, and would not suffer him to take his rest in any place. Whereupon the Prelate, thinking that he should be secure from the injury of Mice if he were in a certain tower, that standeth in the Rhine near to the towne, betook himself unto the said tower as to a safe refuge and sanctuary from his enemies, and locked himself in. But the innumerable troupes of Mice chased him continually very eagerly, and swamme unto him upon the top of the water to execute the just judgment of God, and so at last he was most miserably devoured by those sillie creatures; who pursued him with such bitter hostility, that it is recorded they seraped and kowwed out his very name from the walls and tapistry wherein it was written, after they had so cruelly devoured his body. Wherefore the tower wherein he was eaten up by the Mice is shewn to this day, for a perpetual monument to all succeeding ages of the barbarous and inhuman tyranny of this impious Prelate, being situate in a little green Island in the midst of the Rhine near to the towne of Bingen, and is commonly called in the German Tongue the MOWSE-TURN.

CORYAT'S Crudities, pp. 571, 572.

Other authors who record this tale say that the Bishop was eaten by Rats.

THE summer and autumn had been so wet,
That in winter the corn was growing yet ;

'Twas a piteous sight, to see, all around,
The grain lie rotting on the ground.

Every day the starving poor
Crowded around Bishop Hatto's door,
For he had a plentiful last-year's store,
And all the neighborhood could tell
His granaries were furnish'd well.

At last Bishop Hatto appointed a day
To quiet the poor without delay ;
He bade them to his great Barn repair,
And they should have food for the winter there

Rejoiced such tidings good to hear,
The poor folk flock'd from far and near ;
The great Barn was full as it could hold
Of women and children, and young and old.

Then when he saw it could hold no more,
Bishop Hatto he made fast the door ;
And while for mercy on Christ they call,
He set fire to the Barn and burnt them all.

'T' faith, 'tis an excellent bonfire !' quoth he,
'And the country is greatly obliged to me,
For ridding it in these times forlorn
Of Rats that only consume the corn.'

So then to his palace returned he,
And he sat down to supper merrily,
And he slept that night like an innocent man ;
But Bishop Hatto never slept again.

In the morning, as he enter'd the hall
Where his picture hung against the wall,
A sweat like death all over him came,
For the Rats had eaten it out of the frame.

As he look'd, there came a man from his farm ;
He had a countenance white with alarm ;
'My Lord, I open'd your granaries this morn,
And the Rats had eaten all your corn'

Another came running presently,
And he was pale as pale could be, —
'Fly ! my Lord Bishop, fly,' quoth he,
'Ten thousand Rats are coming this way, —
The Lord forgive you for yesterday !'

'I'll go to my tower on the Rhine,' replied he,
'Tis the safest place in Germany ;
The walls are high, and the shores are steep,
And the stream is strong, and the water deep.'

Bishop Hatto fearfully hasten'd away,
And he cross'd the Rhine without delay,
And reach'd his tower, and barr'd with care
All the windows, doors, and loop-holes there.

He laid him down and closed his eyes ; —
But soon a scream made him arise ;
He started, and saw two eyes of flame
On his pillow, from whence the screaming came.

He listen'd and look'd;—it was only the Cat,
But the Bishop he grew more fearful for that;
For she sat screaming, mad with fear
At the Army of Rats that were drawing near.

For they have swam over the river so deep,
And they have climb'd the shores so steep,
And up the Tower their way is bent,
To do the work for which they were sent.

They are not to be told by the dozen or score;
By thousands they come, and by myriads and more.
Such numbers had never been heard of before;
Such a judgment had never been witness'd of yore.

Down on his knees the Bishop fell,
And faster and faster his beads did he tell,
As louder and louder drawing near
The gnawing of their teeth he could hear.

And in at the windows, and in at the door,
And through the walls, helter-skelter they pour,
And down from the ceiling, and up through the floor,
From the right and the left, from behind and before,
From within and without, from above and below,
And all at once to the Bishop they go.

They have whetted their teeth against the stones;
And now they pick the Bishop's bones;
They gnaw'd the flesh from every limb,
For they were sent to do judgment on him!

Westbury, 1799.

THE PIOUS PAINTER.

The legend of the Pious Painter is related in the Pia Hilaria of Gazæus; but the Pious Poet has omitted the second part of the story, though it rests upon quite as good authority as the first. It is to be found in the Fabliaux of Le Grand.

THE FIRST PART.

THERE once was a painter, in Catholic days,
Like JOB, who eschewed all evil;
Still on his Madonnas the curious may gaze
With applause and with pleasure; but chiefly his praise
And delight was in painting the Devil.

2.

They were Angels, compared to the Devils he drew,
Who besieged poor St. Anthony's cell;
Such burning hot eyes, such a furnace-like hue!
And round them a sulphurous coloring he threw,
That their breath seem'd of brimstone to smell.

3.

And now had the artist a picture begun;
'Twas over the Virgin's church-door;

She stood on the Dragon, embracing her Son;
Many Devils already the artist had done,
But this must outdo all before.

4.

The Old Dragon's imps, as they fled through the air,
At seeing it, paused on the wing;
For he had the likeness so just to a hair,
That they came as Apollyon himself had been there,
To pay their respects to their King.

5.

Every child, at beholding it, trembled with dread,
And scream'd as he turn'd away quick.
Not an old woman saw it, but, raising her head, Dropp'd a bead, made a cross on her wrinkles, and said,
Lord, keep me from ugly Old Nick!

6.

What the Painter so earnestly thought on by day,
He sometimes would dream of by night;
But once he was startled as sleeping he lay;
'Twas no fancy, no dream; he could plainly survey
That the Devil himself was in sight.

7.

"You rascally dauber!" old Beelzebub cries,
"Take heed how you wrong me again!
Though your caricatures for myself I despise,
Make me handsomer now in the multitude's eyes,
Or see if I threaten in vain!"

8.

Now the Painter was bold, and religious beside,
And on faith he had certain reliance;
So carefully he the grim countenance eyed,
And thank'd him for sitting, with Catholic pride,
And sturdily bade him defiance.

9.

Betimes in the morning the Painter arose;
He is ready as soon as 'tis light.
Every look, every line, every feature he knows;
'Tis fresh in his eye; to his labor he goes,
And he has the old Wicked One quite.

10.

Happy man! he is sure the resemblance can't fail;
The tip of the nose is like fire; [mail,
There's his grin and his fangs, and his dragon-like
And the very identical curl of his tail,—
So that nothing is left to desire.

11.

He looks and retouches again with delight,
'Tis a portrait complete to his mind;
And exulting again and again at the sight,
He looks round for applause, and he sees with affright
The Original standing behind.

12.

"Fool! Idiot!" old Beelzebub grinn'd as he spoke,
And stamp'd on the scaffold in ire;

The Painter grew pale, for he knew it no joke ;
'Twas a terrible height, and the scaffolding broke,
The Devil could wish it no higher.

“ He'p — help ! Blessed Mary ! ” he cried in alarm,
As the scaffold sunk under his feet.
From the canvass the Virgin extended her arm ;
She caught the good Painter ; she saved him from harm ;
There were hundreds who saw in the street.

14.

The Old Dragon fled when the wonder he spied,
And cursed his own fruitless endeavor ;
While the Painter call'd after his rage to deride,
Shook his pallet and brushes in triumph, and cried,
“ I'll paint thee more ugly than ever ! ”

THE SECOND PART.

1.

THE Painter so pious all praise had acquired
For defying the malice of Hell ;
The Monks the unerring resemblance admired ;
Not a Lady lived near but her portrait desired
From a hand that succeeded so well.

2.

One there was to be painted the number among
Of features most fair to behold ;
The country around of fair Marguerite rung ;
Marguerite she was lovely, and lively, and young ;
Her husband was ugly and old.

3.

O Painter, avoid her ! O Painter, take care,
For Satan is watchful for you !
Take heed lest you fall in the Wicked One's snare ;
The net is made ready ; O Painter, beware
Of Satan and Marguerite too.

4.

She seats herself now ; now she lifts up her head ;
On the artist she fixes her eyes ;
The colors are ready, the canvass is spread ;
He lays on the white, and he lays on the red,
And the features of beauty arise.

5.

He is come to her eyes, eyes so bright and so blue !
There's a look which he cannot express ; —
His colors are dull to their quick-sparkling hue ;
More and more on the lady he fixes his view ;
On the canvass he looks less and less.

6.

In vain he retouches ; her eyes sparkle more,
And that look which fair Marguerite gave !

Many Devils the Artist had painted of yore,
But he never had tried a live Angel before, —
St. Anthony, help him and save !

7.

He yielded, alas ! — for the truth must be told, —
To the Woman, the Tempter, and Fate.
It was settled the Lady, so fair to behold,
Should elope from her Husband, so ugly and old,
With the Painter, so pious of late.

8.

Now Satan exults in his vengeance complete ;
To the Husband he makes the scheme known ;
Night comes, and the lovers impatiently meet ;
Together they fly ; they are seized in the street,
And in prison the Painter is thrown.

9.

With Repentance, his only companion, he hes,
And a dismal companion is she !
On a sudden, he saw the Old Enemy rise,
“ Now, you villanous dauber ! ” Sir Beelzebub cries,
“ You are paid for your insults to me ! ”

10.

“ But my tender heart you may easily move
If to what I propose you agree ;
That picture, — be just ! the resemblance improve ;
Make a handsomer portrait ; your chains I'll remove,
And you shall this instant be free. ”

11.

Overjoy'd, the conditions so easy he hears ;
“ I'll make you quite handsome ! ” he said.
He said, and his chain on the Devil appears ;
Released from his prison, released from his fears,
The Painter is snug in his bed.

12.

At morn he arises, composes his look,
And proceeds to his work as before ;
The people beheld him, the culprit they took ;
They thought that the Painter his prison had broke,
And to prison they led him once more.

13.

They open the dungeon ; — behold, in his place
In the corner old Beelzebub lay ;
He smirks, and he smiles, and he leers with a grace,
That the Painter might catch all the charms of his face,
Then vanish'd in lightning away.

14.

Quoth the Painter, “ I trust you'll suspect me no
more,
Since you find my assertions were true.
But I'll alter the picture above the Church-door,
For he never vouchsafed me a sitting before,
And I must give the Devil his due. ”

ST. MICHAEL'S CHAIR.

"Know all men that the most Holy Father Gregory, in the year from the incarnation of our Lord 1070, bearing an affection of extraordinary devoutness to the Church of St. Michael's Mount, has piously granted to all the faithful who shall reach or visit it, with their oblations and alms, a remission of a third part of their penances."— At the beginning of the 15th century, "Because, it was said, this privilege is still unknown to many, therefore we the servants of God, and the ministers of this church in Christ, do require and request of all of you who possess the care of souls, for the sake of mutual accommodation, to publish these words in your respective churches; that your parishioners and subjects may be more carefully animated to a greater exhortation of devoutness, and may more gloriously in pilgrimages frequent this place, for the gracious attainment of the gifts and indulgencies aforesaid." From this publication of the privilege and undoubtedly commence that numerous resort of pilgrims to the church which Carew intimates; and of which Norden, who generally is the mere copier of Carew, yet is here the enlarger of him, says, "The Mount hath been much resorted unto by pilgrims in devotion to St. Michael." Then too was framed assuredly that seat on the tower, which is so ridiculously described by Carew, as "a little without the castle, — a bad seat in a craggy place, — somewhat dangerous for access;" when it is a chair composed of stones projecting from the two sides of the tower battlements, and uniting into a kind of basin for a seat just at the southwestern angle, but elevated above the battlements on each side, having its back just within, and hanging high over the rocky precipice below. It thus "appears somewhat dangerous" indeed, but not merely "for access," though the climber to it must actually turn his whole body at that altitude to take his seat in it, but from the altitude itself, and from its projection over the precipice. It also appears an evident addition to the building. And it was assuredly made at this period, not for the ridiculous purpose to which alone it professedly ministers at present, — that of enabling women who sit in it to govern their husbands afterwards; but for such of the pilgrims as had stronger heads, and bolder spirits, to complete their devotions at the Mount, by sitting in this St. Michael's Chair, as denominated, and these showing themselves as pilgrims, to the country round. Hence, in an author who lends us information without knowing it, as he alludes to customs without feeling the force of them, we read this transient information:

Who knows not Mighel's Mount and Chair,
The pilgrim's holy vaunt?

Norden also reëchoes Carew, in saying, "St. Michael's chair is fabled to be in the Mount." We thus find a reason for the construction of the chair, that comports with all the uses of the church on which it is constructed, and that ministered equally with this to the purposes of religion then predominant; a religion, dealing more in exteriors than our own, operating more than our own, through the body, upon the soul; and so leaving, perhaps, a more sensible impression upon the spirits. To sit in the chair then, was not merely, as Carew represents the act, "somewhat dangerous" in the attempt, "and therefore holy in the adventure," but also holy in itself, as on the church tower; more holy in its purposes, as the seat of the pilgrims; and most holy as the seat of a few in accomplishment of all their vows; as the chair of a few, in invitation of all the country.— WHITAKER'S Supplement to the First and Second Book of POLWHELE'S History of Cornwall, pp. 6, 7.

MERRILY, merrily rung the bells,
The bells of St. Michael's tower,
When Richard Penlake and Rebecca his wife
Arrived at St. Michael's door.

Richard Penlake was a cheerful man,
Cheerful, and frank, and free;
But he led a sad life with Rebecca his wife,
For a terrible shrew was she.

Richard Penlake a scolding would take,
Till patience avail'd no longer;
Then Richard Penlake his crab-stick would take,
And show her that he was the stronger.

Rebecca his wife had often wish'd
To sit in St. Michael's chair;
For she should be the mistress then,
If she had once sat there.

It chanced that Richard Penlake fell sick;
They thought he would have died;
Rebecca his wife made a vow for his life,
As she knelt by his bed-side.

"Now hear my prayer, St. Michael! and spare
My husband's life," quoth she;
"And to thine altar we will go
Six marks to give to thee."

Richard Penlake repeated the vow,
For woundily sick was he;
"Save me, St. Michael, and we will go
Six marks to give to thee."

When Richard grew well, Rebecca his wife
Teased him by night and by day:
"O mine own dear! for you I fear,
If we the vow delay."

Merrily, merrily rung the bells,
The bells of St. Michael's tower,
When Richard Penlake and Rebecca his wife
Arrived at St. Michael's door.

Six marks they on the altar laid,
And Richard knelt in prayer:
She left him to pray, and stole away
To sit in St. Michael's chair.

Up the tower Rebecca ran,
Round, and round, and round;
'Twas a giddy sight to stand a-top,
And look upon the ground.

"A curse on the ringers for rocking
The tower!" Rebecca cried,
As over the church battlements
She strode with a long stride.

"A blessing on St. Michael's chair!"
She said, as she sat down:
Merrily, merrily rung the bells,
And out Rebecca was thrown.

Tidings to Richard Penlake were brought
That his good wife was dead:
"Now shall we toll for her poor soul
The great church bell?" they said.

"Toll at her burying," quoth Richard Penlake,
 "Toll at her burying," quoth he;
 "But don't disturb the ringers now
 In compliment to me."

KING HENRY V. AND THE HERMIT OF DREUX.

While Henry V. lay at the siege of Dreux, an honest Hermit, unknown to him, came and told him the great evils he brought on Christendom by his unjust ambition, who usurped the kingdom of France, against all manner of right, and contrary to the will of God; wherefore, in his holy name, he threatened him with a severe and sudden punishment if he desisted not from his enterprise. Henry took this exhortation either as an idle whimsey, or a suggestion of the dauphin's, and was but the more confirmed in his design. But the blow soon followed the threatening; for, within some few months after, he was smitten with a strange and incurable disease. — MEZERAY.

HE pass'd unquestion'd through the camp;
 Their heads the soldiers bent
 In silent reverence, or begg'd
 A blessing as he went;
 And so the Hermit pass'd along,
 And reached the royal tent.

King Henry sat in his tent alone;
 The map before him lay;
 Fresh conquests he was planning there
 To grace the future day.

King Henry lifted up his eyes
 The intruder to behold;
 With reverence he the hermit saw;
 For the holy man was old;
 His look was gentle as a Saint's,
 And yet his eye was bold.

"Repent thee, Henry, of the wrongs
 Which thou hast done this land!
 O King, repent in time, for know
 The judgment is at hand.

"I have pass'd forty years of peace
 Beside the river Blaise;
 But what a weight of woe hast thou
 Laid on my latter days!

"I used to see along the stream
 The white sail gliding down,
 That wafted food, in better times,
 To yonder peaceful town.

"Henry! I never now behold
 The white sail gliding down;
 Famine, Disease, and Death, and Thou
 Destroy that wretched town.

"I used to hear the traveller's voice
 As here he pass'd along,
 Or maiden, as she loiter'd home
 Singing her even-song.

"No traveller's voice may now be heard;
 In fear he hastens by;
 But I have heard the village maid
 In vain for succor cry.

"I used to see the youths row down,
 And watch the dripping oar,
 As pleasantly their viol's tones
 Came soften'd to the shore.

"King Henry, many a blacken'd corpse
 I now see floating down!
 Thou man of blood! repent in time,
 And leave this leaguer'd town."

"I shall go on," King Henry cried,
 "And conquer this good land;
 Seest thou not, Hermit, that the Lord
 Hath given it to my hand?"

The Hermit heard King Henry speak,
 And angrily look'd down;—
 His face was gentle, and for that
 More solemn was his frown.

"What if no miracle from Heaven
 The murderer's arm control;
 Think you for that the weight of blood
 Lies lighter on his soul?"

"Thou conqueror King, repent in time,
 Or dread the coming woe!
 For, Henry, thou hast heard the threat,
 And soon shalt feel the blow!"

King Henry forced a careless smile,
 As the hermit went his way;
 But Henry soon remember'd him
 Upon his dying day.

OLD CHRISTOVAL'S ADVICE,

AND THE REASON WHY HE GAVE IT.

Recibió un Cavallero, para que cultivasse sus tierras, a un Quintero, y para pagarle algo adelantado le pidió fiador; y no teniendo quien le fiasse, le prometió delante del sepulcro de San Isidro que cumpliría su palabra, y si no, que el Santo le castigasse. Con lo qual, el Cavallero le pagó toda su soldada, y le fió. Mas desagradecido aquel hombre, no haciendo caso de su promessa, se huyó, sin acabar de servir el tiempo concertado. Passó de noche sin reparar en ello, por la Iglesia de San Andrés, donde estaba el cuerpo del siervo de Dios. Fuè cosa maravillosa, que andando corriendo toda la noche, no se apartó de la Iglesia, sino que toda se le fuè en dar mil bueltas al rededor de ella, hasta que por la mañana, yendo el amo à quezarse de San Isidro, y pedirle cumplierse su fianza, halló a su Quintero allí, dando mas y mas bueltas, sin poderse haver apartado de aquel sitio. Pidió perdon al Santo, y á su amo, al qual satisfizo despues enteramente por su trabajo. — VILLEGAS. Flos Sanctorum.

“If thy debtor be poor,” old Christoval said,
“Exact not too hardly thy due;
For he who preserves a poor man from want
May preserve him from wickedness too.

“If thy neighbor should sin,” old Christoval said,
“O never unmerciful be;
But remember it is through the mercy of God
That thou art not as sinful as he.

“At sixty-and-seven, the hope of Heaven
Is my comfort, through God’s good grace;
My summons, in truth, had I perish’d in youth,
Must have been to a different place.”

“You shall have the farm, young Christoval,”
My master Henrique said;
“But a surety provide, in whom I can confide,
That duly the rent shall be paid.”

I was poor, and I had not a friend upon earth,
And I knew not what to say;
We stood in the porch of St. Andrew’s Church,
And it was St. Isidro’s day.

“Take St. Isidro for my pledge,”
I ventured to make reply;
“The Saint in Heaven may be my friend,
But friendless on earth am I.”

We enter’d the Church, and went to his shrine,
And I fell on my bended knee —
“I am friendless, holy Isidro,
And therefore I call upon thee!

“I call upon thee my surety to be;
My purpose is honest and true;
And if ever I break my plighted word,
O Saint, mayst thou make me rue!”

I was idle, and quarter-day came on,
And I had not the rent in store;
I fear’d St. Isidro’s anger,
But I dreaded my landlord more.

So, on a dark night, I took my flight,
And stole like a thief away;
It happen’d that by St. Andrew’s Church
The road I had chosen lay.

As I past the Church door, I thought how I swore Upon St. Isidro’s day;
That the Saint was so near increased my fear,
And faster I hasten’d away.

So all night long I hurried on,
Pacing full many a mile,
And knew not his avenging hand
Was on me all the while.

Weary I was, yet safe, I thought;
But when it was day-light,
I had, I found, been running round
And round the Church all night.

I shook like a palsy, and fell on my knees,
And for pardon devoutly I pray’d;
When my master came up — “What, Christoval!
You are here betimes!” he said.

“I have been idle, good Master,” said I,
“Good Master, and I have done wrong;
And I have been running round the Church
In penance all night long.”

“If thou hast been idle,” Henrique replied, “Henceforth thy fault amend!
I will not oppress thee, Christoval,
And the Saint may thy labor befriend.”

Homeward I went a penitent,
And from that day I idled no more;
St. Isidro bless’d my industry,
As he punish’d my sloth before.

“When my debtor was poor,” old Christoval said
“I have never exacted my due;
But remembering my master was good to me,
I copied his goodness too.

“When my neighbor hath sinn’d,” old Christoval
said,
“I judged not too hardly his sin,
But thought of the night by St. Andrew’s Church,
And consider’d what I might have been.”

CORNELIUS AGRIPPA;

A BALLAD.

OF A YOUNG MAN THAT WOULD READ UN-LAWFUL BOOKS, AND HOW HE WAS PUNISHED.

VERY PITHY AND PROFITABLE.

CORNELIUS AGRIPPA went out one day;
His Study he lock’d ere he went away,
And he gave the key of the door to his wife,
And charged her to keep it lock’d on her life.

“And if any one ask my Study to see,
I charge you to trust them not with the key;
Whoever may beg, and entreat, and implore,
On your life let nobody enter that door.”

There lived a young man in the house, who in vain
Access to that Study had sought to obtain;

And he begg'd and pray'd the books to see,
Till the foolish woman gave him the key.

On the Study-table a book there lay,
Which Agrippa himself had been reading that day;
The letters were written with blood therein,
And the leaves were made of dead men's skin;—

And these horrible leaves of magic between
Were the ugliest pictures that ever were seen,
The likeness of things so foul to behold,
That what they were is not fit to be told.

The young man he began to read
He knew not what; but he would proceed,
When there was heard a sound at the door
Which, as he read on, grew more and more.

And more and more the knocking grew;
The young man knew not what to do;
But, trembling, in fear he sat within,
Till the door was broke, and the Devil came in.

Two hideous horns on his head he had got,
Like iron heated nine times red-hot;
The breath of his nostrils was brimstone blue,
And his tail like a fiery serpent grew.

“What wouldst thou with me?” the Wicked One
cried,
But not a word the young man replied;
Every hair on his head was standing upright,
And his limbs like a palsy shook with affright.

“What wouldst thou with me?” cried the Author of ill;
But the wretched young man was silent still;
Not a word had his lips the power to say,
And his marrow seem'd to be melting away.

“What wouldst thou with me?” the third time he cries,
And a flash of lightning came from his eyes,
And he lifted his griffin claw in the air,
And the young man had not strength for a prayer.

His eyes red fire and fury dart
As out he tore the young man's heart;
He grinn'd a horrible grin at his prey;
And in a clap of thunder vanish'd away.

THE MORAL

Henceforth let all young men take heed
How in a Conjuror's books they read.

KING CHARLEMAIN.

François Petrarque, fort renommé entre les Poètes Italiens, discourant en un épître son voyage de France et de l'Allemagne, nous raconte que passant par la ville d'Aix, il apprit de quelques

*Prestres une histoire prodigieuse qu'ils tenoient de main en main pour tres veritable. Qui estoit que Charles le Grand, apres avoir conquesté plusieurs pays, s'esperdit de telle façon en l'amour d'une simple femme, que mettant tout honneur et reputation en arriere, il oubliu non seulement les affaires de son royaume, mais aussi le soing de sa propre personne, au grand desplaisir de chacun; estant seulement ententif à courtiser ceste dame: laquelle par bonheur commença à s'aliter d'une grosse maladie, qui lui apporta la mort. Dont les Princes et grands Seigneurs furent fort rejouis, esperans que par ceste mort, Charles reprendroit comme devant et ses esprits et les affaires du royaume en main: toutes-fois il se trouva tellement infatué de ceste amour, qu'encores cherissoit-il ce cadaver, l'embrassant, baisant, arrolant de la meme façon que devant, et au lieu de prester l'oreille aux legations qui luy survenoient, il l'entretenoit de mille bayes, comme s'elle eust esté pleine de vie.
Ce corps commençoit déjà non seulement à mal sentir, mais aussi se tournoit en putrefaction, et neantmoins n'y avoit aucun de ses
facoris qui luy en osast parler; dont advint que l'Archevesque Turpin mieuz advisé que les autres, pourpensa que telle chose ne pouvoit estre advenue sans quelque sorcellerie. Au moyen dequoy espiant un jour l'heure que le Roy s'estoit absenté de la chambre, commença de fouiller le corps de toutes parts, finale-ment trouva dans sa bouche au dessous de sa langue un anneau qu'il luy osta. Le jour mesme Charlemaigne retournant sur ses premieres brisees, se trouva fort estonne de voir une car-casse ainsi puante. Parquoy, comme s'il se fust reveillé d'un profond sommeil, commanda que l'on l'ensevelist promptement.
Ce qui fut fait; mais en contr' eschange de ceste folie, il tourna tous ses pensemens vers l'Archevesque porteur de cest anneau, ne pouvant estre de là en avant sans luy, et le suivant en tous les endroits. Quoy voyant ce sage Prelat, et craignant que cest anneau ne tombast en mains de quelque autre, le jetta dans un lac prochain de la ville. Depuis lequel temps on dit que ce Roy se trouve si espris de l'amour du lieu, qu'il ne se desquarant de la ville d'Aix, où il bastit un Palais, et un Monastere, en l'un desquels il parfit le reste de ses jours, et en l'autre voulut estre ensevely, ordonnant par son testament que tous les Emperours de Rome eussent à se faire sacrer premiere-ment en ce lieu. — PASQUIER. Recherches de la Fraace.
L. 6, C. 33.*

This very learned author has strangely mistaken Aix in Savoy, the real scene of the legend, for Aix-la-Chapelle. The ruins of a building said to have been Charlemain's palace are still to be seen on the Lake of Bourget.

1.

It was strange that he loved her, for youth was gone
And the bloom of her beauty was fled: [by,
'Twas the glance of the harlot that gleam'd in her eye,
And all but the Monarch could plainly descry
From whence came her white and her red.

2.

Yet he thought with Agatha none might compare,
And he gloried in wearing her chain;
The court was a desert if she were not there;
To him she alone among women seem'd fair,
Such dotage possess'd Charlemain.

3.

The soldier, the statesman, the courtier, the maid,
Alike the proud leman detest;
And the good old Archbishop, who ceased to up-
braid,
Shook his gray head in sorrow, and silently pray'd
That he soon might consign her to rest.

4.

A joy ill-dissembled soon gladdens them all,
For Agatha sickens and dies.

And now they are ready with bier and with pall ;
The tapers gleam gloomy amid the high hall,
And the strains of the requiem arise.

5.

But Charlemain sent them in anger away,
For she should not be buried, he said ;
And despite of all counsel, for many a day,
Where array'd in her costly apparel she lay,
The Monarch would sit by the dead.

6.

The cares of the kingdom demand him in vain,
And the army cry out for their lord ;
The Lombards, the fierce misbelievers of Spain,
Now ravage the realms of the proud Charlemain,
And still he unsheaths not the sword.

7.

The soldiers they clamor, the Monks bend in prayer
In the quiet retreats of the cell ;
The physicians to counsel together repair,
And with common consent, one and all they declare
That his senses are bound by a spell.

8.

Then, with relics protected, and confident grown,
And telling devoutly his beads,
The good old Archbishop, when this was made known,
Steals in when he hears that the corpse is alone,
And to look for the spell he proceeds.

9.

He searches with care, though with tremulous
haste,
For the spell that bewitches the king ;
And under her tongue, for security placed,
Its margin with mystical characters traced,
At length he discovers a ring.

10.

Rejoicing he seized it, and hasten'd away ;
The Monarch reënter'd the room ;
The enchantment was ended, and, suddenly gay,
He bade the attendants no longer delay,
But bear her with speed to the tomb.

11.

Now merriment, joyance, and feasting again
Enliven'd the palace of Aix ;
And now by his heralds did King Charlemain
Invite to his palace the courtier train
To hold a high festival day.

12.

And anxiously now for the festival day
The highly-born Maidens prepare ;
And now, all apparel'd in costly array,
Exulting they come to the palace of Aix,
Young and aged, the brave and the fair.

13.

Oh ! happy the Damsel who, 'mid her compeers,
For a moment engaged the King's eye !

Now glowing with hopes, and now fever'd with fears,
Each maid or triumphant or jealous appears,
As noticed by him, or pass'd by.

14.

And now, as the evening approach'd, to the ball
In anxious suspense they advance,
Hoping each on herself that the King's choice might fall,
When, lo ! to the utter confusion of all,
He ask'd the Archbishop to dance.

15.

The damsels they laugh, and the barons they stare ;
'Twas mirth and astonishment all ;
And the Archbishop started, and mutter'd a prayer,
And, wroth at receiving such mockery there,
In haste he withdrew from the hall.

16.

The moon dimpled over the water with light
As he wander'd along the lake side ;
But the King had pursued, and, o'erjoyed at his
sight,
"Oh turn thee, Archbishop, my joy and delight,
Oh turn thee, my charmer," he cried.

17.

"Oh come where the feast, and the dance, and the song,
Invite thee to mirth and to love ;
Or at this happy moment, away from the throng,
To the shade of yon wood let us hasten along, —
The moon never pierces that grove."

18.

As thus by new madness the King seem'd possess'd,
In new wonder the Archbishop heard ;
Then Charlemain warmly and eagerly press'd
The good old man's poor, wither'd hand to his breast,
And kiss'd his long, gray, grizzle beard.

19.

"Let us well, then, these fortunate moments employ !"
Cried the Monarch with passionate tone ;
"Come away then, dear charmer, — my angel, —
my joy, —
Nay, struggle not now, — 'tis in vain to be coy, —
And remember that we are alone."

20.

"Blessed Mary, protect me !" the Archbishop
cried ;
"What madness has come to the King !"
In vain to escape from the monarch he tried,
When luckily he on his finger espied
The glitter of Agatha's ring.

21.

Overjoy'd, the good prelate remember'd the spell,
And far in the lake flung the ring ;

The waters closed round it, and wondrous to tell,
Released from the cursed enchantment of hell,
His reason return'd to the King.

22.

But he built him a palace there close by the bay,
And there did he love to remain;
And the traveller who will, may behold at this day
A monument still in the ruins at Aix
Of the spell that possess'd Charlemain.

ST. ROMUALD.

Les Catalans ayant appris que S. Romuald vouloit quitter leurs pays, en furent très-affligés; ils délibérèrent sur les moyens de l'en empêcher, et le seul qu'ils imaginèrent comme le plus sûr, fut de le tuer, afin de profiter du moins de ses reliques et des guérisons et autres miracles qu'elles opéreroient après sa mort. La dévotion que les Catalans avoient pour lui, ne plut point du tout à S. Romuald; il usa de stratagème et leur échappa. — St. Foix, Essais Historiques sur Paris. — T. 5, p. 163.

St. Foix, who is often more amusing than trustworthy, has fathered this story upon the Spaniards, though it belongs to his own countrymen, the circumstances having happened when Romuald was a monk of the Convent of St. Michael's, in Aquitaine. It is thus related by Yepes. En esta ocasion suerdio una cosa bien extraordinaria, porque los naturales de la tierra donde estava el monasterio de San Miguel, estimavan en tanto a San Romualdo, que faltandoles la paciencia de que se quisiesse yr, dieron en un terrible disparate, a quien llama muy bien San Pedro Damiano Impia Pietas, piedad cruel: porque queriendose yr San Romualdo, determinaron de matarle, para que ya que no le podian tener en su tierra vivo, alomenos gozassen de sus reliquias y cuerpo santo. Supo San Romualdo la determinacion bestial y indiscreta de aquella gente: y tomo una prudente resolucion, porque imitando a David, que fingio que estava loco, por no caer en manos de sus enemigos, assi San Romualdo se hizo raer la cabeza, y con algunos ademanes, y palabras mal concertadas que dezia, le turvieron por hombre que le avia faltado el juyzio, con que se aseguraron los naturales de la tierra que ya perpetuamente le tendrian en ella: y con semejante estratagemas y traça tuvo lugar San Romualdo de hurtarse, y a cencerros topados (como dicen) huyr de aquella tierra, y llegar a Italia a la ciudad de Ravena.

Coronica General de la Orden de San Benito. — T. 5, ff. 274.

Villegas in his Flos Sanctorum, (February 7th), records some of St. Romuald's achievements against the Devil and hisimps. He records also the other virtues of the Saint, as specified in the poem. They are more fully stated by Yepes. Tenia tres cilicios, los quales mudava de treynta en treynta dias: no los labava, sino ponialos al ayre, y à la agua que llovia, con que se mataban algunas inmundicias, que se criavan en ellos. — ff. 298. Quando alguna vez era tentado de la gula, y desseava comer de algun manjar, tomorale en las manos, miravale, oliale, y despues que estava despierto el apetito, dezia, O gula, gula, quan dulce y suave te parece este manjar! pero no te ha de entrar en provecho! y entonces se mortificava, y le dezaca, y le embiava entero, o al silleroço, o a los pobres.

There is a free translation of this poem, by Bilderdijk, in the second volume of his Krckelzangen, p. 113.

ONE day, it matters not to know
How many hundred years ago,
A Frenchman stopp'd at an inn door:
The Landlord came to welcome him, and chat
Of this and that,
For he had seen the Traveller there before.

“Doth holy Romuald dwell
Still in his cell?”

The Traveller ask'd, “or is the old man dead?”
“No; he has left his loving flock, and we
So great a Christian never more shall see,”
The Landlord answer'd, and he shook his head.

“Ah, sir, we knew his worth!
If ever there did live a Saint on earth! —
Why, Sir, he always used to wear a shirt
For thirty days, all seasons, day and night:
Good man, he knew it was not right
For Dust and Ashes to fall out with Dirt;
And then he only hung it out in the rain,
And put it on again.

“There has been perilous work
With him and the Devil there in yonder cell;
For Satan used to maul him like a Turk.
There they would sometimes fight
All through a winter's night,
From sunset until morn,
He with a cross, the Devil with his horn;
The Devil spitting fire, with might and main,
Enough to make St. Michael half afraid;
He splashing holy water till he made
His red hide hiss again,
And the hot vapor fill'd the smoking cell.
This was so common that his face became
All black and yellow with the brimstone flame,
And then he smelt, — O Lord! how he did smell!”

“Then, Sir! to see how he would mortify
The flesh! If any one had dainty fare,
Good man, he would come there,
And look at all the delicate things, and cry
‘O Belly, Belly,
You would be gormandizing now, I know;
But it shall not be so! —
Home to your bread and water — home, I tell ye!’”

“But,” quoth the Traveller, “wherefore did he leave
A flock that knew his saintly worth so well?”
“Why,” said the Landlord, “Sir, it so befell
He heard unluckily of our intent
To do him a great honor; and, you know,
He was not covetous of fame below,
And so by stealth one night away he went.”

“What might this honor be?” the Traveller cried.
“Why, Sir,” the host replied,
“We thought perhaps that he might one day leave us;

And then should strangers have
The good man's grave,
A loss like that would naturally grieve us;
For he'll be made a Saint of, to be sure.
Therefore we thought it prudent to secure
His relies while we might;
And so we meant to strangle him one night’

THE
KING OF THE CROCODILES.

The people at Isna, in Upper Egypt, have a superstition concerning Crocodiles similar to that entertained in the West Indies; they say there is a King of them who resides near Isna, and who has ears, but no tail; and he possesses an uncommon regal quality, that of doing no harm. Some are bold enough to assert that they have seen him.—Brown's Travels.

If the Crocodile Dynasty in Egypt had been described as distinguished by a long neck, as well as the want of a tail, it might be supposed that some tradition of the Ichthyosaurus, or other variety of the Præadamite Crocodile, was preserved in those countries.

No one who has perused Mr. Waterton's Wanderings will think there is any thing more extraordinary in the woman's attack upon her intended devourer, than in what that enterprising and most observant naturalist has himself performed. He has ridden a Crocodile, twisting the huge reptile's fore legs on his back by main force, and using them as a bridle. "Should it be asked," he says, "how I managed to keep my seat, I would answer, I hunted some years with Lord Darlington's fox-hounds."

There is a translation of this ballad by Bilderdijk, published in his Krekelzangen, 1822, vol. ii. p. 109, before the second part was written.

PART I.

"Now, Woman, why without your veil?
And wherefore do you look so pale?
And, Woman, why do you groan so sadly,
And wherefore beat your bosom madly?"

"Oh! I have lost my darling boy,
In whom my soul had all its joy;
And I for sorrow have torn my veil,
And sorrow hath made my very heart pale.

"Oh, I have lost my darling child,
And that's the loss that makes me wild;
He stoop'd to the river down to drink,
And there was a Crocodile by the brink.

"He did not venture in to swim;
He only stoop'd to drink at the brim;
But under the reeds the Crocodile lay,
And struck with his tail, and swept him away.

"Now take me in your boat, I pray,
For down the river lies my way,
And me to the Reed Island bring,
For I will go to the Crocodile King.

"He reigns not now in Crocodilople,
Proud as the Turk at Constantinople;
No ruins of his great City remain,
The Island of Reeds is his whole domain.

"Like a Dervise there he passes his days,
Turns up his eyes, and fasts and prays;
And being grown pious, and meek, and mild,
He now never eats man, woman, or child.

"The King of the Crocodiles never does wrong:
He has no tail, so stiff and strong;
He has no tail to strike and slay,
But he has ears to hear what I say.

"And to the King I will complain
How my poor child was wickedly slain;
The King of the Crocodiles he is good,
And I shall have the murderer's blood."

The man replied, "No, Woman, no,
To the Island of Reeds I will not go;
I would not for any worldly thing
See the face of the Crocodile King."

"Then lend me now your little boat,
And I will down the river float.
I tell thee that no worldly thing
Shall keep me from the Crocodile King.

"The King of the Crocodiles he is good,
And therefore will give me blood for blood;
Being so mighty and so just,
He can revenge me; he will, and he must."

The Woman she leap'd into the boat,
And down the river alone did she float;
And fast with the stream the boat proceeds;
And now she is come to the Island of Reeds.

The King of the Crocodiles there was seen;
He sat upon the eggs of the Queen;
And all around, a numerous rout,
The young Prince Crocodiles crawl'd about.

The Woman shook every limb with fear,
As she to the Crocodile King came near;
For never man without fear and awe
The face of his Crocodile Majesty saw.

She fell upon her bended knee,
And said, "O King, have pity on me,
For I have lost my darling child,
And that's the loss that makes me wild.

"A Crocodile ate him for his food;
Now let me have the murderer's blood;
Let me have vengeance for my boy,
The only thing that can give me joy.

"I know that you, Sire! never do wrong;
You have no tail, so stiff and strong,
You have no tail to strike and slay,
But you have ears to hear what I say."

"You have done well," the King replies,
And fixed on her his little eyes;
"Good Woman, yes, you have done right,
But you have not described me quite.

"I have no tail to strike and slay,
And I have ears to hear what you say;
I have teeth, moreover, as you may see,
And I will make a meal of thee."

Bristol, 1799.

PART II.

WICKED the word, and bootless the boast,
As cruel King Crocodile found to his cost;
And proper reward of tyrannical might,
He show'd his teeth, but he miss'd his bite.

“A meal of me!” the Woman cried,
Taking wit in her anger, and courage beside;
She took him his forelegs and hind between,
And trundled him off the eggs of the Queen.

To revenge herself then she did not fail;
He was slow in his motions for want of a tail;
But well for the Woman was it, the while,
That the Queen was gadding abroad in the Nile.

Two Crocodile Princes, as they play'd on the sand,
She caught, and grasping them one in each hand,
Thrust the head of one into the throat of the other,
And made each Prince Crocodile choke his brother.

And when she had truss'd three couple this way,
She carried them off, and hasten'd away,
And plying her oars with might and main,
Cross'd the river, and got to the shore again.

When the Crocodile Queen came home, she found
That her eggs were broken and scattered around,
And that six young Princes, darlings all,
Were missing, for none of them answer'd her call.

Then many a not very pleasant thing
Pass'd between her and the Crocodile King:
“Is this your care of the nest?” cried she.
“It comes of your gadding abroad,” said he.

The queen had the better in this dispute,
And the Crocodile King found it best to be mute,
While a terrible peal in his ears she rung,
For the Queen had a tail as well as a tongue.

In woful patience he let her rail,
Standing less in fear of her tongue than her tail,
And knowing that all the words which were spoken
Could not mend one of the eggs that were broken.

The Woman, meantime, was very well pleased;
She had saved her life, and her heart was eased;
The justice she ask'd in vain for her son,
She had taken herself, and six for one.

“Mash-Allah!” her neighbors exclaim'd in delight.

She gave them a funeral supper that night,
Where they all agreed that revenge was sweet,
And young Prince Crocodiles delicate meat.

 THE ROSE.

Between the Cytee and the Chirche of Bethlehem, is the felde Floridus, that is to seyne, the felde florsched. For als moche as a fayre Mayden was blamed with wrong and sclaundred, that sche hadd don fornicacioun, for whiche cause sche was demed to the dethe, and to be brent in that place, to the whiche she was ladd. And as the fyre began to brenne about hire, she made her preyeres to oure Lord, that als wissely as sche was not gylyt of that synne, that he wold help hire, and make it to be knowen to alle men of his mercyfalle grace: and whanne sche had thus seyde, sche entered into the fuyer, and anon was the fuyer quenched and oute, and the brondes that weren brennyngo becomen white Roseres, fulle of roses, and theise werein the first Roseres and roses, both white and rede, that every ony man saughe.

And thus was this Maiden saved by the grace of God.—
The Voiage and Traicaille of Sir John Maundeuille.

NAY, EDITH! spare the Rose; — perhaps it lives,
And feels the noontide sun, and drinks refresh'd
The dews of night; let not thy gentle hand
Tear its life-strings asunder, and destroy
The sense of being! — Why that infidel smile?
Come, I will bribe thee to be merciful;
And thou shalt have a tale of other days, —
For I am skill'd in legendary lore, —
So thou wilt let it live. There was a time
Ere this, the freshest, sweetest flower that bloom'd,
Bedeck'd the bowers of earth. Thou hast not heard
How first by miracle its fragrant leaves
Spread to the sun their blushing loveliness.

There dwelt in Bethlehem a Jewish maid,
And Zillah was her name, so passing fair
That all Judea spake the virgin's praise.
He who had seen her eye's dark radiance
How it reveal'd her soul, and what a soul
Beam'd in the mild effulgence, woe to him!
For not in solitude, for not in crowds,
Might he escape remembrance, nor avoid
Her imaged form, which followed every where,
And filled the heart, and fix'd the absent eye.
Alas for him! her bosom own'd no love
Save the strong ardor of religious zeal,
For Zillah on her God had centred all
Her spirit's deep affections. So for her
Her tribes-men sigh'd in vain, yet revered
The obdurate virtue that destroy'd their hopes.

One man there was, a vain and wretched man,
Who saw, desired, despaired, and hated her.
His sensual eye had gloated on her cheek
Even till the flush of angry modesty
Gave it new charms, and made him gloat the more.
She loathed the man; for Hamuel's eye was bold,
And the strong workings of brute selfishness
Had moulded his broad features; and she fear'd
The bitterness of wounded vanity
That with a fiendish hue would overcast
His faint and lying smile. Nor vain her fear;
For Hamuel vow'd revenge, and laid a plot
Against her virgin fame. He spread abroad
Whispers that travel fast, and ill reports
That soon obtain belief; how Zillah's eye,
When in the temple heaven-ward it was raised,
Did swim with rapturous zeal, but there were those Who had beheld the enthusiast's melting glance
With other feelings fill'd; — that 'twas a task
Of easy sort to play the saint by day
Before the public eye, but that all eyes

Were closed at night; — that Zillah's life was foul,
Yea, forfeit to the law.

Shame — shame to man,
That he should trust so easily the tongue
Which stabs another's fame! The ill report
Was heard, repeated, and believed, and soon, —
For Hamuel, by his well-schemed villany,
Produced such semblances of guilt, — the Maid
Was to the fire condemn'd.

Without the walls,
There was a barren field; a place abhorr'd,
For it was there where wretched criminals
Receiv'd their death; and there they fix'd the stake,
And piled the fuel round, which should consume
The injured Maid, abandon'd, as it seem'd,
By God and Man. The assembled Bethlemites
Beheld the scene, and when they saw the Maid
Bound to the stake, with what calm holiness
She lifted up her patient looks to Heaven,
They doubted of her guilt. With other thoughts
Stood Hamuel near the pile; him savage joy
Led thitherward, but now within his heart
Unwonted feelings stirr'd, and the first pangs
Of wakening guilt, anticipant of Hell.
The eye of Zillah, as it glanced around,
Fell on the slanderer once, and rested there
A moment; like a dagger did it pierce,
And struck into his soul a cureless wound.
Conscience! thou God within us! not in the hour
Of triumph dost thou spare the guilty wretch;
Not in the hour of infamy and death
Forsake the virtuous! They draw near the stake, —
They bring the torch! — hold, hold your erring hands!

Yet quench the rising flames! — they rise! they spread!

They reach the suffering Maid! oh God protect
The innocent one!

They rose, they spread, they raged; —
The breath of God went forth; the ascending fire
Beneath its influence bent, and all its flames
In one long lightning-flash concentrating,
Darted and blasted Hamuel, — him alone.
Hark! — what a fearful scream the multitude
Pour forth! — and yet more miracles! the stake
Branches and buds, and, spreading its green leaves,
Embowers and canopies the innocent Maid,
Who there stands glorified; and Roses, then
First seen on earth since Paradise was lost,
Profusely blossom round her, white and red,
In all their rich variety of hues;
And fragrance such as our first parents breathed
In Eden she inhales, vouchsafed to her
A presage sure of Paradise regain'd.

THE LOVER'S ROCK.

De la Peña de los Enamorados.

Un moço Christiano estava cautivo en Granada, sus partes y diligencia eran tales, su buen termino y cortesia, que su amo hazia mucha confianza del dentro y fuera de su casa. Una hija suya al tanto se le aficiona y puso en el los ojos. Pero como quier que ella fuesse casadera, y el moço esclavo, no podian passar adelante como deseavan; ca el amor mal se puede encubrir, y temian si el padre della, y amo del, lo sabia, pagarian con las cabeças. Acordaron de huir a tierra de Christianos, resolucion que al moço venia mejor, por bolver a los suyos, que a ella por desterrarse de su patria: si ya no la movia el deseo de hazerse Christiana, lo que yo no creo. Tomaron su camino con todo secreto, hasta llegar al peñasco ya dicho, en que la moça cansada se puso a reposar. En esto vieron assomar a su padre con gente de acavullo, que venia en su seguimiento. Que podian hazer, o a que parte bolverse? que consejo tomar? mentirosas las esperanças de los hombres y miserables sus intentos. Acudieron a lo que solo les quedava de encumbrar aquel peñol, trepando por aquellos ristos, que era rrpuro assaz flaco. El padre con un semblante suñuido los mando abazar: amenagava les sino obedecian de executar en ellos una muerte muy cruel. Los que acompañavan al padre los amonestavan lo mismo, pues solo les restava aquella esperança de alcançar perdon de la misericordia de su padre, con hazer lo que les mandava, y echarseles a los pies. No quisieron venir en esto. Los Moros puestos a pic acometieron a subir el peñasco: pero el moço les defendio la subida con galgas, piedras y palos, y todo lo demás que le venia a la mano, y le servia de armas en aquella desesperacion. El padre visto esto, hizo venir de un pueblo alli cerca vallerteros para que de lejos los fchassen. Ellos vista su perdicion, acordaron con su muerte librarse de los demuestos y tornantos mayores que temian. Las palabras que en este trance se dixeron, no ay para que relatarlas. Finalmente abraçados entre si fuertemente, se echaron del peñol abazo, por aquella parte en que los mirava su cruel y sanudo padre. Deste manera espiraron antes de llegar a lo baxo, con lastima de los presentes, y aun con lagrimas de algunos que se movian con aquel triste espectáculo de aquellos moços desgraciados, y a pesar del padre, como estaban, los enterraron en aquel mismo lugar; constancia que se emplrara mejor en otra hazaña, y les fuera bien contada la muerte, si la padecieron por la virtud y en defensa de la verdadera religion, y no por satisfacer a sus apetitos desenfrenados

MARIANA

THE Maiden, through the favoring night,
From Granada took her flight;
She bade her Father's house farewell,
And fled away with Manuel.

No Moorish maid might hope to vie
With Laila's cheek or Laila's eye;
No maiden loved with purer truth,
Or ever loved a lovelier youth.

In fear they fled, across the plain,
The father's wrath, the captive's chain;
In hope to Seville on they flee,
To peace, and love, and liberty.

Chioma they have left, and now,
Beneath a precipice's brow,
Where Guadalhorce winds its way,
There in the shade awhile they lay; —

For now the sun was near its height,
And she was weary with her flight;
She laid her head on Manuel's breast,
And pleasant was the maiden's rest.

While thus the lovely Laila slept,
A fearful watch young Manuel kept.
Alas! her Father and his train
He sees come speeding o'er the plain.

The Maiden started from her sleep ;
They sought for refuge up the steep ;
To scale the precipice's brow
Their only hope of safety now.

But them the angry Father sees ;
With voice and arm he menaces ;
And now the Moors approach the steep ;
Loud are his curses, loud and deep.

Then Manuel's heart grew wild with woe ;
He loosen'd stones and roll'd below ;
He loosen'd crags ; for Manuel strove
For life, and liberty, and love.

The ascent was perilous and high ;
The Moors they durst not venture nigh ;
The fugitives stood safely there ;
They stood in safety and despair.

The Moorish chief unmoved could see
His daughter bend her suppliant knee ;
He heard his child for pardon plead,
And swore the offenders both should bleed.

He bade the archers bend the bow,
And make the Christian fall below ;
He bade the archers aim the dart,
And pierce the Maid's apostate heart.

The archers aim'd their arrows there ;
She clasp'd young Manuel in despair ;
"Death, Manuel, shall set us free !
Then leap below, and die with me."

He clasp'd her close, and cried, Farewell !
In one another's arms they fell ;
And falling o'er the rock's steep side,
In one another's arms they died.

And side by side they there are laid,
The Christian youth and Moorish maid ;
But never Cross was planted there,
Because they perish'd for despair.

Yet every Moorish maid can tell
Where Laila lies, who loved so well ;
And every youth, who passes there,
Says for Manuel's soul a prayer.

GARCI FERRANDEZ.

This story, which later historians have taken some pains to disprove, may be found in the Coronica General de Espana.

PART I.

In an evil day and an hour of woe
Did Garci Ferrandez wed !

He wedded the Lady Argentine,
As ancient stories tell ;
He loved the Lady Argentine,
Alas ! for what befell !
The Lady Argentine hath fled ;
In an evil day and an hour of woe
She hath left the husband who loved her well,
To go to Count Aymerique's bed.

2.

Garci Ferrandez was brave and young,
The comeliest of the land ;
There was never a knight of Leon in fight
Who could meet the force of his matchless might ;
There was never a foe in the infidel band
Who against his dreadful sword could stand ;
And yet Count Garci's strong right hand
Was shapely, and soft, and white ;
As white and as soft as a lady's hand
Was the hand of the beautiful knight.

3.

In an evil day and an hour of woe
To Garci's Hall did Count Aymerique go ;
In an evil hour and a luckless night
From Garci's Hall did he take his flight,
And bear with him that lady bright,
That lady false, his bale and bane.
There was feasting and joy in Count Aymerique's bower,
When he, with triumph, and pomp, and pride,
Brought home the adulteress like a bride :
His daughter only sat in her tower ;
She sat in her lonely tower alone,
And for her dead mother she made her moan ;
"Methinks," said she, "my father for me
Might have brought a bridegroom home.
A stepmother he brings hither instead ;
Count Aymerique will not his daughter should wed,
But he brings home a leman for his own bed."
So thoughts of good and thoughts of ill
Were working thus in Abba's will ;
And Argentine, with evil intent,
Ever to work her woe was bent ;
That still she sat in her tower alone,
And in that melancholy gloom,
When for her mother she made her moan,
She wish'd her father too in the tomb.

4.

She watches the pilgrims and poor who wait
For daily food at her father's gate.
"I would some Knight were there," thought she,
"Disguised in pilgrim-weeds for me !
For Aymerique's blessing I would not stay,
Nor he nor his leman should say me nay,
But I with him would wend away."

5.

She watches her handmaid the pittance deal ;
They took their dole and went away ;
But yonder is one who lingers still ;
As though he had something in his will,
Some secret which he fain would say ;

And close to the portal she sees him go;
He talks with her handmaid in accents low;
Oh then she thought that time went slow,
And long were the minutes that she must wait
Till her handmaid came from the castle-gate.

From the castle-gate her handmaid came,
And told her that a Knight was there,
Who sought to speak with Abba the fair,
Count Aymerique's beautiful daughter and heir.
She bade the stranger to her bower;
His stature was tall, his features bold;
A goodlier form might never maid
At tilt or tourney hope to see;
And though in pilgrim-weeds arrayed,
Yet noble in his weeds was he,
And did his arms in them enfold
As they were robes of royalty.

7.

He told his name to the high-born fair;
He said that vengeance led him there.
"Now aid me, lady dear," quoth he,
"To smite the adulteress in her pride;
Your wrongs and mine avenged shall be,
And I will take you for my bride."
He pledged the word of a true Knight;
From out the weeds his hand he drew;
She took the hand that Garci gave,
And then she knew his tale was true,
For she saw the warrior's hand so white,
And she knew the fame of the beautiful Knight.

 PART II.

1.

'Tis the hour of noon;
The bell of the convent hath done,
And the Sexts are begun;
The Count and his leman are gone to their meat.
They look to their pages, and lo they see
Where Abba, a stranger so long before,
The ewer, and basin, and napkin bore;
She came and knelt on her bended knee,
And first to her father minister'd she:
Count Aymerique look'd on his daughter down;
He look'd on her then without a frown.

2.

And next to the Lady Argentine
Humbly she went and knelt;
The Lady Argentine the while
A haughty wonder felt;
Her face put on an evil smile;
"I little thought that I should see
The Lady Abba kneel to me
In service of love and courtesy!
Count Aymerique," the leman cried,
"Is she weary of her solitude,
Or hath she quell'd her pride?"
Abba no angry word replied;
She only raised her eyes, and cried,

"Let not the Lady Argentine
Be wroth at ministry of mine!"
She look'd at Aymerique, and sigh'd;
"My father will not frown, I ween,
That Abba again at his board should be seen!"
Then Aymerique raised her from her knee,
And kiss'd her eyes, and bade her be
The daughter she was wont to be.

3.

The wine hath warm'd Count Aymerique;
That mood his crafty daughter knew;
She came and kiss'd her father's cheek,
And stroked his beard with gentle hand,
And winning eye and action bland,
As she in childhood used to do.
"A boon! Count Aymerique," quoth she;
"If I have found favor in thy sight,
Let me sleep at my father's feet to-night.
Grant this," quoth she, "so I shall see
That you will let your Abba be
The daughter she was wont to be."
With asking eye did Abba speak;
Her voice was soft and sweet;
The wine had warm'd Count Aymerique,
And when the hour of rest was come,
She lay at her father's feet.

4.

In Aymerique's arms the adulteress lay;
Their talk was of the distant day,
How they from Garci fled away
In the silent hour of night;
And then amid their wanton play
They mock'd the beautiful Knight
Far, far away his castle lay,
The weary road of many a day;
"And travel long," they said, "to him,
It seem'd, was small delight;
And he belike was loath with blood
To stain his hands so white."
They little thought that Garci then
Heard every scornful word!
They little thought the avenging hand
Was on the avenging sword!
Fearless, unpenitent, unblest,
Without a prayer they sunk to rest,
The adulterer on the leman's breast.

5.

Then Abba, listening still in fear,
To hear the breathing long and slow,
At length the appointed signal gave,
And Garci rose and struck the blow.
One blow sufficed for Aymerique,—
He made no moan, he utter'd no groan;
But his death-start waken'd Argentine,
And by the chamber lamp she saw
The bloody falchion shine!
She raised for help her in-drawn breath;
But her shriek of fear was her shriek of death.

6.

In an evil day and an hour of woe
Did Garci Ferrandez wed!

One wicked wife he has sent to her grave;
He hath taken a worse to his bed.

Bristol, 1801

KING RAMIRO.

The remarkable story here versified is thus related in the Nobiliario de D. Pedro, Conde de Bracclos, son of D. Diniz, king of Portugal, a singularly valuable and curious work, published by the Coronista Mayor of that kingdom, Juan Bautista Lavaña, at Rome, in 1640. King D. Diniz reigned from 1279 to 1333.

El Rey D. Ramiro o segando de Leom, ouvio falar da fermosura e bondade de huma Moura; e como era de alto sangue irmã de Alboazar Albucadam, filha de D. Zalam Zala, bisneta del Rey Aboalli, o que conqueveo a terra no tempo del Rey Rodrigo, Este Alboazar era Seahor de toda a terra desde Gaya até Santarem; e ouve muytas batalhas com Christãos, estremadamente com este Rey Ramiro; e el Rey Ramiro fez com elle grandes amizades por cobrar aquella Moura, que el muyto amava; e fez emfinta que o amava muyto; e mandoulhe dizer que a queria ver, por se aver de conhecer com elle por as amizades serem mais firmes; e Alboazar mandoulhe dizer que lhe prazia dello, e que fosse a Gaya, e hi se veria com el. E el Rey Ramiro foyse lá em tres gales com fidalgos, e pidiohe aquella Moura que lhe desse, e faloia Christam, e cazaria com ella; e Alboazar lhe respondeo, ta tens molher, e filhas della, e es Christãos; como podes tu casar duas vezes? E el lhe dire, ea verdade era, mas elle era tam parente da Rainha D. Aldonza sua molher, ea a santa Igreja os partiria. E Alboazar juroulhe por su ley de Mojamede, ca lhe nom daria por todo o reyno que elle avia, que a tenha desposada com el Rey de Marrocos.

Este Rey D. Ramiro trazia hum grande Astrologo que avia nome Amaõ; e por sãs artes tiroua huma noyte donde estava, e leuona às galês que hi estavam prestas, e entrou Rey Ramiro com a Moura em huma galê. A esto chegou Alboazar, e alli foy contenda grande entre elles; e desapareçerom hi dos de Rey Ramiro vinte dous dos bons que hi levava, e da outra compahna muyta; e el levou a Moura a Minhor, e de ali a Leom, e bautizoua, e poslhe nome Ortiga, que queria tanto dizer em aquel tempo, como castigada e ensinada, e cumprida de todos os bens.

Alboazar tece-se por mal viltado desto, e pensou em como poderia vingar tal deshonra, e ouvio falar em como a Rainha D. Aldonça, molher del Rey Ramiro estava em Minhor. Postou sãs naos e outras velas, o melhor que pole, e mais encuberto; e foy à quelle lugar de Minhor, e entrou a villa, e filhou a Rainha D. Aldonça, e meteo nas naos com donas e donzellas que achou, e das outras compahnas muytas, vejose a o Castello de Gaya, que era em a quelle tempo de grandes edifícios e nobres paços.

A el Rey Ramiro contaram este feyto, e foy em tamanha tristeza que foy louco hũs doze dias: e como enbrou seu entendimento mandou por seu filho o Infante D. Ordonho, e por algũs seus vassallos que entendeo que eraõ para graõ feyto, e metose com elles em cinco galês, ea nom pode mais aver, e nom quiz levar galeotes se nom aquelles que entendeo que poderia reger as galês, e mandou a os fidalgos que remassem em lugar de galeotes; e esto fez elle porque as galês crom poueas, e por irem mais fidalgos, e as galês irem mais aparadas para aquel mester para que ia; e el eubrio as galês de pano verde, e entrou com ellas por Sam Joaõ de Farado, que agora chamaõ Sam Joane de Foz. Aquel lugar de huma parte e outra era a ribeyra euberta de arbores, e as galês encostous so as ramos dellas; e porque eraõ eubertas de pano verde, nom pareciaõ. El deceo de noyte a terra com todas os seus, e falou com o Infante, que se deytassem so as arbores o mais encuberto que fazer posseseua, e por nenhuma guiza nom se abulassem, até que ouvissem a voz de seu corno, e ouvindo que lhe acorressem a graõ pressa. El vestiose em panos de tacanha, e sua espada, e seu lorigõ e o corno so hi; e foyse deytar a huma fonte que estava so o castello de Gaya. E esto fuzia Rey Ramiro por ver a Rainha sa molher, para aver conselho com ella, como poderia mais eumpridamente aver direyto de Alboazar, e de todos seus filhos, e de toda sa compahna; ea tinha que pello conselho della cobruria todo, ea cometendo este feyto em outra maneyra, poderia escapar Alboazar e seus filhos: e porque el era de graõ coraço, punha em esta guiza seu feyto em graõ ventura; mas as cousas que saõ ordenadas de Deos, vem a aquello que a elle apraz, e nom assim como os homẽs pensaõ.

Aconteceo assi, que Alboazar Albucadaõ fora a correr monte contra Alufons, e huma sergente que avia nome Perona, natural de França, que aviaõ levado com a Rainha servia ante ella: levantouse pella manhã, assi como avia de costume de lhe ir por agoa para as mãs a aquella fonte, e achou hi jazer Rey Ramiro, e nom o conheceo. El pediohe na Aravia da agoa por Deos, ea se nom podia de alli levantar; e ella doalha por huma aecter; e el meteo hum camafeo na boca, e aquel camafeo avia partido com sa molher a Rainha por a metade; e el deose a beber, e deytou o camafeo no aecter. E a sergente foyse, e deo agoa à Rainha, e ella vio o camafeo, e reconheceo logo, e a Rainha perguntou, quem achara no caminho? e ella respondeo, que nom achara ninguem; e ella lhe dire que menta, e que o nom negasse, e que lhe furia bem e merec; e a sergente lhe dire, que achara hi hum Mouro doente e lazerado, e lhe pedira agoa que bebesse por Deos, e que lhe dera; e a Rainha dire que lhe fosse por elle, e o trouresse encubertamente. E a sergente foy lá, e ditelhe, homem pobre, a Rainha minha senhora vos manda chamar, e esto he por vosso beia, ca ella mandara prasar de vos. E Rey Ramiro respondeo so si, assi o mande Deos. Foyse com ella, e entrarom pella porta da camara, e conheceo a Rainha, e ditelhe, Rey Ramiro que te aduce aqui? e el lhe respondeo, o vosso amor. E ella lhe dire, veste morto: e el lhe dire, pequẽna maravilha, pois o faço por vosso amor. E ella respondeo, nom me has tu amor, pois de aqui levaste Ortiga, que mais prezas que a mi; mas vante hora para essa traseamara, e escusarmey destas donas e donzellas, e irmey logo para ti. A camara era de abobeda, e como Rey Ramiro foy dentro, fechou ella a porta com grande cadeado. E elle jazendo na camara, chegou Alboazar, e foyse para sã camara; e a Rainha lhe dire, se tu aqui tivesses Rey Ramiro, que lhe furias? O Moura respondeo, o que furia a mim; matalo com grandes tormentas. E Rey Ramiro ouvia tudo, e a Rainha dire, Pois senhor, aprestes a tens; eã aqui esta fechado em esta traseamara, ca ora te podes della vingar a tua vontade.

Rey Ramiro entendeo que era enganado por sã molher, que ja de alli nom podia escapar se nom por arte alguma; e maginou que era tempo de se ajudar de seu saber, e dire n graõ alta voz, Alboazar Albucadam, sabe que eu te errey mal; mostrandote amizade, levy desta eaza tã irmã, que nom era de minha ley; e me confessey este pecado a meu Abude; e el me deo em pendença, que me vesse meter em teu poder o mais vilmente que pudesse; e se me tu matar quizesse, que te pedisse que, como eu fizera tam grande pecado ante a tã pessaa, e ante os teus, em filhar ta irmã, mostrandote bou amor, que bem assi me desses morte em praça vergonhosa; e por quanto u pecado que ca fiz, foy em grandes terras soado, que bem assi fosse a minha noyte soada por hum corno, e mostrada a todos os teus. E hora te peço pois de morrer ey, que faças chamar teus filhos e filhas, e teus parentes, e os gentes desta villa, e me fugas ir a este curral que he de grande ouvida, e me ponhas em lugar alto, e me leyces tanger meu corno, que trago para esto, a tanto, até que me sayja o folgo e a alma do corpo. Em esta filharas vengança de mi, e teus filhos e parentes avraõ prazer, e a minha alma serã salva. Esto me nom debes de negar por salvamento de minha alma; que sabes que por tã ley debes salvar se poderes as almas de todas as leys.

E esto dezia el, por fazer vir alli todos seus filhos e parentes, por se vingar delles; ea em outra guiza nom os poderia achar em hum; e porque o curral era alto de muros, e nom avia mais que huma porta por hu os seus aviaõ de entrar. Alboazar pensou no que lhe pediu, e filhou delle lastima, e dice contra a Rainha, Este homem rependido hẽ de seu pecado; mais ey eu errado a elle eã elle ã mi; graõ torto furin de o matar, pois se paẽ em meu poder. A Rainha respondeohe, Alboazar, fraco de coraço, eu sey quem he Rey Ramiro; e sey de certo, se o salvas de morte, que lhe nom podes escapar que a nom prendas ari; ea el he arteyoso a vingador, assi como tu sabes. E nom ouviste tu dizer, como el tirou os olhos a D. Ordonho seu irmaõ que era mór de dias, por o descedar do Rey no? e nom te acordas quantas lides ouveste com elle, e te veneeo; e te matou e cativou muytos bons? e ja te esqueceo a força que te fez de te irmã? e em como eu era sã molher, me trouzeste, que he a mór des honra que os Christãos podem aver? Nom es para viver, nem es para nuda, se te nom vingas. E se o tu nom fazes por tua alma, porque assi a salvos, porque he homem de outra ley, e em contrario da tua; e tu dalhe a morte que te pede, pois ja vem aconselhado de seu Abade; ea graõ peccado farias, se lha partisses.

Alboazar olhou o dizer da Rainha, e dire em seu coração, de má ventura he o homem que se fa de nenhũa molher: esta hê sã molher lidima, e tem Infantes e Infantas del, e quer sã morte deshonorada; eu nom ey porque della fie; eu alongauey de mi. E pensou em o que lhe dizia a Rainha, em como Rey Ramiro era arreygroso e vingador; e receouse delle, se o nom matasse; e mandou chamar todos os que erom naquelle lugar, e dice a Rey Ramiro, Tu vieste aqui e fizeste gram lœura, que nos teus paços puderas filhar pendeça; e porque sey se me tu tivesses em teu poder, nom escaparia da morte, eu te quero cumprir o que me pides por salvamento de tua alma.

Mandouo tirar da camara, e levou a o curral, e pollo sobre hum gram padraõ que hi estava, e mandou que tanjese seu corno à tanto atã que lhe saisso fulgo. E el Rey Ramiro lhe pediu que fizesse hi estar a Rainha, e as donas e donzellas, e todos seus filhos, e parentes e cidadãos naquel curral, e Alboazar fezco assi.

El Rey Ramiro tangeo seu corno a todo seu poder, para ouvir em os seus, e a Infante D. Ordonho seu filho quando ouvio o corno, acorreolhe com todos seus vassallos, e miteromse pella porta do curral; e Rey Ramiro decese do padraõ donde estava, e veyo contra o Infante, e dice: Meu filho, rossa madre nom moura, nem as donas e donzellas que com ella viraõ; o guardaia de cajom, que outra morte merece. Alli tirou a espada da bainha, e deo com ella a Alboazar por cima da cabeça, que o fendeo atã os peytos. Alli morcraõ quatro filhos e tres filhas de Alboazar Albucadaõ; e todos os Mouras e Mouras que estavaõ no curral: e nom ficou em essa villa de Gaya pedra com pedra, que toda nom fosse em terra. Filhou el Rey Ramiro sã molher com sãs donas e donzellas que estavaõ com ella, e quanto aver achou, e meteo nas galês; e despois que este ouve acabado, chamou o Infante seu filho, e os seus fidalgos, e contoulhes tudo, como lhe axiera com a Rainha sã molher, e elle que lhe dera ajuda para fazer della mais crua justia na sã terra. Esto ouverom todas por estranho de tamanha maldade de molher; e o Infante D. Ordonho sairaõlhe as lagrimas polos olhos, e dice contra seu padre, Senhor a mi nom cabe de falar em esto, porque he mi madre; se nom tanto, que otheis por vossa honra.

E entrarom entom nas galês, e chegarom à foz de Ancora, e amarraraõ as galês para folgarem, porque aviaõ muyto trabalhado aquelles dias: alli foram dizer a el Rey que a Rainha scia chorando; e el Rey dice, Vamola ver. Foy lá, e perguntoulhe porque chorava? E ella respondeo, Porque mataste aquelle Mouro, que era melhor que ti. O Infante dice contra seu padre, Isto he demonio; que quereis della? que poã ser que vos fugira. E el Rey mandoua entã amarrar a huma mã, e lanca-la no mar, e desaquelle tempo lhe chamaram Foz de Ancora. Por este peccado que dire o Infante D. Ordonho contra sã madre, dizcrom despois as gentes que por esso fora deserdado dos povos de Castella. Rey Ramiro foyse a Lcoã, e fez sãs cortes muy ricas, e fujou com os seus de sãs terras, e mostroulhes a maldade da Rainha Aldonça sa molher: que elle avia por bem de cazor com D. Ortiga, que era de alto linhage: e elles todas a huma voz o louvarom, e ouvrromno por bem. Elle foy da boa vida, e fez o Mosteyro de S. Juliaõ, e outros hospitales muytos; e os que della decenderon foram muyto cumplidos. — Ff. 111 —116.

A characteristic circumstance in the poem is added from the Livro Velho dos Linhagens, a work of the thirteenth century, printed among the Provas da historia Geneologica da Casa Real Portuguesa, t. 1. It is related there in these words: — E o Mouro lhe disse, viestes a morrer; mas querote perguntar, que se me liveces em Mier, que morte me darias? El Rey Ramiro era muito faminto, e respondeolhe assim, eu te daria hum capã assado, e huma regueifa, a furiate tudo comer, e darchia em sima en sa capa chea de vinho que bebesse. — Provas, T. 1, p. 213.

GREEN grow the alder-trees, and close
To the water-side by St. Joam da Foz.

From the castle of Gaya the Warden sees
The water and the alder-trees;
And only these the Warden sees;
No danger near doth Gaya fear;
No danger nigh doth the Warden spy;
He sees not where the galleys lie
Under the alders silently;

For the galleys with green are cover'd o'er,
They have crept by night along the shore;
And they lie at anchor, now it is morn,
Awaiting the sound of Ramiro's horn.

2.

In traveller's weeds Ramiro sate
By the fountain at the castle-gate;
But under the weeds was his breastplate,
And the sword he had tried in so many fights,
And the horn whose sound would ring around,
And be known so well by his knights.

3.

From the gate Aldonza's damsel came
To fill her pitcher at the spring,
And she saw, but she knew not, her master the King.

In the Moorish tongue Ramiro spake,
And begg'd a draught for mercy's sake,
That he his burning thirst might slake;
For, worn by a long malady,
Not strength enow, he said, had he
To lift it from the spring.

4.

She gave her pitcher to the King,
And from his mouth he dropp'd a ring
Which he had with Aldonza broken;
So in the water from the spring
Queen Aldonza found the token.
With that she bade her damsel bring Secretly the stranger in.

5.

"What brings thee hither, Ramiro?" she cried;
"The love of you," the King replied.
"Nay! nay! it is not so!" quoth she;
"Ramiro, say not this to me!
I know your Moorish concubine
Hath now the love which once was mine.
If you had loved me as you say,
You would never have stolen Ortiga away;
If you had never loved another,
I had not been here in Gaya to-day
The wife of Ortiga's brother!
But hide thee here, — a step I hear,
King Alboazar draweth near."

6.

In her alcove she bade him hide:
"King Alboazar, my lord," she cried,
"What wouldst thou do, if at this hour
King Ramiro were in thy power?"
"This I would do," the Moor replied;
"I would hew him limb from limb;
As he, I know, would deal by me,
So I would deal by him."

"Alboazar!" Queen Aldonza said,
 "Lo! here I give him to thy will;
 In yon alcove thou hast thy foe.
 Now thy vengeance then fulfil!"

7.

With that up spake the Christian king:
 "O Alboazar, deal by me
 As I would surely deal with thee,
 If I were you, and you were me!
 Like a friend you guested me many a day;
 Like a foe I stole your sister away:
 The sin was great, and I felt its weight,
 All joy by day the thought oppress'd,
 And all night long it troubled my rest;
 Till I could not bear the burden of care,
 But told my Confessor in despair.
 And he, my sinful soul to save,
 This penance for atonement gave;
 That I before you should appear,
 And yield myself your prisoner here,
 If my repentance was sincere,
 That I might by a public death
 Breathe shamefully out my latest breath.

8.

"King Alboazar, this I would do,
 If you were I, and I were you;
 That no one should say you were meanly fed,
 I would give you a roasted capon first,
 And a good ring loaf of wheaten bread,
 And a skinful of wine to quench your thirst;
 And after that I would grant you the thing
 Which you came to me petitioning.
 Now this, O King, is what I crave,
 That I my sinful soul may save:
 Let me be led to your bull-ring,
 And call your sons and daughters all,
 And assemble the people, both great and small,
 And let me be set upon a stone,
 That by all the multitude I may be known,
 And bid me then this horn to blow,
 And I will blow a blast so strong,
 And wind the horn so loud and long,
 That the breath in my body at last shall be gone,
 And I shall drop dead in sight of the throng.
 Thus your revenge, O King, will be brave,
 Granting the boon which I come to crave,
 And the people a holyday sight will have,
 And I my precious soul shall save;
 For this is the penance my Confessor gave.
 King Alboazar, this I would do,
 If you were I, and I were you."

9.

"This man repents his sin, be sure!"
 To Queen Aldonza said the Moor;
 "He hath stolen my sister away from me;
 I have taken from him his wife;
 Shame then would it be, when he comes to me,
 And I his true repentance see,
 If I for vengeance should take his life."

10.

"O Alboazar!" then quoth she,
 "Weak of heart as weak can be!

Full of revenge and wiles is he.
 Look at those eyes beneath that brow;
 I know Ramiro better than thou!
 Kill him, for thou hast him now;
 He must die, be sure, or thou.
 Hast thou not heard the history
 How, to the throne that he might rise,
 He pluck'd out his brother Ordoño's eyes?
 And dost not remember his prowess in fight,
 How often he met thee and put thee to flight,
 And plunder'd thy country for many a day?
 And how many Moors he has slain in the strife,
 And how many more carried captives away?
 How he came to show friendship — and thou didst believe him?
 How he ravish'd thy sister — and wouldst thou forgive him?
 And hast thou forgotten that I am his wife,
 And that now by thy side I lie like a bride,
 The worst shame that can ever a Christian betide?
 And cruel it were, when you see his despair,
 If vainly you thought in compassion to spare,
 And refused him the boon he comes hither to crave,

For no other way his poor soul can he save,
 Than by doing the penance his Confessor gave."

11.

As Queen Aldonza thus replies,
 The Moor upon her fixed his eyes,
 And he said in his heart, Unhappy is he
 Who putteth his trust in a woman!
 Thou art King Ramiro's wedded wife,
 And thus wouldst thou take away his life!
 What cause have I to confide in thee?
 I will put this woman away from me.
 These were the thoughts that pass'd in his breast
 But he call'd to mind Ramiro's might;
 And he fear'd to meet him hereafter in fight,
 And he granted the King's request.

12.

So he gave him a roasted capon first,
 And a skinful of wine to quench his thirst;
 And he called for his sons and daughters all,
 And assembled the people, both great and small
 And to the bull-ring he led the king;
 And he set him there upon a stone,
 That by all the multitude he might be known;
 And he bade him blow through his horn a blast,
 As long as his breath and his life should last.

13.

Oh, then his horn Ramiro wound:
 The walls rebound the pealing sound,
 That far and wide rings echoing round;
 Louder and louder Ramiro blows,
 And farther the blast and farther goes;
 Till it reaches the galleys where they lie close
 Under the alders, by St. Joam da Foz.
 It roused his knights from their repose,
 And they and their merry men arose.
 Away to Gaya they speed them straight;
 Like a torrent they burst through the city gate;
 And they rush among the Moorish throng,
 And slaughter their infidel foes.

14.

Then his good sword Ramiro drew,
 Upon the Moorish King he flew,
 And he gave him one blow, for there needed not two;
 They killed his sons and his daughters too;
 Every Moorish soul they slew;
 Not one escaped of the infidel crew;
 Neither old nor young, nor babe nor mother;
 And they left not one stone upon another.

15.

They carried the wicked Queen aboard,
 And they took counsel what to do to her;
 They tied a millstone round her neck,
 And overboard in the sea they threw her.
 But a heavier weight than that millstone lay
 On Ramiro's soul at his dying day.

 INCHCAPE ROCK.

An old writer mentions a curious tradition which may be worth quoting. "By east the Isle of May," says he, "twelve miles from all land in the German seas, lyes a great hidden rock, called Incheape, very dangerous for navigators, because it is overflowed everie tide. It is reported, in old times, upon the saide rock there was a bell, fixed upon a tree or timber, which rang continually, being moved by the sea, giving notice to the saylers of the danger. This bell or clocke was put there and maintained by the Abbot of Aberbrothok, and being taken down by a sea pirate, a yeare thereafter he perished upon the same rocke, with ship and goodes, in the righteous judgement of God." — STODDARD'S Remarks on Scotland.

No stir in the air, no stir in the sea,
 The ship was still as she could be;
 Her sails from heaven received no motion;
 Her keel was steady in the ocean.

Without either sign or sound of their shock,
 The waves flow'd over the Incheape Rock;
 So little they rose, so little they fell,
 They did not move the Incheape Bell.

The Abbot of Aberbrothok
 Had placed that Bell on the Incheape Rock;
 On a buoy in the storm it floated and swung,
 And over the waves its warning rung.

When the Rock was hid by the surge's swell,
 The mariners heard the warning Bell;
 And then they knew the perilous Rock,
 And blest the Abbot of Aberbrothok.

The Sun in heaven was shining gay;
 All things were joyful on that day;

The sea-birds scream'd as they wheel'd round,
 And there was joyance in their sound.

The buoy of the Incheape Bell was seen
 A darker speck on the ocean green;
 Sir Ralph the Rover walk'd his deck,
 And he fix'd his eye on the darker speck.

He felt the cheering power of spring;
 It made him whistle, it made him sing;
 His heart was mirthful to excess,
 But the Rover's mirth was wickedness.

His eye was on the Incheape float;
 Quoth he, "My men, put out the boat,
 And row me to the Incheape Rock,
 And I'll plague the Abbot of Aberbrothok."

The boat is lower'd, the boatmen row,
 And to the Incheape Rock they go;
 Sir Ralph bent over from the boat,
 And he cut the Bell from the Incheape float.

Down sunk the Bell with a gurgling sound;
 The bubbles rose and burst around;
 Quoth Sir Ralph, "The next who comes to the Rock Won't bless the Abbot of Aberbrothok."

Sir Ralph the Rover sail'd away;
 He scour'd the seas for many a day;
 And now, grown rich with plunder'd store,
 He steers his course for Scotland's shore.

So thick a haze o'erspreads the sky,
 They cannot see the Sun on high;
 The wind hath blown a gale all day;
 At evening it hath died away.

On the deck the Rover takes his stand;
 So dark it is they see no land.
 Quoth Sir Ralph, "It will be lighter soon,
 For there is the dawn of the rising Moon."

"Canst hear," said one, "the breakers roar?
 For methinks we should be near the shore."
 "Now where we are I cannot tell,
 But I wish I could hear the Incheape Bell."

They hear no sound; the swell is strong;
 Though the wind hath fallen, they drift along,
 Till the vessel strikes with a shivering shock,—
 "Oh Christ! it is the Incheape Rock!"

Sir Ralph the Rover tore his hair;
 He curs'd himself in his despair;
 The waves rush in on every side;
 The ship is sinking beneath the tide.

But, even in his dying fear,
 One dreadful sound could the Rover hear—
 A sound as if, with the Incheape Bell,
 The Devil below was ringing his knell.

WELL OF ST. KEYNE.

"I know not whether it be worth the reporting, that there is in Cornwall, near the parish of St. Neots, a Well, arched over with the robes of four kinds of trees, withy, oak, elm, and ash, dedicated to St. Keyne. The reported virtue of the water is this, that whether husband or wife come first to drink thereof, they get the mastery thereby."—FULLER. This passage in one of the folios of the Worthy old Fuller, who, as he says, knew not whether it were worth the reporting, suggested the following Ballad; and the Ballad has produced so many imitations, that it may be prudent here thus to assert its originality, lest I should be accused hereafter of having committed the plagiarism which has been practised upon it.

"Next," says Carew, in his Survey of Cornwall, p. 150, "I will relate you another of the Cornish natural wonders, viz. St. Kayne's Well; but lest you make a wonder first at the Saint, before you take notice of the Well, you must understand, that this was not Kayne the manqueller, but one of a gentler spirit and milder sex, to wit, a woman. He who caused the spring to be pictured, added this rhyme for an exposition:—

'In name, in shape, in quality,
This Well is very quaint;
The name to lot of Kayne befell,
No over-holy saint.
The shape, four trees of divers kinde,
Withy, Oak, Elm, and Ash,
Make with their roots an arched roof,
Whose floor this spring doth wash.
The quality, that man or wife,
Whose chance or choice attains
First of this sacred stream to drink,
Thereby the mastery gains.'"

CAREW'S Survey of Cornwall, p. 130.

Of St. Keyne, whose death is placed in the year 490, and whose festival used to be celebrated in Brecknockshire, on October 8, there is a brief account in the English Martyrologe. Father Cressy, the Benedictine, gives her history more fully. "Illustrious," says he, "she was for her birth, being the daughter of Braganus, prince of that province in Wales, which, from him, was afterwards called Brecknockshire; but more illustrious for her zeal to preserve her chastity, for which reason she was called in the British language Keynevayre, that is, Keyna the Virgin."

2. This Prince Braganus, or Brachanus, the father of St. Keyna, is * said to have had twelve sons and twelve daughters by his lady, called Marcella, daughter of Theodorice son of Tethphalt, Prince of Garthmatrin, the same region called afterward Brecknock. Their first born son was St. Canoc; and their eldest daughter was Gladus, who was mother of Caducus by St. Gunley, a holy king of the southern Britons. The second daughter was Melaria, the mother of the holy Archbishop St. David. Thus writes Capgrave, neither doth he mention any other of their children besides St. Keyna.

3. But in Giraldus Cambrensis † another daughter is commemorated, called St. Almedha. And David Powel ‡ makes mention of a fifth named Tydvaël, who was the wife of Congen the son of Cadel, Prince of Powisland; and mother of Broelmael, surnamed Seithroc, who slew Ethelfred King of the Northumbers.

4. Concerning the Holy Virgin St. Keyna, we find this narration in the author of her life, extant in Capgrave; § "She was of royal blood, being daughter of Braganus, Prince of Brecknockshire. When she came to ripe years many noble persons sought her in marriage; but she utterly refused that state, having consecrated her virginity to our Lord by a perpetual vow. For which cause she was afterward by the Britons called Keyn-wiri, that is, Keyna the Virgin."

5. At length she determined to forsake her country and find out some desert place, where she might attend to contemplation. Therefore, directing her journey beyond Severn, and there meeting with certain woody places, she made her request to the prince of that country that she might be permitted to serve God in that solitude. His answer was, that he was very willing to grant her request, but that that place did so swarm with serpents that neither men nor beasts could inhabit it. But she constantly replied, that her firm trust was in the name and assistance of Almighty God, to drive all that poisonous brood out of that region.

6. Hereupon the place was granted to the Holy Virgin; who presently prostrating herself in fervent prayer to God, obtained of him to change all the serpents and vipers there into stones. And to this day the stones in that region do resemble the windings of serpents through all the fields and villages, as if they had been framed so by the hand of the engraver.

7. Our learned Camden, in his diligent search after antiquities, seems to have visited this country, being a part of Somersetshire, though he is willing to disparage the miracle. His words are, "On the western bank of Avon is seen the town of Cainsham. Some are of opinion that it was named so from Keyna, a most holy British Virgin, who, according to the credulous persuasion of former ages, is believed to have turned serpents into stones; because such like miracles of sporting nature are there sometimes found in the quarries. I myself saw a stone brought from thence representing a serpent roiled up into a spire; the head of it stuck out in the outward surface, and the end of the tail terminated in the centre."

8. But let us prosecute the life of this holy Virgin. Many years being spent by her in this solitary place, and the fame of her sanctity every where divulged, and many oratories built by her, her nephew St. Cadoc performing a pilgrimage to the Mount of St. Michael, met there with his blessed aunt, St. Keyna, at whose sight he was replenished with great joy. And being desirous to bring her back to her own country, the inhabitants of that region would not permit him. But afterward, by the admonition of an angel, the holy Maid returned to the place of her nativity, where, on the top of a hillcock seated at the foot of a high mountain, she made a little habitation for herself; and by her prayers to God obtained a spring there to flow out of the earth, which, by the merits of the Holy Virgin, afforded health to divers infirmities.

9. But when the time of her consummation approached, one night she, by the revelation of the Holy Ghost, saw in a vision, as it were, a fiery pillar, the base whereof was fixed on her bed; now her bed was the pavement strewn over with a few branches of trees. And in this vision two angels appeared to her; one of which approaching respectfully to her, seemed to take off the sackcloth with which she was covered, and instead thereof to put on her a smock of fine linen, and over that a tunic of purple, and last of all a mantle all woven with gold. Which having done, he thus said to her, "Prepare yourself to come with us, that we may lead you into your heavenly Father's kingdom." Hereupon she wept with excess of joy, and endeavoring to follow the angels she awaked, and found her body inflamed with a fever, so that she perceived her end was near.

10. Therefore, sending for her nephew Cadocus, she said to him, "This is the place above all others beloved by me; here my memory shall be perpetuated. This place I will often visit in spirit if it may be permitted me. And I am assured it shall be permitted me, because our Lord has granted me this place as a certain inheritance. The time will come when this place shall be inhabited by a sinful people, which notwithstanding I will violently root out of this seat. My tomb shall be a long while unknown, till the coming of other people, whom, by my prayers, I shall bring hither; them will I protect and defend; and in this place shall the name of our Lord be blessed for ever."

11. After this, her soul being ready to depart out of her body, she saw standing before her a troop of heavenly angels, ready, joyfully, to receive her soul, and to transport it without any fear or danger from her spiritual enemies. Which, having told to those who stood by, her blessed soul was freed from the prison of her body, on the eighth day before the Ides of October. In her dissolution, her face smiled, and was all of a rosy color; and so sweet a fragraney proceeded from her sacred virgin body, that those who were present thought themselves in the joy of Paradise. St. Cadocus buried her in her own oratory, where for many years she had led a most holy, mortified life, very acceptable to God.

Church History of Brittany, Book X., Ch. 14.

Such is the history of St. Keyne, as related by F. Serenus Cressy, permissu superiorum, et approbatione Doctorum. There was evidently a scheme of setting up a shrine connected with the legend. In one part it was well conceived, for the Cornu Ammonis is no where so frequently found as near Keynsham; fine specimens are to be seen over the doors of many of the houses there, and I have often observed fragments among the stones which were broken up to mend the road. The Welsh seem nearly to have forgotten this saint. Mr. Owen, in his Cambrian Biography, enumerates two daughters of Brychan, Ceindrech, and Ceinwen, both ranked among saints, and the latter having two churches dedicated to her in Mona. One of these is probably St. Keyne.

A WELL there is in the west country,
And a clearer one never was seen;
There is not a wife in the west country
But has heard of the Well of St. Keyne.

An oak and an elm-tree stand beside,
And behind doth an ash-tree grow,
And a willow from the bank above
Droops to the water below.

A traveller came to the Well of St. Keyne;
Joyfully he drew nigh,
For from cock-crow he had been travelling,
And there was not a cloud in the sky.

He drank of the water so cool and clear,
For thirsty and hot was he;
And he sat down upon the bank
Under the willow-tree.

There came a man from the house hard by,
At the Well to fill his pail;
On the Well-side he rested it,
And he bade the Stranger hail.

“Now art thou a bachelor, Stranger?” quoth he;
“For an if thou hast a wife,
The happiest draught thou hast drank this day
That ever thou didst in thy life.

“Or has thy good woman, if one thou hast,
Ever here in Cornwall been?
For an if she have, I’ll venture my life,
She has drank of the Well of St. Keyne.”

“I have left a good woman who never was here,”
The Stranger he made reply;
“But that my draught should be the better for that,
I pray you answer me why.”

“St. Keyne,” quoth the Cornish-man, “many a
Drank of this crystal Well; [time
And before the Angel summon’d her,
She laid on the water a spell.

“If the Husband of this gifted Well
Shall drink before his Wife,

A happy man thenceforth is he,
For he shall be Master for life.

“But if the Wife should drink of it first,— God help the Husband then!”
The Stranger stoop’d to the Well of St. Keyne,
And drank of the water again.

“You drank of the Well, I warrant, betimes?”
He to the Cornish-man said:
But the Cornish-man smiled as the Stranger spake,
And sheepishly shook his head.

“I hasten’d as soon as the wedding was done,
And left my Wife in the porch;
But i’ faith she had been wiser than me,
For she took a bottle to church.”

BISHOP BRUNO.

“Bruno, the Bishop of Herbiopolitanum, sailing in the river of Danubius, with Henry the Third, then Emperor, being not far from a place which the Germanes call Ben Strudel, or the devouring gulfe, which is neere unto Grinon, a castle in Austria, a spirit was heard clamoring aloud, ‘Ho, ho, Bishop Bruno, whither art thou travelling? but dispose of thyselfe how thoo pleasest, thou shalt be my prey and spoil.’ At the hearing of these words they were all stupified, and the Bishop with the rest crossed and blessed themselves. The issue was, that within a short time after, the Bishop, feasting with the Emperor in a castle belonging to the Countesse of Esburch, a rafter fell from the roof of the chamber wherein they sate, and strooke him dead at the table.” — HEYWOOD’S Hierarchy of the Blessed Angels.

BISHOP BRUNO awoke in the dead midnight,
And he heard his heart beat loud with affright:
He dreamt he had rung the palace bell,
And the sound it gave was his passing knell.

Bishop Bruno smiled at his fears so vain;
He turned to sleep, and he dreamt again;
He rang at the palace gate once more,
And Death was the Porter that open’d the door.

He started up at the fearful dream, [scream;
And he heard at his window the screech-owl
Bishop Bruno slept no more that night,—
Oh! glad was he when he saw the day-light!

Now he goes forth in proud array,
For he with the Emperor dines to-day;
There was not a Baron in Germany
That went with a nobler train than he.

Before and behind his soldiers ride;
The people throng’d to see their pride,
They bow’d the head, and the knee they bent,
But nobody bless’d him as he went.

So he went on stately and proud,
When he heard a voice that cried aloud,

THE WOODS OF THE WOODS

The woods of the woods
are full of the wood of the woods
and the wood of the woods

"Ho! ho! Bishop Bruno! you travel with glee;
But I would have you know, you travel to me!"

Behind, and before, and on either side,
He look'd, but nobody he espied;
And the Bishop at that grew cold with fear,
For he heard the words distinct and clear.

And when he rang at the palace bell,
He almost expected to hear his knell;
And when the Porter turn'd the key,
He almost expected Death to see.

But soon the Bishop recover'd his glee,
For the Emperor welcomed him royally;
And now the tables were spread, and there
Were choicest wines and dainty fare.

And now the Bishop had bless'd the meat,
When a voice was heard as he sat in his seat,—
"With the Emperor now you are dining with glee,
But know, Bishop Bruno, you sup with me!"

The Bishop then grew pale with affright,
And suddenly lost his appetite;
All the wine and dainty cheer
Could not comfort his heart, that was sick with fear.

But by little and little recovered he,
For the wine went flowing merrily,
Till at length he forgot his former dread,
And his cheeks again grew rosy red.

When he sat down to the royal fare,
Bishop Bruno was the saddest man there;
But when the masquers enter'd the hall,
He was the merriest man of all.

Then from amid the masquers' crowd
There went a voice hollow and loud,—
"You have past the day, Bishop Bruno, in glee;
But you must pass the night with me!"

His cheek grows pale, and his eyeballs glare,
And stiff round his tonsure bristled his hair;
With that there came one from the masquers' band,
And took the Bishop by the hand.

The bony hand suspended his breath;
His marrow grew cold at the touch of Death;
On saints in vain he attempted to call;
Bishop Bruno fell dead in the palace hall.

BATTLE OF BLENHEIM.

1.

It was a summer evening;
Old Kaspar's work was done,

And he before his cottage door
Was sitting in the sun;
And by him sported on the green
His little grandchild Wilhelmine.

2.

She saw her brother Peterkin
Roll something large and round,
Which he beside the rivulet,
In playing there, had found;
He came to ask what he had found,
That was so large, and smooth, and round.

3.

Old Kaspar took it from the boy,
Who stood expectant by;
And then the old man shook his head,
And with a natural sigh,
"Tis some poor fellow's skull," said he,
"Who fell in the great victory.

4.

"I find them in the garden,
For there's many here about;
And often, when I go to plough,
The ploughshare turns them out;
For many thousand men," said he,
"Were slain in that great victory."

5.

"Now tell us what 'twas all about,"
Young Peterkin he cries;
And little Wilhelmine looks up
With wonder-waiting eyes;
"Now tell us all about the war,
And what they fought each other for."

6.

"It was the English," Kaspar cried,
"Who put the French to rout;
But what they fought each other for,
I could not well make out;
But every body said," quoth he,
"That 'twas a famous victory."

7.

"My father lived at Blenheim then,
Yon little stream hard by;
They burnt his dwelling to the ground,
And he was forced to fly;
So with his wife and child he fled,
Nor had he where to rest his head.

8.

"With fire and sword the country round
Was wasted far and wide,
And many a childing mother then,
And new-born baby died;
But things like that, you know, must be
At every famous victory.

9.

"They say it was a shocking sight
After the field was won;
For many thousand bodies here

Lay rotting in the sun;
But things like that, you know, must be
After a famous victory.

10.

“Great praise the Duke of Marlbro’ won,
And our good Prince Eugene.”
“Why, ’twas a very wicked thing!”
Said little Wilhelmine.
“Nay — nay — my little girl,” quoth he,
“It was a famous victory.”

11.

“And every body praised the Duke,
Who this great fight did win.”
“But what good came of it at last?”
Quoth little Peterkin.
“Why, that I cannot tell,” said he;
“But ’twas a famous victory.”

A TRUE BALLAD

ST. ANTIDIUS, THE POPE, AND THE DEVIL.

Deste Atendio cuentan las estorias que le avino, que el martes despues de Ramos, passo por la puente de un rio que ha nombre Divino; e vio en un campo gran compañía de diablos que estaban contado a sus príncipes los males que fazien por las tierras; e entre todos los otros estava un negro a manera de Etyopiano: e alabavase que avie siete años que andava lidiando con el Papa por le fazer pecar; e nunca pudiera sy non entonces que le fiziera fazer ya que pecado muy grave; e esto provava lo por la sandalia del apostoligo que traye. E Sant Atendio que vido aquello, llamo aquel diablo, e conjuro por la virtud de Dios e por la Santa Cruz que lo llevase a Roma; e cavalgo en el; e llevo a Roma, el jueves de la cena a hora de missa, el Papa que quiere revestirse para dezir missa; dexo sant Atendio al diablo a la puerta e dixol que lo atendiese; e el entro dentro e saeo el Papa aparte, e dixol que fiziesse penitencia de aquel pecado; e el quiso lo negar, mas fizo gelo otorgar el santo obispo con a sandalia que le dio. E fizo el Papa penitencia; e dixo sant Atendio la missa en su lugar, e consagro la crisma; e tomo una partida della para sy; e despues del Papa, e salio fuera, e cavalgo en el diablo, e llevo lo a su argobispado el sabado de pascua a hora de missa. — CORONICA DE ESPAÑA.

This Saint Atendio, according to the Chronica General, was Bishop of Vesytana in Gaul, and martyred by the Vandals in the year 411. The Spaniards have a tradition that he was Bishop of Jaen: they say, “that as the Devil was crossing the sea with this unwelcome load upon his back, he artfully endeavored to make Atendio pronounce the name of Jesus, which, as it breaks all spells, would have enabled him to throw him off into the water; but that the Bishop, understanding his intent, only replied, Arre Diablo, ‘Gee-up Devil!’ and they add, “that when he arrived at Rome, his hat was still covered with the snow which had fallen upon it while he was passing the Alps, and that the hat is still shown at Rome in confirmation of the story and the miracle.” Feyjoo has two letters upon this whimsical legend among his Cartas Eruditas. In the first (T. 1, Carta 24,) he replies to a correspondent who had gravely inquired his opinion upon the story, “De buen humor,” says he, “estaba V. nd. quando le ocurrió inquirir mi dictamen, sobre la Historieta de el Obispo de Jaen, de quien se cuenta, que fue a Roma en una noche, caballero sobre la espalda de un Diablo de alquiler: Triste de mi, si essa curiosidad se hace contagiosa, y dan muchas en seguir el exemplo de V. nd. consultandome sobre cuentos de niños y viejas.” Nevertheless, though he thus treats the story as an old wife’s tale, he bestows some reasoning upon it. “As he heard it,” he says, “it did not appear whether the use which the Bishop made of the Devil were licit or illicit; that is, whether he made use of him as a wizard, by virtue of a compact, or by virtue of authority, having the permission of the Most High so to do. In either case there is a great incongruity. In the first, inasmuch as it is not credible that the Devil should voluntarily serve the Bishop for the purpose of preventing a great evil to the church: — I say voluntarily, because the notion that a compact is so binding upon the Devil that he can in no ways resist the pleasure of the person with whom he has contracted es cosa de Theologos de Vode à la cinta. In the second, because the journey being designed for a holy purpose, it is more conformable to reason that it should have been executed by the ministry of a good angel than of a bad one; as, for instance, Habakkuk was transported by the ministry of a good angel from Judea to Babylon, that he might carry food to the imprisoned Daniel. If you should oppose to me the example of Christ, who was carried by the Devil to the pinnacle of the temple, I reply, that there are two manifest disparities. The first, that Christ conducted himself in this case passively and permissively; the second, that the Devil placed him upon the pinnacle of the Temple, not for any good end, but with a most wicked intention. “But,” pursues the good Benedictine, “why should I fatigue myself with arguing? I hold the story unworthy of being critically examined till it be shown me written in some history, either ecclesiastical or profane, which is entitled to some credit.”

Soon after this letter was published, another correspondent informed Feyjoo, that the story in question was written in the General Chronicle of King D. Alphonso the Wise. This incited him to farther inquiry. He found the same legend in the Speculum Historiale of Vincentius Belvacensis, and there discovered that the saint was called Antidius, not Athendius, and that the scene lay upon the river Dunius instead of the river Divinus. Here too he found a reference to Sigebertus Gemblacensis; and in that author, the account which the Chronieler had followed and the explanation of his errors in the topography: his Vesytania proving to be Besançon, and the river the Doubs, which the Romans called Dubius, Dubis, and Aduadubis. But he found also to his comfort, that though Jean Jacques Chifflet, a physician of Besançon, had endeavored to prove the truth of the story for the honor of his nation or city, in a book entitled Vesontio Civitas Imperialis Libera Sequanorum, and had cited certain ancient Acts and Breviaries, in support of it, the veracious Bollandists had decided that these Acts were apocryphal, the Breviaries not to be believed in this point, and the whole story a fable which had been equally related of St. Maximus Taurinensis and Pope Leo the Great. These Bollandists strain at a gnat, and swallow an Aulay with equal gravity. Fortified by their authority, Feyjoo, who was worthy to have belonged to a more enlightened church, triumphantly dismissed the legend, and observed, “that the contriver was a chunsky fabler to make the Devil spend two days upon the journey, which,” as he says, “is slow travelling for an infernal postilion.” (Cartas Eruditas, T. 2, C. 21.) The discussion, however, reminded him of a curious story, which he thus relates: — “There is in this city of Oviedo a poor Porter, called by name Pedro Moreno, of whom a tale is told similar in substance to this of the Bishop of Jaen. The circumstance is related in this manner. Some letters had been delivered to him which he was to carry to Madrid with more than ordinary diligence, because expedition was of importance. At a little distance from this city, he met with a friar, who offered to join company with him for the journey: to this he objected, upon the ground, that he was going in great haste, and that the friar would not be able to keep pace with him; but in fine, the friar prevailed upon him to let it be so, and at the same time gave him a walking-stick for his use. So they began to travel together, and that so well, that Valladolid being forty leagues (160 miles) from Oviedo, they got beyond that city on the first day to dinner. The rest of the journey was performed with the same celerity. This story spread through the whole place, and was believed by all the vulgar (and by some also who were not of the vulgar) when it came to my ears: the authority referred to was the man himself, who had related it to an infinite number of persons. I sent for him to my cell to examine him. He affirmed that the story was true, but by questioning and cross-questioning him concerning the particulars, I made him fall into many contradictions. Moreover, I found that he had told the story with many variations to different persons. What I clearly ascertained was, that he had heard the legend of the Bishop of Jaen, and thought to become a famous man, by making a like fable believed of himself. I believe that many persons were undeceived when my inquiry was known. But before this examination was made, to how many places had the report of this miraculous journey extended, where the exposure of the falsehood will never reach! Perhaps, if this writing should not prevent it, the journey of Pedro Moreno, the Porter, will one day be little less famous in Spain than that of the Bishop of Jaen."—Cartas Eruditas, T. 1, C. 21.

According to Marullus, as quoted by Zuinger in his great Theatrum Humanæ Vitæ, i. 417, Antidius was Bishop of Tours, and Zosimus was the Pope whom he served so essentially by riding post to his aid.

A very incorrect copy of this Ballad was printed and sold by J. Bailey, 116 Chancery Lane, price 6d., with a print from a juvenile design by G. Cruickshank. I think myself fortunate in having accidentally obtained this broadside, which, for its rarity, will one day be deemed valuable in a collection of the works of a truly original and inimitable artist.

It is Antidius the Bishop
Who now at even tide,
Taking the air and saying a prayer,
Walks by the river side.

The Devil had business that evening,
And he upon earth would go;
For it was in the month of August,
And the weather was close below.

He had his books to settle;
And up to earth he hied,
To do it there in the evening air,
All by the river side.

His imps came flying around him,
Of his affairs to tell;
From the north, and the south, and the east, and the west,
They brought him the news that he liked best,
Of things they had done,
And the souls they had won,
And how they sped well
In the service of Hell.

There came a devil posting in,
Return'd from his employ;
Seven years had he been gone from Hell;
And now he came grinning for joy.

"Seven years," quoth he, "of trouble and toil
Have I labor'd the Pope to win;
And I to-day have caught him;
He hath done a deadly sin!"
And then he took the Devil's book,
And wrote the deed therein.

Oh, then King Beelzebub, for joy,
He drew his mouth so wide
You might have seen his iron teeth,
Four and forty from side to side.

He wagg'd his ears, he twisted his tail,
He knew not for joy what to do;
In his hoofs and his horns, in his heels and his corns,
It tickled him all through.

The Bishop, who beheld all this,
Straight how to act bethought him;
He leap'd upon the Devil's back,
And by the horns he caught him.

And he said a Pater-noster
As fast as he could say,
And made a cross on the Devil's head,
And bade him to Rome away.

Away, away, the Devil flew
All through the clear moonlight;
I warrant who saw them on their way
He did not sleep that night.

Without bridle, or saddle, or whip, or spur,
Away they go like the wind;
The beads of the Bishop are hanging before,
And the tail of the Devil behind.

They met a Witch, and she hail'd them,
As soon as she came within call;
"Ave Maria!" the Bishop exclaim'd;
It frightened her broomstick, and she got a fall.

He ran against a shooting star,
So fast for fear did he sail,
And he singed the beard of the Bishop
Against a comet's tail;
And he pass'd between the horns of the moon,
With Antidius on his back;
And there was an eclipse that night
Which was not in the almanac.

The Bishop, just as they set out,
To tell his beads begun;
And he was by the bed of the Pope
Before the string was done.

The Pope fell down upon his knees,
In terror and confusion,
And he confess'd the deadly sin,
And he had absolution.

And all the Popes in bliss that be,
Sung, O be joyful! then;
And all the Popes in bale that be,
They howl'd for envy then;
For they before kept jubilee,
Expecting his good company,
Down in the Devil's den.

But what was this the Pope had done
To bind his soul to Hell?

Ah! that is the mystery of this wonderful history,
And I wish that I could tell!

But would you know, there you must go;
You can easily find the way;
It is a broad and a well-known road,
That is travell'd by night and by day.

And you must look in the Devil's book;
You will find one debt that was never paid yet,
If you search the leaves throughout;
And that is the mystery of this wonderful history,
And the way to find it out.

GONZALO HERMIGUEZ.

This story is related at length by Bernardo de Brito, in his Cronica de Cister., l. vi. c. 1, where he has preserved, also, part of a poem by Gonzalo Hermiguez. The verses are said to be the oldest in the Portuguese language; and Brito says there were more of them, but he thought it sufficient to cite these for his purpose. If they had been correctly printed, it might have been difficult to make out their meaning; but from a text so corrupted, it is impossible.

1.

In arms and in anger, in struggle and strife,
Gonzalo Hermiguez won his wife;
He slew the Moor who from the fray
Was rescuing Fatima that day;
In vain she shriek'd: Gonzalo press'd
The Moorish prisoner to his breast:
That breast in iron was array'd;
The gauntlet was bloody that grasp'd the Maid;
Through the beaver-sight his eye
Glared fierce, and red, and wrathfully;
And while he bore the captive away,
His heart rejoiced, and he blest the day.

2.

Under the lemon walk's odorous shade
Gonzalo Hermiguez wooed the Maid;
The ringlets of his raven hair
Waved upon the evening air,
And gentle thoughts, that raise a sigh,
Softened the warrior's dark-brown eye,
When he with passion and sweet song
Wooed her to forgive the wrong.
Till she no more could say him nay;
And the Moorish Maiden blest the day
When Gonzalo bore her a captive away.

3.

To the holy Church, with pomp and pride,
Gonzalo Hermiguez led his bride.
In the sacred font that happy day
Her stain of sin was wash'd away;
There did the Moorish Maiden claim
Another faith, another name;

There, as a Christian convert, plight
Her faith unto the Christian Knight;
And Oriana blest the day
When Gonzalo bore her a captive away.

4.

Of Affonso Henriques' court the pride
Were Gonzalo Hermiguez and his bride;
In battle strongest of the strong,
In peace the master of the song,
Gonzalo of all was first in fame,
The loveliest she and the happiest dame.
But ready for her heavenly birth,
She was not left to fade on earth;
In that dread hour, with Heaven in view,
The comfort of her faith she knew,
And blest on her death-bed the day
When Gonzalo bore her a captive away.

5.

Through a long and holy life,
Gonzalo Hermiguez mourn'd his wife.
The arms wherewith he won his bride,
Sword, shield, and lance, were laid aside.
That head which the high-plumed helm had worn
Was now of its tresses shaven and shorn,
A Monk of Alcobaca he
Eminent for sanctity.
Contented in his humble cell
The meekest of the meek to dwell,
His business was, by night and day,
For Oriana's soul to pray.
Never day did he let pass
But scored to her account a mass;
Devoutly for the dear one dead
With self-inflicted stripes he bled;
This was Gonzalo's sole employ,
This was Gonzalo's only joy;
Till love, thus purified, became
A holy, yea, a heavenly flame;
And now in heaven doth bless the day
When he bore the Moorish captive away.

QUEEN ORRACA

AND

THE FIVE MARTYRS OF MOROCCO.

This legend is related in the Chronicle of Affonso II., and in the Historia Serafica of Fr. Manoel da Esperança.

1.

THE Friars five have girt their loins,
And taken staff in hand;
And never shall those Friars again
Hear mass in Christian land.

They went to Queen Orraca,
To thank her and bless her then;

And Queen Orraca in tears
Knelt to the holy men.

“Three things, Queen Orraca,
We prophesy to you:
Hear us, in the name of God!
For time will prove them true

“In Morocco we must martyr'd be;
Christ hath vouchsafed it thus:
We shall shed our blood for Him
Who shed his blood for us.

“To Coimbra shall our bodies be brought,
Such being the will divine;
That Christians may behold and feel
Blessings at our shrine.

“And when unto that place of rest
Our bodies shall draw nigh,
Who sees us first, the King or you,
That one that night must die.

“Fare thee well, Queen Orraca!
For thy soul a mass we will say,
Every day as long as we live,
And on thy dying day.”

The Friars they blest her, one by one,
Where she knelt on her knee;
And they departed to the land
Of the Moors beyond the sea.

2.

“What news, O King Affonso,
What news of the Friars five?
Have they preach'd to the Miramolin;
And are they still alive?”

“They have fought the fight, O Queen!
They have run the race;
In robes of white they hold the palm
Before the throne of Grace.

“All naked in the sun and air
Their mangled bodies lie;
What Christian dared to bury them,
By the bloody Moors would die.”

3.

“What news, O King Affonso,
Of the Martyrs five what news?
Doth the bloody Miramolin
Their burial still refuse?”

“That on a dunghill they should rot,
The bloody Moor decreed;
That their dishonor'd bodies should
The dogs and vultures feed;—

“But the thunder of God roll'd over them,
And the lightning of God flash'd round;
Nor thing impure, nor man impure,
Could approach the holy ground.

“A thousand miracles appall'd
The cruel Pagan's mind;
Our brother Pedro brings them here,
In Coimbra to be shrined.”

4.

Every altar in Coimbra
Is dress'd for the festival day;
All the people in Coimbra
Are dight in their richest array;—

Every bell in Coimbra
Doth merrily, merrily ring;
The Clergy and the Knights await
To go forth with the Queen and the King.

“Come forth, come forth, Queen Orraca;
We make the procession stay.”
“I beseech thee, King Affonso,
Go you alone to-day.

“I have pain in my head this morning;
I am ill at heart also:
Go without me, King Affonso,
For I am too faint to go.”

“The relics of the Martyrs five
All maladies can cure;
They will requite the charity
You show'd them once, be sure:

“Come forth then, Queen Orraca;
You make the procession stay:
It were a scandal and a sin
To abide at home to-day.”

Upon her palfrey she is set,
And forward then they go;
And over the long bridge they pass,
And up the long hill wind slow.

“Prick forward, King Affonso,
And do not wait for me;
To meet them close by Coimbra,
It were discourtesy;—

“A little while I needs must wait,
Till this sore pain be gone;—
I will proceed the best I can;
But do you and your Knights prick on.

The King and his Knights prick'd up the hill
Faster than before;
The King and his Knights have topp'd the hill,
And now they are seen no more.

As the King and his Knights went down the hill,
A wild boar cross'd the way;
“Follow him! follow him!” cried the King;
“We have time by the Queen's delay.”

A-hunting of the boar astray
Is King Affonso gone:
Slowly, slowly, but straight the while,
Queen Orraca is coming on.

And winding now the train appears
Between the olive-trees :
Queen Orraca alighted then,
And fell upon her knees.

The Friars of Alanquer came first,
And next the relics past ; —
Queen Orraca look'd to see
The King and his Knights come last.

She heard the horses tramp behind ;
At that she turn'd her face :
King Affonso and his Knights came up
All panting from the chase.

“Have pity upon my poor soul,
Holy Martyrs five !” cried she :
“Holy Mary, Mother of God, Virgin, pray for me !”

5.

That day in Coimbra
Many a heart was gay ;
But the heaviest heart in Coimbra
Was that poor Queen's that day.

The festival is over,
The sun hath sunk in the west ;
All the people in Coimbra
Have betaken themselves to rest.

Queen Orraca's Father Confessor
At midnight is awake,
Kneeling at the Martyrs' shrine,
And praying for her sake.

Just at the midnight hour, when all
Was still as still could be,
Into the Church of Santa Cruz
Came a saintly company.

All in robes of russet gray,
Poorly were they dight ;
Each one girdled with a cord,
Like a Friar Minorite.

But from those robes of russet gray,
There flow'd a heavenly light ;
For each one was the blessed soul
Of a Friar Minorite.

Brighter than their brethren,
Among the beautiful band,
Five were there who each did bear
A palm-branch in his hand.

He who led the brethren,
A living man was he ;
And yet he shone the brightest
Of all the company.

Before the steps of the altar,
Each one bow'd his head ;
And then with solemn voice they sung
The Service of the Dead.

“And who are ye, ye blessed Saints ?”
The Father Confessor said ;
“And for what happy soul sing ye
The Service of the Dead ?”

“These are the souls of our brethren in bliss ;
The Martyrs five are we :
And this is our father Francisco,
Among us bodily.

“We are come hither to perform
Our promise to the Queen ;
Go thou to King Affonso,
And say what thou hast seen.”

There was loud knocking at the door,
As the heavenly vision fled ;
And the porter called to the Confessor,
To tell him the Queen was dead.

THE
OLD WOMAN OF BERKELEY,

A BALLAD,

SHOWING HOW AN OLD WOMAN RODE DOUBLE,
AND WHO RODE BEFORE HER.

A. D. 852. Circa dies istos, mulier quædam malefica, in villâ quæ Berkeleya dicitur degens, gule amatricæ ac petulantia, flagitiis modum usque in senium et auguriis non ponens, usque ad mortem impudica permansit. Hæc die quadam cum sederet ad prandium, cornicula quam pro delitiis pasebat, nescio quid garrere cepit ; quo audita, mulieris cultellus de manu excidit, simul et facies pallescere cepit, et emissio rugitu, hodie, inquit, accipiam grande incommodum, hodieque ad sulceni ultimum meum pervenit aratum. Quo dicto, nuncius doloris intravit ; muliere vero percunctata ad quid veniret, offero, inquit, tibi filii tui obitum et totius familiae ejus ex subitâ ruinâ interitum. Hoc quoque dolore mulier permoto, lecto protinus decubuit graviter infirmata ; sentiasque morbum subrepere ad vitalia, liberos quos habuit superstites, monachum videlicet et monacham, per epistolam invitavit ; advenientes autem voce singultiente alloquitur. Ego, inquit, o pueri, meo miserabili fato demoniacis semper artibus inserviivi ; ego omnia vitiorum sentina, ego illecebrarum omnium fui magistra. Erat tamen mihi inter hæc mala spes vestrae religionis, quæ meam solidaret animam desperatum ; vos expectabam propugnatores contra demones, tutores contra sævissimos hostes. Nunc igitur quoniam ad finem vitæ perveni, rogo vos per materna ubera, ut mea tentatis alleviare tormenta. Insuite me defunctam in corio cervino, ac deinde in sarcophago lapideo supponite, operculumque ferro et plumbo constringite, ac demum lapidem tribus cathenis ferreis et fortissimis circumdantes, clericos quinquaginta psalmodiarum cantores, et tot per tres dies presbyteros missarum celebratores applicate, qui feroces lenigent adversariorum incursus. Ita si tribus noctibus secunda jaceo, quartâ die me infodite humo.

Factumque est ut præceperat illis. Sed, proh dolor ! nil preces, nil lacrymæ, nil demum valere cathene. Primis enim duabus noctibus, cum chori psallentium corpori assistebant, advenientes Demones ostium ecclesie confregerunt ingenti obice clausum, extremasque cathenas negotio levi dirumpunt ; mediâ autem quæ fortior erat, illibata manebat. Tertiâ autem nocte, circa gallicinium, strepitu hostium adventantium, omne monasterium visum est a fundamento moveri. Unus ergo demonum, et vultu cæteris terribilior et staturâ eminentior, januas Ecclesie impetu violento concussas in fragmenta dejecit. Divexerunt clerici cum laicis, metu steterunt omnium capilli, et psalmodum concensus defecit. Dæmon ergo gestu ut videbatur arroganti ad sepulchrum accedens, et nomen mulieris modicum ingeminans, surgere imperavit. Quâ respondente, quod nequiret pro vuculis, jam malo tuo, inquit, solveris; et protinus catenam quæ cæterorum ferocium dæmonum deluserat, velut stuppeum vinculum rumpebat. Operculum etiam sepulchri pede depellens, mulierem palam omnibus ab ecclesiâ extraxit, ubi præforibus niger equus superbe hinciens videbatur, uncis ferreis et clavis undique confixus, super quem misera mulier projecta, ab oculis assistentium cecevit. Audiebantur tamen clamores per quatuor fere miliaria horribiles, auxilium postulantes.

Ista itaque quæ retuli incredibilia non erant, si legatur beati Gregorii dialogus, in quo refert, hominem in ecclesiâ sepultum, a dæmonibus foras ejectum. Et apud Francos Carolus Martellus insignis vir fortitudinis, qui Saracenos Galliam ingressos, Hispaniam redire compulsi, exactis vitæ suæ diebus, in Ecclesiâ beati Dionysii legitur fuisse sepultus. Sed quia patrimonia, cum arcibus omnium fere ecclesiarum Gallie, pro stipendio commilitonum suorum mutilaverat, miserabiliter a malignis spiritibus de sepulchro corporaliter avulsus, usque in hodiernum diem nusquam comparuit. — MATTHEW OF WESTMINSTER.

This story is also related by Olaus Magnus, and in the Nuremberg Chronicle. But William of Malmesbury seems to have been the original authority, and he had the story from an eye-witness. "When I shall have related it," he says, "the credit of the narrative will not be shaken, though the minds of the hearers should be incredulous, for I have heard it from a man of such character who would swear he had seen it, that I should blush to disbelieve." — Sharpe's WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY, p. 264.

The Raven croak'd as she sat at her meal,
And the Old Woman knew what he said,
And she grew pale at the Raven's tale,
And sicken'd, and went to her bed.

"Now fetch me my children, and fetch them with speed,"
The Old Woman of Berkeley said;
"The Monk my son, and my daughter the Nun,
'Bid them hasten, or I shall be dead."

The Monk her son, and her daughter the Nun,
Their way to Berkeley went;
And they have brought, with pious thought,
The holy sacrament.

The Old Woman shriek'd as they enter'd her door;
And she cried with a voice of despair,
"Now take away the sacrament,
For its presence I cannot bear!"

Her lip it trembled with agony;
The sweat ran down her brow;
"I have tortures in store for evermore,
But spare me, my children, now!"

Away they sent the sacrament;
The fit it left her weak;
She look'd at her children with ghastly eyes,
And faintly struggled to speak.

"All kind of sin I have rioted in,
And the judgment now must be;
But I secured my children's souls;
Oh! pray, my children, for me!"

"I have 'noited myself with infants' fat;
The fiends have been my slaves;
From sleeping babes I have suck'd the breath;
And, breaking by charms the sleep of death,
I have call'd the dead from their graves.

"And the Devil will fetch me now in fire,
My witchcrafts to atone;
And I, who have troubled the dead man's grave,
Shall never have rest in my own.

"Bless, I entreat, my winding sheet,
My children, I beg of you;
And with holy water sprinkle my shroud,
And sprinkle my coffin too.

"And let me be chain'd in my coffin of stone,
And fasten it strong, I implore,
With iron bars, and with three chains
Chain it to the church floor.

"And bless the chains, and sprinkle them;
And let fifty Priests stand round,
Who night and day the mass may say
Where I lie on the ground.

"And see that fifty Choristers
Beside the bier attend me,
And day and night, by the tapers' light,
With holy hymns defend me.

"Let the church bells all, both great and small,
Be toll'd by night and day,
To drive from thence the fiends who come
To bear my body away.

"And ever have the church-door barr'd
After the even-song;
And I beseech you, children dear,
Let the bars and bolts be strong.

"And let this be three days and nights,
My wretched corpse to save;
Till the fourth morning keep me safe,
And then I may rest in my grave."

The Old Woman of Berkeley laid her down,
And her eyes grew deadly dim;
Short came her breath, and the struggle of death
Did loosen every limb.

They bless'd the old woman's winding sheet
With rites and prayers due;
With holy water they sprinkled her shroud,
And they sprinkled her coffin too.

And they chain'd her in her coffin of stone,
And with iron barr'd it down,
And in the church with three strong chains
They chain'd it to the ground.

And they bless'd the chains, and sprinkled them
And fifty Priests stood round,
By night and day the mass to say
Where she lay on the ground.

And fifty sacred Choristers
Beside the bier attend her,
Who day and night, by the tapers' light,
Should with holy hymns defend her.

To see the Priests and Choristers
It was a goodly sight,
Each holding, as it were a staff,
A taper burning bright.

And the church bells all, both great and small,
Did toll so loud and long ;
And they have barr'd the church door hard,
After the even-song.

And the first night the tapers' light
Burnt steadily and clear ;
But they without a hideous rout
Of angry fiends could hear ; —

A hideous roar at the church door,
Like a long thunder peal ;
And the Priests they pray'd, and the Choristers sung
Louder, in fearful zeal.

Loud toll'd the bell ; the priests pray'd well ;
The tapers they burnt bright ;
The Monk her son, and her daughter the Nun,
They told their beads all night.

The cock he crew ; the Fiends they flew
From the voice of the morning away ;
Then undisturb'd the Choristers sing,
And the fifty Priests they pray ;
As they had sung and pray'd all night,
They pray'd and sung all day.

The second night the tapers' light
Burnt dismally and blue,
And every one saw his neighbor's face
Like a dead man's face to view.

And yells and cries without arise,
That the stoutest heart might shock,
And a deafening roaring like a cataract pouring
Over a mountain rock.

The Monk and Nun they told their beads
As fast as they could tell,
And aye as louder grew the noise,
The faster went the bell.

Louder and louder the Choristers sung,
As they trembled more and more ;
And the Priests as they pray'd to Heaven for aid,
They smote their breasts full sore.

The cock he crew ; the Fiends they flew
From the voice of the morning away ;
Then undisturb'd the Choristers sing,
And the fifty Priests they pray ;
As they had sung and pray'd all night,
They pray'd and sung all day.

The third night came, and the tapers' flame
A frightful stench did make ;
And they burnt as though they had been dipp'd
In the burning brimstone lake.

And the loud commotion, like the rushing of ocean,
Grew momentarily more and more ;
And strokes as of a battering-ram
Did shake the strong church door.

The bellmen they for very fear
Could toll the bell no longer ;
And still as louder grew the strokes,
Their fear it grew the stronger.

The Monk and Nun forgot their beads ;
They fell on the ground in dismay ;
There was not a single Saint in heaven
To whom they did not pray.

And the Choristers' song, which late was so strong,
Falter'd with consternation ;
For the church did rock as an earthquake shock
Uplifted its foundation.

And a sound was heard like the trumpet's blast
That shall one day wake the dead ;
The strong church door could bear no more,
And the bolts and the bars they fled ; —

And the tapers' light was extinguish'd quite ;
And the Choristers faintly sung ;
And the Priests, dismay'd, panted and pray'd,
And on all Saints in heaven for aid
They call'd with trembling tongue.

And in He came with eyes of flame,
The Devil, to fetch the dead ;
And all the church with his presence glow'd
Like a fiery furnace red.

He laid his hand on the iron chains,
And like flax they moulder'd asunder,
And the coffin lid, which was barr'd so firm,
He burst with his voice of thunder.

And he bade the Old Woman of Berkeley rise,
And come with her master away ;
A cold sweat started on that cold corpse,
At the voice she was forced to obey.

She rose on her feet in her winding-sheet ;
Her dead flesh quiver'd with fear ;
And a groan like that which the Old Woman gave Never did mortal hear.

She follow'd her Master to the church door ;
There stood a black horse there ;
His breath was red like furnace smoke,
His eyes like a meteor's glare.

The Devil he flung her on the horse,
And he leap'd up before,

And away like the lightning's speed they went,
And she was seen no more.

They saw her no more ; but her cries
For four miles round they could hear ;
And children at rest at their mothers' breast
Started, and scream'd with fear.

SURGEON'S WARNING.

The subject of this parody was suggested by a friend, to whom also I am indebted for some of the stanzas.

Respecting the patent coffins herein mentioned, after the manner of Catholic Poets, who confess the actions they attribute to their Saints and Deity to be but fiction, I hereby declare that it is by no means my design to depreciate that useful invention ; and all persons to whom this Ballad shall come are requested to take notice, that nothing herein asserted concerning the aforesaid coffins is true, except that the maker and patentee lives by St. Martin's Lane.

The Doctor whisper'd to the Nurse,
And the Surgeon knew what he said ;
And he grew pale at the Doctor's tale,
And trembled in his sick bed.

"Now fetch me my brethren, and fetch them with speed,"
The Surgeon affrighted said ;
"The Parson and the Undertaker,
Let them hasten, or I shall be dead."

The Parson and the Undertaker
They hastily came complying,
And the Surgeon's Prentices ran up stairs
When they heard that their Master was dying.

The Prentices all they enter'd the room,
By one, by two, by three ;
With a sly grin came Joseph in,
First of the company.

The Surgeon swore, as they enter'd his door, —
"Twas fearful his oaths to hear, —
"Now send these scoundrels out of my sight,
I beseech ye, my brethren dear !"

He foam'd at the mouth with the rage he felt,
And he wrinkled his black eyebrow :
"That rascal Joe would be at me, I know,
But, zounds, let him spare me now !"

Then out they sent the Prentices ;
The fit it left him weak ;
He look'd at his brothers with ghastly eyes,
And faintly struggled to speak.

"All kinds of carcasses I have cut up,
And now my turn will be ;

But, brothers, I took care of you ;
So pray take care of me.

"I have made candles of dead men's fat ;
The Sextons have been my slaves ;
I have bottled babes unborn, and dried
Hearts and livers from rifled graves.

"And my Prentices now will surely come
And carve me bone from bone ;
And I, who have rifled the dead man's grave,
Shall never have rest in my own.

"Bury me in lead when I am dead,
My brethren, I entreat,
And see the coffin weigh'd, I beg,
Lest the plumber should be a cheat.

"And let it be solder'd closely down,
Strong as strong can be, I implore ;
And put it in a patent coffin,
That I may rise no more.

"If they carry me off in the patent coffin,
Their labor will be in vain ;
Let the Undertaker see it bought of the maker,
Who lives by St. Martin's Lane.

"And bury me in my brother's church,
For that will safer be ;
And, I implore, lock the church door,
And pray take care of the key.

"And all night long let three stout men
The vestry watch within ;
To each man give a gallon of beer,
And a keg of Holland's gin ; —

"Powder and ball, and blunderbuss,
To save me if he can,
And eke five guineas if he shoot
A Resurrection Man.

"And let them watch me for three weeks,
My wretched corpse to save ;
For then I think that I may stink
Enough to rest in my grave."

The Surgeon laid him down in his bed ;
His eyes grew deadly dim ;
Short came his breath, and the struggle of death
Did loosen every limb.

They put him in lead when he was dead,
And, with precaution meet,
First they the leaden coffin weigh,
Lest the plumber should be a cheat.

They had it solder'd closely down,
And examin'd it o'er and o'er ;
And they put it in a patent coffin,
That he might rise no more.

For to carry him off in a patent coffin,
Would, they thought, be but labor in vain,

So the Undertaker saw it bought of the maker,
Who lives by St. Martin's Lane.

In his brother's church they buried him,
That safer he might be;
They lock'd the door, and would not trust
The Sexton with the key.

And three men in the vestry watch,
To save him if they can;
And, should he come there, to shoot they swear
A Resurrection Man.

And the first night, by lantern light,
Through the church-yard as they went,
A guinea of gold the Sexton show'd
That Mister Joseph sent.

But conscience was tough; it was not enough;
And their honesty never swerved;
And they bade him go, with Mister Joe,
To the devil, as he deserved.

So all night long, by the vestry fire,
They quaff'd their gin and ale;
And they did drink, as you may think,
And told full many a tale.

The Cock he crew, Cock-a-doodle-doo!
Past five! the watchmen said;
And they went away, for while it was day
They might safely leave the dead.

The second night, by lantern light,
Through the church-yard as they went,
He whisper'd anew, and show'd them two,
That Mister Joseph sent.

The guineas were bright, and attracted their sight,
They look'd so heavy and new;
And their fingers itch'd as they were bewitch'd,
And they knew not what to do.

But they waver'd not long, for conscience was strong,
And they thought they might get more;
And they refused the gold, but not
So rudely as before.

So all night long, by the vestry fire,
They quaff'd their gin and ale;
And they did drink, as you may think,
And told full many a tale.

The third night, as, by lantern light,
Through the church-yard they went,
He bade them see, and show'd them three,
That Mister Joseph sent.

They look'd askance with greedy glance;
The guineas they shone bright;
For the Sexton on the yellow gold
Let fall his lantern light.

And he look'd sly with his roguish eye,
And gave a well-timed wink;

And they could not stand the sound in his hand,
For he made the guineas chink.

And conscience, late that had such weight,
All in a moment fails;
For well they knew that it was true
A dead man tells no tales.

And they gave all their powder and ball,
And took the gold so bright;
And they drank their beer, and made good cheer,
Till now it was midnight.

Then, though the key of the church-door
Was left with the Parson, his brother,
It open'd at the Sexton's touch,—
Because he had another.

And in they go, with that villain Joe,
To fetch the body by night;
And all the church look'd dismally
By his dark-lantern light.

They laid the pick-axe to the stones,
And they moved them soon asunder;
They shovell'd away the hard-press'd clay,
And came to the coffin under.

They burst the patent coffin first,
And they cut through the lead;
And they laugh'd aloud when they saw the shroud,
Because they had got at the dead.

And they allow'd the Sexton the shroud,
And they put the coffin back;
And nose and knees they then did squeeze
The Surgeon in a sack.

The watchmen, as they pass'd along,
Full four yards off could smell,
And a curse bestow'd upon the load
So disagreeable.

So they carried the sack a-pick-a-back,
And they carved him bone from bone;
But what became of the Surgeon's soul
Was never to mortal known.

Westbury, 1798.

HENRY THE HERMIT.

It was a little island where he dwelt,
A solitary islet, bleak and bare,
Short, scanty herbage spotting with dark spots
Its gray stone surface. Never mariner
Approach'd that rude and uninviting coast,
Nor ever fisherman his lonely bark
Anchor'd beside its shore. It was a place
Befitting well a rigid anchoret,
Dead to the hopes, and vanities, and joys,
And purposes of life; and he had dwelt

Many long years upon that lonely isle ;
 For in ripe manhood he abandon'd arms,
 Honors, and friends, and country, and the world,
 And had grown old in solitude. That isle
 Some solitary man, in other times,
 Had made his dwelling-place ; and Henry found
 The little chapel which his toil had built
 Now by the storms unroof'd, his bed of leaves
 Wind-scatter'd ; and his grave o'ergrown with grass,
 And thistles, whose white seeds there wing'd in vain,
 Wither'd on rocks, or in the waves were lost.
 So he repair'd the chapel's ruin'd roof,
 Clear'd the gray lichens from the altar-stone,
 And underneath a rock that shelter'd him
 From the sea-blast, he built his hermitage.

[food,
 The peasants from the shore would bring him
 And beg his prayers ; but human converse else
 He knew not in that utter solitude ;
 Nor ever visited the haunts of men,
 Save when some sinful wretch on a sick bed
 Implor'd his blessing and his aid in death.
 That summons he delay'd not to obey,
 Though the night-tempest or autumnal wind
 Madden'd the waves ; and though the mariner,
 Albeit relying on his saintly load,
 Grew pale to see the peril. Thus he lived
 A most austere and self-denying man,
 Till abstinence, and age, and watchfulness,
 Had worn him down, and it was pain at last
 To rise at midnight from his bed of leaves,
 And bend his knees in prayer. Yet not the less,
 Though with reluctance of infirmity,
 Rose he at midnight from his bed of leaves,
 And bent his knees in prayer ; but with more zeal,
 More self-condemning fervor, raised his voice,
 Imploring pardon for the natural sin
 Of that reluctance, till the atoning prayer
 Had satisfied his heart, and given it peace,
 And the repented fault became a joy.

One night, upon the shore his chapel-bell
 Was heard ; the air was calm, and its far sounds
 Over the water came, distinct and loud.
 Alarm'd, at that unusual hour, to hear
 Its toll irregular, a monk arose,
 And cross'd to the island-chapel. On a stone
 Henry was sitting there, dead, cold, and stiff,
 The bell-rope in his hand, and at his feet
 The lamp* that stream'd a long, unsteady light.

ST. GUALBERTO.

ADDRESSED TO GEORGE BURNETT.

Milton has made the name of Vallumbrosa familiar to English readers ; few of whom, unless they have visited the spot,

* This story is related in the English Martyrology, 1603.

know that it is the chief seat of a religious order founded by St. Gualberto. A passage in one of Miss Seward's early letters shows how well Milton had observed the peculiar feature of its autumnal scenery. "I have heard my father say, that when he was in Italy with Lord Charles Fitzroy, they travelled through Vallumbrosa in autumn, after the leaves had begun to fall ; and that their guide was obliged to try what was land, and what water, by pushing a long pole before him, which he carried in his hand, the vale being so very irriguous, and the leaves so totally covering the surface of the streams." — Poetical Works of ANNE SEWARD, with Extracts from her Literary Correspondence,
 vol. i. p. lxxxvi.

1.

THE work is done ; the fabric is complete ;
 Distinct the Traveller sees its distant tower,
 Yet, ere his steps attain the sacred seat,
 Must toil for many a league and many an hour.
 Elate the Abbot sees the pile, and knows,
 Stateliest of convents now, his new Moscera rose.

2.

Long were the tale that told Moscera's pride,
 Its columns' cluster'd strength and lofty state,
 How many a saint bedeck'd its sculptured side ;
 What intersecting arches graced its gate ;
 Its towers how high, its massy walls how strong,
 These fairly to describe were sure a tedious song.

3.

Yet while the fane rose slowly from the ground,
 But little store of charity, I ween,
 The passing pilgrim at Moscera found ;
 And often there the mendicant was seen
 Hopeless to turn him from the convent door,
 Because this costly work still kept the brethren poor.

4.

Now all is finish'd, and from every side
 They flock to view the fabric, young and old.
 Who now can tell Rodulfo's secret pride,
 When, on the Sabbath-day, his eyes behold
 The multitudes that crowd his church's floor,
 Some sure to serve their God, to see Moscera more ?

5.

So chanced it that Gualberto pass'd that way,
 Since sainted for a life of saintly deeds.
 He paused, the new-rear'd convent to survey,
 And, o'er the structure whilst his eye proceeds,
 Sorrowed, as one whose holier feelings deem
 That ill so proud a pile did humble monks beseem.

6.

Him, musing as he stood, Rodulfo saw,
 And forth he came to greet the holy guest ;
 For him he knew as one who held the law
 Of Benedict, and each severe behest
 So duly kept with such religious care,
 That Heaven had oft vouchsafed its wonders to his prayer.

7.

"Good brother, welcome !" thus Rodulfo cries
 "In sooth it glads me to behold you here ;

It is Gualberto! and mine aged eyes
 Did not deceive me: yet full many a year
 Hath slipp'd away, since last you bade farewell
 To me your host and my uncomfortable cell.

8.

"'Twas but a sorry welcome then you found,
 And such as suited ill a guest so dear.
 The pile was ruinous, the base unsound;
 It glads me more to bid you welcome here,
 For you can call to mind our former state;
 Come, brother, pass with me the new Moscera's gate."

9.

So spake the cheerful Abbot; but no smile
 Of answering joy relax'd Gualberto's brow;
 He raised his hand, and pointed to the pile —
 "Moscera better pleased me then, than now;
 A palace this, befitting kingly pride!
 Will holiness, my friend, in palace pomp abide?"

10.

"Ay," cries Rodulfo, "'tis a stately place!
 And pomp becomes the House of Worship well.
 Nay, scowl not round with so severe a face!
 When earthly kings in seats of grandeur dwell,
 Where art exhausted decks the sumptuous hall,
 Can poor and sordid huts beseem the Lord of all?"

11.

"And ye have rear'd these stately towers on high
 To serve your God?" the Monk severe replied;
 "It rose from zeal and earnest piety,
 And prompted by no worldly thoughts beside?
 Abbot, to him who prays with soul sincere,
 However poor the cell, God will incline his ear.

12.

"Rodulfo! while this haughty building rose,
 Still was the pilgrim welcome at your door?
 Did charity relieve the orphan's woes?
 Clothed ye the naked? did ye feed the poor?
 He who with alms most succurs the distress'd,
 Proud Abbot! know he serves his heavenly Father best.

13.

"Did they in sumptuous palaces go dwell
 Who first abandon'd all to serve the Lord?
 Their place of worship was the desert cell;
 Wild fruits and berries spread their frugal board;
 And if a brook, like this, ran murmuring by,
 They bless'd their gracious God, and 'thought it luxury.'"

14.

Then anger darken'd in Rodulfo's face;
 "Enough of preaching," sharply he replied;
 "Thou art grown envious; 'tis a common case;
 Humility is made the cloak of pride.
 Proud of our home's magnificence are we,
 But thou art far more proud in rags and beggary."

15.

With that Gualberto cried in fervent tone,
 "O Father, hear me! If this costly pile
 Was for thine honor rear'd, and thine alone,
 Bless it, O Father, with thy fostering smile!
 Still may it stand, and never evil know,
 Long as beside its walls the endless stream shall flow.

16.

"But, Lord, if vain and worldly-minded men
 Have wasted here the wealth which thou hast lent,
 To pamper worldly pride; frown on it then!
 Soon be thy vengeance manifestly sent!
 Let yonder brook, that gently flows beside,
 Now from its base sweep down the unholy house of pride!"

17.

He said, — and lo, the brook no longer flows!
 The waters pause, and now they swell on high;
 Erect in one collected heap they rose;
 The affrighted brethren from Moscera fly,
 And upon all the Saints in Heaven they call,
 To save them in their flight from that impending fall.

18.

Down the heap'd waters came, and, with a sound
 Like thunder, overthrown the fabric falls;
 Swept far and wide, its fragments strow the ground,
 Prone lie its columns now, its high-arch'd walls;
 Earth shakes beneath the onward-rolling tide,
 That from its base swept down the unholy house
 of pride.

* * * * *

19.

Were old Gualberto's reasons built on truth,
 Dear George, or like Moscera's base unsound?
 This sure I know, that glad am I, in sooth,
 He only play'd his pranks on foreign ground;
 For had he turn'd the stream on England too,
 The Vandal monk had spoilt full many a goodly view.

20.

Then Malmesbury's arch had never met my sight,
 Nor Battle's vast and venerable pile;
 I had not traversed then with such delight
 The hallowed ruins of our Alfred's isle,
 Where many a pilgrim's curse is well bestow'd
 On those who rob its walls to mend the turnpike road.

21.

Wells would have fallen, dear George, our country's pride;
 And Canning's stately church been rear'd in vain;
 Nor had the traveller Ely's tower descried,

Which when thou seest far o'er the fenny plain,
Dear George, I counsel thee to turn that way;
Its ancient beauties sure will well reward delay.

22.

And we should never then have heard, I think,
At evening hour, great Tom's tremendous knell.
The fountain streams that now in Christ-church
stink,
Had Niagara'd o'er the quadrangle;
But, as 'twas beauty that deserved the flood,
I ween, dear George, thy own old Pompey might have stood.

23.

Then had not Westminster, the house of God,
Served for a concert-room, or signal-post:
Old Thames, obedient to the father's nod,
Had swept down Greenwich, England's noblest boast;
And, eager to destroy the unholy walls,
Fleet Ditch had roll'd up hill to overwhelm St.
Paul's.

24.

George, dost thou deem the legendary deeds
Of saints like this but rubbish, a mere store
Of trash, that he flings time away who reads?
And wouldst thou rather bid me puzzle o'er
Matter and Mind and all the eternal round,
Plunged headlong down the dark and fathomless profound?

25.

Now do I bless the man who undertook
These Monks and Martyrs to biographize;
And love to ponder o'er his ponderous book,
The mingle-mangle mass of truth and lies,
Where waking fancies mix'd with dreams appear,
And blind and honest zeal, and holy faith sincere.

26.

All is not truth; and yet, methinks, 'twere hard
Of wilful fraud such fablers to accuse;
What if a Monk, from better themes debarr'd,
Should for an edifying story choose
How some great Saint the Flesh and Fiend o'ercame;
His taste I trow, and not his conscience, were to blame.

27.

No fault of his, if what he thus design'd,
Like pious novels for the use of youth,
Obtain'd such hold upon the simple mind
That was received at length for gospel-truth.
A fair account! and shouldst thou like the plea,
Thank thou our valued friend, dear George, who taught it me.

28.

All is not false which seems at first a lie.
Fernan Antolinez, a Spanish knight,
Knelt at the mass, when, lo! the troops hard by
Before the expected hour began the fight.

Though courage, duty, honor, summon'd there,
He chose to forfeit all, not leave the unfinish'd prayer.

29.

But while devoutly thus the unarm'd knight
Waits till the holy service should be o'er,
Even then the foremost in the furious fight
Was he beheld to bathe his sword in gore;
First in the van his plumes were seen to play,
And all to him decreed the glory of the day.

30.

The truth is told, and men at once exclaim'd,
Heaven had his Guardian Angel deign'd to send;
And thus the tale is handed down to fame.
Now, if our good Sir Fernan had a friend
Who in this critical season served him well,
Dear George, the tale is true, and yet no miracle.

31.

I am not one who scan with scornful eyes
The dreams which make the enthusiast's best delight;
Nor thou the legendary lore despise,
If of Gualberto yet again I write,
How first impell'd he sought the convent cell;
A simple tale it is, but one that pleased me well.

* * * * *

32.

Fortune had smiled upon Gualberto's birth,
The heir of Valdespesa's rich domains;
An only child, he grew in years and worth,
And well repaid a father's anxious pains.
In many a field that father had been tried,
Well for his valor known, and not less known for pride.

33.

It chanced that one in kindred near allied
Was slain by his hereditary foe;
Much by his sorrow moved, and more by pride,
The father vow'd that blood for blood should flow;
And from his youth Gualberto had been taught
That with unceasing hate should just revenge be sought.

34.

Long did they wait; at length the tidings came
That, through a lone and unfrequented way,
Soon would Anselmo — such the murderer's
name —
Pass on his journey home, an easy prey.
“Go,” said the father, “meet him in the wood!”
And young Gualberto went, and laid in wait for blood.

35.

When now the youth was at the forest shade
Arrived, it drew toward the close of day;
Anselmo haply might be long delay'd,
And he, already wearied with his way,

Beneath an ancient oak his limbs reclined,
And thoughts of near revenge alone possess'd his mind.

36.

Slow sunk the glorious sun ; a roseate light
Spread o'er the forest from his lingering rays ;
The glowing clouds upon Gualberto's sight
Softened in shade, — he could not choose but gaze ;
And now a placid grayness clad the heaven,
Save where the west retain'd the last green light of even.

37.

Cool breathed the grateful air, and fresher now
The fragrance of the autumnal leaves arose ;
The passing gale scarce moved the o'erhanging bough,
And not a sound disturb'd the deep repose,
Save when a falling leaf came fluttering by,
Save the near brooklet's stream that murmur'd quietly.

38.

Is there who has not felt the deep delight,
The hush of soul, that scenes like these impart ?
The heart they will not soften is not right ;
And young Gualberto was not hard of heart.
Yet sure he thinks revenge becomes him well,
When from a neighboring church he heard the vesper-bell.

39.

The Romanist who hears that vesper-bell,
Howe'er employ'd, must send a prayer to Heaven.
In foreign lands I liked the custom well ;
For with the calm and sober thoughts of even
It well accords ; and wert thou journeying there,
It would not hurt thee, George, to join that vesper-prayer.

40.

Gualberto had been duly taught to hold
All pious customs with religious care ;
And—for the young man's feelings were not cold,—
He never yet had miss'd his vesper-prayer.
But strange misgivings now his heart invade ;
And when the vesper-bell had ceased, he had not pray'd.

41.

And wherefore was it that he had not pray'd ?
The sudden doubt arose within his mind,
And many a former precept then he weigh'd,
The words of Him who died to save mankind ;
How 'twas the meek who should inherit Heaven,
And man must man forgive, if he would be forgiven.

42.

Troubled at heart, almost he felt a hope,
That yet some chance his victim might delay.

So as he mused adown the neighboring slope,
He saw a lonely traveller on his way ;
And now he knows the man so much abhorr'd, —
His holier thoughts are gone, he bares the murderous sword.

43.

“The house of Valdespesa gives the blow !
Go, and our vengeance to our kinsman tell !”
Despair and terror seized the unarm'd foe,
And prostrate at the young man's knees he fell,
And stopp'd his hand and cried, “Oh, do not take A wretched sinner's life ! mercy for Jesus' sake !”

44.

At that most blessed name, as at a spell,
Conscience, the power within him, smote his heart.
His hand, for murder raised, unharmed fell ;
He felt cold sweat-drops on his forehead start ;
A moment mute in holy horror stood,
Then cried, “Joy, joy, my God ! I have not shed his blood !”

45.

He raised Anselmo up, and bade him live,
And bless, for both preserved, that holy name ;
And pray'd the astonish'd foeman to forgive
The bloody purpose led by which he came.
Then to the neighboring church he sped away,
His overburden'd soul before his God to lay.

46.

He ran with breathless speed, — he reach'd the door, —
With rapid throbs his feverish pulses swell ; —
He came to crave for pardon, to adore
For grace vouchsafed ; before the cross he fell,
And raised his swimming eyes, and thought that there
He saw the imaged Christ smile favoring on his prayer.

47.

A blest illusion ! from that very night
The Monk's austerest life devout he led ;
And still he felt the enthusiast's deep delight ;
Seraphic visions floated round his head ;
The joys of heaven foretasted fill'd his soul ;
And still the good man's name adorns the sainted roll.

NOTES.

Earth shakes beneath the onward-rolling tide,
That from its base swept down the unholy house of pride.
Stanza 18, p. 478.

Era amigo de pobreza, en tanto grado, que sentia mucho, que los Monasterios se edificasen sumptuosamente; y assi visitando el de Mosquera y viendo un edificio grande, y elegante, buelto a Rodulpho, que era alli Abad, con el rostro ayrado le dixo: Con lo que has gastado, siguiendo tu parecer, en este magnifico edificio, has quitado el sustento a muchos pobres. Puso los ojos en un pequeño arroyo, que corría allí cerca, y dijo, Dios Omnipotente, que surtes hacer grandes cosas de pequeñas criaturas, yo te ruego, que sea por medio de esta pequeño arroyo venganza de este gran edificio. Dijo esto, y fuese de allí como abominando el lugar; y siendo oído, el arroyuelo comenzó a crecer, y fue de suerte, que recogiendo un monte de agua, y tomando de atrás la corriente, vino con tan grande impetu, que llevando piedras y árboles consigo, derribo el edificio. —

Flos Sanctorum, por El Maestro Alonso de Villegas.

Quodam itaque tempore cum monasteria, que sub suo erant regimine, solito more inviseret, venit ad canobium cui vocabulum est Muscetum; ubi cum casas cerneret grandiores pulchrioresque quam vellet: accersito venerabili viro domino Rodulfo, qui eas construxerat, et ab illo ibi ordinatus fuerat Abbas, severissimo vultu dixit: Tu in isto loco hæc tibi fabricasti palatia? Et conversus ad purrissimum rivum qui inibi juxta currat, dixit: O Regambulo, si me de Rodulfo, et istis ejus domibus vindicaveris, utrem aqua Seve fluminis plenum, undis tuis augebo. Et hæc dicens sine mora discessit. Cujus imperium, ac si rationalis homo, rivus ille suscipiens, illo recedente intumescere capit, et nescio unde largissima aquarum fluentia congregans, relicto proprio alveo de monte præcipitanter ruit, gravissimos petrarum scopulos atque arbores secum trahens, in prædictas domos illis terra tenuis eas dejecit. Quâ ultione completâ, quasi pro mercede, quod promiserat, Pater recepit. Quâ pro re Abbas ille turbatus cum Fratribus, de loco mutare disponebat canobium. Quibus ille hæc consolationis verba locutus est: Nolite, inquit, timere ne habitetis quia rivus ille nec quidquam mali vobis facturum est, nec ultra vobis nocebit. Quod ejus raticinium verum firmiterque usque hodie permanet. Denique ille sæpe dictus rivulus, quod tunc casu, immo plus imperio Patris acciderit, nec antea fuerat, nec ulterius fecit.

The destruction of this Monastery is thus related in the Vita del Glorioso S. Giovan Gualberto Azzini, Nobil Fiorentino, e Fondatore della sacra Religione di Vallombrosa, a poem in nine parts or books, by M. Niccolo Lorenzini, Fisico da Monte Pulciano. — Firenze, 1599.

. . . . prende il sentiero

*Di Moscheto il Cenobio, in cui discerne,
Beache da lunge, che spento è quel vero
Segno d'humili e pure voglie interne:
V'arriva, e trova 'l edificio tutto
Esser con pompa dal Rettor costruito.*

*Il biasma, e dice che cotanto argento
Si speso, havria nutrito mille e mille
Mendici, la cui vita aspro tormento
Di fame accorcia, e ch' in eterne stille
Si risolvon di pianto al gielo, e al vento,
Che in tanto ci mena l'hore sue tranquille,
Godendo in così ricca stanza e bella;
E lui superbo con disdegno appella.*

*Hor duaque d'humiltà quel buon desio
Ch' esser de' verde, è secco? (ahi cieca voglia!)
A che si tosto affondar nell' oblio
Le nostre Leggi, e questa humile spoglia?
O pria che si dimostri alcun restio
In ben servarle, sol in me s' accoglia
Ogni angoscia e martir, ne le mie pene
In questa vita, altro che morte affrene.*

*Il paterno dolor con tai parole
Sfoga, ed ha tanto l'alterezza di schivo,
Che quel vano Rettor corregger vuole;
Oad' habbia sol à Dio lo spirito vivo,
Cui prega, e poscia impetra, com' ei suole,
Che si cresca un vicino e picciol Rivo
Per le nubi, ch' allhor solva e disserri,
Che l' edificio e quelle pompe atterri.*

*E quasi dimorar fosse interdetto
Piu in quella chiostra, ratto fuor s' invia,
Comandando al Ruscel che inondi il tetto
Con ruina del loco; ecco si eria*

*Horribil nembo, esce quel Rio del letto
Usato, e per diversa alpestra via,
Incontro a quell' albergo prende il corso,
E sol nella parete adorna è scorso.*

*Si alto gonfia il torbido torrente
E tragge sì gran pietre e legni al muro,
Che percotendo 'l fu che inmantenente
In tal assalto così strano e scuro,
A terra caggia, e di timor la gente
Ingombri il caso spaventoso e duro;
Indi sparisce il nembo ed è serena
L'aria già fosca, e l' onda il corso affrena.*

*Non è in memoria che i bel Rio già mai
Inondasse le rive, o quando il Sole
Stragge le nevi, o quando i vaghi rai
Di lui, gran pioggia avvien ch' al mondo invole;
Hor qual torrente adduce affanni e guai
Al monaco superbo, e tanta mole
(Perch' al Santo ubidisco) rompe e sface,
Poi ricade come pria tranquillo, e tace.*

Fernan Antolinez, a Spanish knight. — Stanza 28, p. 479.

*Acontecio en aquella * batalla una cosa digna de memoria. Fernan Antolinez, hombre noble y muy devoto, oia missa al tiempo que se dio señal de acometer, costumbre ordinaria suya antes de la pelea; por no dexarla comengada, se quedo en el templo quando se toco à la arma. Esta piedad quon agradable fuese a Dios, se entendio por un milagro. Estacase primero en la Iglesia, despues escondido en su casa, tenia no le ofrendassen como a cobarde. En tanto, otro a el semejante, es a sobre su Angel bueno, pelea entre los primeros tan valientemente, que la victoria de aquel dia se atribuyo en gran parte al valor de el dicho Antolinez. Confirmaron el milagro las señales de los golpes, y las manchas de la sangre que se hallaron frescas en sus armas y cavallo. Assi publicado el caso, y sabido lo que passava, quedo mas conocida la inocencia y esfuerço de Antolinez. — MARIANA.*

Perhaps this miracle, and its obvious interpretation, may have suggested to Florian the circumstance by which his Gonsalvo is prevented from combating and killing the brother of his mistress. Florian is fond of Spanish literature.

A simple tale it is, but one that pleased me well.

Stanza 31, p. 479.

Llamòse el padre Gualberto, y era señor de Valdespesa, que está entre Sena, y Florencia: seguia la milicia; y como le matassen un su dcudo ceecano injustamente, indignados, assi el hijo, que era ya hombre, como el padre, con mucho cuydado buscaran ocasion, como vengar aquella muerte. Sucedio, que viniendo à Florencia el hijo, con un criado suyo, hombre valiente, y los dos bien armados, à cavallo, vio à su enemigo, y en lugar que era imposible irseles: lo qual considerado por el contrario, y que tenia cierta su muerte, descendió de un cavallo, en que venia, y puesto de rodillas le pidió, juntos las manos, por Jesu Christo crucificado, le perdonasse la vida. Entrecióse Juan Gualberto, oyendo el nombre de Jesu Christo crucificado; y diróle, que por amor de aquel Señor, que rogó en la Cruz por los que le pusieron en ella, el le perdonava. Pidióle, que se levantasse, y perdiése el temor, que ya no por enemigo, sino por amigo le queria, y que de Dios, por quien hacia esto, esperara el premio. Passó adelante Gualberto; y viendo una Iglesia en un monte cerca de Florencia, llamada de San Miniato, que era de Monges negros, entró en ella para dar gracias à Jesu Christo nuestro Señor por la merced, que le havia hecho en favoricarlo, de que perdonasse, y no tomasse vengauza de su enemigo: puse de rodillas delante de un Crucifixo, el qual, viendo el, y otros que estavan presentes, desde la Cruz inclinó la cabeza à Gualberto, como agradciendo, y dandole gracias, de que por su amor huviesse perdonado la vida à su enemigo. Descubrióse el caso, y fue publico, y muy celebrado, y el Crucifixo fue tenido en grande reverencia en aquella Iglesia de S. Miniato. Quedó Juan Gualberto de este acaecimiento, trocado en otro varon, y determinó dexar el mundo, y las cosas perecederas de el. — VILLEGAS. Flos Sanctorum.

He saw the imaged Christ smile favoring on his prayer.
Stanza 46, p. 480.

Sir Peter Damian relates a story so similar to this of Gualberto in almost all circumstances, that Cuper found it advisable to disparage his authority on this occasion, and quote some of his own declarations, that he was not always satisfied of the truth or accuracy of what he related. Cum in tot aliis narrationibus id sibi contigisse fateatur Petrus Damiani, idem in hac Crucifixi historiâ ipsi evenisse non injuria suspicor. The Bollandist then proceeds to declare his own stout belief in the miracle as belonging to St. Gualberto. Ut ut est, ego Crucifixi sese inclinantis miraculum S. Joanni Gualberto accidisse historicâ fide credo, atque istud in dubium revocare, summâ pervicaciâ, ne dicam dementia, esse existimo. Quid enim historicè tandem certum erit, si omnibus historicis, atque etiam vetustissimis synchronis aut subæqualibus factum aliquod narrantibus, de eo dubitare liceat? Intolerabilis sane est hæc mentis pertinacia, quam quidam nostri temporis Aristarchi, ac præsertim heterodoxi, prudentiam aut constantiam vocare non erubescunt.

Non ignoro scriptores aliquos in vitium contrarium incurrisse, et in exornando hoc miraculo nimios fuisse; inter quos jure merito numerari potest Ludovicus Zaccagnius, qui sine ullo veterum testimonio, colloquium inter Crucifixum et S. Joannem Gualbertum ex suo, ut opinor, cerebro finxit. Hæc tamen additamenta miraculi veritatem non argunt, sed potius confirmant, quamvis per hyperbolen maxime reprehendendam. — Acta SS. fol. 3, p. 314.

*Ivi adora di Christo il morto e macro
Sembante (che rassembra il ver) dipinto,
Il ver figura in croce eterno e sacro
Re del mondo di sangue infuso e tinto;
Ma sovra gli altri con dolente ed aéro
Volto, e con suon mosso dal petto, e spinto;
A tanta Imago allhor' pien d' alto zelo
L' Eroë s' inchina, e porge i preghi al cielo.*

*Signor sò ben, che me dall' empio Egitto
(Dicèa) salvasti, e dall' horror d' inferno;
C'hoggi in tutto quel mal c'havèa prescritto,
E quel pensier d' vendicarmi interno
Sol tua merce fu spento; hor fia ben dritto
Ch'io commetta 'l mio spirito al tuo governo,
Ch'io di te segua l'opre, i detti, e l'orme,
Che sia 'l mio cor al tuo desir conforme.*

* * * *

*In cotal modo humilmente à Dio
Sacro Giovanni li suoi preghi ardenti;
Poi surto in piedi in atto adorno e pio,
Porgendo gli occhi à quella Imago intenti,
Con fronte lieta, e puro e bel desio
Move la lingua in questi nuovi accenti,
Stende la destra al cielo, e al gid prigionie
L'altra man sù la testa allarga, e ponè.*

*O mio pietoso Dio qual gid gradisti
Abel co' sacrificii suoi perfetti,
D'Abraham Patriarca i voti udisti
E di sua fede i rari ardenti affetti,
Et à mill' altri i bei tesori apristi
Della tua grazia dagli empirei tetti,
Tal quasi un olocausto quel perdono
Ch'io diedi à questo, accetta, e prendi in dono.*

*Et à me stringi 'l cor con mille nodi,
Sù la Croce il ritien, teo il congiungi,
Ivi 'l trafiggi cò tuoi santi ehiodi,
Col sangue il lava, e con le spine il pungi;
Ne quindi l'alma unqua si torca, e snodi,
Ivi l'abbraccia, la conforta, et ungi,*

*E con la mirra et aloe del pianto
Fa che purghi 'l suo vil corporco manto.*

*Questo voto novello, e questa offerta,
Quantunque è nulla al tuo gran merto, hor prendi
Un raggio di tua grazia in me converta
Il ghiaccio in foco, hor al mio prego intendi;
La via eh'al ciel conduce è stretta ed erta,
Da noi l'opre, la fede e'l pianto attendi;
Dunque ricivi i miei sospiri e 'l duolo,
S' a me, per esser tuo, me stesso involo.*

*Non pria formò l'humil preghiera honesta
Il giovin degno, e'l suo sermon finio,
Che in un momento la dipinta testa
Mosse quel che rassembra il morto Dio,
E la inchinò ver lui; vide ognun questa
Gran meraviglia, che del Cielo uscìo,
Quasi dicesse, al tuo desir consento,
Com' in te l'odio, in me 'l favor sia spento.*

*Io sì 'l tue dono, e 'l tuo dolor gradisco,
C'hor d' ogni affanno, e di timor te spoglio,
E qual ogni alma humil prendo e nutrisco
Di sacro cibo, e à degne imprese invoglio;
Tal al tuo cor leggiadra rete ordisco
In cui preso tenerlo meco io voglio,
Lui d' ogni nebbia e d' ogni error disgombro.
Lui di mia grazia dolcemente ingombro.*

*In tal maniera parèa dir col segno
Del capo, e ne devenne ognun stupito,
Sì dal Fattor del glorioso regno
Fu del suo servo l'humil prego udito,
Ei sol mosse dal ciel quel volto degno,
Ei sol 'l cui poter sommo infinito,
Quest' ampio globo di ricchezze adorno
Move ad ognor con dolci tempore intorno*

*Pur hoggi il simulacro santo e puro
Visto è dal mondo nel medesimo tempio.
Il memorabil di che tristo e scuro
Si fece il Sol per l'aspro caso et empio
Dal suo Fattor; animo alpestre e duro
Non è, ch' ivi nol mova un tanto esempio
Di nostra fede, e non sospirò, e gena,
Sì lega i cor la meraviglia estrema.*

*Vide, come pur vuol l' antica istoria
In cotal giorno la città del Fiore
Quel nobil segno, e del Signor la gloria
In quella Imago, e 'l sempiterno amore,
Sì che vira ne serba ancor memoria,
Le porge voti, à Dio sacrandò il core;
Però ch' è scala quel dipinto aspetto
Onde l' huom poggì al vero eterno oggetto.*

*Avanzò tanto il natural confine
Del sacro capo in ogni parte il moto,
Sì fur sopra natura alte e divine
Quelle maniere, e l' atto aperto e noto,
Che tante genti ch' iri humili, e chine
Il vider, s' arrestrar col guardo inmoto;
Che l' estremo stupor fa l' huom conforme
A un sassa, o mezzo tra chi vegghia, e dorme*

*Ma quei, per cui se fe 'l divin mistero,
Poi che spese dell' ira il foco arverso,
Sì di se dona al suo Signor l' impero,
Sì al gran miracol dentro ha il cor converso,
Ch' ad altro non rivolge unqua il pensiero,
In questo sol tien l' intelletto immerso
Senza parlar s' affisa in terna, è a pena
L' interno ardor per brave spazio affrena.*

NICOLA LORENZINI, part I. pp 25—32.

THE
MARCH TO MOSCOW.

1.

THE Emperor Nap he would set off
On a summer excursion to Moscow;
The fields were green, and the sky was blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
What a pleasant excursion to Moscow!

2.

Four hundred thousand men and more
Must go with him to Moscow:
There were Marshals by the dozen,
And Dukes by the score;
Princes a few, and Kings one or two;
While the fields are so green, and the sky so blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
What a pleasant excursion to Moscow!

3.

There was Junot and Augereau,
Heigh-ho for Moscow!
Dombrowsky and Poniatowsky,
Marshal Ney, lack-a-day!
General Rapp, and the Emperor Nap;
Nothing would do,
While the fields were so green, and the sky so blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
Nothing would do
For the whole of this crew,
But they must be marching to Moscow.

4.

The Emperor Nap he talk'd so big
That he frighten'd Mr. Roscoe.
John Bull, he cries, if you'll be wise,
Ask the Emperor Nap if he will please
To grant you peace, upon your knees,
Because he is going to Moscow!
He'll make all the Poles come out of their holes,
And beat the Russians, and eat the Prussians;
For the fields are green, and the sky is blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
And he'll certainly march to Moscow!

5.

And Counsellor Brougham was all in a fume
At the thought of the march to Moscow:
The Russians, he said, they were undone,
And the great Fee-Faw-Fum
Would presently come,
With a hop, step, and jump, unto London.
For, as for his conquering Russia,
However some persons might scoff it,
Do it he could, and do it he would,
And from doing it nothing would come but good,
And nothing could call him off it.
Mr. Jeffrey said so, who must certainly know,
For he was the Edinburgh Prophet.
They all of them knew Mr. Jeffrey's Review,
Which with Holy Writ ought to be reckon'd:

It was, through thick and thin, to its party true;
Its back was buff, and its sides were blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
It served them for Law and for Gospel too.

6.

But the Russians stoutly they turned to
Upon the road to Moscow.
Nap had to fight his way all through;
They could fight, though they could not parlez-
vous;
But the fields were green, and the sky was blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
And so he got to Moscow.

7.

He found the place too warm for him,
For they set fire to Moscow.
To get there had cost him much ado,
And then no better course he knew,
While the fields were green, and the sky was blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
But to march back again from Moscow.

8.

The Russians they stuck close to him
All on the road from Moscow.
There was Tormazow and Jemalow,
And all the others that end in ow;
Milarodovitch and Jaladovitch,
And Karatschkowitch,
And all the others that end in itch;
Schamscheff, Souchosaneff,
And Schepaleff,
And all the others that end in eff;
Wasiltschikoff, Kostomaroff,
And Tehoglokoff,
And all the others that end in off;
Rajeffsky, and Novereffsky,
And Rieffsky,
And all the others that end in effsky;
Osharoffsky and Rostoffsky,
And all the others that end in offsky;
And Platoff he play'd them off,
And Shouvaloff he shovell'd them off,
And Markoff he mark'd them off,
And Krosnoff he cross'd them off,
And Tuchkoff he touch'd them off,
And Boroskoff he bored them off,
And Kutousoff he cut them off,
And Parenzoff he pared them off,
And Worronzoff he worried them off,
And Doctoroff he doctor'd them off,
And Rodionoff he flogg'd them off.
And, last of all, an Admiral came,
A terrible man with a terrible name,
A name which you all know by sight very well,
But which no one can speak, and no one can spell.
They stuck close to Nap with all their might;
They were on the left and on the right,
Behind and before, and by day and by night;
He would rather parlez-vous than fight;
But he look'd white, and he look'd blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!

When parlez-vous no more would do,
For they remember'd Moscow.

9.

And then came on the frost and snow,
All on the road from Moscow.
The wind and the weather he found, in that hour,
Cared nothing for him, nor for all his power;
For him who, while Europe crouch'd under his rod,
Put his trust in his Fortune, and not in his God.
Worse and worse every day the elements grew,
The fields were so white, and the sky so blue,
Sacrebleu! Ventrebleu!
What a horrible journey from Moscow!

10.

What then thought the Emperor Nap
Upon the road from Moscow?
Why, I ween he thought it small delight
To fight all day, and to freeze all night;
And he was besides in a very great fright,
For a whole skin he liked to be in;
And so, not knowing what else to do,
When the fields were so white, and the sky so blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
He stole away, — I tell you true, —
Upon the road from Moscow.
'Tis myself, quoth he, I must mind most;
So the Devil may take the hindmost.

11.

Too cold upon the road was he;
Too hot had he been at Moscow;
But colder and hotter he may be,
For the grave is colder than Moscow;
And a place there is to be kept in view,
Where the fire is red, and the brimstone blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
Which he must go to,
If the Pope say true,
If he does not in time look about him;
Where his namesake almost
He may have for his Host;
He has reckon'd too long without him;
If that Host get him in Purgatory,
He won't leave him there alone with his glory;
But there he must stay for a very long day,
For from thence there is no stealing away,
As there was on the road from Moscow.

BROUGH BELLS.

The church at Brough is a pretty large, handsome, ancient building. The steeple is not so old, having been built about the year 1513, under the direction of Thomas Blenkinsop, of Helbeck, Esq. There are in it four excellent bells, by much the largest in the county, except the great bell at Kirkby Thore. Concerning these bells at Brough, there is a tradition that they were given by one Brunskill, who lived upon Stanemore, in the remotest part of the parish, and had a great many cattle. One time it happened that his Bull fell a bellowing, which in the dialect of the country is called cruning, this being the genuine Saxon word to denote that vociferation. Thereupon he said to one of his neighbors, 'Hearest thou how loud this bull crunes? If these cattle should all crune together, might they not be heard from Brough lither?' He answered, 'Yea.' 'Well then,' says Brunskill, 'I'll make them all crune together.' And he sold them all, and with the price thereof he bought the said bells, (or perhaps he might get the old bells new cast and made larger.) There is a monument in the body of the church, in the south wall, between the highest and second window, and in which it is said the said Brunskill was the last that was interred." — Nicolson and Burns' History and Antiquities of Westmoreland and Cumberland, vol. i. p. 571.

"At the further Brough there was a chapel or oratory, founded by John Brunskill, (probably the same who gave the bells,) in 1506. Unto whom Thomas Blenkinsop, Esq., of Helbeck, gave the ground called Gihgarth, on condition that he should build a chapel there, and also an hospital, with two beds in it for travellers and other poor people, and maintain for ever, paying to him and his heirs twopence rent at Pentecost yearly, and on defect of such maintaining and repairing the said chapel, hospital, and beds, the land to revert to the said Thomas and his heirs. In pursuance whereof, he, the said John Brunskill, founded an oratory or chapel, dedicated to Our Lady St. Mary, the Mother of Christ, and to St. Gabriel, the Archangel; who, as Roger, Bishop of Carlisle, and Richard, Abbot of Shap, did, by writing under their hands and seals, affirm, wrought many fair and divers miracles by the sufferance of our Lord God. Two priests were established to sing and to pray in the said chapel for evermore, for the souls of all the benefactors of the said chapel that were departed from the world, and for the welfare of those that were living. One of the said priests was to teach grammar, the other to instruct children willing to learn singing, freely, without any salary from them. The foundation of this chapel was confirmed both by the Bishop of Carlisle and the Archbishop of York, and yet was afterwards opposed by the Vicar of Brough, who conceived himself much prejudiced thereby, and particularly in respect of the oblations which were given from him to the said chapel. Whereupon he set up the cross, and lighted up candles in the church at mid-time of the day, caused the bells to be rung, and cursed with bell, book, and candle, all those that should receive any oblations of those that resorted to the said chapel, or should give any encouragement unto the same. Brunskill, the founder, complained to the Archbishop's Court, at York, against the vicar, Mr. Rasebeck, and obtained a sharp citation against him; censuring him as an abandoned wretch, and inflated with diabolical venom for opposing so good a work. Notwithstanding which, Mr. Rasebeck appealed to the Pope, and an agreement was made between the founder and him, by a composition of twenty shillings yearly, to be paid to Mr. Rasebeck, and his successors, vicars of Brough.

"Thus the chapel continued till the dissolution of the religious houses. And the priest that taught to sing being removed, the other that taught grammar was thought fit to be continued as master of a free-school; and by the commissioners, Sir Walter Mildmay and Robert Kellison, Esq., order was taken, and a fund settled for this purpose. So that a salary of 7*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.* was to be paid yearly to the master of the school by the king's auditors, they receiving all the rents and revenues which formerly belonged unto it as a chapel, and which were given to it by the founder and other benefactors.

"This is all the endowment which it hath at present, (1777,) except a convenient dwelling-house and garden, which were given by one of the schoolmasters, Mr. John Beck. But it was formerly very bountifully endowed by several benefactors; as Henry, Earl of Cumberland, Edward Musgrave, of Hartley, Esq., William Musgrave, son of Richard Musgrave, of Brough, Thomas Blenkinsop, Esq., Hugh Newton, and divers others, who gave lands in Brough, Stanemore, Moreton, Yanewith, Mekel-Strickland, Bampton Cundall, and Mekel-Ashby, all in Westmoreland; and in Penrith, in Cumberland, and West-Laton, in Yorkshire, and Bernard Castle, in the county of Durham." — Ib. p. 574.

ONE day to Helbeck I had stroll'd,
Among the Crossfell Hills,
And, resting in its rocky grove,
Sat listening to the rills,—

The while to their sweet undersong
The birds sang blithe around,
And the soft west wind awoke the wood
To an intermitting sound.

Louder or fainter, as it rose
Or died away, was borne
The harmony of merry bells,
From Brough, that pleasant morn.

“Why are the merry bells of Brough,
My friend, so few?” said I;
“They disappoint the expectant ear,
Which they should gratify.

“One, two, three, four; one, two, three, four;
'Tis still one, two, three, four;
Mellow and silvery are the tones;
But I wish the bells were more!”

“What! art thou critical?” quoth he;
“Eschew that heart's disease
That seeketh for displeasure where
The intent hath been to please.

“By those four bells there hangs a tale,
Which being told, I guess,
Will make thee hear their scanty peal
With proper thankfulness.

“Not by the Cliffords were they given,
Nor by the Tuftons' line;
Thou hearest in that peal the crune
Of old John Brunskill's kine.

“On Stanemore's side, one summer eve,
John Brunskill sat to see
His herds in yonder Borrodale
Come winding up the lea.

“Behind them, on the lowland's verge,
In the evening light serene,
Brough's silent tower, then newly built
By Blenkinsop, was seen.

“Slowly they came in long array,
With loitering pace at will;
At times a low from them was heard,
Far off, for all was still.

“The hills return'd that lonely sound
Upon the tranquil air;
The only sound it was, which then
Awoke the echoes there.

“Thou hear'st that lordly bull of mine,
Neighbor,' quoth Brunskill then;
How loudly to the hills he crunes,
That crune to him again!

“Thinkest thou if yon whole herd at once
Their voices should combine,
Were they at Brough, that we might not Hear plainly from this upland spot
That cruning of the kine?”

“That were a crune, indeed,' replied
His comrade, 'which, I ween,
Might at the Spital well be heard,
And in all dales between.

“Up Mallerstang to Eden's springs,
The eastern wind upon its wings
The mighty voice would bear;
And Appleby would hear the sound,
Methinks, when skies are fair.'

“Then shall the herd,' John Brunskill cried,
'From yon dumb steeple crune,
And thou and I, on this hill-side,
Will listen to their tune.

“So, while the merry Bells of Brough,
For many an age ring on,
John Brunskill will remember'd be,
When he is dead and gone,—

“As one who, in his latter years,
Contented with enough,
Gave freely what he well could spare
To buy the Bells of Brough.'

“Thus it hath proved: three hundred years
Since then have past away,
And Brunskill's is a living name
Among us to this day.”

“More pleasure,” I replied, “shall I
From this time forth partake,
When I remember Helbeck woods,
For old John Brunskill's sake.

“He knew how wholesome it would be,
Among these wild, wide fells,
And upland vales, to catch, at times,
The sound of Christian bells;—

“What feelings and what impulses
Their cadence might convey
To herdsman or to shepherd boy,
Whiling in indolent employ
The solitary day;—

“That, when his brethren were convened
To meet for social prayer,
He too, admonish'd by the call,
In spirit might be there;—

“Or, when a glad thanksgiving sound,
Upon the winds of Heaven,
Was sent to speak a Nation's joy,
For some great blessing given,—

“For victory by sea or land,
And happy peace at length;

Peace by his country's valor won,
And 'stablish'd by her strength ;—

“ When such exultant peals were borne
Upon the mountain air,
The sound should stir his blood, and give
An English impulse there.”

Such thoughts were in the old man's mind,
When he that eve look'd down
From Stanemore's side on Borrodale,
And on the distant town.

And had I store of wealth, methinks,
Another herd of kine,
John Brunskill, I would freely give,
That they might crune with thine.

QUEEN MARY'S CHRISTENING.

Estava la Reyna (Doña Maria) lo mas del tiempo en la villa de Mompeller, y las vezes que el Rey yva alla, no hazia con ella vida de marido ; y muy dissolutamente se rendia a otras mugeres, porque era muy sujeto a aquel vicio. Sucedió que estando en Miraval la Reyna, y el Rey Don Pedro en un lugar alli cerca, junto a Mompeller, que se dice Lates, un Rico Hombre de Aragon, que se dezia Don Guillen de Alcalá, por grandes ruegos y instancia llevo al Rey adonde la Reyna estava nussa, segun se escribe, que tenia recabado que cumpliria su voluntad una dama de quien era servidor ; y en su lugar pusole en la camara de la Reyna ; y en aquella noche que tuvo participacion con ella, quedo preñada de un hijo, el qual pario en Mompeller en la casa de los de Toruamira, en la vespera de la Purificacion de nuestra Señora del año 1207. Mando luego la Reyna llevar al Infante a la Iglesia de Santa Maria, y al templo de Sant Fermín, pare dor gracias a nuestro Señor, por averle dado hijo tan impensadamente ; y buuelto a palacia mando encender doce velas de un mismo peso y tamaño, y ponerles los nombres de los doce Apostoles, para que de aquella que mas durasse, tomasse el nombre ; y assi fue llamado Jayme. — ZURITA, L. 2, C. 59.

The story is told at much greater length in La Historia del muy alto e invencible Rey Don Jayme de Aragon, Primero deste nombre, llamado El Conquistador. Conquista primero en lengua Latina por el Maestro Bernardino Gomes Miedes, Arcediano de Murviedro, y Canonigo de Valencia, agora nuevamente traduzida por el mesmo Autor en lengua Castellana. — Valencia, 1584.

There are three chapters relating to the “mystery of this wonderful history,” in the first book of this work.

Cap. x. Como balcio el Rey (D. Pedro) de Roma a Zaragoza, y de los modos que la Reyna su madre tuvo para casarle con la Señora de Mompeller, y como fue alla.

Cap. xi. De la notable invencion y arte que la Reyna Doña Maria uso viendose tan despreciada del Rey, para concebir del.

Cap. xiii. Del Nacimiento del Principe Don Jayme, y de los estraños mystrios que en su brutismo acucieron.

Miedes thus gives his reason for taking much pains in compiling a faithful statement of the circumstances:—Conforman todos los historiadores antiguos y modernos en contar la estraña concepcion y nacimiento del Infante Don Jayme ; puesto que en el modo y discurso de cada cosa, y como ello passo, discrepan en algo ; pues los unos le passan brece y succintamente por mas honestidad, como la propria historia del Rey ; otros cuentan muchos y diversas cosas sobre ello, porque son amigos de passar por todo, y es cierto que convienen todos con el Rey, y como esta dicho, en solo el modo difieren. Par tanto, tomando de cada uno lo mas provable y menos discrepante, nos resolvemos en lo siguiente. — P. 13.

In justice to the Queen, I am bound to say that Miedes represents her as beautiful and of unblemished reputation, hermosa y honestissima ; and in justice to the King, profligate as he was, that there was a very strong suspicion of Doña Maria's being secretly married to another husband, by whom she had two daughters, a story which had reached the King, and which Miedes seems to accredit.

THE first wish of Queen Mary's heart
Is, that she may bear a son,
Who shall inherit in his time
The kingdom of Aragon.

She hath put up prayers to all the Saints
This blessing to accord,
But chiefly she hath call'd upon
The Apostles of our Lord.

The second wish of Queen Mary's heart
Is to have that son call'd James,
Because she thought for a Spanish King
'Twas the best of all good names.

To give him this name of her own will
Is what may not be done,
For, having applied to all the Twelve,
She may not prefer the one.

By one of their names she hath vow'd to call
Her son, if son it should be ;
But which, is a point whereon she must let
The Apostles themselves agree.

Already Queen Mary hath to them
Contracted a grateful debt ;
And from their patronage she hoped
For these further blessings yet.

Alas ! it was not her hap to be
As handsome as she was good ;
And that her husband King Pedro thought so,
She very well understood.

She had lost him from her lawful bed
For lack of personal graces,
And by prayers to them, and a pious deceit,
She had compass'd his embraces.

But if this hope of a son should fail,
All hope must fail with it then,
For she could not expect by a second device
To compass the King again.

Queen Mary hath had her first heart's wish—
She hath brought forth a beautiful boy ;
And the bells have rung, and masses been sung,
And bonfires have blazed for joy.

And many's the cask of the good red wine,
And many the cask of the white,
Which was broach'd for joy that morning,
And emptied before it was night.

But now for Queen Mary's second heart's wish,
It must be determined now ;

And Bishop Boyl, her Confessor,
Is the person who taught her how.

Twelve waxen tapers he hath had made,
In size and weight the same ;
And to each of these twelve tapers,
He hath given an Apostle's name.

One holy Nun had bleached the wax,
Another the wicks had spun ;
And the golden candlesticks were bless'd,
Which they were set upon.

From that which should burn the longest,
The infant his name must take ;
And the Saint who own'd it was to be
His Patron for his name's sake.

A godlier or a goodlier sight
Was nowhere to be seen,
Methinks, that day, in Christendom,
Than in the chamber of that good Queen.

Twelve little altars have been there
Erected, for the nonce ;
And the twelve tapers are set thereon,
Which are all to be lit at once.

Altars more gorgeously dress'd
You nowhere could desire ;
At each there stood a ministering Priest
In his most rich attire.

A high altar hath there been raised,
Where the Crucifix you see ;
And the sacred Pix that shines with gold
And sparkles with jewelry.

Bishop Boyl, with his precious mitre on,
Hath taken there his stand,
In robes which were embroidered
By the Queen's own royal hand.

In one part of the ante-room
The Ladies of the Queen,
All with their rosaries in hand,
Upon their knees are seen.

In the other part of the ante-room,
The Chiefs of the realm you behold,
Ricos Omes, and Bishops, and Abbots,
And Knights, and Barons bold.

Queen Mary could behold all this
As she lay in her state bed ;
And from the pillow needed not
To lift her languid head.

One fear she had, though still her heart
The unwelcome thought eschew'd,
That haply the unlucky lot
Might fall upon St. Jude.

But the Saints, she trusted, that ill chance
Would certainly forefend ;

And moreover there was a double hope
Of seeing the wish'd-for end ; —

Because there was a double chance
For the best of all good names ;
If it should not be Santiago himself,
It might be the lesser St. James.

And now Bishop Boyl hath said the mass ;
And as soon as the mass was done,
The priests, who by the twelve tapers stood,
Each instantly lighted one.

The tapers were short and slender too,
Yet to the expectant throng,
Before they to the socket burnt,
The time, I trow, seem'd long

The first that went out was St. Peter,
The second was St. John ;
And now St. Matthias is going,
And now St. Matthew is gone.

Next there went St. Andrew ;
There goes St. Philip too ;
And see ! there is an end
Of St. Bartholomew.

St. Simon is in the snuff ;
But it was a matter of doubt
Whether he or St. Thomas could be said
Soonest to have gone out.

There are only three remaining,
St. Jude, and the two St. James ;
And great was then Queen Mary's hope
For the best of all good names.

Great was then Queen Mary's hope,
But greater her fear, I guess,
When one of the three went out,
And that one was St. James the Less.

They are now within less than quarter-inch,
The only remaining two !
When there came a thief in St. James,
And it made a gutter too !

Up started Queen Mary,
Up she sat in her bed ;
"I never can call him Judas."'
She clasp'd her hands and said.

"I never can call him Judas !"
Again did she exclaim ;
"Holy Mother, preserve us !
It is not a Christian name !"

She spread her hands, and clasp'd them again,
And the Infant in the cradle
Set up a cry, an angry cry,
As loud as he was able.

"Holy Mother, preserve us !"
The Queen her prayer renew'd ;

When in came a moth at the window,
And flutter'd about St. Jude.

St. James hath fallen in the socket,
But as yet the flame is not out;
And St. Jude hath singed the silly moth
That flutters so blindly about.

And before the flame and the molten wax
That silly moth could kill,
It hath beat out St. Jude with its wings,
And St. James is burning still!

Oh, that was a joy for Queen Mary's heart;
The babe is christened James;
The Prince of Aragon hath got
The best of all good names!

Glory to Santiago,
The mighty one in war!
James he is call'd, and he shall be King James the Conqueror!

Now shall the Crescent wane,
The Cross be set on high
In triumph upon many a Mosque;
Woe, woe to Maw'netry!

Valencia shall be subdued;
Majorca shall be won;
The Moors be routed every where;
Joy, joy, for Aragon!

Shine brighter now, ye stars, that crown
Our Lady del Pilar,
And rejoice in thy grave, Cid Campeador, Ruydiez de Bivar!

Keswick, 1829.

ROPRECHT THE ROBBER.

The story here versified is told by Taylor the Water Poet, in his "Three Weeks, Three Days, and Three Hours' Observations from London to Hamburg, in Germany; amongst Jews and Gentiles, with Descriptions of Towns and Towers, Castles and Citadels, artificial Gallowses and natural Hangmen; and dedicated for the present to the absent Odombian Knight Errant, Sir Thomas Coryat." It is in the volume of his collected works, p. 82, of the third paging. Collein, which is the scene of this story, is more probably Kollen on the Elbe, in Bohemia, or a town of the same name in Prussia, than Cologne, to which great city the reader will perceive I had good reasons for transferring it.

PART I.

ROPRECHT the Robber is taken at last;
In Cologne they have him fast;
Trial is over, and sentence past;
And hopes of escape were vain, he knew,
For the gallows now must have its due.

But though pardon cannot here be bought,
It may for the other world, he thought;
And so, to his comfort, with one consent
The Friars assured their penitent.

Money, they teach him, when rightly given,
Is put out to account with Heaven;
For suffrages therefore his plunder went,
Sinfully gotten, but piously spent.

All Saints, whose shrines are in that city,
They tell him, will on him have pity,
Seeing he hath liberally paid,
In this time of need, for their good aid.

In the Three Kings they bid him confide,
Who there in Cologne lie side by side:
And from the Eleven Thousand Virgins eke,
Intercession for him will they bespeak.

And also a sharer he shall be
In the merits of their community;
All which they promise, he need not fear,
Through Purgatory will carry him clear.

Though the furnace of Babylon could not compare
With the terrible fire that rages there,
Yet they their part will so zealously do,
He shall only but frizzle as he flies through.

And they will help him to die well,
And he shall be hang'd with book and bell;
And moreover with holy water they
Will sprinkle him, ere they turn away.

For buried Roprecht must not be;
He is to be left on the triple tree;
That they who pass along may spy
Where the famous Robber is hanging on high.

Seen is that gibbet far and wide
From the Rhine and from the Dusseldorff side;
And from all roads which cross the sand,
North, south, and west, in that level land.

It will be a comfortable sight
To see him there by day and by night;
For Roprecht the Robber many a year
Had kept the country round in fear.

So the Friars assisted, by special grace,
With book and bell to the fatal place;
And he was hang'd on the triple tree,
With as much honor as man could be.

In his suit of irons he was hung;
They sprinkled him then, and their psalm they sung;
And turning away when this duty was paid,
They said, What a goodly end he had made!

The crowd broke up, and went their way;
All were gone by the close of day;
And Roprecht the Robber was left there
Hanging alone in the moonlight air

The last who look'd back for a parting sight,
Beheld him there in the clear moonlight;
But the first who look'd when the morning shone,
Saw in disnay that Roprecht was gone.

PART II.

THE stir in Cologne is greater to-day
Than all the bustle of yesterday;
Hundreds and thousands went out to see;
The irons and chains, as well as he,
Were gone, but the rope was left on the tree.

A wonderful thing! for every one said
He had hung till he was dead, dead, dead,
And on the gallows was seen, from noon
Till ten o'clock, in the light of the moon.

Moreover the Hangman was ready to swear
He had done his part with all due care;
And that certainly better hang'd than he
No one ever was, or ever could be.

Neither kith nor kin, to bear him away,
And funeral rites in secret pay,
Had he; and none that pains would take,
With risk of the law, for a stranger's sake.

So 'twas thought, because he had died so well,
He was taken away by miracle.
But would he again alive be found?
Or had he been laid in holy ground?

If in holy ground his relics were laid,
Some marvellous sign would show, they said;
If restored to life, a Friar he would be,
Or a holy Hermit certainly,
And die in the odor of sanctity.

That thus it would prove they could not doubt,
Of a man whose end had been so devout;
And to disputing then they fell
About who had wrought this miracle.

Had the Three Kings this mercy shown,
Who were the pride and honor of Cologne?
Or was it an act of proper grace,
From the Army of Virgins of British race,
Who were also the glory of that place?

Pardon, some said, they might presume,
Being a kingly act, from the Kings must come;
But others maintained that St. Ursula's heart
Would sooner be moved to the merciful part.

There was one who thought this aid divine
Came from the other bank of the Rhine;
For Roprecht there, too, had for favor applied,
Because his birthplace was on that side.

To Dusseldorff then the praise might belong,
And its Army of Martyrs, ten thousand strong;
But he for a Dusseldorff man was known,

And no one would listen to him in Cologne,
Where the people would have the whole wonder their own.

The Friars, who help'd him to die so well,
Put in their claim to the miracle;
Greater things than this, as their Annals could tell,
The stock of their merits for sinful men
Had done before, and would do again.

'Twas a whole week's wonder in that great town,
And in all places, up the river and down;
But a greater wonder took place of it then,
For Roprecht was found on the gallows again!

PART III.

WITH that the whole city flocked out to see;
There Roprecht was on the triple tree,
Dead, past all doubt, as dead could be;
But fresh he was as if spells had charm'd him,
And neither wind nor weather had harm'd him.

While the multitude stood in a muse,
One said, I am sure he was hang'd in shoes!
In this the Hangman and all concurr'd;
But now, behold, he was booted and spur'd!

Plainly therefore it was to be seen,
That somewhere on horseback he had been;
And at this the people marvelled more,
Than at any thing which had happened before.

For not in riding trim was he
When he disappeared from the triple tree;
And his suit of irons he still was in,
With the collar that clipp'd him under the chin.

With that this second thought befell,
That perhaps he had not died so well,
Nor had Saints perform'd the miracle;
But rather there was cause to fear,
That the foul Fiend had been busy here!

Roprecht the Robber had long been their curse,
And hanging had only made him worse;
For bad as he was when living, they said
They had rather meet him alive than dead.

What a horse must it be which he had ridden!
No earthly beast could be so bestridden;
And when by a hell horse a dead rider was carried,
The whole land would be fearfully harried!

So some were for digging a pit in the place,
And burying him there with a stone on his face;
And that hard on his body the earth should be press'd,
And exorcists be sent for to lay him at rest.

But others, whose knowledge was greater, opined
That this corpse was too strong to be confined;
No weight of earth which they could lay

Would hold him down a single day,
If he chose to get up and ride away.

There was no keeping Vampires under ground;
And bad as a Vampire he might be found,
Pests against whom, it was understood,
Exorcism never had done any good.

But fire, they said, had been proved to be
The only infallible remedy;
So they were for burning the body outright,
Which would put a stop to his riding by night.

Others were for searching the mystery out,
And setting a guard the gallows about,
Who should keep a careful watch, and see Whether Witch or Devil it might be
That helped him down from the triple tree; —

For that there were Witches in the land,
Was what all by this might understand;
And they must not let the occasion slip
For detecting that cursed fellowship.

Some were for this, and some for that,
And some they could not tell for what;
And never was such commotion known
In that great city of Cologne.

PART IV.

PIETER SNOYE was a boor of good renown,
Who dwelt about an hour and a half from the town;
And he, while the people were all in debate,
Went quietly in at the city gate.

For Father Kijf he sought about,
His confessor, till he found him out;
But the Father Confessor wondered to see
The old man, and what his errand might be.

The good Priest did not wonder less
When Pieter said he was come to confess;
“Why, Pieter, how can this be so?
I confessed thee some ten days ago!

“Thy conscience, methinks, may be well at rest,
An honest man among the best;
I would that all my flock, like thee,
Kept clear accounts with Heaven and me!”

Always before, without confusion,
Being sure of easy absolution,
Pieter his little slips had summ'd;
But he hesitated now, and he haw'd, and humm'd.

And something so strange the Father saw
In Pieter's looks, and his hum and his haw,
That he began to doubt it was something more
Than a trifle omitted in last week's score.

At length it came out, that in the affair
Of Roprecht the Robber he had some share;

The Confessor then gave a start in fear —
“God grant there have been no witchcraft here!”

Pieter Snoye, who was looking down,
With something between a smile and a frown,
Felt that suspicion move his bile,
And look'd up with more of a frown than a smile.

“Fifty years I, Pieter Snoye,
Have lived in this country, man and boy,
And have always paid the Church her due,
And kept short scores with Heaven and you.

“The Devil himself, though Devil he be,
Would not dare impute that sin to me;
He might charge me as well with heresy;
And if he did, here, in this place,
I'd call him liar, and spit in his face!”

The Father, he saw, cast a gracious eye
When he heard him thus the Devil defy;
The wrath, of which he had eased his mind,
Left a comfortable sort of warmth behind,

Like what a cheerful cup will impart,
In a social hour, to an honest man's heart;
And he added, “For all the witchcraft here,
I shall presently make that matter clear.

“Though I am, as you very well know, Father Kijf,
A peaceable man, and keep clear of strife,
It's a queerish business that now I've been in;
But I can't say that it's much of a sin.

“However, it needs must be confess'd,
And as it will set this people at rest,
To come with it at once was best:
Moreover, if I delayed, I thought
That some might perhaps into trouble be brought.

“Under the seal I tell it you,
And you will judge what is best to do,
That no hurt to me and my son may ensue.
No earthly harm have we intended,
And what was ill done has been well mended.

“I and my son, Piet Pieterszoon,
Were returning home by the light of the moon,
From this good city of Cologne,
On the night of the execution day;
And hard by the gibbet was our way.

“About midnight it was we were passing by,
My son, Piet Pieterszoon, and I,
When we heard a moaning as we came near,
Which made us quake at first for fear.

“But the moaning was presently heard again,
And we knew it was nothing ghostly then;
‘Lord help us, Father!’ Piet Pieterszoon said,
‘Roprecht, for certain, is not dead!’

“So under the gallows our cart we drive,
And, sure enough, the man was alive;

Because of the irons that he was in,
He was hanging, not by the neck, but the chin.

"The reason why things had got thus wrong,
Was, that the rope had been left too long;
The Hangman's fault — a clumsy rogue,
He is not fit to hang a dog.

"Now Roprecht, as long as the people were there,
Never stirr'd hand or foot in the air;
But when at last he was left alone,
By that time so much of his strength was gone,
That he could do little more than groan.

"Piet and I had been sitting it out,
Till a latish hour, at a christening bout;
And perhaps we were rash, as you may think,
And a little soft, or so, for drink.

"Father Kijf, we could not bear
To leave him hanging in misery there;
And 'twas an act of mercy, I cannot but say,
To get him down, and take him away.

"And, as you know, all people said
What a goodly end that day he had made;
So we thought for certain, Father Kijf,
That, if he were saved, he would mend his life.

"My son, Piet Pieterszoon, and I,
We took him down, seeing none was nigh;
And we took off his suit of irons with care,
When we got him home, and we hid him there.

"The secret, as you may guess, was known
To Alit, my wife, but to her alone;
And never sick man, I dare aver,
Was better tended than he was by her.

"Good advice, moreover, as good could be,
He had from Alit, my wife, and me;
And no one could promise fairer than he:
So that we and Piet Pieterszoon, our son,
Thought that we a very good deed had done.

"You may well think we laughed in our sleeve,
At what the people then seem'd to believe;
Queer enough it was to hear them say,
That the Three Kings took Roprecht away; —

"Or that St. Ursula, who is in bliss,
With her Army of Virgins had done this:
The Three Kings and St. Ursula, too,
I warrant, had something better to do.

"Piet Pieterszoon, my son, and I,
We heard them talk as we stood by,
And Piet look'd at me with a comical eye.
We thought them fools, but, as you shall see,
Not over-wise ourselves were we.

"For I must tell you, Father Kijf,
That when we told this to Alit, my wife,
She at the notion perk'd up with delight,
And said she believed the people were right.

"Had not Roprecht put in the Saints his hope,
And who but they should have loosen'd the rope,
When they saw that no one could intend
To make at the gallows a better end?

"Yes, she said, it was perfectly clear
That there must have been a miracle here;
And we had the happiness to be in it,
Having been brought there just at the minute.

"And therefore it would become us to make
An offering for this favor's sake
To the Three Kings and the Virgins too,
Since we could not tell to which it was due.

"For greater honor there could be none
Than what in this business the Saints had done
To us and Piet Pieterszoon, our son;
She talk'd me over, Father Kijf,
With that tongue of hers, did Alit, my wife.

"Lord, forgive us! as if the Saints would deign
To come and help such a rogue in grain;
When the only mercy the case could admit
Would have been to make his halter fit!

"That would have made one hanging do,
In happy season for him too,
When he was in a proper eue;
And have saved some work, as you will see,
To my son, Piet Pieterszoon, and me.

"Well, Father, we kept him at bed and board,
Till his neck was cured and his strength restored,
And we should have sent him off this day
With something to help him on his way.

"But this wicked Roprecht, what did he?
Though he had been saved thus mercifully,
Hanging had done him so little good,
That he took to his old ways as soon as he could.

"Last night, when we were all asleep,
Out of his bed did this gallows-bird creep;
Piet Pieterszoon's boots and spurs he put on,
And stole my best horse, and away he was gone!

"Now Alit, my wife, did not sleep so hard,
But she heard the horse's feet in the yard;
And when she jogg'd me, and bade me awake,
My mind misgave me as soon as she spake.

"To the window my good woman went,
And watch'd which way his course he bent;
And in such time as a pipe can be lit,
Our horses were ready with bridle and bit.

"Away, as fast as we could hie,
We went, Piet Pieterszoon and I;
And still on the plain we had him in sight;
The moon did not shine for nothing that night.

"Knowing the ground, and riding fast,
We came up with him at last,
And — would you believe it? Father Kijf,

The ungrateful wretch would have taken my life,
If he had not miss'd his stroke with a knife!

"The struggle in no long time was done,
Because, you know, we were two to one;
But yet all our strength we were fain to try,
Piet Pieterszoon, my son, and I.

"When we had got him on the ground,
We fastened his hands, and his legs we bound;
And across the horse we laid him then,
And brought him back to the house again.

"We have robb'd the gallows, and that was ill
Said I to Piet Pieterszoon, my son; [done!]
'And restitution we must make
To that same gallows, for justice' sake.'

"In his suit of irons the rogue we array'd,
And once again in the cart he was laid!
Night not yet so far was spent,
But there was time enough for our intent;
And back to the triple tree we went.

"His own rope was ready there;
To measure the length we took good care;
And the job which the bungling Hangman begun,
This time, I think, was properly done
By me and Piet Pieterszoon, my son."

THE YOUNG DRAGON.

The legend on which this poem is founded is related in the Vida y Hazañas del Gran Tamorlan, con la descripción de las Tierras de su Imperio y Señorío, escrita por Ruy Gonzalez de Clavijo, Camarero del muy alto y Poderoso Señor Don Enrique. Tercero deste nombre, Rey de Castilla y de Leon; con un Itinerario de lo sucedido en la Embajada, que por dicho Señor el Rey hizo al dicho Príncipe, llamado por otro nombre Tamurbec, año del nacimiento de 1403.

The ambassadors had seen at Constantinople, in the Church of St. John of the Stone, el brazo izquierdo de Sant Juan Baptista; el qual brazo era de so el ombro ayuso fasta en la mano. E este brazo fué quemado, e non tenia salvo el cuero e el hueso, e á las coyunturas del codo a de la mano estaba guarnecida de oro con piedras. They then went to a church of our Lady, called Peribelico, é aqui in esta Iglesia estaba el otra brazo del bienaventurado Sant Juan Baptista, el qual fué mostrado á los dichos Embajadores: el qual brazo era el derecho, y era desde el codo ayuso con su mano; é estaba bien fresco é sano; é como quicra que dicen que todo el cuerpo del bienaventurado Sant Juan fué que mado, salvo el un dedo de la mano derecha con que señalo quando dixo, Ecce Agnus Dei, todo este dicho brazo estaba sano segun alli pareció: estaba engastonado con unas vergas de oro delgadas, y falliesciale el dedo pulgar; y la razon que los Monges decian porque falliesciale aquel dedo de alli, era esta: Decian que en la ciudad de Antiochia, al tiempo que en ella avia idolatras, que andaba en él una figura de Dragon, á que avian por costumbre los de la ciudad de dar cada ano á comer á aquel Dragon una persona. E qui echaban suertes a qual caeria; e que aquel á quien caia, que non pudiese escusar que lo non comiese aquel Dragon. La qual suerte diz que cayó en aquel tiempo á una fija de un ome bueno, e que quando vido que non podia escusar de dar su fija á aquel Dragon, que ovo gran cuita en su corazon, e que con dolor de la fija, que se fuera á una Iglesia de Monges Christianos, que entonces en la dicha ciudad avia, é dixo á los Monges que él avia oido algunas veces, que Dios avia fecho muchos milagros por Sant Juan; por ende que él queria creer que era verdad, e adorar en aquel brazo suyo que alli tenian. E demandóle merced que entre los otros milagros que Dios nuestro Señor avia mostrado por él, que quisiere agora fucerle merced de mostrar este, é ficiese como su fija non muriese tan mala muerte, como era comida de aquella fiera, e la librase de aquel peligro: é que los Monges aviendo compasion dél, que le mostraron el dicho brazo, é que él que fucára los hinojos por lo adorar; e que con dolor de la fija que travára con los dientes del dedo pulgar de la mano del Sancto glorioso, é que ge lo arrancára e llevára en su boca, que los Monges non lo vieron, e que quando quisieron dar la doncella al Dragon, que el que abrió la boca por la comer, e que él entonces qui le lanzó el dedo del bienaventurado Sant Juan Baptista en la boca, e que rebento luego el Dragon, que fué un gran milagro; e que aquel ome que se convirtió á le Fé de nuestro Señor Jesu Christo. pp. 53, 54.

PART I.

PITHYRIAN was a Pagan,
An easy-hearted man,
And Pagan sure he thought to end,
As Pagan he began;
Thought he, the one must needs be true,
The old Religion, or the new,
And therefore nothing care I;
I call Diana the Divine;
My daughter worships at the shrine
Of the Christian Goddess, Mary.

In this uncertain matter
If I the wrong course take,
Mary to me will mercy show
For my Marana's sake.
If I am right, and Dian bend
Her dreadful bow, or Phœbus send
His shafts abroad for slaughter,
Safe from their arrows shall I be,
And the twin Deities for me
Will spare my dear-loved daughter.

If every one in Antioch
Had reasoned in this strain,
It never would have raised alarm
In Satan's dark domain.
But Mary's Image every day
Looks down on crowds who come to pray;
Her votaries never falter;
While Dian's temple is so bare,
That unless her Priestess take good care,
She will have a grass-green altar.

Perceiving this, the old Dragon
Inflamed with anger grew;
Earthquakes and Plagues were common ills,
There needed something new;
Some vengeance so severe and strange
That forepast times, in all their range,
With no portent could match it;
So for himself a nest he made,
And in that nest an egg he laid,
And down he sat to hatch it.

He built it by the fountain
Of Phlegethon's red flood,

In the innermost abyss, the place
Of central solitude ;
Of adamantine blocks unhewn,
With lava scoria interstrewn,
The sole material fitting ;
With amianth he lined the nest,
And incombustible asbest,
To bear the fiery sitting.

There, with malignant patience,
He sat in fell despite,
Till this dracontine cockatrice
Should break its way to light.
Meantime his angry heart to cheer,
He thought that all this while no fear
The Antiocheans stood in,
Of what, on deadliest vengeance bent,
With imperturbable intent,
He there for them was brooding.

The months of incubation
At length were duly past ;
And now the infernal Dragon-chick
Hath burst its shell at last ;
At which long-look'd-for sight enrapt,
For joy the father Dragon clapp'd
His brazen wings like thunder,
So loudly that the mighty sound
Was like an earthquake felt around,
And all above and under.

The diabolic youngling
Came out no callow birth,
Puling, defenceless, blind and weak,
Like bird or beast of earth ;
Or man, most helpless thing of all
That fly, or swim, or creep, or crawl ;
But in his perfect figure ;
His horns, his dreadful tail, his sting,
Scales, teeth, and claws, and every thing,
Complete and in their vigor.

The Old Dragon was delighted,
And proud withal to see
In what perfection he had hatch'd
His hellish progeny ;
And round and round, with fold on fold,
His tail about the imp he roll'd,
In fond and close enlacement ;
And neck round neck, with many a turn,
He coil'd, which was, you may discern,
Their manner of embracement.

PART II.

A VOICE was heard in Antioch,
Whence uttered none could know ;
But from their sleep it wakened all,
Proclaiming, Woe, woe, woe !
It sounded here, it sounded there,
Within, without, and every where,
A terror and a warning ;

Repeated thrice the dreadful word
By every living soul was heard
Before the hour of morning.

And in the air a rushing
Past over, in the night ;
And as it past, there past with it
A meteoric light ;
The blind that piercing light intense
Felt in their long-seal'd visual sense,
With sudden, short sensation :
The deaf that rushing in the sky
Could hear, and that portentous cry
Reach'd them with consternation.

The astonished Antiocheans
Impatiently await
The break of day, not knowing when
Or what might be their fate.
Alas ! what then the people hear,
Only with certitude of fear
Their sinking hearts affrighted ;
For in the fertile vale below,
Came news that, in that night of woe,
A Dragon had alighted.

It was no earthly monster
In Libyan deserts nurs'd ;
Nor had the Lerna lake sent forth
This winged worm accurs'd ;
The Old Dragon's own laid egg was this,
The fierce Young Dragon of the abyss,
Who from the fiery fountain,
Through earth's concavities, that night
Had made his way, and taken flight
Out of a burning mountain.

A voice that went before him
The cry of woe preferred ;
The motion of his brazen wings
Was what the deaf had heard ;
The flashing of his eyes, that light
The which upon their inward sight
The blind had felt astounded ;
What wonder then, when from the wall
They saw him in the vale, if all
With terror were confounded ?

Compared to that strong armor
Of scales which he was in,
The hide of a rhinoceros
Was like a lady's skin.
A battering-ram might play in vain
Upon his head, with might and main,
Though fifty men had work'd it ;
And from his tail they saw him fling
Out, like a rocket, a long sting,
When he for pastime jerk'd it.

To whom of Gods or Heroes
Should they for aid apply ?
Where should they look for succor now,
Or whither should they fly ?
For now no Demigods were found
Like those whose deathless deeds abound

In ancient song and story ;
 No Hercules was then on earth,
 Nor yet of her St. George's birth
 Could Cappadocia glory.

And even these against him
 Had found their strength but small ;
 He could have swallowed Hercules,
 Club, lion-skin, and all.
 Yea, had St. George himself been there
 Upon the fiercest steed that e'er
 To battle bore bestrider,
 This dreadful Dragon, in his might,
 One mouthful only, and one bite,
 Had made of horse and rider.

They see how unavailing
 All human force must prove ;
 Oh, might their earnest prayers obtain
 Protection from above !
 The Christians sought our Lady's shrine,
 To invoke her aid divine ;
 And, with a like emotion,
 The Pagans, on that fearful day,
 Took to Diana's fane their way,
 And offered their devotion.

But there the offended Goddess
 Beheld them with a frown ;
 The indignant altar heaved itself,
 And shook their offerings down ;
 The Priestess, with a deathlike hue,
 Pale as the marble Image grew ;
 The marble Image reddened ;
 And these poor suppliants, at the sight,
 Felt, in fresh access of affright,
 Their hearts within them deaden'd.

Behold the marble eyeballs
 With life and motion shine !
 And from the moving marble lips
 There comes a voice divine,
 A demon voice, by all the crowd
 Distinctly heard, nor low, nor loud,
 But deep, and clear, and thrilling ;
 And carrying to the soul such dread
 That they perforce must what it said
 Obey, however unwilling.

Hear ! hear ! it said, ye people !
 The ancient Gods have sent,
 In anger for your long neglect,
 This signal punishment.
 To mortal Mary vows were paid,
 And prayers prefer'd, and offerings made ;
 Our temples were deserted ;
 Now when our vengeance makes ye wise,
 Unto your proper Deities
 In fear ye have reverted !

Hear now the dreadful judgment
 For this which ye have done : —
 The infernal Dragon will devour
 Your daughters, one by one ;

A Christian Virgin, every day,
 Ye must present him for his prey,
 With garlands deck'd, as meet is :
 That with the Christians he begins
 Is what, in mercy to your sins,
 Ye owe to my entreaties.

Whether, if to my worship
 Ye now continue true,
 I may, when these are all consumed,
 Avert the ill from you,
 That on the Ancient Gods depends,
 If they be made once more your friends
 By your sincere repentance :
 But for the present, no delay ;
 Cast lots among ye, and obey
 The inexorable sentence.

PART III.

THROUGH to the Pagan priesthood
 A triumph this might seem,
 Few families there were who thus
 Could in their grief misdeem ;
 For, oft in those distracted days,
 Parent and child went different ways,
 The sister and the brother ;
 And when, in spirit moved, the wife
 Chose one religious course of life,
 The husband took the other.

Therefore in every household
 Was seen the face of fear ;
 They who were safe themselves, exposed
 In those whom they held dear.
 The lists are made, and in the urn
 The names are placed to wait their turn
 For this far worse than slaughter ;
 And from that fatal urn, the first
 Drawn for this dreadful death accurs'd
 Was of Pithyrian's daughter.

With Christian-like composure,
 Marana heard her lot ;
 And though her countenance at first
 Grew pale, she trembled not.
 Not for herself the Virgin grieved ;
 She knew in whom she had believed,
 Knew that a crown of glory
 In Heaven would recompense her worth,
 And her good name remain on earth
 The theme of sacred story.

Her fears were for her father,
 How he should bear this grief,
 Poor wretched heathen, if he still Remain'd in misbelief ;
 Her looks amid the multitude,
 Who struck with deep compassion stood,
 Are seeking for Pithyrian :
 He cannot bear to meet her eye.
 Where goest thou ? whither wouldst thou fly,
 Thou miserable Syrian ?

Hath sudden hope inspired him,
Or is it in despair
That through the throng he made his way,
And sped he knew not where?
For how could he the sight sustain,
When now the sacrificial train
Inhumanly surround her!
How bear to see her when, with flowers
From rosiers and from jasmine bowers,
They like a victim crown'd her!

He knew not why nor whither
So fast he hurried thence,
But felt like one possess'd by some Controlling influence;
Nor turn'd he to Diana's fane,
Inly assured that prayers were vain
If made for such protection;
His pagan faith he now forgot,
And the wild way he took was not
His own, but Heaven's direction.

He who had never enter'd
A Christian church till then,
Except in idle mood profane,
To view the ways of men,
Now to a Christian church made straight,
And hastened through its open gate,
By his good Angel guided,
And thinking, though he knew not why,
That there some blessed Power on high
Had help for him provided.

Wildly he look'd about him
On many a form divine,
Whose Image o'er its altar stood,
And many a sculptured shrine,
In which believers might behold
Relics more precious than the gold
And jewels which encased them,
With painful search from far and near
Brought to be venerated here,
Where piety had placed them.

There stood the Virgin Mother,
Crown'd with a starry wreath,
And there the awful Crucifix
Appeared to bleed and breathe;
Martyrs to whom their palm is given,
And sainted Maids who now in Heaven
With glory are invested;
Glancing o'er these, his rapid eye
Toward one image that stood nigh
Was drawn, and there it rested.

The countenance that fix'd him
Was of a sun-burnt mien;
The face was like a Prophet's face
Inspired, but yet serene;
His arms, and legs, and feet were bare;
The raiment was of camel's hair,
That, loosely hanging round him,
Fell from the shoulders to the knee;
And round the loins, though elsewhere free,
A leathern girdle bound him.

With his right arm uplifted,
The great Precursor stood,
Thus represented to the life
In carved and painted wood.
Below the real arm was laid
Within a crystal shrine display'd
For public veneration;
Not now of flesh and blood,—but bone,
Sinews, and shrivell'd skin alone,
In ghastly preservation.

Moved by a secret impulse
Which he could not withstand,
Let me, Pithyrian cried, adore
That blessed arm and hand!
This day, this miserable day,
My pagan faith I put away,
Abjure it and abhor it;
And in the Saints I put my trust,
And in the Cross; and, if I must,
Will die a Martyr for it.

This is the arm whose succor
Heaven brings me here to seek!
Oh, let me press it to my lips,
And so its aid bespeak!
A strong faith makes me now presume
That when to this unhappy doom
A hellish power hath brought her,
The heavenly hand, whose mortal mould
I humbly worship, will unfold
Its strength, and save my daughter.

The Sacristan with wonder
And pity heard his prayer,
And placed the relic in his hand,
As he knelt humbly there.
Right thankfully the kneeling man
To that confiding Sacristan
Return'd it, after kissing;
And he within its crystal shrine
Replaced the precious arm divine,
Nor saw that aught was missing.

PART IV.

Oh piety audacious!
Oh boldness of belief!
Oh sacrilegious force of faith,
That then inspired the thief!
Oh wonderful extent of love,
That Saints enthroned in bliss above
Should bear such profanation,
And not by some immediate act,
Striking the offender in the fact,
Prevent the perpetration!

But sure the Saint that impulse
Himself from Heaven had sent,
In mercy predetermining
The marvellous event;
So inconceivable a thought,
Seeming with such irreverence fraught,

Could else have no beginning ;
Nor else might such a deed be done,
As then Pithyrian ventured on,
Yet had no fear of sinning.

Not as that Church he enter'd
Did he from it depart,
Like one bewildered by his grief,
But confident at heart ;
Triumphantly he went his way,
And bore the Holy Thumb away,
Elated with his plunder ;
That Holy Thumb which well he knew
Could pierce the Dragon through and through,
Like Jupiter's own thunder.

Meantime was meek Marana
For sacrifice array'd ;
And now in sad procession forth
They led the flower-crown'd Maid.
Of this infernal triumph vain,
The Pagan Priests precede the train ;
Oh hearts devoid of pity !
And to behold the abhorr'd event,
At far or nearer distance went
The whole of that great city.

The Christians go to succor
The sufferer with their prayers,
The Pagans to a spectacle
Which dreadfully declares,
In this their over-ruling hour,
'Their Gods' abominable power ;
Yet not without emotion
Of grief, and horror, and remorse,
And natural piety, whose force
Prevail'd o'er false devotion.

The walls and towers are cluster'd,
And every hill and height
That overlooks the vale, is throng'd
For this accursed sight.
Why art thou joyful, thou green Earth ?
Wherefore, ye happy Birds, your mirth
Are ye in carols voicing ?
And thou, O Sun, in yon blue sky,
How canst thou hold thy course on high
This day, as if rejoicing ?

Already the procession
Hath past the city gate ;
And now along the vale it moves
With solemn pace sedate.
And now the spot before them lies
Where, waiting for his promised prize,
The Dragon's chosen haunt is ;
Blacken'd beneath his blasting feet,
Though yesterday a green retreat
Beside the clear Orontes.

There the procession halted ;
The Priests on either hand
Dividing then, a long array,
In order took their stand.

Midway between the Maid is left,
Alone, of human aid bereft :
The Dragon now hath spied her ;
But in that moment of most need,
Arriving breathless with his speed,
Her Father stood beside her.

On came the Dragon rampant,
Half running, half on wing,
His tail uplifted o'er his back
In many a spiral ring ;
His scales he ruffled in his pride ;
His brazen pennons, waving wide,
Were gloriously distended ;
His nostrils smoked ; his eyes flash'd fire ;
His lips were drawn ; and in his ire
His mighty jaws extended.

On came the Dragon rampant,
Expecting there no check,
And open-mouth'd to swallow both
He stretch'd his burnish'd neck.
Pithyrian put his daughter by,
Waiting for this with watchful eye,
And ready to prevent it ;
Within arm's length he let him come,
Then in he threw the Holy Thumb,
And down his throat he sent it.

The hugest brazen mortar
That ever yet fired bomb,
Could not have check'd this fiendish beast
As did that Holy Thumb.
He stagger'd as he wheel'd short round ;
His loose feet scraped along the ground,
To lift themselves unable ;
His pennons in their weakness flagg'd ;
His tail, erected late, now dragg'd,
Just like a long, wet cable.

A rumbling and a tumbling
Was heard in his inside ;
He gasp'd, he panted, he lay down,
He roll'd from side to side ;
He moan'd, he groan'd, he snuff'd, he snored
He growl'd, he howl'd, he raved, he roar'd ;
But loud as were his clamors,
Far louder was the inward din,
Like a hundred braziers working in
A caldron with their hammers.

The hammering came faster,
More faint the moaning sound ;
And now his body swells, and now
It rises from the ground.
Not upward with his own consent,
Nor borne by his own wings, he went ;
Their vigor was abated ;
But lifted, no one could tell how,
By power unseen, with which he now
Was visibly inflated.

Abominable Dragon,
Now art thou overmatch'd ;

And better had it been for thee
 That thou hadst ne'er been hatch'd ;
 For now, distended like a ball
 To its full stretch, in sight of all,
 The body mounts ascendant ;
 The head before, the tail behind,
 The wings, like sails that want a wind,
 On either side are pendant.

Not without special merey
 Was he thus borne on high,
 Till he appear'd no bigger than
 An Eagle in the sky.
 For when about some three miles height,
 Yet still in perfect reach of sight, —
 Oh, wonder of all wonders ! —
 He burst in pieces, with a sound
 Heard for a hundred leagues around,
 And like a thousand thunders.

But had that great explosion
 Been in the lower sky,
 All Antioch would have been laid
 In ruins, certainly.
 And in that vast assembled rout
 Who crowded joyfully about
 Pithyrian and his daughter,
 The splinters of the monster's hide
 Must needs have made on every side
 A very dreadful slaughter.

So far the broken pieces
 Were now dispersed around,
 And shiver'd so to dust, that not
 A fragment e'er was found.
 The Holy Thumb, (so it is thought,) —
 When it this miracle had wrought,
 At once to Heaven ascended ;
 As if, when it had thus display'd
 Its power, and saved the Christian Maid,
 Its work on earth was ended.

But at Constantinople
 The arm and hand were shown,
 Until the mighty Ottoman
 O'erthrew the Grecian throne.
 And when the Monks, this tale who told
 To pious visitors, would hold
 The holy hand for kissing,
 They never fail'd, with faith devout,
 In confirmation to point out
 That there the Thumb was missing.

EPILOGUE

to

THE YOUNG DRAGON.

I TOLD my tale of the Holy Thumb
 That split the Dragon asunder,

63

And my daughters made great eyes as they heard,
 Which were full of delight and wonder.

With listening lips and looks intent,
 There sat an eager boy,
 Who shouted sometimes, and clapp'd his hands,
 And could not sit still for joy.

But when I look'd at my Mistress's face,
 It was all too grave the while ;
 And when I ceased, methought there was more
 Of reproof than of praise in her smile.

That smile I read aright, for thus Reprovingly said she,
 " Such tales are meet for youthful ears,
 But give little content to me.

" From thee far rather would I hear
 Some sober, sadder lay,
 Such as I oft have heard, well pleased
 Before those locks were gray."

" Nay, Mistress mine," I made reply,
 " The Autumn hath its flowers,
 Nor ever is the sky more gay
 Than in its evening hours.

" Our good old Cat, Earl Toulemagne,
 Upon a warm Spring day,
 Even like a kitten at its sport,
 Is sometimes seen to play.

" That sense which held me back in youth
 From all intemperate gladness,
 That same good instinct bids me shun
 Unprofitable sadness.

" Nor marvel you if I prefer
 Of playful themes to sing ;
 The October grove hath brighter tints
 Than Summer or than Spring ;

" For o'er the leaves, before they fall,
 Such hues hath Nature thrown,
 That the woods wear, in sunless days,
 A sunshine of their own.

" Why should I seek to call forth tears ?
 The source from whence we weep
 Too near the surface lies in youth ;
 In age it lies too deep.

" Enough of foresight sad, too much
 Of retrospect, have I ;
 And well for me that I sometimes
 Can put those feelings by ; —

" From public ills, and thoughts that else
 Might weigh me down to earth,
 That I can gain some intervals
 For healthful, hopeful mirth ; —

" That I can sport in tales which suit
 Young auditors like these,
 Yet, if I err not, may content
 The few I seek to please.

"I know in what responsive minds
My lightest lay will wake
A sense of pleasure, for its own,
And for its author's sake

"I know the eyes in which the light
Of memory will appear;
I know the lips, which, while they read,
Will wear a smile sincere;—

"The hearts to which my sportive song
The thought of days will bring,
When they and I, whose Winter now
Comes on, were in our Spring.

"And I their well-known voices too,
Though far away, can hear,

Distinctly, even as when in dreams
They reach the inward ear.

"There speaks the man we knew of yore,
Well pleased I hear them say;
'Such was he in his lighter moods,
Before our heads were gray.

"Buoyant he was in spirit, quick
Of fancy, blithe of heart,
And Care, and Time, and Change have left
Untouch'd his better part.'

"Thus say my morning friends who now
Are in the vale of years,
And I, save such as thus may rise,
Would draw no other tears."

Ballads and Metrical Tales.

VOL. II.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE two volumes of this collection, which consist of Ballads and Metrical Tales, contain the Author's earliest and latest productions of that kind; those which were written with most facility and most glee, and those upon which most time and pains were bestowed, according to the subject and the mode of treating it.

The Tale of Paraguay was published separately in 1825, having been so long in hand that the Dedication was written many years before the Poem was completed.

All for Love, and The Legend of a Cock and a Hen, were published together in a little volume in 1829.

A TALE OF PARAGUAY.

PREFACE.

ONE of my friends observed to me, in a letter, that many stories which are said to be founded on fact, have in reality been founded on it. This is the case, if there be any gross violation committed, or ignorance betrayed, of historical manners in the prominent parts of a narrative wherein the writer affects to observe them; or when the ground-work is taken from some part of history so popular and well known that any mixture of fiction disturbs the sense of truth. Still more so, if the subject be in itself so momentous that any alloy of invention must of necessity debase it; but most of all in themes drawn from Scripture, whether from the more familiar or the more awful portions; for when what is true is saered, whatever may be added to it is so surely felt to be false, that it appears profane.

Founded on fact the Poem is, which is here committed to the world; but, whatever may be its defects, it is liable to none of these objections. The story is so singular, so simple, and, withal, so complete, that it must have been injured by any alteration. How faithfully it has been followed, the reader may perceive, if he chooses to consult the abridged translation of Dobrizhoffer's History of the Abipones; and for those who may be gratified with what Pinkerton has well called the lively singularity of the old man's Latin, the passage from the original is here subjoined.

"Ad Australes fluvij Empalado ripas Hispanorum turma Herbæ Paraquariæ conficiendæ operam dabat. Deficientibus jam arboribus, è quibus illa folia rescinduntur, exploratores tres emisserant, qui trans illud flumen arbores desideratas investigarent. Forte in tugurium, agrumque frumento Turcien consitum incidere, ex quo hanc sylvam barbarorum contuberniis scatere perperam arguebant. Hæc notitia tanto omnes perculit metu, ut suspensio, ad quem conducti fuerant, labore suis aliquamdiu in tuguriis laterent, ut limax intra concham. Diu noctuque hostilis aggressio formidabatur. Ad liberandos se hoc terrore cursor ad S. Joachimi oppidum missus, qui, ut barbaros istæ habitantes perquiramus, inventosque ad nostram transferamus coloniam flagitavit. Sine tergiversatione operam addixi meam. Licet trium hebdomadam itinere defunctus Nato servatori sacra die ex Mbaebera domum redierim, S. Joannis apostoli festo iter mox aggressus sum cum quadraginta Indorum meorum comitatu. Fluvii ob continuatum dies complures imbrem turgentibus profectio perardua nobis exstitit. Accepto ex Hispanorum tugurio viarum duce, trajectoque flumine Empalado sylvas omnes ad fluvij Mondag miri ripas usque attentis oculis pervagati, tertio demum die, humano, quod deteximus, vestigio nos ducente ediculum attigimus, ubi mater vetula, cum filio vicesimum, filiaque quintum decimum annum agente annis abhinc multis degebat. Quibus in latebris Indi alii versarentur, à me rogata mater, neminem mortalium præter se, binasque proles, his in sylvis superesse, omnes, qui per hanc viciniam habitaverant, variolarum dira peste dudum extinctos fuisse, respondit. De dicti veritate ancipitem me dum observaret filius: tutò, ait, fidem adhiberis matri meæ ista affirmanti: namque ipsus ego uxorem mihi quæsiturus remotissimas etiam sylvas identidem percursavi, quin tamen vel hominis umbram reperirem aspicio. En! nature instinctu adolescens barbarus, conjugium cum sorore sibi nequiquam licere, intellexit. Is multis post mensibus meo in oppido, nullos præter se homines illis in sylvis degere, iterum, iterumque ingenue mihi asseveravit. Idem confirmarunt Hispani, à quibus evocatus sum, ultra biennium in conquirenda herba dein per illas sylvas occupati, non medioeri cum quæstu.

“Vetulam matrem congruis argumentis hortans sum ad meum ut oppidum, siquidem luberet, commigaret ocyus, se, suosque meliori fortuna illic usuros, pollicitus. Lubenter invitationi meæ obtemperatam se, respondit; rem unicam migrationi suæ obstare. Sunt mihi, ait, tres, quos coram vides, apri à prima ætate mansueti; nos quoque euntes caniculi more sequuntur. Hi, si campum aridum videant, vel extra sylvarum umbram à sole ardenti videantur, peribunt confestim, timeo. Hanc solitudinem, quæso, animo ejicias tuo, reposui; cordi mihi fore chara animalcula, nil dubites. Sole astuante umbram, ubi ubi demum, captabimus. Neque lacunæ, annes, paludes, ubi refrigerantur tua hæc coreula, usquam deerunt. Talibus delinita promissis se nobiscum ituram, spondit. Et vero postridie iter ingressi, calendis Januarii incolumes oppidum attigimus, licet per viam binæ fulminibus, imbribusque horrendis fætæ tempestates nobis incubuerint, ac tigris rugitu assiduo totam per noctem minitans nobis iterum, iterumque propinquarit. Hispanos, quæis matrem duabus cum prolibus per transennam exhibui, nihilque omnino fudorum sylvestrium in tota late vicinia superesse, significavi, timoris sui et puduit, et penituit. Autumaverant equidem sylvas Empalado, et Mondag fluminibus interjectas barbarorum habitationibus, perinde ut formicis, undique scaterent. Jam de forma, habitudine, vivendi ratione, quam in matre, ejusque prolibus observaveram, dicendum obiter aliquid. Ab ineunte ætate in Mondag litioribus, culicem, serpentem, aliorumque animalculorum noxiorum frequentia oppido infectis consedere. Palmarum ramis tuguriolum definiabatur. Aqua semper lutulenta potum; arborum fructus, alces, damulæ, cuniculi, aves variæ, frumentum torigium, radices arboris mandio dapem; tela ex foliis caraquata contexta vestitum, lectumque præbuere. Mel, quod exesis in arboribus passim prostat, inter cupedias numerabatur. Tabacæ, quam peti vocant Quarani, fumum ex arundine, cui ligneum vasculum cacabi instar præfixum, diu noctuque hauserat vetula; filius tabacæ folia in pulverem redacta ore mandere nunquam desiit. Concha ad lapidem exacuta pro cultro utebantur, interdum arundine fissa. Adolescens matris, sororisque nutricius bina ferri frustilla, cultri olim confracti reliquias, pollicem lata, et pollice nil longiora, ligno, ceu manubrio inserta, cera, filoque circumligata cingulo gestabat suo. Hoc instrumento sagittas scitissime elaborare, decipulas è ligno ad capiendas alces facere, arbores, ubi mellis indicium viderat, perfodere, aliaque id genus præstare solebat. Cum argilla, è qua ollæ conficiuntur, nusquam esset, carnibus assis, non coctis vescabantur per omnem vitam. Herbarum Paraguariæ folia non nisi frigida perfudere, cum vas, quo aquam recepto moro calefacerent, non haberent. Ignem per affrictum celerem duorum lignellorum nõrunt promptissime elicere, omnium Americanorum more, quod alio loco exponam uberior. Ad restinguendam sitim aqua palustri, semperque, ni ab Austro frigido refrigeretur tantisper, tepida utebantur, cui adferendæ, asservendæque ingentes cucurbitæ pro cantharis serviunt. Ut, quam curta illis domi fuerit suppellex, porro videas, de eorum vestitu faciendâ est mentio.

“Puellæ pariter breve reticulum, in quo noctibus cubabat, per diem vestitus instar fuerat. Cum nimis diaphana mihi videretur, ut verecundiæ consultum irem in fudorum, Hispanorumque præsentia, linteum gossipinum, quo lotas manus tergemus, illius nuditati tegendæ destinavi. Puella linteum, quod illi Indi mei porrexerant, iterum, iterumque complicatum papyri instar, capiti imposuit suo, ceu clypeum contra solis æstus; verum admonita ab Indis illo se involvit. Juvenci quoque, ne verecundos offenderet oculos, perizomata linea, quibus in itineribus contra culicem morsus caput obvolveram meum, invito obtrusi. Præsertim celissimas arbores simii velocitate scandebat, ut fructus ab apris tribus devorandos, inde deciperet. Caligis, veluti compedibus impeditus vix gressum figere potuit. Tanta rerum penuria, frugalitate tanta cum in solitudine victitantur semper, ac anachoretarum veterum rigores, asperitatesque experirentur, sorte sua contentissimos, tranquillo animo, corporeque morborum nescios illos suspexi. Ex quo palam fit, naturam paucis contentam esse; erubescant illi, quibus saturandis, ornandisque totus orbis vix sufficit. Ex ultimis terræ finibus, ex oceani, sylvarum, camporum, montium, tellurisque gremio, ex elementis omnibus, et unde non? avidè petuntur subsidia, quæ ad comendandum corpus, ad oblectandum palatum faciunt. Verum dum oblectare se, ornareque putant, se onerant, opprimuntque. Dum delicias multiplicant suas, opes, viresque imminunt quotidie, formæ venustatem labefactant, morbus adescit sibi, mortemque accelerant eo infeliciores, quo fuerint deliciores.

“Tres mei sylvicolæ, de quibus sermo, rituum Quaraniis barbaris propriorum vel immemores, vel contemptores fuerunt. Crinibus passis sine ulla incisione, vel ligamine incedebant. Juveni nec labium pertusum, nec vertex psittacorum plumis coronatus. Matri, filiaque inanes nullæ, quamvis illa collo circumdederit monilis loco funiculum, è quo frustilla ligni pyramidati, sat multi ponderis pendebant; è mutuo illorum collisu ad quemvis gressum strepitus edebatur. Primo conspectu interrogavi vetulam: num ad terrendos culices strepitans hoc monile è collo suspenderit? moxque globulorum vitreorum exquisiti coloris fascem ligneis his ponderibus substituit. Mater, filiusque corpore erant proceri, forma honesta; filia vultu tam candido, tamque eleganti, ut à Poetis Diadas inter Nymphas, Hamadriadasque numerari, ab Eoropæo quovis pulchra dici tutò posset. Hilaritatem decoram affabilitati conjunctam præ se ferebat. Nostro adventu repentino minime terreri, recreari potius videbatur. Quarania lingua loquentes nos liberales inter caehinnos risit, nos illam eadem respondentem. Cum enim extra aliorum Indorum societatem fratri, matrique duntaxat colloqueretur, verbis Quaranicis retentis quidem, ridicula quædam dialectus irrepserat. Sic quaragi sol: yagi luna: cheragi ægroto dicimus reliqui, et illud e cum subjecta notula veluti s pronunciamus, quarassi, gassi, cherassi; illi quaratschi, yatschi, cheratschi dicebant. Juvenis præter matrem, sororemque nullam unquam vidit feminam; neque præter patrem suum virum aliquem. Puella matrem duntaxat novit, nullam præterea feminam. Virum præter fratrem suum ne eminus quidem conspexit, dum enim utero à matre gestabatur, pater ejus à tigride fuerat discerptus. Ad fructus seu humi, seu in arboribus natos conquirendos, ad ligna, foco necessaria, colligenda sylvam dumetis, arundinibus, spinisque horrentem solers puella peragravit quotidie, quibus pedes misere pertusos habebat. Ne incomitata esset, psittacum exilem humero, simiolum brachio insidentem circumtulit plerumque, nullo tigris metu, quæis omnis illa vicinia abundat, vel me ipso teste oculato. Prædie ejus diei, quo in istorum contubernium incurrimus, parum abfuit, quin dormiens à propinqua jaon tigride devorarer. Indi mei ejus rugitu expergefati et hastis et admotis celeriter ignibus vitam servarunt meam. His in nemoribus, cum minor sit ferarum copia, tigrides fame stimulante ferociant atrocibus, avidiusque in obvios assiliunt homines, quam in campis, ubi, cum infinita vis pecorum omnis generis oberret, præda, famisque remedium, quoties lubet, illis in promptu est. Novi proselyti in oppido mox vestiti reliquorum more, et præ reliquis quotidiano cibo liberaliter refecti sunt. Curatum quoque à me diligenter, ad sylvas vicinas cum aliis ut excurrant frequentius, umbra, amœnaque arborum, quæis assueverant, viriditate fruituri. Experientia equidem novimus, ut pisces extra aquam cito intereunt, sic barbaros è sylvis ad oppida translatos sæpe contabescere, victus, aerisque mutatione, ac solis potissimum æstu corporum habitudinem perturbante, quippe quæ à pueritia humidis, frigidiusculis, opacisque nemoribus assueverunt. Idem fuit matris, filii, filiaque nostro in oppido fatum. Paucis ab adventu suo hebdomadibus gravedine, rheumateque totum corpus pervadente tentabantur omnes. His oculorum, auriumque dolor, ac haud multo post surditas successit. Marore animi, cibi que omnis fastidium vires absumpsit adeo, ut extrema demum macies, tabesque nullis remediis profectibus consequeretur. Aliquot mensibus languescens mater senicula, Christianæ discipline rudimentis rite imbuta, sacroque tincta laticæ prima occubuit, animo tam sereno, Divinisque voluntatibus acquiescente, ut illam ad superos transisse nil dubitaverim. Puella, quæ plena vigoris, venustatisque oppidum ingrediebatur, viribus exhausta, sui omnino jam dissimilis, floris instar paulatim marcescens vix ossibus hæsit, ac denique matrem ad tumulum secuta est, et nisi vehementissime fallor, ad Cælum. Quid si cum regum sapientissimo dicamus: illam post sacrum, quo expiata est, baptisma consummatum in brevi explevisse tempora multa: placitam Deo fuisse animam illius: raptam esse, ne malitia mutaret intellectum ejus. Illud certissimum: qui innocentissimæ puellæ integritatem laudibus, funus præproperum lacrymis non prosequeretur, neminem in oppido fuisse. Præter illius tum superstes eandem, quæ mater, sororque extinctæ sunt, invaletudinem sensit, sed, quia robustior, superavit. Quin et ex morbillis, qui multas in oppido edebant strages, sibi convaluit adeo, ut confirmata penitus valetudine nihil illi porro metuedum esse videretur. Hilari erat animo, statis horis sacram adivit adem, Christiana dogmata condidit perdidit, morigerum, placidumque se præbuit omnia, ac frugis optima: indicia passim dedit. Ad periclitandam tamen illius in oppido perseverantiam tantisper differendum ejus baptismum existimavi. Hæc inter adest forte Indus Christianus, qui hunc catechumenum mo jubente suis dudum habebat in aridibus, vir probus, et agri dives. Hic: mi Pater, agebat, sylvicola noster equidem optime valet, verum mihi videtur ad delirandum propendere. Nil sibi jam dolere, sed noctes sibi insomnes abire, inquit, spectabilem sibi matrem cum sorore adesse quot noctibus, et amica voce sibi dicere: Ndecaray, ndecarayãnga, nderemindã a cyrupi orõ yu yebi ndererahabone. Sine te, quæso, baptizari. Præter tuam expectationem venimus iterum te abducturæ. Hoc alloquio, hoc aspectu sibi somnum impediri, ait. Jubeas illum meo nomine, respondi, bono esse animo. Tristem matris, sororisque, quibuscumque, per omnem ætatem versatus est, recordationem somniorum ejusmodi causam esse. Illas cælo, ut quidem mihi verisimile, receptas nihil jam negotii his in terris habere. Hæc ego. Verum paucos post dies idem redit Indus, eadem, quæ nuper, refert, suamque de timenda catechumeni deliratione suspicionem confirmat. Aliquid rei subesse, suspicatus actutum ejus in domum propero, sedentem deprehendo. Rogatus à me: qui se habeat? incolumem, doloris omnis expertem se esse ridens reponit, addit tamen: vigilando semper se noctem agere, quod mater, sororque identidem præsentibus sibi offerantur, de baptismo accelerando moneant, et inopinata se abducendum, minentur; idcirco nullam se quietis partem capere posse, iterum, iterumque mihi affirmat candore, ut semper alias, summo. Somnari ab illo talia, atque adeo contemni posse, autumaveram; memor tamen, somnia monitiones cælestes, Dei oracula non raro existisse, uti divinis ex literis patet, in negotio tanti momenti visum mihi est catechumeni et securitati et tranquillitati consulere. De illius perseverantia, de religionis caput scientia sat certus præmissis interrogationibusque necessariis cum saceris undis mox ablui, Ludovici nomine insignivi. Hoc a me præstitum 23 Junii, S. Joannis Baptistæ vigilia circa horam decimam antemeridianam. Eodem die circa vesperum nullo morbo, aut apoplexiæ indicio accedente placidissime expiravit.

“Hic eventus, universo oppido compertus, quemque juratus testari possum, in admirationem rapuit omnes. Lectoris arbitrio, quid de hoc sentiendum sit, relinquo. Nunquam tamen in animum inducere meum, potui, ut factum hoc fortitum putarem. Eximia Dei elementæ tribuo, quod hi tres sylvicolæ à me sint reperti in ignotis sylvarum latebris, quod mihi ad oppidum meum, ad amplectendam religionem se hortantî morem promptissime gesserint, quod sacro laticæ expiati vitam clanserint. Optimum Numen in Cælo consociatos voluit, qui tot annos in sylva contubernales fuere incredibili morum integritate. Fateor, dulcissimam mihi etiamnum accidere expeditionis ad flumen Empalado memoriam, quæ licet multis molestiis, periculisque mihi constiterit, tamen illis sylvicolis felicissima fuit; Hispanis utilissima: hi equidem à me facti certiores, quod per immensos illos nemorum tractus nulla porro Barbarorum vestigia extant, istic per triennium quæstu maximo multa centenariorum millia herbæ Paraquaricæ collegerunt. Neque id rarum, missionariorum, qui sylvas herbæ feraces barbaris liberant, sudore, ac periculo Hispanos dite-cere mercatores. His tamen nunquam in mentem venit ad alendos, vestiendosque catechumenos vel micam, filumve contribuere. Illorum corpora, ut animi missionariorum sapisime inopum curæ relinquuntur.” — Dobrizhoffer de Abipenibus, Lib. Prodrumus, pp. 97—106.

DEDICATION.

TO EDITH MAY SOUTHEY.

1.

EDITH! ten years are number'd, since the day,
Which ushers in the cheerful month of May,
To us by thy dear birth, my daughter dear,
Was blest. Thou therefore didst the name partake

Of that sweet month, the sweetest of the year;
But fittier was it given thee for the sake
Of a good man, thy father's friend sincere,
Who at the font made answer in thy name.
Thy love and reverence rightly may he claim,
For closely hath he been with me allied
In friendship's holy bonds, from that first hour
When in our youth we met on Tejo's side;
Bonds which, defying now all Fortune's power,
Time hath not loosen'd, nor will Death divide.

2.

A child more welcome, by indulgent Heaven
Never to parents' tears and prayers was given:
For scarcely eight months at thy happy birth
Had pass'd, since of thy sister we were left, —
Our first-born and our only babe, bereft.
Too fair a flower was she for this rude earth!
The features of her beauteous infancy
Have faded from me, like a passing cloud,
Or like the glories of an evening sky:
And seldom hath my tongue pronounced her
name

Since she was summon'd to a happier sphere.
But that dear love, so deeply wounded then,
I in my soul with silent faith sincere
Devoutly cherish till we meet again.

3.

I saw thee first with trembling thankfulness,
O daughter of my hopes and of my fears!
Press'd on thy senseless cheek a troubled kiss,
And breathed my blessing over thee with tears.
But memory did not long our bliss alloy;
For gentle nature, who had given relief,
Wean'd with new love the chasten'd heart from grief;
And the sweet season minister'd to joy.

4.

It was a season when their leaves and flowers
The trees as to an Arctic summer spread;
When chilling wintry winds and snowy showers,
Which had too long usurp'd the vernal hours,
Like spectres from the sight of morning, fled
Before the presence of that joyous May;
And groves and gardens all the live-long day
Rung with the birds' loud love-songs. Over all,
One thrush was heard from morn till even-fall;

Thy Mother well remembers when she lay
The happy prisoner of the genial bed,
How from yon lofty poplar's topmost spray,
At earliest dawn his thrilling pipe was heard;
And when the light of evening died away,
That blithe and indefatigable bird
Still his redundant song of joy and love preferr'd.

5.

How I have doted on thine infant smiles
At morning, when thine eyes unclosed on mine;
How, as the months in swift succession roll'd,
I mark'd thy human faculties unfold,
And watch'd the dawning of the light divine;
And with what artifice of playful guiles
Won from thy lips with still-repeated wiles
Kiss after kiss, a reckoning often told, —
Something I ween thou know'st; for thou hast seen

Thy sisters in their turn such fondness prove,
And felt how childhood, in its winning years,
The attemper'd soul to tenderness can move.
This thou canst tell; but not the hopes and fears
With which a parent's heart doth overflow, —
The thoughts and cares inwoven with that love, —

Its nature and its depth, thou dost not, canst not know.

6.

The years which since thy birth have pass'd away
May well to thy young retrospect appear
A measureless extent: — like yesterday
To me, so soon they fill'd their short career.
To thee discourse of reason have they brought,
With sense of time and change; and something
too
Of this precarious state of things have taught,
Where Man abideth never in one stay;
And of mortality a mournful thought.
And I have seen thine eyes suffused in grief,
When I have said that with autumnal gray
The touch of eld hath mark'd thy father's head;
That even the longest day of life is brief,
And mine is falling fast into the yellow leaf.

7.

Thy happy nature from the painful thought
With instinct turns, and scarcely canst thou bear
To hear me name the Grave. Thou knowest not
How large a portion of my heart is there!
The faces which I loved in infancy
Are gone; and bosom-friends of riper age,
With whom I fondly talk'd of years to come,
Summon'd before me to their heritage
Are in the better world, beyond the tomb.
And I have brethren there, and sisters dear,
And dearer babes. I therefore needs must dwell
Often in thought with those whom still I love so well.

8.

Thus wilt thou feel in thy maturer mind;
When grief shall be thy portion, thou wilt find Safe consolation in such thoughts as these, —

A present refuge in affliction's hour.
And if indulgent Heaven thy lot should bless
With all imaginable happiness,
Here shalt thou have, my child, beyond all power
Of chance, thy holiest, surest, best delight.
Take therefore now thy Father's latest lay, —
Perhaps his last; — and treasure in thine heart
The feelings that its musing strains convey.
A song it is of life's declining day,
Yet meet for youth. Vain passions to excite,
No strains of morbid sentiment I sing,
Nor tell of idle loves with ill-spent breath;
A reverent offering to the Grave I bring,
And twine a garland for the brow of Death.

Keswick, 1814.

PROEM.

THAT was a memorable day for Spain,
When on Pamplona's towers, so basely won,
The Frenchmen stood, and saw upon the plain
Their long-expected succors hastening on:
Exultingly they mark'd the brave array,
And deem'd their leader should his purpose gain,
Though Wellington and England barr'd the way.
Anon the bayonets glitter'd in the sun,
And frequent cannon flash'd, whose lurid light
Redden'd through sulphurous smoke; fast volleying round
Roll'd the war-thunders, and with long rebound
Backward from many a rock and cloud-capt
height
In answering peals Pyrene sent the sound.
Impatient for relief, toward the fight
The hungry garrison their eye-balls strain:
Vain was the Frenchman's skill, his valor vain;
And even then, when eager hope almost
Had moved their irreligious lips to prayer,
Averting from the fatal scene their sight,
They breathed the execrations of despair.
For Wellesley's star hath risen ascendant there,
Once more he drove the host of France to flight,
And triumph'd once again for God and for the right.

That was a day, whose influence far and wide
The struggling nations felt; it was a joy
Wherewith all Europe rung from side to side.
Yet hath Pamplona seen, in former time,
A moment big with mightier consequence,
Affecting many an age and distant clime.
That day it was which saw in her defence,
Contending with the French before her wall,
A noble soldier of Guipuzcoa fall,
Sore hurt, but not to death. For when long care
Restored his shatter'd leg, and set him free,
He would not brook a slight deformity,
As one who, being gay and debonnaire,
In courts conspicuous as in camps must be:
So he, forsooth, a shapely boot must wear;
And the vain man, with peril of his life,
Laid the recover'd limb again beneath the knife.

Long time upon the bed of pain he lay,
 Whiling with books the weary hours away ;
 And from that circumstance and this vain man
 A train of long events their course began,
 Whose term it is not given us yet to see.
 Who hath not heard Loyola's sainted name,
 Before whom Kings and Nations bow'd the knee ?
 Thy annals, Ethiopia, might proclaim
 What deeds arose from that prolific day ;
 And of dark plots might shuddering Europe tell.
 But Science, too, her trophies would display ;
 Faith give the martyrs of Japan their fame ;
 And Charity on works of love would dwell
 In California's dolorous regions drear ;
 And where, amid a pathless world of wood,
 Gathering a thousand rivers on his way,
 Huge Orellana rolls his affluent flood ;
 And where the happier sons of Paraguay,
 By gentleness and pious art subdued,
 Bow'd their meek heads beneath the Jesuits'
 sway,
 And lived and died in filial servitude.

I love thus uncontroll'd, as in a dream,
 To muse upon the course of human things ;
 Exploring sometimes the remotest springs,
 Far as tradition lends one guiding gleam ;
 Or following, upon Thought's audacious wings,
 Into Futurity, the endless stream.
 But now, in quest of no ambitious height,
 I go where Truth and Nature lead my way,
 And ceasing here from desultory flight,
 In measured strains I tell a Tale of Paraguay.

CANTO I.

1.

JENNER! forever shall thy honor'd name
 Among the children of mankind be bless'd,
 Who by thy skill hast taught us how to tame
 One dire disease, — the lamentable pest
 Which Africa sent forth to scourge the West,
 As if in vengeance for her sable brood
 So many an age remorselessly oppress'd.
 For that most fearful malady subdued
 Receive a poet's praise, a father's gratitude.

2.

Fair promise be this triumph of an age
 When Man, with vain desires no longer blind,
 And wise, though late, his only war shall wage,
 Against the miseries which afflict mankind,
 Striving with virtuous heart and strenuous mind
 Till evil from the earth shall pass away.
 Lo, this his glorious destiny assign'd!
 For that bless'd consummation let us pray,
 And trust in fervent faith, and labor as we may.

3.

The hideous malady which lost its power
 When Jenner's art the dire contagion stay'd,
 Among Columbia's sons, in fatal hour,
 Across the wide Atlantic wave convey'd,

Its fiercest form of pestilence display'd :
 Where'er its deadly course the plague began,
 Vainly the wretched sufferer look'd for aid ;
 Parent from child, and child from parent ran,
 For tyrannous fear dissolved all natural bonds of man.

4.

A feeble nation of Guarani race,
 Thinn'd by perpetual wars, but unsubdued,
 Had taken up at length a resting-place
 Among those tracts of lake, and swamp, and wood,
 Where Mondai, issuing from its solitude,
 Flows with slow stream to Empalado's bed.
 It was a region desolate and rude ;
 But thither had the horde for safety fled,
 And being there conceal'd, in peace their lives they led.

5.

There had the tribe a safe asylum found
 Amid those marshes wide and woodlands dense,
 With pathless wilds and waters spread around,
 And labyrinthine swamps, a sure defence
 From human foes, — but not from pestilence.
 The spotted plague appear'd, that direst ill ;
 How brought among them none could tell, or whence ;
 The mortal seed had lain among them still,
 And quicken'd now to work the Lord's mysterious will.

6.

Alas, it was no medicable grief
 Which herbs might reach! Nor could the jug-gler's power,
 With all his antic mummeries, bring relief.
 Faith might not aid him in that ruling hour,
 Himself a victim now. The dreadful stour
 None could escape, nor aught its force assuage.
 The marriageable maiden had her dower
 From death ; the strong man sunk beneath its rage,
 And death cut short the thread of childhood and of age.

7.

No time for customary mourning now ;
 With hand close-clinch'd to pluck the rooted hair,
 To beat the bosom, on the swelling brow
 Inflict redoubled blows, and blindly tear
 The cheeks, indenting bloody furrows there,
 The deep-traced signs indelible of woe ;
 Then to some crag, or bank abrupt, repair,
 And giving grief its scope, infuriate throw
 The impatient body thence upon the earth below.

8.

Devices these by poor, weak nature taught,
 Which thus a change of suffering would obtain ;
 And flying from intolerable thought,
 And piercing recollections, would full fain
 Distract itself by sense of fleshly pain

From anguish that the soul must else endure.
Easier all outward torments to sustain,
Than those heart-wounds which only time can cure,
And He in whom alone the hopes of man are sure.

9.

None sorrow'd here; the sense of woe was scar'd,
When every one endured his own sore ill.
The prostrate sufferers neither hoped nor fear'd;
The body labor'd, but the heart was still:—
So let the conquering malady fulfil
Its fatal course, rest cometh at the end!
Passive they lay with neither wish nor will
For aught but this; nor did they long attend
That welcome boon from death, the never-failing friend.

10.

Who is there to make ready now the pit,
The house that will content from this day forth
Its easy tenant? Who in vestments fit
Shall swathe the sleeper for his bed of earth,
Now tractable as when a babe at birth?
Who now the ample funeral urn shall knead,
And, burying it beneath his proper hearth,
Deposit there with careful hands the dead,
And lightly then relay the floor above his head?

11.

Unwept, unshrouded, and unsepulchred,
The hammock, where they hang, for winding-sheet
And grave suffices the deserted dead:
There from the armadillo's searching feet
Safer than if within the tomb's retreat.
The carrion birds obscene in vain essay
To find that quarry: round and round they beat
The air, but fear to enter for their prey,
And from the silent door the jaguar turns away.

12.

But nature for her universal law
Hath other, surer instruments in store,
Whom from the haunts of men no wonted awe
Withholds as with a spell. In swarms they pour
From wood and swamp; and when their work is o'er,
On the white bones the mouldering roof will fall;
Seeds will take root, and spring in sun and shower;
And Mother Earth ere long with her green pall,
Resuming to herself the wreck, will cover all.

13.

Oh! better thus with earth to have their part,
Than in Egyptian catacombs to lie,
Age after age preserved by horrid art,
In ghastly image of humanity!
Strange pride that with corruption thus would vie!
And strange delusion that would thus maintain
The fleshly form, till cycles shall pass by,
And in the series of the eternal chain,
The spirit come to seek its old abode again.

14.

One pair alone survived the general fate;
Left in such drear and mournful solitude,
That death might seem a preferable state.
Not more depress'd the Arkite patriarch stood,
When landing first on Ararat he view'd,
Where all around the mountain summits lay,
Like islands seen amid the boundless flood:
Nor our first parents more forlorn than they,
Through Eden when they took their solitary way.

15.

Alike to them it seem'd, in their despair,
Whither they wander'd from the infected spot.
Chance might direct their steps: they took no
care;
Come well or ill to them, it matter'd not!
Left as they were in that unhappy lot,
The sole survivors they of all their race,
They reek'd not when their fate, nor where,
nor what,
In this resignation to their hopeless case,
Indifferent to all choice or circumstance of place.

16.

That palsyng stupor past away ere long,
And as the spring of health resumed its power,
They felt that life was dear, and hope was strong.
What marvel? 'Twas with them the morning hour,
When bliss appears to be the natural dower
Of all the creatures of this joyous earth;
And sorrow, fleeting, like a vernal shower,
Scarcely interrupts the current of our mirth;
Such is the happy heart we bring with us at birth.

17.

Though of his nature and his boundless love
Erring, yet tutor'd by instinctive sense,
They rightly deem'd the Power who rules above
Had saved them from the wasting pestilence.
That favoring power would still be their defence:
Thus were they by their late deliverance taught
To place a child-like trust in Providence,
And in their state forlorn they found this thought
Of natural faith with hope and consolation fraught.

18.

And now they built themselves a leafy bower,
Amid a glade, slow Mondai's stream beside,
Screen'd from the southern blast of piercing
power;
Not like their native dwelling, long and wide,
By skilful toil of numbers edified,
The common home of all, their human nest,
Where threescore hammocks, pendant side by side,
Were ranged, and on the ground the fires were dress'd;
Alas, that populous hive hath now no living guest!

19.

A few firm stakes they planted in the ground,
Circling a narrow space, yet large enow;
These, strongly interknit, they closed around

With basket-work of many a pliant bough.
The roof was like the sides; the door was low,
And rude the hut, and trimm'd with little care,
For little heart had they to dress it now;
Yet was the humble structure fresh and fair,
And soon its inmates found that love might sojourn there.

20.

Quiara could recall to mind the course
Of twenty summers; perfectly he knew
Whate'er his fathers taught of skill or force.
Right to the mark his whizzing lance he threw,
And from his bow the unerring arrow flew
With fatal aim: and when the laden bee
Buzz'd by him in its flight, he could pursue
Its path with certain ken, and follow free
Until he traced the hive in hidden bank or tree.

21.

Of answering years was Monnema, nor less
Expert in all her sex's household ways.
The Indian weed she skilfully could dress;
And in what depth to drop the yellow maize
She knew, and when around its stem to raise
The lighten'd soil; and well could she prepare
Its ripen'd seed for food, her proper praise;
Or in the embers turn with frequent care
Its succulent head yet green, sometimes for daintier [fare.

22.

And how to macerate the bark she knew,
And draw apart its beaten fibres fine,
And bleaching them in sun, and air, and dew,
From dry and glossy filaments entwined,
With rapid twirl of hand, the lengthening line;
Next interknitting well the twisted thread,
In many an even mesh its knots combine,
And shape in tapering length the pensile bed,
Light hammock there to hang beneath the leafy shed.

23.

Time had been when, expert in works of clay,
She lent her hands the swelling urn to mould,
And fill'd it for the appointed festal day
With the beloved beverage which the bold
Quaff'd in their triumph and their joy of old;
The fruitful cause of many an uproar rude,
When, in their drunken bravery uncontroll'd,
Some bitter jest awoke the dormant feud,
And wrath, and rage, and strife, and wounds, and death ensued.

24.

These occupations were gone by: the skill
Was useless now, which once had been her pride.
Content were they, when thirst impell'd, to fill
The dry and hollow gourd from Mondai's side;
The river from its sluggish bed supplied
A draught for repetition all unmeet;
Howbeit the bodily want was satisfied;
No feverish pulse ensued, nor ireful heat;
Their days were undisturb'd, their natural sleep was sweet.

25.

She, too, had learn'd in youth how best to trim
The honor'd Chief for his triumphal day,
And covering with soft gums the obedient limb
And body, then with feathers overlay,
In regular hues disposed, a rich display.
Well pleased the glorious savage stood, and eyed
The growing work; then, vain of his array,
Look'd with complacent frown from side to side,
Stalk'd with elater step, and swell'd with statelier pride.

26.

Feasts and carousals, vanity and strife,
Could have no place with them in solitude
To break the tenor of their even life.
Quiara day by day his game pursued,
Searching the air, the water, and the wood,
With hawk-like eye, and arrow sure as fate;
And Monnema prepared the hunter's food:
Cast with him here in this forlorn estate,
In all things for the man was she a fitting mate.

27.

The Moon had gather'd oft her monthly store
Of light, and oft in darkness left the sky,
Since Monnema a growing burden bore
Of life and hope. The appointed weeks go by;
And now her hour is come, and none is nigh
To help: but human help she needed none.
A few short throes endured with scarce a cry,
Upon the bank she laid her new-born son,
Then slid into the stream, and bathed, and all was done.

28.

Might old observances have there been kept,
Then should the husband to that pensile bed,
Like one exhausted with the birth, have crept,
And laying down in feeble guise his head,
For many a day been nursed and dieted
With tender care, to childing mothers due.
Certes a custom strange, and yet far spread
Through many a savage tribe, howe'er it grew,
And once in the old world known as widely as the new.

29.

This could not then be done; he might not lay
The bow and those unerring shafts aside;
Nor through the appointed weeks forego the prey,
Still to be sought amid those regions wide,
None being there who should the while provide
That lonely household with their needful food:
So, still Quiara through the forest plied
His daily task, and in the thickest wood
Still laid his snares for birds, and still the chase pursued.

30.

But seldom may such thoughts of mingled joy
A father's agitated breast dilate,
As when he first beheld that infant boy.
Who hath not proved it, ill can estimate

The feeling of that stirring hour, — the weight
Of that new sense, the thoughtful, pensive bliss.
In all the changes of our changeful state,
Even from the cradle to the grave, I wis,
The heart doth undergo no change so great as this.

31.

A deeper and unwonted feeling fill'd
These parents, gazing on their new-born son.
Already in their busy hopes they build
On this frail sand. Now let the seasons run,
And let the natural work of time be done
With them, — for unto them a child is born ;
And when the hand of Death may reach the one,
The other will not now be left to mourn
A solitary wretch, all utterly forlorn.

32.

Thus Monnema and thus Quiara thought,
Though each the melancholy thought repress'd ;
They could not choose but feel, yet utter'd not
The human feeling, which in hours of rest
Often would rise, and fill the boding breast
With a dread foretaste of that mournful day,
When, at the inexorable Power's behest,
The unwilling spirit, called perforce away,
Must leave, forever leave, its dear connatural clay.

33.

Link'd as they were, where each to each was all,
How might the poor survivor hope to bear
That heaviest loss which one day must befall,
Nor sink beneath the weight of his despair ?
Scarce could the heart even for a moment dare
That miserable time to contemplate,
When the dread Messenger should find them
there,
From whom is no escape, — and reckless Fate,
Whom it had bound so close, forever separate.

34.

Lighter that burden lay upon the heart
When this dear babe was born to share their lot ;
They could endure to think that they must part.
Then too a glad consolatory thought
Arose, while gazing on the child they sought
With hope their dreary prospect to delude,
Till they almost believed, as fancy taught,
How that from them a tribe should spring re-
new'd,
To people and possess that ample solitude.

35.

Such hope they felt, but felt that whatsoe'er
The undiscoverable to come might prove,
Unwise it were to let that bootless care
Disturb the present hours of peace and love.
For they had gain'd a happiness above
The state which in their native horde was known :
No outward causes were there here to move
Discord and alien thoughts ; being thus alone
From all mankind, their hearts and their desires were one.

36.

Different their love in kind and in degree
From what their poor depraved forefathers knew,
With whom degenerate instincts were left free
To take their course, and blindly to pursue,
Unheeding they the ills that must ensue,
The bent of brute desire. No moral tie
Bound the hard husband to his servile crew
Of wives ; and they the chance of change might try,
All love destroy'd by such preposterous liberty.

37.

Far other tie this solitary pair
Indissolubly bound ; true helpmates they,
In joy or grief, in weal or woe to share,
In sickness or in health, through life's long day ;
And reassuming in their hearts her sway
Benignant Nature made the burden light.
It was the Woman's pleasure to obey,
The Man's to ease her toil in all he might ;
So each in serving each obtain'd the best delight.

38.

And as connubial, so parental love
Obey'd unerring Nature's order here,
For now no force of impious custom strove
Against her law ; — such as was wont to sear
The unhappy heart with usages severe,
Till harden'd mothers in the grave could lay
Their living babes with no compunctious tear ;
So monstrous men become, when from the way
Of primal light they turn through heathen paths astray.

39.

Deliver'd from this yoke, in them henceforth
The springs of natural love may freely flow :
New joys, new virtues with that happy birth
Are born, and with the growing infant grow.
Source of our purest happiness below
Is that benignant law which hath entwined
Dearest delight with strongest duty, so
That in the healthy heart and righteous mind
Ever they co-exist, inseparably combined.

40.

Oh ! bliss for them when in that infant face
They now the unfolding faculties desery,
And fondly gazing, trace — or think they trace —
The first faint speculation in that eye,
Which hitherto hath roll'd in vacancy !
Oh ! bliss in that soft countenance to seek
Some mark of recognition, and espy
The quiet smile which in the innocent cheek
Of kindness and of kind its consciousness doth speak !

41.

For him, if born among their native tribe,
Some haughty name his parents had thought good,
As weening that wherewith they should ascribe
The strength of some fierce tenant of the wood,

The water, or the aerial solitude,
 Jaguar or vulture, water-wolf or snake,
 The beast that prowls abroad in search of blood,
 Or reptile that within the treacherous brake
 Waits for the prey, upheav'd, its hunger to assuage.

42.

Now soften'd as their spirits were by love,
 Abhorrent from such thoughts they turn'd away;
 And with a happier feeling, from the dove,
 They named the child Yeruti. On a day,
 When, smiling at his mother's breast in play,
 They in his tones of murmuring pleasure heard
 A sweet resemblance of the stock-dove's lay,
 Fondly they named him from that gentle bird;
 And soon such happy use endear'd the fitting word.

43.

Days past, and moons have wax'd and waned,
 and still
 This dovelet, nestled in their leafy bower,
 Obtains increase of sense, and strength, and will,
 As in due order many a latent power
 Expands,—humanity's exalted dower;
 And they, while thus the days serenely fled,
 Beheld him flourish like a vigorous flower,
 Which, lifting from a genial soil its head,
 By seasonable suns and kindly showers is fed.

44.

Erelong the cares of helpless babyhood
 To the next stage of infancy give place,
 That age with sense of conscious growth endued,
 When every gesture hath its proper grace:
 Then come the unsteady step, the tottering pace;
 And watchful hopes and emulous thoughts appear;
 The imitative lips essay to trace
 Their words, observant both with eye and ear,
 In mutilated sounds which parents love to hear.

45.

Serenely thus the seasons pass away;
 And, oh! how rapidly they seem to fly
 With those for whom to-morrow, like to-day,
 Glides on in peaceful uniformity!
 Five years have since Yeruti's birth gone by,
 Five happy years;—and ere the Moon which then
 Hung like a Sylphid's light canoe on high
 Should fill its circle, Monnema, again,
 Laying her burden down, must bear a mother's pain.

46.

Alas, a keener pang, before that day,
 Must by the wretched Monnema be borne!
 In quest of game Quiara went his way
 To roam the wilds, as he was wont, one morn;
 She look'd in vain at eve for his return.
 By moonlight, through the midnight solitude,
 She sought him; and she found his garment torn,
 His bow and useless arrows in the wood,
 Marks of a jaguar's feet, a broken spear, and blood.

CANTO II.

1.

O thou who, listening to the Poet's song,
 Dost yield thy willing spirit to his sway,
 Look not that I should painfully prolong
 The sad narration of that fatal day
 With tragic details; all too true the lay!
 Nor is my purpose e'er to entertain
 The heart with useless grief; but, as I may,
 Blend in my calm and meditative strain
 Consolatory thoughts, the balm for real pain.

2.

O Youth or Maiden, whosoe'er thou art,
 Safe in my guidance may thy spirit be;
 I wound not wantonly the tender heart;
 And if sometimes a tear of sympathy
 Should rise, it will from bitterness be free—
 Yea, with a healing virtue be endued,
 As thou, in this true tale, shalt hear from me
 Of evils overcome, and grief subdued,
 And virtues springing up like flowers in solitude.

3.

The unhappy Monnema, when thus bereft,
 Sunk not beneath the desolating blow.
 Widow'd she was; but still her child was left;
 For him must she sustain the weight of woe,
 Which else would in that hour have laid her low.
 Nor wish'd she now the work of death complete;
 Then only doth the soul of woman know
 Its proper strength, when love and duty meet;
 Invincible the heart wherein they have their seat.

4.

The seamen who, upon some coral reef,
 Are cast amid the interminable main,
 Still cling to life, and, hoping for relief,
 Drag on their days of wretchedness and pain.
 In turtle-shells they hoard the scanty rain,
 And eat its flesh, sun-dried for lack of fire,
 Till the weak body can no more sustain
 Its wants, but sinks beneath its sufferings dire;
 Most miserable man who sees the rest expire!

5.

He lingers there while months and years go by,
 And holds his hope though months and years have past;
 And still at morning round the farthest sky,
 And still at eve his eagle glance is cast,
 If there he may behold the far-off mast
 Arise, for which he hath not ceased to pray.
 And if perchance a ship should come at last,
 And bear him from that dismal bank away,
 He blesses God that he hath lived to see that day.

6.

So strong a hold hath life upon the soul,
 Which sees no dawning of eternal light,
 But subject to this mortal frame's control,
 Forgetful of its origin and right,

Content in bondage dwells and utter night.
By worthier ties was this poor mother bound
To life; even while her grief was at the height,
Then in maternal love support she found,
And in maternal cares a healing for her wound.

7.

For now her hour is come: a girl is born,
Poor infant, all unconscious of its fate,
How passing strange, how utterly forlorn!
The genial season served to mitigate,
In all it might, their sorrowful estate,
Supplying to the mother, at her door,
From neighboring trees, which bent beneath their weight,
A full supply of fruitage now mature;
So in that time of need their sustenance was sure.

8.

Nor then alone, but always did the Eye
Of Mercy look upon that lonely bower.
Days past, and weeks; and months and years went by,
And never evil thing the while had power
To enter there. The boy, in sun and shower,
Rejoicing in his strength to youthhood grew;
And Mooma, that beloved girl, a dower
Of gentleness from bounteous nature drew,
With all that should the heart of womankind imbue.

9.

The tears which o'er her infancy were shed
Profuse, resented not of grief alone:
Maternal love their bitterness allay'd,
And, with a strength and virtue all its own,
Sustain'd the breaking heart. A look, a tone,
A gesture of that innocent babe, in eyes
With saddest recollections overflown,
Would sometimes make a tender smile arise,
Like sunshine opening through a shower in vernal skies.

10.

No looks but those of tenderness were found
To turn upon that helpless infant dear;
And as her sense unfolded, never sound
Of wrath or discord brake upon her ear.
Her soul its native purity sincere
Possess'd, by no example here defiled;
From envious passions free, exempt from fear,
Unknowing of all ill, amid the wild
Beloving and beloved she grew, a happy child.

11.

Yea, where that solitary bower was placed,
Though all unlike to Paradise the scene,
(A wide circumference of woodlands waste,)
Something of what in Eden might have been
Was shadow'd there imperfectly, I ween,
In this fair creature: safe from all offence,
Expanding like a shelter'd plant serene,
Evils that fret and stain being far from thence,
Her heart in peace and joy retain'd its innocence.

12.

At first the infant to Yeruti proved
A cause of wonder and disturbing joy.
A stronger tie than that of kindred moved
His inmost being, as the happy boy
Felt in his heart of hearts, without alloy,
The sense of kind: a fellow creature she,
In whom, when now she ceased to be a toy
For tender sport, his soul rejoiced to see
Connatural powers expand, and growing sympathy

13.

For her he cull'd the fairest flowers, and sought
Throughout the woods the earliest fruits for her.
The cayman's eggs, the honeycomb he brought
To this beloved sister,—whatsoe'er,
To his poor thought, of delicate or rare
The wilds might yield, solicitous to find.
They who affirm all natural acts declare
Self-love to be the ruler of the mind,
Judge from their own mean hearts, and foully wrong mankind.

14.

Three souls in whom no selfishness had place
Were here; three happy souls, which undefiled,
Albeit in darkness, still retain'd a trace
Of their celestial origin. The wild
Was as a sanctuary where Nature smiled
Upon these simple children of her own,
And, cherishing whate'er was meek and mild,
Call'd forth the gentle virtues, such alone,
The evils which evoke the stronger being unknown.

15.

What though at birth we bring with us the seed
Of sin, a mortal taint,—in heart and will
Too surely felt, too plainly shown in deed,—
Our fatal heritage; yet are we still
The children of the All-Merciful; and ill
They teach, who tell us that from hence must flow
God's wrath, and then, his justice to fulfil,
Death everlasting, never-ending woe:
O miserable lot of man if it were so!

16.

Falsely and impiously teach they who thus
Our heavenly Father's holy will misread!
In bounty hath the Lord created us,
In love redeem'd. From this authentic creed
Let no bewildering sophistry impede
The heart's entire assent, for God is good.
Hold firm this faith, and, in whatever need,
Doubt not but thou wilt find thy soul endued
With all-sufficing strength of heavenly fortitude!

17.

By nature peccable and frail are we,
Easily beguiled; to vice, to error prone;
But apt for virtue too. Humanity
Is not a field where tares and thorns alone
Are left to spring; good seed hath there been sown

With no unsparing hand. Sometimes the shoot
Is choked with weeds, or withers on a stone;
But in a kindly soil it strikes its root,
And flourisheth, and bringeth forth abundant fruit.

18.

Love, duty, generous feeling, tenderness,
Spring in the uncontaminated mind;
And these were Mooma's natural dower. Nor less
Had liberal Nature to the boy assign'd,
Happier herein than if among mankind
Their lot had fallen, — oh, certes happier here!
That all things tended still more close to bind
Their earliest ties, and they from year to year
Retain'd a childish heart, fond, simple, and sincere.

19.

They had no sad reflection to alloy
The calm contentment of the passing day,
Nor foresight to disturb the present joy.
Not so with Monnema; albeit the sway
Of time had reach'd her heart, and worn away,
At length, the grief so deeply seated there,
The future often, like a burden, lay
Upon that heart, a cause of secret care
And melancholy thought; yet did she not despair.

20.

Chance from the fellowship of human kind
Had cut them off, and chance might reunite.
On this poor possibility her mind
Reposed; she did not for herself invite
The unlikely thought, and cherish with delight
The dream of what such change might haply
bring;
Gladness with hope long since had taken flight
From her; she felt that life was on the wing,
And happiness, like youth, has here no second spring.

21.

So were her feelings to her lot composed,
That to herself all change had now been pain.
For Time upon her own desires had closed;
But in her children as she lived again,
For their dear sake she learnt to entertain
A wish for human intercourse renew'd;
And oftentimes, while they devour'd the strain,
Would she beguile their evening solitude
With stories strangely told and strangely understood.

22.

Little she knew, for little had she seen,
And little of traditionary lore
Had reach'd her ear; and yet to them, I ween,
Their mother's knowledge seem'd a boundless store.
A world it opened to their thoughts, yea, more, —
Another world beyond this mortal state.
Bereft of her, they had indeed been poor;
Being left to animal sense, degenerate;
Mere creatures, they had sunk below the beasts' estate.

23.

The human race, from her they understood,
Was not within that lonely hut confined,
But distant far beyond their world of wood
Were tribes and powerful nations of their kind;
And of the old observances which bind
People and chiefs, the ties of man and wife,
The laws of kin religiously assign'd,
Rites, customs, scenes of riotry and strife,
And all the strange vicissitudes of savage life.

24.

Wondering they listen to the wondrous tale;
But no repining thought such tales excite:
Only a wish, if wishes might avail,
Was haply felt, with juvenile delight,
To mingle in the social dance at night,
Where the broad moonshine, level as a flood,
O'erspread the plain, and in the silver light,
Well pleased, the placid elders sat and view'd
The sport, and seem'd therein to feel their youth renew'd.

25.

But when the darker scenes their mother drew,
What crimes were wrought when drunken fury
raged;
What miseries from their fatal discord grew,
When horde with horde in deadly strife engaged;
The rancorous hate with which their wars they waged;
The more unnatural horrors which ensued,
When, with inveterate vengeance unassuaged,
The victors round their slaughter'd captives stood, [blood; —
And babes were brought to dip their little hands in 26.

Horrent they heard; and with her hands the Maid
Press'd her eyes close, as if she strove to blot
The hateful image which her mind portray'd.
The Boy sat silently, intent in thought;
Then, with a deep-drawn sigh, as if he sought
To heave the oppressive feeling from his breast,
Complacently compared their harmless lot
With such wild life, outrageous and unblest;
Securely thus to live, he said, was surely best.

27.

On tales of blood they could not bear to dwell;
From such their hearts abhorrent shrunk in fear.
Better they liked that Monnema should tell
Of things unseen; what Power had placed them
here,
And whence the living spirit came, and where
It past, when parted from this mortal mould;
Of such mysterious themes with willing ear
They heard, devoutly listening while she told Strangely-disfigured truths, and fables feign'd of old.

28.

By the Great Spirit man was made, she said;
His voice it was which peal'd along the sky,
And shook the heavens, and fill'd the earth with Alone and inaccessible, on high [dread.

He had his dwelling-place eternally,
 And Father was his name. This all knew well;
 But none had seen his face; and if his eye
 Regarded what upon the earth befell,
 Or if he cared for man, she knew not: — who could tell?

29.

But this, she said, was sure — that after death
 There was reward, and there was punishment:
 And that the evil-doers, when the breath
 Of their injurious lives at length was spent,
 Into all noxious forms abhor'd were sent,
 Of beasts and reptiles; so retaining still
 Their old propensities, on evil bent,
 They work'd where'er they might their wicked
 will,
 The natural foes of man, whom we pursue and kill.

30.

Of better spirits, some there were who said
 That in the grave they had their place of rest.
 Lightly they laid the earth upon the dead,
 Lest in its narrow tenement the guest
 Should suffer underneath such load oppress'd.
 But that death surely set the spirit free,
 Sad proof to them poor Monnema address'd,
 Drawn from their father's fate; no grave had he Wherein his soul might dwell. This therefore could not be.

31.

Likelier they taught who said that to the Land
 Of Souls the happy spirit took its flight,
 A region underneath the sole command
 Of the Good Power; by him for the upright
 Appointed and replenish'd with delight;
 A land where nothing evil ever came,
 Sorrow, nor pain, nor peril, nor affright,
 Nor change, nor death; but there the human frame,
 Untouch'd by age or ill, continued still the same.

32.

Winds would not pierce it there, nor heat and cold
 Grieve, nor thirst parch, and hunger pine; but there
 The sun by day its even influence hold
 With genial warmth, and thro' the unclouded air
 The moon upon her nightly journey fare:
 The lakes and fish-full streams are never dry;
 Trees ever green perpetual fruitage bear;
 And, wheresoe'er the hunter turns his eye,
 Water, and earth, and heaven, to him their stores supply.

33.

And once there was a way to that good land,
 For in mid-earth a wondrous Tree there grew,
 By which the adventurer might, with foot and
 hand,
 From branch to branch his upward course pursue;
 An easy path, if what were said be true,

Albeit the ascent was long; and when the height
 Was gain'd, that blissful region was in view,
 Wherein the traveller safely might alight,
 And roam abroad at will, and take his free delight.

34.

O happy time, when ingress thus was given
 To the upper world, and at their pleasure they Whose hearts were strong might pass from Earth to Heaven
 By their own act and choice! In evil day
 Mishap had fatally cut off that way,
 And none may now the Land of Spirits gain,
 Till from its dear-loved tenement of clay,
 Violence or age, infirmity and pain,
 Divorce the soul which there full gladly would remain.

35.

Such grievous loss had by their own misdeed
 Upon the unworthy race of men been brought.
 An aged woman once, who could not speed
 In fishing, earnestly one day besought
 Her countrymen, that they of what they caught
 A portion would upon her wants bestow.
 They set her hunger and her age at nought,
 And still to her entreaties answered no!
 And mock'd her, till they made her heart with rage o'erflow.

36.

But that Old Woman, by such wanton wrong
 Inflamed, went hurrying down; and in the pride
 Of magic power, wherein the crone was strong,
 Her human form infirm she laid aside.
 Better the Capiguara's limbs supplied
 A strength accordant to her fierce intent;
 These she assumed, and, burrowing deep and wide
 Beneath the Tree, with vicious will, she went,
 To inflict upon mankind a lasting punishment.

37.

Downward she wrought her way, and all around
 Laboring, the solid earth she undermined,
 And loosen'd all the roots; then from the ground
 Emerging, in her hatred of her kind,
 Resumed her proper form, and breathed a wind
 Which gather'd like a tempest round its head:
 Eftsoon the lofty Tree its top inclined,
 Uptorn with horrible convulsion dread,
 And over half the world its mighty wreck lay spread.

38.

But never scion sprouted from that Tree,
 Nor seed sprang up; and thus the easy way,
 Which had till then for young and old been free,
 Was closed upon the sons of men for aye.
 The mighty ruin moulder'd where it lay,
 Till not a trace was left; and now in sooth
 Almost had all remembrance past away.
 This from the elders she had heard in youth;
 Some said it was a tale, and some a very truth.

39.

Nathless departed spirits at their will
 Could from the Land of Souls pass to and fro ;
 They come to us in sleep when all is still,
 Sometimes to warn against the impending blow,
 Alas ! more oft to visit us in woe :
 Though in their presence there was poor relief !
 And this had sad experience made her know ;
 For when Quiara came, his stay was brief,
 And, waking then, she felt a freshen'd sense of grief.

40.

Yet to behold his face again, and hear
 His voice, though painful, was a deep delight ;
 It was a joy to think that he was near,
 To see him in the visions of the night, —
 To know that the departed still requite
 The love which to their memory still will cling :
 And though he might not bless her waking sight
 With his dear presence, 'twas a blessed thing
 That sleep would thus sometimes his actual image bring.

41.

Why comes he not to me ? Yeruti cries ;
 And Mooma, echoing with a sigh the thought,
 Ask'd why it was that to her longing eyes
 No dream the image of her father brought ;
 Nor Monnema to solve that question sought
 In vain, content in ignorance to dwell ;
 Perhaps it was because they knew him not ;
 Perhaps — but sooth she could not answer well ;
 What the departed did, themselves alone could tell.

42.

What one tribe held another disbelieved,
 For all concerning this was dark, she said ;
 Uncertain all, and hard to be received.
 The dreadful race, from whom their fathers fled,
 Boasted that even the Country of the Dead
 Was theirs, and where their Spirits chose to go,
 The ghosts of other men retired in dread
 Before the face of that victorious foe ;
 No better, then, the world above, than this below !

43.

What then, alas ! if this were true, was death ?
 Only a mournful change from ill to ill !
 And some there were who said the living breath
 Would ne'er be taken from us by the will
 Of the Good Father, but continue still
 To feed with life the mortal frame he gave,
 Did not mischance or wicked witchcraft kill ; —
 Evils from which no care avail'd to save,
 And whereby all were sent to fill the greedy grave.

44.

In vain to counterwork the baleful charm
 By spells of rival witchcraft was it sought ;
 Less potent was that art to help than harm.
 No means of safety old experience brought :
 Nor better fortune did they find who thought
 From Death, as from some living foe, to fly ;
 For speed or subterfuge avail'd them nought ;

But wheresoe'er they fled they found him nigh :
 None ever could elude that unseen enemy.

45.

Bootless the boast, and vain the proud intent
 Of those who hoped, with arrogant display
 Of arms and force, to scare him from their tent,
 As if their threatful shouts and fierce array
 Of war could drive the Invisible away !
 Sometimes, regardless of the sufferer's groan,
 They dragg'd the dying out, and as a prey
 Exposed him, that, content with him alone,
 Death might depart, and thus his fate avert their own.

46.

Depart he might, — but only to return
 In quest of other victims, soon or late ;
 When they who held this fond belief, would learn,
 Each by his own inevitable fate,
 That, in the course of man's uncertain state,
 Death is the one and only certain thing.
 Oh folly then to fly or deprecate
 That which, at last, Time, ever on the wing,
 Certain as day and night, to weary age must bring !

47.

While thus the Matron spake, the youthful twain
 Listen'd in deep attention, wistfully ;
 Whether with more of wonder or of pain
 Uneath it were to tell. With steady eye
 Intent they heard ; and when she paused, a sigh
 Their sorrowful foreboding seem'd to speak :
 Questions to which she could not give reply
 Yeruti ask'd ; and for that Maiden meek,
 Involuntary tears ran down her quiet cheek.

48.

A different sentiment within them stirr'd,
 When Monnema recall'd to mind, one day,
 Imperfectly, what she had sometimes heard
 In childhood, long ago, the Elders say, —
 Almost from memory had it pass'd away, —
 How there appear'd amid the woodlands men
 Whom the Great Spirit sent there to convey
 His gracious will ; but little heed she then
 Had given, and like a dream it now recurr'd again.

49.

But these young questioners, from time to time,
 Call'd up the long-forgotten theme anew.
 Strange men they were, from some remotest clime,
 She said, of different speech, uncouth to view,
 Having hair upon their face, and white in hue :
 Across the World of waters wide they came Devotedly the Father's work to do,
 And seek the Red Men out, and in his name
 His merciful laws, and love, and promises proclaim.

50.

They served a Maid more beautiful than tongue
 Could tell, or heart conceive. Of human race,
 All heavenly as that Virgin was, she sprung ;
 But for her beauty and celestial grace,
 Being one in whose pure elements no trace
 Had e'er inhered of sin or mortal stain,

The highest Heaven was now her dwelling-place ;
There as a Queen divine she held her reign,
And there in endless joy forever would remain.

51.

Her feet upon the crescent Moon were set,
And, moving in their order round her head,
The Stars compose her sparkling coronet.
There at her breast the Virgin Mother fed
A Babe divine, who was to judge the dead ;
Such power the Spirit gave this awful Child :
Severe he was, and in his anger dread,
Yet alway at his Mother's will grew mild,
So well did he obey that Maiden undefiled.

52.

Sometimes she had descended from above
To visit her true votaries, and requite
Such as had served her well. And for her love,
These bearded men, forsaking all delight,
With labor long and dangers infinite,
Across the great blue waters came, and sought
The Red Men here, to win them, if they might,
From bloody ways, rejoiced to profit aught,
Even when with their own lives the benefit was bought.

53.

For trusting in this heavenly Maiden's grace,
It was for them a joyful thing to die,
As men who went to have their happy place
With her, and with that Holy Child, on high,
In fields of bliss above the starry sky,
In glory, at the Virgin Mother's feet ;
And all who kept their lessons faithfully
An everlasting guerdon there would meet,
When Death had led their souls to that celestial seat.

54.

On earth they offer'd, too, an easy life
To those who their mild lessons would obey,
Exempt from want, from danger, and from strife ;
And from the forest leading them away,
They placed them underneath this Virgin's sway,
A numerous fellowship, in peace to dwell ;
Their high and happy office there to pay
Devotions due, which she requited well,
Their heavenly Guardian she in whatsoe'er befell.

55.

Thus Monnema remember'd, it was told
By one who, in his hot and headstrong youth,
Had left her happy service ; but when old,
Lamented oft, with unavailing ruth,
And thoughts which, sharper than a serpent's tooth,
Pierced him, that he had changed that peaceful place
For the fierce freedom and the ways uncouth
Of their wild life, and lost that Lady's grace,
Wherefore he had no hope to see in Heaven her face.

56.

And she remember'd, too, when first they fled
For safety to the farthest solitude

Before their cruel foes, and lived in dread
That thither, too, their steps might be pursued
By those old enemies athirst for blood,
How some among them hoped to see the day
When these beloved messengers of good
To that lone hiding-place might find the way,
And them to their abode of blessedness convey.

57.

Such tales excited in Yeruti's heart
A stirring hope that haply he might meet
Some minister of Heaven ; and many a part,
Untrod before, of that wild wood retreat,
Did he, with indefatigable feet,
Explore ; yet ever from the fruitless quest
Return'd at evening to his native seat
By daily disappointment undepress'd, —
So buoyant was the hope that fill'd his youthful breast.

58.

At length the hour approach'd that should fulfil
His harmless heart's desire, when they shall see
Their fellow-kind, and take for good or ill
The fearful chance, — for such it needs must be, —
Of change from that entire simplicity.
Yet wherefore should the thought of change
appall ?
Grief it perhaps might bring, and injury,
And death ; — but evil never can befall
The virtuous, for the Eye of Heaven is over all.

CANTO III.

1.

AMID those marshy woodlands far and wide,
Which spread beyond the soaring vulture's eye,
There grew, on Empalado's southern side,
Groves of that tree whose leaves adust supply
The Spaniards with their daily luxury ;
A beverage whose salubrious use obtains
Through many a land of mines and slavery,
Even over all La Plata's sea-like plains,
And Chili's mountain realm, and proud Peru's domains.

2.

But better for the injured Indian race
Had woods of manchineel the land o'erspread :
Yea, in that tree so bless'd by Nature's grace
A direr curse had they inherited,
Than if the Upas there had rear'd its head,
And sent its baleful scions all around,
Blasting where'er its effluent force was shed,
In air and water, and the infected ground,
All things wherein the breath or sap of life is found.

3.

The poor Guaranies dreamt of no such ill,
When, for themselves in miserable hour,
The virtues of that leaf, with pure good will,
They taught their unsuspected visitor,
New in the land as yet. They learnt his power

Too soon, which law nor conscience could restrain ;
A fearless, but inhuman conqueror,
Heart-harden'd by the accursed lust of gain :
O fatal thirst of gold ! O foul reproach for Spain !

4.

For gold and silver had the Spaniards sought,
Exploring Paraguay with desperate pains ;
Their way through forests, axe in hand, they wrought ;
Drench'd from above by unremitting rains,
They waded over inundated plains,
Forward by hope of plunder still allured ;
So they might one day count their golden gains,
They cared not at what cost of sin procured ;
All dangers they defied, all sufferings they endured.

5.

Barren alike of glory and of gold
That region proved to them ; nor would the soil
Unto their unindustrious hands unfold
Harvests, the fruit of peace, and wine and oil,
The treasures that repay contented toil
With health and weal ; treasures that with them
bring
No guilt for priest and penance to assail,
Nor with their venom arm the awaken'd sting
Of conscience at that hour when life is vanishing.

6.

But, keen of eye in their pursuit of gain,
The conquerors look'd for lucre in this tree :
An annual harvest there might they attain,
Without the cost of annual industry.
'Twas but to gather in what there grew free,
And share Potosi's wealth. Nor thence alone,
But gold in glad exchange they soon should see
From all that once the Incas called their own,
Or where the Zippa's power or Zaque's laws were known.

7.

For this, in fact though not in name a slave,
The Indian from his family was torn ;
And droves on droves were sent to find a grave
In woods and swamps, by toil severe outworn,
No friend at hand to succor or to mourn,
In death unpitied, as in life unblest'd.
O miserable race, to slavery born !
Yet when we look beyond this world's unrest,
More miserable than the oppressors than the oppress'd.

8.

Often had Kings essay'd to check the ill
By edicts not so well enforced as meant ;
A present power was wanting to fulfil
Remote authority's sincere intent.
To Avarice, on its present purpose bent,
The voice of distant Justice spake in vain ;
False magistrates and priests their influence lent
The accursed thing for lucre to maintain :
O fatal thirst of gold ! O foul reproach for Spain !

9.

O foul reproach ! but not for Spain alone,
But for all lands that bear the Christian name !
Where'er commercial slavery is known ;
O shall not Justice, trumpet-tongued, proclaim
The foul reproach, the black offence, the same ?
Hear, guilty France ! and thou, O England, hear !
Thou who hast half redeem'd thyself from shame,
When slavery from thy realms shall disappear,
Then from this guilt, and not till then, wilt thou be clear.

10.

Uncheck'd in Paraguay it ran its course,
Till all the gentler children of the land
Well nigh had been consumed without remorse.
The bolder tribes meantime, whose skilful hand
Had tamed the horse, in many a warlike band
Kept the field well with bow and dreadful spear.
And now the Spaniards dared no more withstand
Their force, but in their towns grew pale with fear,
If the Mocobio or the Abipon drew near.

11.

Bear witness, Chaco, thou, from thy domain
With Spanish blood, as erst with Indian, fed !
And Corrientes, by whose church the slain
Were piled in heaps, till for the gather'd dead
One common grave was dug, one service said !
Thou too, Parana, thy sad witness bear
From shores with many a mournful vestige
spread,
And monumental crosses here and there,
And monumental names that tell where dwellings were !

12.

Nor would with all their power the Kings of Spain,
Austrian or Bourbon, have at last avail'd
This torrent of destruction to restrain,
And save a people every where assail'd
By men before whose face their courage quail'd,
But for the virtuous agency of those
Who with the Cross alone, when arms had fail'd,
Achieved a peaceful triumph o'er the foes,
And gave that weary land the blessings of repose.

13.

For whensoc'er the Spaniards felt or fear'd
An Indian enemy, they call'd for aid
Upon Loyola's sons, now long endear'd
To many a happy tribe, by them convey'd
From the open wilderness or woodland shade,
In towns of happiest polity to dwell.
Freely these faithful ministers essay'd
The arduous enterprisc, contented well
If with success they sped, or if as martyrs fell.

14.

And now it chanced some traders, who had fell'd
The trees of precious foliage far and wide
On Empalado's shore, when they beheld
The inviting woodlands on its northern side,
Cross'd thither in their quest, and there espied

Yeruti's footsteps: searching then the shade,
At length a lonely dwelling they descried,
And at the thought of hostile hordes dismay'd,
To the nearest mission sped, and ask'd the Jesuit's aid.

15.

That was a call which ne'er was made in vain
Upon Loyola's sons. In Paraguay
Much of injustice had they to complain,
Much of neglect; but faithful laborers they
In the Lord's vineyard, there was no delay
When summon'd to his work. A little band
Of converts made them ready for the way;
Their spiritual father took a Cross in hand
To be his staff, and forth they went to search the land.

16.

He was a man of rarest qualities,
Who to this barbarous region had confined
A spirit with the learned and the wise
Worthy to take its place, and from mankind
Receive their homage, to the immortal mind
Paid in its just inheritance of fame.
But he to humbler thoughts his heart inclined;
From Gratz, amid the Styrian hills, he came,
And Dobrizhoffer was the good man's honor'd name.

17.

It was his evil fortune to behold
The labors of his painful life destroy'd;
His flock, which he had brought within the fold,
Dispersed; the work of ages render'd void,
And all of good that Paraguay enjoy'd
By blind and suicidal Power o'erthrown.
So he the years of his old age employ'd,
A faithful chronicler in handing down
Names which he loved, and things well worthy to be known.

18.

And thus, when exiled from the dear-loved scene,
In proud Vienna he beguiled the pain
Of sad remembrance; and the Empress Queen,
That great Teresa, she did not disdain
In gracious mood sometimes to entertain
Discourse with him both pleasurable and sage;
And sure a willing ear she well might deign
To one whose tales may equally engage
The wondering mind of youth, the thoughtful heart of age.

19.

But of his native speech because well nigh
Disuse in him forgetfulness had wrought,
In Latin he composed his history —
A garrulous, but a lively tale, and fraught
With matter of delight and food for thought.
And if he could in Merlin's glass have seen
By whom his tomes to speak our tongue were taught,
The old man would have felt as pleased, I ween,
As when he won the ear of that great Empress Queen.

20.

Little he deem'd when with his Indian band
He through the wilds set forth upon his way,
A Poet then unborn, and in a land
Which had proscribed his order, should one day
Take up from thence his moralizing lay,
And shape a song that, with no fiction dress'd,
Should to his worth its grateful tribute pay,
And sinking deep in many an English breast,
Foster that faith divine that keeps the heart at rest.

21.

Behold him on his way! the breviary
Which from his girdle hangs, his only shield;
That well-known habit is his panoply,
That Cross, the only weapon he will wield:
By day, he bears it for his staff afield,
By night, it is the pillow of his bed:
No other lodging these wild woods can yield
Than earth's hard lap, and rustling overhead
A canopy of deep and tangled boughs far spread.

22.

Yet may they not without some cautious care
Take up their inn content upon the ground.
First it behoves to clear a circle there,
And trample down the grass and plantage round,
Where many a deadly reptile might be found,
Whom with its bright and comfortable heat
The flame would else allure: such plagues abound
In these thick woods, and therefore must they beat [feet.
The earth, and trample well the herbs beneath their 23.

And now they heap dry reeds and broken wood:
The spark is struck, the crackling fagots blaze,
And cheer that unaccustom'd solitude.
Soon have they made their frugal meal of maize;
In grateful adoration then they raise
The evening hymn. How solemn in the wild
That sweet accordant strain wherewith they praise
The Queen of Angels, merciful and mild!
Hail, holiest Mary! Maid, and Mother undefiled.

24.

Blame as thou mayst the Papist's erring creed,
But not their salutary rite of even!
The prayers that from a pious soul proceed,
Though misdirected, reach the ear of Heaven.
Us, unto whom a purer faith is given,
As our best birthright it behoves to hold
The precious charge; but, oh, beware the leaven
Which makes the heart of charity grow cold!
We own one Shepherd, we shall be at last one fold.

25.

Thinkest thou the little company who here
Pour forth their hymn devout at close of day,
Feel it no aid that those who hold them dear,
At the same hour the self-same homage pay,
Commending them to Heaven when far away?
That the sweet bells are heard in solemn chime
Through all the happy towns of Paraguay,

Where now their brethren in one point of time
Join in the general prayer, with sympathy sublime ?

26.

That to the glorious Mother of their Lord
Whole Christendom that hour its homage pays ?
From court and cottage that with one accord
Ascends the universal strain of praise ?
Amid the crowded city's restless ways,
One reverential thought pervades the throng ;
The traveller on his lonely road obeys
The sacred hour, and as he fares along,
In spirit hears and joins his household's even-song.

27.

What if they think that every prayer enroll'd
Shall one day in their good account appear ;
That guardian Angels hover round and fold
Their wings in adoration while they hear ;
Ministrant Spirits through the ethereal sphere
Waft it with joy, and to the grateful theme,
Well pleased, the Mighty Mother bends her ear ?
A vain delusion this we rightly deem :
Yet what they feel is not a mere illusive dream.

28.

That prayer perform'd, around the fire reclined
Beneath the leafy canopy they lay
Their limbs : the Indians soon to sleep resign'd ;
And the good Father with that toilsome day
Fatigued, full fain to sleep, — if sleep he may, —
Whom all tormenting insects there assail ;
More to be dreaded these than beasts of prey
Against whom strength may cope, or skill prevail ;
But art of man against these enemies must fail.

29.

Patience itself, that should the sovereign cure
For ills that touch ourselves alone, supply,
Lends little aid to one who must endure
This plague : the small tormentors fill the sky,
And swarm about their prey ; there he must lie
And suffer while the hours of darkness wear ;
At times he utters with a deep-drawn sigh
Some name adored, in accents of despair
Breathed sorrowfully forth, half murmur and half prayer.

30.

Welcome to him the earliest gleam of light ;
Welcome to him the earliest sound of day ;
That, from the sufferings of that weary night
Released, he may resume his willing way,
Well pleased again the perils to essay
Of that drear wilderness, with hope renew'd :
Success will all his labors overpay ;
A quest like his is cheerfully pursued ;
The heart is happy still that is intent on good.

31.

And now where Empalado's waters ereep
Through low and level shores of woodland wide,
They come ; prepared to cross the sluggish deep,
An ill-shaped coracle of hardest hide,

Ruder than ever Cambrian fisher plied
Where Towey and the salt-sea waters meet,
The Indians launch ; they steady it and guide,
Winning their way with arms and practised feet,
While in the tottering boat the Father keeps his seat.

32.

For three long summer days on every side
They search in vain the sylvan solitude ;
The fourth a human footstep is espied,
And through the mazes of the pathless wood
With hound-like skill and hawk-like eye pursued ;

For keen upon their pious quest are they
As e'er were hunters on the track of blood.
Where softer ground or trodden herbs betray
The slightest mark of man, they there explore the way.

33.

More cautious when more certain of the trace,
In silence they proceed ; not like a crew
Of jovial hunters, who the joyous chase
With hound and horn in open field pursue,
Cheering their way with jubilant halloo,
And hurrying forward to their spoil desired,
The panting game before them, full in view :
Humaner thoughts this little band inspired,
Yet with a hope as high their gentle hearts were fired.

34.

Nor is their virtuous hope devoid of fear ;
The perils of that enterprise they know ;
Some savage horde may have its fastness here,
A race to whom a stranger is a foe,
Who not for friendly words, nor proffer'd show
Of gifts, will peace or parley entertain.
If by such hands their blameless blood should flow
To serve the Lamb who for their sins was slain,
Blessed indeed their lot, for so to die is gain !

35.

Them, thus pursuing where the track may lead,
A human voice arrests upon their way ;
They stop, and thither, whence the sounds proceed,
All eyes are turn'd in wonder, — not dismay,
For sure such sounds might charm all fear away ;
No nightingale whose brooding mate is nigh,
From some sequester'd bower at close of day,
No lark rejoicing in the orient sky,
Ever pour'd forth so wild a strain of melody.

36.

The voice which through the ringing forest floats
Is one which having ne'er been taught the skill
Of marshalling sweet words to sweeter notes,
Utters all unpremeditate, at will,
A modulated sequence, loud and shrill,
Of inarticulate and long-breathed sound,
Varying its tones with rise, and fall, and trill,
Till all the solitary woods around
With that far-piercing power of melody resound.

37.

In mute astonishment attent to hear,
 As if by some enchantment held, they stood,
 With bending head, fix'd eye, and eager ear,
 And hand uprais'd in warning attitude
 To check all speech or step that might intrude
 On that sweet strain. Them leaving, thus spellbound,
 A little way alone into the wood
 The Father gently moved toward the sound,
 Treading with quiet feet upon the grassy ground.

38.

Anon advancing thus the trees between,
 He saw beside her bower the songstress wild,
 Not distant far, himself the while unseen.
 Mooma it was, that happy maiden mild,
 Who, in the sunshine, like a careless child
 Of nature, in her joy was caroling.
 A heavier heart than his it had beguiled
 So to have heard so fair a creature sing
 The strains which she had learnt from all sweet birds of spring.

39.

For these had been her teachers, these alone ;
 And she, in many an emulous essay,
 At length into a descant of her own
 Had blended all their notes, a wild display
 Of sounds in rich, irregular array ;
 And now as blithe as bird in vernal bower,
 Pour'd in full flow the unexpressive lay,
 Rejoicing in her consciousness of power,
 But in the inborn sense of harmony yet more.

40.

In joy had she begun the ambitious song,
 With rapid interchange of sink and swell ;
 And sometimes high the note was rais'd, and long
 Produced, with shake and effort sensible,
 As if the voice exulted there to dwell ;
 But when she could no more that pitch sustain,
 So thrillingly attuned the cadence fell,
 That with the music of its dying strain
 She moved herself to tears of pleasurable pain.

41.

It might be deem'd some dim presage possess'd
 The virgin's soul ; that some mysterious sense
 Of change to come, upon her mind impress'd,
 Had then call'd forth, e'er she departed thence,
 A requiem to their days of innocence.
 For what thou lovest in thy native shade
 There is one change alone that may compensate,
 O Mooma, innocent and simple maid,
 Only one change, and it will not be long delay'd !

42.

When now the Father issued from the wood
 Into that little glade in open sight,
 Like one entranced, beholding him, she stood ;
 Yet had she more of wonder than affright,
 Yet less of wonder than of dread delight,
 When thus the actual vision came in view ;
 For instantly the maiden read aright

Wherefore he came ; his garb and beard she knew ;
 All that her mother heard had then indeed been true.

43.

Nor was the Father fill'd with less surprise ;
 He too strange fancies well might entertain,
 When this so fair a creature met his eyes.
 He might have thought her not of mortal strain ;
 Rather, as bards of yore were wont to feign,
 A nymph divine of Mondai's secret stream ;
 Or haply of Diana's woodland train ;
 For in her beauty Mooma such might seem,
 Being less a child of earth than like a poet's dream.

44.

No art of barbarous ornament had scarr'd
 And stain'd her virgin limbs, or 'fil'd her face ;
 Nor ever yet had evil passion marr'd
 In her sweet countenance the natural grace
 Of innocence and youth ; nor was there trace
 Of sorrow, or of hardening want and care.
 Strange was it in this wild and savage place,
 Which seem'd to be for beasts a fitting lair,
 Thus to behold a maid so gentle and so fair.

45.

Across her shoulders was a hammock flung :
 By night it was the maiden's bed, by day
 Her only garment. Round her as it hung,
 In short, unequal folds of loose array,
 The open meshes, when she moves, display
 Her form. She stood with fix'd and wondering
 eyes ;
 And trembling like a leaf upon the spray,
 Even for excess of joy, with eager cries
 She call'd her mother forth to share that glad surprise.

46.

At that unwonted call, with quicken'd pace,
 The matron hurried thither, half in fear.
 How strange to Monnema a stranger's face !
 How strange it was a stranger's voice to hear !
 How strangely to her disaccustom'd ear
 Came even the accents of her native tongue !
 But when she saw her countrymen appear,
 Tears for that unexpected blessing sprung,
 And once again she felt as if her heart were young.

47.

Soon was her melancholy story told
 And glad consent unto that Father good
 Was given, that they to join his happy fold
 Would leave with him their forest solitude.
 Why comes not now Yeruti from the wood ?
 Why tarrieth he so late this blessed day ?
 They long to see their joy in his renew'd,
 And look impatiently toward his way,
 And think they hear his step, and chide his long delay.

48.

He comes at length, a happy man, to find
 His only dream of hope fulfill'd at last.

The sunshine of his all-believing mind
There is no doubt or fear to overcast;
No chilling forethought checks his bliss; the past
Leaves no regret for him, and all to come
Is change, and wonder, and delight. How fast
Hath busy fancy conjured up a sum
Of joys unknown, whereof the expectance makes him dumb!

49.

O happy day, the Messenger of Heaven
Hath found them in their lonely dwelling-place!
O happy day, to them it would be given
To share in that Eternal Mother's grace,
And one day see in Heaven her glorious face,
Where Angels round her mercy-throne adore!
Now shall they mingle with the human race,
Sequester'd from their fellow-kind no more;
O joy of joys supreme! O bliss for them in store!

50.

Full of such hopes this night they lay them down,
But, not as they were wont, this night to rest.
Their old tranquillity of heart is gone;
The peace wherewith till now they have been blest
Hath taken its departure. In the breast
Fast-following thoughts and busy fancies throng;
Their sleep itself is feverish, and possess'd
With dreams that to the wakeful mind belong;
To Mooma and the youth then first the night seem'd long.

51.

Day comes, and now a first and last farewell
To that fair bower within their native wood,
Their quiet nest till now. The bird may dwell
Henceforth in safety there, and rear her brood,
And beasts and reptiles undisturb'd intrude;
Reckless of this, the simple tenants go,
Emerging from their peaceful solitude,
To mingle with the world, — but not to know
Its crimes, nor to partake its cares, nor feel its woe.

 CANTO IV.

1.

THE bells rung blithely from St. Mary's tower
When in St. Joachim's the news was told
That Dobrizhoffer from his quest that hour
Drew nigh: the glad Guaranies, young and old,
Throng through the gate, rejoicing to behold
His face again; and all with heartfelt glee
Welcome the Pastor to his peaceful fold,
Where so beloved amid his flock was he,
That this return was like a day of jubilee.

2.

How more than strange, how marvellous a sight
To the new-comers was this multitude!
Something like fear was mingled with affright,
When they the busy scene of turmoil view'd;
Wonder itself the sense of joy subdued,

And with its all-unwonted weight oppress'd
These children of the quiet solitude;
And now and then a sigh that heaved the breast
Unconsciously bewray'd their feeling of unrest.

3.

Not more prodigious than that little town
Seem'd to these comers, were the pomp and power
To us of ancient Rome in her renown;
Nor the elder Babylon, or ere that hour
When her high gardens, and her cloud-capt
tower,
And her broad walls before the Persian fell;
Nor those dread fanes on Nile's forsaken shore,
Whose ruins yet their pristine grandeur tell,
Wherein the demon Gods themselves might deign to dwell.

4.

But if, all humble as it was, that scene
Possess'd a poor and uninstructed mind
With awe, the thoughtful spirit, well I ween,
Something to move its wonder there might find,
Something of consolation for its kind,
Some hope and earnest of a happier age,
When vain pursuits no more the heart shall blind,
But Faith the evils of this earth assuage,
And to all souls assure their heavenly heritage.

5.

Yes; for in history's mournful map, the eye
On Paraguay, as on a sunny spot,
May rest complacent: to humanity,
There, and there only, hath a peaceful lot
Been granted, by Ambition troubled not,
By Avarice undebased, exempt from care,
By perilous passions undisturb'd. And what
If Glory never rear'd her standard there,
Nor with her clarion's blast awoke the slumbering air?

6.

Content and cheerful Piety were found
Within those humble walls. From youth to age
The simple dwellers paced their even round
Of duty, not desiring to engage
Upon the busy world's contentious stage,
Whose ways they wisely had been train'd to dread:
Their inoffensive lives in pupilage
Perpetually, but peacefully they led,
From all temptation saved, and sure of daily bread.

7.

They on the Jesuit, who was nothing loath,
Reposed alike their conscience and their cares;
And he, with equal faith, the trust of both Accepted and discharged. The bliss is theirs
Of that entire dependence that prepares
Entire submission, let what may befall;
And his whole careful course of life declares
That for their good he holds them thus in thrall,
Their Father and their Friend, Priest, Ruler, all in all.

8.

Food, raiment, shelter, safety, he provides;
 No forecast, no anxieties have they;
 The Jesuit governs, and instructs, and guides;
 Their part it is to honor and obey,
 Like children under wise parental sway.
 All thoughts and wishes are to him confess'd;
 And when, at length, in life's last, weary day,
 In sure and certain hope they sink to rest,
 By him their eyes are closed, by him their burial blest.

Deem not their lives of happiness devoid,
 Though thus the years their course obscurely fill;
 In rural and in household arts employ'd,
 And many a pleasing task of pliant skill,
 For emulation here unmix'd with ill,
 Sufficient scope was given. Each had assign'd
 His proper part, which yet left free the will;
 So well they knew to mould the ductile mind
 By whom the scheme of that wise order was combin'd.

10.

It was a land of priestcraft, but the Priest
 Believed himself the fables that he taught:
 Corrupt their forms, and yet those forms at least
 Preserv'd a salutary faith that wrought,
 Maugre the alloy, the saving end it sought.
 Benevolence had gain'd such empire there,
 That even superstition had been brought
 An aspect of humanity to wear,
 And make the weal of man its first and only care.

11.

Nor lack'd they store of innocent delight,
 Music and song, and dance and proud array,
 Whate'er might win the ear, or charm the sight;
 Banners and pageantry in rich display
 Brought forth upon some Saint's high holyday,
 The altar dress'd, the church with garlands hung,
 Arches and floral bowers beside the way,
 And festal tables spread for old and young,
 Gladness in every heart, and mirth on every tongue.

12.

Thou who despisest so debased a fate,
 As in the pride of wisdom thou mayst call
 These meek, submissive Indians' low estate,
 Look round the world, and see where over all
 Injurious passions hold mankind in thrall,
 How barbarous Force asserts a ruthless reign,
 Or Mammon, o'er his portion of the ball,
 Hath learn'd a baser empire to maintain —
 Mammon, the god of all who give their souls to gain.

13.

Behold the fraudulent arts, the covert strife,
 The jarring interests that engross mankind;
 The low pursuits, the selfish aims of life;
 Studies that weary and contract the mind,
 That bring no joy, and leave no peace behind;
 And Death approaching to dissolve the spell!
 The immortal soul, which hath so long been blind,

Recovers then clear sight, and sees too well
 The error of its ways, when irretrievable.

14.

Far happier the Guaranies' humble race,
 With whom, in dutiful contentment wise,
 The gentle virtues had their dwelling-place.
 With them the dear, domestic charities
 Sustain'd no blight from fortune; natural ties
 There suffer'd no divorcement, save alone
 That which in course of nature might arise;
 No artificial wants and ills were known;
 But there they dwelt as if the world were all their own.

15.

Obedience in its laws that takes delight
 Was theirs; simplicity that knows no art;
 Love, friendship, grateful duty in its height;
 Meekness and truth, that keep all strife apart,
 And faith and hope which elevate the heart
 Upon its heavenly heritage intent.
 Poor, erring, self-tormentor that thou art,
 O Man! and on thine own undoing bent,
 Wherewith canst thou be blest, if not with these content?

16.

Mild pupils in submission's perfect school,
 Two thousand souls were gather'd here, and here
 Beneath the Jesuit's all-embracing rule
 They dwelt, obeying him with love sincere,
 That never knew distrust, nor felt a fear,
 Nor anxious thought which wears the heart away.
 Sacred to them their laws, their Ruler dear;
 Humbler or happier none could be than they,
 Who knew it for their good in all things to obey.

17.

The Patron Saint, from whom their town was named,
 Was that St. Joachim, who, legends say,
 Unto the Saints in Limbo first proclaim'd
 The Advent. Being permitted, on the day
 That Death enlarged him from this mortal clay,
 His daughter's high election to behold,
 Thither his soul, glad herald, wing'd its way,
 And to the Prophets and the Patriarchs old
 The tidings of great joy and near deliverance told.

18.

There on the altar was his image set,
 The lamp before it burning night and day,
 And there was incensed, when his votaries met
 Before the sacred shrine, their beads to say,
 And for his fancied intercession pray,
 Devoutly as in faith they bent the knee.
 Such adoration they were taught to pay;
 Good man, how little had he ween'd that he Should thus obtain a place in Rome's idolatry!

19.

But chiefly there the Mother of our Lord,
 His blessed daughter, by the multitude
 Was for their special patroness adored.

Amid the square on high her image stood,
Clasping the Babe in her beatitude,
The Babe Divine on whom she fix'd her sight;
And in their hearts, albe the work was rude,
It rais'd the thought of all-commanding might,
Combin'd with boundless love and mercy infinite.

20.

To this great family the Jesuit brought
His new-found children now; for young and old
He deem'd alike his children while he wrought
For their salvation,—seeking to unfold
The saving mysteries in the creed enroll'd,
To their slow minds, that could but ill conceive
The import of the mighty truths he told.
But errors they have none to which they cleave,
And whatsoe'er he tells they willingly believe.

21.

Safe from that pride of ignorance were they
That with small knowledge thinks itself full wise.
How at believing aught should these delay,
When every where new objects met their eyes
To fill the soul with wonder and surprise?
Not of itself, but by temptation bred,
In man doth impious unbelief arise;
It is our instinct to believe and dread;
God bids us love, and then our faith is perfected.

22.

Quick to believe, and slow to comprehend,
Like children, unto all the teacher taught
Submissively an easy ear they lend:
And to the font at once he might have brought
These converts, if the Father had not thought
Theirs was a case for wise and safe delay,
Lest lightly learn'd might lightly be forgot;
And meanwhile due instruction day by day
Would to their opening minds the sense of truth convey.

23.

Of this they reek'd not whether soon or late;
For overpowering wonderment possess'd
Their faculties; and in this new estate
Strange sights, and sounds, and thoughts, well nigh oppress'd
Their sense, and raised a turmoil in the breast
Resenting less of pleasure than of pain;
And sleep afforded them no natural rest,
But in their dreams, a mixed, disorder'd train,
The busy scenes of day disturb'd their hearts again.

24.

Even when the spirit to that secret wood
Return'd, slow Mondai's silent stream beside,
No longer there it found the solitude
Which late it left: strange faces were descried,
Voices, and sounds of music far and wide,
And buildings seem'd to tower amid the trees,
And forms of men and beasts on every side,
As ever-wakeful fancy hears and sees
All things that it had heard, and seen, and more than these.

25.

For in their sleep strange forms deform'd they saw
Of frightful fiends, their ghostly enemies,
And souls who must abide the rigorous law
Weltering in fire, and there with dolorous cries
Blaspheming roll around their hopeless eyes;
And those who doom'd a shorter term to bear
In penal flames, look upward to the skies,
Seeking and finding consolation there,
And feel, like dew from heaven, the precious aid of prayer.

26.

And Angels who around their glorious Queen
In adoration bent their heads abased;
And infant faces in their dreams were seen
Hovering on cherub-wings; and Spirits placed
To be their guards invisible, who chased
With fiery arms their fiendish foes away;
Such visions overheated fancy traced,
Peopling the night with a confused array
That made its hours of rest more restless than the day.

27.

To all who from an old erratic course
Of life, within the Jesuit's fold were led,
The change was perilous. They felt the force
Of habit, when, till then in forests bred,
A thick, perpetual umbrage overhead,
They came to dwell in open light and air.
This ill the Fathers long had learnt to dread,
And still devised such means as might prepare
The new-reclaim'd unhurt this total change to bear.

28.

All thoughts and occupations to commute,
To change their air, their water, and their food,
And those old habits suddenly uproot,
Conform'd to which the vital powers pursued
Their functions,—such mutation is too rude
For man's fine frame unshaken to sustain.
And these poor children of the solitude
Began ere long to pay the bitter pain
That their new way of life brought with it in its train.

29.

On Monnema the apprehended ill
Came first; the matron sunk beneath the weight
Of a strong malady, whose force no skill
In healing might avert or mitigate.
Yet, happy in her children's safe estate,
Her thankfulness for them she still express'd;
And yielding then complacently to fate,
With Christian rites her passing hour was bless'd,
And with a Christian's hope she was consign'd to rest.

30.

They laid her in the Garden of the Dead;
Such as a Christian burial-place should be
Was that fair spot, where every grave was spread
With flowers, and not a weed to spring was free;

But the pure blossoms of the orange-tree
 Dropp'd like a shower of fragrance on the bier;
 And palms, the type of immortality,
 Planted in stately colonnades appear,
 That all was verdant there throughout the unvarying year.

31.

Nor ever did irreverent feet intrude
 Within that sacred spot; nor sound of mirth,
 Unseemly there, profane the solitude,
 Where solemnly committed earth to earth,
 Waiting the summons for their second birth,
 Whole generations in Death's peaceful fold
 Collected lay; green innocence, ripe worth,
 Youth full of hope, and age whose days were told,
 Compress'd alike into that mass of mortal mould.

32.

Mortal, and yet at the Archangel's voice
 To put on immortality. That call
 Shall one day make the sentient dust rejoice;
 These bodies then shall rise, and east off all
 Corruption, with whate'er of earthly thrall
 Had clogg'd the heavenly image, then set free.
 How then should Death a Christian's heart
 appall?
 Lo, Heaven for you is open; — enter, ye
 Children of God, and heirs of his eternity!

33.

This hope supported Mooma, hand in hand
 When with Yeruti at the grave she stood.
 Less even now of death they understand
 Than of the joys eternal that ensued;
 The bliss of infinite beatitude
 To them had been their teacher's favorite theme,
 Wherewith their hearts so fully were imbued,
 That it the sole reality might seem,
 Life, death, and all things else, a shadow or a dream.

34.

Yea, so possess'd with that best hope were they,
 That if the heavens had opened overhead,
 And the Archangel with his trump that day
 To judgment had convoked the quick and dead,
 They would have heard the summons not with dread,
 But in the joy of faith that knows no fear;
 Come, Lord! come quickly! would this pair have said,
 And thou, O Queen of men and Angels dear,
 Lift us, whom thou hast loved, into thy happy sphere!

35.

They wept not at the grave, though overwrought
 With feelings there as if the heart would break.
 Some haply might have deem'd they suffered not;
 Yet they who look'd upon that Maiden meek
 Might see what deep emotion blanched her cheek.

An inward light there was which fill'd her eyes,
 And told, more forcibly than words could speak,
 That this disruption of her earliest ties
 Had shaken mind and frame in all their faculties.

36.

It was not passion only that disturb'd
 Her gentle nature thus; it was not grief;
 Nor human feeling by the effort curb'd
 Of some misdeeming duty, when relief
 Were surely to be found, albeit brief,
 If sorrow at its springs might freely flow;
 Nor yet repining, stronger than belief
 In its first force, that shook the Maiden so,
 Though these alone might that frail fabric overthrow.

37.

The seeds of death were in her at that hour;
 Soon was their quickening and their growth dis-
 play'd;
 Thenceforth she droop'd and wither'd like a flower,
 Which, when it flourish'd in its native shade,
 Some child to his own garden hath convey'd,
 And planted in the sun, to pine away.
 Thus was the gentle Mooma seen to fade,
 Not under sharp disease, but day by day
 Losing the powers of life in visible decay

38.

The sunny hue that tinged her cheek was gone:
 A deathly paleness settled in its stead;
 The light of joy which in her eyes had shone,
 Now like a lamp that is no longer fed
 Grew dim; but when she raised her heavy head,
 Some proffer'd help of kindness to partake,
 Those feeble eyes a languid lustre shed,
 And her sad smile of thankfulness would wake
 Grief even in callous hearts for that sweet sufferer's sake.

39.

How had Yeruti borne to see her fade?
 But he was spared the lamentable sight,
 Himself upon the bed of sickness laid.
 Joy of his heart, and of his eyes the light,
 Had Mooma been to him, his soul's delight,
 On whom his mind forever was intent,
 His darling thought by day, his dream by night,
 The playmate of his youth in mercy sent,
 With whom his life had passed in peacefulest content.

40.

Well was it for the youth, and well for her
 As there in placid helplessness she lay,
 He was not present with his love to stir
 Emotions that might shake her feeble clay,
 And rouse up in her heart a strong array
 Of feelings, hurtful only when they bind
 To earth the soul that soon must pass away.
 But this was spared them; and no pain of mind
 To trouble her had she, instinctively resign'd.

41.

Nor was there wanting to the sufferers aught
Of careful kindness to alleviate
The affliction ; for the universal thought
In that poor town was of their sad estate,
And what might best relieve or mitigate
Their case, what help of nature or of art ;
And many were the prayers compassionate
That the good Saints their healing would im-
part,
Breathed in that maid's behalf from many a tender
heart.

42.

And vows were made for her, if vows might save ;
She for herself the while preferr'd no prayer ;
For when she stood beside her Mother's grave,
Her earthly hopes and thoughts had ended
there.
Her only longing now was, free as air
From this obstructive flesh to take her flight
For Paradise, and seek her Mother there,
And then, regaining her beloved sight,
Rest in the eternal sense of undisturb'd delight.

43.

Her heart was there, and there she felt and knew
That soon full surely should her spirit be.
And who can tell what foretastes might ensue
To one, whose soul, from all earth's thralldom
free,
Was waiting thus for immortality ?
Sometimes she spake with short and hurried breath,
As if some happy sight she seem'd to see,
While, in the fulness of a perfect faith,
Even with a lover's hope, she lay and look'd for death.

44.

I said that for herself the patient maid
Preferr'd no prayer ; but oft her feeble tongue
And feebler breath a voice of praise essay'd ;
And duly when the vesper bell was rung,
Her evening hymn in faint accord she sung
So piously, that they who gathered round,
Awe-stricken on her heavenly accents hung,
As though they thought it were no mortal sound,
But that the place whereon they stood was holy ground.

45.

At such an hour, when Dobrizhoffer stood
Beside her bed, oh ! how unlike, he thought,
This voice to that which, ringing through the wood,
Had led him to the secret bower he sought !
And was it then for this that he had brought
That harmless household from their native
shade ?
Death had already been the mother's lot ;

And this fair Mooma, was she form'd to fade
So soon, — so soon must she in earth's cold lap be laid ?

46.

Yet he had no misgiving at the sight ;
And wherefore should he ? He had acted well,
And deeming of the ways of God aright,
Knew that to such as these, whate'er befell
Must needs for them be best. But who could dwell
Unmoved upon the fate of one so young,
So blithesome late ? What marvel if tears fell
From that good man as over her he hung,
And that the prayers he said came faltering from his tongue !

47.

She saw him weep, and she could understand
The cause thus tremulously that made him speak.
By his emotion moved, she took his hand ;
A gleam of pleasure o'er her pallid cheek
Past, while she look'd at him with meaning meek,
And for a little while, as loath to part,
Detaining him, her fingers, lank and weak,
Play'd with their hold ; then letting him depart,
She gave him a slow smile that touch'd him to the heart.

48.

Mourn not for her ! for what hath life to give
That should detain her ready spirit here ?
Thinkest thou that it were worth a wish to live,
Could wishes hold her from her proper sphere ?
That simple heart, that innocence sincere
The world would stain. Fitter she ne'er could be
For the great change ; and now that change is near,
Oh, who would keep her soul from being free ?
Maiden beloved of Heaven, to die is best for thee !

49.

She hath pass'd away, and on her lips a smile
Hath settled, fix'd in death. Judged they aright,
Or suffered they their fancy to beguile
The reason, who believed that she had sight
Of Heaven before her spirit took its flight ;
That Angels waited round her lowly bed ;
And that, in that last effort of delight,
When lifting up her dying arms, she said,
I come ! a ray from heaven upon her face was shed ?

50.

St. Joachin's had never seen a day
Of such profuse and general grief before,
As when, with tapers, dirge, and long array,
The Maiden's body to the grave they bore.
All eyes, all hearts, her early death deplore ;
Yet, wondering at the fortune they lament,
They the wise ways of Providence adore,
By whom the Pastor surely had been sent,
When to the Mondai woods upon his quest he went.

51.

'This was, indeed, a chosen family,
For Heaven's especial favor mark'd, they said ;
Shut out from all mankind they seem'd to be ;
Yet mercifully there were visited,
That so within the fold they might be led,
Then call'd away to bliss. Already two
In their baptismal innocence were dead ;
The third was on the bed of death they knew,
And in the appointed course must presently ensue.

52.

They marvell'd, therefore, when the youth once more
Rose from his bed, and walk'd abroad again ;
Severe had been the malady, and sore
The trial, while life struggled to maintain
Its seat against the sharp assaults of pain :
But life in him was vigorous ; long he lay
Ere it could its ascendancy regain ;
Then, when the natural powers resumed their sway,
All trace of late disease past rapidly away.

53.

The first inquiry, when his mind was free,
Was for his Sister. She was gone, they said,
Gone to her Mother, evermore to be
With her in Heaven. At this no tears he shed,
Nor was he seen to sorrow for the dead ;
But took the fatal tidings in such part
As if a dull, unfeeling nature bred
His unconcern ; for hard would seem the heart
To which a loss like his no suffering could impart.

54.

How little do they see what is, who frame
Their hasty judgment upon that which seems !
Waters that babble on their way proclaim
A shallowness ; but in their strength deep streams
Flow silently. Of death Yeruti deems
Not as an ill, but as the last great good,
Compared wherewith all other he esteems
Transient and void : how then should thought intrude
Of sorrow in his heart for their beatitude ?

55.

While dwelling in their sylvan solitude
Less had Yeruti learn'd to entertain
A sense of age than death. He understood
Something of death from creatures he had slain ;
But here the ills which follow in the train
Of age had first to him been manifest, —
The shrunken form, the limbs that move with pain,
The failing sense, infirmity, unrest, —
That in his heart he said to die betimes was best.

56.

Nor had he lost the dead : they were but gone
Before him, whither he should shortly go.
Their robes of glory they had first put on ;
He, cumber'd with mortality, below

66

Must yet abide awhile, content to know
He should not wait in long expectance here.
What cause then for repining, or for woe ?
Soon shall he join them in their heavenly sphere,
And often, even now, he knew that they were near.

57.

'Twas but in open day to close his eyes,
And shut out the unprofitable view
Of all this weary world's realities,
And forthwith, even as if they lived anew,
The dead were with him ; features, form, and hue,
And looks, and gestures, were restored again :
Their actual presence in his heart he knew ;
And when their converse was disturb'd, oh, then
How flat and stale it was to mix with living men !

58.

But not the less, whate'er was to be done,
With living men he took his part content,
At loom, in garden, or a-field, as one
Whose spirit, wholly on obedience bent,
To every task its prompt attention lent.
Alert in labor he among the best ;
And when to church the congregation went,
None more exact than he to cross his breast,
And kneel, or rise, and do in all things like the rest.

59.

Cheerful he was, almost like one elate
With wine, before it hath disturb'd his power
Of reason. Yet he seem'd to feel the weight
Of time ; for always, when from yonder tower
He heard the clock tell out the passing hour,
The sound appeared to give him some delight ;
And when the evening shades began to lower,
Then was he seen to watch the fading light
As if his heart rejoiced at the return of night.

60.

The old man, to whom he had been given in care,
To Dobrizhoffer came one day, and said,
The trouble which our youth was thought to bear
With such indifference hath deranged his head.
He says that he is nightly visited ;
His Mother and his Sister come and say
That he must give this message from the dead,
Not to defer his baptism, and delay
A soul upon the earth which should no longer stay.

61.

A dream the Jesuit deem'd it ; a deceit
Upon itself by feverish fancy wrought ;
A mere delusion, which it were not meet
To censure, lest the youth's distemper'd thought Might thereby be to further error brought ;
But he himself its vanity would find, —
They argued thus, — if it were noticed not.
His baptism was in fitting time design'd,
The father said, and then dismiss'd it from his mind

62.

But the old Indian came again ere long
With the same tale, and freely then confess d

His doubt that he had done Yeruti wrong;
For something more than common seem'd impress'd;

And now he thought that certes it were best
From the youth's lips his own account to hear;
Haply the father then to his request
Might yield, regarding his desire sincere,
Nor wait for further time if there were aught to fear.

63.

Considerately the Jesuit heard, and bade
The youth be called. Yeruti told his tale.
Nightly these blessed spirits came, he said,
To warn him he must come within the pale
Of Christ without delay; nor must he fail
This warning to their pastor to repeat,
Till the renewed entreaty should prevail.
Life's business then for him would be complete,
And 'twas to tell him this they left their starry seat.

64.

Came they to him in dreams?—he could not tell;
Sleeping or waking now small difference made;
For even, while he slept, he knew full well
That his dear Mother and that darling Maid
Both in the Garden of the Dead were laid;
And yet he saw them as in life, the same,
Save only that in radiant robes array'd,
And round about their presence when they came
There shone an effluent light as of a harmless flame.

65.

And where he was he knew, the time, the place,—
All circumstantial things to him were clear.
His own heart undisturb'd. His Mother's face
How could he choose but know; or, knowing, fear
Her presence and that Maid's, to him more dear
Than all that had been left him now below?
Their love had drawn them from their happy
sphere;
That dearest love unchanged they came to show;
And he must be baptized, and then he too might go.

66.

With searching ken the Jesuit, while he spake,
Perused him, if in countenance or tone
Aught might be found appearing to partake
Of madness. Mark of passion there was none;
None of derangement: in his eye alone,
As from a hidden fountain emanate,
Something of an unusual brightness shone:
But neither word nor look betrayed a state
Of wandering, and his speech, though earnest, was sedate.

67.

Regular his pulse, from all disorder free,
The vital powers perform'd their part assign'd;
And to whate'er was ask'd collectedly
He answer'd. Nothing troubled him in mind;
Why should it? Were not all around him kind?
Did not all love him with a love sincere,
And seem in serving him a joy to find?

He had no want, no pain, no grief, no fear;
But he must be baptized; he could not tarry here

68.

Thy will be done, Father in heaven who art!
The pastor said, nor longer now denied;
But with a weight of awe upon his heart
Enter'd the church, and there, the font beside,
With holy water, chrism, and salt applied,
Perform'd in all solemnity the rite.
His feeling was that hour with fear allied;
Yeruti's was a sense of pure delight,
And while he knelt his eyes seem'd larger and more bright.

69.

His wish hath been obtain'd; and this being done,
His soul was to its full desire content.
The day in its accustom'd course pass'd on;
The Indian mark'd him ere to rest he went,
How o'er his beads, as he was wont, he bent,
And then, like one who casts all care aside,
Lay down. The old man fear'd no ill event,
When, "Ye are come for me!" Yeruti cried;
"Yes, I am ready now!" and instantly he died.

NOTES.

So he, forsooth, a shapely boot must wear — Proem, p. 501.

His leg had been set by the French after their conquest of Pamplona, and re-set after his removal to his father's house. The latter operation is described as having been most severe, but borne by him, in his wonted manner, without any manifestation of suffering. For some time his life was despaired of. "When the danger of death was past, and the bones were knit and becoming firm, two inconveniences remained: one occasioned by a portion of bone below the knee, which projected so as to occasion some deformity; the other was a contraction of the leg, which prevented him from walking erect or standing firmly on his feet. Now, as he was very solicitous about his appearance, and intended at that time to follow the course of a military life, which he had begun, he inquired of his medical attendants, in the first place, whether the bone could be removed, which stood out in so unsightly a manner. They answered that it was possible to remove it, but the operation would be exceedingly painful, much more so than any which he had before undergone. He nevertheless directed them to cut it out, that he might have his will, and (as he himself related in my hearing, says Ribadencira) that he might wear fashionable and well-fitting boots. Nor could he be dissuaded from this determination. He would not consent to be bound during the operation, and went through it with the same firmness of mind which he had manifested in the former operations. By this means the deformity of the bone was removed. The contraction of the leg was in some degree relieved by other applications, and especially by certain machines, with which, during many days, and with great and continual pain, it was stretched; nevertheless it could not be so extended, but that it always remained something shorter than the other." — Ribadencira, Vita S. Ignatii Loyolæ, Acta SS. Jul. t. 7, p. 659.

A close-fitting boot seems to have been as fashionable at one time as close-fitting innominables of buckskin were about the year 1790; and perhaps it was as severe an operation to get into them for the first time. "The greasy shoemaker," says Tom Nash, with his squirrel's skin, and a whole stall of ware upon his arm, enters, and wrencheth his legs for an hour together, and after shows his tally. By St. Loy that draws deep." — Nash's Lenten Stuff. Horl. Miscel. vol. ii. p. 289, 8vo edition.

The operation of fitting a Spanish dandy with short-laced quarter-boots is thus minutely described by Juan de Zavaleta, who was historiographer at the commencement of Carlos the Second's reign.

Entra el zapatero oliendo á cansado. Saca de las hormas los zapatos, con tanta dificultad como si desoliera las hormas. Siéntase en una silla el galán; hincase el zapatero de rodillas, apoderase de una pierna con tantos tirones y desagradados, como si le embiaran a que le diera tormento. Mete un calzador en el talón del zapato, encapillate otro en la punta del pie, y luego empieza a guiar el zapato por encima del calzador. Apenas ha caminado poco mas que los dedos del pie, quando es menester arrastrarle con unas tenazas, y aun arrastrado se resiste. Ponese en pie el paciente fatigado, pero contento de que los zapatos le veigan angostos; y de orden del zapatero da tres ó quatro patadas en el suelo, con tanta fuerza, que pues na se quiebra, deve de ser de bronce.

Arozados dan de si el cordovan y la suela; pelbrjos en fin de animales, que obedecen a golpes. Buelvese a sentar el tal señor, dobla ázia fuera el copete del zapato, cogele con la boca de las tenazas, hinea el oficial junto a el entrambas rodillas, afirmase en el suelo con la mano izquierda, y puesto de brazas sobre el pie, hecho arco los dos dedos de la mano derecha que firman el jeme, va con ellos ayudando a llevar por el empeine arriba el cordovan, de quien tira con las tenazas su dueño. Buelve a ponerse en una rodilla, como primero estava; empuña con la una mano la punta del pie, y con la palma de la otra da sobre su mano tan grandes golpes como si los diera con una palu de jugar a la pelota; que es la necesidad tan discreta, que se haze el pobre el mal a si mismo, por no hazersele a aquel de quien accessita.

Ajustada ya la punta del pie, acude al talón; hunaedece con la lengua los remates de las costuras, porque no fulseen las costuras de scas por los remates. Tremenda vanidad, sufrir en sus pies un hombre la boca de otro hombre, solo por tener aliñados los pies! Desdobra el zapatero el talón, dase una buelta con el calzador a la mano, y empieza a encaxar en el pie la segunda porcion del zapato. Manda que se baze la punta, y hazese lo que manda. Llama ázia a si el zapato con tal fuerza, que entre su cuerpo, y el espaldar de la silla abrevia torpe y desaliñadamente al que calza. Dícele luego que haga talón, y el hombre obedece como un esclavo. Ordena despues que dê en el suelo una patada, y el di la patada, como se le ordena. Buelve a sentarse; saca el cruel mairastro el calzador del empeine, y por donde salió el calzador mete un palo, que llaman costa, y contra el buelve y rebuelve el sacabocados, que saca los bocados del cordovan, para que entren las cintas; y dera en el empeine del pie un dolor, y unas señales, como si huviera sacado de allí los bocados. Aguijereu las orejas, passa la cinta con una aguja, lleva las orejas a que cierran el zapato, ajustalos, y da luego con tanta fuerza el nudo, que si pudieran ahogar a un hombre por la garganta del pie, le ahogara. Haze la rosa despues con mas cuydado que gracia. Buelve a devanarse a la mano el calzador, que está colgando del talón; tira del como quien retoca, dá con la otra mano palmadas en la planta, como quien assicanta, y saca el calzador, echandose todo ázia atrás. Pone el galán el pie en el suelo, y quidase mirandole. Levantase el zapatero, arrasa con el dedo el sudor de la frente, y queda respirando como si huviera corrido. Todo esto se ahorrava con hazer el zapato un poco mayor que el pie. Padecen luego entrambos otro tanto con el pie segundo. Llega el ultimo y fiero trance de darle el dinera. Recoge el oficial sus baratijas. Recibe su estipendio, sale por la puerta de la sala mirando si es buena la plata que le han dado, dexando á su dueño de movimientos tan torpes como si le huviera echada unos grillos.

Si pensarán los que se calzan apretado que se achican el pie. Si lo piensan se engañan. Los huesos no se pueden meter unos en otros: con esto es fuerza que si le quiton de lo largo al zapato, se doble el pie por las coyunturas, y crezca ázia arriba lo que le menguan de adelante. Si le estrechan lo ancho, es preciso que se alargue aquella carne oprinida. Con la misma cantidad de pie que se tenian, se quedan los que calzan sisado. Lo que hazen es atormentarse, y dezur los pies de peor hechura. El animal á quien mas largos pies dió la naturaleza segun su cantidad, es el hombre; porque, como ha de andar todo el cuerpo sobre ellos, y no son mas de dos, quiso que anduviesse seguro. El que se los quiere abreviar, gana parece que tiene de caer, y de caer en los vicios, donde se hará mayor mal, que en las piedras. La parte que le puso Dios al hombre en la fabrica de su cuerpo mas cerca de la tierra, son los pies: quiso sin duda que fuera la parte mas humilde de su fabrica: pero los galones viciosos les quitan la humildad con los aliños, y los ensoberecen con el cuydado. Enfada esto a Dios tanto, que aviendo de hazer al hombre animal que pisasse la tierra, hizo la tierra de tal calidad, que se pudiesse imprimir en ella la huella del hombre. Abierta dera su sepultura el pie que se levanta, y parece que se levanta de la sepultura. Tremenda crueldad es enloquecer con el adorna al que se quiere tragar la tierra a cada passo. — El dia de Fiesta. Obras de D. Juan de Zavaleta, p. 179, 180.

"In comes the shoemaker in the odor of haste and fatigue. He takes the shoes off the last with as much difficulty as if he were skinning the lasts. The gallant seats himself upon a chair; the shoemaker kneels down, and takes possession of one foot, which he handles as if he were sent there to administer the torture. He puts one shoeing-skin* in the heel of the shoe, fits the other upon the point of the foot, and then begins to guide the shoe over the shoeing-skin. Scarcely has it got farther than the toes when it is found necessary to draw it on with pincers, and even then it is hard work. The patient stands up, fatigued with the operation, but well pleased that the shoes are tight; and by the shoemaker's directions he stamps three or four times on the floor, with such force that it must be of iron if it does not give way.

"The cordovan and the soles being thus beaten, submit; they are the skins of animals who obey blows. Our gallant returns to his seat, he turns up the upper leather of the shoe, and lays hold on it with the pincers; the tradesman kneels close by him on both knees, rests on the ground with his left hand, and bending in this all-four's position over the foot, making an arch with those fingers of the right hand which form the span, assists in drawing on the upper part of the cordovan, the gallant pulling the while with the pincers. He then puts himself on one knee, lays hold of the end of the foot with one hand, and with the palm of the other strikes his own hand as hard as if he were striking a ball with a racket. For necessity is so discreet that the poor man inflicts this pain upon himself that he may give none to the person of whose custom he stands in need.

"The end of the foot being thus adjusted, he repairs to the heel, and with his tongue moistens the end of the seams, that they may not give way for being dry. Tremendous vanity, that one man should allow the mouth of another to be applied to his feet that he may have them trimly set out! The shoemaker unfolds the heel, turns round with the shoeing-skin in his hand, and begins to fit the second part of the shoe upon the foot. He desires the gallant to put the end of the foot down, and the gallant does as he is desired. He draws the shoe towards him with such force that the person who is thus being shoed is compressed in an unseemly manner between the shoemaker's body and the back of the chair. Presently he tells him to put his heel down, and the man is as obedient as a slave. He orders him then to stamp upon the ground, and the man stamps as he is ordered. The gallant then seats himself again; the cruel operator draws the shoeing-skin from the instep, and in its place drives in a stick which they call costa.† He then turns upon it the punch, which makes the holes in the leather, through which the ribands are to pass; he again twists round his hand the strip of hare's-skin which hangs from the heel, and pulls it as if he were ringing a bell, and leaves upon the upper part of the top such pain and marks as if he had punched the holes in it. He bores the ears, passes the string through with a bodkin, brings the ears together that they may fasten the shoe, fits them to their intended place, and ties the knot with such force, that if it were possible to strangle a man by the neck of his foot, strangled the gallant would be. Then he makes the rose, with more care than grace. He goes then to take out the shoeing skin, which is still hanging from the heel; he lays hold of this, strikes the sole of the foot with his other hand as if settling it, and draws out the skin, bringing out all with it. The gallant puts his foot to the ground, and remains looking at it. The shoemaker rises, wipes the sweat from his forehead with his fingers, and draws his breath like one who has been running. All this trouble might have been saved by making the shoe a little larger than the foot. Presently both have to go through the same pains with the other foot. Now comes the last and terrible act of payment. The tradesman collects his tools, receives his money, and goes out at the door, looking at the silver to see if it is good, and leaving the gallant walking as much at his ease as if he had been put in fetters.

* A piece of hare's-skin is used in Spain for this purpose, as it appears by the former extract from Tom Nash that squirrel's-skin was in England.

† Which is used to drive in upon the last, to raise a shoe higher in the instep.

"If they who wear tight shoes think that thereby they can lessen the size of their feet, they are mistaken. The bones cannot be squeezed one into another; if therefore the shoe is made short, the foot must be crooked at the joints, and grow upward if it is not allowed to grow forward. If it is pinched in the breadth, the flesh which is thus constrained must extend itself in length. They, who are shod thus miserably remain with just the same quantity of foot.

"Of all animals, man is the one to which, in proportion to its size, nature has given the largest feet; because as his whole body is to be supported upon them, and he has only two, she chose that he should walk in safety. He who wishes to abbreviate them acts as if he were inclined to fall, and to fall into vices which will do him more injury than if he fell upon stones. The feet are the part which in the fabric of the human body are placed nearest to the earth; they are meant therefore to be the humblest part of his frame, but gallants take away all humility by adorning and setting them forth in bravery. This so displeases the Creator, that having to make man an animal who should walk upon the earth, he made the earth of such properties, that the footsteps should sink into it. The foot which is lifted from the ground leaves its own grave open, and seems as if it rose from the grave. What a tremendous thing is it then to set off with adornments that which the earth wishes to devour at every step!"

Whiling with books the tedious hours away. — Proem, p. 502.

Vede quanto importa a ligaõ de bons livros! Se o livro fora de cavallerias, sahria Ignacio hum grande cavalleyro; foy hum livro de vidas de Santos, sahio hum grande Santo. Se lera cavallerias, sahria Ignacio hum Cavalleyro da ardente espada; leo eidas de Santos, sahio hum Santo da ardente tocha. — Vieyra, Sermam de S. Ignacio, t. i. 368.

See, says Vieyra, the importance of reading good books. If it had been a book of knight-errantry, Ignacio would have become a great knight-errant; it was the Lives of the Saints, and Ignatius became a great saint. If he had read about knights, he might have proved a Knight of the Burning Sword: he read about saints, and proved a Saint of the Burning Torch.

Nothing could seem more probable than that Cervantes had this part of Loyola's history in his mind when he described the rise of Don Quixote's madness, if Cervantes had not shown himself in one of his dramas to be thoroughly imbued with the pestilent superstition of his country. El dichoso Rufan is one of those monstrous compositions which nothing but the anti-christian fables of the Romish church could have produced.

Landor, however, supposes that Cervantes intended to satirize a favorite dogma of the Spaniards. The passage occurs in his thirteenth conversation.

"The most dexterous attack ever made against the worship among catholics, which opens so many side-chapels to pillering and imposture, is that of Cervantes.

"Leopold. I do not remember in what part.

"President. Throughout Don Quixote. Dulcinea was the peerless, the immaculate, and death was denounce against all who hesitated to admit the assertion of her pections. Surely your highness never could have imagined that Cervantes was such a knight-errant as to attack knight-errantry, a folly that had ceased more than a century, if indeed it was any folly at all; and the idea that he ridiculed the poems and romances founded on it is not less improbable, for they contained all the literature of the nation, excepting the garniture of chapter-houses, theology, and pervaded, as with a thread of gold, the beautiful histories of this illustrious people. He delighted the idlers of romance by the jokes he scattered amongst them on the false taste of his predecessors and of his rivals; and he delighted his own heart by this solitary archery; well knowing what amusement those who came another day would find in picking up his arrows and discovering the bull's-eye hits.

"Charles V. was the knight of La Mancha, devoting his labors and vigils, his wars and treaties, to the chimerical idea of making all minds, like watches, turn their indexes by a simultaneous movement to one point. Sancho Panza was the symbol of the people, possessing sound sense in all other matters, but ready to follow the most extravagant visionary in this, and combining implicit belief in it with the grossest sensuality. For religion, when it is hot enough to produce enthusiasm, burns up and kills every seed intrusted to its bosom." — Imaginary Conversations, vol. i. 187.

Benedetto di Virgilio, the Italian ploughman, thus describes the course of Loyola's reading, in his heroic poem upon that Saint's life.

*Mentre le vote indebolite vene
Stass' egli rinforzando à poco à poco
Dentro i paterni tetti, e si trattiene
Or sù la ricca zambra, or presso al foco,
For' del costume suo, pensier gli viene
Di legger libri più che d'altro gioco;
Quant' era dianzi innamorato, e d'armi
Tant' or, mutando stile, inchina à i carmi*

*Quinci comanda, che i volumi ornati
D'alti concetti, e di leggiadra rima,
Dentro la stanza sua vengon portati,
Che passar con lor versi il tempo stima:
Cercan ben tosto i paggi in tutti i lati
Ove posar solean tai libri prima,
Ma nè per questa parte, nè per quella
Ponno istoria trovar vecchia, o novella.*

*I volumi vergati in dolci canti
S'ascondon sì, che nulla il cercar giova:
Ma pur cercando i più secreti canti
Per gran fortuna un tomo ecco si trova,
Tomo divin, che le vite de' Santi
Conserca, e de la etade prisca e nova,
Onde per fur la brama sua contenta
Tal opra un fido servo à lui presenta*

*Il volume, che spiega in ogni parte
De guerrieri del ciel l'opre famose,
Fu ch' Ignatio s'accenda d seguir l'arte
Che à soffrir tanto i sacri Eroï dispose,
Egli già sprezza di Bellona e Marte
Gli studi, che à seguir primu si pose,
E s' accinge à troncar maggior d'Alcide,
L'Hydra del vicio, e le sue teste infide.*

*Tutto giocondo à contemplar s'appiglia
Si degai fogli, e da principio al fine;
Qui ritrova di Dio l'ampira famiglia,
Spirti beati ed alme peregrine:
Tra gli altri osserva con sua meraviglia
Il pio Gusman, che colse da le spine
Rose celesti de la terra santa,
Onde del buon Gicso nacque la pianta.*

*Contempla dopo il Serafico Magno
Fondator de le bigge immense squadre;
La divina virtù, l'alto guadagno
De l'opre lor mirabili e leggiadre:
Rimira il Padoan di lui compagno,
Che liberò da indegna morte il padre,
E per provar di quella causa il torto,
Vivo fè de la tomba uscire il morto.*

*Quinci ritrova il Celestin, che spande
Trionfante bandiera alla campagna,
De l'egregie virtù sue memorande
Con Italia s'ingemma e Francia e Spagna:
Ornati i figli suoi d'opre ammirande
Son per l'Africa sparti, e per Lamagna,
E in parti infide al Ciel per lor si vede
Nascere la Chiesa, e pullular la fede.*

*Quivi s'avisa, come il buon Norcino
Inclito Capitan del Rè superno,*

*Un giorno guereggiand' su 'l Casino
 G'Idoli frucassò, rinsè l'Inferno,
 E con aita del motor divino
 Guastò tempio sacro al cieco Averno,
 Por di novo l'eresse à l'alta prole
 Divino essemplio de l'eterno Sole.*

*Legge comè Brunone al divin Regge
 Accolse al Rè del Ciel cigni felici,
 E dando ordine lor, regola e legge
 G' imparò calpestare aspre pendici;
 E quelle de le donne anco vi legge,
 Che qui di ricche direntar mendici
 Per trorar poi sù le sedi superne
 Lor doti incorruttibili ed eterne.*

*Chiara tra l'altre nota e Caterina,
 Che per esser di Dio fedele amante,
 Fà intrepida à i tormenti: e la Regina
 Di Siena, e seco le compagne tante:
 Orsola con la schiera peregrina,
 Monache sacre, verginelle sante,
 Che sprezzanda del mondo il vano rito,
 Ellesero Giesù lor gran marito.*

*E tra i Romiti mira Ilorione,
 E di Vienna quel sì franco e forte
 Che debellò la furie, e 'l gran Compione
 Ch' oppo il Natal di Christo hebbe la morte;
 Risguarda quel del primo Confalone,
 Che del Ciel guarida le superne porte:
 E gli undeci compagni, e come luce
 Il dico Agnello di lor capo e Duca.*

*Mentre in questo penetra e meglio intende
 D'Eroi sì gloriosi il nobil vanto,
 Aura immortal del Ciel sovra lui scende,
 Aura immortal di spiro divo e santo:
 Già gli sgombra gli errori e già gli accende
 In guisa il cor, che distilla in pianto;
 Lagrime versa, e le lagrime sparte
 Bagnan del libro le vergate carte.*

*Qual duro ghiaccio sovra e monti alpini
 Da la virtù del sole intencrito,
 Suol liquefarsi, e di bei cristallini
 Rivi l'herbe inaffiar del suol fiorito:
 Tal da la forza degli ardor divini
 Del Giovanetto molle il cor ferito,
 Hor si discioglie in tepidi liquori,
 E rigan del bel volto i vaghi fiori.*

*Com' altri nel cristallo, o nel diamante
 Specchiarsi suol, tal ei si specchia, e mira
 Nel specchio di sua mente, inù l'errante
 Vita discerne, onde con duol sospira:
 Quinci risolve intrepido e costante
 Depor gli orgogli giovanili e l'ira,
 Per imitar ne l'opra e ne gli effitti
 I celesti guerrier del libro letti.*

Ignatio Loiola. Roma, 1617. Canto 2.

The Jesuits, however, assure us, that Loyola is not the author of their society, and that it is not allowable either to think or say so. Societas Jesu ut à S. Ignatio de Loiola non ducit nomen, ita neque originem primam, et aliud sentire aut loqui, nefas. (Imago primi Sæculi Soc. Jesu, p. 64.) Jesus primus ac præcipuus auctor Societatis is the title of a chapter in this their secular volume, which is a curious and very beautiful book. Then follows Beata Virgo nutrix, potrona, inò altera velut auctor Societatis. Lastly, Post Christum et Mariam Societatis Auctor et Parens sanctus Ignatius.

“On the 26th August, 1794, the French plundered the rich church of Loyola, at Azeitia, and proceeding to Elgoibas, loaded five carts with the spoils of the church of that place. This party of marauders consisted of 200. The peasants collected, fell upon them, and after an obstinate conflict of three hours, recovered the whole booty, which they conveyed to Vittoria in triumph. Among other things, a relic of Loyola was recovered, which was carried in procession to the church, the victorious peasants accompanying it.” — Marellac, Hist. de la Guerre de l'Espagne, p. 86.

Vaccination. — Canto I. st. 1.

It is odd that in Hindostan, where it might have been supposed superstition would have facilitated the introduction of this practice, a pious fraud was found necessary for removing the prejudice against it.

Mooperal Streemivashary, a Brahmin, thus writes to Dr. Anderson, at Madras, on vaccine inoculation.

“It might be useful to remove a prejudice in the minds of the people, arising from the term cow-pock, being taken literally in our Tamul tongue; whereas there can be no doubt that it has been a drop of nectar from the exuberant udders of the cows in England, and no way similar to the humor discharged from the tongue and feet of diseased cattle in this country.” — FORBES'S Oriental Memoirs, vol. iii. p. 423.

For tyrannous fear dissolved all natural bonds of man.

Canto I. st. 3.

Mackenzie gives a dreadful picture of the effect of small-pox among the North American Indians.

“The small-pox spread its destructive and desolating power, as the fire consumes the dry grass of the field. The fatal infection spread around with a baneful rapidity, which no flight could escape, and with a fatal effect that nothing could resist. It destroyed with its pestilential breath whole families and tribes; and the horrid scene presented to those who had the melancholy and afflicting opportunity of beholding it, a combination of the dead, the dying, and such as, to avoid the horrid fate of their friends around them, prepared to disappoint the plague of its prey, by terminating their own existence.

“The habits and lives of these devoted people, which provided not to-day for the wants of to-morrow, must have heightened the pains of such an affliction, by leaving them not only without remedy, but even without alleviation. Nought was left them but to submit in agony and despair.

“To aggravate the picture, if aggravation were possible, may be added the putrid carcasses which the wolves, with a furious voracity, dragged forth from the huts, or which were mangled within them by the dogs, whose hunger was satisfied with the disfigured remains of their masters. Nor was it uncommon for the father of a family, whom the infection had not reached, to call them around him, to represent the cruel sufferings and horrid fate of their relations, from the influence of some evil spirit, who was preparing to extirpate their race; and to incite them to baffle death, with all its horrors, by their own poniards. At the same time, if their hearts failed them in this necessary act, he was himself ready to perform the deed of mercy with his own hand, as the last act of his affection, and instantly to follow them to the common place of rest and refuge from human evil.”

And from the silent door the jaguar turns away.

Canto I. st. 11.

I may be forgiven for not having strictly adhered to natural history in this instance. The liberty which I have taken is mentioned, that it may not be supposed to have arisen from ignorance of this animal's habits.

The jaguar will not attack a living horse if a dead one be near, and when it kills its prey, it drags it to its den, but is said not to eat the body till it becomes putrid. They are caught in large traps of the cage kind, baited with stinking meat, and then speared or shot through the bars. The Chalcaguines had a braver way of killing them: they provoked the animal, fronted it, received its attack upon a thick truncheon, which they held by the two ends, threw it down while its teeth were fixed in the wood, and ripped the creature up before it could recover. (Teeha, p. 29.) A great profit is made by their skins. The jaguar which has once tasted human flesh becomes a most formidable animal; such a beast is called a tigre ceceo, a fleshed tiger. There was one which infested the road between Santa Fé and Santiago, and had killed ten men; after which a party of soldiers were sent to destroy it. The same thing is said of the lion and other beasts of prey, probably with truth; not, as is vulgarly supposed, because they have a particular appetite for this kind of food, but because, having once fed upon man, they from that time regard him, like any animal of inferior strength, as their natural prey. "It is a constant observation in Numidia," says Bruce, "that the lion avoids and flies from the face of men, till by some accident they have been brought to engage, and the beast has prevailed against him; then that feeling of superiority, imprinted by the Creator in the heart of all animals, for man's preservation, seems to forsake him. The lion, having once tasted human blood, relinquishes the pursuit after the flock. He repairs to some highway or frequented path, and has been known, in the kingdom of Tunis, to interrupt the road to a market for several weeks; and in this he persists, till hunters or soldiers are sent out to destroy him." Dobrizhoffer saw the skin of a jaguar which was as long as the standard hide. He says, also, that he saw one attack two horses which were coupled with a thong, kill one, and drag the other away after it.

A most unpleasant habit of this beast is, that in cold or wet weather he chooses to lodge within doors, and will steal into the house. A girl at Corrientes, who slept with her mother, saw one lying under the bed when she rose in the morning: she had presence of mind to bid her mother lie still, went for help, and soon rid the house of its perilous visiter. Cat-like, the jaguar is a good climber; but Dobrizhoffer tells us how a traveller who takes to a tree for shelter may profit by the provision: In prompta consilium; urina pro armis est: hac si tigridis ad arboris pedem militantis oculos conspexeris, salva res est. Quâ datâ portâ fuget illico. (i. 280.) He who first did this must have been a good marksman as well as a cool fellow, and it was well for him that he reserved his fire till the jaguar was within shot.

Dobrizhoffer seems to credit an opinion (which is held in India of the tiger also) that the jaguar's claws are in a certain degree venomous; the scar which they leave is said to be always liable to a very painful and burning sense of heat. But that author, in his usual amusing manner, repeats many credulous notions concerning the animal; as that its burnt claws are a remedy for the tooth-ache; and that it has a mode of decoying fish, by standing neck-deep in the water, and spitting out a white foam, which allures them within reach. Techo (30) says the same thing of a large snake.

An opinion that wounds inflicted by the stroke of animals of this kind are envenomed is found in the East also. Captain Williamson says, "However trivial the scratches made by the claws of tigers may appear, yet, whether it be owing to any noxious quality in the claw itself, to the manner in which the tiger strikes, or any other matter, I have no hesitation in saying, that at least a majority of such as have been under my notice died; and I have generally remarked, that those whose cases appeared the least alarming were most suddenly carried off. I have ever thought the perturbation arising from the nature of the attack to have a considerable share in the fatality alluded to, especially as I never knew any one wounded by a tiger to die without suffering for some days under that most dreadful symptom, a locked jaw! Such as have been wounded to appearance severely, but accompanied with a moderate hæmorrhage, I have commonly found to recover, excepting in the rainy season: at that period I should expect serious consequences from either a bite or a scratch." — Oriental Sports, vol. i. p. 52.

Wild beasts were so numerous and fierce in one part of Mexico, among the Otenites, that Fr. Juan de Grijalva says in his time, in one year, more than 250 Indians were devoured by them. "There then prevailed an opinion," he proceeds, "and still it prevails among many, that those tigers and lions were certain Indian sorcerers, whom they call Nahuales, who by diabolical art transform themselves into beasts, and tear the Indians in pieces, either to revenge themselves for some offences which they have received, or to do them evil, which is the proper condition of the Devil, and an effect of his fierceness. Some traces of these diabolical acts have been seen in our time, for in the year 1579, the deaths of this kind being many, and the suspicion vehement, some Indians were put to the question, and they confessed the crime, and were executed for it. With all this experience and proof, there are many persons who doubt these transformations, and say that the land being mountainous produces wild beasts, and the beasts being once fleshed commit these great ravages. And it was through the weak understandings of the Indians that they were persuaded to believe their conjurers could thus metamorphose themselves; and, if these poor wretches confessed themselves guilty of such a crime, it was owing to their weakness under the torture; and so they suffered for an offence which they had never committed."

Father Grijalva, however, holds with his Father S. Augustine, who has said, concerning such things, hæc ad nos non quibuscumque qualibus credere putaremus indignum, sed eis referentibus pervenerunt, quos nobis non existimemus fuisse mentitos. "In the days of my Father S. Augustine," he says, "wonderful things were related of certain inn-keepers in Italy, who transformed passengers into beasts of burden, to bring to their inns straw, barley, and whatever was wanted from the towns, and then metamorphosed them into their own persons, that they might purchase, as customers, the very commodities they had carried. And in our times the witches of Legrone make so many of these transformations, that now no one can doubt them. This matter of the Nahuales, or sorcerers of Tututepec, has been confessed by so many, that that alone suffices to make it credible. The best proof which can be had is, that they were condemned to death by course of justice; and it is temerity to condemn the judges, for it is to be believed that they made all due inquiry. Our brethren who have been ministers there, and are also judges of the interior court, (that is, of the conscience,) have all held these transformations to be certain; so that there ought to be no doubt concerning it. On the contrary, it is useful to understand it, that if at any time in heathen lands the devil should work any of these metamorphoses, the Indians may see we are not surprised at them, and do not hold them as miraculous, but can explain to them the reason and cause of these effects, which astonish and terrify them so greatly."

He proceeds to show that the devil can only exercise this power as far as he is permitted by God, in punishment for sin, and that the metamorphosis is not real, but only apparent; the sorcerer not being actually transformed into a lion, but seeming as if he were so both to himself and others. In what manner he can tear a man really to pieces with imaginary claws, and devour him in earnest with an imaginary mouth, the good friar has not condescended to explain. — Historia de la Orden de S. Augustin en la Provincia de N. España, pp. 34, 35.

Preserved with horrid art
In ghastly image of humanity. — Canto I. st. 13.

The more ghastly in proportion as more of the appearance of life is preserved in the revolting practice. Such, however, it was not to the feelings of the Egyptians, who had as much pride in a collection of their ancestors, as one of the strongest family feeling could have in a collection of family pictures. The body, Diodorus says, is delivered to the kindred with every member so whole and entire that no part of the body seems to be altered, even to the very hairs of the eyelids and the eyebrows, so that the beauty and shape of the face seems just as before. By which means many of the Egyptians, laying up the bodies of their ancestors in stately monuments, perfectly see the true visage and countenance of those who were buried many ages before they themselves were born; so that in regarding the proportion of every one of these bodies, and the lineaments of their faces, they take exceeding great delight, even as if they were still living among them. (Book i.)

They believe, says Herodotus, (Euterpe, § 123,) that on the dissolution of the body the soul immediately enters into some other animal; and that after using as vehicles every species of terrestrial, aquatic, and winged creatures, it finally enters a second time into a human body. They affirm that it undergoes all these changes in the space of three thousand years. This opinion some among the Greeks have at different periods of time adopted as their own; but I shall not, though I could, specify their names.

How little did the Egyptians apprehend that the bodies which they preserved with such care, to be ready again for use when the cycle should be fulfilled, would one day be regarded as an article of trade, broken up, exported piecemeal, and administered in grains and seroples, as a costly medicine, to rich patients! A preference was even given to virgin mummy.

The bodies of the Incas, from the founder of the empire, were preserved in the Temple of the Sun: they were seated each on his litter, and in such excellent preservation that they seemed to be alive; according to the testimony of P. Acosta and Garcilaso, who saw them and touched them. It is not known in what manner they were prepared, so as to resist the injuries of time. Gomara (c. 195) says they were embalmed by the juice of certain fragrant trees, which was poured down their throats, and by unguents of gum. Acosta says that a certain bitumen was used, and that plates of gold were placed instead of eyes, so well fitted that the want of the real eye was not perceived. Garcilaso thought the chief preparation consisted in freezing them with snow. They were buried in one of the courts of the hospital of St. Andres. — Merc. Peruano, No. 221.

Hideous exhibitions of this kind are sometimes made in monasteries, where they are in perfect accord with monastic superstition. I remember seeing two human bodies, dry and shrivelled, suspended in the Casa dos Ossos, at Evora, a chapel, the walls of which are lined with skulls and bones.

"Among the remarkable objects in the vicinity of Palermo pointed out to strangers, they fail not to singularize a convent of Capuchins at a small distance from town, the beautiful gardens of which serve as a public walk. You are shown, under the fabric, a vault divided into four great galleries, into which the light is admitted by windows cut out at the top of each extremity. In this vault are preserved, not in flesh, but in skin and bone, all the Capuchins who have died in the convent since its foundation, as well as the bodies of several persons from the city. There are here private tombs belonging to opulent families, who, even after annihilation, disdain to be confounded with the vulgar part of mankind. It is said, that in order to secure the preservation of these bodies, they are prepared by being gradually dried before a slow fire, so as to consume the flesh without greatly injuring the skin; when perfectly dry, they are invested with the Capuchin habit, and placed upright, on tablets, disposed step above step along the sides of the vault; the head, the arms, and the feet are left naked. A preservation like this is horrid. The skin discolored, dry, and as if it had been tanned, nay, torn in some places, glued close to the bones. It is easy to imagine, from the different grimaces of this numerous assemblage of fleshless figures, rendered still more frightful by a long beard on the chin, what a hideous spectacle this must exhibit; and whoever has seen a Capuchin alive, may form an idea of this singular repository of dead friars." — Sonnini.

It is not surprising that such practices arise from superstition; but it is strange, indeed, that they should afford any gratification to pride. That excellent man, Fletcher of Madeley, has a striking remark upon this subject. "The murderer," says he, "is dissected in the surgeon's hall, gratis; and the rich sinner is embowelled in his own apartment at great expense. The robber, exposed to open air, wastes away in hoops of iron; and the gentleman, confined to a damp vault, moulders away in sheets of lead; and while the fowls of the air greedily prey upon the one, the vermin of the earth eagerly devour the other."

How different is the feeling of the Hindoos upon this subject from that of the Egyptians! "A mansion with bones for its rafters and beams; with nerves and tendons for cords; with muscles and blood for mortar; with skin for its outward covering; filled with no sweet perfume, but loaded with feces and urine; a mansion infested by age and by sorrow; the seat of malady, harassed with pains, haunted with the quality of darkness, and incapable of standing long. Such a mansion of the vital soul lets its occupier always cheerfully quit." — Inst. of Menu.

When the laden bee

Buzzed by him in its flight, he could pursue
Its course with certain ken. — Canto I. st. 20.

It is difficult to account for the superior quickness of sight which savages appear to possess. The Brazilian tribes used to eradicate the eyelashes and eyebrows, as impeding it. "Some Indians," P. Andres Perez de Ribas says, "were so quick-sighted that they could ward off the coming arrow with their own bow." — L. ii. c. 3, p. 41.

Covering with soft guns the obedient limb
And body, then with feathers overlay,
In regular hues disposed. — Canto I. st. 25.

Inconvenient as this may seem, it was the foll dress of the Tupi and Guarani tribes. A fashion less gorgeous and elaborate, but more refined, is described by one of the best old travellers to the East, François Pyrard.

"The inhabitants of the Maldives use on feast days this kind of gallantry. They bruise sanders (sandal-wood) and camphire, on very slicke and smooth stones, (which they bring from the firm land,) and sometimes other sorts of odoriferous woods. After they compound it with water distilled of flowers, and overspread their bodies with this paste, from the girdle upwards; adding many forms with their finger, such as they imagine. It is somewhat like cot and pinked doublets, and of an excellent savor. They dress their wives or lemans in this sort, and make upon their backs works and shadows as they please." Skin-prints Purchas calls this. — Pyrard de Laval. Purchas, p. 1655.

The abominable practice of tarring and feathering was but too well known during the American war. It even found its way to England. I remember, when a child, to have seen a man in this condition in the streets of Bristol.

The costume of the savages, who figured so frequently in the pageants of the sixteenth century, seems to have been designed to imitate the Brazilian tribes, best known to the French and English at that time. Indeed, this is stated by Vincent Carloix, when, in describing an entertainment given to Marechal de Vieilleville by the captains of the galleys at Marseilles, he says, Ayant lié six galères ensemble de front, et fait dresser les tables dessus, et tapissées en façon de grandes salles; ayant accoustrés les forceats en Bressiliens pour servir, ils firent une infinité de gambades et de tourbions à la façon des sauvages, que personne n'avoit encore vus; dont tout le monde, avec une extrême alluigresse, s'esbahissoit merveilleusement. — Mémoires, l. x. ch. 18.

Drinking feasts. — Canto I. st. 26.

The point of honor in drinking is not the same among the savages of Goiana, as among the English potatoes: they account him that is drunk first the bravest fellow. — Harcourt's Voyage.

A custom strange, and yet far spread
Through many a savage tribe, how'er it grew,
And once in the old world known as widely as the new.
Canto I. st. 28.

Je la trouve chez les Ibériens, ou les premiers peuples d'Espagne; je la trouve chez les anciens habitans de l'Isle de Corse; elle étoit chez les Tibariens en Asie; elle est aujourd'hui dans quelquesunes de nos provinces voisines d'Espagne, ou cela s'oppele faire couvade; elle est encore vers le Japon, et dans l'Amerique chez les Caraïbes et les Galibis. — Lafitau, Mœurs des Sauvages, t. i. p. 50.

Strabo says this strange custom existed in Cantabria, (l. iii. p. 174, ed. 1571,) so that its Gascon extraction has been direct. Diodorus Siculus is the authority for its existence in Corsica. (Book iii. ch. 1, English translation, 1814, vol. i. p. 305.) Apollonius Rhodius describes it among the Tibarieni, (l. ii. 1012:) ὡς ἰστροεῖ Νυμφόδωρος ἐν τισιν νόμοις, says the scholiast.

Voicy la brutalité de nos sauvages dans leurs réjouissance pour l'accroissement de leur famille. C'est qu'au même tems que la femme est delivrée le mary se met au lit, pour s'y plaindre et y faire l'accouchée; coutume, que bien que sauvage et ridicule se trouve neantmoins à ce que l'on dit, paray les paysans d'une certaine province de France; et ils appellent cela faire la couvade. Mais ce qui est de fâcheuse pour le pauvre Caraïbe qui s'est mis au lit au lieu de l'accouchée, c'est qu'on luy fait faire dicté dix ou douze jours de suite, ne luy donnant rien par jour qu'un morceau de cassave, et un peu d'eau dans laquelle on a aussi fait bouillir un peu de ce pain de racine. Après il mange un peu plus : mais il n'entame la cassave qu'il lui est présentée que par le milieu durant quelques quarante jours, en laissant les bords entiers qu'il pend à sa case, pour servir à un festin qu'il fait ordinairement en suite à tous ses amis. Et même il s'abstient après cela, quelquefois dix mois ou au entier de plusieurs viandes, comme de lamantin, de tortue, de poureau, de poules, de poisson, et de choses délicates, craignant par une pitoyable folie que cela ne nuise à l'enfant. Mais ils ne font ce grand jeûne qu'à la naissance de leur premier enfant. — Rochefort. Hist. Morale des Iles Antilles, c. 23, p. 495.

Mareo Polo, (l. ii. c. 41,) the other authority to which Lafitau refers, speaks of the custom as existing in the great Khan's province of Cardandan. Hanno un' usanza che subito ch' una donna ha partorito, si leva del letto, e lavato il fanciullo e ravolto ne' panni, il marito si mette a giacere in letto in sua vece, e tiene il figliuolo appresso di se, havendo la cura di quello per quaranta giorni, che non si parte mai. Et gli amici e parenti vanno a visitarlo per rallegrarlo e consolarlo; e le donne che sono da parto fanno quel che bisogna per casa, portando da mangiare e bere al marito, ch' e nel letto, e dando il latte al fanciullo, che gli è appresso. — Ramusio, t. ii. p. 36, ed. 1583.

Yet this custom, preposterous as it is, is not more strange than an opinion which was once so prevalent in this country that Primrose made it the subject of a chapter in his work, De Vulgi Erroribus in Medicinâ, and thought it necessary to prove, by physical reasons, maritum loco uxoris gravidæ non ærotare, for such is the title of one of his chapters. He says, Inter errores quamplurimos maxime ridendus hic esse videtur, quod vir credatur ærotare, usque affici symptomatis, quibus ipsa mulier prægnans solet, illadque experientiâ confirmatua plurimi esse volunt. Habebam ægrum febre laborantem cum urinâ calide accensâ et turbidâ, qui ærotationis suæ nullam causam agnoscebat quam uxoris suæ graviditatem. Nullibi terrarum quam in Angliâ id observatua memini me audivisse, aut legisse unquam. — Nec si quis maritus cum uxor gravida est, ærotat ab uxore infectus fuit, sed potest ex peculiari præprij corporis vitio id pati. Sicut dum hæc scribo, pluit; non est tamen pluvia aut causa scriptiois, aut scriptura pluvie. Res nova non est, viros et mulieres etiam simul ærotare. At mirum est hæcenusque ignotum, graviditatem affectum esse contagiosum, et non alias mulieres sed viros, quas natura ianunes ab hoc labore fecit, solos infici. Præterea observatum est non omnibus mulieribus ejusmodi symptomata, aut saltem non omnia singulis contingere; at tamen accidit sæpe ut cum mulier bene valet, ærotet maritus, etiam absens per aliquot miliaria. Sed quoniam ex solâ relatione absurditas hujus erroris patet, plura non addam. Jupiter Bacchum in femore. Palladem in cerebro gestavit. Sed hoc illi esto proprium. — Lib. ii. c. 13.

This notion, however, is probably not yet extinct, for I know that it existed in full force some thirty years ago, and that not in the lowest rank of life.

*Till hardened mothers in the grave could lay
Their living babes with no compunctious tear.*

Canto I. st. 38.

This dreadful practice is carried to such an extent in the heart of South America, that whole tribes have become extinct in consequence of it, and of another practice, hardly less nefarious.

Those bloody African savages, the Giagas, reared no children whatsoever; "for as soon," says Battell, "as the woman is delivered of her child, it is presently buried quick; so that there is not one child brought up in all this generation. But when they take any town, they keep the boys and girls of thirteen or fourteen years of age as their own children, but the men and women they kill and eat. These little boys they train up in the wars, and hang a collar about their necks for a disgrace, which is never taken off till he proveth himself a man, and brings his enemy's head to the general; and then it is taken off, and he is a free man, and is called 'gonso,' or 'soldier.' This maketh them all desperate and forward to be free, and counted men, and so they do increase. A generation without generation, says Purchas, p. 977.

Among the causes for which the Knistencaux women procure abortion, Mackenzie (p. 98) assigns that of hatred for the father. No other traveller has ever suspected the existence of this motive. They sometimes kill their female children to save them from the miseries which they themselves have suffered.

The practice among the Panches of Bogota was, that if the first-born proved a girl, it was destroyed, and every girl in succession till the mother bore a boy, after which girls were allowed to live; but if the first-born were a boy, all the children then were reared. — Piedrahita, p. 11.

Perhaps the most flagitious motive for which this crime has ever become a practice, is that which the Guann women assign for it; they destroy the greater number of their female infants in order to keep up the value of the sex. (Azara, t. ii. 85—100. See Hist. of Brazil, vol. ii. 379.) A knowledge of the evils which polygamy brings upon some of their neighbors may have led to this mode of preventing it.

Father Gumilla one day bitterly reproved a Betoia woman (whom he describes as having more capacity than any other of the Indians in those parts,) for killing her new-born daughter. She listened to him without lifting her eyes from the ground, and when he had done, and thought that she was convinced of her guilt, and heartily repented of it, she said, "Father, if you will not be angry, I will tell you what is in my heart." He promised that he would not, and bade her speak freely. This she said to me, he says, as follows, literally translated from the Betoia tongue. "Would to God, Father, would to God, my mother when she brought me forth had loved me so well and pitied me so much as to have saved me from all those troubles which I have endured till this day, and am to endure till death! If my mother had buried me as soon as I was born, I should have died, but should not have felt death, and should have been spared from that death which must come, and should have escaped so many things bitterer than death; who knows how many more such I must endure before I die! Consider well, Father, the hardships that a poor Indian woman endures among these Indians! They go with us to the plantations, but they have a bow and arrow in their hands, nothing more; we go with a basket full of things on the back, one child at the breast, another upon the basket. Their business is to shoot a bird or a fish, ours is to dig and work in the field; at evening they go home without any burden; we, besides our children, have to carry roots for their food, and maize to make their drink. They, when they reach the house, go to converse with their friends; we have to seek wood, fetch water, and prepare their supper. Having supped, they go to sleep; but we almost all the night are pounding maize to make their chica. And what is the end of this our watching and labor? They drink the chica, they get drunk, and being out of their senses, beat us with sticks, take us by the hair, drag us about and trample on us. Would to God, Father, that my mother had buried me when she brought me forth! You know that I complain with ease, for all that I have said you witness every day. But our greatest pain you do not know, because you never can suffer it. You do not know, Father, the death it is for the poor Indian woman, when having served her husband as a slave, sweating in the field, and in the house without sleep, at the end of twenty years she sees him take a girl for another wife. Her he loves, and though she ill uses our children, we cannot interfere, for he neither loves us nor cares for us now. A girl is to command over us, and treat us as her servants, and if we speak, they silence us with sticks. Can any Indian woman do better for the daughter which she brings forth than to save it from all these troubles, and deliver it from this slavery, worse than death? I say again, Father, would to God my mother had made me feel her kindness by burying me as soon as I was born! Then would not this heart have had now so much to feel, nor these eyes so much to weep for?" Here, says Gumilla, tears put an end to her speech: and the worst is, that all which she said, and all she would have said, if grief had allowed her to proceed, is true. — Orinoco Illustrado, t. ii. p. 65, ed. 1791.

*From the dove
They named the child Yeruti.* — Canto I. st. 42.

This is the Guarani name for the species described by Azara, t. iv. p. 130, No. cccxx.

What power had placed them here. — Canto II. st. 27.

Some of the Orinoco tribes believe that their first forefathers grew upon trees. — Gumilla, t. i. c. 6.

The Othomacae, one of the rudest of the Orinoco tribes, suppose themselves descended from a pile of stones upon the top of a rock called Baraguan, and that they all return to stone as they came from it; so that this mass of rock is composed of their forefathers. Therefore, though they bury their dead, within the year they take off their heads and carry them to the holes in the rock. — Gumilla, t. i. c. 6.

These are the odd people who always for a first marriage give a girl to an old man, and a youth to an old woman. Polygamy is not in use among them; and they say, that if the young people came together, there could be no good household management. — Gumilla, t. i. c. 12.

P. Labbé (Lett. Edif. t. viii. p. 189, edit. 1781) speaks of a tribe on the north bank of the Plata who put their women to death when they were thirty years old, thinking they had then lived long enough. I have not seen this custom mentioned by any other writer, nor do I believe that it can possibly have existed.

And Father was his name. — Canto II. st. 28.

Tupa. It is the Tupi and Guarani name for Father, for Thunder, and for the Supreme Being.

The Patagones call the Supreme Being Soychu, a word which is said to express that which cannot be seen, which is worthy of all veneration, and which is out of the world. They may thus explain the word; but it cannot contain this meaning; it is a definition of what they mean, and apparently not such as a savage would give. The dead they call Soychuhet; they who are with God, and out of the world.

The Puelches, Picunches, and Moluches have no name for God. Their prayers are made to the sun, whom they regard as the giver of all good. A Jesuit once admonished them to worship that God who created all things, and this orb among the rest; but they replied, they had never known any thing greater or better than the sun. — Dobrizhoffer, t. ii. p. 100.

The most remarkable mode of superstition I remember to have met with is one which is mentioned by the Bishop of Santa Marta, in his History of the Nuevo Reyno de Granada. He tells us, that "the Pijaos of the Nuevo Reyno worshipped nothing visible or invisible, except the spirits of those whom they killed for the purpose of deifying them. For they thought that if an innocent person were put to death, he became a god, and in that capacity would be grateful to those who were the authors of his apotheosis. For this reason they used to catch strangers and kill them; not thinking one of their own horde, or of their enemies, could be esteemed innocent, and therefore fitting. A woman or a child would do. But after a few months they held it necessary to make a new god, the old one either having lost his power, or changed his place, or perhaps by that time discharged himself of his debt of gratitude." — Piedrahita, p. 12.

*And once there was a way to that good land,
For in mid-earth a wondrous Tree there grew.*

Canto II. st. 33.

Los Mocobis fingian un Arbol, que en su idioma llamaban Nulliagdigua, de altura tan desmedida que llegaba desde la tierra al cielo. Por el de rama en rama ganando siempre mayor elevacion subian las almas á pecar de un rio y lagunas muy grandes, que abundaban de pescado regaladisimo. Pero un dia que el alma de una Vieja no pudo pescar cosa alguna, y los pescadores la negaron el socorro de una limosna para su mantenimiento, se irritó tanto contra la nacion Mocobi que, trasfiguranda en Copiguará tomó el ejercicio de roer el Arbol por donde subian al cielo, y no desistió hasta derribarlo en tierra con increíble escrutimento y dano irreparable de toda la nacion.

This legend is contained in a manuscript history of Paraguay, the Rio de la Plata, and Tucuman. For the use of the first volume (a transcript of which is in my possession) I am beholden, as for other civilities of the same kind, to Mr. Thomas Kinder. This portion of the work contains a good account of the native tribes; the second volume contains the historical part; but when Mr. Kinder purchased the one at Buenos Ayres, the other was on its way to the United States, having been borrowed from the owner by an American, and not returned. Fortunately the subjects of the two volumes are so distinct that each may be considered as a complete work; and I have referred, in the history of Brazil, to that which I possess, by the title of Noticias del Paraguay, &c.

The land of souls. — Canto II. st. 39.

Many of the Indian speculations respecting the condition of souls in a future state are given in my History of Brazil. A description of a Keltic Island of the Blessed, as dressed up by Ossian Macpherson, may be found in the notes to Macao. A Tonga one is thus described in the very curious and valuable work of Mr. Mariner.

"The Tonga people universally and positively believe in the existence of a large island lying at a considerable distance to the N. W. of their own islands, which they consider to be the place of residence of their gods, and of the souls of their nobles and mataboohes. This island is supposed to be much larger than all their own islands put together; to be well stocked with all kinds of useful and ornamental plants always in a state of high perfection, and always bearing the richest fruits and the most beautiful flowers, according to their respective natures; that when these fruits or flowers are plucked, others immediately occupy their place, and that the whole atmosphere is filled with the most delightful fragrance that the imagination can conceive, proceeding from these immortal plants. The island is also well stocked with the most beautiful birds of all imaginable kinds, as well as with abundance of hogs, all of which are immortal, unless they are killed to provide food for the Hotooas, or gods; but the moment a hog or bird is killed, another living hog or bird immediately comes into existence to supply its place, the same as with the fruits and flowers; and this, as far as they know or suppose, is the only mode of propagation of plants and animals. The island of Bolotoo is supposed to be so far off as to render it dangerous for their canoes to attempt going there; and it is supposed, moreover, that even if they were to succeed in reaching so far, unless it happened to be the particular will of the gods, they would be sure to miss it. They give, however, an account of a Tonga canoe, which, in her return from the Feejee Islands a long time ago, was driven by stress of weather to Bolotoo: ignorant of the place where they were, and being much in want of provisions, and seeing the country abound in all sorts of fruit, the crew landed, and proceeded to pluck some bread fruit, but to their unspeakable astonishment they could no more lay hold of it than if it were a shadow. They walked through the trunks of the trees, and passed through the substance of the houses, (which were built like those of Tonga,) without feeling any resistance. They at length saw some of the Hotooas, who passed through the substance of their bodies as if there was nothing there. The Hotooas recommended them to go away immediately, as they had no proper food for them, and promised them a fair wind and a speedy passage. They accordingly put directly to sea, and in two days, sailing with the utmost velocity, they arrived at Hamoa, (the Navigators' Island,) at which place they wanted to touch before they got to Tonga. Having remained at Hamoa two or three days, they sailed for Tonga, where they arrived with great speed, but in the course of a few days they all died, not as a punishment for having been at Bolotoo, but as a natural consequence, the air of Bolotoo, as it were, infecting mortal bodies with speedy death."

In Yucatan their notion of the happy after death was, that they rested in a delightful land, under the shade of a great tree, where there was plenty of food and drink. — Herrera, iv. 10, n.

The Austral tribes believe that the dead live in some region under the earth, where they have their tents, and hunt the souls of ostriches. — Dobrizh, ii. 295.

The Persians have a great reverence for large, old trees, thinking that the souls of the happy delight to dwell in them, and for this reason they call them pir, which signifies an old man, by which name they also designate the supposed inhabitant. Pietro Della Valle describes a prodigious tree of this character, in the hollow of which tapers were always kept burning to the honor of the Pir. He pitched his tent under its boughs twice; once with his wife when on his way to embark for Europe, and again when returning with her corpse. The passage wherein he speaks of this last night's lodging is very affecting. We soon forgive this excellent traveller for his coxcombray, take an interest in his domestic affairs, and part with him at last as with an old friend.

Who thought

From Death, as from some living Joe, to fly. — Canto II. st. 44.

An opinion of this kind has extended to people in a much higher grade of society than the American Indians.

"After this DEATH appeared in Dwaraka in a human shape, the color of his skin being black and yellow, his head close shorn, and all his limbs distorted. He placed himself at men's doors, so that all those who saw him shuddered with apprehension, and became even as dead men from mere affright. Every person to whose door he came shot an arrow at him; and the moment the arrow quitted the bow-string, they saw the spectre no more, nor knew which way he was gone" — Life of Creeshna.

This is a poetical invention; but such an invention has formed a popular belief in Greece, if M. Pouqueville may be trusted.

"The Evil Eye, the Cucodæmon, has been seen wandering over the roofs of the houses. Who can dare to doubt this? It was in the form of a withered old woman, covered with funeral rags; she was heard to call by their names those who are to be cut off from the number of the living. Nocturnal concerts, voices murmuring amid the silence of the darkest nights have been heard in the air; phantoms have been seen wandering about in solitary places, in the streets, in the markets; the dogs have howled with the most dismal and melancholy tone, and their cries have been repeated by the echoes along the desert streets. It is when such things happen, as I was told very seriously by an inhabitant of Nauplia di Romania, that great care must be taken not to answer if you should be called during the night: if you hear symphonies, bury yourself in the bed clothes, and do not listen to them; it is the Old Woman, it is the Plague itself that knocks at your door." — Pouqueville, 189.

The Patagones and other Austral tribes attribute all diseases to an evil spirit. Their conjurers therefore beat drums by the patient, which have hideous figures painted upon them, thinking thus to frighten away the cause. If he dies, his relations endeavor to take vengeance upon those who pretended to cure him; but if one of the chiefs dies, all the conjurers are slain, unless they can save themselves by flight. — Dobrizhoffer, t. ii. 286.

They dragged the dying out. — Canto II. st. 45.

The Austral tribes sometimes bury the dying, thinking it an act of mercy thus to shorten their sufferings. (Dobrizh. t. ii. 286.) But in general this practice, which extends widely among savages, arises from the selfish feeling assigned in the text. Superstition, without this selfishness, produces a practice of the same kind, though not absolutely as brutal, in the East. "The moorda or chultries are small huts in which a Hindoo, when given over by his physicians, is deposited, and left alone to expire, and be carried off by the sacred flood." Cruso, in Forbes, iv. 99.

"When there is no hope of recovery, the patient is generally removed from the bed, and laid on a platform of fresh earth, either out of doors, or prepared purposely in some adjoining room or viranda, that he may there breathe his last. In a physical sense, this removal at so critical a period must be often attended with fatal consequences; though perhaps not quite so decisive as that of exposing an aged parent or a dying friend on the banks of the Ganges. I now only mention the circumstances as forming part of the Hindoo religious system. After having expired upon the earth, the body is carried to the water-side, and washed with many ceremonies. It is then laid upon the funeral pile, that the fire may have a share of the victim: the ashes are finally scattered in the air, and fall upon the water.

"During the funeral ceremony, which is solemn and affecting, the Brahmins address the respective elements in words to the following purport; although there may be a different mode of performing these religious rites in other parts of Hindostan.

"O Earth! to thee we commend our brother; of thee he was formed; by thee he was sustained; and unto thee he now returns!

"O Fire! thou hadst a claim in our brother; during his life he subsisted by thy influence in nature; to thee we commit his body; thou emblem of purity, may his spirit be purified on entering a new state of existence.

"O Air! while the breath of life continued, our brother respired by thee; his last breath is now departed; to thee we yield him.

"O Water! thou didst contribute to the life of our brother; thou wert one of his sustaining elements. His remains are now dispersed; receive thy share of him, who has now taken an everlasting flight!" — Forbes's Oriental Memoirs, iii. 12.

And she, in many an emulous essay,

At length into a descent of her own

Had blended all their notes. — Canto III. st. 39, &c.

An extract from a journal written in Switzerland will be the best comment upon the description in these stanzas, which indeed were probably suggested by my recollections of the Staubach.

"While we were at the waterfall, some half score peasants, chiefly women and girls, assembled just out of reach of the spray, and set up — surely the wildest chorus that ever was heard by human ears — a song, not of articulate sounds, but in which the voice was used as a mere instrument of music, more flexible than any which art could produce, — sweet, powerful, and thrilling beyond description."

It will be seen by the subjoined sonnet of Mr. Wordsworth's, who visited this spot three years after me, that he was not less impressed than I had been by this wild concert of voices.

On approaching the Staub-bach, Lauterbrunnen.

Tracks let me follow far from human kind
Which these illusive greetings may not reach;
Where only Nature tunes her voice to teach
Careless pursuits, and raptures unconfined.
No Mermaid warbles (to allay the wind
That drives some vessel towards a dangerous beach)
More thrilling melodies! no cavern'd Witch,
Chanting a love-spell, ever intertwined
Notes shrill and wild with art more musical!
Alas! that from the lips of abject Want
And Idleness in tatters mendicant
They should proceed — enjoyment to intrhall,
And with regret and useless pity haunt
This bold, this pure, this sky-born Waterfall!

"The vocal powers of these musical beggars (says Mr. Wordsworth) may seem to be exaggerated; but this wild and savage air was utterly unlike any sounds I had ever heard; the notes reached me from a distance, and on what occasion they were sung I could not guess, only they seemed to belong in some way or other to the waterfall; and reminded me of religious services chanted to streams and fountains in Pagan times."

Some dim presage. — Canto III. st. 41.

Upon this subject an old Spanish romancer speaks thus: Aunque hombre no sabe lo de adelante como ha de venir, el espíritu lo siente, y antes que venga se duce dello: y de aquí se levantaron los grandes suspiros que hombres dan a sobrevienta no pensando en ninguna cosa, como a muchas acaece; que aquel que el suspiro echa de sí, el espíritu es que siente el mal que ha de ser. — Chronica del Rey D. Rodrigo, p. ii. c. 171.

Across her shoulders was a hammock flung. — Canto III. st. 45.

Pinkerton, in his Geography, (vol. ii. p. 535, n. 3d edit.)

says, that nets are sometimes worn among the Guaranis instead of clothes, and refers to this very story in proof of his assertion. I believe he had no other ground for it. He adds, that "perhaps they were worn only to keep off the flies;" as if those blood-suckers were to be kept off by open network!

We owe something, however, to the person who introduces us to a good and valuable book, and I am indebted originally to Mr. Pinkerton for my knowledge of Dobrizhoffer. He says of him, when referring to the Historia de Abiponibus, "the lively singularity of the old man's Latin is itself an amusement; and though sometimes garrulous, he is redundant in authentic and curious information. His work, though bearing a restricted title, is the best account yet published of the whole viceroyalty of La Plata."

Her feet upon the crescent moon were set. — Canto III. st. 51.

This is a common representation of the Virgin, from the Revelation.

*Virgen de Sol vestida, e dos seus raios
Claros envolta toda, e das Estrellas
Coroada, e debaixo os pés a Lua.*

FRANCISCO DE SA DE MIRANDA.

These lines are highly esteemed by the Portuguese critics.

*Severe he was, and in his anger dread,
Yet always at his Mother's will grew mild,
So well did he obey that Maiden undefiled.* —

Canto III. st. 51.

"How hath the conceit of Christ's humiliation here on earth, of his dependence on his mother during the time of his formation and birth, and of his subjection to her in his infancy, brought forth preposterous and more than heathenish transformations of his glory in the superstitious daughters of the idolatrous church! They cannot conceive Christ as King, unless they acknowledge her as Queen Dowager of heaven; her title of Lady is æquiparant to his title of Lord; her authority for some purposes held as great, her bowels of compunction (towards the weaker sex especially) more tender. And as the Heathens frame Gods suitable to their own desire, soliciting them most, (though otherwise less potent,) whom they conceive to be most favorable to their present suits, so hath the blessed Virgin, throughout the Romish Church, obtained (what she never sought) the entire monopoly of women's prayers in their travails; as if her presence at others' distressful labors (for she herself, by their doctrine, brought forth her first-born and only son without pain) had wrought in her a truer feeling or tenderer touch, than the High Priest of their souls can have of their infirmities; or as if she would use more faithful and effectual intercession with her Son, than he can or will do with his Father. Some, in our times, out of the weakness of their sex, matching with the impetuosity of their adulterous and disloyal zeal, have in this kind been so impotently outrageous as to intercept others' supplications directed to Christ, and superscribe them in this form unto his mother; Blessed Lady, command thy son to hear this woman's prayers, and send her deliverance! These, and the like speeches, have moved some good women, in other points tainted rather with superstition than preciseness, to dispense with the law of secrecy, seldom violated in their parliaments; and I know not whether I should attribute it to their courage or stupidity, not to be more affrighted at such blasphemies, than at some monstrous and prodigious birth. This and the like inbred inclinations unto superstition, in the rude and uninstructed people, are more superficially set forward by the fabulous Roman Legendary and his Linner, than the like were in the heathen, by heathen poets and painters." — Dr. Thomas Jackson's Works, vol. i. 1007.

Tyranny of the Spaniards. — Canto IV. st. 7, 8.

The consumption of the Indians in the Paraguay tea-trade, and the means taken by the Jesuits for cultivating the Caa-tree, are described by Dobrizhoffer.

The Encomenderos compelled the unhappy people whom they found living where they liked, to settle in such places as were most convenient for the work in which they were now to be compulsorily employed. All their work was task-work, imposed with little moderation, and exacted without mercy. This tyranny extended to the women and children; and as all the Spaniards, the officers of justice as well as the Encomenderos, were implicated in it, the Indians had none to whom they could look for protection. Even the institutions of Christianity, by which the Spanish government hoped to better the temporal condition of its new subjects, were made the occasion of new grievances and more intolerable oppression. For, as the Indians were legally free, — free, therefore, to marry where they pleased, and the wife was to follow the husband, — every means was taken to prevent a marriage between two Indians who belonged to different Repártimientos, and the interest of the master counteracted all the efforts of the priest. The Spanish women are said to have exceeded their husbands in cruelty on such occasions, and to have instigated them to the most violent and iniquitous measures, that they might not lose their female attendants. The consequence was, that profligacy of manners among the Indians was rather encouraged than restrained, as it is now in the English sugar islands, where the planter is not a religious man. — Lozano, l. 1, § 3, 6, 7.

St. Joachim. — Canto IV. st. 17.

The legend of his visit to Limbo is given here in a translated extract from that very curious work, the Life of the Virgin Mary, as related by herself to Sister Maria de Jesus, Abbess of the Franciscan Convent de la Inmaculada Concepcion at Agreda, and published with the sanction of all the ecclesiastical authorities in Spain.

After some conversation between the Almighty and the Virgin, at that time three years and a half old, the Franciscan confessor, who was the accomplice of the abbess in this blasphemous imposture, proceeds thus: —

"The Most High received this morning sacrifice from his tender spouse, Mary the most holy, and with a pleased countenance said to her, 'Thou art beautiful in thy thoughts, O Prince's daughter, my dove, and my beloved! I admit thy desires, which are agreeable to my eyes: and it is my will, in fulfilment of them, that thou shouldst understand the time draws nigh, when by my divine appointment thy father Joachim must pass from this mortal life to the life immortal and eternal. His death shall be short, and he will soon rest in peace, and be placed with the Saints in Limbo, awaiting the redemption of the whole human race.' This information from the Lord neither disturbed nor troubled the regal breast of Mary, the Princess of Heaven; yet as the love of children to their parents is a debt due by nature, and that love in all its perfection existed in this most holy child, a natural grief at losing her most holy father Joachim, whom as a daughter she devoutly loved, could not fail to be resented. The tender and sweet child Mary felt a movement of grief compatible with the serenity of her magnanimous heart: and acting with greatness in every thing, following both grace and nature, she made a fervent prayer for her father Joachim: she besought the Lord, that, as the mighty and true God, he would look upon him in the hour of his happy death, and defend him from the Devil, especially in that hour, and preserve him, and appoint him in the number of his elect, as one who in his life had confessed and magnified his holy and adorable name. And the more to oblige his Majesty, the most faithful daughter offered to endure for her father, the most holy Joachim, all that the Lord might ordain.

"His Majesty accepted this petition, and consoled the divine child, assuring her that he would be with her father as a merciful and compassionate remunerator of those who love and serve him, and that he would place him with the Patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and he prepared her again to receive and suffer other troubles. Eight days before the death of the holy Patriarch Joachim, Mary the most holy had other advices from the Lord, declaring the day and hour in which he was to die, as in fact it occurred, only six months after our Queen went to reside in the temple. When her Highness had received this information from the Lord, she besought the twelve angels, (who, I have before said, were those whom

St. John names in the Revelation,) that they would be with her father Joachim in his sickness, and comfort him, and console him in it; and thus they did. And for the last hour of his transit she sent all those of her guard, and besought the Lord that he would make them manifest to her father for his greater consolation. The Most High granted this, and in every thing fulfilled the desire of his elect, unique, and perfect one: and the great Patriarch and happy Joachin saw the thousand holy angels who guarded his daughter Maria, at whose petition and desire the grace of the Almighty superabounded, and by his command the angel said to Joachin these things:—

“ ‘Maa of God, the Most High and Mighty is thy eternal salvation, and he sends thee from his holy place the necessary and timely assistance for thy soul! Mary, thy daughter, sends us to be with thee at this hour, in which thou hast to pay to thy Creator the debt of natural death. She is thy most faithful and powerful intercessor with the Most High, in whose name and peace depart thou from this world with consolation and joy, that he hath made thee parent of so blessed a daughter. And although his incomprehensible Majesty, in his serene wisdom, hath not till now manifested to thee the sacrament and dignity in which he will constitute thy daughter, it is his pleasure that thou shouldst know it now, to the intent that thou mayest magnify him and praise him, and that at such news the jubilee of thy spirit may be joined with the grief and natural sadness of death. Mary, thy daughter, and our Queen, is the one chosen by the arm of the Omnipotent, that the Divine Word may in her clothe himself with flesh, and with the human form. She is to be the happy Mother of the Messiah, blessed among women, superior to all creatures, and inferior only to God himself. Thy most happy daughter is to be the repairer of what the human race lost by the first fall, and the high mountain whereon the new law of grace is to be formed and established. Therefore, as thou leavest now in the world its restauratrix and daughter, by whom God prepares for it the fitting remedy, depart thou in joy; and the Lord will bless thee from Zion, and will give thee a place among the Saints, that thou mayest attain to the sight and possession of the happy Jerusalem.’ ”

“ While the holy Angels spake these words to Joachin, St. Anna, his wife, was present, standing by the pillow of his bed; and she heard, and, by divine permission, understood them. At the same time, the holy Patriarch Joachin lost his speech, and entering upon the common way of all flesh, began to die, with a marvellous struggle between the delight of such joyful tidings and the pain of death. During this conflict with his interior powers, many and fervent acts of divine love, of faith, and adoration, and praise, and thanksgiving, and humiliation, and other virtues, did he heroically perform: and thus absorbed in the new knowledge of so divine a mystery he came to the end of his natural life, dying the precious death of the Saints. His most holy spirit was carried by the Angels to the Limbo of the Holy Fathers and of the Just: and for a new consolation and light in the long night wherein they dwelt, the Most High ordered that the soul of the holy Patriarch Joachin should be the new Paranymp and Ambassador of his Great Majesty, for announcing to all that congregation of the Just, how the day of eternal light had now dawned, and the day-break was born, Mary, the most holy daughter of Joachin and of Anna, from whom should be born the Sun of Divinity, Christ, Restorer of the whole human race. The Holy Fathers and the Just in Limbo heard these tidings, and in their jubilee composed new hymns of thanksgiving to the Most High.

“ This happy death of the Patriarch St. Joachin occurred (as I have before said) half a year after his daughter, Mary the most holy, entered the Temple; and when she was at the tender age of three and a half, she was thus left in the world without a natural father. The age of the Patriarch was sixty and nine years, distributed and divided thus: at the age of forty-six years, he took St. Anna to wife; twenty years after this marriage, Mary the most holy was born; and the three years and a half of her Highness's age make sixty-nine and a half, a few days more or less.

“ The holy Patriarch and father of our Queen being dead, the holy Angels of her guard returned incontinently to her presence, and gave her notice of all that had occurred in her father's transit. Forthwith the most prudent child solicited with prayers for the consolation of her mother St. Anna, entreating that the Lord would, as a father, direct and govern her in the solitude wherein, by the loss of her husband, Joachin, she was left. St. Anna herself sent also news of his death, which was first communicated to the Mistress of our divine Princess, that, in imparting it, she might console her. The Mistress did this, and the most wise child heard her, with all composure and dissimulation, but with the patience and the modesty of a Queen; but she was not ignorant of the event which her Mistress related to her as news.” — Mistica Ciudad de Dios, par. 1, l. 2, c. 16, § 664—669. Madrid, 1744.

It was in the middle of the seventeenth century that the work, from which this extract is translated, was palmed upon the Spaniards as a new revelation. Gross and blasphemous as the imposture is, the work was still current when I procured my copy, about twenty years ago; and it is not included in the Spanish Index Expurgatorius of 1790, the last (I believe) which was published, and which is now before me.

He could not tarry here. — Caato IV. st. 67.

A case precisely of the same kind is mentioned by Mr. Mariner. “ A young Chief at Tonga, a very handsome man, was inspired by the ghost of a woman in Bolotoo, who had fallen in love with him. On a sudden, he felt himself low-spirited, and, shortly afterwards, fainted away. When he came to himself, he was very ill, and was taken accordingly to the house of a priest. As yet, he did not know who it was that inspired him, but the priest informed him that it was a woman of Bolotoo, mentioning her name, who had died some years before, and who wished him now to die, that he might be near her. He accordingly died in two days. The Chief said he suspected this, from the dreams he had had at different times, when the figure of a woman came to him in the night. Mr. Mariner was with the sick Chief three or four times during his illness, and heard the priest foretell his death, and relate the occasion of it.” — Mariner.

The following similar case appeared in a newspaper:— “ Died, on Sunday evening, the 14th instant, John Sackcouse, aged 22, a native of the west coast of Greenland. This Eskimaux has occupied a considerable share of the public attention, and his loss will be very generally felt. He had already rendered important service to the country in the late expedition of discovery, and great expectations were naturally formed of the utility which he would prove on the expedition about to sail for Baffin's Bay. The Admiralty, with great liberality and judgment, had directed the greatest pains to be taken in his further education; and he had been several months in Edinburgh with this view, when he was seized with a violent inflammation in the chest, which carried him off in a few days. He was extremely docile, and, though rather slow in the attainment of knowledge, he was industrious, zealous, and cheerful, and was always grateful for the kindness and attention shown to him. His amiable disposition and simple manners had interested those who had opportunities of knowing him personally, in a way that will not soon be forgotten. To the public, his loss, we fear, is irreparable—to his friends, it is doubly severe. Just before his death, the poor Eskimaux said he knew he was going to die; that his father and mother had died in the same way; and that his sister, who was the last of all his relations, had just appeared to him, and called him away.” — Edinburgh Courant, Feb. 19.

ALL FOR LOVE, OR A SINNER WELL SAVED.

TO CAROLINE BOWLES.

Could I look forward to a distant day
With hope of building some elaborate lay,
Then would I wait till worthier strains of mine
Might bear inscribed thy name, O Caroline!
For I would, while my voice is heard on earth,
Bear witness to thy genius and thy worth.
But we have both been taught to feel with fear
How frail the tenure of existence here,
What unforeseen calamities prevent,
Alas, how oft! the best-resolved intent;
And therefore this poor volume I address
To thee, dear friend, and sister Poetess.

ROBERT SOUTHEY.

Keswick, 21 Feb. 1829.

The story of the following Poem is taken from a Life of St. Basil, ascribed to his contemporary St. Amphilochius, Bishop of Iconium; a Latin version of which, made by Cardinal Ursus in the ninth century, is inserted by Rosweyde, among the Lives of the Fathers, in his compilation Historiæ Ercmiticæ. The original had not then been printed, but Rosweyde obtained a copy of it from the Royal Library at Paris. He intimates no suspicion concerning the authenticity of the life, or the truth of this particular legend; observing only, that hæc narratio apud solum invenitur Amphilochium. It is, indeed, the flower of the work, and as such had been culled by some earlier translator than Ursus. The very learned Dominican, P. François Combefis, published the original, with a version of his own, and endeavored to establish its authenticity in opposition to Baronius, who supposed the life to have been written by some other Amphilochius, not by the Bishop of Iconium. Had Combefis possessed powers of mind equal to his erudition, he might even then have been in some degree prejudiced upon this subject, for, according to Baillet, il avoit un attachement particulier pour S. Basile. His version is inserted in the Acta Sanctorum, (Jun. t. ii. pp. 937—957.) But the Hollandist Baert brands the life there as apocryphal; and in his annotations treats Combefis more rudely, it may be suspected, than he would have done, had he not belonged to a rival and hostile order.

Should the reader be desirous of comparing the Poem with the Legend, he may find the story, as transcribed from Rosweyde, among the Notes.

I.

A YOUTH hath enter'd the Sorcerer's door,
But he dares not lift his eye,
For his knees fail, and his flesh quakes,
And his heart beats audibly.

"Look up, young man!" the Sorcerer said;
"Lay open thy wishes to me!
Or art thou too modest to tell thy tale?
If so, I can tell it thee.

"Thy name is Eleëmon;
Proterius's freedman thou art;
And on Cyra, thy Master's daughter,
Thou hast madly fix'd thy heart.

"But fearing (as thou well mayest fear!)
The high-born Maid to woo,
Thou hast tried what secret prayers, and vows,
And sacrifice might do.

"Thou hast prayed unto all Saints in Heaven,
And to Mary their vaunted Queen;
And little furtherance hast thou found
From them, or from her, I ween!

"And thou, I know, the Ancient Gods,
In hope forlorn, hast tried,
If haply Venus might obtain
The maiden for thy bride.

"On Jove and Phœbus thou hast call'd,
And on Astarte's name;
And on her, who still at Ephesus
Retains a faded fame.

"Thy voice to Baal hath been raised;
To Nile's old Deities;
And to all Gods of elder time,
Adored by men in every clime,
When they ruled earth, seas, and skies.

"Their Images are deaf!
Their Oracles are dumb!
And therefore thou, in thy despair,
To Abibas art come.

"Ay, because neither Saints nor Gods
Thy pleasure will fulfil,
Thou comest to me, Eleëmon,
To ask if Satan will!

"I answer thee, Yes. But a faint heart
Can never accomplish its ends;
Put thy trust boldly in him, and be sure
He never forsakes his friends."

While Eleëmon listen'd
He shudder'd inwardly,
At the ugly voice of Abibas,
And the look in his wicked eye.

And he could then almost have given
His fatal purpose o'er;
But his Good Angel had left him
When he entered the Sorcerer's door.

So, in the strength of evil shame,
His mind the young man knit
Into a desperate resolve,
For his bad purpose fit.

"Let thy Master give me what I seek,
O Servant of Satan," he said,
"As I ask firmly, and for his Renounce all other aid!

"Time presses. Cyra is content
To bid the world farewell,
And pass her days, a virgin vow'd,
Among Emmelia's sisterhood,
The tenant of a cell.

"Thus hath her father will'd, that so
A life of rigor here below
May fit her for the skies,
And Heaven acceptably receive
His costliest sacrifice.

"The admiring people say of this
That Angels, or that Saints in bliss,
The holy thought inspire ;
And she is call'd a blessed Maid,
And he a happy Sire.

"Through Cappadocia far and wide
The news hath found its way,
And crowds to Cæsarea flock
To attend the solemn day.

"The robes are ready, rich with gold,
Even like a bridal dress,
Which at the altar she will wear
When self-devoted she stands there
In all her loveliness.

"And that coarse habit too, which she Must then put on, is made,
Therein to be for life and death
Unchangeably array'd.

"This night, this precious night is ours ;
Late, late, I come to you ;
But all that must be dared, or done,
Prepared to dare and do."

"Thou hast hesitated long !" said Abibas,
"And thou hast done amiss,
In praying to Him whom I name not,
That it never might come to this !

"But thou hast chosen thy part, and here thou art ;
And thou shalt have thy desire ;
And though at the eleventh hour
Thou hast come to serve our Prince of Power,
He will give thee in full thine hire.

"These Tablets take ;" (he wrote as he spake ;)
"My letters, which thou art to bear,
Wherein I shall commend thee
To the Prince of the Powers of the Air.

"Go from the North Gate out, and take
On a Pagan's tomb thy stand ;
And, looking to the North, hold up
The Tablets in thy hand ; —

"And call the Spirits of the Air,
That they my messenger may bear
To the place whither he would pass,
And there present him to their Prince
In the name of Abibas.

"The passage will be swift and safe ;
No danger awaits thee beyond ;
Thou wilt only have now to sign and seal,
And hereafter to pay the Bond."

II.

SHUNNING human sight, like a thief in the night,
Eleimon made no delay,
But went unto a Pagan's tomb
Beside the public way.

Enclosed with barren elms it stood,
There planted when the dead
Within the last abode of man
Had been deposited.

And thrice ten years those barren trees,
Enjoying light and air,
Had grown and flourish'd, while the dead
In darkness moulder'd there.

Long had they overtopp'd the tomb ;
And closed was now that upper room
Where friends were wont to pour,
Upon the honor'd dust below,
Libations through the floor.

There on that unblest monument
The young man took his stand,
And northward he the tablets held
In his uplifted hand.

A courage not his own he felt,
A wicked fortitude,
Wherewith bad influences unseen
That hour his heart endued.

The rising Moon grew pale in heaven
At that unhappy sight ;
And all the blessed Stars seem'd then
To close their twinkling light ;
And a shuddering in the elms was heard,
Though winds were still that night.

He call'd the Spirits of the Air,
He call'd them in the name
Of Abibas ; and at the call
The attendant Spirits came.

A strong hand, which he could not see,
Took his uplifted hand ;
He felt a strong arm circle him,
And lift him from his stand ; —

A whirr of unseen wings he heard
About him every where,
Which onward, with a mighty force,
Impell'd him through the air.

Fast through the middle sky and far
It hurried him along ;

The Hurricane is not so swift,
The Torrent not so strong;—

The Lightning travels not so fast,
The Sunbeams not so far;
And now behind him he hath left
The Moon and every Star.

And still, erect as on the tomb
In impious act he stood,
Is he rapt onward — onward — still
In that fix'd attitude.

But as he from the living world
Approach'd where Spirits dwell,
His bearers there in thinner air
Were dimly visible;—

Shapeless, and scarce to be descried
In darkness where they flew;
But still, as they advanced, the more
And more distinct they grew.

And when their way fast-speeding they
Through their own region went,
Then were they in their substance seen,
The angelic form, the fiendish mien,
Face, look, and lineament.

Behold where dawns before them now,
Far off, the boreal ray,
Sole daylight of that frozen zone,
The limit of their way.

In that drear realm of outer night,
Like the shadow, or the ghost of light,
It moved in the restless skies,
And went and came, like a feeble flame
That flickers before it dies.

There the fallen Seraph reign'd supreme
Amid the utter waste;
There, on the everlasting ice,
His dolorous throne was placed.

Son of the Morning! is it then
For this that thou hast given
Thy seat, preëminent among
The hierarchies of Heaven?—

As if dominion here could joy
To blasted pride impart;
Or this cold region slake the fire
Of Hell within the heart!

Thither the Evil Angels bear
The youth, and, rendering homage there
Their service they evince,
And in the name of Abibas
Present him to their Prince:

Just as they seized him when he made
The Sorcerer's mandate known,
In that same act and attitude
They set him before the throne.

The fallen Seraph cast on him
A dark, disdainful look;
And from his raised hand scornfully
The proffer'd tablets took.

“Ay,—love!” he cried. “It serves me well.
There was the Trojan boy,—
His love brought forth a ten years' war,
And fired the towers of Troy.

“And when my own Mark Antony
Against young Cæsar strove,
And Rome's whole world was set in arms,
The cause was,—all for love!

“Some for ambition sell themselves;
By avarice some are driven;
Pride, envy, hatred, best will move
Some souls; and some for only love
Renounce their hopes of Heaven.

“Yes, of all human follies, love,
Methinks, hath served me best;
The Apple had done but little for me,
If Eve had not done the rest.

“Well then, young Amorist, whom love
Hath brought unto this pass,
I am willing to perform the word
Of my servant Abibas.

“Thy Master's daughter shall be thine,
And with her sire's consent;
And not more to thy heart's desire
Than to her own content.

“Yea, more;—I give thee with the girl,
Thine after-days to bless,
Health, wealth, long life, and whatso'er
The world calls happiness.

“But, mark me!—on conditions, youth!
No paltering here we know!
Dost thou here, solemnly, this hour,
Thy hope of Heaven forego?

“Dost thou renounce thy baptism,
And bind thyself to me,
My woful portion to partake
Through all eternity?

“No lurking purpose shall avail,
When youth may fail and courage quail,
To cheat me by contrition!
I will have thee written down among
The children of Perdition.

“Remember, I deceive thee not,
Nor have I tempted thee!
Thou comest of thine own accord,
And aetest knowingly.

“Dost thou, who now to choose art free,
Forever pledge thyself to me?
As I shall help thee, say!”—

"I do; so help me, Satan!" said
The wilful castaway.

"A resolute answer," quoth the Fiend;
"And now then, Child of Dust,
In further proof of that firm heart,
Thou wilt sign a Bond before we part,
For I take thee not on trust!"

Swift as thought, a scroll and a reed were brought,
And to Eleëmon's breast,
Just where the heart-stroke plays, the point
Of the reed was gently press'd.

It pierced not in, nor touch'd the skin;
But the sense that it caused was such,
As when an electric pellet of light
Comes forcibly out at a touch;—

A sense no sooner felt than gone,
But, with that short feeling, then
A drop of his heart's blood came forth
And fill'd the fatal pen.

And with that pen accurs'd he sign'd
The execrable scroll,
Whereby he to perdition bound
His miserable soul.

"Eleëmon, Eleëmon!" then said the Demon,
"The girl shall be thine,
By the tie she holds divine,
Till time that tie shall sever;
And by this writing thou art mine,
Forever, and ever, and ever!"

III.

Look at yon silent dwelling now!
A heavenly sight is there,
Where Cyra in her Chamber kneels
Before the Cross in prayer.

She is not loath to leave the world;
For she hath been taught with joy
To think that prayer and praise thenceforth
Will be her life's employ.

And thus her mind hath she inclined,
Her pleasure being still (An only child, and motherless)
To do her Father's will.

The moonlight falls upon her face,
Upraised in fervor meek,
While peaceful tears of piety
Are stealing down her cheek.

That duty done, the harmless maid
Disposed herself to rest;
No sin, no sorrow in her soul,
No trouble in her breast.

But when upon the pillow then,
Composed, she laid her head,
She little thought what unseen Powers
Kept watch beside her bed.

A double ward had she that night,
When evil near her drew;
Her own Good Angel guarding her,
And Eleëmon's too.

Their charge it was to keep her safe
From all unholy things;
And o'er her, while she slept, they spread
The shadow of their wings.

So when an Evil Dream drew nigh,
They barr'd him from access,
Nor suffer'd him to reach her with
A breath of sinfulness.

But with his instigations they
A hallowing influence blent,
And made his fiendish ministry
Subserve to their intent.

Thus, while in troubled sleep she lay,
Strange impulses were given,
Emotions earthly and of earth,
With heavenly ones of Heaven.

And now the nightingale hath ceased
Her strain, who all night long
Hath in the garden rosier trill'd
A rich and rapturous song.

The storks on roof, and dome, and tower,
Forbear their clattering din,
As now the motions and the sounds
Of daily life begin.

Then, as from dreams that seem'd no dreams,
The wondering Maid awoke,
A low, sweet voice was in her ear,
Such as we might expect to hear
If some Good Angel spoke.

According with her dreams, it said,
"So, Cyra, must it be;
The duties of a wedded life
Hath Heaven ordain'd for thee."

This was no dream full well she knew;
For open-eyed she lay,
Conscious of thought and wakefulness,
And in the light of day;
And twice it spake, if doubt had been,
To do all doubt away.

Alas! but how shall she make known
This late and sudden change?
Or how obtain belief for what
Even to herself is strange?

How will her Father brook a turn
That must to all seem shame?

How bear to think that vulgar tongues
Are busy with her name? —

That she should for a voice — a dream —
Expose herself to be the theme
Of wonder and of scorn; —
Public as her intent had been,
And this the appointed morn!

The Nuns even now are all alert;
The altar hath been dress'd,
The scissors that should clip her hair
Provided, and the black hood there,
And there the sable vest.

And there the Priests are robing now;
The Singers in their station;
Hark! in the city she can hear
The stir of expectation!

Through every gate the people pour,
And guests on roof, and porch, and tower,
Expectant take their place;
The streets are swarming, and the church
Already fills apace.

Speak, then, she must: her heart she felt
This night had changed its choice;
Nor dared the Maiden disobey, —
Nor did she wish to (sooth to say,) —
That sweet and welcome voice.

Her Father comes: she studies not
For gloss, or for pretence;
The plain, straight course will Cyra take (Which none without remorse forsake)
Of truth and innocence.

“O Father, hear me patiently!”
The blushing Maiden said;
“I tremble, Father, while I speak,
But surely not for dread; —

“If all my wishes have till now
Found favor in thy sight,
And ever to perform thy will
Hath been my best delight,
Why should I fear to tell thee now
The visions of this night?

“I stood in a dream at the altar, —
But it was as an earthly Bride;
And Eleëmon, thy freedman,
Was the Bridegroom at my side.

“Thou, Father, gavest me to him,
With thy free and full consent;
And — why should I dissemble it? —
Methought I was content.

‘Months then and years were crowded
In the course of that busy night;
I clasp'd a baby to my breast,
And, oh! with what delight!

“Yea, I was fruitful as a vine;
Our Heavenly Parent me and mine
In all things seem'd to bless;
Our ways were ways of peace, our paths
Were paths of pleasantness.

“When I taught lispings lips to pray,
The joy it was to me,
O Father, thus to train these plants
For immortality!

“I saw their little winning ways
Their grandsire's love engage;
Methought they were the pride, the joy,
The crown of his old age.

“When from the Vision I awoke,
A voice was in my ear, —
A waking voice, — I heard it twice;
No human tongue was near; —

“No human utterance so could reach
The secret soul, no human speech
So make the soul rejoice;
In hearing it I felt and knew
It was an Angel's voice!

“And thus, in words distinct, it said: —
‘So, Cyra, must it be!
The duties of a wedded life
Hath Heaven ordain'd for thee.’”

Her cheek was like the new-blown rose,
While thus she told her tale;
Proterius listened earnestly,
And as he heard grew pale; —

For he, too, in the dreams of night,
At the altar had seem'd to stand,
And to Eleëmon, his freedman,
Had given his daughter's hand.

Their offspring, courting his caress,
About his knees had throng'd;
A lovely progeny, in whom,
When he was in the silent tomb,
His line should be prolong'd.

And he had heard a waking voice,
Which said it so must be,
Pronouncing upon Cyra's name
A holiest eulogy: —

“Her shall her husband praise, and her
Her children bless'd shall call;
Many daughters have done virtuously,
But thine excelleth them all!”

No marvel if his heart were moved;
The dream he saw was one;
He kiss'd his trembling child, and said,
“The will of Heaven be done!”

Little did child or sire in this
The work of sorcery fear;

As little did Eleëmon think
That the hand of Heaven was here.

IV.

FROM house to house, from street to street,
The rapid rumor flies;
Incredulous ears it found, and hands
Are lifted in surprise;
And tongues through all the astonish'd town
Are busier now than eyes.

“So sudden and so strange a change!
A Freedman, too, the choice!
The shame, — the scandal, — and for what?
A vision and a voice!

“Had she not chosen the strait gate, —
The narrow way, — the holy state, —
The Sanctuary's abode?
Would Heaven call back its votary
To the broad and beaten road?

“To carnal wishes would it turn
The mortified intent?
For this are miracles vouchsafed?
For this are Angels sent?

“A plain collusion! a device
Between the girl and youth!
Good easy man must the Father be,
To take such tale for truth!”

So judged the acrid and the austere,
And they whose evil heart
Inclines them, in whate'er betides,
To take the evil part.

But others, whom a kindlier frame
To better thoughts inclined,
Preserved, amid their wonderment,
An equitable mind.

They would not of Proterius thus
Injuriously misdeem, —
A grave, good man, and with the wise
For wisdom in esteem.

No easy ear, or vain belief,
Would he to falsehood lend;
Nor ever might light motive him
From well-weigh'd purpose bend.

And surely on his pious child,
The gentle Cyra, meek and mild,
Could no suspicion rest;
For in this daughter he had been
Above all fathers blest.

As dutiful as beautiful,
Her praise was widely known,
Being one who, as she grew in years,
Had still in goodness grown.

And what though Eleëmon were
A man of lowly birth?
Enough it was if Nature had
Ennobled him with worth.

“This was no doubtful thing,” they said,
“For he had in the house been bred,
Nor e'er from thence removed;
But there from childhood had been known,
And trusted, and approved.

“Such as he was, his qualities
Might to the world excuse
The Maid and Father for their choice,
Without the vision and the voice,
Had they been free to choose.

“But Heaven by miracle had made
Its pleasure manifest;
That manifested will must set
All doubtful thoughts to rest.
Mysterious though they be, the ways
Of Providence are best.”

The wondering City thus discoursed;
To Abibas alone
The secret truth, and even to him
But half the truth, was known.

Meantime the Church hath been prepared
For spousal celebration;
The Sisters to their cells retire,
Amazed at such mutation.

The habit and hood of camel's hair,
Which with the sacred scissors there
On the altar were display'd,
Are taken thence, and in their stead
The marriage rings are laid.

Behold, in garments gay with gold,
For other spousals wrought,
The Maiden from her Father's house
With bridal pomp is brought.

And now before the Holy Door
In the Ante-naive they stand;
The Bride and Bridegroom side by side,
The Paranympths, in festal pride,
Arranged on either hand.

Then from the Sanctuary the Priests,
With incense burning sweet,
Advance, and at the Holy Door
The Bride and Bridegroom meet.

There to the Bride and Bridegroom they
The marriage tapers gave;
And to the altar as they go,
With cross-way movement to and fro,
The thuribule they wave.

For fruitfulness, and perfect love,
And constant peace, they pray'd,

On Eleëmon, the Lord's Servant,
And Cyra, the Lord's Handmaid.

They call'd upon the Lord to bless
Their spousal celebration,
And sanctify the marriage rite
To both their souls' salvation.

A pause at every prayer they made ;
Whereat, with one accord,
The Choristers took up their part,
And sung, in tones that thrill'd the heart,
Have mercy on us, Lord !

Then with the marriage rings the priest
Betroth'd them each to each,
And, as the sacred pledge was given,
Resumed his awful speech ; —

Pronouncing them, before high Heaven
This hour espoused to be,
Now and forevermore, for time,
And for eternity.

This did he in the presence
Of Angels and of men ;
And at every pause the Choristers
Intoned their deep Amen !

Then to that gracious Lord, the Priest
His supplication made,
Who, as our sacred Scriptures tell,
Did bring Rebecca to the well
When Abraham's servant pray'd.

He call'd upon that gracious Lord
To stablish with his power
The espousals made between them,
In truth and love, this hour ; —

And with his mercy and his word
Their lot, now link'd, to bless,
And let his Angel guide them
In the way of righteousness.

With a Christian benediction,
The Priest dismiss'd them then,
And the Choristers, with louder voice,
Intoned the last Amen !

The days of Espousals are over ;
And on the Crowning-day,
To the sacred fane the bridal train,
A gay procession, take again
Through thronging streets their way.

Before them, by the Paranympis,
The coronals are borne,
Composed of all sweet flowers of spring
By virgin hands that morn.

With lighted tapers in array
They enter the Holy Door,
And the Priest with the waving thuribule
Perfumes the way before.

He raised his voice, and call'd aloud
On Him who from the side
Of our first Father, while he slept,
Form'd Eve to be his bride ; —

Creating Woman thus for Man
A helpmate meet to be,
For youth and age, for good and ill,
For weal and woe, united still
In strict society, —

Flesh of his flesh ; appointing them
One flesh to be, one heart.
Whom God hath joined together,
Them let not man dispart !

And on our Lord he call'd, by whom
The marriage feast was blest,
When first by miracle he made
His glory manifest.

Then, in the ever-blessed Name,
Almighty over all,
From the man's Paranymphe he took
The marriage coronal ; —

And crowning him therewith, in that
Thrice holy Name, he said,
"Eleëmon, the Servant of God, is crown'd
For Cyra, the Lord's Handmaid !"

Next, with like action and like words,
Upon her brow he set
Her coronal, intertwined wherecin
The rose and lily met ;
How beautifully they bescem'd
Her locks of glossy jet !

Her he for Eleëmon crown'd,
The Servant of the Lord ; —
Alas, how little did that name
With his true state accord !

"Crown them with honor, Lord !" he said,
"With blessings crown the righteous head !
To them let peace be given,
A holy life, a hopeful end,
A heavenly crown in Heaven !"

Still as he made each separate prayer
For blessings that they in life might share,
And for their eternal bliss,
The echoing Choristers replied,
"O Lord, so grant thou this !"

How differently, meantime, before
The altar as they knelt,
While they the sacred rites partake
Which endless matrimony make,
The Bride and Bridegroom felt !

She, who possess'd her soul in peace
And thoughtful happiness,
With her whole heart had inly join'd
In each devout address.

His lips the while had only moved
 In hollow repetition;
 For he had steel'd himself, like one
 Bound over to perdition

In present joy he wrapp'd his heart,
 And resolutely cast
 All other thoughts beside him,
 Of the future, or the past.

 V.

TWELVE years have held their quiet course
 Since Cyra's nuptial day;
 How happily, how rapidly,
 Those years have past away!

Bless'd in her husband she hath been;
 He loved her as sincerely,
 (Most sinful and unhappy man!)
 As he had bought her dearly.

She hath been fruitful as a vine,
 And in her children bless'd;
 Sorrow hath not come near her yet,
 Nor fears to shake, nor cares to fret,
 Nor grief to wound the breast.

And bless'd alike would her husband be,
 Were all things as they seem;
 Eleëmon hath every earthly good,
 And with every man's esteem.

But where the accursed reed had drawn
 The heart-blood from his breast,
 A small red spot remain'd
 Indelibly impress'd.

Nor could he from his heart throw off
 The consciousness of his state;
 It was there with a dull, uneasy sense,
 A coldness and a weight;—

It was there when he lay down at night,
 It was there when at morn he rose;
 He feels it whatever he does,
 It is with him wherever he goes.

No occupation from his mind
 That constant sense can keep;
 It is present in his waking hours,
 It is present in his sleep;—

But still he felt it most,
 And with painfulest weight it press'd,
 O miserable man!
 When he was happiest.

O miserable man,
 Who hath all the world to friend,
 Yet dares not in prosperity
 Remember his latter end!

But happy man, whate'er
 His earthly lot may be,
 Who looks on Death as the Angel
 That shall set his spirit free,
 And bear it to its heritage
 Of immortality!

In such faith hath Proterius lived;
 And strong is that faith, and fresh,
 As if obtaining then new power,
 When he hath reach'd the awful hour
 Appointed for all flesh.

Eleëmon and his daughter
 With his latest breath he bless'd,
 And saying to them, "We shall meet Again before the Mercy-seat!"
 Went peacefully to rest.

This is the balm which God
 Hath given for every grief;
 And Cyra, in her anguish,
 Look'd heavenward for relief.

But her miserable husband
 Heard a voice within him say,
 "Eleëmon, Eleëmon,
 Thou art sold to the Demon!"
 And his heart seem'd dying away.

Whole Cæsarea is pour'd forth
 To see the funeral state,
 When Proterius is borne to his resting-place
 Without the Northern Gate.

Not like a Pagan's is his bier
 At doleful midnight borne
 By ghastly torchlight, and with wail
 Of women hired to mourn.

With tapers in the face of day,
 These rites their faithful hope display;
 In long procession slow,
 With hymns that fortify the heart,
 And prayers that soften woe.

In honor of the dead man's rank,
 But of his virtues more,
 The holy Bishop Basil
 Was one the bier who bore.

And with the Bishop side by side,
 As nearest to the dead allied,
 Was Eleëmon seen:
 All mark'd, but none could read aright,
 The trouble in his mien.

"His master's benefits on him
 Were well bestow'd," they said,
 "Whose sorrow now full plainly show'd
 How well he loved the dead."

They little ween'd what thoughts in him
 The solemn psalm awoke,

Which to all other hearts that hour
Its surest comfort spoke : —

“ Gather my Saints together ;
In peace let them be laid,
They who with me,” thus saith the Lord,
“ Their covenant have made ! ”

What pangs to Eleömon then,
O wretchedest of wretched men,
That psalmody convey'd !
For conscience told him that he, too,
A covenant had made.

And when he would have closed his ears
Against the unwelcome word,
Then from some elms beside the way
A Raven's croak was heard.

To him it seem'd a hollow voice
That warn'd him of his doom ;
For the tree whereon the Raven sat
Grew over the Pagan's tomb.

VI.

WHEN weariness would let her
No longer pray and weep,
And midnight long was past,
Then Cyra fell asleep.

Into that wretched sleep she sunk
Which only sorrow knows,
Wherein the exhausted body rests,
But the heart hath no repose.

Of her Father she was dreaming,
Still aware that he was dead,
When, in the visions of the night,
He stood beside her bed.

Crown'd and in robes of light he came ;
She saw he had found grace ;
And yet there seem'd to be
A trouble in his face.

The eye and look were still the same
That she from her cradle knew ;
And he put forth his hand, and blest her,
As he had been wont to do.

But then the smile benign
Of love forsook his face,
And a sorrowful displeasure
Came darkly in its place ; —

And he cast on Eleömon
A melancholy eye,
And sternly said, “ I bless thee not, — Bondsman ! thou knowest why ! ”

Again to Cyra then he turn'd, —
“ Let not thy husband rest

Till he hath wash'd away with tears
The red spot from his breast !

“ Hold fast thy hope, and Heaven will not Forsake thee in thine hour :
Good Angels will be near thee,
And evil ones shall fear thee,
And Faith will give thee power.”

Perturb'd, yet comforted, she woke ;
For in her waking ear
The words were heard which promised her
A strength above all fear.

An odor, that refresh'd no less
Her spirit with its blessedness
Than her corporeal frame,
Was breathed around, and she surely found
That from Paradise it came.

And, though the form revered was gone,
A clear, unearthly light
Remain'd, encompassing the bed,
When all around was night.

It narrow'd as she gazed ;
And soon she saw it rest,
Concentred, like an eye of light,
Upon her husband's breast.

Not doubting now the presence
Of some good presiding Power,
Collectedness as well as strength
Was given her in this hour.

And rising half, the while in deep
But troubled sleep he lay,
She drew the covering from his breast
With cautious hand away.

The small, round, blood-red mark she saw ;
Eleömon felt her not ;
But in his sleep he groan'd, and cried,
“ Out ! out — accursed spot ! ”

The darkness of surrounding night
Closed then upon that eye of light.
She waited for the break
Of day, and lay the while in prayer
For that poor sinner's sake —

In fearful, miserable prayer ;
But while she pray'd, the load of care
Less heavily bore on her heart,
And light was given, enabling her
To choose her difficult part.

And she drew, as comfortable texts
Unto her thoughts recurr'd,
Refreshment from the living well
Of God's unerring word.

But when the earliest dawn appear'd,
Herself in haste she array'd,
And watch'd his waking patiently,

And still as she watched she pray'd ;
And when Eleëmon had risen,
She spake to him, and said : —

“ We have been visited this night ;
My Father's Ghost I have seen ;
I heard his voice, — an awful voice ! —
And so hast thou, I ween ! ”

Eleëmon was pale when he awoke ;
But paler then he grew,
And over his whole countenance
There came a deathlike hue.

Still he controll'd himself, and sought
Her question to beguile ;
And forcing, while he answer'd her,
A faint and hollow smile, —

“ Cyra,” he said, “ thy thoughts possess'd
With one too painful theme,
Their own imaginations
For reality misdeem ;
Let not my dearest, best beloved,
Be troubled for a dream ! ”

“ O Eleëmon,” she replied,
“ Dissemble not with me thus ;
Ill it becomes me to forget
What Dreams have been to us !

“ Thinkest thou there can be peace for me,
Near to me as thou art,
While some unknown and fearful sin
Is festering at thy heart ?

“ Eleëmon, Eleëmon,
I may not let thee rest,
Till thou hast wash'd away with tears
The red spot from thy breast !

“ Thus to conceal thy crime from me,
It is no tenderness !
The worst is better known than fear'd.
Whatever it be, confess ;
And the Merciful will cleanse thee
From all unrighteousness ! ”

Like an aspen leaf he trembled ;
And his imploring eye
Bespake compassion, ere his lips
Could utter their dreaded reply.

“ O dearly loved, as dearly bought,
My sin and punishment I had thought
To bear through life alone ;
Too much the Vision hath reveal'd,
And all must now be known !

“ On thee, methinks, and only thee,
Dare I for pity call ;
A'hor me not, — renounce me not, —
My life, my love, my all !

“ And, Cyra, sure, if ever cause
Might be a sinner's plea,

'Twould be for that lost wretch who sold
His hope of Heaven for thee !

“ Thou seest a miserable man
Given over to despair,
Who has bound himself, by his act and deed,
To the Prince of the Powers of the Air.”

She seized him by the arm,
And hurrying him into the street,
“ Come with me to the Church,” she cried,
“ And to Basil the Bishop's feet ! ”

VII.

PUBLIC must be the sinner's shame,
As heinous his offence ;
So Basil said, when he ordain'd
His form of penitence.

And never had such dismay been felt
Through that astonish'd town,
As when, at morn, the Crier went Proclaiming up and down, —

“ The miserable sinner, Eleëmon,
Who for love hath sold himself to the Demon,
His guilt before God and man declares ;
And beseeches all good Christians
To aid him with their prayers.”

Many were the hearts compassionate
Whom that woful petition moved ;
For he had borne his fortune meekly,
And therefore was well beloved.

Open his hand had been,
And liberal of its store ;
And the prayers of the needy arose,
Who had daily been fed at his door.

They, too, whom Cyra's secret aid
Relieved from pressing cares,
In this her day of wretchedness,
Repaid her with their prayers.

And from many a gentle bosom
Supplications for mercy were sent,
If haply they might aid
The wretched penitent.

Sorely such aid he needed then !
Basil himself, of living men
The powerfulest in prayer,
For pity, rather than in hope,
Had bidden him not despair.

So hard a thing for him it seem'd
To wrest from Satan's hand
The fatal Bond, which, while retain'd,
Must against him in judgment stand.

“ Dost thou believe,” he said, “ that Grace
Itself can reach this grief ? ”

SEIZED ON AND CARRIED.

She seized him by the arm

And hurrying him into the street,

"Come with me to the church," she cried

And to Basil the Bishop's feet!"

With a feeble voice, and a woful eye,
 "Lord, I believe!" was the sinner's reply;
 "Help thou mine unbelief!"

The Bishop then cross'd him on the brow,
 And cross'd him on the breast;
 And told him, if he did his part
 With true remorse and faithful heart,
 God's mercy might do the rest.

"Alone in the holy Relic-room
 Must thou pass day and night,
 And wage with thy ghostly enemies
 A more than mortal fight.

"The trial may be long, and the struggle strong,
 Yet be not thou dismay'd;
 For thou mayst count on Saints in Heaven,
 And on earthly prayers for aid.

"And in thy mind this scripture bear
 With steadfast faithfulness, whate'er
 To appall thee may arrive,—
 'When the wicked man turneth away from his sin,
 He shall save his soul alive!'

"Take courage as thou lookest around
 On the relics of the blest;
 And night and day, continue to pray,
 Until thy tears have wash'd away
 The stigma from thy breast!"

"Let me be with him!" Cyra cried;
 "If thou mayst not be there;
 In this sore trial I at least
 My faithful part may bear:

"My presence may some comfort prove,
 Yea, haply some defence;
 O Father, in myself I feel
 The strength of innocence!"

"Nay, Daughter, nay; it must not be!
 Though dutiful this desire;
 He may by Heaven's good grace be saved,
 But only as if by fire;—

"Sights which should never meet thine eye
 Before him may appear;
 And fiendish voices proffer words
 Which should never assail thy ear;
 Alone must he this trance sustain;
 Keep thou thy vigils here!"

He led him to the Relic-room;
 Alone he left him there;
 And Cyra with the Nuns remain'd
 To pass her time in prayer.

Alone was Eleemon left
 For mercy on Heaven to call;
 Deep and unceasing were his prayers,
 But not a tear would fall.

His lips were parch'd, his head was hot,
 His eyeballs throb'd with heat;

And in that utter silence
 He could hear his temples beat.

But cold his feet, and cold his hands;
 And at his heart there lay
 An icy coldness unrelieved,
 While he pray'd the livelong day.

A long, long day! It pass'd away
 In dreadful expectation;
 Yet free throughout the day was he
 From outward molestation.

Nor sight appear'd, nor voice was heard,
 Though every moment both he fear'd;
 The Spirits of the Air
 Were busy the while in infusing
 Suggestions of despair.

And he in strong endeavor still Against them strove with earnest will;
 Heart-piercing was his cry,
 Heart-breathed his groaning; but it seem'd
 That the source of tears was dry.

And now had evening closed;
 The dim lamp-light alone
 On the stone cross, and the marble walls,
 And the shrines of the Martyrs, shone.

Before the Cross Eleemon lay:
 His knees were on the ground;
 Courage enough to touch the Cross
 Itself, he had not found.

But on the steps of the pedestal
 His lifted hands were laid;
 And in that lowliest attitude
 The suffering sinner pray'd.

A strong temptation of the Fiend,
 Which bade him despair and die,
 He with the aid of Scripture
 Had faithfully put by;
 And then, as with a dawning hope,
 He raised this contrite cry:—

"O that mine eyes were fountains!
 If the good grace of Heaven
 Would give me tears, methinks I then
 Might hope to be forgiven!"

To that meek prayer a short, loud laugh
 From fiendish lips replied:
 Close at his ear he felt it,
 And it sounded on every side.

From the four walls and the vaulted roof
 A shout of mockery rung;
 And the echoing ground repeated the sound,
 Which peal'd above, and below, and around,
 From many a fiendish tongue.

The lamps went out at that hideous shout,
 But darkness had there no place,

For the room was fill'd with a lurid light
That came from a Demon's face.

A dreadful face it was, — too well
By Eleëmon known!
Alas! he had seen it when he stood
Before the dolorous Throne.

“Eleëmon! Eleëmon!”
Sternly said the Demon,
How have I merited this?
I kept my covenant with thee,
And placed thee in worldly bliss!

“And still thou mightest have had,
Thine after-days to bless,
Health, wealth, long life, and whatsoe'er
The World calls happiness.

“Fool, to forego thine earthly joys,
Who hast no hope beyond!
For judgment must be given for me,
When I sue thee upon the Bond.

“Remember I deceived thee not;
Nor had I tempted thee:
Thou camest of thine own accord,
And didst act knowingly!

“I told thee thou mightst vainly think
To cheat me by contrition,
When thou wert written down among
The Children of Perdition!

“‘So help me, Satan!’ were thy words
When thou didst this allow;
I help'd thee, Eleëmon, then, —
And I will have thee now!”

At the words of the Fiend, from the floor
Eleëmon in agony sprung;
Up the steps of the pedestal he ran,
And to the Cross he clung.

And then it seem'd as if he drew,
While he clasp'd the senseless stone,
A strength he had not felt till then,
A hope he had not known.

So when the Demon ceased,
He answer'd him not a word;
But, looking upward, he
His faithful prayer preferr'd:

“All, all, to Thee, my Lord
And Savior, I confess!
And I know that Thou canst cleanse me
From all unrighteousness!

“I have turned away from my sin;
In Thee do I put my trust;
To such Thou hast promised forgiveness,
And Thou art faithful and just!”

With that the Demon disappear'd;
The lamps resumed their light;

Nor voice nor vision more
Disturb'd him through the night.

He stirr'd not from his station,
But there stood fix'd in prayer;
And when Basil the Bishop enter'd
At morn, he found him there.

VIII.

WELL might the Bishop see what he Had undergone that night;
Remorse and agony of mind
Had made his dark hair white.

So should the inner change, he ween'd,
With the outward sign accord;
And holy Basil cross'd himself,
And blest our gracious Lord.

“Well hast thou done,” said he, “my son,
And faithfully fought the fight;
So shall this day complete, I trust,
The victory of the night.

“I fear'd that forty days and nights
Too little all might be;
But great and strange hath been the change
One night hath wrought in thee.”

“O Father, Father,” he replied,
“And hath it been but one?
An endless time it seem'd to me!
I almost thought Eternity
With me had been begun.

“And surely this poor flesh and blood
Such terrors could not have withstood,
If grace had not been given;
But when I clasp'd the blessed Cross,
I then had help from Heaven.

“The coldness from my heart is gone;
But still the weight is there,
And thoughts, which I abhor, will come
And tempt me to despair.

“Those thoughts I constantly repel;
And all, methinks, might yet be well,
Could I but weep once more,
And with true tears of penitence
My dreadful state deplore.

“Tears are denied; their source is dried!
And must it still be so?
O Thou, who from a rock didst make
The living waters flow, —

“A broken and a bleeding heart
This hour I offer Thee;
And, when Thou seest good, my tears
Shall then again be free!”

A knocking at the door was heard
As he ended this reply ;
Hearing that unexpected sound,
The Bishop turn'd his eye,
And his venerable Mother,
Emmelia, the Abbess, drew nigh.

“We have not ceased this mournful night,”
Said she, “on Heaven to call ;
And our afflicted Cyra
Hath edified us all.

“More fervent prayers from suffering heart,
I ween, have ne'er been sent ;
And now she asks, as some relief,
In this her overwhelming grief,
To see the penitent.

“So earnestly she ask'd, that I
Her wish would not defer ;
And I have brought her to the door :
Forgive me, Son, if I err.”

“Hard were I did I not consent
To thy compassionate intent,
O Mother,” he replied ;
And raising then his voice, “Come in,
Thou innocent !” he cried.

That welcome word when Cyra heard,
With a sad pace and slow,
Forward she came, like one whose heart
Was overcharged with woe.

Her face was pale, — long illness would
Have changed those features less ;
And long-continued tears had dimm'd
Her eyes with heaviness.

Her husband's words had reach'd her ear
When at the door she stood ;
“Thou hast pray'd in vain for tears,” she said,
“While I have pour'd a flood !

“Mine flow, and they will flow ; they must ;
They cannot be repress'd !
And oh, that they might wash away
The stigma from thy breast !

“Oh that these tears might cleanse that spot, —
Tears which I cannot check !”
Profusely weeping as she spake,
She fell upon his neck.

He clasp'd the mourner close, and in
That passionate embrace,
In grief for her, almost forgot
His own tremendous case.

Warm as they fell he felt her tears,
And in true sympathy,
So gracious Heaven permitted then,
His own to flow were free.

And then the weight was taken off,
Which at his heart had press'd ; —

O mercy ! and the crimson spot
Hath vanish'd from his breast !

At that most happy sight,
The four, with one accord,
Fell on their knees, and blest
The mercy of the Lord.

“What then ! before the strife is done,
Would ye of victory boast ?”
Said a Voice above : “they reckon too soon,
Who reckon without their host !”

“Mine is he by a Bond
Which holds him fast in law :
I drew it myself for certainty,
And sharper than me must the Lawyer be
Who in it can find a flaw !

“Before the Congregation,
And in the face of day,
Whoever may pray, and whoever gainsay,
I will challenge him for my Bondsman,
And carry him quick away !”

“Ha, Satan ! dost thou in thy pride,”
With righteous anger Basil cried,
“Defy the force of prayer ?
In the face of the Church wilt thou brave it ?
Why, then we will meet thee there !

“There mayst thou set forth thy right,
With all thy might, before the sight
Of all the Congregation ;
And they that hour shall see the power
Of the Lord unto salvation !”

“A challenge fair ! We meet then there,”
Rejoin'd the Prince of the Powers of the Air ;
“The Bondsman is mine by right.
Let the whole city come at thy call,
And great and small : in face of them all,
I will have him in thy despite !”

So having said, he tarried not
To hear the Saint's reply.
“Beneath the sign which Constantine,”
Said Basil, “beheld in the sky,
We strive, and have our strength therein,
Therein our victory !”

 IX.

THE Church is fill'd ; so great the faith
That City in its Bishop hath ;
And now the Congregation
Are waiting there in trembling prayer
And terrible expectation.

Emmelia and her sisterhood
Have taken there their seat ;
And Choristers, and Monks, and Priests,
And Psalmists there, and Exorcists,
Are station'd in order meet.

In sackcloth clad, with ashes strown
 Upon his whiter hair,
 Before the steps of the altar,
 His feet for penance bare,
 Eleemon stands, a spectacle
 For men and Angels there.

Beside him Cyra stood, in weal
 Or woe, in good or ill,
 Not to be sever'd from his side,
 His faithful helpmate still.

Dishevell'd were her raven locks,
 As one in mourner's guise;
 And pale she was, but faith and hope
 Had now relumed her eyes.

At the altar Basil took his stand;
 He held the Gospel in his hand,
 And in his ardent eye
 Sure trust was seen, and conscious power,
 And strength for victory.

At his command the Chorister
 Enounced the Prophet's song,
 "To God our Savior mercies
 And forgivenesses belong."

Ten thousand voices join'd to raise
 The holy hymn on high,
 And hearts were thrill'd and eyes were fill'd
 By that full harmony.

And when they ceased, and Basil's hand
 A warning signal gave,
 The whole huge multitude was hush'd
 In a stillness like that of the grave.

The Sun was high in a bright blue sky;
 But a chill came over the crowd,
 And the Church was suddenly darken'd,
 As if by a passing cloud.

A sound as of a tempest rose,
 Though the day was calm and clear;
 Intrepid must the heart have been
 Which did not then feel fear.

In the sound of the storm came the dreadful Form;
 The Church then darken'd more,
 And He was seen erect on the screen
 Over the Holy Door.

Day-light had sicken'd at his sight;
 And the gloomy Presence threw
 A shade profound over all around,
 Like a cheerless twilight hue.

"I come hither," said the Demon,
 "For my Bondsman Eleemon!
 Mine is he, body and soul.
 See all men!" and with that on high
 He held the open scroll.

The fatal signature appear'd,
 To all the multitude,

Distinct as when the accursed pen
 Had traced it with fresh blood.
 "See all men!" Satan cried again,
 And then his claim pursued.

"I ask for justice! I prefer
 An equitable suit!
 I appeal to the Law, and the case
 Admitteth of no dispute.

"If there be justice here,
 If Law have place in Heaven,
 Award upon this Bond
 Must then for me be given.

"What to my rightful claim,
 Basil, canst thou gainsay,
 That I should not seize the Bondsman,
 And carry him quick away?"

"The writing is confess'd;—
 No plea against it shown;—
 The forfeiture is mine,
 And now I take my own!"

"Hold there!" cried Basil, with a voice
 That arrested him on his way,
 When from the screen he would have swoopt
 To pounce upon his prey;—

"Hold there, I say! Thou canst not sue
 Upon this Bond by law!
 A sorry legalist were he
 Who could not, in thy boasted plea,
 Detect its fatal flaw.

"The Deed is null, for it was framed
 With fraudulent intent;
 A thing unlawful in itself;
 A wicked instrument,—
 Not to be pleaded in the Courts.—
 Sir Fiend, thy cause is shent!"

"This were enough; but, more than this,
 A maxim, as thou knowest, it is,
 Whereof all Laws partake,
 That no one may of his own wrong
 His own advantage make.

"The man, thou sayest, thy Bondsman is;
 Mark, now, how stands the fact!
 Thou hast allow'd, nay, aided him,
 As a Freedman, to contract
 A marriage with this Christian woman here,
 And by a public act.

"That act being publicly perform'd
 With thy full cognizance,
 Claim to him as thy Bondsman thou
 Canst never more advance;—

"For when they solemnly were then
 United, in sight of Angels and men,
 The matrimonial band
 Gave to the wife a right in him;
 And we on this might stand.

“Thy claim upon the man was by
Thy silence then forsaken;
A marriage thus by thee procured
May not by thee be shaken;
And thou, O Satan, as thou seest,
In thine own snare art taken!”

So Basil said, and paused awhile;
The Arch-fiend answer'd not;
But he heaved in vexation
A sulphurous sigh for the Bishop's vocation,
And thus to himself he thought:—

“The Law thy calling ought to have been,
With thy wit so ready, and tongue so free!
To prove by reason, in reason's despite,
That right is wrong, and wrong is right,
And white is black, and black is white,—
What a loss have I had in thee!”

“I rest not here,” the Saint pursued;
“Though thou in this mayst see
That in the meshes of thine own net
I could entangle thee!”

“Fiend, thou thyself didst bring about
The spousal celebration,
Which link'd them by the nuptial tie
For both their souls' salvation.

“Thou sufferedst them before high Heaven
With solemn rites espoused to be,
Then and for evermore, for time
And for eternity.

“That tie holds good; those rites
Will reach their whole intent;
And thou of his salvation wert
Thyself the instrument.

“And now, methinks, thou seest in this
A higher power than thine;
And that thy ways were overruled,
To work the will divine!”

With rising energy he spake,
And more majestic look;
And with authoritative hand
Held forth the Sacred Book.

Then with a voice of power he said,
“The Bond is null and void!
It is nullified, as thou knowest well,
By a Covenant whose strength by Hell
Can never be destroy'd!—

“The Covenant of grace,
That greatest work of Heaven,
Which whose claims in perfect faith,
His sins shall be forgiven.

“Were they as scarlet red,
They should be white as wool;
This is the All-mighty's Covenant,
Who is All-merciful!

“His Minister am I!
In his All-mighty name
To this repentant sinner
God's pardon I proclaim!

“In token that against his soul
The sin shall no longer stand,
The writing is effaced, which there
Thou holdest in thy hand!

“Angels that are in bliss above
This triumph of Redeeming Love
Will witness, and rejoice;
And ye shall now in thunder hear
Heaven's ratifying voice!”

A peal of thunder shook the pile;
The Church was fill'd with light;
And when the flash was past, the Fiend
Had vanish'd from their sight.

He fled as he came, but in anger and shame;
The pardon was complete;
And the impious scroll was dropp'd, a blank,
At Eleëmon's feet.

NOTES.

FROM THE LIFE OF S. BASIL THE GREAT, BY S. AMPHILO-CHIUS, BISHOP OF ICONIUM.

Rosweyde, Vitæ Patrum, pp. 156, 158.

“Helladius autem sanctæ recordationis, qui inspector et minister fuit miraculorum quæ ab eo patrata sunt, quique post obitum ejusdem Apostolicæ memoriæ Basilii sedem illius suscipere meruit, vir miraculis et clarus, atque omni virtute ornatus, retulit mihi, quia cum senator quidam fidelis, nomine Proterius, pergeret ad sancta et peregranda loca, et ibidem filiam suam tondere, et in unum venerabilium monasteriorum mittere, et sacrificium Deo offerre voluisset; Diabolus, qui ab initio homicida est, invidens ejus religioso proposito, commovit unum ex servis ejus, et hunc ad puellæ succendit amorem. Hic itaque cum tanto voto esset indignus, et non auderet propositum saltem contingere, alloquitur unum ex detestandis maleficis, repromittens illi, ut si fortè arte sua posset illam commovere, multam ei auri tribueret quantitatem. At verò veneficus dixit ad eum: O homo, ego ad hoc impos cristo: sed si vis, mitto te ad provisorem meum Diabolum, et ille faciet voluntatem tuam, si tu dumtaxat feceris voluntatem ejus. Qui dixit ad eum: Quæcunque dixerit mihi, faciam. At ille: Abrenuntias, inquit, Christo in scriptis? Dicit ei: Etiam. Porrò iniquitatis operarius dicit ei: Si ad hoc paratus es cooperator tibi efficiar. Ille autem ad ipsum: Paratus sum, tantùm ut consequar desiderium. Et factâ epistolâ, pessimæ operationis minister ad Diabolum destinavit eam, habentem dictatum hujusmodi: Quoniam domino et provisorio meo oportet me dare operam, quò a Christianorum religione discedam, et ad tuam societatem accedam, ut compleatur portio tua; nisi tibi præsentem, meas deferentem litterulas, cupidine puellæ sauciatum. Et obsecro ut hujus voti compos existat, ut et in hoc glorior, et cum offluentiore alacritate colligam amatores tuos. Et datâ ei epistolâ, dixit: Vade tali horâ noctis, et sta supra monumentum alicujus pagani, et erige chartam in aëra, et adstabunt tibi, qui te debent ducere ad Diabolum. Qui hoc alacriter gesto, emisit miserinam illam vocem, invocans Diaboli adjutorium: et continuò adstiterunt ei principes potestatis tenebrarum, spiritus nequitie, et suscepto qui fuerat deceptus, cum gaudio magno duxerunt eum ubi erat Diabolus, quem et monstraverunt ei super excelsum solium sedentem, et in gyro ejus nequitie spiritus circumstantes: et susceptis venefici litteris, dicit ad infelicem illum: *Credis in me? Qui dicit: Credo. Dicit ei Diabolus: Tergiversatores estis vos Christiani, et quidem quando me opus habitis, venitis ad me; eam autem consecuti fueritis affectum, abnegatis me et acceditis ad Christum vestrum, qui, cum sit bonus atque misericors, suscipit eos. Sed fac mihi in scriptis tam Christi tui et sancti Baptismatis voluntariam abrenuntiationem, quam in me per secula spontaneam repromissionem, et quia mecum eris in die iudicii simul perfruturum aeternis suppliciis, quæ mihi sunt præparata. At ille exposuit propria manu scriptum, quemadmodum fuerat expelitus. Rursusque ille corruptor animarum draco destinat de montes fornicationi præpositos, et exardescere facit ad puellam ad amorem pueri, quæ projecta se in pavimentum, et capit clamare ad patrem: *Miserere mei, miserere! quia atrociter torquor propter talem puerum nostram! Computare visceribus tuis; ostende in me unigenitum tuam paternum affectum, et junge me puero, quem elegi. Quod si hæc agere nolueris, videbis me amarâ morte post paululum mortuam, et rationem dabis Deo pro me in die iudicii. Pater autem cum lachrymis dicebat: Heu mihi peccatori! quid est quod contigit miseræ filie meæ? quis thesaurum meum furatus est? quis fuit meæ injuriam intulit! quis dulce oculorum meorum lumen extinxit? ego te semper supercaelesti sposo consiliatus sum desponsare Christo, et Angelorum contubernio sociam constituere, et in psalmis et hymnis et canticis spiritualibus canere Deo accelerabam: tu autem in lasciviam petulantie insanisti! Dimitte me, sicut volo, cum Deo contractum facere, ne delinens sanctitatem meam cum aurore in infernum, neque confusione nobilitatem parentum tuorum operias. Quæ in nihilum reputans, quæ à patre sibi dicebantur, perseverabat clamans: *Pater mi, aut fac desiderium meum, aut prius paululum mortuam me ridebis. Pater itaque ejus in magrâ demutatione constitutus, tam immensitatem vastitatis absorptus, quàm amicorum consiliis acquiescens se admonentium, ac dierum, expedire potius voluntatem puellæ fieri, quàm sese manibus interficere, consensus, et præcepit fieri desiderium puellæ patris, quàm cum exitibili tralree morti. Et mox protulit puerum quæ quærebatur, simul et propriam genitricem, et datus eis omnia bona sua, dicit: *Salvi nata vere misera: multum lamentabris repa nitens in nubilissimis, quando nihil tibi prodierit. Porro nefandi matrimonii conjugio facto, et diabolice operationis completo facinore, et pauco tempore pretereunte, notatus est puer à quibusdam, quod non ingrederetur ecclesiam, neque attractoret immortalia et vivifica Sacramenta, et dicant miserande uxor ejus: *Noveris quia maritus tuus, quem elegisti, non est Christianus, sed extraneus ad fidem, et penitus est alienus. Quæ tenebris et dirâ plagâ referta, projecta se in pavimentum, et capit unguis semetipsam discerpere, et percutere pectus, atque clamare: *Nemo unquam qui parentibus inobediens fuit, saluus factus est. Quis annuntiabit patri meo confusionem meam? Heu mihi infelici! in quod perditionis profundum descendi! quare nata sum? vel nata quare non statim indircptibilis facta sum? Hujusmodi ergo cum complorantem seductus vir ejus agnosceus, venit ad eam, asserens non se ita rei veritatem habere: quæ in refrigerium suavoris ejus verbis deveniens, dicit ad eam: *Si vis mihi satisfacere, et infelicem animam meam certificare, cras ego et tu pergemus unanimiter ad ecclesiam, et coram me sume intemerata mysteria, et taliter mihi poteris satisfacere. Tunc coactus dicit ei sententiam capituli. Protinus ergo puella feminicâ infirmitate depositâ, et consilio bono accepto, currit ad pastorem et discipulum Christi Basilium, adversus tantam clamans impietatem: *Misericordiam mihi miseræ presta sancte Dei, miserere mi discipule Domini, quæ contractum cum demonibus feci. Miserere mi, quæ proprio patri facta sum inobediens. Et cognita illi fecit rei geste negotia. Porro sanctus Dei convocato puera, sciscitabatur ab eo si hæc hujusmodi essent. Qui ad sanctum cum lachrymis ait: *Etiâ sancte Dei. Nam etsi ergo tacuero, opera mea clamabunt. Et curruvit ei et ipse malignam diaboli operationem, qualiter ab exordio usque ad finem fuerit subsecutus. Tunc dicit ei: *Vis converti ad Dominum Deum nostram? Qui dicit: *Etiâ volo, sed non possum. Dicit ei: *Cur? Respondit: *In scriptis abrenuntiaui Christo, et fadus præpigi cum diabolo. Dicit ei sanctus: *Non tibi sit curæ: benignus est Deus noster, et suscipiet te penitentiam agentem. Benignus enim est super multitis nostris. Et projecit se puella ad pedes ejus, evangelice rogabat eum, dicens: *Discipule Christi Dei nostri, si quid potes, adjuva nos! Dicit sanctus ad puerum: *Credis posse salvari? At ille dicit: *Credo, Domine, adjuva incredulitatem meam. Et confestim adprehensâ manu ejus, et facto super eum Christi signo simul et oratione, retrusit illum in uno loco intra quem sacri habebantur amictus, et datâ ei regulâ aravit et ipse pro illo per tres *dies. Post quos visitavit eum, et dixit: *Quomodo te habes, fili? Dicit ei puer: *La magnâ sum, domine, deflectione. Sancte Dei, non suffero clamores, pavores, jacula, et lapidationes ipsorum Tenentes enim propria manus meâ scripturam, objurgantur in me, dicentes: *Tu occidisti ad nos, non nos ad te. Et dicit ei sanctus: *Noli timere, fili mi, tantummodò crede. Et datâ ei modicâ escâ, et facto super eum Christi devotò signo et oratione, inclusit eum; et post paucos dies visitavit illum, et dixit: *Quomodo te habes, fili? Ait: *Pater sancte, à longe clamores coram audio simul et minas; nam non video illos. Et rursus dato ei cibo, et effusâ oratione clausit ostium, et discessit. Præterea quadagesimo die abiit ad eum, et dicit illi: *Quomodo te habes, frater? Respondit et dicit ei: *Benè, sancte Dei. Vidi enim te hodie in somnio pugnantem pro me, et vincentem Diabolum. Mox ergo secundum consuetudinem factâ oratione eduxit illum, et duxit illum ad cubiculum suum. Manè autem facto, convocato tam venerabili clero, quem monasteriis et omni Christo amabili populo, dixit eis: *Filii mei dilecti, universi gratias agamus Domino: Ecce enim futura est, et ovem perditam pastor bonus super humeros suos imponat, et reducat Ecclesiæ: Et nos oportet prævigilem ducere noctem, et deprecari voluntatem ipsius, ut non vincat corruptor animarum. Quo protinus acta, et promptissimè populo congregato, per totam noctem unâ cum bono pastore deprecati sunt Deum, cum lacrymis pro ipso clamantes, *Kyrie eleison. Et diluculò unâ cum omni multitudine populi assumit sanctus puerum, et tenens dexteram manuum ejus, duxit eum in sanctum Dei ecclesiam cum psalmis et hymnis. At ecce Diabolus, qui cito nostræ semper incidit, si hanc sine tristitiâ viderit, cum totâ perniciosâ virtute suâ venit, et puero insibiliter comprehenso, voluit raper eum de manu sancti: et cepit puer clamans dicere: *Sancte Dei auxiliare mihi, et adrò contra illum impudenti insantiâ venit, ut ipsam egregiam Basilium simul cum illo impelleret et subtraheret. Conversus ergo sanctus ad Diabolum ait: *Impudentissime, et animarum violator, pater tenebrarum et perditionis, non tibi sufficit tua perditio, quàm tibi ipsi et his, qui sub te sunt, acquisisti, sed adhuc non quiescis, et Dei mi plasma tentando? Diabolus verò dicit ad eum: *Præjudicas mihi, Basili: ita ut multi ex nobis audirent voces ejus. At ecce sanctus Dei ad eum: *inrumpat, inquit, tibi Dominus, diabole. At ille, Basili, præjudicium mihi facis. Non ivero ego ad eum, sed ille venit ad me, abrenuntiaudo Christum, merumque est sponsione pactuatus, et ecce scriptum habeo, et in die iudicii coram communi iudice deferam illud. Sanctus autem Domini dicit: *Benedictus Dominus Deus meus, non deponet populus iste manus ab excelso cali, nisi reddideris scriptum. Et conversus dicit plebi: *Tollite manus vestras in calum, universi clamantes cum lacrymis, *Kyrie eleison. Cumque staret populus horâ multâ extensus habentes manus in calum, ecce scriptum pueri in ærrem deportatum, et ab omnibus visum venit, et positum est in manibus egregii patris nostri posterioris Basilii. Suscepit autem illud, gratias egit Deo, gavisusque edhementem unâ cum universâ plebe, dicit ad puerum: *Recognoscis litterulas has, frater? At ille dicit ad eum: *Etiâ sancte Dei, propria manus meâ scriptura est. Et disruptâ scripturâ introduxit eum in ecclesiam, et dignus habitus est sacris interesse Missarum officiis, et participatione sacrorum mysteriorum, et muneribus Christi. Et factâ susceptione magna recreavit universum populum, et ducto puero et instructo, atque datâ ei decenti regula, tradidit eum uxorî ejus, indesinenter glorificantem et laudantem Deum. Amen.*****************

Baert, though he pronounces the life in which this legend appears to be apocryphal, does not deliver a decided opinion upon the legend itself. He says, "Helladium Basilii in Episcopatu successorem fuisse, omnibus est indubitatum; vitam decessoris ab illo conscriptam, credimus (ut par est) S. Joanni Damasceno, qui vitam ad nos tantum transmississet thesaurum; eum enim viditur præ oculis habuisse, cum locum inde unum descripsit in oratione pro sacris Imaginibus. An vero ea, quæ hic narratur, et Helladio sunt, lector iudicet. Patuit enim fieri, ut eo quo Pseudo-Amphilochius scripsit tempore, fragmenta quedam Helladii extarent, quæ ipse retulerit in Basilium suum. Quod attinet ad Proterii filiam, a demone in amorem juvenis concitatum, simile quid contigisse B. Mariæ Antiochena referimus tomo 7 Maji, die 29, pag. 52. Mihi tamen verosimilius est, eundem qui Amphilochium mentitus est, mentiri etiam Helladium potuisse." — p. 952—3. Jun. t. 2.

The story, to which Baert refers, resembles the legend of St. Basil in one part, but is utterly unlike it in the circum stances wherein he has supposed the resemblance to exist. It appears to have been one of those fictions which were composed honestly as works of imagination, not like the lives of St. Benedict, St. Francis, St. Dominic, St. Ignatius Loyola, and so many of their respective orders, with a fraudulent intent, to impose upon mankind. Like other such fictions, however, it has been adopted and legitimated by credulity and fraud, and the blessed Mary, the Virgin of Antioch, has her place accordingly in the Acta Sanctorum, on the 29th of May. But as the legend evidently was not written when Antioch was a Christian city, and, moreover, as the legend itself contains nothing whatever by which its age could be determined, Papebroche presents it as co habendam esse loco, quo multa in Vitis Sanctorum Patrum, utilem quidem instructionem continentia ad formandos mores, sed ad historicam certitudinem parum aut nihil. Igitur istam quoque ut talem hic damus; liberum lectori relinquentes, ut eam quo velit gradu credibilitatis collect.

In this legend, one of the chief persons in Antioch, Anthemius by name, failing to win the affections of Maria, who was the daughter of a poor widow, and had resolved to lead a life of celibacy, applies to a Magician to assist him. The Magician sends two demons to influence mother and daughter in their sleep, so as to bring Maria to Anthemius's bed-chamber; but the temptations of worldly wealth, which are offered, have only the effect of alarming them; they rise in the middle of the night, and go toward the Church, there to pray for protection and deliverance; and, on the way thither, one demon takes upon him Maria's form, while the other personates the mother, and thus deceys Maria into the apartment where Anthemius is expecting her. She is, however, allowed to depart uninjured, upon a promise to return at the end of fifteen days, and live with him as a servant, provided he will offer her no violence. Nothing can be more unlike the story of Proterius's daughter. Having extorted an oath from her, that she would return according to this promise, Anthemius remains, wondering at the great power of the Magician. "Certes," thought he, "one who can do what he hath done in this matter is greater than all men; why, then, should I not offer him all I am worth, if he will make me equal to himself?" And, being inflamed with this desire, he said within himself, "If I were such as he is, whatever I might wish for would be within my reach." This thought came into his mind as if it were by Divine Providence, to the end that he might willingly let the virgin depart, and that she might not be bound by the nefarious oath which she had taken, and that the devil, who was the instigator of his evil desires, might be confounded in his designs, both upon the virgin herself, and upon him who was at this time the virgin's enemy.

"As soon, therefore, as it was day, Anthemius went out to seek for the Sorcerer, and to give him thanks. Having found him, and saluted him, he delivered to him, with many thanks, the gold which he had promised; and then, falling at his feet, earnestly entreated that he might be made such as the Sorcerer himself was, promising that, if this could be effected through his means, he would requite him with whatever sum he might demand. But the Sorcerer replied, 'that it was not possible for him to be made a sorcerer also, because he was a Christian, having been made such by his baptism.' But Anthemius answered, 'Then I renounce my baptism and Christian name, if I may be made a sorcerer.' Still the Sorcerer replied, 'Thou canst not be made a sorcerer, neither canst thou keep the laws of the sorcerers, the which if thou wert not to keep, thou wouldst then fall from a place which could never again be recovered.' But Anthemius, again embracing his feet, promised that he would perform whatever should be enjoined him. Then the Sorcerer, seeing his perseverance, asked for paper, and having written therein what he thought good, gave it to Anthemius, and said, 'Take this writing, and, in the dead of the night, go out of the city, supperless, and stand upon yonder little bridge. A huge multitude will pass over it, about midnight, with a mighty uproar, and with their Prince seated in a chariot: yet fear not thou, for thou wilt not be hurt, having with thee this my writing; but hold up the writing, so that it may be perceived: and if thou shouldst be asked what thou doest there at that hour, or who thou art, say, 'The Great Master sent me to my Lord the Prince, with this letter, that I might deliver it unto him.' But take heed neither to sign thyself as a Christian, nor to call upon Christ; for in either case thy desire would then be frustrated.'

"Anthemius, therefore, having received the letter, went his way; and, when night came, he went out of the city, and took his stand upon the little bridge, holding up the writing in his hand. About midnight, a great multitude came there, and horsemen in great numbers, and the Prince himself sitting in a chariot; and they who went first surrounded him, saying, 'Who is this that standeth here?' To whom Anthemius made answer, 'The Great Master hath sent me to my Lord the Prince with this letter.' And they took the letter from him, and delivered it to the Prince, who sat in the chariot; and he, having received and read the same, wrote something in the same paper, and gave it to Anthemius, that he should carry it to the Sorcerer. So, in the morning, Anthemius, having returned, delivered it to the Sorcerer, who, having perused it, said, 'Wouldst thou know what he hath written to us? even just as I before said to thee, to wit, 'Knowest thou not that this man is a Christian? Such a one I can in no wise admit, unless, according to our manner, he performeth all things, and renounceth and abhorreth his faith.' When Anthemius heard this, he replied, 'Master, now as elsewhere I abjure the name of Christian, and the faith, and the baptism.' Then the Sorcerer wrote again; and giving the writing to Anthemius, said, 'Go again, and take thy stand at night at the same place, and when he shall come, give him this, and attend to what he shall say.' Accordingly he went his way, and took his stand at the time and place appointed. Behold, at the same hour the same company appeared again, and they said unto him, 'Wherefore hast thou returned hither?' Anthemius answered and said, 'Lord, the Great Master hath sent me back with this writing.' The Prince then received it, and read, and again wrote in it, and gave it again to be returned to the Sorcerer. To whom Anthemius went again in the morning, and he, having read the writing, said unto him, 'Knowest thou what he hath written unto me in reply? I wrote to him, saying, "All these things, Lord, he hath abjured before me; admit him, therefore, if it pleaseth thee." But he hath written back, "Unless he abjureth all this in writing, and in his own hand, I will not admit him." Say now, then, what wilt thou that I should do for thee?'

"The wretched Anthemius answered and said, 'Master, I am ready to do this also.' And with that he seated himself, and wrote thus: — I, Anthemius, adjure Christ and his faith. I abjure also his baptism, and the cross, and the Christian name, and I promise that I will never again use them, or invoke them.' But, while he was thus writing, a copious sweat ran from him, from the top of his head to the soles of his feet, so that his whole inner garment was wet therewith, as he himself afterwards with continual tears confessed. He nevertheless went on writing, and, when it was finished, he gave the writing to the Sorcerer to read, who, when he had perused it, said, 'This is well; go thy way again, and he will now certainly receive thee. And when he shall have admitted thee, say to him reverently, I beseech thee, Lord, assign to me those who may be at my bidding; and he will assign unto thee as many as thou wilt have. But this I advise thee, not to take more than one or two familiars, inasmuch as more would perplex thee, and would be perpetually disturbing thee night and day, that thou mightest give them what to do.' Then Anthemius returned to the same place as before, and awaited there, and the same company came there again at midnight, and the leader of them, having incontinently recognized Anthemius, began to cry out, 'Lord, the Great Master hath again sent hither this man with his commands: and the Prince bade him draw nigh. And Anthemius, drawing nigh, gave unto him his profession of abjuration, full of calamity and woe. He, having received and read it, raised it on high in his hand, and began to exclaim, 'Christ, behold Anthemius, who heretofore was thine, hath, by this writing, abjured and execrated thee! I am not the author of this his deed; but he, offering himself to my service with many entreaties, hath of his own accord written this his profession of abjuration, and delivered it to me. Have thou then therefore no care of him from this time forth!' And he repeated these words a second time, and again a third.

"But when Anthemius heard that dreadful voice, he trembled from head to foot, and began at the same time to cry aloud, and to say, 'Give me back the writing! I am a Christian! I beseech thee, I adjure thee! I will be a Christian! Give me back the profession which I have wickedly written! But when the miserable man was proceeding thus to exclaim, the Prince said unto him, 'Never again mayst thou have this thy profession, which I shall produce in the terrible day of judgment. From this moment thou art mine, and I have thee in my power at will, unless an outrage be done to justice.' With these words he departed, leaving Anthemius. But Anthemius lay prostrate on his face upon the bridge till it was dawn, weeping and lamenting his condition. As soon as it was daylight he rose, and returned to his own house, where he remained weeping and lamenting, not knowing what he should do. Now there was another city, some eighteen miles off, where there was said to be a Bishop, who was a man of God. To him, therefore, he resolved to repair, that he might obtain his intercession, and having confessed the whole matter even as it had taken place, to be again by him baptized; for in his own city he was ashamed to confess what he had done. Having then cut off his hair, and clad himself in sackcloth, he departed, and came unto the Bishop, and having made himself known, was admitted to him, and threw himself at his feet, saying, 'I beseech thee, baptize me!' But the Bishop replied, 'Can I believe that thou hast not yet been baptized?' Then he, taking the Bishop apart, told him the whole matter, saying, 'I have indeed received baptism when I was a child, but having now renounced it in writing, behold I am unbaptized!' To which the Bishop replied, 'How camest thou persuaded that thou hast been unbaptized of the baptism which thou hast received?' Anthemius answered, 'In that unhappy hour when I wrote the abjuration of my Lord and Savior, and of his baptism, incontinently a profuse sweat burst out, even from the top of my head to the soles of my feet, so that my inner garments were wet therewith; and from that time I have believed of a truth, that even as I then abjured my baptism, so did it depart from me. Now, if thou canst, O venerable Father, help me, in compassion upon one who has thus voluntarily undone himself.' He said this prostrate on the ground, and bedewed with tears.

"When the man of God, the Bishop, heard this, he threw himself upon the ground, and lay there beside Anthemius, weeping and praying to the Lord. Then, after a long while, rising, he roused Anthemius, and said to him, 'Verily, son, I dare not again purify by baptism a man who hath been already baptized, for among Christians there is no second baptism, except of tears. Yet do not thou despair of thy salvation, nor of the divine mercy, but rather commit thyself to God, praying and humbly beseeching him for all the remainder of thy life; and God, who is good and merciful, may render back to thee the writing of thy abjuration, and moreover forgive thee that impiety, as he forgave the ten thousand talents to the debtor in the Gospel. Hope not to find a better way than this, for there is no other to be found.' He then being persuaded thus to do, and having obtained the Bishop's prayers, went his way, weeping and groaning for the sin which he had committed; and having returned home, he sold all his goods, and set at liberty all his people, both men servants and maid servants, giving them also of his possessions, and the rest of his goods he distributed to the churches, and to the poor, secretly, by the hand of a faithful servant. Moreover, he gave three pounds of gold to the mother of that Virgin, with the love of whom the Demon, to his own destruction, had inflamed him, having placed them in a certain church, saying, 'I beseech ye, pray to God for me a sinner: I shall never again trouble you, nor any other person; for I depart I know not whither, to bewail the wickedness of my deeds.' Thus this man did, — and from that time he was seen no more, casting himself wholly upon the mercy of God, to which none who hath betaken himself can perish.

"But we, who have heard the relation of this dreadful thing, praise the Almighty Lord our God, and adore the greatness of his works, that he hath protected the virgin Maria in her holy intention of leading a single life, and hath taken her mother out of poverty, affording liberally to them both for their support and maintenance, and hath delivered her also from the fear of sin, avoiding the transgression of the oath, which had passed between Maria the virgin and her enemy Anthemius, by annulling it. For the Lord brought these things to pass before the fifteen days, which were the appointed time between them, had elapsed. Wherefore we may say with the Evangelist, Our Lord hath done all things well. Nor hath he suffered the suppliant, who seeks him in penitence, to perish; for he saith, I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. Let us, therefore, continue to entreat him, that we may be protected by his Almighty hand, and may be delivered from all the devices of the Devil, and that, being aided by the prayers of the Saints, we may be worthy to attain the kingdom of Heaven. To the Lord our God belong all honor, and glory, and adoration, now and always, forever and ever. Amen."

The Greeks appear to have delighted in fictions of this peculiar kind. The most extravagant of such legends is that of St. Justina and St. Cyprian, which Martene and Durand present as a veritable history, censuring Bishop Fell for treating it as fabulous! It is much too long for insertion in this place, but it would be injured by abridging it. The reader may find it in the Thesaurus Novus Anecdotorum, t. iii. pp. 1618—1650. Calderon has taken it for the subject of his Magico Prodigioso.

It was the north of Heaven that Lucifer, according to grave authors, attempted to take by storm. En aver criado Dios con tanta hermosura el cielo y la tierra, quedo ordenada su celestial Corte de divinas Hierarquias; mas reynò tanto la ingratitud en uno de los Cortesanos, viendose tan lindo y bello, y en mas eminente lugar que los demas (segun Theodoro) que quiso emparejar con el Altissimo, y subir al Aquilon, formando para esto una quadrilla de sus confidentes y parciales.

With this sentence Fr. Marco de Guadalajara y Xavier begins his account of the Memorable Expulsion, y justissimo destierro de los Moriscos de España.

The marriage. — p. 538, col. 2.

The description of the marriage service is taken from Dr. King's work upon "the Rites and Ceremonies of the Greek Church in Russia." "In all the offices of the Greek Church," he says, "there is not perhaps a more curious service than this of matrimony, nor any which carries more genuine marks of antiquity; as from the bare perusal of it may be seen, at one view, most of the ceremonies which antiquarians have taken great pains to ascertain." It agrees very closely with the ritual given by Martene, De Antiquis Ecclesie Ritibus, t. ii. pp. 390—398.

In these ceremonies,

"The which do endless matrimony make," the parties are betrothed to each other "for their salvation," — "now and forever, even unto ages of ages."

"Formerly these crowns were garlands made of flowers or shrubs; but now there are generally in all churches crowns of silver, or other metals, kept for that purpose." — DR. KING'S Rites, &c. p. 232.

"A certain crown of flowers used in marriages," says the excellent Bishop Heber, (writing from the Caratic,) "has been denounced to me as a device of Satan! And a gentleman has just written to complain that the Danish Government of Tranquebar will not allow him to excommunicate some young persons for wearing masks, and acting, as it appears, in a Christmas mummerly, or at least in some private rustic theatricals. If this be heathenish, Heaven help the wicked! But I hope you will not suspect that I shall lend any countenance to this kind of ecclesiastical tyranny, or consent to men's consciences being burdened with restrictions so foreign to the cheerful spirit of the Gospel." — vol. iii. pp. 446.

Basil, of living men
The powerfulest in prayer. — p. 542, col. 2.

The most remarkable instance of St. Basil's power in prayer is to be found, not in either of his lives, the veracious or the apocryphal one, but in a very curious account of the opinions held by the Armenian Christians, as drawn up for the information of Pope Benedict XII., and inserted by Domenico Bernino in his Historia di tutte l'Heresia (Secolo xiv. cap. iv. t. iii. pp. 508—536.) It is there related that on the sixth day of the Creation, when the rebellious angels fell from heaven through that opening in the firmament which the Armenians call Arocca, and we the Galaxy, one unlucky angel, who had no participation in their sin, but seems to have been caught in the crowd, fell with them; and many others would in like manner have fallen by no fault of their own, if the Lord had not said unto them, Pax vobis. But this unfortunate angel was not restored till he obtained, it is not said how, the prayers of St. Basil; his condition meantime, from the sixth day of the Creation to the fourth century of the Christian era, must have been even more uncomfortable than that of Klopstock's repentant Devil. — p. 512, § 16.

Elcemon's penance. — p. 543, col. 1.

In the legend the penitent is left forty days and nights to contend with the Powers of Darkness in the Relic Chamber.

Captain Hall relates an amusing example of the manner in which penance may be managed at this time in Mexico.

"I went," he says, "to the Convent of La Cruz to visit a friend who was doing penance, not for a sin he had committed, but for one he was preparing to commit. The case was this: — Don N. had recently lost his wife, and, not choosing to live in solitude, looked about for another helpmate; and being of a disposition to take little trouble in such a research, or, probably, thinking that no labor could procure for him any one so suitable as what his own house afforded, he proposed the matter to his lately lamented wife's sister, who had lived in his house several years; and who, as he told me himself, was not only a very good sort of person, but one well acquainted with all the details of his household, known and esteemed by his children, and accustomed to his society.

"The church, however, looked exceedingly grave upon the occasion; not, however, as I at first supposed, from the nearness of the connection, or the shortness of the interval since the first wife's death, but because the intended lady had stood godmother to four of Don N.'s children. This, the church said, was a serious bar to the new alliance, which nothing could surmount but protracted penances and extensive charity. Don N. was urgent; and a council was assembled to deliberate on the matter. The learned body declared, after some discussion, the case to be a very knotty one; and that, as the lady had been four times godmother to Don N.'s children, it was impossible she could marry him. Nevertheless, the Fathers (compassionate persons!) wished to give the unhappy couple another chance; and agreed to refer the question to a learned doctor in the neighborhood, skilled in all difficult questions of casuistry. This sage person decided that, according to the canons of the church, the marriage might take place, on payment of a fine of four hundred dollars; two for the poor in pocket, and two for the poor in spirit; namely, the priests. But to expiate the crime of marrying a quadruple godmother, a slight penance must also be submitted to in the following manner. Don N. was to place himself on his knees before the altar, with a long wax candle burning in his hand, while his intended lady stood by his side holding another: this was to be repeated in the face of the congregation, for one hour, during every Sunday and fast-day throughout a whole year; after which purifying exposure, the parties were to be held eligible to proceed with the marriage. Don N., who chose rather to put his conscience than his knees to such discipline, took his own measures on the occasion. What these were, the idle public took the liberty of guessing broadly enough, but no one could say positively. At the end of a week, however, it was announced, that the case had undergone a careful re-examination, and that it had been deemed proper to commute the penance into one week's retirement from the world; that is to say, Don N. was to shut himself up in the Convent of La Cruz, there to fast and pray in solitude and silence for seven days. The manner in which this penance was performed is an appropriate commentary on the whole transaction. The penitent, aided and assisted by two or three of the jovial friars of the convent, passed the evening in discussing some capital wine, sent out for the occasion by Don N. himself, after eating a dinner, prepared by the cook of the convent, the best in New Galicia. As for silence and solitude, his romping boys and girls were with him during all the morning; besides a score of visitors, who strolled daily out of town as far as the convent, to keep up the poor man's spirits, by relating all the gossip which was afloat about his marriage, his penitence, and the wonderful kindness of the church." — CAPT. HALL'S Journal, vol. ii. pp. 210—214.

"I have read of a gentleman," says Bishop Taylor, "who, being on his death-bed, and his confessor searching and dressing his wounded soul, was found to be obliged to make restitution of a considerable sum of money, with the diminution of his estate. His confessor found him desirous to be saved, a lover of his religion, and yet to have a kindness for his estate, which he desired might be entirely transmitted to his beloved heir: he would serve God with all his heart, and repented him of his sin, of his rapine and injustice; he begged for pardon passionately, he humbly hoped for mercy, he resolved, in case he did recover, to live strictly, to love God, to reverence his priests, to be charitable to the poor; but to make restitution he found impossible to him, and he hoped the commandment would not require it of him, and desired to be relieved by an easy and a favorable interpretation; for it is ten thousand pities so many good actions and good purposes should be in vain, but it is worse, infinitely worse, if the man should perish. What should the confessor do in this case? — shall not the man be relieved, and his piety be accepted; or shall the rigor and severity of his confessor, and his scrupulous fears and impertinent niceness, cast away a soul either into future misery, or present discomfort? Neither one nor other was to be done; and the good man was only to consider what God had made necessary, not what the vices of his penitent and his present follies should make so. Well: the priest insists upon his first resolution, 'Non dimittitur peccatum, nisi restitatur ablatum;' the sick man could have no ease by the loss of a duty. The poor cleric desires the confessor to deal with his son, and try if he could be made willing that his father might go to heaven at charge of his son, which when he had attempted, he was answered with extreme rudeness and injurious language; which caused great trouble to the priest and to the dying father. At last the religious man found out this device, telling his penitent, that unless by corporal penances there could be made satisfaction in exchange of restitution, he knew no hopes; but because the profit of the estate, which was obliged to restitution, was to descend upon the son, he thought something might be hoped, if, by way of commutation, the son would hold his finger in a burning candle for a quarter of an hour. The glad father, being overjoyed at this loop-hole of eternity, this glimpse of heaven, and the certain retaining of the whole estate, called to his son, told him the condition and the advantages to them both, making no question but he would gladly undertake the penance. But the son with indignation replied, 'he would not endure so much torture to save the whole estate.' To which the priest, espying his advantage, made this quick return to the old man: — 'Sir, if your son will not, for a quarter of an hour, endure the pains of a burning finger to save your soul, will you, to save a portion of the estate for him, endure the flames of hell to eternal ages?' The unreasonableness of the odds, and the ungratefulness of the son, and the importunity of the priest, and the fear of hell, and the indispensable necessity of restitution, awakened the old man from his lethargy, and he bowed himself to the rule, made restitution, and had hopes of pardon and present comfort." — Works of JEREMY TAYLOR, vol. xiii. p. 38.

The penances which Indian fanatics voluntarily undertake and perform would be deemed impossible in Europe, if they had not been witnessed by so many persons of unquestionable authority. The penances which the Bramins enjoin are probably more severe than they would otherwise be, on this account, lest they should seem trifling in the eyes of a people accustomed to such exhibitions.

"If a Shoodru go to a Bramhnee of bad character, he must renounce life by casting himself into a large fire. If a Shoodru go to a Braminee of unsullied character, he must tie straw round the different parts of his body, and cast himself into the fire. The woman must be placed on an ass and led round the city, and then go the Great Way: the meaning of this is, she must wander to those sacred places of the Hindoos where the climate is exceedingly cold, and proceed till she actually perish with cold. This is a meritorious way of terminating life, and is mentioned as such in the Hindoo writings." — WARD, vol. i. p. 427.

Sometimes the law is frustrated by its own severity. "It is a dogma of general notoriety, that if a Jungum has the mischance to lose his Lingum, he ought not to survive the misfortune. Poornia, the present minister of Mysoor, relates an incident of a Ling-ayet friend of his, who had unhappily lost his portable god, and came to take a last farewell. The Indians, like more enlightened nations, readily laugh at the absurdities of every sect but their own, and Poornia gave him better counsel. It is a part of the ceremonial, preceding the sacrifice of the individual, that the principal persons of the sect should assemble on the banks of some holy stream, and placing in a basket the lingum images of the whole assembly, purify them in the sacred waters. The destined victim, in conformity to the advice of his friend, suddenly seized the basket, and overturned its contents into the rapid Caveri. 'Now, my friends,' said he, 'we are on equal terms: let us prepare to die together.' The discussion terminated according to expectation. The whole party took an oath of inviolable secrecy, and each privately provided himself with a new image of the lingum." — WILKS, vol. i. p. 506.

In 1790, when the Mahrattas were to have coöperated with Lord Cornwallis at Seringapatam, their general, Parasu Ram Bhao, became unclean from eating with a Bramin who had — kissed a cobbler's wife. There was no stream near holy enough to wash away the impurity; so he marched his whole immense army to the junction of the Tungba and the Badra. Major Moor, who was with him, says, "During this march, uncalled for in a military point of view, the army laid waste scores of towns and thousands of acres, — indeed, whole districts; we fought battles, stormed forts, destroyed a large army, and ran every military risk. Having reached the sacred place of junction, he washed, and having been made clean, was weighed against gold and silver; his weight was 16,000 pagodas, about 7000*l.*, which was given to the Bramins. They who had eaten with the Bramin at the same time, in like manner washed away the defilement; but the weighing is a ceremony peculiar to the great." — MOOR'S Hindu Infanticide, p. 231.

"The present king of Travancore has conquered, or carried war into all the countries which lay round his dominions, and lives in the continual exercise of his arms. To atone for the blood which he has spilt, the Brahmans persuaded him that it was necessary he should be born anew: this ceremony consisted in putting the prince into the body of a golden cow of immense value, where, after he had lain the time prescribed, he came out regenerated, and freed from all the crimes of his former life. The cow was afterwards cut up, and divided amongst the seers who had invented this extraordinary method for the remission of his sins." — ORME'S Fragments.

A far less expensive form was observed among the ancient Greeks, in cases wherein a second birth was deemed indispensable; "for in Greece they thought not those pure and clean who had been carried forth for dead to be interred, or whose sepulchre and funerals had been solemnized or prepared; neither were such allowed to frequent the company of others, nor suffered to come near unto their sacrifices. And there goeth a report of a certain man named Aristinus, one of those who had been possessed with this superstition; how he sent unto the oracle of Apollo at Delphos, for to make supplication and prayer unto the god, for to be delivered out of this perplexed anxiety that troubled him by occasion of the said custom, or law, then in force, and that the prophetess Pythia returned this answer: —

"Look whatsoever women do,
in childbed newly laid,
Unto their babes which they brought forth,
the very same, I say,
See that be done to thee again;
and after that be sure,

Unto the blessed Gods with hands to sacrifice, most pure.

"Which oracle thus delivered, Aristinus, having well pondered and considered, committed himself as an infant new born unto women, for to be washed, to be wrapped in swaddling clothes, and to be suckled with the breast-head: after which all such others, whom we call Hysteroptomous, that is to say, those whose graves were made as if they were dead, did the semblable. Howbeit some do say that, before Aristinus was born, these ceremonies were observed about these Hysteroptomoi, and that this was a right ancient custom kept in the semblable case." — PLUTARCH'S Morals, tr. by Philemon Holland, p. 852.

The lamps went out. — p. 543, col. 2.

There is the authority of a Holy Man, in the Romance of Merlin, — which is as good authority for such a fact as any thing in the Acta Sanctorum, — that the Devil, like other wild beasts who prowl about seeking what they may devour, is afraid of a light. The Holy Man's advice to a pious damsel is never to lie down in the dark: "garde que la ou tu coucheras il y ait toujours clarté, car le Diable hait toutes clercs choses; ne ne vient pas roulements ou il y a clarte." — vol. i. ff. 4.

And white is black, and black is white. — p. 547, col. 1.

Satan might have been reconciled to St. Basil's profession if he had understood, by his faculty of second-sight, that this, which it is sometimes the business of a lawyer to prove, would one day be the duty of the Romanists to believe, if their church were to tell them so. No less a personage than St. Ignatius Loyola has asserted this. In his Exercitia Spiritualia, the 13th of the Rules which are laid down ad sciendum cum Ecclesiâ, is in these words: —

"Denique, ut ipsi Ecclesiâ Catholicâ omnino unanimes, conformesque simus, si quid, quod oculis nostris apparet album, nigrum illa esse definerit, debemus itidem, quod nigrum sit, pronuntiare. Indubitate namque credendum est, eadem esse Domini nostri Jesu Christi, et Ecclesiâ orthodoxæ, sponsæ ejus, spiritum, per quem gubernamur ac dirigimur ad salutem; neque aliam esse Deum, qui olim tradidit Decalogi præcepta, et qui nunc temporis Ecclesiâ hierarchicam instruit atque regit." — p. 141. Antwerp, 1635.

Such is the implicit obedience enjoined in those Spiritual Exercises, of which Pope Paul III. said in his brief, sub annulo Piscatoris, "Omnia et singula in tuis contenta, ex certâ scientiâ nostrâ, approbamus, collaudamus, ac præsentis scripti patrocinio communitimus." The Romanists are to believe that black is white, if the Roman Church tells them so: morally and politically it has often told them so, and they have believed and acted accordingly.

At Elzéon's feet.* — p. 547, col. 2.

This is not the only miracle of this kind recorded of St. Basil.

"There was a certain woman of noble family, and born of rich parents, who was wholly made up of the vanities of this world, and beyond measure arrogant in all things; she, becoming a widow, wasted her substance shamelessly, living a loose and profligate life, doing none of those things which are enjoined by the Lord, but wallowing like a swine in the mire and filth of her iniquities. But being at length, by the will of God, brought to a consideration of her own estate, and her mind filled with consciousness of the immeasurable offences which she had committed, she called to remembrance the multitude of her sins, and bewailed them penitently, saying, 'Woe to me a sinner, how shall I render an account of the multitude of my sins! I have profaned a spiritual temple; I have defiled the soul which inhabiteth this body! Woe is me, woe is me! what have I done! what hath befallen me! Shall I say, like the Harlot or the Publican, that I have sinned? But no one has sinned like me! How, then, shall I be assured that God will receive my repentance?' While she meditated in herself upon these things, He, who would that all should be saved and brought back into the way of truth, and would have no one perish, was pleased to bring unto her remembrance all the sins which she had committed from her youth up. And she set down in writing all these offences, even all that she had committed from her youth to this her elder age; and, last of all, she set down one great and heinous sin, the worst of all; and having done this, she folded up the writing, and fastened it with lead. After this, having waited till a convenient season, when holy Basil was accustomed to go to the church that he might pray there, she ran before to meet him, and threw the writing at his feet, and prostrated herself before him, saying, 'O, holy man of God, have compassion upon me a sinner, yea, the vilest of sinners!' The most blessed man stopt thereat, and asked of her 'wherefore she thus groaned and lamented?' and she said unto him, 'Saint of God, see, I have set down all my sins and iniquities in this writing, and I have folded it, and fastened it with lead; do not thou, I charge thee, open it, but by thy powerful prayers blot out all that is written therein.' Then the great and holy Basil held up the writing, and, looking toward Heaven, said, 'O Lord, to Thee alone all the deeds of this woman are manifest! Thou hast taken away the sins of the world, and more easily mayst thou blot out those of this single soul. Before thee, indeed, all our offences are numbered; but thy mercy is infinite.' Saying thus, he went into the church, holding the aforesaid writing in his hand; and prostrating himself before the altar, there he remained through the night, and on the morrow, during the performance of all the masses which were celebrated there, entreating God for this woman's sake. And when she came to him, he gave her the writing, and said to her, 'Woman, hast thou heard that the remission of sins can come from God alone?' She answered, 'Yea, father; and therefore have I supplicated thee that thou shouldst intercede with that most merciful God in my behalf.' And then she opened the writing, and found that it was all blotted out, save only that the one great and most heinous sin still remained written there. Put she, seeing that this great sin was still legible as before, beat her breast, and began to bewail herself, and falling at his feet again, with many tears she said, 'Have compassion upon me, O Servant of the Most High, and as thou hast once exerted thyself in prayer for all my sins, and hast prevailed, so now intercede, as thou canst, that this offence also may be blotted out.' Thereat holy Basil wept for pity; and he said unto her, 'Woman, arise! I also am a sinner, and have myself need of forgiveness. He who hath blotted out thus much, hath granted thee remission of thy sins as far as hath to him seemed good; and God, who hath taken away the sins of the world, is able to take from thee this remaining sin also; and if thou wilt keep his commandments, and walk in His ways, thou shalt not only have forgiveness, but wilt also become worthy of glory. But go thou into the desert, and there thou wilt find a holy man, who is well known to all the holy fathers, and who is called Ephraim. Give thou this writing to him, and he will intercede for thee, and will prevail with the Lord.'

'The woman then commended herself to the holy Bishop's prayers, and hastened away into the desert, and performed a long journey therein. She came to the great and wonderful Hermit, who was called Ephraim by name, and knocking at his door, she cried aloud, saying, 'Have compassion on me, Saint of God, have compassion on me!' But he, having been forewarned in spirit concerning the errand on which she came, replied unto her, saying, 'Woman, depart, for I also am a man and a sinner, standing myself in need of an intercessor.' But she held out the writing, and said, 'The holy Archbishop Basil sent me to thee, that thou mightst intercede for me, and that therethrough the sin which is written herein might be blotted out. The other many sins holy Basil hath blotted out by his prayers: Saint of God, do not thou think it much to intercede with the Lord for me for this one sin, seeing that I am sent unto thee to that end.' But that confessor made answer, 'No, daughter! Could he obtain from the Lord the remission of so many other sins, and cannot he intercede and prevail for this single one? Go thy way back, therefore, and tarry not, that thou mayst find him before his soul be departed from his body.' Then the woman commended herself to the holy Confessor Ephraim, and returned to Casarea.

'But when she entered that city, she met the person who were bearing the body of St. Basil to burial; seeing which, she threw herself upon the ground, and began to cry aloud against the holy man, saying, 'Woe is me a sinner, woe is me a lost wretch, woe is me! O man of God, thou hast sent me into the desert, that thou mightst be rid of me, and not wearied more; and behold I am returned from my bootless journey, having gone over so great a way in vain! The Lord God see to this thing, and judge between me and thee, inasmuch as thou couldst have interceded with Him for me, and have prevailed, if thou hadst not sent me away to the desert.' Saying this, she threw the writing upon the bier whereon the body of holy Basil was borne, and related before the people all that passed between them. One of the clergy then desiring to know what this one sin was, took up the writing, and opened it, and found that it was clean blotted out: whereupon he cried with a loud voice unto the woman, and said, 'O woman, there is nothing written herein! Why dost thou consume thyself with so much labor and sorrow, not knowing the great things of God unto thee ward, and his inscrutable mercies?' Then the multitude of the people, seeing this glorious and great miracle, glorified God, who hath such power, that he remitteth the sins of all who are living, and giveth grace to his servants, that after their decease they should heal all sickness and all infirmity; and hath given unto them power for remitting all sins to those who preserve a right faith in the Lord, continuing in good works, and glorifying God and our Lord and Savior.' — Vita Patrum, pp. 159, 160.

'In the days of the blessed Theodemir, Bishop of Compostella, there was a certain Italian, who had hardly dared confess to his own Priest and Bishop a certain enormous crime which he had formerly committed. His Bishop having heard the confession, and being struck with astonishment and horror at so great an offence, dared not appoint what penance he should perform. Nevertheless, being moved with compassion, he sent the sinner with a schedule, in which the offence was written, to the Church of Santiago at Compostella, enjoining him that he should, with his whole heart, implore the aid of the blessed Apostle, and submit himself to the sentence of the Bishop of that Apostolical Church. He therefore, without delay, went to Santiago in Galicia, and there placed the schedule, which contained the statement of his crime, upon the venerable altar, repenting that he had committed so great a sin, and entreating forgiveness, with tears and sobs, from God and the Apostle. This was on Santiago's Day, being the eighth of the Kalends of August, and at the first hour.

'When the blessed Theodemir, Bishop of the See of Compostella, came attired in his pontificals to sing mass at the altar that day at the third hour, he found the schedule under the covering of the altar, and demanded forthwith, wherefore, and by whom it had been placed there. The Penitent upon this came forward, and on his knees declared, with many tears, before all the people, the crime which he had committed, and the injunctions which had been laid on him by his own Bishop. The holy Bishop then opened the schedule, and found nothing written therein; it appeared as if no letters had ever been inscribed there. A marvellous thing, and an exceeding joy, for which great praise and glory were incontinently rendered to God and the Apostle, the people all singing, 'This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes!' The holy Bishop then of a truth believing, that the penitent had obtained forgiveness with God through the merits of the Apostle, would impose upon him no other penance for the crime which he had committed, except that of keeping Friday as a fast from that time forth, and having absolved him from all his other sins, he dismissed him to his own country. Hence it may be inferred, that if any one shall truly repent, and, going from distant countries to Galicia, shall there, with his whole heart, entreat pardon from God, and pray for the aid of the blessed Santiago, the record of his misdeeds shall, without all doubt, be blotted out forever.' — Acta SS. Jul. t. vi. p. 48.

There is a miracle of the same kind related of St. Antonio, — and probably many other examples might be found.

THE
PILGRIM TO COMPOSTELLA;

BEING THE LEGEND OF A COCK AND A HEN,

TO THE HONOR AND GLORY OF SANTIAGO.

A CHRISTMAS TALE.

"Res similis fictæ; sed quid mihi fingere prodest."

OVID, Met. xiii. v. 935.

"Hear also no lean story of theirs!" — LIGHTFOOT.

The Legend, (for a genuine Legend it is,) which has been made the subject of the ensuing Ballad, is related by Bishop Patrick in his Parable of the Pilgrim. (ch. xxxv. pp. 430—434.) Udal ap Rhys relates it in his Tour through Spain and Portugal. (pp. 35—38.) Both these writers refer to Lucius Marineus Siculus as their authority. And it is told also in the Journal du Voyage d'Espagne, (Paris, 1669,) by a Conseiller who was attached to the French Embassy in that country. (p. 18.)

The story may likewise be found in the Acta Sanctorum. A duplicate of the principal miracle occurs in the third volume, for the month of May, (die 12^a, p. 171.) and is there ascribed to S. Domingo de la Calzada, the author, Luiz de la Vega, contending, that both relations are to be received as true, the Bollandist (Henschenius) contrariwise opining that they are distinct miracles, but leaving the reader nevertheless to determine freely for himself utrum id malit, an vero credere velit, unicum duntaxat esse quod sub quadam circumstantiarum varietate refertur ut geminum.

In the sixth volume of the same work, for the month of July, (die 25^a,) the legend of the Pilgrim is twice told, once (p. 45) as occurring to a native of Utrecht, (Cæsarius Heisterbachensis is the authority,) once as having befallen a German at Thoulouse, (p. 50;) the latter story is in the collection of Santiago's miracles, which Pope Calixtus II. is said to have compiled. The extract from Lucius Marineus Siculus may also be seen there. It is here annexed as it stands in the fifth book of that author's work de rebus Hispaniæ memorabilibus.

"In antiquissimâ civitate quam Sancti Dominici Calciatensis vulgus appellat, gallum vidimus et gallinam, qui dum vixerunt, cujus coloris fuissent ignoramus: postea vero cum jugulati fuissent et assi, candidissimi revixerunt, magnam Dei potentiam summumque miraculum referentes. Cujus rei veritas et ratio sic se habet. Vir quidam probus et amicus Dei, et uxor ejus, optima mulier, cum filio adolescentulo magnæ probitatis, ad Sanctum Jacobum Compostellam proficiscentes, in hanc urbem itineris labore defessi ingrediuntur, et quiescendi gratiâ restiterunt in domo cujusdam qui adultam filiam habebat. Quæ cum adolescentem pulchrâ facie vidisset, ejus amore captâ est. Et cum juvenis ab ea requisitus atque vezatus, ejus voto repugnasset, amorem convertit in odium, et ei nocere cupiens, tempore quo discedere volebant ejus cucullo crateram sui patris clam reposuit. Cumque peregrini mane discessissent, exclamavit puella coram parentibus crateram sibi fuisse subreptam. Quod audias Prætor satellites confestim misit, ut peregrinos reducerent. Qui cum venissent, puella conscia sui sceleris accessit ad juvenem et crateram eruit e cucullo. Quapropter comperto delicto, juvenis in campum productus iniquâ sententiâ et sine culpâ laquea suspensus est: miserique parentes cum filium deplorassent, postea discedentes Compostellam pervenerunt. Ubi solutis votis et Deo gratias agentes subiinde redeuntes ad locum pervenerunt, ubi filius erat suspensus, et mater multis perfusa lacrymis ad filium accessit, multâ desuadente morito.

Cumque filium suspiceret, dixit et filius, Mater meo noli fieri super me: ego enim vicus sum, quoniam Virgo Dei genitrix, et Sanctus Jacobus me sustinent et servant incolunt. Vade charissima mater ad judicem qui me falsò condemnavit, et dic ei me vivere propter innocentiam meam, ut me librari jubeat, tibi que restituat. Properat sollicita mater, et præ nimio gaudio fletus uberius, Prætorum convocat in mensâ sedentem, qui gallum et gallinam assos scindere volebat. 'Prætor, inquit, filius meus vivit; jube solvi, obsecro!' Quod cum audisset Prætor, existimans eum quod dicebat propter amorem matris somniasse, respondit subridens, 'quid hoc est, bona mulier? Ne fallaris! sic enim vivit filius tuus, ut vivunt hæ aves!' Et rix hoc dixerat cum gallus et gallina saltaverunt in mensâ, statimque gullus cantavit. Quod cum Prætor vidisset attonitus continuo egreditur, vocat sacerdotes, et citis, proficiscuntur ad juvenem suspensum: et invenierunt iaculum valdeque latantem, et paratibus restituit; domumque reversi gallum capiunt et gallinam, et in ecclesiam transferunt magnâ solemnitate. Quæ ibi clausæ res admirabiles et Dei potentiam testificantes observantur, ubi septennio vivunt; hunc enim terminum Deus illis instituit; et in fine septennii antequam moriantur, pullum relinquunt et pullam sui coloris et magnitudinis: et hoc fit in eâ ecclesiâ quolibet septennio. Mognæ quoque admirationis est, quod omnes per hanc urbem transcuntentes peregrini, qui sunt innumerabiles, galli hujus et golline plumam cupiunt, et nunquam illis plumæ deficiunt. Hoc ego testor, propterea quod vidi et interfui, plumamque mecum fero." — Rerum Hispanicarum Scriptores, l. ii. p. 805.

Luiz de la Vega agrees with Marineus Siculus in all the particulars of this perpetual miracle, except the latter; "sed scriptorem illum fictionis arguit, quod asserat, plumas galli et gallinæ, quæ quotidie peregrinis illac transeuntibus distribuuntur, prodigiose multiplicari: affirmat autem tamquam testis oculatus, in eâ ecclesiâ designatum esse quemdam clericum, qui plumas illos concecit et peregrinis distribuit; at negat continuum multiplicationis miraculum à Marino Siculo tam confidenter assertum, in eâ urbe videri, aut patri. Testis tamen probare nititur reliqua omnia prodigia esse vera, testaturque ad perpetuam rei memoriam in superiori ecclesiæ parte omnium oculis exponi idem patibulum, in quo peregrinus suspensus fuit." — Acta Sanctorum, Jul. t. vi. p. 46.

PRELUDE.

"TELL us a story, old Robin Gray!
This merry Christmas time;
We are all in our glory; so tell us a story,
Either in prose or in rhyme.

"Open your budget, old Robin Gray!
We very well know it is full:
Come! out with a murder, — a Goblin, — a Ghost,
Or a tale of a Cock and a Bull!"

"I have no tale of a Cock and a Bull,
My good little women and men;
But 'twill do as well, perhaps, if I tell
A tale of a Cock and a Hen."

INTRODUCTION.

You have all of you heard of St. James for Spain
As one of the Champions Seven,
Who, having been good Knights on Earth,
Became Hermits, and Saints in Heaven.

Their history once was in good repute,
And so it ought to be still;
Little friends, I dare say you have read it:
And if not, why, I hope you will.

Of this St. James that book proclaims
Great actions manifold ;
But more amazing are the things
Which of him in Spain are told ; —

How once a ship, of marble made,
Came sailing o'er the sea,
Wherein his headless corpse was laid,
Perfumed with sanctity ; —

And how, though then he had no head,
He afterwards had two,
Which both work'd miracles so well,
That it was not possible to tell
The false one from the true ; — *

And how he used to fight the Moors
Upon a milk-white charger :
Large tales of him the Spaniards tell,
Munchausen tells no larger.

But in their cause, of latter years,
He has not been so hearty ;
For that he never struck a stroke is plain,
When our Duke, in many a hard campaign,
Beat the French armies out of Spain,
And conquer'd Bonaparté.

Yet still they worship him in Spain,
And believe in him with might and main ;
Santiago there they call him ;
And if any one there should doubt these tales,
They've an Inquisition to maul him.

At Compostella, in his Church,
His body and one head
Have been, for some eight hundred years,
By Pilgrims visited.

Old scores might there be clean rubb'd off ;
And tickets there were given
To clear all toll-gates on the way
Between the Church-yard and Heaven.

Some went for payment of a vow
In time of trouble made ;
And some, who found that pilgrimage
Was a pleasant sort of trade ; —

And some, I trow, because it was Believed, as well as said,

* Whereby, my little friends, we see
That an original may sometimes be
No better than its fac simile ;
A useful truth I trow,
Which picture-buyers won't believe,
But which picture-dealers know.

Young Connoisseurs who will be,
Remember I say this —
For your benefit hereafter —
In a parenthesis.

And not to interrupt
The order of narration,
This warning shall be printed
By way of annotation.

That all, who in their mortal stage
Did not perform this pilgrimage,
Must make it when they were dead ; —

Some upon penance for their sins,
In person, or by attorney ;
And some who were or had been sick ;
And some who thought to cheat Old Nick ;
And some who liked the journey ;

Which well they might when ways were safe ;
And therefore rich and poor
Went in that age on pilgrimage,
As folks now make a tour.

The poor with scrip, the rich with purse,
They took their chance for better for worse,
From many a foreign land,
With a scallop-shell in the hat for badge,
And a Pilgrim's staff in hand.

Something there is, the which to leave
Untold would not be well,
Relating to the Pilgrim's staff,
And to the scallop-shell.

For the scallop shows, in a coat of arms,
That of the bearer's line
Some one, in former days, hath been
To Santiago's shrine.

And the staff was bored and drilled for those
Who on a flute could play ;
And thus the merry Pilgrim had
His music on the way.

THE LEGEND.

PART I.

ONCE on a time, three Pilgrims true,
Being Father, and Mother, and Son,
For pure devotion to the Saint,
This pilgrimage begun.

Their names, little friends, I am sorry to say,
In none of my books can I find ;
But the son, if you please, we'll call Pierre ;
What the parents were call'd, never mind.

From France they came, in which fair land
They were people of good renown ;
And they took up their lodging one night on the way
In La Calzada town.

Now, if poor Pilgrims they had been,
And had lodged in the Hospice instead of the Inn,
My good little women and men,
Why, then you never would have heard
This tale of the Cock and the Hen.

For the innkeepers they had a daughter,
Sad to say, who was just such another

As Potiphar's daughter, I think, would have been,
If she follow'd the ways of her mother.

This wicked woman to our Pierre
Behaved like Potiphar's wife ;
And, because she fail'd to win his love,
She resolved to take his life.

So she pack'd up a silver cup
In his wallet privily ;
And then, as soon as they were gone,
She raised a hue and cry.

The Pilgrims were overtaken ;
The people gather'd round ;
Their wallets were search'd, and in Pierre's
The silver cup was found.

They dragg'd him before the Alcajde ;
A hasty Judge was he ;
"The theft," he said, "was plain and proved,
And hang'd the thief must be."
So to the gallows our poor Pierre
Was hurried instantly.

If I should now relate
The piteous lamentation,
Which for their son these parents made,
My little friends, I am afraid
You'd weep at the relation.

But Pierre in Santiago still
His constant faith profess'd ;
When to the gallows he was led,
" 'Twas a short way to Heaven," he said,
"Though not the pleasantest."

And from their pilgrimage he charged
His parents not to cease,
Saying that, unless they promised this,
He could not be hang'd in peace.

They promised it with heavy hearts :
Pierre then, therewith content,
Was hang'd ; and they upon their way
To Compostella went.

PART II.

FOUR weeks they travell'd painfully ;
They paid their vows, and then
To La Calzada's fatal town
Did they come back again.

The Mother would not be withheld,
But go she must to see
Where her poor Pierre was left to hang
Upon the gallows tree.

Oh tale most marvellous to hear,
Most marvellous to tell !
Eight weeks had he been hanging there,
And yet was alive and well !

"Mother," said he, "I am glad you're return'd ;
It is time I should now be released :
Though I cannot complain that I'm tired,
And my neck does not ache in the least.

"The Sun has not scorch'd me by day ;
The Moon has not chill'd me by night ;
And the winds have but help'd me to swing,
As if in a dream of delight.

"Go you to the Alcajde,
That hasty Judge unjust ;
Tell him Santiago has saved me,
And take me down he must !"

Now, you must know the Alcajde,
Not thinking himself a great sinner,
Just then at table had sat down,
About to begin his dinner.

His knife was raised to carve,
The dish before him then ;
Two roasted fowls were laid therein ;
That very morning they had been
A Cock and his faithful Hen

In came the Mother wild with joy ;
"A miracle !" she cried ;
But that most hasty Judge unjust
Repell'd her in his pride.

"Think not," quoth he, "to tales like this
That I should give belief !
Santiago never would bestow
His miracles, full well I know,
On a Frenchman and a thief."

And pointing to the Fowls, o'er which
He held his ready knife,
"As easily might I believe
These birds should come to life !"

The good Saint would not let him thus
The Mother's true tale withstand ;
So up rose the Fowls in the dish,
And down dropp'd the knife from his hand.

The Cock would have crow'd if he could ;
To cackle the Hen had a wish ;
And they both slipp'd about in the gravy,
Before they got out of the dish.

And when each would have open'd its eyes,
For the purpose of looking about them,
They saw they had no eyes to open,
And that there was no seeing without them.

All this was to them a great wonder ;
They stagger'd and reel'd on the table ;
And either to guess where they were,
Or what was their plight, or how they came there,
Alas ! they were wholly unable ; —

Because, you must know, that that morning --
A thing which they thought very hard —

The Cook had cut off their heads,
And thrown them away in the yard.

The Hen would have prank'd up her feathers,
But plucking had sadly deform'd her ;
And for want of them she would have shiver'd with cold,
If the roasting she had had not warm'd her.

And the Cook felt exceedingly queer ;
He thought it a very odd thing
That his head and his voice were he did not know where,
And his gizzard tuck'd under his wing.

The gizzard got into its place,
But how, Santiago knows best ;
And so, by the help of the Saint,
Did the liver and all the rest.

The heads saw their way to the bodies ;
In they came from the yard without check,
And each took its own proper station,
To the very great joy of the neck.

And in flew the feathers, like snow in a shower,
For they all became white on the way ;
And the Cook and the Hen in a trice were reffedged,
And then who so happy as they ?

Cluck ! cluck ! cried the Hen right merrily then
The Cook his clarion blew ;
Full glad was he to hear again
His own cock-a-doo-del-doo !

PART III.

“ A MIRACLE ! a miracle ! ”
The people shouted, as they might well,
When the news went through the town ;
And every child, and woman, and man
Took up the cry, and away they ran
To see Pierre taken down.

They made a famous proession ;
My good little women and men,
Such a sight was never seen before,
And I think will never again.

Santiago's Image, large as life,
Went first with banners, and drum, and fife ;
And next, as was most meet,
The twice-born Cook and Hen were borne
Along the thronging street.

Perch'd on a cross-pole hoisted high,
They were raised in sight of the crowd ;
And, when the people set up a cry,
The Hen she cluck'd in sympathy,
And the Cook he crow'd aloud.

And because they very well knew for why
They were carried in such solemnity,

And saw the Saint and his banners before 'em,
They behaved with the greatest propriety,
And most correct decorum.

The Knife, which had cut off their heads that morn,
Still red with their innocent blood, was borne ;
The scullion boy he carried it ;
And the Skewers also made a part of the show,
With which they were truss'd for the spit.

The Cook in triumph bore that Spit
As high as he was able ;
And the Dish was display'd, wherein they were laid,
When they had been served at table.

With eager faith the crowd press'd round ;
There was a scramble of women and men
For who should dip a finger-tip
In the blessed Gravy then.

Next went the Alcayde, beating his breast,
Crying aloud, like a man distress'd,
And amazed at the loss of his dinner, “ Santiago, Santiago !
Have mercy on me a sinner ! ”

And lifting oftentimes his hands
Towards the Cook and Hen,
“ Orate pro nobis ! ” devoutly he cried ;
And as devoutly the people replied,
Whenever he said it, “ Amen ! ”

The Father and Mother were last in the train ;
Rejoicingly they came,
And extoll'd, with tears of gratitude,
Santiago's glorious name.

So, with all honors that might be,
They gently unhang'd Pierre ;
No hurt or harm had he sustain'd,
But, to make the wonder clear,
A deep, black halter-mark remain'd
Just under his left ear.

PART IV.

AND now, my little listening dears,
With open mouths and open ears,
Like a rhymor whose only art is
That of telling a plain, unvarnish'd tale,
To let you know, I must not fail,
What became of all the parties.

Pierre went on to Compostella
To finish his pilgrimage ;
His parents went back with him joyfully,
After which they return'd to their own country ;
And there, I believe, that all the three
Lived to a good old age.

For the gallows on which Pierre
So happily had swung,

It was resolved that never more
On it should man be hung.

To the Church it was transplanted,
As ancient books declare ;
And the people in commotion,
With an uproar of devotion,
Set it up for a relie there.

What became of the halter I know not,
Because the old books show not ;
But we may suppose and hope,
That the city presented Pierre
With that interesting rope.

For in his family — and this
The Corporation knew —
It rightly would be valued more
Than any cordon bleu.

The Innkeeper's wicked daughter
Confess'd what she had done ;
So they put her in a convent,
And she was made a Nun.

The Alceyde had been so frighten'd
That he never ate fowls again ;
And he always pull'd off his hat
When he saw a Cock and Hen.

Wherever he sat at table,
Not an egg might there be placed ;
And he never even muster'd courage for a custard,
Though garlic tempted him to taste
Of an omelet now and then.

But always, after such a transgression,
He hasten'd away to make confession ;
And not till he had confess'd,
And the Priest had absolved him, did he feel
His conscience and stomach at rest.

The twice-born Birds to the Pilgrim's Church,
As by miracle consecrated,
Were given ; and there unto the Saint
They were publicly dedicated.

At their dedication the Corporation
A fund for their keep supplied ;
And after following the Saint and his banners,
This Cock and Hen were so changed in their manners,
That the Priests were edified.

Gentle as any turtle-dove,
Saint Cock became all meekness and love ;
Most dutiful of wives,
Saint Hen she never peek'd again ;
So they led happy lives.

The ways of ordinary fowls
You must know they had clean forsaken ;
And if every Cock and Hen in Spain
Had their example taken,
Why, then — the Spaniards would have had
No eggs to eat with bacon.

These blessed Fowls, at seven years' end,
In the odor of sanctity died ;
They were carefully pluck'd, and then
They were buried, side by side.

And, lest the fact should be forgotten,
(Which would have been a pity,)
'Twas decreed, in honor of their worth,
That a Cock and Hen should be borne thenceforth
In the arms of that ancient City.

Two eggs Saint Hen had laid, no more ;
The chicken were her delight ;
A Cock and Hen they proved,
And both, like their parents, were virtuous and white.

The last act of the Holy Hen
Was to rear this precious brood ; and, when Saint Cock and she were dead,
This couple, as the lawful heirs,
Succeeded in their stead.

They also lived seven years ;
And they laid eggs but two,
From which two milk-white chicken
To Cock and Henhood grew ;
And always their posterity
The self-same course pursue.

Not one of these eggs ever addled,
(With wonder be it spoken !)
Not one of them ever was lost,
Not one of them ever was broken.

Saered they are ; neither magpie, nor rat,
Snake, weasel, nor marten approaching them ;
And woe to the irreverent wretch
Who should even dream of poaching them !

Thus, then, is this great miracle
Continued to this day ;
And to their Church all Pilgrims go,
When they are on the way ;
And some of the feathers are given them ;
For which they always pay.

No price is set upon them ;
And this leaves all persons at ease ;
The Poor give as much as they can,
The Rich as much as they please.

But that the more they give the better,
Is very well understood ;
Seeing whatever is thus disposed of
Is for their own souls' good ; —

For Santiago will always Befriend his true believers ;
And the money is for him, the Priests
Being only his receivers.

To make the miracle the more,
Of these feathers there is always store,
And all are genuine too ;

All of the original Cock and Hen,
Which the Priests will swear is true.

Thousands a thousand times told have bought them;
And if myriads and tens of myriads sought them,
They would still find some to buy;
For, however great were the demand,
So great would be the supply.

And if any of you, my small friends,
Should visit those parts, I dare say
You will bring away some of the feathers,
And think of old Robin Gray.

NOTES.

A ship of marble made. — p. 555, col. 1.

The marble ship I have not found any where except in Geddes, who must have found it in some version of the legend which has not fallen into my hands. But that the ship was made of marble I believe to be quite as true as any other part of the legend of Santiago. — Whether of marble or not, it was a miraculous ship which, without oars or sails, performed the voyage from Joppa to Iria Flava, now El Padron, in Galicia, in seven days.

Classical fables were still so passable when the Historia Compostelana was written, that the safe passage of this ship over the Syrtes, and between Scylla and Charybdis, is ascribed to the presiding hand of Providence. — España Sagrada, t. xx. p. 6.

How the body came to leave its head behind is a circumstance which has not been accounted for; and yet it requires explanation, because we are assured that Santiago took particular care not to part with his head, when it was cut off.

“At the moment,” says the Annalist of Galicia, “when the cruel executioner severed from its neck the precious head of the sacred Apostle, the body miraculously raised its hands and caught it, and in that posture it continued till night. The astonished Jews attempted to separate it, but in vain; for upon touching the venerable corpse, their arms became cold, as if frozen, and they remained without the use of them.” — Añales de Galicia, por El Doctor D. Francisco Xavier Manuel de la Huerta y Vega. — Santiago, 1733.

“*Cortada la cabeza no Dio en tierra,
Que por virtud de Dios, el con las manos,
Antes que cayra al suelo a si la aferra,
Que no pueden quitarsela tyranos.*” Christoval de Mesa: El Patron de España, ff. 62.

Perhaps his companions dropped it on their way to the coast, for the poet tells us they travelled in the dark, and in a hurry:

“*Cubiertos de la noche con el manto
Sin que ningun contrario los impida,
Mas presto que si fueran a galope,
Llecan el cuerpo a la ciudad de Jope.*” — Ib. ff. 65.

But according to the Historia Compostelana, (España Sagrada, t. xx. p. 6.) there is the testimony of Pope St. Leo, that the original head came with the body.

*And how, though then he had no head,
He afterwards had two.* — p. 555, col. 1.

This is a small allowance, and must be understood with reference to the two most authentic ones in that part of the world, — that at Braga, and one of the two at Compostella.

It is a common thing for Saints to be polycephalous; and Santiago is almost as great a pluralist in heads as St. John the Baptist has been made by the dealers in relics. There are some half dozen heads, and almost as many whole bodies ascribed to him, — all in good odor, all having worked miracles, and all, beyond a doubt, equally authentic.

And how he used to fight the Moors. — p. 555, col. 1.

Most appropriately therefore, according to P. Sautel, was he called Bounerges.

“*Conspicitur media cataphractus in aere ductor,
Qui dedit in trepidam barbara castra fugam.
Tam cito tam valide cur terga dederit phalanges?
Noairum Tonitru Filius ista patrat.*”

Annus Sacer Poeticus, vol. ii. p. 32.

— “siendo acá en España nuestro amparo y defensa en las guerras, mereció con razon este nombre: pues mas feroz que trueno ni rayo espantaba, confundia y desbarataba los grandes exercitos de los Moros.” — Morales, Coronica Gen. de España, l. ix. c. vii. § 4.

“*Vitoria Espana, vitoria, que tienes en tu defensa,
uno de los Doze Pares;
mas no de nacion Francesca.
Hijo es tuyo, y tantos mata que parece que su fuerza excede a la de la muerte
quando mas furiosa y presta.*”

Ledesma, Conceptos Espirituales, p. 242.

The Spanish Clergy had a powerful motive for propagating these fables; their Privilegio de los votos being one of the most gainful, as well as most impudent forgeries, that ever was committed.

“The two sons of Zebedee manifested,” says Morales, “their courage and great heart, and the faith which was strengthening in them, by their eagerness to revenge the injury done to their kinsman and master when the Samaritans would not receive him into their city. Then Santiago and St. John distinguished themselves from the other Apostles, by coming forward, and saying to our Savior, ‘Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from Heaven and consume them?’ It seems as if (according to the Castilian proverb concerning kinsmen) their blood boiled in them to kill and to destroy, because of the part which they had in his. But be not in such haste, O glorious Apostle Santiago, to shed the blood of others for Christ, your cousin-german! It will not be long before you will give it to him, and for him will give all your own. Let him first shed his for you, that, when yours shall be mingled with it by another new tie of spiritual relationship, and by a new friendship in martyrdom, it shall be more esteemed by him, and held in great account. Let the debt be well made out, that the payment may be the more due. Let the benefit be completed, that you may make the recompense under greater obligation, and with more will. Then will it be worth more, and manifest more gratitude. Learn meantime from your Master, that love is not shown in killing and destroying the souls of others for the beloved, but in mortifying and offering your own to death. This, which is the height and perfection of love, your Master will teach you, and thenceforth you will not content yourself with any thing less. And if you are desirous, for Christ’s sake, to smite and slay his enemies, have patience awhile, fierce Saint! (Santo feroz.) There will come a time when you shall wage war for your Master, sword in hand, and in your person shall slaughter myriads and myriads of Moors, his wicked enemies!” — Coronica General de España, l. ix. c. vii. § 8.

An old hymn, which was formerly used in the service of his day, likens this Apostle to — a Lion’s whelp!

“*Elvetus hic Apostolus
Decorus et amabilis,
Velut Leonis cotalus
Vicit bella certaminis.*” — Divi Tutelares, 229.

"Thirty-eight visible appearances," says the Padre Maestro Fray Felipe de la Gandara, Chronicler General of the Kingdom of Galicia, — "thirty-eight visible appearances, in as many different battles, aiding and favoring the Spaniards, are recounted by the very learned Don Miguel Erce Gimenez in his most erudite and laborious work upon the Preaching of Santiago in Spain; from which work the illustrissimus Doctor Don Antonio Calderon has collected them in his book upon the Excellencies of this Apostle. And I hold it for certain that his appearances have been many more; and that in every victory, which the Spaniards have achieved over their enemies, this their Great Captain has been present with his favor and intercession." — Armas i Triunfos del Reino de Galicia, p. 618.

The Chronista General proceeds to say that Galicia may be especially proud of its part in all these victories, the Saint having publicly prided himself upon his connection with that kingdom; for being asked in a battle once, who and what he was, (being a stranger,) he replied, "I am a Soldier, a Kinsman of the Eternal King, a Citizen and Inhabitant of Compostella, and my name is James." For this fact the Chronicler assures us that book of manuscript sermons, preached in Paris three centuries before his time by a Franciscan Friar, is sufficient authority: "es valiente autoridad!" — Armas i Triunfos del Reino de Galicia, p. 649.

... still they worship him in Spain,
And believe in him with might and main. — p. 555, col. 1.

— "calamo describi vix potest, aut verbis exprimi, quanta in Jacobum Apostolum Hispani amore feruntur, quam tenero pietatis sensu festos illius dies et memoriam celebrent; quam se suaque omnia illius fideli et clientela derocent; ipsius auspiciis bellicas expeditiones suscipere, et conficere soliti, et Jacobi nomine quasi tessera se milites illius esse profiteri. Cum pugnam incunt, ut sibi animos faciant et hostibus terrorem incutiunt, in primis, que vehementior esse soliti, impressione, illum vocem intonant, Sancte Jacobe, urge Hispania, hoc est, Santiago, cierra Hispania; militari se illi sacramenta adiciunt; et illustrissimo Equitum Ordine Jacobi nomine instituto, ejusque nomini sacro, cujus Rex ipse Catholicus Magnus Magister et Rector est; ejus se obsequiis dedicant et legibus adstringunt, ut nullius erga quemquam alium Sanctum Patronum gentis clariora ritent, quam Hispanica erga Jacobum amaris et religionis iudicia. Quam vero bene respondeat huic amari et pietati Apostolus cura, et sollicitudine Patris et Patroni, ex rebus à suis clientibus, ejus auxilio, præclarè gestis, satis constat, tum in ipsa Hispania, tum in utraque, ad Orientem et Occidentem Solem Indiã, Hispanorum et Lusitanorum armis subacta, et illarum opprã et industriã ubique locorum propagatã Christianã religione." — P. Ant. Macedo. Divi Tutelares Orbis Christiani, p. 228.

Santiago there they call him. — p. 555, col. 1.

"The true name of this Saint," says Ambrosio de Morales, "was Jacobo, (that is, according to the Spanish form,) taken with little difference from that of the Patriarch Jacob. A greater is that which we Spaniards have made, corrupting the word little by little, till it has become the very different one which we now use. From Santo Jacobo we shortened it, as we commonly do with proper names, and said Santo Jaco. We clipped it again after this abbreviation, and by taking away one letter, and changing another, made it into Santiago. The alteration did not stop here; but because Yago or Tiago by itself did not sound distinctly and well, we began to call it Diago, as may be seen in Spanish writings of two or three hundred years old. At last, having passed through all these mutations, we rested with Diego for the ordinary name, reserving that of Santiago when we speak of the Saint." — Coronica General de España, l. ix. c. vii. § 2.

Florez pursues the corruption further: "nombrandele por la voz latina Jacobus Apostolus con abreviacion y vulgaridad Jacobo Apostolo, ó Giacomo Postolo, ó Jae Apostol." — España Sagrada, t. xix. p. 71.

It has not been explained how Jack in this country was transferred from James to John.

The Prior Cayrasco de Figueroa assures us that St. James was a gentleman, his father Zebedee being

"*Varon de ilustre sangre y Galileo,
Puesto que usava el arte piscatoria,
Que entonces no era illicito, ni feo,
Ni aora en muchas partes menos gloria,
La gente principal tener oficio,
O por su menester, o su exercicio.*"

Templo Militante, p. iii. p. 83.

Morales also takes some pains to establish this point. Zebedee, he assures us, "era hombre principal, señor de un nacio, con que seguia la pesca;" and it is clear, he says, "como padre y hijos seguian este trato de la pesqueria honradamente, mas como señores que como oficiales!" — Coronica Gen. de España, l. ix. c. vii. § 3.

They're an Inquisition to maul him. — p. 555, col. 1.

Under the dominion of that atrocious Tribunal Ambrosio de Morales might truly say, "No one will dare deny that the body of the glorious Apostle is in the city which is named after him, and that it was brought thither, and afterwards discovered there by the great miracles," — of which he proceeds to give an account. "People have been burnt for less," — as a fellow at Leeds said the other day of a woman whom he suspected of bewitching him.

There is nothing of which the Spanish and Portuguese authors have boasted with greater complacency and pleasure than of the said Inquisition. A notable example of this is afforded in the following passage from the Templo Militante, Flores Santorum, y Triunfos de sus Virtudes, by D. Bartolome Cayrasco de Figueroa, Prior and Canon of the Cathedral Church of Grand Canary. (Lisbon, 1613.)

— "*gloriosa España,
Aunque de mucho puedes gloriarte,
No està en esso el rulo que te acompaña,
Sino en tener la Fè por estuandarte:
Por esta la provincia mas extraña,
Y todo el orbe teme de enajarte;
Por esta de tu nombre tiembla el mundo
Y el cavernosa Tartaro profundo.*"

"*Agradezco a Dios de cuya mano
Procede toda gracia, toda gloria;
Y despues del al Principe Christiano,
Philipo digno de immortal memoria:
Porque con su gobierno soberano,
Con su justicia, y su piedad notoria,
Estas assegurada, y defendida,
De todos los peligros desta vida.*"

"*Este gran Rey decora tu terreno
Con veynte y dos insignes fortalezas,
Cuyos fuertes Alcajdes ponen freno
A todas las tartaricas braxças:
Y con temor del malo, honor del bueno,
Castigan las malicias, y simplezas
De hercicas palabras y opiniones,
Que son las veynte y dos Inquisiciones.*"

"*De la Imperial Talèdo es la primera;
De la Real Sevilla la segunda,
De Cordova la ilustre la tercera,
La quarta de Granada la ficunda:
Tambien en Calahorra la vanderã
De la sograda Inquisicion se funda,
Y margaritas son desta corona,
Zaragoza, Valencia, Barcelona.*"

"*Tambien Valladolid aventajada:
Despues del gran incendio, en edificio;
Cuenca, Murcia, Llerena celebrada
En mucha antigüedad del Santo Oficio:
En Galicia assi raiasmo esta fundada
Torre deste santissimo exercicio,
En Exora, en Coimbra, en Udisipo,
Que ya la Lusitania es de Philipo.*"

"*Tambien Sicilia en esta viva peña
De la importante Inquisicion estriva;*"

*Y Gran Canaria en publica reseña
Los adversarios de la Fe derriba:
Las islas de Mallorca y de Cerdeña,
Y el gran Reyno que fue de Atabalipa,
Y la pastreca desta heroica sauva
Es la ciudad que fue de Moteczuma.*

“*Sobre estas fortalezas de importancia
Esta la general torre suprema,
Fundada sobre altissima constancia,
Cubierta de Catolica diadema:
De cuya soberana vigilancia,
Resplandeciente luz, virtud extrema,
Procede a las demas, la fuerza, el brio,
El Christiano valor, el poderio.*”

“*Estes pues son los celebres Castillos,
De la Fe verdaderos defensores,
Que con habitos rojos y amarillos,
Castigan los hereticos errores:
Y a los pechos Catolicos sencillos,
De la verdad Christiana zeladores,
Les dan el justo premio, honor devido,
De la virtud heroica mercedo.*”

The Poet proceeds to eulogize Santiago as having been the founder in Spain of that faith for the defence and promotion of which these two-and-twenty Castles were erected.

“*Pues si en el mundo es digno de memoria
El fundador de una ciudad terrena;
Y luego es celebrada en larga historia
El inventor de alguna cosa buena,
Que premio le daras? que honor? que gloria?
Felicet España, de virtudes llena,
Al que fue de la Fe que aqui refiero,
En tus Provincias fundador primero?*”

“*Razon será, que su memoria sea
En todo tu distrito eternizada,
Y que en aqueste Santoral se lea
(Aunque con debil pluma) celebrada:
Pues alto España, porque el mundo vea
Que puedes en la Fe mas que en la espada,
Da me atentos oydos entretanto
Que de tu Cavallero ilustre canto.*”

“*Oyganme los magnanimos guerreros
Que ponen freno al barbaro despecho,
Y en especial aquellos Cavalleros
Que adornan de su insinia roxa el pecho:
Veran que los blasones verdaderos
Se alcanzan, imitando en dicho y hecho
Al Español caudillo Santiago
Gran zelador del Agareno estrago.*”

*At Compostella, in his Church,
His body and one head
Have been, for some eight hundred years,
By Pilgrims visited. — p. 555, vol. 1.*

“*—— a visitar el cuerpo santo
Todo fiel Christiano la via toma:
Adonde viene peregrino tanto
Como a Jerusalem, y como a Roma,
Que a el de tierra y mar por los caminos
Vienen de todo el mundo peregrinos*”

“*Varia gente fiel, pueblo devoto,
El Santuario celebre frequenta,
Acude el casi naufrago piloto,
Libre de ia maritima tormenta:
Que del mar combatido hizo voto,
Teniendo de salvar el alma cuenta,
Que de la tempestad casi sin habla,
Con la vida salio sobre una tabla.*”

“*El cora del lugar propia se aleza
De una azemila o carro hecho carga,
Y representa su piadosa queza,
De aquella enfermedad proliza y larga:
Buelve en sus pies, y las muletas deca,
Y de alguna piadosa obra se encarga,
Gratificando con palabras santas,
Poder bolver sobre sus prapius plantas.*”

“*El que ya tuco vista, y no tiene ojos,
Al Templo viene del Apostol Diego,
Haze oracion, y postrase de hinojos,
Buelve con luz, aviendo entrado ciego:
Y ojos de cera dexa por despojos,
De que alcançó salud su humilde ruego,
Y en recompensa de la nueva vista,
Es del raro milagro coronista.*”

“*El que hablar no puede, aunque con lengua
Que subito accidente hizo mudo,
Pide remedio de su falta y mengua,
Con un sonido balbuciente y rudo:
Su devocion humilde su mal mengua,
Y pudiendo dezir lo que no puda,
Con nueva voz, y con palabras claras,
Haze gracias por dadivas tan raras.*”

“*Si aqueste viene de sus miembros manco,
Y aquel sordo del todo, otra contrecho,
Con todas el Apostol es tan franco,
Con su medio con Dios es de proeçho:
Cada qual con alegre habito blanco,
Buelve de su demanda satisfecho,
Dando buelta a su tierra los dolientes,
Sanos de enfermedades diferentes.*”

“*A quien de prision saca, ô cautiverio,
Remedia enfermos, muertos resucita,
Da a los desconsolados refrigerio,
Y diferentes aflicciones quita:
Sobre toda dolencia tiene imperio
La milagrosa fabrica bendita,
Libra de muerte en agua, en hierro, en fuego,
El cuerpo santo del Apostol Diego.*”

“*Da toda alma fiel gracias al cielo,
Que perdonado al pecador que yerra,
Para remedio suyo, y su consuelo,
Tal bien el Reyno de Galizia encierra:
Para que venga desde todo el suelo
A las postreras partes de la tierra,
Todo fiel Catolico Christiano,
A implorar el auxilio soberano.*”

Cristoval de Mesa, El Patron de España, ff. lxxii. p. 3.

The high altar at Compostella is, as all the altars formerly were in Galicia and Asturias, not close to the wall, but a little detached from it. It is ten feet in length, and very wide, with a splendid frontispiece of silver. The altar itself is hollow, and at the Gospel end there is a small door, never opened except to royal visitors, and when a new Archbishop first comes to take possession. It was opened for Ambrosio de Morales, because he was commissioned to inspect the churches: nothing, however, was to be seen within, except two large, flat stones, which formed the floor, and at the end of them a hole about the size of an orange, but filled with mortar. Below is the vault in which the body of Santiago is said to be deposited in the marble coffin wherein it was found. The vault extends under the altar and its steps, and some way back under the Capella Mayor: it is in fact a part of the Crypt walled off with a thick wall, para dexar cerrado del todo el santo cuerpo.

The Saint, whose real presence is thus carefully concealed, receives his pilgrims in effigy. The image is a half figure of stone, a little less than life, gilt and painted, holding in one hand a book, and as if giving a blessing with the other. Esta en cabello, without either crown or glory, on the head, but a large silver crown is suspended immediately above, almost so as to touch the head; and the last ceremony which a pilgrim performs is to ascend to the image, which is over the altar, by a staircase from the Epistle side, kiss it reverently on the head, embrace it, and place this crown upon it, and then go down on the Gospel side. — Vierge de Morales, t. xx. p. 151.

“*Ingens sub templo fornix, et claustra per umbras
Magna jacent, cæcæque domus, queis magna Jacobi
Ossa sepulchrali fama est in sede latere.
Nulli fas hominum sacramta insistere limen;
Est ridisse nefas, nec cundi pervius usus:
E loagè venum exorant atque oscula figunt
Limibus, rediuntque domos; variisque galeris
Jacobi effigies addunt, humerosque bacillis
Circumdant, conchisque super fulgentibus ornant.*”

PACIFICIS, lib. vii. p. 117.

The sepulchre was thus closed by the first Archbishop, D. Diego Gelmirez, “que ya de ninguna manera se puede ver, ni entenderse como está. Y esto hizo con prudentissimo consejo aquel gran Principe y valeroso Perlado, y con reverencia devota, porque cada uno no quisiese ver y tratar aquel precioso relicario comunmente, y sin el debido respeto; que se pierda sin duda quando los cuerpos santos y sus sepulturas pueden ser vistas vulgarmente de todos.” — MORALES, l. ix. c. vii. § 67.

A print of the sepulchre, from an illuminated drawing in the manuscript of the Historia Compostelana, is given in the 29th volume of the España Sagrada. And in that history (pp. 59, 51) is the following characteristic account of the enlargement of the altar by D. Diego Gelmirez.

“Among the other worthinesses, with the which the aforesaid Bishop in no inactive solicitude hastened to decorate his Church, we have been careful to defend from the death of oblivion whatsoever his restauratory hand did to the altar of the said Church. But, lest in bringing forward all singular circumstances we should wander into devious ways, we will direct our intention to the straight path, and commit to succeeding remembrance so far as our possibility may reveal those things which we beheld with our own eyes. For of how small dimensions the altar of Santiago formerly was, lest we should be supposed to diminish it in our relation, may better be collected from the measure of the altar itself. But as religion increased in the knowledge of the Christian faith, that another altar, a little larger than the other, was placed over it by those who were zealous for their holy faith, our ancient fathers have declared unto us as well by faithful words, as by the assured testimony of writings. But the aforesaid Bishop being vehemently desirous of increasing the beauty of his Church, and seeing that this little altar, though thus enlarged, was altogether unworthy of so great an Apostle, thought it worthy of pious consideration to aggrandize the Apostolical altar. Wherefore, being confirmed thereunto by the prudent counsel of religious men, although the Canons stoutly resisted him in this matter, he declared his determination to demolish the habitacle which was made in the likeness of the sepulchre below, in which sepulchre we learn, without all doubt, that the remains of the most holy Apostle are enclosed. They indeed repeatedly asserted that a work which, rude and deformed as it was, was nevertheless edified in honor to the remains of such holy personages, ought by no means to be destroyed, lest they themselves or their lord should be stricken with lightning from heaven, and suffer the immediate punishment of such audacity. But he, like a strenuous soldier, protected with the impenetrable shield of a good resolution, forasmuch as, with the eye of his penetration, he perceived that they regarded external things more than inner ones, trampled upon their fears with the foot of his right intention, and levelled to the ground their habitacle, and enlarged the altar, which had originally been so small a one, now for the third time, with marble placed over and about it on all sides, making it as it ought to be. Without delay also he marvellously began a silver frontispiece for this egregious and excellent work, and more marvellously completed it.”

There used to be interpreters at Compostella for all languages; lenguageros they were called. They had a silver wand, with a hand and finger pointed at the top, to show the relics with. Among those relics is the head of St. James the Less; a grinder, in a splendid gold reliquary, of one St. James, it has not been determined which; one of St. Christopher's arms, of modest dimensions; and seven heads of the Eleven Thousand Virgins. These are from the list which Morales gives; but that good and learned man, who often swallowed the bull and stuck at the tail, omits some more curious ones, which are noticed in an authentic inventory. (España Sagrada, t. xix. p. 344.) Among these are part of our Lord's raiment, of the earth on which he stood, of the bread which he brake, of his blood, and of the Virgin's milk.

A late editor of Old Fortunatus is reminded in one of his notes of Martinus Scriblerus, by a passage in the play, which, as he should have seen, is evidently allusive to such relics as those at Compostella.

“there can I show thee
The ball of gold that set all Troy on fire:
There shalt thou see the scarf of Cupid's mother,
Snatch'd from the soft moist ivory of her arm
To wrap about Adonis' wounded thigh:
There shalt thou see a wheel of Titan's ear,
Which dropp'd from Heaven when Phaeton fired the world.
I'll give thee — the fan of Proserpine,
Which, in reward for a sweet Thracian song,
The black-brow'd Empress threw to Orpheus,
Being come to fetch Eurydice from hell.”

..... all who in their mortal stage

Did not perform this pilgrimage,

Must make it when they were dead. — p. 555, col. 2.

“*Hæc Lysia propinant urbes, huc gentes Iberæ

Fray Lays de Escobar has this among the five hundred proverbs of his Litany: —

— el camino a la muerte es como el de Santiago.

Las quatrocientas, &c. ff. 140.

It seems to allude to this superstition, meaning, that it is a journey which all must take. The particular part of the pilgrimage, which must be performed either in ghost or in person, is that of crawling through a hole in the rock at El Padron, which the Apostle is said to have made with his staff. In allusion to this part of the pilgrimage, which is not deemed so indispensable at Compostella as at Padron, they have this proverb — Quien va à Santiago, y non va à Padron, ó faz Romeria ó non. The pilgrim, indeed, must be incurious who would not extend his journey thither; a copious fountain, of the coldest and finest water which Morales tasted in Galicia, rises under the high altar, but on the outside of the church; the pilgrims drink of it, and wash in its waters, as the Apostle is said to have done: they ascend the steps in the rock upon their knees, and finally perform the passage which must be made by all: “y cierto, considerado el sitio, y la hermosa vista que de allí hay à la ciudad, que estaba abaxo en lo llano, y à toda la ancha hoya llena de grandes arboledas y frescuras de mas de dos leguas en largo, lugar es aparejado para mucha contemplacion.” — Vierge de Morales, p. 174.

One of Pantagruel's Questions Écypétiques is, “Utrum le noir Scorpion pourroit souffrir solution de continuité en sa substance, et par l'effusion de son sang abscurcir et embrunir la voye lactée, au grand interest et dommage des Lifrelofres Jacobipetes.” — RABELAIS, t. ii. p. 417.

The scallop-shell. — p. 555, col. 2.

“The scallops, being denominated by ancient authors the Shells of Gales, or Galicia, plainly apply to this pilgrimage in particular.” — Fosbrooke, British Monachism, p. 423.

Fuller is therefore mistaken when, speaking of the Daeres family, (Church Hist. cent. xii. p. 42,) who gave their arms gules, three scallop-shells argent, he says, "which scallop-shells, (I mean the nethermost of them, because most concave and capacious,) smooth within, and artificially plated without, was oftentimes cup and dish to the pilgrims in Palestine, and thereupon their arms often charged therewith."

That the scallop belonged exclusively to the Compostella pilgrim is certain, as the following miracle may show.

"The ship, in which the body of the Apostle was embarked, passed swiftly by a village in Portugal called Bonzas, wherein there dwelt a noble and powerful lord, who on that day married one of his daughters to the son of another person as considerable as himself, lord of the land of Amaya. The nuptials were celebrated in the village of Bonzas, and many noble knights of that province came to the solemnity. One of their sports was that of throwing the cane, and in this the bridegroom chose to bear a part, commanding a troop, that he might display his dexterity. The place for the sport was on the coast of the ocean, and the bridegroom's horse, becoming ungovernable, plunged into the sea, and sunk under the immensity of its waters, and, at the moment when the ship was passing by, rose again close beside it. There were several miracles in this case. The first was, that the sea bore upon its waves the horse and horseman, as if it had been firm land, after not having drowned them when they were so long a time under water. The second was, that the wind, which was driving the ship in full speed to its port, suddenly fell, and left it motionless; the third, and most remarkable, was, that both the garments of the knight, and the trappings of the horse, came out of the sea covered with scallop-shells.

"The knight, astonished at such an unexpected adventure, and seeing the disciples of the Apostle, who with equal astonishment were looking at him from the ship, asked them what it was that had brought him where he found himself. To which the disciples, being inspired by Heaven, replied, 'that certes Christ, through the merit of a certain servant of his, whose body they were transporting in that ship, had chosen to manifest his power upon him, for his good, by means of this miracle.' The knight then humbly requested them to tell him who Christ was, and who was that servant of his of whom they spake, and what was the good which he was to derive. The disciples then briefly catechized him; and the knight, having thus been instructed, said to them, 'Friends and Sirs, you, who have served Christ and his holy Apostle, which I as yet have not done, ask of him to show you for what purpose he has put these scallop shells upon me, because so strange a marvel cannot have been wrought without some great mystery.' With that the disciples made their prayer accordingly, and, when they had prayed, they heard a voice from Heaven, which said thus unto the knight, 'Our Lord Christ has thought good to show by this act all persons present and to come, who may choose to love and serve this his servant, and who shall go to visit him where he shall be interred, that they take with them from thence other such scallop-shells as these with which thou art covered, as a seal of privilege, confirming that they are his, and will be so from that time forward: and he promises that afterwards, in the Day of the last Judgment, they shall be recognized of God for his; and that, because of the honors which they have done to this his servant and friend, in going to visit him and to venerate him, he will receive them into his glory and his Paradise.'

"When the knight heard these words, immediately he made the disciples baptize him; and while they were so doing, he noticed, with devotion and attention, the ceremonies of the sacred ministry, and, when it was done, he took his leave of them, commending himself to their grace, and entreating of them that they would commend him in their prayers to Christ and his Apostle Santiago. At that instant the wind, which till then had been still, struck the sails, and the ship began to cleave the wide sea. The knight then directed his course toward the shore, riding upon the water, in sight of the great multitude, which from the shore was watching him; and when he reached the shore, and was surrounded by them, he related to them what had happened. The natives, astonished at the sight of such stupendous miracles, were converted, and the knight, with his own hand, baptized his bride."

The facts are thus related, to the letter, in the Sanctorum Portugues, from whence the Breviaries of Alcobaca and St.

Cucufate copied it, and that of Oviedo in the Hymn for the Apostle's Day,—from which authorities the moderns have taken it. The Genealogists say that the Vieyras of Portugal are descended from this knight, because the scallop is called by that name in their tongue, and that family bear it in their arms. The Pimenteles make the same pretensions, and also bear four scallops in their shield. The Ribadaneyras also advance a similar claim, and they bear a cross with five scallops.

"This is the origin of the shells with which the pilgrims, who come to visit the body of our glorious Patron, adorn themselves, the custom having, without doubt, been preserved by tradition from that time. The circumstances are confirmed by pictures representing it, which from ancient times have been preserved in various cities. In the Church of St. Maria de Araceli at Rome, on the Gospel side, there is a spacious chapel, dedicated to our glorious Patron; it was painted in the year 1441, and in one compartment this adventure is represented: there is the ship, having the body of the Apostle on the poop, and the seven Disciples on board: close to the ship, upon the sea, is a knight upon a black horse, with a red saddle and trappings, both covered with scallop-shells. The same story is painted in the parish church of Santiago at Madrid: and it is related in a very ancient manuscript, which is preserved in the library of the Monastery of St. Juan de los Reyes, at Toledo. In the Ancient Breviary of the Holy Church of Oviedo, mention is made of this prodigy in these verses, upon the vesper of the glorious Saint:—

*'Cunctis mare cernentibus,
Sed a profundo ducitur,
Natus Regis submergitur
Totus plenus conchilibus.'*

Finally, the fact is authenticated by their Holinesses Alexander III., Gregory IX., and Clement V., who in their Bulls grant a faculty to the Archbishop of Compostella, that they may excommunicate those who sell these shells to pilgrims any where except in the city of Santiago, and they assign this reason, because the shells are the badge of the Apostle Santiago. And thus in the Church of St. Clement at Rome, which is enriched with the body of St. Clement, Pope and Martyr, is a picture of the Apostle Santiago, apparently more than five hundred years old, which is adorned with scallop-shells on the garment and hat, as his proper badge."—Enñales de Galicia, vol. i. pp. 95, 96.

Gwillim, in his account of this bearing, says nothing of its origin. But he says, "The Escallop (according to Dioscorides) is engendered of the Dew and Air, and hath no blood at all in itself, notwithstanding in man's body of any other food it turneth soonest into blood. The eating of this fish raw is said to cure a snuff. Such (he adds) is the beautiful shape that nature hath bestowed upon this shell, as that the Collar of the Order of St. Michel in France, in the first institution thereof, was richly garnished with certain pieces of gold artificially wrought, as near as the artificer could by imitation express the stamp of nature."—Display of Heraldry, p. 171, (first edit.)

One of the three manners in which Santiago is commonly represented, is in the costume of a Compostellan pilgrim, with a scallop-shell in his hat. All three are described in a book, as rare of occurrence as curious in its subject, thus entitled, PICTOR CHRISTIANUS ERUDITUS: Sive, de Erroribus, qui passim admittuntur circa pingendas atque effingendas Sacras Imagines. Libri Octo cum Appendice. Opus Sacre Scripturae, atque Ecclesiasticae Historiae studiosis non inutile. Authore R. P. M. Fr. Joanne Interian de Ayala, Sacri, Regii, ac Militaris Ordinis Beate Mariae de Mercede Redemptionis Captivorum, Salmaticensis Academiae Doctore Theologo, atque ibidem Sacrae Theologiae cum sacrarum Linguarum interpretatione Professore jam pridem emerito. Anno D. 1730, MATRITI: Ex Typographia Conventus praefati Ordinis. fol.

One of the Censors of this book says, prodit in lucem Pictor Christianus eruditissimi pectoris eruditissimi fatus, obstetricante N. RR. P. M. Fr. Josepho Campazano de la Vega. The work was published by the Master's direction at the cost of the Order; the Master dedicated it to N. Señora de las Mercedes us elaboratum ex cultumque quantum potuit, by her assistance; and there is a censo prefixed by Ferreras the Historian, speaking forcibly of the importance of the undertaking, and of the great ability with which it is executed.

Instead of perceiving that Santiago is represented in the costume of his own pilgrims, this author supposed that the Saint is so attired because he had travelled over Spain! The whole passage is curious for its grave and cool credulity. "*Sonctus Jacobus Zebediæ filius, Hispaniæ primarius (quidquid alii commenti sint) Patronus atque Apostolus, bifuriam sapius a Pictoribus describitur. Pingitur enim peregrini habitu, oblongo inuicis baculo, ex quo etiam bursa pendat, et circa humeros amiculo, quod Hispani Esclavinam vocant; insuper et cum galero satis amplo, quem tamen ornant couchæ, quæ circa latus maris passim se afficiunt; Totum id ex eo arbitror proficisci, quod Hispaniam celerimè, et ut decebat Tonitru filium, peragraverat; ubi postmodum corpus ejus è Hierosolymis translatum condigno honore colitur. Sed ad altis etiam cum gladio pingitur, cumque libro aperto. .... the staff was bored and drilled for those Who on a flute could play. — p. 555, col. 2.

Sir John Hawkins says, "that the pilgrims to St. James of Compostella excavated a staff, or walking-stick, into a musical instrument for recreation on their journey." — History of Music, vol. iv. p. 139, quoted in Fosbrooke's British Monachism, p. 469. Mr. Fosbrooke thinks that "this ascription of the invention of the Bourdon to these pilgrims in particular is very questionable." Sir John probably supposed, with Richelet, that the Bourdon was peculiar to these pilgrims, and therefore that they had invented it.

Mr. Fosbrooke more than doubts the Etymon from a musical use. "The barbarous Greek Bopôvta," he observes, "signified a beast of burden, and the Bourdon was a staff of support. But the various meanings of the word, as given by Cotgrave, make out its history satisfactorily. Bourdon, a drone, or dorre-bee, (Richelet says grosse mouche, ennemie des abeilles,) also the humming or buzzing of bees; also the drone of a bagpipe; also a pilgrim's staff; also a walking-staff, having a sword, &c. within it.

"It was doubtless applied to the use of pitching the note, or accompanying the songs which pilgrims used to recreate themselves on their journeys, and supposed by Menestrier to be hymns and canticles." — Fosbrooke, p. 422.

In Germany, "walking-sticks that serve as tubes for pipes, with a compressing pump at one end to make a fire, and a machine at the other for impaling insects without destroying their beauty, are common." (Hodgkins's Travels, vol. ii. p. 135.) I have seen a telescope and a barometer in a walking-stick, if that name may be applied to a staff of copper.

The twice-born Cock and Hen. — p. 557, col. 1.

There is another story of a bird among the miracles of Santiago; the poor subject of the miracle was not so fortunate as the Cock and Hen of the Alcaide; but the story is true. It occurred in Italy; and the Spanish fable is not more characteristic of the fraudulent practices carried on in the Romish Church, than the Italian story is of the pitiable superstition which such frauds fostered, and which was, and is to this day, encouraged by the dignitaries of that church.

At the request of St. Atto, Bishop of Pisjota, the Pisjotans say that some relics, taken from Santiago's most precious head, were given to their church by the Archbishop of Compostella, Diego Gelmirez, a person well known in Spanish history. "Nullus unquam mortalium hoc donum impetrare posset," he affirmed, when he made the gift; and the historian of the translator adds, "quod verè a Domini factum credimus et non dubitamus, sicut manifestis et apertis indicibus manifestè et aperte miracula declarabant." There is a good collection of these miracles, but this of the Bird is the most remarkable.

"In those days," says the writer, "another miracle, as pious as it is glorious, was wrought by the Lord, in the which he who worthily perpend it will perceive what may pertain to the edification of all those who visit the shrine of Santiago, and of all faithful Christians. About three weeks after the consecration of Santiago's altar, a certain girl of the country near Pistoja was plucking hemp in a garden, when she observed a pigeon flying through the air, which came near her, and alighted: upon which she put up a prayer to the Lord Santiago, saying, 'O Lord Santiago, if the things which are related of thee at Pistoja be true, and thou workest miracles, as the Pistoians affirm, give me this pigeon, that it may come into my hands!' Forthwith the pigeon rose from the spot where it had alighted, and, as if it were a tame bird, came to her, and she took it in her hands, and held it there as if it had been lifeless. What then did the girl do? She carried it home, showed it to her father, and to him and the rest of the family related in what manner it had come to her hands. Some of them said, 'Let us kill and eat it;' others said, 'Do not hurt it, but let it go.' So the girl opened her hand, to see what it would do. The pigeon, finding itself at liberty, fled to the ground, and joined the poultry which were then picking up their food, nor did it afterwards go from the house, but remained in their company, as if it belonged to them.

"All therefore regarding, with no common wonder, the remarkable tameness of this pigeon, which indeed was not a tame bird, but a wild one, they went to a priest in the adjacent city, and acquainted him with the circumstances. The priest, giving good counsel to the girl and her father, as he was bound to do, said, 'We will go together to our Lord the Bishop, on Sunday, and act as he may think proper to direct us in this matter.' Accordingly, on the Sunday they went to Pistoja, and presented the pigeon to the Bishop, who, with his Canons, was then devoutly celebrating mass in honor of Santiago, upon the holy altar which had been consecrated to his honor. The prelate, when he had listened to their story, took the bird, and placed it upon the wall of the chancel, which is round about the altar of Santiago, and there it remained three weeks, never departing from thence, excepting that sometimes, and that very seldom, it flew about the church, but always returned without delay to its own station, and there mildly, gently, harmlessly, and tamely continued; and rarely did it take food.

"But people from Lueca, and other strangers, plucked feathers from its neck, that they might carry them away for devotion, and, moreover, that they might exhibit them to those who had not seen the bird itself. From such injuries it never attempted to defend itself, though its neck was skinned by this plucking, and this the unthinking people continued to do, till at length the pigeon paid the debt of nature. And it was no wonder that it died; for how could any creature live that scarcely ever ate or slept? People came thither night and day from all parts, and one after another disturbed it, and every night vigils were kept there, the clergy and the people with loud voices singing praises to the Lord, and many lights were continually burning there: how, therefore, could it live, when it was never allowed to be at rest? The clergy and people, grieving at its death, as indeed it was a thing to be lamented, took counsel, and hung up the skin and feathers to be seen there by all comers.

"In such and so great a matter, what could be more gratifying, what more convenient than this wonderful sign which the Almighty was pleased to give us? There is no need to relate any thing more concerning the aforesaid pigeon; it was seen there openly and publicly by all comers, so that not only the laity and clergy of that city, but many religious people from other parts, abbots, friars, clergy, and laity, are able to attest the truth. And I also add this my testimony as a true and faithful witness, for I saw the pigeon myself for a whole week, and actually touched it with my own hands."

* Molan. lib. iii. c. 26.

† In festo Translat. ejusdem. 30 Dec.

There is a postscript to this story, as melancholy as the tale itself. The sick, and the crippled, and the lame, had been brought to this church, in expectation of obtaining a miraculous cure by virtue of the new relics which had arrived. Among these was a poor woman in the last stage of disease, who had been brought upon her pallet into the church, and was laid in a corner, and left there; nor was it observed that this poor creature was in articulo mortis, till the pigeon flew to the place, and alighted upon her, and so drew the attention of the people in the church to the dying woman, quam quidem, prout credimus, nisi columba monstrasset, nemo morientem vidisset. They removed her out of the church just before she breathed her last; and, in consequence of this miracle, as it was deemed, they gave her an honorable funeral. — Acta Sanctorum, Jul. t. vi. p. 64.

*What became of the halter, I know not,
Because the old books show not.* — p. 558, col. 1.

*"Antigüedad sagrada, el que se arriedra
De te, sera su verso fulto y manco."*

So Christoval de Mesa observes, when he proceeds to relate how the rude stone, upon which the disciples of Santiago laid his body, when they landed with it in Spain, formed itself into a sepulchre of white marble. — El Patron de España, ff. 68.

PREFACE.

SEVERAL years ago, in the Introduction of my "Letters to Mr. Charles Butler, vindicating the Book of the Church," I had occasion to state that, while a school-boy at Westminster, I had formed an intention of exhibiting the most remarkable forms of Mythology which have at any time obtained among mankind, by making each the groundwork of a narrative poem. The performance, as might be expected, fell far short of the design, and yet it proved something more than a dream of juvenile ambition.

I began with the Mahomedan religion, as being that with which I was then best acquainted myself, and of which every one who had read the Arabian Nights' Entertainments possessed all the knowledge necessary for readily understanding and entering into the intent and spirit of the poem. Mr. Wilberforce thought that I had conveyed in it a very false impression of that religion, and that the moral sublimity which he admired in it was owing to this flattering misrepresentation. But Thalaba the Destroyer was professedly an Arabian Tale. The design required that I should bring into view the best features of that system of belief and worship which had been developed under the Covenant with Ishmael, placing in the most favorable light the morality of the Koran, and what the least corrupted of the Mahomedans retain of the patriarchal faith. It would have been altogether incongruous to have touched upon the abominations engrafted upon it; first by the false Prophet himself, who appears to have been far more remarkable for audacious profligacy than for any intellectual endowments, and afterwards by the spirit of Oriental despotism which accompanied Mahomedanism wherever it was established.

Heathen Mythologies have generally been represented by Christian poets as the work of the Devil and his Angels; and the machinery derived from them was thus rendered credible, according to what was during many ages a received opinion. The plan upon which I proceeded in Madoc was to produce the effect of machinery as far as was consistent with the character of the poem, by representing the most remarkable religion of the New World such as it was, a system of atrocious priest-craft. It was not here, as in Thalaba, the foundation of the poem, but, as usual in what are called epic poems, only incidentally connected with it.

When I took up, for my next subject, that mythology which Sir William Jones had been the first to introduce into English poetry, I soon perceived that the best mode of treating it would be to construct a story altogether mythological. In what form to compose it was then to be determined. No such question had arisen concerning any of my former poems. I should never for a moment have thought of any other measure than blank verse for Joan of Arc, and for Madoc, and afterwards for Roderick. The reason why the irregular, rhymeless lyrics of Dr. Sayers were preferred for Thalaba was, that the freedom and variety of such verse were suited to the story. Indeed, of all the laudatory criticisms with which I have been favored during a long literary life, none ever gratified me more than that of Henry Kirke White upon this occasion, when he observed, that if any other known measure had been adopted, the poem would have been deprived of half its beauty, and all its propriety. And when he added, that the author never seemed to inquire how other men would treat a subject, or what might be the fashion of the times, but took that course which his own sense of fitness pointed out, I could not have desired more appropriate commendation.

The same sense of fitness which made me choose for an Arabian tale the simplest and easiest form of verse, induced me to take a different course in an Indian poem. It appeared to me, that here neither the tone of morals, nor the strain of poetry, could be pitched too high; that nothing but moral sublimity could compensate for the extravagance of the fictions, and that all the skill I might possess in the art of poetry was required to counterbalance the disadvantage of a mythology with which few readers were likely to be well acquainted, and which would appear monstrous if its deformities were not kept out of sight. I endeavored, therefore, to combine the utmost richness of versification with the greatest freedom. The spirit of the poem was Indian, but there was nothing Oriental in the style. I had learnt the language of poetry from our own great masters and the great poets of antiquity.

No poem could have been more deliberately planned, nor more carefully composed. It was commenced at Lisbon on the first of May, 1801, and recommenced in the summer of the same year at Kingsdown, in the same house (endeared to me once by many delightful but now mournful recollections) in which Madoc had been finished, and Thalaba begun. A little was added during the winter of that year in London. It was resumed at Kingsdown in the summer of 1802, and then laid aside till 1806, during which interval Madoc was reconstructed and published. Resuming it then once more, all that had been written was recast at Keswick: there I proceeded with it leisurely, and finished it on the 25th of November, 1809. It is the only one of my long poems of which detached parts were written to be afterwards inserted in their proper places. Were I to name the persons to whom it was communicated during its progress, it would be admitted now that I might well be encouraged by their approbation; and, indeed, when it was published, I must have been very unreasonable if I had not been satisfied with its reception.

It was not till the present edition of these Poems was in the press, that, eight-and-twenty years after Kehama had been published, I first saw the article upon it in the Monthly Review, parts of which cannot be more appropriately preserved any where than here; it shows the determination with which the Reviewer entered upon his task, and the importance which he attached to it.

"Throughout our literary career we cannot recollect a more favorable opportunity than the present for a full discharge of our critical duty. We are indeed bound now to make a firm stand for the purity of our poetic taste against this last and most desperate assault, conducted as it is by a writer of considerable reputation, and unquestionably of considerable abilities. If this poem were to be tolerated, all things after it may demand impunity, and it will be in vain to contend hereafter for any one established rule of poetry as to design and subject, as to character and incident, as to language and versification. We may return at once to the rude hymn in honor of Bacchus, and indite strains adapted to the recitation of rustics in the season of the vintage:—

Quæ canerent agerentque peruncti facibus ora.

It shall be our plan to establish these points, we hope, beyond reasonable controversy, by a complete analysis of the twenty-four sections (as they may truly be called) of the portentous work, and by ample quotations interspersed with remarks, in which we shall endeavor to withhold no praise that can fairly be claimed, and no censure that is obviously deserved."

The reviewer fulfilled his promises, however much he failed in his object. He was not more liberal of censure than of praise, and he was not sparing of quotations. The analysis was sufficiently complete for the purposes of criticism, except that the critic did not always give himself the trouble to understand what he was determined to ridicule. "It is necessary for us," he said, "according to our purpose of deterring future writers from the choice of such a story, or for such a management of that story, to detail the gross follies of the work in question; and, tedious as the operation may be, we trust that, in the judgment of all those lovers of literature who duly value the preservation of sound principles of composition among us, the end will excuse the means." The means were ridicule and reprobation, and the end at which he aimed was thus stated in the Reviewer's peroration.

“We know not that Mr. Southey’s most devoted admirers can complain of our having omitted a single incident essential to the display of his character or the development of his plot. To other readers we should apologize for our prolixity, were we not desirous, as we hinted before, of giving a death-blow to the gross extravagances of the author’s school of poetry, if we cannot hope to reform so great an offender as himself. In general, all that nature and all that art has lavished on him is rendered useless by his obstinate adherence to his own system of fancied originality, in which every thing that is good is old, and every thing that is new is good for nothing. Convinced as we are that many of the author’s faults proceed from mere idleness, deserving even less indulgence than the erroneous principles of his poetical system, we shall conclude by a general exhortation to all critics to condemn, and to all writers to avoid, the example of combined carelessness and perversity which is here afforded by Mr. Southey; and we shall mark this last and worst eccentricity of his Muse with the following character:—Here is the composition of a poet not more distinguished by his genius and knowledge, than by his contempt for public opinion and the utter depravity of his taste—a depravity which is incorrigible, and, we are sorry to add, most unblushingly rejoicing in its own hopelessness of amendment.”

The Monthly Review has, I believe, been for some years defunct. I never knew to whom I was beholden for the good service rendered me in that Journal, when such assistance was of most value; nor by whom I was subsequently, during several years, favored in the same Journal with such flagrant civilities as those of which the reader has here seen a sample.

KESWICK, 19th May, 1833.

ORIGINAL PREFACE.

In the religion of the Hindoos, which of all false religions is the most monstrous in its fables, and the most fatal in its effects, there is one remarkable peculiarity. Prayers, penances, and sacrifices, are supposed to possess an inherent and actual value, in no degree depending upon the disposition or motive of the person who performs them. They are drafts upon Heaven, for which the Gods cannot refuse payment. The worst men, bent upon the worst designs, have in this manner obtained power which has made them formidable to the Supreme Deities themselves, and rendered an Avatar, or Incarnation of Veeshnoo the Preserver, necessary. This belief is the foundation of the following Poem. The story is original; but, in all its parts, consistent with the superstition upon which it is built; and however startling the fictions may appear, they might almost be called credible when compared with the genuine tales of Hindoo mythology.

No figures can be imagined more anti-picturesque, and less poetical, than the mythological personages of the Bramins. This deformity was easily kept out of sight:—their hundred hands are but a clumsy personification of power; their numerous heads only a gross image of divinity, “whose countenance,” as the Bhagvat-Geeta expresses it, “is turned on every side.” To the other obvious objection, that the religion of Hindostan is not generally known enough to supply fit machinery for an English poem, I can only answer, that, if every allusion to it throughout the work is not sufficiently self-explained to render the passage intelligible, there is a want of skill in the poet. Even those readers who should be wholly unacquainted with the writings of our learned Orientalists, will find all the preliminary knowledge that can be needful, in the brief explanation of mythological names prefixed to the Poem.

- BRAMA, the Creator.
- VEESHNOO, . . . the Preserver.
- SEEVA, the Destroyer.

These form the Trimourtee, or Trinity, as it has been called, of the Bramins. The allegory is obvious, but has been made for the Trimourtee, not the Trimourtee for the allegory; and these Deities are regarded by the people as three distinct and personal Gods. The two latter have at this day their hostile sects of worshippers; that of Seeva is the most numerous; and in this Poem, Seeva is represented as Supreme among the Gods. This is the same God whose name is variously written Seeb, Sieven, and Siva; Chiven by the French; Xiven by the Portuguese; and whom European writers sometimes denominate Eswara, Iswaren, Mahadeo, Mahadeva, Rutren,—according to which of his thousand and eight names prevailed in the country where they obtained their information.

- INORA, God of the Elements.
- THE SWERGA, . . his Paradise,—one of the Hindoo heavens.
- YAMEN, Lord of Hell, and Judge of the Dead.
- PADALON, Hell,—under the Earth, and, like the Earth, of an octagon shape; its eight gates are guarded by as many Gods.
- MARRIATALY, . . the Goddess who is chiefly worshipped by the lower castes.
- POLLEAK, or Ganesa,—the Protector of Travellers. His statues are placed in the highways, and sometimes in a small, lonely sanctuary, in the streets and in the fields.
- CASYAPA, the Father of the Immortals.
- DEVETAS, the Inferior Deities.
- SURAS, Good Spirits.
- ASURAS, Evil Spirits, or Devils.
- GLENDOVEERS, . the most beautiful of the Good Spirits, the Grindouvers of Sonnerat.

I.

THE FUNERAL.

I.

MIDNIGHT, and yet no eye
Through all the Imperial City closed in sleep!
Behold her streets a-blaze
With light that seems to kindle the red sky,
Her myriads swarming through the crowded Ways

Master and slave, old age and infancy,
 All, all abroad to gaze;
 House-top and balcony
 Clustered with women, who throw back their veils
 With unimpeded and insatiate sight
 To view the funeral pomp which passes by,
 As if the mournful rite
 Were but to them a scene of joyance and delight.

2.

Vainly, ye blessed twinklers of the night,
 Your feeble beams ye shed,
 Quench'd in the unnatural light which might out-stare
 Even the broad eye of day;
 And thou from thy celestial way
 Pourest, O Moon, an ineffectual ray!
 For lo! ten thousand torches flame and flare
 Upon the midnight air,
 Blotting the lights of heaven
 With one portentous glare.
 Behold, the fragrant smoke, in many a fold
 Ascending, floats along the fiery sky,
 And hangeth visible on high,
 A dark and waving canopy.

3.

Hark! 'tis the funeral trumpet's breath!
 'Tis the dirge of death!
 At once ten thousand drums begin,
 With one long thunder-peal the ear assailing;
 Ten thousand voices then join in,
 And with one deep and general din
 Pour their wild wailing.
 The song of praise is drown'd
 Amid the deafening sound;
 You hear no more the trumpet's tone,
 You hear no more the mourner's moan,
 Though the trumpet's breath, and the dirge of
 death,
 Swell with commingled force the funeral yell.
 But rising over all, in one acclaim,
 Is heard the echoed and reëchoed name,
 From all that countless rout —
 Arvalan! Arvalan!
 Arvalan! Arvalan!
 Ten times ten thousand voices in one shout
 Call Arvalan! the overpowering sound,
 From house to house repeated, rings about,
 From tower to tower rolls round.

4.

The death-procession moves along;
 Their bald heads shining to the torches' ray,
 The Bramins lead the way,
 Chanting the funeral song.
 And now at once they shout,
 Arvalan! Arvalan!
 With quick rebound of sound,
 All in accordant cry,
 Arvalan! Arvalan!
 The universal multitude reply.
 In vain ye thunder on his ear the name;
 Would ye awake the dead?
 Borne upright in his palanquin,

There Arvalan is seen!
 A glow is on his face, — a lively red;
 It is the crimson canopy
 Which o'er his cheek a reddening shade hath shed;
 He moves, — he nods his head, —
 But the motion comes from the bearers' tread,
 As the body, borne aloft in state,
 Sways with the impulse of its own dead weight.

5.

Close following his dead son, Kehama came,
 Nor joining in the ritual song,
 Nor calling the dear name;
 With head depress'd, and funeral vest,
 And arms enfolded on his breast,
 Silent and lost in thought he moves along.
 King of the world, his slaves, unenvying now,
 Behold their wretched Lord; rejoiced they see
 The mighty Rajah's misery;
 That nature in his pride hath dealt the blow,
 And taught the Master of Mankind to know
 Even he himself is man, and not exempt from woe.

6.

O sight of grief! the wives of Arvalan,
 Young Azla, young Nealliny, are seen!
 Their widow-ropes of white,
 With gold and jewels bright,
 Each like an Eastern queen.
 Woe! woe! around their palanquin,
 As on a bridal day,
 With symphony, and dance, and song,
 Their kindred and their friends come on.
 The dance of sacrifice! the funeral song!
 And next the victim slaves in long array,
 Richly bedight to grace the fatal day,
 Move onward to their death;
 The clarions' stirring breath
 Lifts their thin robes in every flowing fold,
 And swells the woven gold,
 That on the agitated air
 Flutters and glitters to the torch's glare.

7.

A man and maid of aspect wan and wild,
 Then, side by side, by bowmen guarded, came;
 O wretched father! O unhappy child!
 Them were all eyes of all the throng exploring —
 Is this the daring man
 Who raised his fatal hand at Arvalan?
 Is this the wretch condemn'd to feel
 Kehama's dreadful wrath?
 Then were all hearts of all the throng deploring;
 For not in that innumerable throng
 Was one who loved the dead; for who could know
 What aggravated wrong
 Provoked the desperate blow!

8.

Far, far behind, beyond all reach of sight,
 In order'd files the torches flow along,
 One ever-lengthening line of gliding light:
 Far, far behind,
 Rolls on the undistinguishable clamor
 Of horn, and trump, and tambour;

Incessant as the roar
Of streams which down the wintry mountain pour,
And louder than the dread commotion
Of breakers on a rocky shore,
When the winds rage over the waves,
And Ocean to the Tempest raves.

9.

And now toward the bank they go,
Where, winding on their way below,
Deep and strong the waters flow.
Here doth the funeral pile appear
With myrrh and ambergris bestrew'd,
And built of precious sandal wood.
They cease their music and their outcry here ;
Gently they rest the bier ;
They wet the face of Arvalan, —
No sign of life the sprinkled drops excite ;
They feel his breast, — no motion there ;
They feel his lips, — no breath ;
For not with feeble, nor with erring hand,
The brave avenger dealt the blow of death.
Then, with a doubling peal and deeper blast,
The tambours and the trumpets sound on high,
And with a last and loudest cry
They call on Arvalan.

10.

Woe ! woe ! for Azla takes her seat
Upon the funeral pile ;
Calmly she took her seat,
Calmly the whole terrific pomp survey'd ;
As on her lap the while
The lifeless head of Arvalan was laid.

11.

Woe ! woe ! Neallmy,
The young Neallmy,
They strip her ornaments away,
Bracelet and anklet, ring, and chain, and zone ;
Around her neck they leave
The marriage knot alone, —
That marriage band, which, when
Yon waning moon was young,
Around her virgin neck
With bridal joy was hung.
Then with white flowers, the coronal of death,
Her jetty locks they crown.

12.

O sight of misery !
You cannot hear her cries, — their sound
In that wild dissonance is drown'd ; —
But in her face you see
The supplication and the agony, —
See in her swelling throat the desperate strength
That with vain effort struggles yet for life ;
Her arms contracted now in fruitless strife,
Now wildly at full length
Towards the crowd in vain for pity spread ; —
They force her on, they bind her to the dead.

13.

Then all around retire ;
Circling the pile, the ministering Bramins stand,

Each lifting in his hand a torch on fire.
Alone the Father of the dead advanced
And lit the funeral pyre.

14.

At once on every side
The circling torches drop ;
At once on every side
The fragrant oil is pour'd ;
At once on every side
The rapid flames rush up.
Then hand in hand the victim band
Roll in the dance around the funeral pyre ;
Their garments' flying folds
Float inward to the fire ;
In drunken whirl they wheel around ;
One drops, — another plunges in ;
And still with overwhelming dim
The tambours and the trumpets sound ;
And clap of hand, and shouts, and cries,
From all the multitude arise ;
While round and round, in giddy wheel,
Intoxicate they roll and reel,
Till one by one whirl'd in they fall,
And the devouring flames have swallow'd all.

15.

Then all was still ; the drums and clarions ceased ;
The multitude were hush'd in silent awe ;
Only the roaring of the flames was heard.

II.

THE CURSE.

1.

ALONE towards the Table of the Dead
Kehama moved ; there on the altar-stone
Honey and rice he spread.
There, with collected voice and painful tone,
He call'd upon his son.
Lo ! Arvalan appears ;
Only Kehama's powerful eye beheld
The thin, ethereal spirit hovering nigh ;
Only the Rajah's ear
Receiv'd his feeble breath.
And is this all ? the mournful Spirit said,
This all that thou canst give me after death ?
This unavailing pomp,
These empty pageantries, that mock the dead !

2.

In bitterness the Rajah heard,
And groan'd, and smote his breast, and o'er his face
Cowl'd the white mourning vest.

3.

ARVALAN.

Art thou not powerful, — even like a God ?
And must I, through my years of wandering,
Shivering and naked to the elements,
In wretchedness await
The hour of Yamen's wrath ?

I thought thou wouldst embody me anew,
 Undying as I am ; —
 Yea, re-create me ! — Father, is this all ?
 This all ? and thou Almighty !

4.

But in that wrongful and upbraiding tone
 Kehama found relief ;
 For rising anger half suppress'd his grief.
 Reproach not me ! he cried,
 Had I not spell-secur'd thee from disease,
 Fire, sword, — all common accidents of man, —
 And thou ! — fool, fool — to perish by a stake !
 And by a peasant's arm ! —
 Even now, when from reluctant Heaven,
 Forcing new gifts and mightier attributes,
 So soon I should have quell'd the Death-God's power.

5.

Waste not thy wrath on me, quoth Arvalan ;
 It was my hour of folly ! Fate prevail'd ;
 Nor boots it to reproach me that I fell.
 I am in misery, Father ! Other souls,
 Predoom'd to Indra's Heaven, enjoy the dawn
 Of bliss ; to them the temper'd elements
 Minister joy : genial delight the sun
 Sheds on their happy being, and the stars
 Effuse on them benignant influences ;
 And thus o'er earth and air they roam at will,
 And, when the number of their days is full,
 Go fearlessly before the awful throne.
 But I, — all naked feeling and raw life, —
 What worse than this hath Yamen's hell in store ?
 If ever thou didst love me, mercy, father !
 Save me, for thou can'st save — the Elements
 Know and obey thy voice.

6.

KEHAMA.

The Elements

Shall sin no more against thee ; whilst I speak,
 Already dost thou feel their power is gone.
 Fear not ! I cannot call again the past ;
 Fate hath made that its own ; but Fate shall yield
 To me the future ; and thy doom be fix'd
 By mine, not Yamen's will. Meantime all power,
 Whereof thy feeble spirit can be made
 Participant, I give. Is there aught else
 To mitigate thy lot ?

ARVALAN.

Only the sight of vengeance. Give me that !
 Vengeance, full, worthy vengeance ! — not the stroke
 Of sudden punishment, — no agony
 That spends itself, and leaves the wretch at rest,
 But lasting, long revenge.

KEHAMA.

What, boy ? is that cup sweet ? then take thy fill !

7.

So, as he spake, a glow of dreadful pride
 Inflamed his cheek ; with quick and angry stride

He moved toward the pile,
 And raised his hand to hush the crowd, and cried,
 Bring forth the murderer ! At the Rajah's voice,
 Calmly, and like a man whom fear had stunn'd,
 Ladurlad came, obedient to the call,
 But Kailyal started at the sound,
 And gave a womanly shriek ; and back she drew,
 And eagerly she roll'd her eyes around,
 As if to seek for aid, albeit she knew
 No aid could there be found.

8.

It chanced that near her, on the river-brink,
 The sculptured form of Marriataly stood ;
 It was an Idol roughly hewn of wood,
 Artless, and mean, and rude ;
 The Goddess of the poor was she ;
 None else regarded her with piety.
 But when that holy Image Kailyal view'd,
 To that she sprung, to that she clung ;
 On her own Goddess with close-clasping arms,
 For life the maiden hung.

9.

They seized the maid ; with unrelenting grasp
 They bruised her tender limbs ;
 She, nothing yielding, to this only hope
 Clings with the strength of frenzy and despair ;
 She screams not now, she breathes not now,
 She sends not up one vow,
 She forms not in her soul one secret prayer,
 All thought, all feeling, and all powers of life
 In the one effort centring. Wrathful they
 With tug and strain would force the maid away ;
 Didst thou, O Marriataly, see their strife ?
 In pity didst thou see the suffering maid ?
 Or was thine anger kindled, that rude hands
 Assail'd thy holy Image ? — for behold
 The holy image shakes !

10.

Irreverently bold, they deem the maid
 Relax'd her stubborn hold,
 And now with force redoubled drag their prey ;
 And now the rooted Idol to their sway Bends, — yields, — and now it falls. But then they scream ;
 For lo ! they feel the crumbling bank give way,
 And all are plunged into the stream.

11.

She hath escaped my will, Kehama cried ;
 She hath escaped, — but thou art here ;
 I have thee still,
 The worsen criminal !
 And on Ladurlad, while he spake, severe
 He fix'd his dreadful frown.
 The strong reflection of the pile
 Lit his dark lineaments,
 Lit the protruded brow, the gathered front,
 The steady eye of wrath.

12.

But while the fearful silence yet endured,
 Ladurlad roused himself ;

Ere yet the voice of destiny
Which trembled on the Rajah's lips was loosed,
Eager he interposed,
As if despair had waken'd him to hope ;
Mercy ! oh mercy ! only in defence —
Only instinctively —
Only to save my child, I smote the Prince ;
King of the world, be merciful !
Crush me — but torture not !

13.

The Man-Almighty deign'd him no reply ;
Still he stood silent ; in no human mood
Of mercy, in no hesitating thought
Of right and justice. At the length he raised
His brow, yet unrelax'd, — his lips unclosed,
And, uttered from the heart,
With the whole feeling of his soul enforced,
The gathered vengeance came.

14.

I charm thy life
From the weapons of strife,
From stone and from wood,
From fire and from flood,
From the serpent's tooth,
And the beasts of blood :
From Sickness I charm thee,
And Time shall not harm thee ;
But Earth, which is mine,
Its fruits shall deny thee ;
And Water shall hear me,
And know thee and fly thee ;
And the Winds shall not touch thee
When they pass by thee,
And the Dews shall not wet thee,
When they fall nigh thee :
And thou shalt seek Death
To release thee, in vain ;
Thou shalt live in thy pain,
While Kehama shall reign,
With a fire in thy heart,
And a fire in thy brain ;
And Sleep shall obey me,
And visit thee never,
And the Curse shall be on thee
Forever and ever.

15.

There where the Curse had striken him,
There stood the miserable man,
There stood Ladurlad, with loose-hanging arms,
And eyes of idiot wandering.
Was it a dream ? alas !
He heard the river flow ;
He heard the crumbling of the pile ;
He heard the wind which shower'd
The thin, white ashes round.
There motionless he stood,
As if he hoped it were a dream,
And feared to move, lest he should prove
The actual misery ;
And still at times he met Kehama's eye,
Kehama's eye, that fastened on him still.

III.

THE RECOVERY.

I.

THE Rajah turned toward the pile again ;
Loud rose the song of death from all the crowd ;
Their din the instruments begin,
And once again join in
With overwhelming sound.
Ladurlad starts, — he looks around ;
What hast thou here in view,
O wretched man, in this disastrous scene ?
The soldier train, the Bramins who renew
Their ministry around the funeral pyre,
The empty palanquins,
The dimly-fading fire.

2.

Where, too, is she whom most his heart held dear,
His best-beloved Kailyal, where is she,
The solace and the joy of many a year
Of widowhood ? is she then gone,
And is he left all-utterly alone,
To bear his blasting curse, and none
To succor or deplore him ?
He staggers from the dreadful spot ; the throng
Give way in fear before him ;
Like one who carries pestilence about,
Shuddering they shun him, where he moves along
And now he wanders on
Beyond the noisy rout :
He cannot fly and leave his Curse behind ;
Yet doth he seem to find
A comfort in the change of circumstance.
Adown the shore he strays,
Unknowing where his wretched feet shall rest,
But farthest from the fatal place is best.

3.

By this in the orient sky appears the gleam
Of day. Lo ! what is yonder in the stream,
Down the slow river floating slow,
In distance indistinct and dimly seen ?
The childless one, with idle eye,
Followed its motion thoughtlessly ;
Idly he gazed, unknowing why,
And half unconscious that he watch'd its way.
Belike it is a tree
Which some rude tempest, in its sudden sway,
Tore from the rock, or from the hollow shore
The undermining stream hath swept away.

4.

But when anon outswelling, by its side,
A woman's robe he spied,
Oh then Ladurlad started,
As one, who in his grave
Had heard an Angel's call.
Yea, Marriataly, thou hast deign'd to save !
Yea, Goddess ! it is she,
Kailyal, still clinging senselessly
To thy dear Image, and in happy hour

Upborne amid the wave
By that preserving power.

5.

Headlong in hope and in joy
Ladurlad plunged in the water;
The Water knew Kehama's spell;
The Water shrunk before him.
Blind to the miracle,
He rushes to his daughter,
And treads the river depths in transport wild,
And clasps, and saves his child.

6.

Upon the farther side, a level shore
Of sand was spread: thither Ladurlad bore
His daughter, holding still with senseless hand
The saving Goddess; there upon the sand
He laid the livid maid,
Raised up against his knees her drooping head;
Bent to her lips, — her lips as pale as death, —
If he might feel her breath,
His own the while in hope and dread suspended;
Chafed her cold breast, and ever and anon
Let his hand rest, upon her heart extended.

7.

Soon did his touch perceive, or fancy, there
The first faint notion of returning life.
He chafes her feet, and lays them bare
In the sun; and now again upon her breast
Lays his hot hand; and now her lips he press'd,
For now the stronger throb of life he knew;
And her lips tremble too!
The breath comes palpably:
Her quivering lids unclosed,
Feebly and feebly fall,
Relapsing, as it seem'd, to dead repose.

8.

So in her father's arms thus languidly,
While over her with earnest gaze he hung,
Silent and motionless she lay,
And painfully and slowly writhed at fits;
At fits, to short convulsive starts was stung.
Till when the struggle and strong agony
Had left her, quietly she lay reposed;
Her eyes now resting on Ladurlad's face,
Relapsing now, and now again unclosed.
The look she fix'd upon his face implies
Nor thought nor feeling; senselessly she lies,
Composed like one who sleeps with open eyes.

9.

Long he lean'd over her,
In silence and in fear.
Kailyal! — at length he cried in such a tone
As a poor mother ventures who draws near,
With silent footstep, to her child's sick bed.
My Father! cried the maid, and raised her head,
Awakening then to life and thought, — thou here?
For when his voice she heard,
The dreadful past recurr'd,
Which dimly, like a dream of pain,
Till now with troubled sense confused her brain.

10.

And hath he spared us then? she cried,
Half rising as she spake,
For hope and joy the sudden strength supplied;
In mercy hath he curb'd his cruel will,
That still thou livest? But as thus she said,
Impatient of that look of hope, her sire
Shook hastily his head;
Oh! he hath laid a Curse upon my life,
A clinging curse, quoth he;
Hath sent a fire into my heart and brain,
A burning fire, forever there to be!
The Winds of Heaven must never breathe on me;
The Rains and Dews must never fall on me;
Water must mock my thirst, and shrink from me;
The common Earth must yield no fruit to me;
Sleep, blessed Sleep! must never light on me;
And Death, who comes to all, must fly from me,
And never, never, set Ladurlad free.

11.

This is a dream! exclaimed the incredulous maid,
Yet in her voice the while a fear express'd,
Which in her larger eye was manifest.
This is a dream! she rose, and laid her hand
Upon her father's brow, to try the charm;
He could not bear the pressure there; — he shrank;
He warded off her arm,
As though it were an enemy's blow; he smote
His daughter's arm aside.
Her eye glanced down; his mantle she espied,
And caught it up. — Oh misery! Kailyal cried,
He bore me from the river-depths, and yet
His garment is not wet!

IV.

THE DEPARTURE.

1.

RECLINED beneath a Cocoa's feathery shade
Ladurlad lies,
And Kailyal on his lap her head hath laid,
To hide her streaming eyes.
The boatman, sailing on his easy way,
With envious eye beheld them where they lay;
For every herb and flower
Was fresh and fragrant with the early dew;
Sweet sung the birds in that delicious hour,
And the cool gale of morning, as it blew,
Not yet subdued by day's increasing power,
Ruffling the surface of the silvery stream,
Swept o'er the moisten'd sand, and raised no
shower.
Telling their tale of love,
The boatman thought they lay
At that lone hour, and who so blest as they!

2.

But now the Sun in heaven is high;
The little songsters of the sky
Sit silent in the sultry hour;

They pant and palpitate with heat ;
 Their bills are open languidly
 To catch the passing air ;
 They hear it not, they feel it not,
 It murmurs not, it moves not.
 The boatman, as he looks to land,
 Admires what men so mad to linger there,
 For yonder Cocoa's shade behind them falls,
 A single spot upon the burning sand.

3.

There all the morning was Ladurlad laid
 Silent and motionless, like one at ease ;
 There motionless upon her father's knees
 Reclined the silent maid.
 The man was still, pondering with steady mind,
 As if it were another's Curse,
 His own portentous lot ;
 Scanning it o'er and o'er in busy thought,
 As though it were a last night's tale of woe,
 Before the cottage door
 By some old beldam sung,
 While young and old, assembled round,
 Listened, as if by witchery bound,
 In fearful pleasure to her wondrous tongue.

4.

Musing so long he lay, that all things seem
 Unreal to his sense, even like a dream,
 A monstrous dream of things which could not be.
 That beating, burning brow, — why it was now
 The height of noon, and he was lying there
 In the broad sun, all bare !
 What if he felt no wind ! the air was still.
 That was the general will
 Of Nature, not his own peculiar doom ;
 Yon rows of rice erect and silent stand,
 The shadow of the Cocoa's highest plume
 Is steady on the sand.

5.

Is it indeed a dream ? He rose to try ;
 Impatient to the water side he went,
 And down he bent,
 And in the stream he plunged his hasty arm
 To break the visionary charm.
 With fearful eye and fearful heart,
 His daughter watch'd the event ;
 She saw the start and shudder,
 She heard the in-drawn groan,
 For the Water knew Kehama's charm ;
 The Water shrunk before his arm ;
 His dry hand moved about unmoisten'd there ;
 As easily might that dry hand avail
 To stop the passing gale,
 Or grasp the impassive air.
 He is Almighty then !
 Exclaim'd the wretched man in his despair :
 Air knows him ; Water knows him ; Sleep
 His dreadful word will keep ;
 Even in the grave there is no rest for me,
 Cut off from that last hope, — the wretch's joy ;
 And Veeshnoo hath no power to save,
 Nor Seeva to destroy.

6.

Oh ! wrong not them ! quoth Kailyal ;
 Wrong not the Heavenly Powers !
 Our hope is all in them. They are not blind !
 And lighter wrongs than ours,
 And lighter crimes than his,
 Have drawn the Incarnate down among mankind
 Already have the Immortals heard our cries,
 And in the mercy of their righteousness
 Beheld us in the hour of our distress !
 She spake with streaming eyes,
 Where pious love and ardent feeling beam.
 And turning to the Image threw
 Her grateful arms around it. — It was thou
 Who savedst me from the stream !
 My Marriataly, it was thou !
 I had not else been here
 To share my Father's Curse,
 To suffer now, — and yet to thank thee thus !

7.

Here then, the maiden cried, dear Father, here
 Raise our own Goddess, our divine Preserver !
 The mighty of the earth despise her rites ;
 She loves the poor who serve her.
 Set up her Image here ;
 With heart and voice the guardian Goddess bless ;
 For jealousy would she resent
 Neglect and thanklessness ; —
 Set up her Image here,
 And bless her for her aid with tongue and soul sincere.

8.

So saying, on her knees the maid
 Began the pious toil.
 Soon their joint labor scoops the easy soil ;
 They raise the Image up with reverent hand,
 And round its rooted base they heap the sand.
 O Thou whom we adore,
 O Marriataly, thee do I implore,
 The virgin cried ; my Goddess, pardon thou
 The unwilling wrong, that I no more,
 With dance and song,
 Can do thy daily service, as of yore !
 The flowers which last I wreathed around thy brow,
 Are withering there ; and never now
 Shall I at eve adore thee,
 And swimming round, with arms outspread,
 Poise the full pitcher on my head,
 In dexterous dance before thee,
 While underneath the reedy shed, at rest
 My father sat the evening rites to view,
 And blest thy name, and blest
 His daughter too.

9.

Then heaving from her heart a heavy sigh,
 O Goddess ! from that happy home, cried she,
 The Almighty Man hath forced us !
 And homeward with the thought unconsciously
 She turn'd her dizzy eye. — But there on high,
 With many a dome, and pinnacle, and spire,

The summits of the Golden Palaces
 Blazed in the dark blue sky, aloft, like fire.
 Father, away! she cried, away!
 Why linger we so nigh?
 For not to him hath Nature given
 The thousand eyes of Deity,
 Always and every where, with open sight,
 To persecute our flight!
 Away — away! she said,
 And took her father's hand, and like a child
 He followed where she led.

V.

THE SEPARATION.

1.

EVENING comes on: arising from the stream,
 Homeward the tall flamingo wings his flight;
 And where he sails athwart the setting beam,
 His scarlet plumage glows with deeper light.
 The watchman, at the wish'd approach of night,
 Gladly forsakes the field, where he all day,
 To scare the winged plunderers from their prey,
 With shout and sling, on yonder clay-built height,
 Hath borne the sultry ray.
 Hark! at the Golden Palaces
 The Bramin strikes the hour.
 For leagues and leagues around, the brazen sound
 Rolls through the stillness of departing day,
 Like thunder far away.

2.

Behold them wandering on their hopeless way,
 Unknowing where they stray,
 Yet sure where'er they stop to find no rest.
 The evening gale is blowing;
 It plays among the trees;
 Like plumes upon a warrior's crest,
 They see yon cocoas tossing to the breeze.
 Ladurlad views them with impatient mind;
 Impatiently he hears
 The gale of evening blowing,
 The sound of waters flowing,
 As if all sights and sounds combined
 To mock his irremediable woe;
 For not for him the blessed waters flow;
 For not for him the gales of evening blow;
 A fire is in his heart and brain,
 And Nature hath no healing for his pain.

3.

The Moon is up, still pale
 Amid the lingering light.
 A cloud, ascending in the eastern sky,
 Sails slowly o'er the vale,
 And darkens round, and closes in the night.
 No hospitable house is nigh,
 No traveller's home, the wanderers to invite;
 Forlorn, and with long watching overworn,
 The wretched father and the wretched child
 Lie down amid the wild.

4.

Before them, full in sight,
 A white flag, flapping to the winds of night,
 Marks where the tiger seized a human prey.
 Far, far away, with natural dread
 Shunning the perilous spot,
 At other times abhorrent had they fled;
 But now they heed it not.
 Nothing they care; the boding death-flag now
 In vain for them may gleam and flutter there.
 Despair and agony in him
 Prevent all other thought;
 And Kailyal hath no heart or sense for aught,
 Save her dear father's strange and miserable lot

5.

There, in the woodland shade,
 Upon the lap of that unhappy maid,
 His head Ladurlad laid,
 And never word he spake;
 Nor heaved he one complaining sigh,
 Nor groaned he with his misery,
 But silently, for her dear sake,
 Endured the raging pain.
 And now the moon was hid on high;
 No stars were glimmering in the sky;
 She could not see her father's eye,
 How red with burning agony:
 Perhaps he may be cooler now,
 She hoped, and long'd to touch his brow
 With gentle hand, yet did not dare
 To lay the painful pressure there.
 Now forward from the tree she bent,
 And anxiously her head she leant,
 And listened to his breath.
 Ladurlad's breath was short and quick,
 Yet regular it came,
 And like the slumber of the sick,
 In pantings still the same.
 Oh, if he sleeps! — her lips unclose,
 Intently listening to the sound,
 That equal sound so like repose.
 Still quietly the sufferer lies,
 Bearing his torment now with resolute will;
 He neither moves, nor groans, nor sighs.
 Doth satiate cruelty bestow
 This little respite to his woe,
 She thought, or are there Gods who look below?

6.

Perchance, thought Kailyal, willingly deceived,
 Our Marriataly hath his pain relieved,
 And she hath bade the blessed Sleep assuage
 His agony, despite the Rajah's rage.
 That was a hope which fill'd her gushing eyes,
 And made her heart in silent yearnings rise,
 To bless the power divine in thankfulness.
 And yielding to that joyful thought her mind,
 Backward the maid her aching head reclined
 Against the tree, and to her father's breath
 In fear she hearken'd still with earnest ear.
 But soon forgetful fits the effort broke:
 In starts of recollection then she woke,
 Till now, benignant Nature overcame
 The Virgin's weary and exhausted frame,

Nor able more her painful watch to keep,
She closed her heavy lids, and sunk to sleep.

7.

Vain was her hope! he did not rest from pain;
The Curse was burning in his brain;
Alas! the innocent maiden thought he slept;
But Sleep the Rajah's dread commandment kept;
Sleep knew Kehama's Curse.
The dews of night fell round them now;
They never bathed Ladurlad's brow;
They knew Kehama's Curse.
The night-wind is abroad;
Aloft it moves among the stirring trees;
He only heard the breeze, —
No healing aid to him it brought;
It play'd around his head, and touch'd him not;
It knew Kehama's curse.

8.

Listening, Ladurlad lay in his despair,
If Kailyal slept, for wherefore should she share
Her father's wretchedness, which none could cure?
Better alone to suffer; he must bear
The burden of his Curse; but why endure
The unavailing presence of her grief?
She, too, apart from him, might find relief;
For dead the Rajah deem'd her, and as thus Already she his dread revenge had fled,
So might she still escape, and live secure.

9.

Gently he lifts his head,
And Kailyal does not feel;
Gently he rises up, — she slumbers still;
Gently he steals away with silent tread.
Anon she started, for she felt him gone;
She call'd, and through the stillness of the night,
His step was heard in flight.
Mistrustful for a moment of the sound,
She listens; till the step is heard no more;
But then she knows that he indeed is gone,
And with a thrilling shriek she rushes on.
The darkness and the wood impede her speed;
She lifts her voice again —
Ladurlad! — and again, alike in vain,
And with a louder cry
Straining its tone to hoarseness; — far away,
Selfish in misery,
He heard the call, and faster did he fly.

10.

She leans against that tree whose jutting bough
Smote her so rudely. Her poor heart,
How audibly it panted,
With sudden stop and start!
Her breath, how short and painfully it came!
Hark! all is still around her, —
And the night so utterly dark,
She opened her eyes, and she closed them,
And the blackness and blank were the same.

11.

'Twas like a dream of horror, and she stood
Half doubting whether all indeed were true.

A Tiger's howl, loud echoing through the wood,
Roused her; the dreadful sound she knew,
And turn'd instinctively to what she fear'd.
Far off the Tiger's hungry howl was heard;
A nearer horror met the maiden's view,
For right before her a dim form appear'd,
A human form in that black night,
Distinctly shaped by its own lurid light,
Such light as the sickly Moon is seen to shed,
Through spell-raised fogs, a bloody, baleful red.

12.

That Spectre fix'd his eyes upon her full;
The light which shone in their accursed orbs
Was like a light from Hell;
And it grew deeper, kindling with the view.
She could not turn her sight
From that infernal gaze, which like a spell
Bound her, and held her rooted to the ground.
It palsied every power;
Her limbs avail'd her not in that dread hour;
There was no moving thence;
Thought, memory, sense were gone:
She heard not now the Tiger's nearer cry;
She thought not on her father now;
Her cold heart's-blood ran back;
Her hand lay senseless on the bough it clasp'd;
Her feet were motionless;
Her fascinated eyes
Like the stone eyeballs of a statue fix'd,
Yet conscious of the sight that blasted them.

13.

The wind is abroad;
It opens the clouds;
Scattered before the gale,
They skurry through the sky,
And the darkness, retiring, rolls over the vale.
The Stars in their beauty come forth on high,
And through the dark blue night
The Moon rides on triumphant, broad and bright.
Distinct and darkening in her light
Appears that Spectre foul;
The moonbeam gives his face and form to sight,
The shape of man,
The living form and face of Arvalan! —
His hands are spread to clasp her.

14.

But at that sight of dread the Maid awoke;
As if a lightning-stroke
Had burst the spell of fear,
Away she broke all frantically, and fled.
There stood a temple near, beside the way,
An open fane of Pollear, gentle God,
To whom the travellers for protection pray.
With elephantine head and eye severe,
Here stood his image, such as when he seiz'd
And tore the rebel Giant from the ground,
With mighty trunk wreathed round
His impotent bulk, and on his tusks, on high
Impaled upheld him between earth and sky.

15.

Thither the affrighted Maiden sped her flight,
And she hath reach'd the place of sanctuary;

And now within the temple in despite,
 Yea, even before the altar, in his sight,
 Hath Arvalan, with fleshly arm of might,
 Seized her. That instant the insulted God
 Caught him aloft, and from his sinuous grasp,
 As if from some tort catapult let loose,
 Over the forest hurl'd him all abroad.

16.

O'ercome with dread,
 She tarried not to see what heavenly Power
 Had saved her in that hour:
 Breathless and faint she fled.
 And now her foot struck on the knotted root
 Of a broad manchineel, and there the Maid
 Fell senselessly beneath the deadly shade.

VI.

CASYAPA.

1.

SHALL this, then, be thy fate, O lovely Maid?
 Thus, Kailyal, must thy sorrows then be ended?
 Her face upon the ground,
 Her arms at length extended,
 There, like a corpse, behold her laid
 Beneath the deadly shade.
 What if the hungry Tiger, prowling by,
 Should snuff his banquet nigh?
 Alas! Death needs not now his ministry;
 The baleful boughs hang o'er her,
 The poison-dews descend.
 What Power will now restore her?
 What God will be her friend?

2.

Bright and so beautiful was that fair night,
 It might have calm'd the gay amid their mirth,
 And given the wretched a delight in tears.
 One of the Glendoveers,
 The loveliest race of all of heavenly birth,
 Hovering with gentle motion o'er the earth,
 Amid the moonlight air,
 In sportive flight was floating round and round,
 Unknowing where his joyous way was tending.
 He saw the Maid where motionless she lay,
 And stoop'd his flight descending,
 And raised her from the ground.
 Her heavy eyelids are half closed;
 Her cheeks are pale and livid like the dead;
 Down hang her loose arms lifelessly;
 Down hangs her languid head.

3.

With timely pity touch'd for one so fair,
 The gentle Glendoveer
 Press'd her, thus pale and senseless, to his breast,
 And springs aloft in air with sinewy wings,
 And bears the Maiden there,
 Where Himakoot, the holy Mount, on high
 From mid-earth rising in mid-heaven,
 Shines in its glory like the throne of Even.

Soaring with strenuous flight above,
 He bears her to the blessed Grove,
 Where in his ancient and august abodes,
 There dwells old Casyapa, the Sire of Gods.

4.

The Father of the Immortals sat,
 Where, underneath the Tree of Life,
 The Fountains of the Sacred River sprung;
 The Father of the Immortals smiled
 Benignant on his son.
 Knowest thou, he said, my child,
 Ercenia, knowest thou whom thou bringest here,
 A mortal to the holy atmosphere?

ERENIA.

I found her in the Groves of Earth,
 Beneath a poison-tree,
 Thus lifeless as thou seest her.
 In pity have I brought her to these bowers,
 Not erring, Father! by that smile —
 By that benignant eye!

CASYAPA.

What if the Maid be sinful? if her ways
 Were ways of darkness, and her death predoom'd
 To that black hour of midnight, when the Moon
 Hath turn'd her face away,
 Unwilling to behold
 The unhappy end of guilt?

ERENIA.

Then what a lie, my Sire, were written here,
 In these fair characters! and she had died,
 Sure proof of purer life and happier doom,
 Now in the moonlight, in the eye of Heaven,
 If I had left so fair a flower to fade.
 But thou, — all knowing as thou art,
 Why askest thou of me?
 O Father, oldest, holiest, wisest, best,
 To whom all things are plain,
 Why askest thou of me?

CASYAPA.

Knowest thou Kehama?

ERENIA

The Almighty Man!
 Who knows not him and his tremendous power?
 The Tyrant of the Earth,
 The Enemy of Heaven!

CASYAPA.

Fearst thou the Rajah?

ERENIA.

He is terrible!

CASYAPA.

Yea, he is terrible! such power hath he,
 That hope hath entered Hell.
 The Asuras and the spirits of the damn'd
 Acclaim their Hero; Yamen, with the might
 Of Godhead, scarce can quell
 The rebel race accur'd:

Half from their beds of torture they uprising,
 And half uproot their chains.
 Is there not fear in Heaven?
 The souls that are in bliss suspend their joy;
 The danger hath disturb'd
 The calm of Deity,
 And Brama fears, and Veeshnoo turns his face
 In doubt toward Seeva's throne.

EREENIA.

I have seen Indra tremble at his prayers,
 And at his dreadful penances turn pale.
 They claim and wrest from Seeva power so vast,
 That even Seeva's self,
 The Highest, cannot grant and be secure.

CASYAPA.

And darest thou, Ereenia, brave
 The Almighty Tyrant's power?

EREENIA.

I brave him, Father! I?

CASYAPA.

Darest thou brave his vengeance? — For, if not,
 Take her again to earth,
 Cast her before the Tiger in his path,
 Or where the death-dew-dropping tree
 May work Kehama's will.

EREENIA.

Never!

CASYAPA.

Then meet his wrath! for He, even He,
 Hath set upon this worm his wanton foot.

EREENIA.

I knew her not, how wretched and how fair,
 When here I waded her — poor Child of Earth,
 Shall I forsake thee, seeing thee so fair,
 So wretched? O my Father, let the Maid
 Dwell in the Sacred Grove!

CASYAPA.

That must not be,
 For Force and Evil then would enter here;
 Ganges, the holy stream which cleanseth sin,
 Would flow from hence polluted in its springs,
 And they who gasp upon its banks in death,
 Feel no salvation. Piety, and Peace,
 And Wisdom, these are mine; but not the power
 Which could protect her from the Almighty Man;
 Nor when the Spirit of dead Arvalan
 Should persecute her here to glut his rage,
 To heap upon her yet more agony,
 And ripen more damnation for himself.

EREENIA.

Dead Arvalan?

CASYAPA.

All power to him, whereof
 The disembodied spirit in its state
 Of weakness could be made participant,

Kehama hath assign'd, until his days
 Of wandering shall be number'd.

EREENIA.

Look! she drinks
 The gale of healing from the blessed Groves.
 She stirs, and lo! her hand
 Hath touch'd the Holy River in its source,
 Who would have shrunk if aught impure were nigh

CASYAPA.

The Maiden, of a truth, is pure from sin.

5.

The waters of the Holy Spring
 About the hand of Kailyal play;
 They rise, they sparkle, and they sing,
 Leaping where languidly she lay,
 As if with that rejoicing stir
 The Holy Spring would welcome her.
 The Tree of Life, which o'er her spread,
 Benignant bow'd its sacred head,
 And dropp'd its dews of healing;
 And her heart-blood, at every breath
 Recovering from the strife of death,
 Drew in new strength and feeling.
 Behold her beautiful in her repose,
 A life-bloom reddening now her dark-brown
 cheek;

And lo! her eyes unclose,
 Dark as the depth of Ganges' spring profound,
 When night hangs over it;
 Bright as the Moon's refulgent beam,
 That quivers on its clear up-sparkling stream.

6.

Soon she let fall her lids,
 As one who, from a blissful dream
 Waking to thoughts of pain,
 Fain would return to sleep, and dream again.
 Distrustful of the sight,
 She moves not, fearing to disturb
 The deep and full delight.
 In wonder fix'd, opening again her eye
 She gazes silently,
 Thinking her mortal pilgrimage was past,
 That she had reach'd her heavenly home of rest,
 And these were Gods before her,
 Or spirits of the blest.

7.

Lo! at Ereenia's voice,
 A Ship of Heaven comes sailing down the skies.
 Where wouldst thou bear her? cries
 The ancient Sire of Gods.
 Straight to the Swerga, to my bower of bliss,
 The Glendoveer replies,
 To Indra's own abodes.
 Foe of her foe, were it alone for this
 Indra should guard her from his vengeance there;
 But if the God forbear,
 Unwilling yet the perilous strife to try,
 Or shrinking from the dreadful Rajah's might, —
 Weak as I am, O Father, even I Stand forth in Seeva's sight.

8.

Trust thou in him whate'er betide,
 And stand forth fearlessly!
 The Sire of Gods replied:
 All that He wills is right; and doubt not thou,
 Howe'er our feeble scope of sight
 May fail us now,
 His righteous will in all things must be done.
 My blessing be upon thee, O my son!

 VII.

THE SWERGA

1.

THEN in the Ship of Heaven, Ereenia laid
 The waking, wondering Maid;
 The Ship of Heaven, instinct with thought, display'd
 Its living sail, and glides along the sky
 On either side, in wavy tide,
 The clouds of morn along its path divide;
 The Winds, who swept in wild career on high,
 Before its presence check their charmed force;
 The Winds, that boitering lagg'd along their course,
 Around the living Bark enamor'd play,
 Swell underneath the sail, and sing before its way.

2.

That Bark, in shape, was like the furrow'd shell
 Wherein the Sea-Nymphs to their parent-King,
 On festal day, their duteous offerings bring.
 Its hue? — Go watch the last green light
 Ere Evening yields the western sky to Night;
 Or fix upon the Sun thy strenuous sight
 Till thou hast reach'd its orb of chrysolite.
 The sail, from end to end display'd,
 Bent, like a rainbow, o'er the Maid.
 An Angel's head, with visual eye,
 Through trackless space, directs its chosen way;
 Nor aid of wing, nor foot, nor fin,
 Requires to voyage o'er the obedient sky.
 Smooth as the swan, when not a breeze at even Disturbs the surface of the silver stream,
 Through air and sunshine sails the Ship of Heaven.

3.

Recumbent there the Maiden glides along
 On her aerial way.
 How swift she feels not, though the swiftest wind
 Had flagg'd in flight behind.
 Motionless as a sleeping babe she lay,
 And all serene in mind,
 Feeling no fear; for that ethereal air
 With such new life and joyance fill'd her heart,
 Fear could not enter there;
 For sure she deem'd her mortal part was o'er,
 And she was sailing to the heavenly shore;
 And that angelic form, who moved beside,
 Was some good Spirit sent to be her guide.

4.

Daughter of Earth! therein thou deem'st aright,
 And never yet did form more beautiful,
 In dreams of night descending from on high,
 Bless the religious Virgin's gifted sight,
 Nor, like a vision of delight,
 Rise on the raptur'd Poet's inward eye.
 Of human form divine was he,
 The immortal Youth of Heaven who floated by,
 Even such as that divinest form shall be
 In those blest stages of our onward race,
 When no infirmity,
 Low thought, nor base desire, nor wasting care,
 Deface the semblance of our heavenly sire.

5.

The wings of Eagle or of Cherubin
 Had seem'd unworthy him;
 Angelic power, and dignity, and grace,
 Were in his glorious pennons; from the neck
 Down to the ankle reach'd their swelling web,
 Richer than robes of Tyrian dye, that deck
 Imperial Majesty;
 Their color like the winter's moonless sky,
 When all the stars of midnight's canopy
 Shine forth; or like the azure deep at noon,
 Reflecting back to heaven a brighter blue.
 Such was their tint when closed; but when out-
 spread,
 The permeating light
 Shed through their substance thin a varying hue;
 Now bright as when the rose,
 Beauteous as fragrant, gives to scent and sight
 A like delight; now like the juice that flows
 From Douro's generous vine;
 Or ruby when with deepest red it glows;
 Or as the morning clouds refulgent shine,
 When, at forthcoming of the Lord of Day,
 The Orient, like a shrine,
 Kindles as it receives the rising ray,
 And heralding his way,
 Proclaims the presence of the Power divine.

6.

Thus glorious were the wings
 Of that celestial Spirit, as he went Disporting through his native element.
 Nor these alone
 The gorgeous beauties that they gave to view;
 Through the broad membrane branched a pliant bone,
 Spreading like fibres from their parent stem;
 Its veins like interwoven silver shone,
 Or as the chaster hue
 Of pearls that grace some Sultan's diadem.
 Now with slow stroke and strong behold him smite
 The buoyant air, and now in gentler flight,
 On motionless wing expanded, shoot along.

7.

Through air and sunshine sails the Ship of Heaven;
 Far, far beneath them lies
 The gross and heavy atmosphere of earth;

And with the Swerga gales,
The Maid of mortal birth
At every breath a new delight inhales.
And now toward its port the Ship of Heaven,
Swift as a falling meteor, shapes its flight,
Yet gently as the dews of night that gem,
And do not bend the hare-bell's slenderest stem.
Daughter of Earth, Ereenia cried, alight;
This is thy place of rest, the Swerga this;
Lo, here my Bower of Bliss!

8.

He furl'd his azure wings, which round him fold
Graceful as robes of Grecian chief of old.
The happy Kailyal knew not where to gaze;
Her eyes around in joyful wonder roam,
Now turn'd upon the lovely Glendoveer,
Now on his heavenly home.

EREENIA.

Here, Maiden, rest in peace,
And I will guard thee, feeble as I am.
The Almighty Rajah shall not harm thee here,
While Indra keeps his throne.

KAILYAL.

Alas, thou fearest him!
Immortal as thou art, thou fearest him!
I thought that death had saved me from his power;
Not even the dead are safe.

EREENIA.

Long years of life and happiness,
O Child of Earth, be thine!
From death I sav'd thee, and from all thy foes
Will save thee, while the Swerga is secure.

KAILYAL.

Not me alone, O gentle Deveta!
I have a Father suffering upon earth,
A persecuted, wretched, poor, good man,
For whose strange misery
There is no human help;
And none but I dare comfort him
Beneath Kehama's Curse;
O gentle Deveta, protect him too!

EREENIA.

Come, plead thyself to Indra! Words like thine
May win their purpose, rouse his slumbering
heart,
And make him yet put forth his arm to wield
The thunder, while the thunder is his own.

9.

Then to the Garden of the Deity
Ereenia led the Maid.
In the mid garden tower'd a giant Tree;
Rock-rooted on a mountain-top, it grew,
Rear'd its unrivall'd head on high,
And stretch'd a thousand branches o'er the sky,
Drinking with all its leaves celestial dew.
Lo! where from thence, as from a living well,
A thousand torrents flow!
For still in one perpetual shower,

Like diamond drops, ethereal waters fell
From every leaf of all its ample bower.
Rolling adown the steep
From that aerial height,
Through the deep shade of aromatic trees,
Half seen, the cataracts shoot their gleams of light,
And pour upon the breeze
Their thousand voices; far away the roar,
In modulations of delightful sound,
Half heard and ever varying, floats around.
Below, an ample Lake expanded lies,
Blue as the o'er-arching skies;
Forth issuing from that lovely Lake
A thousand rivers water Paradise.
Full to the brink, yet never overflowing,
They cool the amorous gales, which, ever blowing,
O'er their melodious surface love to stray;
Then, winging back their way,
Their vapors to the parent Tree repay;
And ending thus where they began,
And feeding thus the source from whence they came,
The eternal rivers of the Swerga ran,
Forever renovate, yet still the same.

10.

On that ethereal lake, whose waters lie
Blue and transpious, like another sky,
The Elements had rear'd their King's abode.
A strong, controlling power their strife suspended.
And there their hostile essences they blended,
To form a Palace worthy of the God.
Built on the Lake, the waters were its floor;
And here its walls were water arch'd with fire;
And here were fire with water vaulted o'er;
And spires and pinnacles of fire
Round watery cupolas aspire,
And domes of rainbow rest on fiery towers,
And roofs of flame are turreted around
With cloud, and shafts of cloud with flame are bound.

Here, too, the Elements forever veer,
Ranging around with endless interchanging;
Pursued in love, and so in love pursuing,
In endless revolutions here they roll;
Forever their mysterious work renewing;
The parts all shifting, still unchanged the whole
Even we on earth at intervals desery
Gleams of the glory, streaks of flowing light, Openings of heaven, and streams that flash at night,
In fitful splendor, through the northern sky.

11.

Impatient of delay, Ereenia caught
The Maid aloft, and spread his wings abroad,
And bore her to the presence of the God.
There Indra sat upon his throne reclined,
Where Devetas adore him;
The lute of Nared, warbling on the wind,
All tones of magic harmony combined
To soothe his troubled mind,
While the dark-eyed Apsaras danced before him.
In vain the God-musician play'd,
In vain the dark-eyed Nymphs of Heaven essay'd

To charm him with their beauties in the dance ;
 And when he saw the mortal Maid appear,
 Led by the heroic Glendoveer,
 A deeper trouble fill'd his countenance.
 What hast thou done, Ereenia, said the God,
 Bringing a mortal here ?
 And while he spake, his eye was on the Maid ;
 The look he gave was solemn, not severe ;
 No hope to Kailyal it convey'd,
 And yet it struck no fear ;
 There was a sad displeasure in his air,
 But pity too was there.

EREENIA.

Hear me, O Indra ! On the lower earth
 I found this child of man, by what mishap
 I know not, lying in the lap of death.
 Aloft I bore her to our Father's grove,
 Not having other thought, than when the gales
 Of bliss had heal'd her, upon earth again
 To leave its lovely daughter. Other thoughts
 Arose, when Casyapa declared her fate ;
 For she is one who groans beneath the power
 Of the dread Rajah, terrible alike
 To men and Gods. His son, dead Arvalan,
 Arm'd with a portion, Indra, of thy power,
 Already wrested from thee, persecutes
 The Maid, the helpless one, the innocent.
 What, then, behoved me but to waft her here
 To my own Bower of Bliss ? what other choice ?
 The spirit of foul Arvalan not yet
 Hath power to enter here ; here thou art yet
 Supreme, and yet the Swerga is thine own.

INDRA.

No child of man, Ereenia, in the Bowers
 Of Bliss may sojourn, till he hath put off
 His mortal part ; for on mortality
 Time, and Infirmity, and Death attend,
 Close followers they, and in their mournful train
 Sorrow, and Pain, and Mutability.
 Did these find entrance here, we should behold
 Our joys, like earthly summers, pass away.
 Those joys perchance may pass ; a stronger hand
 May wrest my sceptre, and unparadise
 The Swerga ; — but, Ereenia, if we fall,
 Let it be Fate's own arm that casts us down ;
 We will not rashly hasten and provoke
 The blow, nor bring ourselves the ruin on.

EREENIA.

Fear courts the blow, Fear brings the ruin on.
 Needs must the chariot-wheels of Destiny
 Crush him who throws himself before their track,
 Patient and prostrate.

INDRA.

All may yet be well.
 Who knows but Veesnnoo will descend and save,
 Once more incarnate ?

EREENIA.

Look not there for help,
 Nor build on unsubstantial hope thy trust.
 Our Father Casyapa hath said he turns

His doubtful eye to Seeva, even as thou
 Dost look to him for aid. But thine own strength
 Should for thine own salvation be put forth ;
 Then might the higher Powers approving see
 And bless the brave resolve. — Oh that my arm
 Could wield yon lightnings which play idly there,
 In inoffensive radiance, round thy head !
 The Swerga should not need a champion now,
 Nor Earth implore deliverance still in vain !

INDRA.

Thinkest thou I want the will ? rash Son of Heaven,
 What if my arm be feeble as thine own
 Against the dread Kehama ? He went on Conquering in irresistible career,
 Till his triumphant car had measured o'er
 The insufficient earth, and all the Kings
 Of men received his yoke ; then had he won
 His will, to ride upon their necks elate,
 And crown his conquests with the sacrifice
 That should, to men and gods, proclaim him Lord
 And Sovereign Master of the vassal World,
 Sole Rajah, the Omnipotent below.
 The steam of that portentous sacrifice
 Arose to Heaven. Then was the hour to strike ;
 Then, in the consummation of his pride,
 His height of glory, then the thunderbolt
 Should have gone forth, and hurl'd him from his throne

Down to the fiery floor of Padalon,
 To everlasting burnings, agony
 Eternal, and remorse which knows no end.
 That hour went by : grown impious in success,
 By prayer and penances he wrested now
 Such power from Fate, that soon, if Seeva turn not
 His eyes on earth, and no Avatar save,
 Soon will he seize the Swerga for his own,
 Roll on through Padalon his chariot wheels,
 Tear up the adamantine bolts which lock
 The accurs'd Asuras to its burning floor,
 And force the drink of Immortality
 From Yamen's charge. Vain were it now to strive ;
 My thunder cannot pierce the sphere of power
 Wherewith, as with a girdle, he is bound.

KAILYAL.

Take me to earth, O gentle Deveta !
 Take me again to earth ! This is no place
 Of rest for me ! — My Father still must bear
 His Curse, — he shall not bear it all alone ;
 Take me to earth, that I may follow him ! —
 I do not fear the Almighty Man ! the Gods
 Are feeble here ; but there are higher Powers,
 Who will not turn their eyes from wrongs like ours ;
 Take me to earth, O gentle Deveta ! —

12.

Saying thus, she knelt, and to his knees she clung,
 And bow'd her head, in tears and silence praying.
 Rising anon, around his neck she flung
 Her arms, and there with folded hands she hung,
 And fixing on the guardian Glendoveer
 Her eyes, more eloquent than Angel's tongue,
 Again she cried, There is no comfort here !

I must be wit'h my Father in his pain. —
Take me to earth, O Deveta, again!

13.

Indra with admiration heard the Maid.
O Child of Earth, he cried,
Already in thy spirit thus divine,
Whatever weal or woe betide,
Be that high sense of duty still thy guide,
And all good Powers will aid a soul like thine.
Then turning to Ereenia, thus he said —
Take her where Ganges hath its second birth,
Below our sphere, and yet above the earth;
There may Ladurlad rest beyond the power
Of the dread Rajah, till the fated hour.

VIII.

THE SACRIFICE.

Dost thou tremble, O Indra, O God of the sky,
Why slumber those thunders of thine?
Dost thou tremble on high, —
Wilt thou tamely the Swerga resign, —
Art thou smitten, O Indra, with dread?
Or seest thou not, seest thou not, Monarch divine,
How many a day to Seeva's shrine
Kehama his victim hath led?
Nine and ninety days are fled,
Nine and ninety steeds have bled;
One more, the rite will be complete —
One victim more, and this the dreadful day.
Then will the impious Rajah seize thy seat,
And wrest the thunder-sceptre from thy sway.
Along the mead the hallow'd Steed
Yet bends at liberty his way;
At noon his consummating blood will flow.
O day of woe! above, below,
That blood confirms the Almighty Tyrant's reign!
Thou tremblest, O Indra, O God of the Sky,
Thy thunder is vain;
Thou tremblest on high for thy power!
But where is Veeshnoo at this hour?
But where is Seeva's eye?
Is the Destroyer blind?
Is the Preserver careless for mankind?

2.

Along the mead the hallow'd Steed
Still wanders whereso'er he will,
O'er hill, or dale, or plain;
No human hand hath trick'd that mane
From which he shakes the morning dew;
His mouth has never felt the rein;
His lips have never froth'd the chain;
For pure of blemish and of stain,
His neck unbroke to mortal yoke,
Like Nature free the Steed must be,
Fit offering for the Immortals he.
A year and day the Steed must stray
Wherever chance may guide his way,
Before he fall at Seeva's shrine;

The year and day have pass'd away,
Nor touch of man hath marr'd the rite divine
And now at noon the Steed must bleed,
The perfect rite to-day must force the need
Which Fate reluctant shudders to bestow;
Then must the Swerga-God
Yield to the Tyrant of the World below;
Then must the Devetas obey
The Rajah's rod, and groan beneath his hateful sway.

3.

The Sun rides high; the hour is nigh;
The multitude, who long
Lest aught should mar the rite,
In circle wide on every side,
Have kept the Steed in sight,
Contract their circle now, and drive him on.
Drawn in long files before the Temple-court,
The Rajah's archers flank an ample space;
Here, moving onward still, they drive him near,
Then, opening, give him way to enter here.

4.

Behold him; how he starts and flings his head!
On either side in glittering order spread,
The archers ranged in narrowing lines appear;
The multitude behind close up the rear
With moon-like bend, and silently await
The awful end,
The rite that shall from Indra wrest his power.
In front, with far-stretched walls, and many a tower,
Turret, and dome, and pinnacle clate,
The huge Pagoda seems to load the land:
And there before the gate
The Bramin band expectant stand;
The axe is ready for Kehama's hand.

5.

Hark! at the Golden Palaces
The Bramin strikes the time!
One, two, three, four, a thrice-told chime,
And then again, one, two.
The bowl that in its vessel floats, anew
Must fill and sink again;
Then will the final stroke be due.
The Sun rides high, the noon is nigh,
And silently, as if spell-bound,
The multitude expect the sound.

6.

Lo! how the Steed, with sudden start,
Turns his quick head to every part!
Long files of men on every side appear.
The sight might well his heart affright;
And yet the silence that is here
Inspires a stranger fear;
For not a murmur, not a sound
Of breath or motion rises round;
No stir is heard in all that mighty crowd;
He neighs, and from the temple-wall
The voice reëchoes loud,
Loud and distinct, as from a hill
Across a lonely vale, when all is still.

7.

Within the temple, on his golden throne
 Reclined, Kehama lies,
 Watching with steady eyes
 The perfumed light that, burning bright,
 Metes out the passing hours.
 On either hand his eunuchs stand,
 Freshening with fans of peacock-plumes the air,
 Which, redolent of all rich gums and flowers,
 Seems, overcharged with sweets, to stagnate there.
 Lo! the time-taper's flame, ascending slow,
 Creeps up its coil toward the fated line;
 Kehama rises and goes forth,
 And from the altar, ready where it lies,
 He takes the axe of sacrifice.

8.

That instant, from the crowd, with sudden shout,
 A Man sprang out
 To lay upon the Steed his hand profane.
 A thousand archers, with unerring eye,
 At once let fly,
 And with their hurtling arrows fill the sky.
 In vain they fall upon him fast as rain;
 He bears a charmed life, which may defy
 All weapons, — and the darts that whizz around,
 As from an adamantine panoply
 Repell'd, fall idly to the ground.
 Kehama clasp'd his hands in agony,
 And saw him grasp the hallow'd courser's mane,
 Spring up with sudden bound,
 And with a frantic cry,
 And madman's gesture, gallop round and round.

9.

They seize, they drag him to the Rajah's feet.
 What doom will now be his, — what vengeance meet
 Will he, who knows no mercy, now require?
 The obsequious guards around, with blood-hound
 eye,
 Look for the word, in slow-consuming fire,
 By piecemeal death, to make the wretch expire,
 Or hoist his living carcass, hook'd on high,
 To feed the fowls and insects of the sky;
 Or if aught worse inventive cruelty
 To that remorseless heart of royalty
 Might prompt, accursed instruments they stand
 To work the wicked will with wicked hand.
 Far other thoughts were in the multitude;
 Pity, and human feelings, held them still;
 And stifled sighs and groans suppress'd were there,
 And many a secret curse and inward prayer
 Call'd on the insulted Gods to save mankind.
 Expecting some new crime, in fear they stood,
 Some horror which would make the natural blood
 Start, with cold shuddering thrill the sinking heart,
 Whiten the lip, and make the abhorrent eye
 Roll back and close, press'd in for agony.

10.

How then fared he for whom the mighty crowd
 Suffer'd in spirit thus, — how then fared he?
 A ghastly smile was on his lip, his eye
 Glared with a ghastly hope, as he drew nigh,

And cried aloud, Yes, Rajah! it is I!

And wilt thou kill me now?

The countenance of the Almighty Man
 Fell when he knew Ladurlad, and his brow
 Was clouded with despite, as one ashamed.
 That wretch again! indignant he exclaim'd,
 And smote his forehead, and stood silently
 Awhile in wrath: then, with ferocious smile,
 And eyes which seem'd to darken his dark cheek,
 Let him go free! he cried; he hath his Curse,
 And vengeance upon him can wreak no worse —
 But ye who did not stop him — tremble ye!

11.

He bade the archers pile their weapons there:
 No manly courage fill'd the slavish band,
 No sweetening vengeance roused a brave despair.
 He call'd his horsemen then, and gave command
 To hem the offenders in, and hew them down.
 Ten thousand cimeters, at once uprear'd,
 Flash up, like waters sparkling to the sun;
 A second time the fatal brands appear'd
 Lifted aloft, — they glitter'd then no more;
 Their light was gone, their splendor quench'd in gore.
 At noon the massacre begun,
 And night closed in before the work of death was done.

IX.

THE HOME-SCENE.

1.

THE steam of slaughter from that place of blood
 Spread o'er the tainted sky.
 Vultures, for whom the Rajah's tyranny
 So oft had furnish'd food, from far and nigh
 Sped to the lure: aloft, with joyful cry,
 Wheeling around, they hover'd overhead;
 Or, on the temple perch'd with greedy eye,
 Impatient watch'd the dead.
 Far off the Tigers, in the inmost wood,
 Heard the death shriek, and snuff'd the scent of
 blood;
 They rose, and through the covert went their way, Couch'd at the forest edge, and waited for their prey.

He who had sought for death went wandering on;
 The hope which had inspired his heart was gone;
 Yet a wild joyance still inflamed his face,
 A smile of vengeance, a triumphant glow.
 Where goes he? — Whither should Ladurlad go!
 Unwittingly the wretch's footsteps trace
 Their wonted path toward his dwelling-place;
 And wandering on, unknowing where,
 He starts like one surprised at finding he is there.

3.

Behold his lowly home,
 By yonder broad-bough'd plane o'er-shaded:

There Marriataly's Image stands,
 And there the garland twined by Kailyal's hands
 Around its brow hath faded.
 The peacocks, at their master's sight,
 Quick from the leafy thatch alight,
 And hurry round, and search the ground,
 And veer their glancing necks from side to side,
 Expecting from his hand
 Their daily dole which erst the Maid supplied,
 Now all too long denied.

4.

But, as he gazed around,
 How strange did all accustom'd sights appear!
 How differently did each familiar sound
 Assail his alter'd ear!
 Here stood the marriage bower,
 Rear'd in that happy hour
 When he, with festal joy and youthful pride,
 Had brought Yedillian home, his beauteous bride.
 Leaves not its own, and many a borrow'd flower,
 Had then bedeck'd it, withering ere the night;
 But he who look'd from that auspicious day
 For years of long delight,
 And would not see the marriage bower decay,
 There planted and nurs'd up, with daily care,
 The sweetest herbs that scent the ambient air,
 And train'd them round to live and flourish there.
 Nor when dread Yamen's will
 Had call'd Yedillian from his arms away,
 Ceased he to tend the marriage-bower, but still,
 Sorrowing, had dress'd it like a pious rite
 Due to the monument of past delight.

5.

He took his wonted seat before the door, —
 Even as of yore,
 When he was wont to view, with placid eyes,
 His daughter at her evening sacrifice.
 Here were the flowers which she so carefully
 Did love to rear for Marriataly's brow;
 Neglected now,
 Their heavy heads were drooping, over-blown;
 All else appear'd the same as heretofore,
 All — save himself alone;
 How happy then, — and now a wretch for evermore!

6.

The market-flag, which, hoisted high,
 From far and nigh,
 Above yon cocoa grove is seen,
 Hangs motionless amid the sultry sky.
 Loud sounds the village drum; a happy crowd
 Is there; Ladurlad hears their distant voices,
 But with their joy no more his heart rejoices;
 And how their old companion now may fare
 Little they know, and less they care;
 The torment he is doom'd to bear
 Was but to them the wonder of a day,
 A burden of sad thoughts soon put away.

7.

They knew not that the wretched man was near;
 And yet it seem'd, to his distemper'd ear,

As if they wrong'd him with their merriment.
 Resentfully he turn'd away his eyes,
 Yet turn'd them but to find
 Sights that enraged his mind
 With envious grief more wild and overpowering.
 The tank which fed his fields was there, and there
 The large-leaved lotus on the waters flowering.

There, from the intolerable heat

The buffaloes retreat;

Only their nostrils raised to meet the air,
 Amid the sheltering element they rest.

Impatient of the sight, he closed his eyes,
 And bow'd his burning head, and in despair
 Calling on Indra, — Thunder-God! he said,
 Thou owest to me alone this day thy throne;
 Be grateful, and in mercy strike me dead.

8.

Despair had roused him to that hopeless prayer;
 Yet thinking on the heavenly Powers, his mind
 Drew comfort; and he rose and gather'd flowers,
 And twined a crown for Marriataly's brow;
 And taking then her wither'd garland down,
 Replaced it with the blooming coronal.
 Not for myself, the unhappy Father cried,
 Not for myself, O Mighty One! I pray,
 Accursed as I am beyond thy aid!
 But, oh! be gracious still to that dear Maid
 Who crown'd thee with these garlands day by day,
 And danced before thee eye at even-tide
 In beauty and in pride.

O Marriataly, whereso'er she stray
 Forlorn and wretched, still be thou her guide!

9.

A loud and fiendish laugh replied,
 Scoffing his prayer. Aloft, as from the air,
 The sound of insult came: he look'd, and there
 The visage of dead Arvalan came forth,
 Only his face amid the clear blue sky,
 With long-drawn lips of insolent mockery,
 And eyes whose lurid glare
 Was like a sulphur fire,
 Mingling with darkness ere its flames expire.

10.

Ladurlad knew him well: enraged to see
 The cause of all his misery,
 He stoop'd and lifted from the ground
 A stake, whose fatal point was black with blood;
 The same wherewith his hand had dealt the wound,
 When Arvalan, in hour with evil fraught,
 For violation seized the shrieking Maid.
 Thus arm'd, in act again to strike he stood,
 And twice with inefficient wrath essay'd
 To smite the impassive shade.
 The lips of scorn their mockery-laugh renew'd,
 And Arvalan put forth a hand, and caught
 The sunbeam, and condensing there its light,
 Upon Ladurlad turn'd the burning stream.
 Vain cruelty! the stake
 Fell in white ashes from his hold, but he Endured no added pain; his agony
 Was full, and at the height;
 The burning stream of radiance nothing harm'd
 him;

A fire was in his heart and brain,
And from all other flame
Kehama's Curse had charm'd him.

11.

Anon the Spirit waved a second hand ;
Down rush'd the obedient whirlwind from the sky,
Scoop'd up the sand like smoke, and from on high
Shed the hot shower upon Ladurlad's head.
Where'er he turns, the accursed Hand is there ;
East, West, and North, and South, on every side
The hand accursed waves in air to guide
The dizzying storm ; ears, nostrils, eyes, and mouth
It fills and chokes, and clogging every pore,
Taught him new torments might be yet in store.
Where shall he turn to fly ? behold his house
In flames ! uprooted lies the marriage-bower,
The Goddess buried by the sandy shower.
Blindly, with staggering step, he reels about,
And still the accursed Hand pursued,
And still the lips of scorn their mockery-laugh
renew'd.

12.

What, Arvalan ! hast thou so soon forgot
The grasp of Pollear ? Wilt thou still defy
The righteous Powers of heaven ? or know'st thou
not
That there are yet superior Powers on high,
Son of the Wicked ? — Lo, in rapid flight,
Ereenia hastens from the ethereal height ;
Bright is the sword celestial in his hand ;
Like lightning in its path athwart the sky,
He comes and drives, with angel-arm, the blow.
Oft have the Asuras, in the wars of Heaven,
Felt that keen sword by arm angelic driven,
And fled before it from the fields of light.
Thrice through the vulnerable shade
The Glendoveer impels the griding blade ;
The wicked Shade flies howling from his foe.
So let that Spirit foul
Fly, and, for impotence of anger, howl,
Writhing with anguish, and his wounds deplore ;
Worse punishment hath Arvalan deserved,
And righteous Fate hath heavier doom in store.

13.

Not now the Glendoveer pursues his flight ;
He bade the Ship of Heaven alight,
And gently there he laid
The astonish'd Father by the happy Maid,
The Maid now shedding tears of deep delight.
Beholding all things with incredulous eyes,
Still dizzy with the sand-storm, there he lay,
While, sailing up the skies, the living Bark
Through air and sunshine held its heavenly way.

X.

MOUNT MERU.

I.

SWIFT through the sky the vessel of the Suras
Sails up the fields of ether like an Angel.

Rich is the freight, O Vessel, that thou bearest !
Beauty and Virtue,
Fatherly cares and filial veneration,
Hearts which are proved and strengthen'd by affliction,
Manly resentment, fortitude, and action,
Womanly goodness ;
All with which Nature halloweth her daughters,
Tenderness, truth, and purity, and meekness,
Piety, patience, faith, and resignation,
Love and devotion.
Ship of the Gods, how richly art thou laden !
Proud of the charge, thou voyagest rejoicing ;
Clouds float around to honor thee, and Evening
Lingers in heaven.

2.

A Stream descends on Meru Mountain ;
None hath seen its secret fountain ;
It had its birth, so Sages say,
Upon the memorable day
When Parvati presumed to lay,
In wanton play,
Her hands, too venturesome Goddess, in her mirth,
On Seeva's eyes, the light and life of Earth.
Thereat the heart of the Universe stood still ;
The Elements ceased their influences ; the Hours
Stopp'd on the eternal round ; Motion, and Breath,
Time, Change, and Life, and Death,
In sudden trance oppress'd, forgot their powers.
A moment and the dread eclipse was ended ;
But, at the thought of Nature thus suspended,
The sweat on Seeva's forehead stood,
And Ganges thence upon the world descended,
The Holy River, the Redeeming Flood.

3.

None hath seen its secret fountain ;
But on the top of Meru Mountain,
Which rises o'er the hills of earth,
In light and clouds, it hath its mortal birth.
Earth seems that pinnacle to rear
Sublime above this worldly sphere,
Its cradle, and its altar, and its throne ;
And there the new-born River lies
Outspread beneath its native skies,
As if it there would love to dwell
Alone and unapproachable.
Soon flowing forward, and resign'd
To the will of the Creating Mind,
It springs at once, with sudden leap,
Down from the immeasurable steep.
From rock to rock, with shivering force rebounding,
The mighty cataract rushes ; Heaven around,
Like thunder, with the incessant roar resounding,
And Meru's summit shaking with the sound.
Wide spreads the snowy foam, the sparkling spray
Dances aloft ; and ever there, at morning,
The earliest sunbeams haste to wing their way,
With rainbow wreaths the holy stream adorning ;
And duly the adoring Moon at night
Sheds her white glory there,
And in the watery air
Suspends her halo-crowns of silver light.

4.

A mountain-valley in its blessed breast
Receives the stream, which there delights to lie,
Untroubled and at rest,
Beneath the untainted sky.

There, in a lovely lake, it seems to sleep,
And thence, through many a channel dark and deep,
Their secret way the holy Waters wind,
Till, rising underneath the root
Of the Tree of Life on Hemakoot,
Majestic forth they flow to purify mankind.

5.

Towards this Lake, above the nether sphere,
The living Bark, with angel eye,
Directs its course along the obedient sky.
Kehama hath not yet dominion here;
And till the dreaded hour,
When Indra by the Rajah shall be driven
Dethroned from Heaven,
Here may Ladurlad rest beyond his power.

6.

The living Bark alights; the Glendoveer
Then lays Ladurlad by the blessed Lake; —
O happy Sire, and yet more happy Daughter!
The ethereal gales his agony aslake,
His daughter's tears are on his cheek,
His hand is in the water;
The innocent man, the man oppress'd, —
Oh joy! — hath found a place of rest
Beyond Kehama's sway; [away.
The Curse extends not here; his pains have past

7.

O happy Sire, and happy Daughter!
Ye on the banks of that celestial water
Your resting-place and sanctuary have found.
What! hath not then their mortal taint defiled
The sacred, solitary ground?
Vain thought! the Holy Valley smiled,
Receiving such a Sire and Child;
Ganges, who seem'd asleep to lie,
Beheld them with benignant eye,
And rippled round melodiously,
And roll'd her little waves, to meet
And welcome their beloved feet.
The gales of Swerga thither fled,
And heavenly odors there were shed
About, below, and overhead;
And Earth, rejoicing in their tread,
Hath built them up a blooming Bower,
Where every amaranthine flower
Its deathless blossom interweaves
With bright and undecaying leaves.

8.

Three happy beings are there here —
The Sire, the Maid, the Glendoveer.
A fourth approaches, — who is this
That enters in the Bower of Bliss?
No form so fair might painter find
Among the daughters of mankind;
For death her beauties hath refined,
And unto her a form hath given

Framed of the elements of Heaven;
Pure dwelling-place for perfect mind.
She stood and gazed on Sire and Child;
Her tongue not yet had power to speak;
The tears were streaming down her cheek;
And when those tears her sight beguiled,
And still her faltering accents fail'd,
The Spirit, mute and motionless,
Spread out her arms for the caress,
Made still and silent with excess
Of love and painful happiness.

9.

The Maid that lovely form survey'd;
Wistful she gazed, and knew her not,
But Nature to her heart convey'd
A sudden thrill, a startling thought,
A feeling many a year forgot,
Now like a dream anew recurring.
As if again in every vein
Her mother's milk was stirring.
With straining neck and earnest eye
She stretch'd her hands imploringly,
As if she fain would have her nigh,
Yet fear'd to meet the wish'd embrace,
At once with love and awe oppress'd.
Not so Ladurlad; he could trace,
Though brighten'd with angelic grace,
His own Yedillian's earthly face;
He ran and held her to his breast!
Oh joy above all joys of Heaven,
By Death alone to others given,
This moment hath to him restored
The early-lost, the long-deplored.

10.

They sin who tell us Love can die.
With life all other passions fly,
All others are but vanity.
In Heaven Ambition cannot dwell,
Nor Avarice in the vaults of Hell;
Earthly these passions of the Earth,
They perish where they have their birth;
But Love is indestructible.
Its holy flame forever burneth;
From Heaven it came, to Heaven returneth;
Too oft on Earth a troubled guest,
At times deceived, at times oppress'd,
It here is tried and purified,
Then hath in Heaven its perfect rest:
It soweth here with toil and care,
But the harvest-time of Love is there.

11.

Oh! when a Mother meets on high
The Babe she lost in infancy,
Hath she not then, for pains and fears,
The day of woe, the watchful night,
For all her sorrow, all her tears,
An over-payment of delight?

12.

A blessed family is this,
Assembled in the Bower of Bliss!
Strange woe, Ladurlad, hath been thine,

And pangs beyond all human measure,
 And thy reward is now divine,
 A foretaste of eternal pleasure.
 He knew indeed there was a day
 When all these joys would pass away,
 And he must quit this blest abode,
 And, taking up again the spell,
 Groan underneath the baleful load,
 And wander o'er the world again,
 Most wretched of the sons of men :
 Yet was this brief repose, as when
 A traveller in the Arabian sands,
 Half fainting on his sultry road,
 Hath reach'd the water-place at last ;
 And resting there beside the well,
 Thinks of the perils he has past,
 And gazes o'er the unbounded plain,
 The plain which must be traversed still,
 And drinks, — yet cannot drink his fill ;
 Then girds his patient loins again.
 So to Ladurlad now was given
 New strength, and confidence in Heaven,
 And hope, and faith invincible.

13.

For often would Ereenia tell
 Of what in elder days befell,
 When other Tyrants, in their might,
 Usurp'd dominion o'er the earth ;
 And Veeshnoo took a human birth,
 Deliverer of the Sons of men,
 And slew the huge Ernaccasen,
 And piecemeal rent, with lion force,
 Errenen's accursed corse,
 And humbled Baly in his pride ;
 And when the Giant Ravanen
 Had borne triumphant from his side
 Sita, the earth-born God's beloved bride,
 Then from his island-kingdom, laugh'd to scorn
 The insulted husband, and his power defied ;
 How, to revenge the wrong, in wrath he hied,
 Bridging the sea before his dreadful way,
 And met the hundred-headed foe,
 And dealt him the unerring blow ;
 By Brama's hand the righteous lance was given,
 And by that arm immortal driven,
 It laid the mighty Tyrant low ;
 And Earth, and Ocean, and high Heaven,
 Rejoiced to see his overthrow.
 Oh ! doubt not thou, Yedillian cried,
 Such fate Kehama will betide ;
 For there are Gods who look below, —
 Seeva, the Avenger, is not blind,
 Nor Veeshnoo careless for mankind.

14.

Thus was Ladurlad's soul imbued
 With hope and holy fortitude ;
 And Child and Sire, with pious mind,
 Alike resolved, alike resign'd,
 Look'd onward to the evil day :
 Faith was their comfort, Faith their stay ;
 They trusted Woe would pass away,
 And Tyranny would sink subdued,
 And Evil yield to Good.

15.

Lovely wert thou, O Flower of Earth !
 Above all flowers of mortal birth ;
 But foster'd in this Blissful Bower,
 From day to day, and hour to hour,
 Lovelier grew the lovely flower.
 O blessed, blessed company !
 When men and heavenly spirits greet,
 And they whom Death had sever'd meet,
 And hold again communion sweet ; —
 O blessed, blessed company !

16.

The Sun, careering round the sky,
 Beheld them with rejoicing eye,
 And bade his willing Charioteer
 Relax his speed as they drew near ;
 Aroun'in check'd the rainbow reins,
 The seven green coursers shook their manes,
 And brighter rays around them threw ;
 The Car of Glory in their view
 More radiant, more resplendent grew ;
 And Surya, through his veil of light,
 Beheld the Bower, and blest the sight.

17.

The Lord of Night, as he sail'd by,
 Stay'd his pearly boat on high ;
 And while around the Blissful Bower,
 He bade the softest moonlight flow,
 Linger'd to see that earthly flower,
 Forgetful of his Dragon foe,
 Who, mindful of their ancient feud,
 With open jaws of rage pursued.

18.

There all good Spirits of the air,
 Suras and Devetas, repair ;
 Aloft they love to hover there,
 And view the flower of mortal birth,
 Here for her innocence and worth,
 Transplanted from the fields of earth ;
 And him, who, on the dreadful day
 When Heaven was fill'd with consternation
 And Indra trembled with dismay,
 And for the sounds of joy and mirth,
 Woe was heard and lamentation,
 Defied the Rajah in his pride,
 Though all in Heaven and Earth beside Stood mute in dolorous expectation ;
 And, rushing forward in that hour,
 Saved the Swerga from his power.
 Grateful for this they hover nigh,
 And bless that blessed Company.

19.

One God alone, with wanton eye,
 Beheld them in their Bower ;
 O ye, he cried, who have defied
 The Rajah, will ye mock my power ?
 'Twas Camdeo riding on his love,
 'Twas the immortal Youth of Love ;
 If men below and Gods above,
 Subject alike, quoth he, have felt these darts,
 Shall ye alone, of all in story,

Boast impenetrable hearts?
 Hover here, my gentle lory,
 Gently hover, while I see
 To whom hath Fate decreed the glory,
 To the Glendoveer or me.

20.

Then, in the dewy evening sky,
 The bird of gorgeous plumery
 Poised his wings, and hover'd nigh.
 It chanced at that delightful hour
 Kailyal sat before the Bower,
 On the green bank with amaranth sweet,
 Where Ganges warbled at her feet.
 Ereenia there, before the Maid,
 His sails of ocean blue display'd;
 And sportive in her sight
 Moved slowly o'er the lake with gliding flight;
 Anon, with sudden stroke and strong,
 In rapid course careering, swept along;
 Now shooting downward from his heavenly height,
 Plunged in the deep below,
 Then rising, soar'd again,
 And shook the sparkling waters off like rain,
 And hovering o'er the silver surface hung.
 At him young Camdeo bent the bow;
 With living bees the bow was strung,
 The fatal bow of sugar-cane,
 And flowers which would inflame the heart
 With their petals barb'd the dart.

21.

The shaft, unerringly address'd,
 Unerring flew, and smote Ereenia's breast.
 Ah, Wanton! cried the Glendoveer,
 Go aim at idler hearts;
 Thy skill is baffled here!
 A deeper love I bear that Maid divine,
 A love that springeth from a higher will,
 A holier power than thine!

22.

A second shaft, while thus Ereenia cried,
 Had Camdeo aim'd at Kailyal's side;
 But, lo! the Bees which strung his bow
 Broke off, and took their flight.
 To that sweet Flower of earth they wing their way,
 Around her raven tresses play,
 And buzz about her with delight,
 As if with that melodious sound
 They strove to pay their willing duty
 To mortal purity and beauty.

23.

Ah! Wanton! cried the Glendoveer,
 No power hast thou for mischief here!
 Choose thou some idler breast,
 For these are proof, by nobler thoughts possess'd.
 Go, to thy plains of Matra go,
 And string again thy broken bow!

24.

Rightly Ereenia spake; and ill had thoughts
 Of earthly love besecm'd the sanctuary
 Where Kailyal had been wafted, that the Soul

Of her dead Mother there might strengthen her,
 Feeding her with the milk of heavenly lore,
 And influxes of Heaven imbue her heart
 With hope, and faith, and holy fortitude,
 Against the evil day. Here rest a while
 In peace, O father! mark'd for misery
 Above all sons of men; O daughter! doom'd
 For sufferings and for trials above all
 Of women;—yet both favor'd, both beloved
 By all good Powers, rest here a while in peace.

XI.

THE ENCHANTRESS.

1.

WHEN from the sword, by arm angelic driven,
 Foul Arvalan fled howling, wild in pain,
 His thin, essential spirit, rent and riven
 With wounds, united soon and heal'd again;
 Backward the accursed turn'd his eye in flight,
 Remindful of revengeful thoughts even then,
 And saw where, gliding through the evening light,
 The Ship of Heaven sail'd upward through the sky,
 Then, like a meteor, vanish'd from his sight.
 Where should he follow? vainly might he try
 To trace through trackless air its rapid course;
 Nor dared he that angelic arm defy,
 Still sore and writhing from its dreaded force.

2.

Should he the lust of vengeance lay aside?
 Too long had Arvalan in ill been train'd;
 Nurs'd up in power, and tyranny, and pride,
 His soul the ignominious thought disdain'd.
 Or to his mighty Father should he go,
 Complaining of defeature twice sustain'd,
 And ask new powers to meet the immortal foe?—
 Repulse he fear'd not, but he fear'd rebuke,
 And shamed to tell him of his overthrow.
 There dwelt a dread Enchantress in a nook
 Obscure; old helpmate she to him had been,
 Lending her aid in many a secret sin;
 And there, for counsel, now his way he took.

3.

She was a woman whose unlovely youth,
 Even like a canker'd rose which none will cull,
 Had wither'd on the stalk; her heart was full
 Of passions which had found no natural scope,
 Feelings which there had grown, but ripen'd not,
 Desires unsatisfied, abortive hope,
 Repinings which provoked vindictive thought:
 These restless elements forever wrought,
 Fermenting in her with perpetual stir,
 And thus, her spirit to all evil moved,
 She hated men because they loved not her,
 And hated women because they were lov'd.
 And thus, in wrath, and hatred, and despair,
 She tempted Hell to tempt her, and resign'd
 Her body to the Demons of the Air,
 Wicked and wanton fiends, who where they will Wander abroad, still seeking to do ill,

And take whatever vacant form they find,
 Carcass of man or beast that life hath left,
 Foul instrument for them of fouler mind.
 To these the Witch her wretched body gave,
 So they would wreak her vengeance on mankind;
 She thus at once their mistress and their slave;
 And they, to do such service nothing loath,
 Obey'd her bidding, slaves and masters both.

4.

So from this cursed intercourse she caught
 Contagious power of mischief, and was taught
 Such secrets as are damnable to guess.
 Is there a child whose little lovely ways
 Might win all hearts, — on whom his parents gaze
 Till they shed tears of joy and tenderness?
 Oh! hide him from that Witch's withering sight!
 Oh! hide him from the eye of Lorrinite!
 Her look hath crippling in it, and her curse
 All plagues which on mortality can light;
 Death is his doom if she behold, — or worse, —
 Diseases loathsome and incurable,
 And inward sufferings that no tongue can tell.

5.

Woe was to him on whom that eye of hate
 Was bent; for, certain as the stroke of Fate,
 It did its mortal work, nor human arts
 Could save the unhappy wretch, her chosen prey;
 For gazing, she consumed his vital parts,
 Eating his very core of life away.
 The wine which from yon wounded palm on high
 Fills yonder gourd, as slowly it distils,
 Grows sour at once if Lorrinite pass by.
 The deadliest worm from which all creatures fly,
 Fled from the deadlier venom of her eye;
 The babe unborn, within its mother's womb,
 Started and trembled when the Witch came nigh;
 And in the silent chambers of the tomb,
 Death shudder'd her unholy tread to hear,
 And from the dry and mouldering bones did fear
 Force a cold sweat, when Lorrinite was near.

6.

Power made her haughty: by ambition fired,
 Erelong to mightier mischiefs she aspired.
 The Calis, who o'er cities rule unseen,
 Each in her own domain a Demon Queen,
 And there adored with blood and human life,
 They knew her, and in their accurs'd employ
 She stirr'd up neighboring states to mortal strife.
 Sani, the dreadful God, who rides abroad
 Upon the King of the Ravens, to destroy
 The offending sons of men, when his four hands
 Were weary with their toil, would let her do
 His work of vengeance upon guilty lands;
 And Lorrinite, at his commandment, knew
 When the ripe earthquake should be loosed, and where

To point its course. And in the baneful air
 The pregnant seeds of death he bade her strew,
 All deadly plagues and pestilence to brew.
 The Locusts were her army, and their bands,
 Where'er she turn'd her skinny finger, flew.
 The floods in ruin roll'd at her commands;

And when, in time of drought, the husbandman
 Beheld the gathered rain about to fall,
 Her breath would drive it to the desert sands,
 While in the marshes' parch'd and gaping soil
 The rice-roots by the searching Sun were dried,
 And in lean groups, assembled at the side
 Of the empty tank, the cattle dropp'd and died;
 And Famine, at her bidding, wasted wide
 The wretched land, till, in the public way,
 Promiscuous where the dead and dying lay,
 Dogs fed on human bones in the open light of day.

7.

Her secret cell the accursed Arvalan,
 In quest of vengeance, sought, and thus began: —
 Mighty mother! mother wise!
 Revenge me on my enemies.

LORRINITE.

Comest thou, son, for aid to me?
 Tell me who have injured thee,
 Where they are, and who they be;
 Of the Earth, or of the Sea,
 Or of the aerial company?
 Earth, nor Sea, nor Air is free
 From the powers who wait on me,
 And my tremendous witchery.

ARVALAN.

She for whom so ill I sped,
 Whom my father deemeth dead,
 Lives, for Marriataly's aid
 From the water saved the Maid.
 In hatred I desire her still,
 And in revenge would have my will.
 A Deveta with wings of blue,
 And sword whose edge even now I rue,
 In a Ship of Heaven on high,
 Pilots her along the sky.
 Where they voyage thou canst tell,
 Mistress of the mighty spell.

8.

At this the Witch, through shrivell'd lips and thin,
 Sent forth a sound half whistle and half hiss.
 Two winged Hands came in,
 Armless and bodiless,
 Bearing a globe of liquid crystal, set
 In frame as diamond bright, yet black as jet.
 A thousand eyes were quench'd in endless night
 To form that magic globe; for Lorrinite
 Had, from their sockets, drawn the liquid sight,
 And kneaded it, with re-creating skill,
 Into this organ of her mighty will.
 Look in yonder orb, she cried;
 Tell me what is there descried.

9.

ARVALAN.

A mountain top, in clouds of light
 Enveloped, rises on my sight;
 Thence a cataract rushes down,
 Hung with many a rainbow crown;
 Light and clouds conceal its head;
 Below, a silver lake is spread;

Upon its shores a Bower I see
Fit home for blessed company.
See, they come forward, — one, two, three, —
The last a Maiden, — it is she!
The foremost shakes his wings of blue;
'Tis he whose sword even yet I rue;
And in that other one I know
The visage of my deadliest foe.
Mother, let thy magic might
Arm me for the mortal fight;
Helm, and shield, and mail afford,
Proof against his dreaded sword.
Then will I invade their seat;
Then shall vengeance be complete.

10.

LORRINITE.

Spirits, who obey my will,
Hear him, and his wish fulfil!

So spake the mighty Witch, nor further spell
Needed; anon a sound, like smother'd thunder,
Was heard, slow rolling under;
The solid pavement of the cell
Quaked, heaved, and cleft asunder,
And at the feet of Arvalan display'd,
Helmet and mail, and shield and cimeter, were laid.

11.

The Asuras, often put to flight
And scatter'd in the fields of light
By their foes' celestial might,
Forged this enchanted armor for the fight.
'Mid fires intense did they anneal,
In mountain furnaces, the quivering steel,
Till, trembling through each deepening hue,
It settled in a midnight blue;
Last they cast it, to aslake,
In the penal icy lake.
Then they consigned it to the Giant brood;
And while they forged the impenetrable arms,
The Evil Powers, to oversee them, stood,
And there imbued
The work of Giant strength with magic charms.
Foul Arvalan, with joy, survey'd
The crescent sabre's cloudy blade,
With deeper joy the impervious mail,
The shield and helmet of avail.
Soon did he himself array,
And bade her speed him on his way.

12.

Then she led him to the den,
Where her chariot, night and day,
Stood harness'd ready for the way.
Two Dragons, yoked in adamant, convey
The magic car; from either collar sprung
An adamantine rib, which met in air,
O'erarch'd, and cross'd, and bent, diverging there,
And firmly in its arc upbore,
Upon their brazen necks, the seat of power.
Arvalan mounts the car, and in his hand
Receives the magic reins from Lorrinite;
The Dragons, long obedient to command,

Their ample sails expand;
Like steeds well-broken to fair lady's hand
They feel the reins of might,
And up the northern sky begin their flight.

13.

Son of the Wicked, doth thy soul delight
To think its hour of vengeance now is nigh?
Lo! where the far-off light
Of Indra's palace flashes on his sight,
And Meru's heavenly summit shines on high,
With clouds of glory bright,
Amid the dark-blue sky.
Already, in his hope, doth he espy,
Himself secure in mail of tenfold charms,
Ereania writhing from the magic blade,
The Father sent to bear his Curse, — the Maid
Resisting vainly in his impious arms.

14.

Ah, Sinner! whose anticipating soul
Incurs the guilt even when the crime is spared!
Joyous toward Meru's summit on he fared,
While the twin Dragons, rising as he guides,
With steady flight, steer northward for the pole.
Anon, with irresistible control,
Force mightier far than his arrests their course;
It wrought as though a Power unseen had caught
Their adamantine yokes to drag them on.
Straight on they bend their way, and now, in vain,
Upward doth Arvalan direct the rein;
The rein of magic might avails no more;
Bootless its strength against that unseen Power,
That, in their mid career,
Hath seized the Chariot and the Charioteer.
With hands resisting, and down-pressing feet
Upon their hold insisting,
He struggles to maintain his difficult seat.
Seeking in vain with that strange Power to vie,
Their doubled speed the affrighted Dragons try.
Forced in a stream from whence was no retreat,
Strong as they are, behold them whirled along,
Headlong, with useless pennons, through the sky.

15.

What Power was that, which, with resistless might,
Foil'd the dread magic thus of Lorrinite?
'Twas all commanding Nature. — They were here
Within the sphere of the adamantine rocks
Which gird Mount Meru round, as far below
That heavenly height where Ganges hath its birth
Involv'd in clouds and light,
So far above its roots of ice and snow.

16.

On — on they roll, — rapt headlong they roll on, —
The lost canoe, less rapidly than this,
Down the precipitous stream is whirl'd along
To the brink of Niagara's dread abyss.
On — on they roll, and now, with shivering shock,
Are dash'd against the rock that girds the Pole.
Down from his shatter'd mail the unhappy Soul
Is dropp'd, — ten thousand thousand fathoms
down, —
Till in an ice-rift, 'mid the eternal snow,

Foul Arvalan is stopp'd. There let him howl,
Groan there,—and there, with unavailing moan,
For aid on his Almighty Father call.

17.

All human sounds are lost
Amid those deserts of perpetual frost,
Old Winter's drear domain,
Beyond the limits of the living World,
Beyond Kehama's reign.
Of utterance and of motion soon bereft,
Frozen to the ice-rock, there behold him lie,
Only the painful sense of Being left,
A Spirit who must feel, and cannot die,
Bleaching and bare beneath the polar sky.

XII.

THE SACRIFICE COMPLETED.

1.

O YE who, by the Lake
On Meru Mount, partake
The joys which Heaven hath destin'd for the blest,
Swift, swift the moments fly,
The silent hours go by,
And ye must leave your dear abode of rest.
O wretched Man, prepare
Again thy Curse to bear!
Prepare, O wretched Maid, for further woe!
The fatal hour draws near,
When Indra's heavenly sphere
Must own the Tyrant of the World below.
To-day the hundredth Steed
At Seeva's shrine must bleed;
The dreadful sacrifice is full to-day;
Nor man nor God hath power,
At this momentous hour,
Again to save the Swerga from his sway.
Fresh woes, O Maid divine,
Fresh trials must be thine:
And what must thou, Ladurlad, yet endure!
But let your hearts be strong,
And rise against all wrong,
For Providence is just, and virtue is secure.

2.

They, little deeming that the fatal day
Was come, beheld, where through the morning sky
A Ship of Heaven drew nigh.
Onward they watch it steer its steady flight;
Till, wondering, they espy
Old Casyapa, the Sire of Gods, alight.
But when Ereenia saw the Sire appear,
At that unwonted and unwelcome sight
His heart received a sudden shock of fear.
Thy presence doth its doleful tidings tell,
O Father! cried the startled Glendoveer!
The dreadful hour is near! I know it well!
Not for less import would the Sire of Gods
Forsake his ancient and august abodes.

3.

Even so, serene the immortal Sire replies;
Soon like an earthquake will ye feel the blow
Which consummates the mighty sacrifice:
And this World, and its Heaven, and all therein,
Are then Kehama's. To the second ring
Of these seven Spheres, the Swerga King,
Even now, prepares for flight,
Beyond the circle of the conquer'd world,
Beyond the Rajah's might.
Ocean, that clips this inmost of the Spheres,
And girds it round with everlasting roar,
Set like a gem appears
Within that bending shore.
Thither fly all the Sons of heavenly race:
I, too, forsake mine ancient dwelling-place.
And now, O Child and Father, ye must go—
Take up the burden of your woe,
And wander once again below.
With patient heart hold onward to the end:
Be true unto yourselves, and bear in mind
That every God is still the good Man's friend;
And when the Wicked have their day assign'd,
Then they who suffer bravely save mankind.

4.

Oh, tell me, cried Ereenia,—for from thee
Nought can be hidden,—when the end will be.

Seek not to know, old Casyapa replied,
What pleaseth Heaven to hide.
Dark is the abyss of Time,
But light enough to guide your steps is given;
Whatever weal or woe betide,
Turn never from the way of truth aside,
And leave the event, in holy hope, to Heaven
The moment is at hand; no more delay;
Ascend the ethereal bark, and go your way;
And Ye, of heavenly nature, follow me.

5.

The will of Heaven be done, Ladurlad cried;
Nor more the man replied,
But placed his daughter in the ethereal bark,
Then took his seat beside.
There was no word at parting, no adieu.
Down from that empyreal height they flew:
One groan Ladurlad breathed, yet utter'd not,
When, to his heart and brain,
The fiery Curse again like lightning shot.
And now on earth the Sire and Child alight;
Up soar'd the Ship of Heaven, and sail'd away from sight.

6.

O ye immortal Bowers,
Where hitherto the Hours
Have led their dance of happiness for aye,
With what a sense of woe
Do ye expect the blow,
And see your heavenly dwellers driven away!
Lo! where the aunney-birds of graceful mien,
Whose milk-white forms were seen,
Lovely as Nymphs, your ancient trees between,

And by your silent springs,
 With melancholy cry,
 Now spread unwilling wings;
 Their stately necks reluctant they protend,
 And through the sullen sky,
 To other worlds, their mournful progress bend.

The affrighted gales to-day
 O'er their beloved streams no longer play;
 The streams of Paradise have ceased to flow;
 The Fountain-Tree withholds its diamond-shower
 In this portentous hour, —
 This dolorous hour, — this universal woe.
 Where is the Palace, whose far-flashing beams,
 With streaks and streams of ever-varying light,
 Brighten'd the polar night
 Around the frozen North's extremest shore?
 Gone like a morning rainbow, — like a dream, —
 A star that shoots and falls, and then is seen no more.

8.

Now! now! — Before the Golden Palaces,
 The Bramin strikes the inevitable hour.
 The fatal blow is given,
 That over Earth and Heaven
 Confirms the Almighty Rajah in his power.
 All evil Spirits then,
 That roam the World about,
 Or wander through the sky,
 Set up a joyful shout.
 The Asuras and the Giants join the cry;
 The damn'd in Padalon acclaim
 Their hoped Deliverer's name;
 Heaven trembles with the thunder-drowning
 sound;
 Back starts affrighted Ocean from the shore,
 And the adamantine vaults and brazen floor
 Of Hell are shaken with the roar.
 Up rose the Rajah through the conquer'd sky,
 To seize the Swerga for his proud abode;
 Myriads of evil Genii round him fly,
 As royally on wings of winds he rode,
 And scaled high Heaven, triumphant like a God.

XIII.

THE RETREAT.

1.

AROUND her Father's neck the Maiden lock'd
 Her arms, when that portentous blow was given;
 Clinging to him she heard the dread uproar,
 And felt the shuddering shock which ran through
 Heaven;
 Earth underneath them rock'd,
 Her strong foundations heaving in commotion,
 Such as wild winds upraise in raving Ocean,
 As though the solid base were rent asunder.
 And lo! where, storming the astonish'd sky,
 Kehama and his evil host ascend!
 Before them rolls the thunder;
 Ten thousand thousand lightnings round them fly;

Upward the lengthening pageantries aspire,
 Leaving from Earth to Heaven a widening wake of fire.

2.

When the wild uproar was at length allay'd,
 And Earth, recovering from the shock, was still,
 Thus to her Father spake the imploring Maid: —
 Oh! by the love which we so long have borne
 Each other, and we ne'er shall cease to bear, —
 Oh! by the sufferings we have shared,
 And must not cease to share, —
 One boon I supplicate in this dread hour,
 One consolation in this hour of woe!
 Father, thou hast it in thy power;
 Thou wilt not, Father, sure refuse me now
 The only comfort my poor heart can know.

3.

O dearest, dearest Kailyal! with a smile
 Of tenderness and anguish, he replied,
 O best beloved, and to be loved the best,
 Best worthy, — set thy duteous heart at rest.
 I know thy wish, and let what will betide,
 Ne'er will I leave thee wilfully again.
 My soul is strengthen'd to endure its pain;
 Be thou, in all my wanderings, still my guide;
 Be thou, in all my sufferings, at my side.

4.

The Maiden, at those welcome words, impress'd
 A passionate kiss upon her Father's cheek:
 They look'd around them then, as if to seek
 Where they should turn, North, South, or East, or West,
 Wherever to their vagrant feet seem'd best.
 But, turning from the view her mournful eyes,
 Oh, whither should we wander? Kailyal cries,
 Or wherefore seek in vain a place of rest?
 Have we not here the Earth beneath our tread,
 Heaven overhead,
 A brook that winds through this sequester'd glade,
 And yonder woods, to yield us fruit and shade?
 The little all our wants require is nigh;
 Hope we have none; — why travel on in fear?
 We cannot fly from Fate, and Fate will find us here.

5.

'Twas a fair scene wherein they stood,
 A green and sunny glade amid the wood,
 And in the midst an aged Bannian grew.
 It was a goodly sight to see
 That venerable tree,
 For o'er the lawn, irregularly spread,
 Fifty straight columns propp'd its lofty head;
 And many a long, depending shoot,
 Seeking to strike its root,
 Straight like a plummet, grew towards the ground.
 Some on the lower boughs which cross'd their way,
 Fixing their bearded fibres, round and round,
 With many a ring and wild contortion wound;
 Some to the passing wind, at times, with sway
 Of gentle motion swung;
 Others, of younger growth, unmoved, were hung
 Like stone-drops from the cavern's fretted height:

Beneath was smooth and fair to sight,
 Nor weeds nor briers deform'd the natural floor,
 And through the leafy cope which bower'd it o'er
 Came gleams of checker'd light.
 So like a temple did it seem, that there
 A pious heart's first impulse would be prayer.

6.

A brook, with easy current, murmur'd near;
 Water so cool and clear
 The peasants drink not from the humble well,
 Which they, with sacrifice of rural pride,
 Have wedded to the cocoa-grove beside;
 Nor tanks of costliest masonry dispense
 To those in towns who dwell,
 The work of Kings, in their beneficence.
 Fed by perpetual springs, a small lagoon,
 Pellucid, deep, and still, in silence join'd,
 And swell'd the passing stream. Like burnish'd steel
 Glowing, it lay beneath the eye of noon;
 And when the breezes, in their play,
 Ruffled the darkening surface, then, with gleam
 Of sudden light, around the lotus stem
 It rippled, and the sacred flowers, that crown
 The lakelet with their roseate beauty, ride,
 In easy waving rock'd, from side to side;
 And as the wind upheaves
 Their broad and buoyant weight, the glossy leaves
 Flap on the twinkling waters, up and down.

7.

They built them here a bower, of jointed cane,
 Strong for the needful use; and light and long
 Was the slight framework rear'd, with little pain;
 Lithe creepers, then, the wicker sides supply,
 And the tall jungle-grass fit roofing gave Beneath the genial sky.
 And here did Kailyal, each returning day,
 Pour forth libations from the brook to pay
 The Spirits of her Sires their grateful rite;
 In such libations pour'd in open glades,
 Beside clear streams and solitary shades,
 The Spirits of the virtuous dead delight.
 And duly here, to Marriataly's praise,
 The Maid, as with an angel's voice of song,
 Pour'd her melodious lays
 Upon the gales of even,
 And gliding in religious dance along,
 Moved graceful as the dark-eyed Nymphs of Heaven;
 Such harmony to all her steps was given.

8.

Thus ever, in her Father's dotting eye,
 Kailyal perform'd the customary rite;
 He, patient of his burning pain the while,
 Beheld her, and approved her pious toil;
 And sometimes, at the sight,
 A melancholy smile
 Would gleam upon his awful countenance.
 He, too, by day and night, and every hour,
 Paid to a higher Power his sacrifice;
 An offering, not of ghee, or fruit, and rice,
 Flower-crown, or blood; but of a heart subdued,

A resolute, unconquer'd fortitude,
 An agony repress'd, a will resign'd,
 To her, who, on her secret throne reclin'd,
 Amid the Sea of Milk, by Veeshnoo's side,
 Looks with an eye of mercy on mankind.
 By the Preserver, with his power endued,
 There Voomdavee beholds this lower clime,
 And marks the silent sufferings of the good,
 To recompense them in her own good time.

9.

O force of faith! O strength of virtuous will!
 Behold him in his endless martyrdom,
 Triumphant still!
 The Curse still burning in his heart and brain;
 And yet doth he remain
 Patient the while, and tranquil, and content!
 The pious soul hath framed unto itself
 A second nature, to exist in pain
 As in its own allotted element.

10.

Such strength the will reveal'd had given
 This holy pair, such influxes of grace,
 That to their solitary resting-place
 They brought the peace of Heaven.
 Yea, all around was hallow'd! Danger, Fear,
 Nor thought of evil ever enter'd here.
 A charm was on the Leopard when he came Within the circle of that mystic glade;
 Submit he crouch'd before the heavenly Maid,
 And offer'd to her touch his speckled side;
 Or, with arch'd back erect, and bending head,
 And eyes half-closed for pleasure, would he stand,
 Courting the pressure of her gentle hand.

11.

Trampling his path through wood and brake,
 And canes which crackling fall before his way,
 And tassel-grass, whose silvery feathers play,
 O'ertopping the young trees,
 On comes the Elephant, to slake
 His thirst at noon in yon pellucid springs.
 Lo! from his trunk upturn'd, aloft he flings
 The grateful shower; and now
 Plucking the broad-leaved bough
 Of yonder plane, with wavy motion slow,
 Fanning the languid air,
 He moves it to and fro.
 But when that form of beauty meets his sight,
 The trunk its undulating motion stops,
 From his forgetful hold the plane-branch drops,
 Reverent he kneels, and lifts his rational eyes
 To her as if in prayer;
 And when she pours her angel voice in song,
 Intranced he listens to the thrilling notes,
 Till his strong temples, bathed with sudden dews,
 Their fragrance of delight and love diffuse.

12.

Lo! as the voice melodious floats around,
 The Antelope draws near,
 The Tigress leaves her toothless cubs to hear;
 The Snake comes gliding from the secret brake,
 Himself in fascination forced along

By that enchanting song ;
 The antic Monkeys, whose wild gambols late,
 When not a breeze waved the tall jungle-grass,
 Shook the whole wood, are hush'd, and silently
 Hang on the cluster'd tree.
 All things in wonder and delight are still ;
 Only at times the Nightingale is heard,
 Not that in emulous skill that sweetest bird
 Her rival strain would try,
 A mighty songster, with the Maid to vie ;
 She only bore her part in powerful sympathy.

13.

Well might they thus adore that heavenly Maid !
 For never Nymph of Mountain,
 Or Grove, or Lake, or Fountain,
 With a diviner presence fill'd the shade.
 No idle ornaments deface
 Her natural grace,
 Musk-spot, nor sandal-streak, nor scarlet stain,
 Ear-drop nor chain, nor arm nor ankle-ring,
 Nor trinketry on front, or neck, or breast,
 Marring the perfect form : she seem'd a thing
 Of Heaven's prime uncorrupted work, a child
 Of early nature undefiled,
 A daughter of the years of innocence.
 And therefore all things loved her. When she stood
 Beside the glassy pool, the fish, that flies
 Quick as an arrow from all other eyes,
 Hover'd to gaze on her. The mother bird,
 When Kailyal's step she heard,
 Sought not to tempt her from her secret nest,
 But, hastening to the dear retreat, would fly
 To meet and welcome her benignant eye.

14.

Hope we have none, said Kailyal to her Sire.
 Said she aright ? and had the mortal Maid
 No thoughts of heavenly aid, —
 No secret hopes her inmost heart to move
 With longings of such deep and pure desire,
 As Vestal Maids, whose piety is love,
 Feel in their ecstasies, when, rapp'd above,
 Their souls unto their heavenly Spouse aspire ?
 Why else so often doth that searching eye
 Roam through the scope of sky ?
 Why, if she sees a distant speck on high,
 Starts there that quick suffusion to her cheek ?
 'Tis but the Eagle in his heavenly height ;
 Reluctant to believe, she hears his cry,
 And marks his wheeling flight,
 Then pensively averts her mournful sight.
 Why ever else, at morn, that waking sigh,
 Because the lovely form no more is nigh
 Which hath been present to her soul all night ;
 And that injurious fear
 Which ever, as it riseth, is repress'd,
 Yet riseth still within her troubled breast,
 That she no more shall see the Glendoveer !

15.

Hath he forgotten me ? The wrongful thought
 Would stir within her, and, though still repell'd
 With shame and self-reproaches, would recur.

75

Days after days unvarying come and go,
 And neither friend nor foe
 Approaches them in their sequester'd bower.
 Maid of strange destiny ! but think not thou
 Thou art forgotten now,
 And hast no cause for further hope or fear ;
 High-fated Maid, thou dost not know
 What eyes watch over thee for weal and woe !
 Even at this hour,
 Searching the dark decrees divine,
 Kehama, in the fulness of his power,
 Perceives his thread of fate entwine with thine.
 The Glendoveer, from his far sphere,
 With love that never sleeps, beholds thee here,
 And in the hour permitted will be near.
 Dark Lorrinite on thee hath fixed her sight,
 And laid her wiles, to aid
 Foul Arvalan when he shall next appear ;
 For well she ween'd his Spirit would renew
 Old vengeance now, with unremitting hate ;
 The Enchantress well that evil nature knew ;
 The accursed Spirit hath his prey in view ;
 And thus, while all their separate hopes pursue,
 All work, unconsciously, the will of Fate.

16.

Fate work'd its own the while. A band
 Of Yoguees, as they roam'd the land,
 Seeking a spouse for Jaga-Naut, their God,
 Stray'd to this solitary glade,
 And reach'd the bower wherein the Maid abode
 Wondering at form so fair, they deem'd the Power
 Divine had led them to his chosen bride,
 And seized and bore her from her Father's side.

XIV.

JAGA-NAUT.

1.

Joy in the City of great Jaga-Naut !
 Joy in the seven-headed Idol's shrine !
 A Virgin-bride his ministers have brought,
 A mortal Maid, in form and face divine,
 Peerless among all daughters of mankind ;
 Search'd they the world again from East to West,
 In endless quest,
 Seeking the fairest and the best,
 No maid so lovely might they hope to find ;—
 For she hath breathed celestial air,
 And heavenly food hath been her fare,
 And heavenly thoughts and feelings give her face
 That heavenly grace.
 Joy in the City of great Jaga-Naut,
 Joy in the seven-headed Idol's shrine !
 The fairest Maid his Yoguees sought ;
 A fairer than the fairest have they brought,
 A Maid of charms surpassing human thought,
 A Maid divine.

2.

Now bring ye forth the Chariot of the God !
 Bring him abroad,

That through the swarming City he may ride ;
 And by his side
 Place ye the Maid of more than mortal grace,
 The Maid of perfect form and heavenly face ;
 Set her aloft in triumph, like a bride
 Upon the Bridal Car,
 And spread the joyful tidings wide and far, —
 Spread it with trump and voice,
 That all may hear, and all who hear rejoice, —
 Great Jaga-Naut hath found his mate ! the God
 Will ride abroad !
 To-night will he go forth from his abede !
 Ye myriads who adore him,
 Prepare the way before him !

3.

Uprear'd on twenty wheels elate,
 Huge as a Ship, the Bridal Car appear'd ;
 Loud creak its ponderous wheels, as through the gate
 A thousand Bramins drag the enormous load.
 There throned aloft in state,
 The Image of the seven-headed God
 Came forth from his abode ; and at his side
 Sat Kailyal like a bride.
 A bridal statue rather might she seem,
 For she regarded all things like a dream,
 Having no thought, nor fear, nor will, nor aught
 Save hope and faith, that lived within her still.

4.

O silent Night, how have they startled thee
 With the brazen trumpet's blare !
 And thou, O Moon ! whose quiet light serene
 Filleth wide heaven, and bathing hill and wood,
 Spreads o'er the peaceful valley like a flood,
 How have they dimm'd thee with the torches'
 glare,
 Which round yon moving pageant flame and flare,
 As the wild rout, with deafening song and shout,
 Fling their long flashes out,
 That, like infernal lightnings, fire the air.

5.

A thousand pilgrims strain
 Arm, shoulder, breast, and thigh, with might and main,
 To drag that sacred wain,
 And scarce can draw along the enormous load.
 Prone fall the frantic votaries in its road,
 And calling on the God,
 Their self-devoted bodies there they lay
 To pave his chariot-way.
 On Jaga-Naut they call ;
 The ponderous Car rolls on, and crushes all.
 Through flesh and bones it ploughs its dreadful path.
 Groans rise unheard ; the dying cry,
 And death and agony
 Are trodden under foot by yon mad throng,
 Who follow close, and thrust the deadly wheels along.

6.

Pale grows the Maid at this accursed sight ;
 The yells which round her rise
 Have roused her with affright,

And fear hath given to her dilated eyes
 A wilder light.
 Where shall those eyes be turn'd ? she knows not where !
 Downward they dare not look, for there
 Is death, and horror, and despair ;
 Nor can her patient looks to Heaven repair,
 For the huge Idol over her, in air,
 Spreads his seven hideous heads, and wide
 Extends their snaky necks on every side ;
 And all around, behind, before
 The Bridal Car, is the raging rout,
 With frantic shout and deafening roar,
 Tossing the torches' flames about.
 And the double double peals of the drum are there,
 And the startling burst of the trumpet's blare ;
 And the gong, that seems, with its thunders dread,
 To astound the living, and waken the dead.
 The ear-strings throb as if they were rent,
 And the eyelids drop as stunned and spent.
 Fain would the Maid have kept them fast ;
 But open they start at the crack of the blast.

7.

Where art thou, Son of Heaven, Ereenia ! where,
 In this dread hour of horror and despair ?
 Thinking on him, she strove her fear to quell —
 If he be near me, then will all be well ;
 And, if he reck not for my misery,
 Let come the worst ; it matters not to me.
 Repel that wrongful thought,
 O Maid ! thou feelest, but believ'st it not ;
 It is thine own imperfect nature's fault
 That lets one doubt of him arise within ;
 And this the Virgin knew ; and like a sin
 Repell'd the thought, and still believed him true,
 And summon'd up her spirit to endure
 All forms of fear, in that firm trust secure.

8.

She needs that faith, she needs that consolation,
 For now the Car hath measured back its track
 Of death, and hath reëntered now its station.
 There, in the Temple-court, with song and dance,
 A harlot-band, to meet the Maid, advance.
 The drum hath ceas'd its peals ; the trump and gong
 Are still ; the frantic crowd forbear their yells ;
 And sweet it was to hear the voice of song,
 And the sweet music of their girdle-bells,
 Armlets and anklets, that, with cheerful sound,
 Symphonious tinkled as they wheel'd around.

9.

They sung a bridal measure,
 A song of pleasure,
 A hymn of joyance and of gratulation.
 Go, chosen One, they cried,
 Go, happy bride !
 For thee the God descends in expectation !
 For thy dear sake
 He leaves his Heaven, O Maid of matchless charms !
 Go, happy One, the bed divine partake,
 And fill his longing arms !
 Thus to the inner fane,
 With circling dance and hymeneal strain,

The astonish'd Maid they led,
And there they laid her on the bridal bed.
Then forth they go, and close the Temple-gate,
And leave the wretched Kailyal to her fate.

10.

Where art thou, Son of Heaven, Ereenia, where?
From the loathed bed she starts, and in the air
Looks up, as if she thought to find him there;

Then, in despair,
Anguish, and agony, and hopeless prayer,
Prostrate she laid herself upon the floor.

There trembling as she lay,
The Bramin of the fane advanced,
And came to seize his prey.

But as the abominable Priest drew nigh,
A power invisible opposed his way;
Starting, he utter'd wildly a death-cry,
And fell. At that the Maid all eagerly
Lifted in hope her head;

She thought her own deliverer had been near;
When lo! with other life reanimate,
She saw the dead arise,

And in the fiendish joy within his eyes,
She knew the hateful Spirit who look'd through
Their specular orbs, — clothed in the flesh of man,
She knew the accursed soul of Arvalan.

11.

Where art thou, Son of Heaven, Ereenia, where?
But not in vain, with sudden shriek of fear,
She calls Ereenia now; the Glendoveer
Is here! Upon the guilty sight he burst Like lightning from a cloud, and caught the accurs'd,

Bore him to the roof aloft, and on the floor
With vengeance dash'd him, quivering there in gore.

Lo! from the pregnant air — heart-withering
sight —

There issued forth the dreadful Lorrinite.

Seize him! the Enchantress cried;

A host of Demons at her word appear,
And, like tornado winds, from every side
At once they rush upon the Glendoveer.

Alone against a legion, little here
Avails his single might,

Nor that celestial falchion, which in fight
So oft had put the rebel race to flight.

There are no Gods on earth to give him aid;
Hemm'd round, he is overpower'd, beat down, and bound,

And at the feet of Lorrinite is laid.

12.

Meantime the scatter'd members of the slain,
Obedient to her mighty voice, assumed

Their vital form again,

And that foul Spirit, upon vengeance bent,
Fled to the fleshly tencment.

Lo! here, quoth Lorrinite, thou seest thy foe!

Him in the Ancient Sepulchres, below

The billows of the Ocean, will I lay;

Gods are there none to help him now, and there
For Man there is no way.

To that dread scene of durance and despair,

Asuras, bear your enemy! I go
To chain him in the Tombs. Meantime do thou,
Freed from thy foe, and now secure from fear,
Son of Kehama, take thy pleasure here.

13.

Her words the accursed race obey'd;
Forth with a sound like rushing winds they fled;
And of all aid from Earth or Heaven bereft,
Alone with Arvalan the Maid was left.

But in that hour of agony, the Maid
Deserted not herself; her very dread

Had calm'd her; and her heart

Knew the whole horror, and its only part.

Yamen, receive me undefiled! she said,
And seized a torch, and fired the bridal bed.

Up ran the rapid flames; on every side
They find their fuel wheresoe'er they spread;
Thin hangings, fragrant gums, and odorous wood,
That piled like sacrificial altars stood.

Around they run, and upward they aspire,
And, lo! the huge Pagoda lined with fire.

14.

The wicked Soul, who had assumed again
A form of sensible flesh for his foul will,
Still bent on base revenge, and baffled still,
Felt that corporeal shape alike to pain
Obnoxious as to pleasure: forth he flew,
Howling and scorch'd by the devouring flame;
Accursed Spirit! Still condemn'd to rue,
The act of sin and punishment the same.
Freed from his loathsome touch, a natural dread
Came on the self-devoted, and she drew
Back from the flames, which now toward her spread,
And, like a living monster, seem'd to dart
Their hungry tongues toward their shrinking prey.

Soon she subdued her heart;

“O Father!” she exclaim'd, “there was no way
But this! And thou, Ereenia, who for me
Sufferest, my soul shall bear thee company.”

15.

So having said, she knit

Her body up to work her soul's desire,
And rush at once among the thickest fire.

A sudden cry withheld her, — “Kailyal, stay!
Child! daughter! I am here!” the voice exclaims,
And from the gate, unharm'd, through smoke and flames,

Like as a God, Ladurlad made his way;
Wrapp'd his preserving arms around, and bore
His Child, uninjured, o'er the burning floor.

XV.

THE CITY OF BALY.

1.

KAILYAL.

Ereenia!

LADURLAD.

Nay, let no reproachful thought
Wrong his heroic heart! The Evil Powers

Have the dominion o'er this wretched World,
And no good Spirit now can venture here.

KAILYAL.

Alas, my Father! he hath ventured here,
And saved me from one horror. But the Powers
Of Evil beat him down, and bore away
To some dread scene of durance and despair;
The Ancient Tombs, methought their mistress
said,
Beneath the ocean waves; no way for Man
Is there; and Gods, she boasted, there are none
On Earth to help him now.

LADURLAD.

Is that her boast?
And hath she laid him in the Ancient Tombs,
Relying that the Waves will guard him there?
Short-sighted are the eyes of Wickedness,
And all its craft but folly. Oh my child!
The Curses of the Wicked are upon me,
And the immortal Deities, who see
And suffer all things for their own wise end,
Have made them blessings to us!

KAILYAL.

Then thou knowest
Where they have borne him?

LADURLAD.

To the Sepulchres
Of the Ancient Kings, which Baly, in his power,
Made in primeval times; and built above them
A City, like the Cities of the Gods,
Being like a God himself. For many an age
Hath Ocean warr'd against his Palaces,
Till, overwhelm'd, they lie beneath the waves,
Not overthrown, so well the awful Chief
Had laid their deep foundations. Rightly said
The Accursed, that no way for man was there;
But not like man am I!

2.

Up from the ground the Maid exultant sprung,
And clapp'd her happy hands in attitude
Of thanks to Heaven, and flung
Her arms around her Father's neck, and stood
Struggling awhile for utterance, with excess
Of hope and pious thankfulness.
Come—come! she cried. Oh let us not delay,—
He is in torments there,—away!—away!

3.

Long time they travell'd on; at dawn of day
Still setting forward with the earliest light,
Nor ceasing from their way
Till darkness closed the night.
Short refuge from the noontide heat,
Reluctantly compell'd, the Maiden took,
And ill her indefatigable feet
Could that brief respite brook.
Hope kept her up, and her intense desire
Supports that heart which ne'er at danger quails,
Those feet which never tire,
That frame which never fails.

4.

Their talk was of the City of the days
Of old, Earth's wonder once, and of the fame
Of Baly, its great founder,—he whose name,
In ancient story and in poet's praise,
Liveth and flourisheth for endless glory,
Because his might
Put down the wrong, and aye upheld the right.
Till for ambition, as old sages tell,
At length the universal Monarch fell:
For he too, having made the World his own,
Then in his pride, had driven
The Devetas from Heaven,
And seized triumphantly the Swerga throne.
The Incarnate came before the Mighty One,
In dwarfish stature, and in mien obscure;
The sacred cord he bore,
And ask'd, for Brama's sake, a little boon,
Three steps of Baly's ample reign, no more.
Poor was the boon required, and poor was he
Who begg'd,—a little wretch it seem'd to be;
But Baly ne'er refused a suppliant's prayer.
He on the Dwarf cast down
A glance of pity in contemptuous mood,
And bade him take the boon,
And measure where he would.

5.

Lo, Son of giant birth,
I take my grant! the Incarnate Power replies.
With his first step he measured o'er the Earth;
The second spann'd the skies.
Three paces thou hast granted;
Twice have I set my footstep, Veeshnoo cries,
Where shall the third be planted?

6.

Then Baly knew the God, and at his feet,
In homage due, he laid his humbled head.
Mighty art thou, O Lord of Earth and Heaven,
Mighty art thou! he said;
Be merciful, and let me be forgiven.
He ask'd for mercy of the Merciful,
And mercy for his virtue's sake was shown.
For though he was cast down to Padalon,
Yet there, by Yamen's throne,
Doth Baly sit in majesty and might,
To judge the dead, and sentence them aright.
And forasmuch as he was still the friend
Of righteousness, it is permitted him,
Yearly, from those drear regions to ascend
And walk the Earth, that he may hear his name
Still hymn'd and honor'd by the grateful voice
Of human-kind, and in his fame rejoice.

7.

Such was the talk they held upon their way,
Of him to whose old City they were bound;
And now, upon their journey, many a day
Had risen and closed, and many a week gone
round,
And many a realm and region had they pass'd,
When now the Ancient Towers appear'd at last.

8.

Their golden summits, in the noon-day light,
Shone o'er the dark-green deep that roll'd between ;
For domes, and pinnacles, and spires were seen
Peering above the sea — a mournful sight !
Well might the sad beholder ween from thence
What works of wonder the devouring wave
Had swallow'd there, when monuments so brave
Bore record of their old magnificence.
And on the sandy shore, beside the verge
Of Ocean, here and there, a rock-hewn fane
Resisted in its strength the surf and surge
That on their deep foundations beat in vain.
In solitude the Ancient Temples stood,
Once resonant with instrument and song,
And solemn dance of festive multitude ;
Now, as the weary ages pass along,
Hearing no voice save of the Ocean flood,
Which roars forever on the restless shores ;
Or visiting their solitary caves,
The lonely sound of winds, that moan around
Accordant to the melancholy waves.

9.

With reverence did the travellers see
The works of ancient days, and silently
Approach the shore. Now on the yellow sand,
Where round their feet the rising surges part,
They stand. Ladurlad's heart
Exulted in his wondrous destiny.
To Heaven he raised his hand
In attitude of stern, heroic pride ;
Oh what a Power, he cried,
Thou dreadful Rajah, doth thy curse impart !
I thank thee now ! — Then turning to the Maid,
Thou seest how far and wide
Yon Towers extend, he said ;
My search must needs be long. Meantime the flood
Will cast thee up thy food, —
And in the Chambers of the Rock, by night,
Take thou thy safe abode.
No prowling beast to harm thee, or affright,
Can enter there ; but wrap thyself with care
From the foul Birds obscene that thirst for blood ;
For in such caverns doth the Bat delight
To have its haunts. Do thou, with stone and shout,
Ere thou liest down at evening, scare them out,
And in this robe of mine involve thy feet.
Duly commend us both to Heaven in prayer ;
Be of good heart, and may thy sleep be sweet !

10.

So saying, he put back his arm, and gave
The cloth which girt his loins, and press'd her hand
With fervent love, then from the sand
Advanced into the sea ; the coming Wave
Which knew Kehama's curse, before his way
Started, and on he went as on dry land ;
And still around his path the waters parted.
She stands upon the shore, where sea-weeds play,
Lashing her polish'd ankles, and the spray
Which off her Father, like a rainbow, fled,

Falls on her like a shower ; there Kailyal stands,
And sees the billows rise above his head.
She, at the startling sight, forgot the power
The Curse had given him, and held forth her hands
Imploringly, — her voice was on the wind,
And the deaf Ocean o'er Ladurlad closed.
Soon she recall'd his destiny to mind,
And, shaking off that natural fear, composed
Her soul with prayer, to wait the event resign'd.

11.

Alone, upon the solitary strand,
The lovely one is left ; behold her go,
Pacing with patient footsteps, to and fro,
Along the bending sand.
Save her, ye Gods ! from Evil Powers, and here
From man she need not fear :
For never Traveller comes near
These awful ruins of the days of yore,
Nor fisher's bark, nor venturous mariner,
Approach the sacred shore.
All day she walk'd the beach ; at night she sought
The chamber of the Rock ; with stone and shout
Assail'd the Bats obscene, and scared them out ;
Then in her Father's robe involved her feet,
And wrapp'd her mantle round to guard her head,
And laid her down : the rock was Kailyal's bed ;
Her chamber-lamps were in the starry sky ;
The winds and waters were her lullaby.

12.

Be of good heart, and may thy sleep be sweet,
Ladurlad said. — Alas ! that cannot be
To one whose days are days of misery.
How often did she stretch her hands to greet
Erechia, rescued in the dreams of night !
How oft, amid the vision of delight,
Fear in her heart all is not as it seems !
Then from unsettled slumber start, and hear
The Winds that moan above, the Waves below !
Thou hast been call'd, O Sleep ! the friend of Woe ;
But 'tis the happy who have call'd thee so.

13.

Another day, another night are gone ;
A second passes, and a third wanes on.
So long she paced the shore,
So often on the beach she took her stand,
That the wild Sea-Birds knew her, and no more
Fled, when she past beside them on the strand.
Bright shine the golden summits in the light
Of the noon-sun, and lovelier far by night
Their moonlight glories o'er the sea they shed :
Fair is the dark-green deep : by night and day,
Unvex'd with storms, the peaceful billows play,
As when they closed upon Ladurlad's head ;
The firmament above is bright and clear ;
The sea-fowl, lords of water, air, and land,
Joyous alike upon the wing appear,
Or when they ride the waves, or walk the sand ;
Beauty, and light, and joy are every where ;
There is no sadness and no sorrow here,
Save what that single human breast contains ;
But oh ! what hopes, and fears, and pains are there !

14.

Seven miserable days the expectant Maid,
From earliest dawn till evening, watch'd the shore;
Hope left her then; and in her heart she said,
Never should she behold her Father more.

XVI.

THE ANCIENT SEPULCHRES.

1.

WHEN the broad Ocean on Ladurlad's head
Had closed and arch'd him o'er,
With steady tread he held his way
Adown the sloping shore.
The dark-green waves with emerald hue
Imbue the beams of day,
And on the wrinkled sand below,
Rolling their mazy network to and fro,
Light shadows shift and play.
The hungry Shark, at scent of prey,
Toward Ladurlad darted;
Beholding then that human form erect,
How like a God the depths he trod,
Appall'd the monster started,
And in his fear departed.
Onward Ladurlad went with heart elate,
And now hath reach'd the Ancient City's gate.

2.

Wondering he stood awhile to gaze
Upon the works of elder days.
The brazen portals open stood,
Even as the fearful multitude
Had left them, when they fled
Before the rising flood.
High overhead, sublime,
The mighty gateway's storied roof was spread,
Dwarfing the puny piles of younger time.
With the deeds of days of yore
That ample roof was sculptured o'er,
And many a godlike form there met his eye,
And many an emblem dark of mystery.
Through these wide portals oft had Baly rode Triumphant from his proud abode,
When, in his greatness, he bestrode
The Aullay, hugest of four-footed kind,
The Aullay-Horse, that in his force,
With elephantine trunk, could bind
And lift the elephant, and on the wind
Whirl him away, with sway and swing,
Even like a pebble from the practis'd sling.

3.

Those streets which never, since the days of yore,
By human footstep had been visited,
Those streets which never more
A human foot shall tread,
Ladurlad trod. In sun-light and sea-green,
The thousand Palaces were seen
Of that proud City, whose superb abodes
Seem'd rear'd by Giants for the immortal Gods.
How silent and how beautiful they stand,

Like things of Nature! the eternal rocks
Themselves not firmer. Neither hath the sand
Drifted within their gates and chok'd their doors,
Nor slime defiled their pavements and their floors.

Did then the Ocean wage
His war for love and envy, not in rage,
O thou fair City, that he spared thee thus?
Art thou Varounin's capital and court,
Where all the Sea Gods for delight resort,
A place too godlike to be held by us,
The poor degenerate children of the earth?
So thought Ladurlad, as he look'd around,
Weening to hear the sound
Of Mermaid's shell, and song,
Of choral throng from some imperial hall,
Wherein the Immortal Powers, at festival,
Their high carousals keep;
But all is silence dread,
Silence profound and dead,
The everlasting stillness of the Deep.

4.

Through many a solitary street,
And silent market-place, and lonely square,
Arm'd with the mighty Curse, behold him fare.
And now his feet attain that royal fane
Where Baly held of old his awful reign.
What once had been the Gardens spread around,
Fair Gardens, once which wore perpetual green,
Where all sweet flowers through all the year were found,
And all fair fruits were through all seasons seen;
A place of Paradise, where each device
Of emulous Art with Nature strove to vie;
And Nature, on her part,
Call'd forth new powers wherewith to vanquish
Art.
The Swerga-God himself, with envious eye,
Survey'd those peerless gardens in their prime;
Nor ever did the Lord of Light,
Who circles Earth and Heaven upon his way,
Behold from eldest time a goodlier sight
Than were the groves which Baly, in his might,
Made for his chosen place of solace and delight.

5.

It was a Garden still beyond all price;
Even yet it was a place of Paradise;
For where the mighty Ocean could not spare,
There had he, with his own creation,
Sought to repair his work of devastation.
And here were coral bowers,
And grots of madrepores,
And banks of sponge, as soft and fair to eye
As e'er was mossy bed
Whereon the Wood Nymphs lie,
With languid limbs, in summer's sultry hours.
Here, too, were living flowers
Which, like a bud compacted,
Their purple cups contracted,
And now, in open blossom spread,
Stretch'd like green anthers many a seeking head
And arborets of jointed stone were there,
And plants of fibres fine, as silkworm's thread,
Yea, beautiful as Mermaid's golden hair

Upon the waves dispread.

Others that, like the broad banana growing,
Raised their long, wrinkled leaves of purple hue,
Like streamers wide outflowing.

And whatso'er the depths of Ocean hide
From human eyes, Ladurlad there espied, —
Trees of the deep, and shrubs, and fruits, and flowers,

As fair as ours,
Wherewith the Sea Nymphs love their locks to
braid,

When to their father's hall, at festival
Repairing, they, in emulous array,
Their charms display,
To grace the banquet and the solemn day.

6.

The golden fountains had not ceased to flow ;
And where they mingled with the briny Sea,
There was a sight of wonder and delight,
To see the fish, like birds in air,

Above Ladurlad flying.

Round those strange waters they repair,
Their scarlet fins outspread and plying ;
They float with gentle hovering there ;

And now, upon those little wings,

As if to dare forbidden things,

With wilful purpose bent,

Swift as an arrow from a bow,

They shoot across, and to and fro,

In rapid glance, like lightning go
Through that unwonted element.

7.

Almost in scenes so wondrous fair,

Ladurlad had forgot

The mighty cause which led him there ;

His busy eye was every where ;

His mind had lost all thought ;

His heart, surrender'd to the joys

Of sight, was happy as a boy's.

But soon the awakening thought recurs

Of him who in the Sepulchres,

Hopeless of human aid, in chains is laid ;

And her who, on the solitary shore,

By night and day, her weary watch will keep,

Till she shall see them issuing from the deep.

8.

Now hath Ladurlad reach'd the Court
Of the great Palace of the King : its floor
Was of the marble rock ; and there, before
The imperial door,

A mighty Image on the steps was seen,
Of stature huge, of countenance serene.

A crown and sceptre at his feet were laid ;

One hand a scroll display'd ;

The other pointed there, that all might see ;

My name is Death, it said ;

In mercy have the Gods appointed me.

Two brazen gates beneath him, night and day,

Stood open ; and within them you behold

Descending steps, which in the living stone

Were hewn, a spacious way

Down to the Chambers of the Kings of old.

9.

Trembling with hope, the adventurous man descended.

The sea-green light of day

Not far along the vault extended ;

But where the slant reflection ended,

Another light was seen

Of red and fiery hue,

That with the water blended,

And gave the secrets of the Tombs to view.

10.

Deep in the marble rock, the Hall
Of Death was hollow'd out, a chamber wide,

Low-roof'd, and long ; on either side,

Each in his own alcove, and on his throne,

The Kings of old were seated : in his hand

Each held the sceptre of command,

From whence, across that scene of endless night,

A carbuncle diffused its everlasting light.

11.

So well had the embalmers done their part
With spice and precious unguents to imbue
The perfect corpse, that each had still the hue
Of living man, and every limb was still
Supple, and firm, and full, as when of yore
Its motion answered to the moving will.
The robes of royalty, which once they wore,
Long since had mouldered off, and left them
bare :

Naked upon their thrones behold them there,
Statues of actual flesh — a fearful sight !

Their large and rayless eyes,

Dimly reflecting to that gem-born light,

Glazed, fix'd, and meaningless, — yet, open wide,

Their ghastly balls belied

The mockery of life in all beside.

12.

But if, amid these chambers drear,
Death were a sight of shuddering and of fear,
Life was a thing of stranger horror here.

For at the farther end, in yon alcove,

Where Baly should have lain, had he obey'd

Man's common lot, behold Ercenia laid.

Strong fetters link him to the rock ; his eye

Now rolls and widens, as with effort vain

He strives to break the chain,

Now seems to brood upon his misery.

Before him couch'd there lay

One of the mighty monsters of the deep,

Whom Lorrinite, encountering on the way,

There station'd, his perpetual guard to keep ;

In the sport of wanton power, she charm'd him
there,

As if to mock the Glendoveer's despair.

13.

Upward his form was human, save that here
The skin was cover'd o'er with scale on scale

Compact, a panoply of natural mail.

His mouth, from ear to ear,

Weapon'd with triple teeth, extended wide,

And tusks on either side ;

A double snake below, he roll'd
His supple length behind in many a sinuous fold.

14

With red and kindling eye, the Beast beholds
A living man draw nigh,
And rising on his folds,
In hungry joy awaits the expected feast,
His mouth half open, and his teeth unsheath'd.
Then on he sprung, and in his scaly arms
Seized him, and fasten'd on his neck, to suck,
With greedy lips, the warm life-blood: and sure
But for the mighty power of magic charms,
As easily as, in the blithesome hour
Of spring, a child doth crop the meadow-flower,
Piecemeal those claws
Had rent their victim, and those armed jaws
Snapp'd him in twain. Naked Ladurlad stood,
Yet fearless and unharm'd in this dread strife,
So well Kehama's Curse had charm'd his fated life.

15.

He too, — for anger, rising at the sight
Of him he sought, in such strange thrall confined,
With desperate courage fired Ladurlad's mind, —
He too unto the fight himself address'd,
And grappling breast to breast,
With foot firm-planted stands,
And seized the monster's throat with both his hands.
Vainly, with throttling grasp, he press'd
The impenetrable scales;
And lo! the Guard rose up, and round his foe,
With gliding motion, wreath'd his lengthening coils,
Then tighten'd all their folds with stress and strain.
Nought would the raging Tiger's strength avail,
If once involved within those mighty toils;
The arm'd Rhinoceros, so clasp'd, in vain
Had trusted to his hide of rugged mail,
His bones all broken, and the breath of life
Crush'd from the lungs, in that unequal strife.
Again, and yet again, he sought to break
The impassive limbs; but when the Monster found
His utmost power was vain,
A moment he relax'd in every round,
Then knit his coils again with closer strain,
And, bearing forward, forced him to the ground.

16.

Erenea groan'd in anguish at the sight
Of this dread fight: once more the Glendoveer
Essay'd to break his bonds, and fear
For that brave father who had sought him here,
Stung him to wilder strugglings. From the rock
He raised himself half up, with might and main,
Pluck'd at the adamant chain,
And now, with long and unrelaxing strain,
In obstinate effort of indignant strength,
Labor'd and strove in vain;
Till his immortal sinews fail'd at length;
And yielding, with an inward groan, to fate,
Despairingly, he let himself again
Fall prostrate on his prison-bed of stone,
Body and chain alike with lifeless weight.

17.

Struggling they lay in mortal fray
All day, while day was in our upper sphere;
For light of day
And natural darkness never entered here;
All night, with unabated might,
They waged the unremitting fight.
A second day, a second night,
With furious will they wrestled still.
The third came on, the fourth is gone;
Another comes, another goes;
And yet no respite, no repose!
But day and night, and night and day,
Involv'd in mortal strife they lay;
Six days and nights have pass'd away,
And still they wage, with mutual rage,
The unremitting fray.
With mutual rage their war they wage,
But not with mutual will;
For when the seventh morning came,
The monster's worn and wearied frame
In this strange contest fails;
And weaker, weaker, every hour,
He yields beneath strong Nature's power,
For now the Curse prevails

18.

Sometimes the Beast sprung up to bear
His foe aloft; and trusting there
To shake him from his hold,
Relax'd the rings that wreath'd him round;
But on his throat Ladurlad hung,
And weigh'd him to the ground;
And if they sink, or if they float,
Alike with stubborn clasp he elung,
Tenacious of his grasp;
For well he knew with what a power,
Exempt from Nature's laws,
The Curse had arm'd him for this hour;
And in the monster's gasping jaws,
And in his hollow eye,
Well could Ladurlad now desery
The certain signs of victory.

19.

And now the Beast no more can keep
His painful watch; his eyes, oppress'd,
Are fainting for their natural sleep;
His living flesh and blood must rest;
The Beast must sleep or die.
Then he, full faint and languidly,
Unwreathes his rings and strives to fly,
And still retreating, slowly trails
His stiff and heavy length of scales.
But that unweariable foe,
With will relentless follows still;
No breathing-time, no pause of fight
He gives, but presses on his flight;
Along the vaulted chambers, and the ascent
Up to the emerald-tinted light of day,
He harasses his way,
Till lifeless, underneath his grasp,
The huge Sea Monster lay.

20.

That obstinate work is done ; Ladurlad cried,
 One labor yet remains !
 And thoughtfully he eyed
 Ereenia's ponderous chains ;
 And with faint effort, half-despairing, tried
 The rivets deep in-driven. Instinctively,
 As if in search of aid, he look'd around :
 Oh, then how gladly, in the near alcove,
 Fallen on the ground its lifeless Lord beside,
 The crescent cineter he spied,
 Whose cloudy blade, with potent spells imbued,
 Had lain so many an age unhurt in solitude !

21.

Joyfully springing there,
 He seized the weapon, and with eager stroke
 Hew'd at the chain ; the force was dealt in vain,
 For not as if through yielding air
 Pass'd the descending cineter,
 Its deaden'd way the heavy water broke ;
 Yet it bit deep. Again, with both his hands,
 He wields the blade, and dealt a surer blow.
 The baser metal yields
 To that fine edge, and lo ! the Glendoveer
 Rises and snaps the half-sever'd links, and stands
 Freed from his broken bands.

XVII.

BALY.

1.

THIS is the appointed night,
 The night of joy and consecrated mirth,
 When from his judgment-seat in Padalon,
 By Yamen's throne,
 Baly goes forth, that he may walk the Earth
 Unseen, and hear his name
 Still hymn'd and honor'd by the grateful voice
 Of human-kind, and in his fame rejoice.
 Therefore, from door to door, and street to street,
 With willing feet,
 Shaking their firebands, the glad children run ;
 Baly ! great Baly ! they acclaim ;
 Where'er they run they bear the mighty name ;
 Where'er they meet,
 Baly ! great Baly ! still their choral tongues repeat.
 Therefore at every door the votive flame
 Through pendent lanterns sheds its painted light,
 And rockets, hissing upward through the sky,
 Fall like a shower of stars
 From Heaven's black canopy.
 Therefore, on yonder mountain's templed height,
 The brazen caldron blazes through the night.
 Huge as a Ship that travels the main sea
 Is that capacious brass ; its wick as tall
 As is the mast of some great admiral.
 Ten thousand votaries bring
 Camphor and ghee to feed the sacred flame ;
 And while, through regions round, the nations see
 Its fiery pillar curling high in heaven,
 Baly ! great Baly ! they exclaim,

Forever hallowed be his blessed name !
 Honor and praise to him for evermore be given .

2.

Why art not thou among the festive throng,
 Baly, O righteous Judge ! to hear thy fame ?
 Still, as of yore, with pageantry and song,
 The glowing streets along,
 They celebrate thy name ;
 Baly ! great Baly ! still
 The grateful habitants of Earth acclaim,
 Baly ! great Baly ! still
 The ringing walls and echoing towers proclaim.
 From yonder mountain the portentous flame
 Still blazes to the nations, as before ;
 All things appear to human eyes the same,
 As perfect as of yore ;
 To human eyes, — but how unlike to thine !
 Thine, which were wont to see
 The Company divine,
 That with their presence came to honor thee !
 For all the blessed ones of mortal birth
 Who have been clothed with immortality,
 From the eight corners of the Earth,
 From the Seven Worlds assembling, all
 Wont to attend thy solemn festival.
 Then did thine eyes behold
 The wide air peopled with that glorious train ;
 Now mayst thou seek the blessed ones in vain,
 For Earth and Air are now beneath the Rajah's reign.

3.

Therefore the righteous Judge hath walk'd the Earth
 In sorrow and in solitude to-night
 The sound of human mirth
 To him is no delight ;
 He turns away from that ungrateful sight,
 Hallowed not now by visitants divine,
 And there he bends his melancholy way,
 Where, in yon full-orb'd Moon's refulgent light,
 The Golden Towers of his old City shine
 Above the silver sea. The ancient Chief
 There bent his way in grief,
 As if sad thoughts indulged would work their own relief.

4.

There he beholds, upon the sand,
 A lovely Maiden in the moonlight stand.
 The land-breeze lifts her locks of jet ;
 The waves around her polish'd ankles play,
 Her bosom with the salt sea-spray is wet ;
 Her arms are cross'd, unconsciously, to fold
 That bosom from the cold,
 While, statue-like, she seems her watch to keep,
 Gazing intently on the restless deep.

5.

Seven miserable days had Kailyal there,
 From earliest dawn till evening, watch'd the deep ;
 Six nights, within the chamber of the rock,
 Had laid her down, and found in prayer
 That comfort which she sought in vain from sleep
 But when the seventh night came,

Never should she behold her father more,
The wretched Maiden said, in her despair;
Yet would not quit the shore,
Nor turn her eyes one moment from the sea:
Never before

Had Kailyal watch'd it so impatiently,
Never so eagerly had hoped before,
As now, when she believed, and said, all hope was o'er.

6.

Beholding her, how beautiful she stood,
In that wild solitude,
Baly from his invisibility
Had issued then, to know her cause of woe;
But that in the air beside her, he espied
Two Powers of Evil for her hurt allied,
Foul Arvalan and dreadful Lorrinite.
Walking in darkness him they could not see,
And marking with what demon-like delight
They kept their innocent prey in sight,
He waits, expecting what the end may be.

7.

She starts; for lo! where, floating many a rood,
A Monster, hugest of the Ocean brood,
Weltering and lifeless, drifts toward the shore.
Backward she starts in fear before the flood,
And, when the waves retreat,
They leave their hideous burden at her feet.

8.

She ventures to approach with timid tread;
She starts, and half draws back in fear,
Then stops, and stretches out her head,
To see if that huge Beast indeed be dead.
Now, growing bold, the Maid advances near,
Even to the margin of the ocean-flood.
Rightly she reads her Father's victory,
And lifts her joyous hands exultingly
To Heaven in gratitude.
Then, spreading them toward the Sea,
While pious tears bedim her streaming eyes,
Come! come! my Father, come to me;
Ereenia, come! she cries;
Lo! from the opening deep they rise,
And to Ladurlad's arms the happy Kailyal flies.

9.

She turn'd from him, to meet, with beating heart,
The Glendoveer's embrace.
Now turn to me, for mine thou art!
Foul Arvalan exclaim'd; his loathsome face
Came forth, and from the air,
In fleshly form, he burst.
Always in horror and despair,
Had Kailyal seen that form and face accurs'd;
But yet so sharp a pang had ne'er
Shot with a thrill like death through all her frame,
As now when on her hour of joy the Spectre came.

10.

Vain is resistance now;
The fiendish laugh of Lorrinite is heard;
And at her dreadful word,

The Asuras once again appear,
And seize Ladurlad and the Glendoveer.

11.

Hold your accursed hands!
A voice exclaim'd, whose dread commands
Were fear'd through all the vaults of Padalon;
And there among them, in the midnight air,
The presence of the mighty Baly shone.
He, making manifest his mightiness,
Put forth on every side a hundred arms,
And seized the Sorceress; maugre all her charms,
Her and her fiendish ministers he caught
With force as uncontrollable as fate,
And that unhappy Soul, to whom
The Almighty Rajah's power availeth not Living to avert, nor dead to mitigate,
His righteous doom.

12.

Help, help, Kehama! Father, help! he cried;
But Baly tarried not to abide
That mightier Power; with irresistible feet
He stamp'd and cleft the Earth; it open'd wide,
And gave him way to his own Judgment-seat.
Down, like a plummet, to the World below
He sunk, and bore his prey
To punishment deserved, and endless woe.

XVIII.

KEHAMA'S DESCENT.

1.

THE Earth, by Baly's feet divided,
Closed o'er his way as to the Judgment-seat
He plunged and bore his prey.
Scarce had the shock subsided,
When, darting from the Swerga's heavenly heights,
Kehama, like a thunderbolt, alights.
In wrath he came; a bickering flame
Flash'd from his eyes, which made the moonlight dim,
And passion forcing way from every limb,
Like furnace-smoke, with terrors wrapt him round.
Furious he smote the ground;
Earth trembled underneath the dreadful stroke,
Again in sunder riven;
He hurl'd in rage his whirling weapon down.
But lo! the fiery shekra to his feet
Return'd, as if by equal force re-driven,
And from the abyss the voice of Baly came:
Not yet, O Rajah, hast thou won
The realms of Padalon!
Earth and the Swerga are thine own;
But, till Kehama shall subdue the throne
Of Hell, in torments Yamen holds his son

2.

Fool that he is! — in torments let him lie!
Kehama, wrathful at his son, replied.
But what am I,

That thou shouldst brave me?—kindling in his pride

The dreadful Rajah cried.
Ho! Yamen! hear me. God of Padalon,
Prepare thy throne,
And let the Amreeta cup
Be ready for my lips, when I anon
Triumphantly shall take my seat thereon,
And plant upon thy neck my royal feet.

3.

In voice like thunder thus the Rajah cried,
Impending o'er the abyss, with menacing hand
Put forth, as in the action of command,
And eyes that darted their red anger down.
Then, drawing back, he let the earth subside,
And, as his wrath relax'd, survey'd,
Thoughtfully and silently, the mortal Maid.
Her eye the while was on the farthest sky,
Where up the ethereal height
Ereenia rose and pass'd away from sight.
Never had she so joyfully
Beheld the coming of the Glendoveer,
Dear as he was and he deserved to be,
As now she saw him rise and disappear.
Come now what will, within her heart said she;
For thou art safe, and what have I to fear?

4.

Meantime the Almighty Rajah, late
In power, and majesty, and wrath array'd,
Had laid his terrors by,
And gazed upon the Maid.
Pride could not quit his eye,
Nor that remorseless nature from his front
Depart; yet whoso had beheld him then,
Had felt some admiration mix'd with dread,
And might have said,
That sure he seem'd to be the King of Men!
Less than the greatest that he could not be,
Who carried in his port such might and majesty.

5.

In fear no longer for the Glendoveer,
Now toward the Rajah Kailyal turn'd her eyes,
As if to ask what doom awaited her.
But then surprise,
Even as with fascination, held them there;
So strange a thing it seem'd to see the change
Of purport in that all-commanding brow,
Which thoughtfully was bent upon her now.
Wondering she gazed, the while her Father's eye
Was fixed upon Kehama haughtily;
It spake defiance to him, high disdain,
Stern patience unsubduable by pain,
And pride triumphant over agony.

6.

Ladurlad, said the Rajah, thou and I
Alike have done the work of Destiny,
Unknowing each to what the impulse tended;
But now that over Earth and Heaven my reign
Is stablish'd, and the ways of Fate are plain
Before me, here our enmity is ended.
I take away thy Curse.—As thus he said,

The fire which in Ladurlad's heart and brain
Was burning, fled, and left him free from pain.
So rapidly his torments were departed,
That at the sudden ease he started,
As with a shock, and to his head
His hands up-fled,
As if he felt through every failing limb
The power and sense of life forsaking him.

7.

Then turning to the Maid, the Rajah cried,
O Virgin, above all of mortal birth
Favor'd alike in beauty and in worth,
And in the glories of thy destiny,
Now let thy happy heart exult with pride,
For Fate hath chosen thee
To be Kehama's bride,
To be the Queen of Heaven and Earth,
And of whatever Worlds beside Infinity may hide; for I can see
The writing which, at thy nativity,
All-knowing Nature wrought upon thy brain,
In branching veins, which to the gifted eye
Map out the mazes of futurity.
There is it written, Maid, that thou and I,
Alone of human kind a deathless pair,
Are doom'd to share
The Amreeta-drink divine
Of immortality. Come, Maiden mine!
High-fated One, ascend the subject sky,
And by Kehama's side
Sit on the Swerga throne, his equal bride.

8.

Oh never,—never,—Father! Kailyal cried;
It is not as he saith,—it cannot be!
I!—I his bride!
Nature is never false; he wrongeth her!
My heart belies such lines of destiny.
There is no other true interpreter!

9.

At that reply, Kehama's darkening brow
Bewray'd the anger which he yet suppress'd;
Counsel thy daughter! tell her thou art now
Free from thy Curse, he said, and bid her bow
In thankfulness to Fate's benign behest.
Bid her her stubborn will restrain,—
For Destiny at last must be obey'd,—
And tell her, while obedience is delay'd,
Thy Curse will burn again.

10.

She needeth not my counsel, he replied,
And idly, Rajah, dost thou reason thus
Of Destiny! for though all other things
Were subject to the starry influencings,
And how'd submissive to thy tyranny,
The virtuous heart and resolute mind are free.
Thus in their wisdom did the Gods decree
When they created man. Let come what will
This is our rock of strength; in every ill,
Sorrow, oppression, pain, and agony,
The spirit of the good is unsubdued,
And, suffer as they may, they triumph still.

II.

Obstinate fools! exclaim'd the Mighty One ;
 Fate and my pleasure must be done,
 And ye resist in vain !
 Take your fit guerdon till we meet again !
 So saying, his vindictive hand he flung
 Towards them, fill'd with curses ; then on high
 Aloft he sprung, and vanish'd through the Sky.

XIX.

MOUNT CALASAY.

1.

THE Rajah, scattering curses as he rose,
 Soar'd to the Swerga, and resumed his throne.
 Not for his own redoubled agony,
 Which now, through heart and brain,
 With renovated pain,
 Rush'd to its seat, Ladurlad breathes that groan.
 That groan is for his child ; he groan'd to see
 That she was stricken now with leprosy,
 Which, as the enemy vindictive fled,
 O'er all her frame with quick contagion spread.
 She, wondering at events so passing strange,
 And fill'd with hope and fear,
 And joy to see the Tyrant disappear,
 And glad expectance of her Glendoveer,
 Perceived not in herself the hideous change.
 His burning pain, she thought, had forced the groan
 Her father breathed ; his agonies alone
 Were present to her mind ; she clasp'd his knees,
 Wept for his Curse, and did not feel her own.

2.

Nor, when she saw her plague, did her good heart,
 True to itself, even for a moment fail.
 Ha, Rajah ! with disdainful smile she cries,
 Mighty, and wise, and wicked as thou art,
 Still thy blind vengeance acts a friendly part.
 Shall I not thank thee for this scurf and scale
 Of dire deformity, whose loathsomeness,
 Surer than panoply of strongest mail,
 Arms me against all foes ? Oh, better so,
 Better such foul disgrace,
 Than that this innocent face
 Should tempt thy wooing ! That I need not dread :
 Nor ever impious foe
 Will offer outrage now, nor further woe
 Will beauty draw on my unhappy head ;
 Safe through the unholy world may Kailyal go.

3.

Her face, in virtuous pride,
 Was lifted to the skies,
 As him and his poor vengeance she defied ;
 But earthward, when she ceased, she turn'd her eyes,
 As if she sought to hide
 The tear which in her own despite would rise.
 Did then the thought of her own Glendoveer
 Call forth that natural tear ?
 Was it a woman's fear,

A thought of earthly love which troubled her ?
 Like yon thin cloud, amid the moonlight sky,
 That flits before the wind,
 And leaves no trace behind,
 The womanly pang pass'd over Kailyal's mind.
 This is a loathsome sight to human eye,
 Half shrinking at herself, the maiden thought ;
 Will it be so to him ? Oh, surely not !
 The immortal Powers, who see
 Through the poor wrappings of mortality,
 Behold the soul, the beautiful soul, within,
 Exempt from age and wasting maladies,
 And undeform'd, while pure and free from sin.
 This is a loathsome sight to human eyes,
 But not to eyes divine,
 Ereemia, Son of Heaven, oh, not to thine !

4.

The wrongful thought of fear, the womanly pain
 Had pass'd away ; her heart was calm again.
 She raised her head, expecting now to see
 The Glendoveer appear ;
 Where hath he fled, quoth she,
 That he should tarry now ? Oh ! had she known Whither the adventurous Son of Heaven was flown,
 Strong as her spirit was, it had not borne
 The appalling thought, nor dared to hope for his return.

5.

For he in search of Seeva's throne was gone,
 To tell his tale of wrong ;
 In search of Seeva's own abode
 The Glendoveer began his heavenly road.
 O wild emprise ! above the farthest skies
 He hoped to rise !
 Him who is throned beyond the reach of thought,
 The Alone, the Inaccessible, he sought.
 O wild emprise ! for when, in days of yore,
 For proud preëminence of power,
 Brama and Veeshnoo, wild with rage, contended,
 And Seeva, in his might,
 Their dread contention ended,
 Before their sight
 In form a fiery column did he tower,
 Whose head above the highest height extended,
 Whose base below the deepest depth descended.
 Downward, its depth to sound,
 Vecshnoo a thousand years explored
 The fathomless profound,
 And yet no base he found :
 Upward, to reach its head,
 Ten myriad years the aspiring Brama soar'd,
 And still, as up he fled,
 Above him still the Immeasurable spread.
 The rivals own'd their Lord,
 And trembled and adored.
 How shall the Glendoveer attain
 What Brama and what Veeshnoo sought in vain ?

6.

Ne'er did such thought of lofty daring enter
 Celestial Spirit's mind. O wild adventure
 That throne to find, for he must leave behind

He fell; but in his ear
 A Voice, which from within him came, was heard,
 The indubitable word
 Of Him to whom all secret things are known:
 Go, ye who suffer, go to Yamen's throne.
 He hath the remedy for every woe;
 He setteth right whate'er is wrong below.

XX.

THE EMBARKATION.

1.

Down from the Heaven of Heavens Ereenia fell
 Precipitate, yet imperceptible
 His fall; nor had he cause nor thought of fear;
 And when he came within this mundane sphere,
 And felt that Earth was near,
 The Glendoveer his azure wings expanded,
 And, sloping down the sky
 Toward the spot from whence he sprung on high,
 There on the shore he landed.

2.

Kailyal advanced to meet him,
 Not moving now as she was wont to greet him,
 Joy in her eye and in her eager pace;
 With a calm smile of melancholy pride
 She met him now, and, turning half aside,
 Her warning hand repell'd the dear embrace.

3.

Strange things, Ereenia, have befallen us here,
 The Virgin said; the Almighty Man hath read
 The lines which, traced by Nature on my brain,
 There to the gifted eye
 Make all my fortunes plain,
 Mapping the mazes of futurity.
 He sued for peace, for it is written there
 That I with him the Amreeta cup must share;
 Wherefore he bade me come, and by his side
 Sit on the Swerga-throne, his equal bride.
 I need not tell thee what reply was given;
 My heart, the sure interpreter of Heaven,
 His impious words belied.
 Thou seest his poor revenge! So having said,
 One look she glanced upon her leprous stain
 Indignantly, and shook
 Her head in calm disdain

4.

O Maid of soul divine!
 O more than ever dear,
 And more than ever mine,
 Replied the Glendoveer;
 He hath not read, be sure, the mystic ways
 Of Fate; almighty as he is, that maze
 Hath mock'd his fallible sight.
 Said he the Amreeta cup? So far aright
 The Evil One may see; for Fate displays
 Her hidden things in part, and part conceals,
 Baffling the wicked eye
 Alike with what she hides, and what reveals,

When with unholy purpose it would pry
 Into the secrets of futurity.
 So may it be permitted him to see
 Dimly the inscrutable decree;
 For to the World below,
 Where Yamen guards the Amreeta, we must go;
 Thus Seeva hath express'd his will; even he,
 The Holiest, hath ordain'd it; there, he saith,
 All wrongs shall be redress'd
 By Yamen, by the righteous Power of Death.

5.

Forthwith the Father and the fated Maid,
 And that heroic Spirit, who for them
 Such flight had late essay'd,
 The will of Heaven obey'd.
 They went their way along the road
 That leads to Yamen's dread abode.

6.

Many a day hath pass'd away
 Since they began their arduous way,
 Their way of toil and pain;
 And now their weary feet attain
 The Earth's remotest bound,
 Where outer Ocean girds it round.
 But not like other Oceans this;
 Rather it seem'd a drear abyss,
 Upon whose brink they stood.
 Oh! scene of fear! the travellers hear
 The raging of the flood;
 They hear how fearfully it roars,
 But clouds of darker shade than night
 Forever hovering round those shores,
 Hide all things from their sight;
 The Sun upon that darkness pours
 His unavailing light,
 Nor ever Moon nor Stars display,
 Through the thick shade, one guiding ray
 To show the perils of the way.

7.

There, in a creek, a vessel lay;
 Just on the confines of the day,
 It rode at anchor in its bay,
 These venturous pilgrims to convey
 Across that outer Sea.
 Strange vessel sure it seem'd to be,
 And all unfit for such wild sea!
 For through its yawning side the wave
 Was oozing in; the mast was frail,
 And old and torn its only sail.
 How may that crazy vessel brave
 The billows that in wild commotion
 Forever roar and rave?
 How hope to cross the dreadful Ocean
 O'er which eternal shadows dwell,
 Whose secrets none return to tell!

8.

Well might the travellers fear to enter!
 But summon'd once on that adventure,
 For them was no retreat.
 Nor boots it with reluctant feet
 To linger on the strand;

Aboard ! aboard !
 An awful voice, that left no choice,
 Sent forth its stern command,
 Aboard ! aboard !
 The travellers hear that voice in fear,
 And breathe to Heaven an inward prayer,
 And take their seats in silence there.

9.

Self-hoisted then, behold the sail
 Expands itself before the gale ;
 Hands which they cannot see, let slip
 The cable of that fated Ship ;
 The land breeze sends her on her way,
 And lo ! they leave the living light of day !

XXI.

THE WORLD'S END.

1.

SWIFT as an arrow in its flight
 The Ship shot through the incumbent night ;
 And they have left behind
 The raging billows and the roaring wind,
 The storm, the darkness, and all mortal fears ;
 And lo ! another light
 To guide their way appears,
 The light of other spheres.

2.

That instant from Ladurlad's heart and brain
 The Curse was gone ; he feels again
 Fresh as in youth's fair morning, and the Maid
 Hath lost her leprous stain.
 The Tyrant then hath no dominion here,
 Starting, she cried ; O happy, happy hour !
 We are beyond his power !
 Then, raising to the Glendoveer,
 With heavenly beauty bright, her angel face,
 Turn'd not reluctant now, and met his dear embrace.

3.

Swift glides the Ship with gentle motion
 Across that calm and quiet ocean,
 That glassy sea, which seem'd to be
 The mirror of tranquillity.
 Their pleasant passage soon was o'er ;
 The Ship hath reach'd its destined shore —
 A level belt of ice, which bound,
 As with an adamantine mound,
 The waters of the sleeping Ocean round.
 Strange forms were on the strand
 Of earth-born spirits slain before their time ;
 Who, wandering over sea, and sky, and land,
 Had so fulfill'd their term ; and now were met
 Upon this icy belt, a motley band,
 Waiting their summons at the appointed hour,
 When each before the Judgment-seat must stand,
 And hear his doom from Baly's righteous power.

4.

Foul with habitual crimes, a hideous crew
 Were there, the race of rapine and of blood.
 Now, having overpass'd the mortal flood,
 Their own deformity they knew,
 And knew the meed that to their deeds was due.
 Therefore in fear and agony they stood,
 Expecting when the Evil Messenger
 Among them should appear. But with their fear
 A hope was mingled now ;
 O'er the dark shade of guilt a deeper hue
 It threw, and gave a fiercer character
 To the wild eye, and lip, and sinful brow.
 They hoped that soon Kehama would subdue
 The inexorable God, and seize his throne,
 Reduce the infernal World to his command,
 And, with his irresistible right hand,
 Redeem them from the vaults of Padalon.

5.

Apart from these, a milder company,
 The victims of offences not their own,
 Look'd when the appointed Messenger should come ;
 Gather'd together some, and some alone
 Brooding in silence on their future doom.
 Widows whom, to their husbands' funeral fire,
 Force or strong error led, to share the pyre,
 As to their everlasting marriage-bed ;
 And babes, by sin unstain'd,
 Whom erring parents vow'd
 To Ganges, and the holy stream profaned
 With that strange sacrifice, rite unordain'd
 By Law, by sacred Nature unallow'd ;
 Others more hapless in their destiny,
 Scarce having first inhaled their vital breath,
 Whose cradles from some tree
 Unnatural hands suspended,
 Then left, till gentle Death,
 Coming like Sleep, their feeble moanings ended ;
 Or for his prey the ravenous Kite descended ;
 Or marching like an army from their caves,
 The Pismires blacken'd o'er, then, bleach'd and bare,
 Left their unhardened bones to fall asunder there.

6.

Innocent Souls ! thus set so early free
 From sin, and sorrow, and mortality,
 Their spotless spirits all-creating Love
 Received into its universal breast.
 Yon blue serene above
 Was their domain ; clouds pillow'd them to rest ;
 The Elements on them like nurses tended,
 And with their growth ethereal substance blended.
 Less pure than these is that strange Indian bird,
 Who never dips in earthly streams her bill,
 But, when the sound of coming showers is heard,
 Looks up, and from the clouds receives her fill.
 Less pure the footless fowl of Heaven, that never Rest upon earth, but on the wing forever
 Hovering o'er flowers, their fragrant food inhale,
 Drink the descending dew upon its way,
 And sleep aloft while floating on the gale

7.

And thus these innocents, in yonder sky,
Grow and are strengthen'd, while the allotted years
Perform their course; then hitherward they fly,
Being free from moral taint, so free from fears,
A joyous band, expecting soon to soar
To Indra's happy spheres,
And mingle with the blessed company
Of heavenly spirits there for evermore.

8.

A Gulf profound surrounded
This icy belt; the opposite side
With highest rocks was bounded,
But where their heads they hide,
Or where their base is founded,
None could espy. Above all reach of sight
They rose; the second Earth was on their height;
Their feet were fix'd in everlasting night.

9.

So deep the Gulf, no eye
Could plumb its dark profundity,
Yet all its depth must try; for this the road
To Padalon, and Yamen's dread abode.
And from below continually
Ministrant Demons rose and eaught
The Souls whose hour was come;
Then, with their burden fraught,
Plunged down, and bore them to receive their doom.

10.

Then might be seen who went in hope, and who Trembled to meet the meed
Of many a foul misdeed, as wild they threw
Their arms retorted from the Demons' grasp,
And look'd around, all eagerly, to seek
For help, where help was none; and strove for aid
To elasp the nearest shade;
Yea, with imploring looks and horrent shriek,
Even from one Demon to another bending,
With hands extending,
Their mercy they essay'd.
Still from the verge they strain,
And from the dreadful Gulf avert their eyes,
In vain; down plunge the Demons, and their cries
Feebly, as down they sink, from that profound arise.

11.

What heart of living man could undisturb'd
Bear sight so sad as this! What wonder there
If Kailyal's lip were blanch'd with inmost dread!
The chill which from that icy belt Struck through her, was less keen than what she felt
With her heart's blood through every limb dispread.
Close to the Glendoveer she clung,
And clasping round his neck her trembling hands,
She closed her eyes, and there in silence hung.

12.

Then to Ladurlad said the Glendoveer,
These Demons, whom thou seest, the ministers
Of Yamen, wonder to behold us here;

But for the dead they come, and not for us;
Therefore, albeit they gaze upon thee thus,
Have thou no fear.

A little while thou must be left alone,
Till I have borne thy daughter down,
And placed her safely by the throne
Of him who keeps the Gate of Padalon.

13.

Then, taking Kailyal in his arms, he said,
Be of good heart, Beloved! it is I
Who bear thee. Saying this, his wings he spread,
Sprung upward in the sky, and poised his flight,
Then plunged into the Gulf, and sought the World of Night.

XXII.

THE GATE OF PADALON.

1.

THE strong foundations of this inmost Earth
Rest upon Padalon. That icy Mound,
Which girt the mortal Ocean round,
Reach'd the profound,—
Ice in the regions of the upper air,
Crystal midway, and adamant below,
Whose strength sufficed to bear
The weight of all this upper World of ours,
And with its rampart closed the Realm of Woe.
Eight gates hath Padalon; eight heavenly Powers
Have them in charge, each alway at his post,
Lest from their penal caves the accursed host,
Maugre the might of Baly and the God,
Should break, and carry ruin all abroad.

2.

Those gates stand ever open, night and day,
And Souls of mortal men
Forever throng the way.
Some from the dolorous den,
Children of sin and wrath, return no more:
They, fit companions of the Spirits accurs'd,
Are doom'd, like them in baths of fire immers'd,
Or weltering upon beds of molten ore,
Or stretch'd upon the brazen floor,
Are fasten'd down with adamantine chains;
While on their substance, ineonsumable,
Leeches of fire forever hang and pull,
And worms of fire forever gnaw their food,
That, still renew'd,
Freshens forever their perpetual pains.

3.

Others there were whom Baly's voice condemn'd
By long and painful penance, to atone
Their fleshly deeds. Them from the Judgment
Throne,
Dread Azyoruca, where she sat involved
In darkness as a tent, received, and dealt
To each the measure of his punishment;
Till, in the central springs of fire, the Will Impure is purged away; and the freed soul,

Thus fitted to receive a second birth,
Imbodied once again, revisits Earth.

4.

But they whom Baly's righteous voice absolved,
And Yamen, viewing with benignant eye,
Dismiss'd to seek their heritage on high,
How joyfully they leave this gloomy bourn,
The dread sojourn
Of Guilt and twin-born Punishment and Woe,
And wild Remorse, here link'd with worse Despair!
They to the eastern Gate rejoicing go:
The Ship of Heaven awaits their coming there;
And on they sail, greeting the blessed light
Through realms of upper air,
Bound for the Swerga once; but now no more
Their voyage rests upon that happy shore,
Since Indra, by the dreadful Rajah's might Compell'd, hath taken flight;
On to the second World their way they wend,
And there, in trembling hope, await the doubtful end.

5.

For still in them doth hope predominate,
Faith's precious privilege, when higher Powers
Give way to fear in these portentous hours.
Behold the Wardens eight
Each silent at his gate
Expectant stands; they turn their anxious eyes
Within, and listening to the dizzy din
Of mutinous uproar, each in all his hands
Holds all his weapons, ready for the fight.
For, hark! what clamorous cries
Upon Kehama, for deliverance, call!
Come, Rajah! they exclaim; too long we groan
In torments. Come, Deliverer! yonder throne
Awaits thee. Now, Kehama! Rajah, now!
Earthly Almighty, wherefore tarriest thou?—
Such were the sounds that rung, in wild uproar,
O'er all the echoing vaults of Padalon;
And as the Asuras from the brazen floor,
Struggling against their fetters, strove to rise,
Their clashing chains were heard, and shrieks and cries,
With curses mix'd, against the Fiends who urge,
Fierce on their rebel limbs, the avenging scourge.

6.

These were the sounds which, at the southern Gate,
Assail'd Ereenia's ear; alighting here,
He laid before Neroodi's feet the Maid,
Who, pale and cold with fear,
Hung on his neck, well nigh a lifeless weight.

7.

Who and what art thou? cried the Guardian
Power,
Sight so unwonted wondering to behold,—
O Son of Light!
Who comest here at this portentous hour,
When Yamen's throne
Trembles, and all our might can scarce keep down
The rebel race from scizing Padalon,—
Who and what art thou? and what wild despair,

Or wilder hope, from realms of upper air,
Tempts thee to bear
This mortal Maid to our forlorn abodes
Fitter for her, I ween, the Swerga bowers,
And sweet society of heavenly Powers,
Than this,—a doleful scene,
Even in securest hours.
And whither would ye go?
Alas! can human or celestial ear
Unmadden'd hear
The shrieks and yellings of infernal woe?
Can living flesh and blood
Endure the passage of the fiery flood!

8.

Lord of the Gate, replied the Glendoveer,
We come obedient to the will of Fate;
And haply doom'd to bring
Hope and salvation to the Infernal King;
For Seeva sends us here;
Even He to whom futurity is known,
The Holiest, bade us go to Yamen's throne.
Thou seest my precious charge;
Under thy care, secure from harm, I leave her,
While I ascend to bear her Father down.
Beneath the shelter of thine arm receive her!

9.

Then quoth he to the Maid,
Be of good cheer, my Kailyal! dearest dear,
In faith subdue thy dread;
Anon I shall be here. So having said,
Aloft, with vigorous bound, the Glendoveer
Sprung in celestial night,
And soaring up, in spiral circles, wound
His indefatigable flight.

10.

But as he thus departed,
The Maid, who at Neroodi's feet was lying,
Like one intranced or dying,
Recovering strength from sudden terror, started;
And, gazing after him, with straining sight
And straining arms, she stood,
As if in attitude
To win him back from flight.
Yea, she had shaped his name
For utterance, to recall and bid him stay,
Nor leave her thus alone; but virtuous shame
Repress'd the unbidden sounds upon their way;
And calling faith to aid,
Even in this fearful hour, the pious Maid
Collected courage, till she seem'd to be
Calm and in hope; such power hath piety.
Before the Giant Keeper of the Gate
She cross'd her patient arms, and at his feet
Prepar'd to meet
The awful will of Fate with equal mind,
She took her seat resign'd.

11.

Even the stern trouble of Neroodi's brow
Relax'd as he beheld the valiant Maid.
Hope, long unfelt till now,
Rose in his heart reviving, and a smile

Dawn'd in his brightening countenance, the while
 He gazed on her with wonder and delight.
 The blessing of the Powers of Padalon,
 Virgin, be on thee! said the admiring God;
 And blessed be the hour that gave thee birth,
 Daughter of Earth!
 For thou to this forlorn abode hast brought
 Hope, who too long hath been a stranger here.
 And surely for no lamentable lot,
 Nature, that erreth not,
 To thee that heart of fortitude hath given,
 Those eyes of purity, that face of love: —
 If thou beest not the inheritrix of Heaven,
 There is no truth above.

12.

Thus as Neroodi spake, his brow severe
 Shone with an inward joy; for sure he thought,
 When Seeva sent so fair a creature here,
 In this momentous hour,
 Erelong the World's deliverance would be wrought,
 And Padalon escape the Rajah's power.
 With pious mind the Maid, in humble guise
 Inclined, received his blessing silently,
 And raised her grateful eyes
 A moment, then again
 Abased them at his presence. Hark! on high
 The sound of coming wings! — her anxious ears
 Have caught the distant sound. Ereenia brings
 His burden down! Upstarting from her seat,
 How joyfully she rears
 Her eager head! and scarce upon the ground
 Ladurlad's giddy feet their footing found,
 When with her trembling arms she clasp'd him
 round.
 No word of greeting,
 No other sign of joy at that strange meeting;
 Expectant of their fate,
 Silent, and hand in hand,
 Before the Infernal Gate,
 The Father and his pious Daughter stand.

13.

Then to Neroodi said the Glendoveer,
 No Heaven-born Spirit e'er hath visited
 This region drear and dread, but I, the first
 Who tread your World accurs'd.
 Lord of the Gate, to whom these realms are known,
 Direct our fated way to Yamen's throne.

14.

Bring forth my Chariot, Carmala! quoth then
 The Keeper of the way.
 It was the Car wherein,
 On Yamen's festal day,
 When all the Powers of Hell attend their King,
 Yearly to Yamenpur did he repair
 To pay his homage there.
 Poised on a single wheel, it mov'd along,
 Instinct with motion; by what wondrous skill
 Compact, no human tongue could tell,
 Nor human wit devise; but on that wheel,
 Moving or still,

As if with life indued,
 The Car miraculous supported stood.

15.

Then Carmala brought forth two mantles, white
 As the swan's breast, and bright as mountain snow,
 When from the wintry sky
 The sun, late rising, shines upon the height,
 And rolling vapors fill the vale below.
 Not without pain the unaccustom'd sight
 That brightness could sustain;
 For neither mortal stain,
 Nor parts corruptible, remain,
 Nor aught that time could touch, or force destroy,
 In that pure web whereof the robes were wrought;
 So long had it in tenfold fires been tried,
 And blanch'd, and to that brightness purified.
 Apparell'd thus, alone,
 Children of Earth, Neroodi cried,
 In safety may ye pass to Yamen's throne.
 Thus only can your living flesh and blood
 Endure the passage of the fiery flood.

16.

Of other frame, O son of Heaven, art thou!
 Yet hast thou now to go Through regions which thy heavenly mould will try.
 Glories unutterably bright, I know,
 And beams intense of empyrean light,
 Thine eye divine can bear; but fires of woe,
 The sight of torments, and the cry
 Of absolute despair, —
 Might not these things dismay thee on thy flight,
 And thy strong pennons flag and fail thee there?
 Trust not thy wings, celestial though thou art,
 Nor thy good heart, which horror might assail,
 And pity quail,
 Pity in these abodes of no avail;
 But take thy seat this mortal pair beside,
 And Carmala the infernal Car will guide.
 Go, and may happy end your way betide!
 So, as he spake, the self-moved Car roll'd on;
 And lo! they pass the Gate of Padalon.

XXIII.

PADALON.

1.

WHOE'ER hath loved, with venturous step, to tread
 The chambers dread
 Of some deep cave, and seen his taper's beam
 Lost in the arch of darkness overhead,
 And mark'd its gleam,
 Playing afar upon the sunless stream,
 Where from their secret bed,
 And course unknown and inaccessible,
 The silent waters well, —
 Whoe'er hath trod such caves of endless night,
 He knows, when measuring back the gloomy way,
 With what delight refresh'd, his eye

Percives the shadow of the light of day,
Through the far portal slanting, where it falls
Dimly reflected on the watery walls;
How heavenly seems the sky;
And how, with quicken'd feet, he hastens up,
Eager again to greet
The living World and blessed sunshine there,
And drink, as from a cup
Of joy, with thirsty lips, the open air.

2.

Far other light than that of day there shone
Upon the travellers, entering Padalon.
They too in darkness enter'd on their way,
But far before the Car,
A glow, as of a fiery furnace light,
Fill'd all before them. 'Twas a light which made Darkness itself appear
A thing of comfort, and the sight, dismay'd,
Shrunk inward from the molten atmosphere.
Their way was through the adamant rock
Which girt the World of Woe; on either side
Its massive walls arose, and overhead
Arch'd the long passage; onward as they ride,
With stronger glare the light around them
spread,
And lo! the regions dread,
The World of Woe before them, opening wide.

3.

There rolls the fiery flood,
Girding the realms of Padalon around.
A sea of flame it seem'd to be,
Sea without bound;
For neither mortal nor immortal sight
Could pierce across through that intensest light.
A single rib of steel,
Keen as the edge of keenest cimenter,
Spann'd this wide gulf of fire. The infernal
Car
Roll'd to the Gulf, and, on its single wheel
Self-balanced, rose upon that edge of steel.
Red-quiivering float the vapors overhead;
The fiery gulf, beneath them spread,
Tosses its billowing blaze with rush and roar;
Steady and swift the self-moved Chariot went,
Winning the long ascent,
Then, downward rolling, gains the farther shore.

4.

But, oh! what sounds and sights of woe,
What sights and sounds of fear,
Assail the mortal travellers here!
Their way was on a causey straight and wide,
Where penal vaults on either side were seen,
Ranged like the cells wherein
Those wondrous winged alchemists infold
Their stores of liquid gold.
Thick walls of adamant divide
The dungeons; and from yonder circling flood,
Off-streams of fire through secret channels glide,
And wind among them, and in each provide
An everlasting food
Of rightful torments for the accursed brood.

5.

These were the rebel race, who, in their might Confiding impiously, would fain have driven
The deities supreme from highest Heaven;
But by the Suras, in celestial fight,
Opposed and put to flight,
Here, in their penal dens, the accursed crew,
Not for its crime, but for its failure, rue
Their wild ambition. Yet again they long
The contest to renew,
And wield their arms again in happier hour;
And with united power,
Following Kehama's triumph, to press on
From World to World, and Heaven to Heaven, and Sphere
To Sphere, till Hemakoot shall be their own,
And Meru Mount, and Indra's Swerga-Bowers,
And Brahma's region, where the heavenly Hours
Weave the vast circle of his age-long day.
Even over Veeshnoo's empyreal seat
They trust the Rajah shall extend their sway,
And that the seven-headed Snake, whereon
The strong Preserver sets his conquering feet,
Will rise and shake him headlong from his throne,
When, in their irresistible array,
Amid the Milky Sea they force their way.
Even higher yet their frantic thoughts aspire;
Yea, on their beds of torment as they lie,
The highest, holiest Seeva, they defy,
And tell him they shall have anon their day,
When they will storm his realm, and seize Mount Calasay.

6.

Such impious hopes torment
Their raging hearts, impious and impotent;
And now, with unendurable desire
And lust of vengeance, that, like inward fire,
Doth aggravate their punishment, they rave
Upon Kehama; him the accursed rout
Acclaim; with furious cries and maddening shout
They call on him to save;
Kehama! they exclaim;
Thundering the dreadful echo rolls about,
And Hell's whole vault repeats Kehama's name.

7.

Over these dens of punishment, the host
Of Padalon maintain eternal guard,
Keeping upon the walls their vigilant ward.
At every angle stood
A watch-tower, the decurion Demon's post,
Where raised on high he view'd with sleepless eye
His trust, that all was well. And over these, —
Such was the perfect discipline of Hell, —
Captains of fifties and of hundreds held
Authority, each in his loftier tower;
And chiefs of legions over them had power;
And thus all Hell with towers was girt around.
Aloft the brazen turrets shone
In the red light of Padalon;
And on the walls between,
Dark moving, the infernal Guards were seen,
Gigantic Demons, pacing to and fro;

Who, ever and anon

Spreading their crimson pennons, plunged below,
Faster to rivet down the Asuras' chains,
And with the snaky scourge and fiercer pains,
Repress their rage rebellious. Loud around,
In mingled sound, the echoing lash, the clash
Of chains, the ponderous hammer's iron stroke,
With execrations, groans, and shrieks, and cries,
Combined, in one wild dissonance, arise;
And through the din there broke,
Like thunder heard through all the warring winds,
The dreadful name. Kehama, still they rave,
Hasten and save!
Now, now, Deliverer! now, Kehama, now!
Earthly Almighty, wherefore tarriest thou?

8.

Oh, if that name abhorr'd,
Thus utter'd, could well nigh
Dismay the Powers of Hell, and daunt their
Lord,
How fearfully to Kailyal's ear it came!
She, as the car roll'd on its rapid way,
Bent down her head, and closed her eyes for dread;
And deafening, with strong effort from within,
Her ears against the din,
Cover'd and press'd them close with both her hands.
Sure, if the mortal Maiden had not fed
On heavenly food, and long been strengthened
With heavenly converse for such end vouchsafed,
Her human heart had fail'd, and she had died
Beneath the horrors of this awful hour.
But Heaven supplied a power
Beyond her earthly nature, to the measure
Of need infusing strength;
And Fate, whose secret and unerring pleasure
Appointed all, decreed
An ample meed and recompense at length.
High-fated Maid, the righteous hour is nigh!
The all-embracing eye
Of Retribution still beholdeth thee;
Bear onward to the end, O Maid, courageously!

9.

On roll'd the car, and lo! afar
Upon its height the towers of Yamenpur
Rise on the astonish'd sight.
Behold the infernal City, Yamen's seat
Of empire, in the midst of Padalon,
Where the eight causeys meet.
There, on a rock of adamant, it stood,
Resplendent far and wide,
Itself of solid diamond edified,
And all around it roll'd the fiery flood.
Eight bridges arch'd the stream; huge piles of brass
Magnificent, such structures as besem
The Seat and Capital of such great God,
Worthy of Yamen's own august abode.
A brazen tower and gateway at each end
Of each was raised, where Giant Wardens
stood,
Station'd in arms the passage to defend,
That never foe might cross the fiery flood.

10.

Oh, what a gorgeous sight it was to see
The Diamond City blazing on its height
With more than mid-sun splendor, by the light
Of its own fiery river!
Its towers, and domes, and pinnacles, and spires,
Turrets and battlements, that flash and quiver
Through the red, restless atmosphere forever;
And hovering overhead,
The smoke and vapors of all Padalon,
Fit firmament for such a world, were spread,
With surge, and swell, and everlasting motion,
Heaving and opening like tumultuous ocean.

11.

Nor were there wanting there
Such glories as besem'd such region well;
For though with our blue heaven and genial air
The firmament of Hell might not compare,
As little might our earthly tempests vie
With the dread storms of that infernal sky,
Whose clouds of all metallic elements
Sublimed were full. For, when its thunder broke,
Not all the united World's artillery,
In one discharge, could equal that loud stroke;
And though the Diamond Towers and Battlements
Stood firm upon their adamantine rock,
Yet while it volleyed round the vault of Hell,
Earth's solid arch was shaken with the shock,
And Cities in one mighty ruin fell.
Through the red sky terrific meteors scour;
Huge stones come hailing down; or sulphur-
shower,
Floating amid the lurid air like snow,
Kindles in its descent,
And with blue fire-drops rains on all below.
At times the whole supernal element,
Igniting, burst in one vast sheet of flame,
And roar'd as with the sound
Of rushing winds, above, below, around;
Anon the flame was spent, and overhead
A heavy cloud of moving darkness spread.

12.

Straight to the brazen bridge and gate
The self-moved Chariot bears its mortal load.
At sight of Carmala,
On either side the Giant Guards divide,
And give the chariot way.
Up yonder winding road it rolls along,
Swift as the bittern soars on spiral wing,
And lo! the Palace of the Infernal King!

13.

Two forms inseparable in unity
Hath Yamen; even as with hope or fear
The Soul regardeth him doth he appear;
For hope and fear,
At that dread hour, from ominous conscience
spring,
And err not in their bodings. Therefore some,
They who polluted with offences come,

Behold him as the King
Of Terrors, black of aspect, red of eye,
Reflecting back upon the sinful mind,
Heighten'd with vengeance, and with wrath divine,

Its own inborn deformity.

But to the righteous Spirit how benign

His awful countenance,

Where, tempering justice with parental love,

Goodness, and heavenly grace,

And sweetest mercy shine! Yet is he still Himself the same, one form, one face, one will;

And these his twofold aspects are but one;

And change is none

In him for change in Yamen could not be;

The Immutable is he.

14.

He sat upon a marble sepulchre,
Massive and huge, where, at the Monarch's feet,
The righteous Baly had his Judgment-seat.

A Golden Throne before them vacant stood;
Three human forms sustain'd its ponderous
weight,

With lifted hands outspread, and shoulders bow'd
Bending beneath the load.

A fourth was wanting. They were of the hue
Of coals of fire; yet were they flesh and blood,

And living breath they drew;

And their red eyeballs roll'd with ghastly stare,
As thus, for their misdeeds, they stood tormented
there.

15.

On steps of gold those living Statues stood,
Who bore the Golden Throne. A cloud behind
Immovable was spread; not all the light
Of all the flames and fires of Padalon
Could pierce its depth of night.

There Azyoruca veil'd her awful form

In those eternal shadows: there she sat,

And as the trembling Souls, who crowd around
The Judgment-seat, received the doom of fate,

Her giant arms, extending from the cloud,
Drew them within the darkness. Moving out

To grasp and bear away the innumerable rout,
Forever and forever thus were seen

The thousand mighty arms of that dread Queen.

16.

Here, issuing from the Car, the Glendoveer
Did homage to the God, then raised his head.

Suppliants we come, he said,

I need not tell thee by what wrongs oppress'd,
For nought can pass on earth to thee unknown;

Sufferers from tyranny we seek for rest,

And Seeva bade us go to Yamen's throne;

Here, he hath said, all wrongs shall be redress'd.
Yamen replied, Even now the hour draws near,

When Fate its hidden ways will manifest.

Not for light purpose would the Wisest send His suppliants here, when we, in doubt and

fear,

The awful issue of the hour attend.

Wait ye in patience and in faith the end!

XXIV.

THE AMREETA.

I.

So spake the King of Padalon, when, lo!

The voice of lamentation ceas'd in Hell,

And sudden silence all around them fell,

Silence more wild and terrible

Than all the infernal dissonance before.

Through that portentous stillness, far away,

Unwonted sounds were heard, advancing on

And deepening on their way;

For now the inexorable hour

Was come, and, in the fulness of his power,
Now that the dreadful rites had all been done,

Kehama from the Swerga hastened down

To seize upon the throne of Padalon.

2.

He came in all his might and majesty,
With all his terrors clad, and all his pride;

And, by the attribute of Deity,

Which he had won from Heaven, self-multiplied,

The Almighty Man appear'd on every side.

In the same indivisible point of time,

At the eight Gates he stood at once, and beat

The Warden-Gods of Hell beneath his feet;

Then, in his brazen Cars of triumph, straight,
At the same moment, drove through every gate.

By Aullays, hugest of created kind,

Fiercest, and fleetest than the viewless wind,
His Cars were drawn, ten yokes of ten abreast,—

What less sufficed for such almighty weight?

Eight bridges from the fiery flood arose,

Growing before his way; and on he goes,
And drives the thundering Chariot-wheels along,

At once o'er all the roads of Padalon.

3.

Silent and motionless remain

The Asuras on their bed of pain,

Waiting, with breathless hope, the great event.

All Hell was hush'd in dread,

Such awe that omnipresent coming spread;
Nor had its voice been heard, though all its rout

Innumerable had lifted up one shout;

Nor, if the infernal firmament

Had in one unimaginable burst

Spent its collected thunders, had the sound

Been audible, such louder terrors went

Before his forms substantial. Round about
The presence scattered lightnings far and wide,

That quench'd on every side,

With their intensest blaze, the feeble fire

Of Padalon, even as the stars go out,

When, with prodigious light,

Some blazing meteor fills the astonish'd night.

4.

The Diamond City shakes!

The adamantine Rock

Is loosen'd with the shock!

From its foundation moved, it heaves and quakes,

The brazen portals, crumbling, fall to dust ;
 Prone fall the Giant Guards
 Beneath the Aullays crush'd ;
 On, on, through Yamenpur, their thundering feet
 Speed from all points to Yamen's Judgment-seat.
 And lo ! where multiplied,
 Behind, before him, and on every side,
 Wielding all weapons in his countless hands,
 Around the Lord of Hell Kehama stands !
 Then, too, the Lord of Hell put forth his might :
 Thick darkness, blacker than the blackest night,
 Rose from their wrath, and veil'd
 The unutterable fight.
 The power of Fate and Sacrifice prevail'd,
 And soon the strife was done.
 Then did the Man-God reassume
 His unity, absorbing into one
 The consubstantiate shapes ; and as the gloom
 Opened, fallen Yamen on the ground was seen,
 His neck beneath the conquering Rajah's feet,
 Who on the marble tomb
 Had his triumphal seat.

5.

Silent the Man-Almighty sat ; a smile
 Gleam'd on his dreadful lips, the while,
 Dallying with power, he paused from following up
 His conquest, as a man in social hour
 Sips of the grateful cup,
 Again and yet again, with curious taste,
 Searching its subtle flavor ere he drink ;
 Even so Kehama now forbore his haste,
 Having within his reach whate'er he sought.
 On his own haughty power he seem'd to muse,
 Pampering his arrogant heart with silent thought.
 Before him stood the Golden Throne in sight,
 Right opposite ; he could not choose but see,
 Nor seeing choose but wonder. Who are ye
 Who bear the Golden Throne tormented there ?
 He cried ; for whom doth Destiny prepare
 The Imperial Seat ? and why are ye but Three ?

6.

FIRST STATUE.

I of the Children of Mankind was first,
 Me miserable ! who, adding store to store,
 Heap'd up superfluous wealth ; and now accurs'd,
 Forever I the frantic crime deplore.

SECOND STATUE.

I o'er my Brethren of Mankind the first
 Usurping power, set up a throne sublime,
 A King and Conqueror ; therefore thus accurst,
 Forever I in vain repent the crime.

THIRD STATUE.

I on the Children of Mankind the first,
 In God's most holy name, imposed a tale
 Of impious falsehood ; therefore thus accurst,
 Forever I in vain the crime bewail.

7.

Even as thou here beholdest us,
 Here we have stood, tormented thus,
 Such countless ages, that they seem to be

Long as eternity ;
 And still we are but Three.
 A Fourth will come to share
 Our pain, at yonder vacant corner bear
 His portion of the burden, and complete
 The Golden Throne for Yamen's Judgment-seat.
 Thus hath it been appointed : he must be Equal in guilt to us, the guilty Three.
 Kehama, come ! too long we wait for thee !

8.

Thereat, with one accord,
 The Three took up the word, like choral song,
 Come, Rajah ! Man-God ! Earth's Almighty Lord !
 Kehama, come ! we wait for thee too long.

9.

A short and sudden laugh of wondering pride
 Burst from him in his triumph : to reply
 Scornful he deign'd not ; but with alter'd eye,
 Wherein some doubtful meaning seem'd to lie,
 He turn'd to Kailyal. Maiden, thus he cried,
 I need not bid thee see
 How vain it is to strive with Fate's decree,
 When hither thou hast fled to fly from me,
 And lo ! even here thou find'st me at thy side.
 Mine thou must be, being doom'd with me to share
 The Amreeta cup of immortality ;
 Yea, by Myself I swear,
 It hath been thus appointed. Joyfully
 Join then thy hand, and heart, and will with mine,
 Nor at such glorious destiny repine,
 Nor in thy folly more provoke my wrath divine.

10.

She answer'd, I have said. It must not be !
 Almighty as thou art,
 Thou hast put all things underneath thy feet ;
 But still the resolute heart
 And virtuous will are free.
 Never, oh ! never, — never — can there be
 Communion, Rajah, between thee and me.

11.

Once more, quoth he, I urge, and once alone.
 Thou seest yon Golden Throne,
 Where I anon shall set thee by my side ;
 Take thou thy seat thereon,
 Kehama's willing bride,
 And I will place the Kingdoms of the World
 Beneath thy Father's feet,
 Appointing him the King of mortal men :
 Else underneath that Throne,
 The Fourth supporter he shall stand and groan ;
 Prayers will be vain to move my mercy then.

12.

Again the Virgin answer'd, I have said !
 Ladurlad caught her in his proud embrace,
 While on his neck she hid
 In agony her face.

13.

Bring forth the Amreeta-cup ! Kehama cried
 To Yamen, rising sternly in his pride.

It is within the Marble Sepulchre,
The vanquish'd Lord of Padalon replied ;
Bid it be open'd. Give thy treasure up !
Exclam'd the Man-Almighty to the Tomb.

And at his voice and look
The massy fabric shook, and open'd wide.
A huge Anatomy was seen reclined
Within its marble womb. Give me the Cup !
Again Kehama cried ; no other charm
Was needed than that voice of stern command.
From his repose the ghastly form arose,
Put forth his bony and gigantic arm,
And gave the Amrecta to the Rajah's hand.
Take . drink ! with accents dread the Spectre said ;
For thee and Kailyal hath it been assign'd,
Ye only of the Children of Mankind.

14.

Then was the Man-Almighty's heart elate ;
This is the consummation ! he exclaim'd ;
Thus have I triumphed over Death and Fate.
Now, Seeva ! look to thine abode !
Henceforth, on equal footing we engage,
Alike immortal now ; and we shall wage
Our warfare, God to God !
Joy fill'd his impious soul,
And to his lips he raised the fatal bowl.

15.

Thus long the Glendoveer had stood
Watching the wonders of the eventful hour,
Amazed, but undismay'd ; for in his heart
Faith, overcoming fear, maintain'd its power.
Nor had that faith abated, when the God
Of Padalon was beaten down in fight ;
For then he look'd to see the heavenly might
Of Seeva break upon them. But when now
He saw the Amrecta in Kehama's hand,
An impulse which defied all self-command
In that extremity
Stung him, and he resolved to seize the cup,
And dare the Rajah's force in Seeva's sight.
Forward he sprung to tempt the unequal fray,
When, lo ! the Anatomy
With warning arm, withstood his desperate way,
And from the Golden Throne the Fiery Three
Again, in one accord, renew'd their song —
Kehama, come ! we wait for thee too long.

16.

O fool of drunken hope and frantic vice !
Madman ! to seek for power beyond thy scope
Of knowledge, and to deem
Less than Omniscience could suffice
To wield Omnipotence ! O fool, to dream
That immortality could be
The meed of evil ! — yea, thou hast it now,
Victim of thine own wicked heart's device ;
Thou hast thine object now, and now must pay the price.

17.

He did not know the holy mystery
Of that divinest cup, that as the lips
Which touch it, even such its quality,

Good or malignant : Madman ! and he thinks
The blessed prize is won, and joyfully he drinks.

18.

Then Seeva open'd on the Accursed One
His Eye of Anger : upon him alone
The wrath-beam fell. He shudders — but too late ;
The deed is done ;
The dreadful liquor works the will of Fate.
Immortal he would be,
Immortal he is made ; but through his veins
Torture at once and immortality,
A stream of poison doth the Amrecta run,
And while within the burning anguish flows,
His outward body glows,
Like molten ore, beneath the avenging Eye,
Doom'd thus to live and burn eternally.

19.

The Fiery Three,
Beholding him, set up a fiendish cry,
A song of jubilee !
Come, Brother, come ! they sung ; too long
Have we expected thee ;
Henceforth we bear no more
The unequal weight. Come, Brother, we are Four !

20.

Vain his almightiness, for mightier pain
Subdued all power ; pain ruled supreme alone ;
And yielding to the bony hand
The unemptied cup, he moved toward the Throne,
And at the vacant corner took his stand.
Behold the Golden Throne at length complete,
And Yamen silently ascends the Judgment-seat.

21.

For two alone, of all mankind, to me
The Amrecta Cup was given,
Then said the Anatomy ;
The Man hath drank, the Woman's turn is next.
Come, Kailyal, come, receive thy doom,
And do the Will of Heaven ! —
Wonder, and Fear, and Awe at once perplex'd
The mortal Maiden's heart ; but over all
Hope rose triumphant. With a trembling hand,
Obedient to his call,
She took the fated Cup ; and, lifting up
Her eyes, where holy tears began to swell,
Is it not your command,
Ye heavenly Powers ? as on her knees she fell,
The pious Virgin cried ;
Ye know my innocent will, my heart sincere ;
Ye govern all things still,
And wherefore should I fear ?

22.

She said, and drank. The Eye of Mercy beam'd
Upon the Maid : a cloud of fragrance steam'd
Like incense-smoke as all her mortal frame
Dissolved beneath the potent agency
Of that mysterious draught ; such quality
From her pure touch the fated Cup partook.
Like one entranced she knelt,
Feeling her body melt

Till all but what was heavenly pass'd away :
Yet still she felt

Her Spirit strong within her, the same heart,
With the same loves, and all her heavenly part
Unchang'd, and ripen'd to such perfect state
In this miraculous birth, as here on Earth,
Dimly our holiest hopes anticipate.

23.

Mine! mine! with rapturous joy Ereenia cried,
Immortal now, and yet not more divine;
Mine, mine, — forever mine!
The immortal Maid replied,
Forever, ever thine!

24.

Then Yamen said, O thou to whom by Fate,
Alone of all mankind, this lot is given,
Daughter of Earth, but now the Child of Heaven!
Go with thy heavenly Mate,
Partaker now of his immortal bliss;
Go to the Swerga Bowers,
And there recall the hours
Of endless happiness.

25.

But that sweet Angel, — for she still retain'd
Her human loves and human piety, —
As if reluctant at the God's commands,
Linger'd, with anxious eye
Upon her Father fix'd, and spread her hands
Toward him wistfully.
Go! Yamen said, nor cast that look behind
Upon Ladurlad at this parting hour,
For thou shalt find him in thy Mother's Bower.

26.

The Car — for Carmala his word obey'd —
Moved on, and bore away the Maid,
While from the Golden Throne the Lord of Death
With love benignant on Ladurlad smiled,
And gently on his head his blessing laid.
As sweetly as a Child,
Whom neither thought disturbs nor care en-
cumbers,
Tired with long play, at close of summer day,
Lies down and slumbers,
Even thus, as sweet a boon of sleep partaking,
By Yamen blest, Ladurlad sunk to rest.
Blessed that sleep! more blessed was the waking!
For on that night a heavenly morning broke;
The light of heaven was round him when he woke;
And in the Swerga, in Yedillian's Bower,
All whom he loved he met, to part no more.

NOTES.

Calmly she took her seat. — I. 10, p. 560.

"SHE," says Bernier, "whom I saw burn herself, when I parted from Surat to travel into Persia, in the presence of Monsieur Chardin of Paris, and of many English and Dutch, was of a middle age, and not unhandsome. To represent unto you the undaunted cheerfulness that appeared in her countenance, the resolution with which she marched, washed herself, spoke to the people; the confidence with which she looked upon us, viewed her little cabin, made up of very dry millet-straw and small wood, went into this cabin, and sat down upon the pile, and took her husband's head into her lap, and a torch into her own hand, and kindled the cabin, whilst I know not how many Brahmans were busy in kindling the fire round about. To represent to you, I say, all this as it ought, is not possible for me; I can at present scarce believe it myself, though it be but a few days since I saw it."

They strip her ornaments away. — I. 11, p. 569.

She went out again to the river, and taking up some water in her hands, muttered some prayers, and offered it to the sun. All her ornaments were then taken from her; and her armlets were broken, and chaplets of white flowers were put upon her neck and hands. Her hair was tucked up with five combs; and her forehead was marked with clay in the same manner as that of her husband. — STAVORINUS.

Around her neck they leave

The marriage-knot alone. — I. 11, p. 569.

When the time for consummating the marriage is come, they light the fire Homan with the wood of Ravasiton. The Bramin blesses the former, which, being done, the bridegroom takes three handfuls of rice, and throws it on the bride's head, who does the same to him. Afterwards the bride's father clothes her in a dress according to his condition, and washes the bridegroom's feet; the bride's mother observing to pour out the water. This being done, the father puts his daughter's hand in his own, puts water into it, some pieces of money, and, giving it to the bridegroom, says, at the same time, I have no longer any thing to do with you, and I give you up to the power of another. The Tali, which is a ribbon with a golden head hanging at it, is held ready; and, being shown to the company, some prayers and blessings are pronounced; after which the bridegroom takes it, and hangs it about the bride's neck. This knot is what particularly secures his possession of her; for before he had had the Tali on, all the rest of the ceremonies might have been made to no purpose; for it has sometimes happened that when the bridegroom was going to fix it on, the bride's father has discovered his not being satisfied with the bridegroom's gift, when another, offering more, has carried off the bride with her father's consent. But, when once the Tali is put on, the marriage is indissoluble; and whenever the husband dies, the Tali is burnt along with him, to show that the marriage bands are broke. Besides these particular ceremonies, the people have notice of the wedding by a Pandal, which is raised before the bride's door some days before. The whole concludes with an entertainment which the bride's father gives to the common friends; and during this festivity, which continues five days, alms are given to the poor, and the fire Homan is kept in. The seventh day, the new-married couple set out for the bridegroom's house, whither they frequently go by torchlight. The bride and bridegroom are carried in a sedan, pass through the chief streets of the city, and are accompanied by their friends, who are either on horseback or mounted on elephants. — A. ROGER.

They force her on, they bind her to the dead. — I. 12, p. 569

'Tis true, says Bernier, that I have seen some of them, which, at the sight of the pile and the fire, appeared to have some apprehension, and that perhaps would have gone back. Those demons the Bramins that are there with their great sticks, astonish them, and hearten them up, or even thrust them in; as I have seen it done to a young woman, that retreated five or six paces from the pile, and to another, that was much disturbed when she saw the fire take hold of her clothes, these executioners thrusting her in with their long poles.

At Lahor, I saw a very handsome and a very young woman burnt; I believe she was not above twelve years of age. This poor unhappy creature appeared rather dead than alive when she came near the pile; she shook and wept bitterly. Meanwhile, three or four of these executioners, the Bramins, together with an old hag that held her under the arm, thrust her on, and made her sit down upon the wood; and lest she should run away, they tied her legs and hands; and so they burnt her alive. I had enough to do to contain myself for indignation. — BERNIER.

Pietro della Valle conversed with a widow, who was about to turn herself by her own choice. She told him, that generally speaking, women were not forced to burn themselves; but sometimes, among people of rank, when a young woman, who was handsome, was left a widow, and in danger of marrying again, (which is never practised among them, because of the confusion and disgrace which are inseparable from such a thing,) or of falling into other irregularities, then indeed the relations of the husband, if they are at all tenacious of the honor of the family, compel her to burn herself, whether she likes it or no, merely to prevent the inconveniences which might take place.

Dellon also, whom I consider as one of the best travellers in the East, expressly asserts, that widows are burnt there “de gré, ou de force. L'on n'en voit que trop qui après avoir désiré et demandé la mort avec un courage intrépide, et après avoir obtenu et acheté la permission de se brûler, ont tremblé à la vue du bûcher, se sont repenties, mais trop tard, de leur imprudence, et ont fait d'inutiles efforts pour se retracter. Mais lorsque cela arrive, bien loin que les Bramenes soient touchés d'aucune pitié, ils lient cruellement ces malheureuses, et les brûlent par force, sans avoir aucun égard à leurs plaintes, ni à leurs cris.” — Tom. i. p. 138.

It would be easy to multiply authorities upon this point. Let it suffice to mention one important historical fact: When the great Albuquerque had established himself at Goa, he forbade these accursed sacrifices; the women extolled him for it as their benefactor and deliverer, (Commentarios de Alb. ii. 20.) and no European in India was ever so popular, or so revered by the natives. Yet, if we are to believe the anti-missionaries, none but fools, fanatics, and pretenders to humanity, would wish to deprive the Hindoo women of the right of burning themselves! “It may be useful (says Colonel Mark Wilks) to examine the reasonableness of interfering with the most exceptionable of all their institutions. It has been thought an abomination not to be tolerated, that a widow should immolate herself on the funeral pile of her deceased husband. But what judgment should we form of the Hindoo, who (if any of our institutions admitted the parallel) should forcibly pretend to stand between a Christian and the hope of eternal salvation? And shall we not hold him to be a driveller in politics and morals, a fanatic in religion, and a pretender in humanity, who would forcibly wrest this hope from the Hindoo widow?” — Historical Sketches of the South of India, vol. i. p. 499.

Such opinions, and such language, may safely be left to the indignation and pity which they cannot fail to excite. I shall only express my astonishment, that any thing so monstrous, and so miserably futile, should have proceeded from a man of learning, great good sense, and general good feelings, as Colonel Wilks evidently appears to be.

One drops, another plunges in. — I. 14, p. 569.

When Bernier was passing from Amad-Avad to Agra, there came news to him in a borough, where the caravan rested under the shade, (staying for the cool of the evening to march on their journey,) that a woman was then upon the point of burning herself with the body of her husband. I presently rose, says he, and ran to the place where it was to be done, which was a great pit, with a pile of wood raised in it, whereon I saw laid a dead corpse and a woman, which, at a distance, seemed to me pretty fair, sitting near it on the same pile, besides four or five Bramins putting the fire to it from all sides; five women of a middle age, and well enough dressed, holding one another by the hand, and dancing about the pit, and a great crowd of people, men and women, looking on. The pile of wood was presently all on fire, because store of oil and butter had been thrown upon it: and I saw, at the same time, through the flames, that the fire took hold of the clothes of the woman, that were imbued with well-scented oils, mingled with powder of sandal and saffron. All this I saw, but observed not that the woman was at all disturbed; yea, it was said, that she had been heard to pronounce, with great force, these two words, fire, two, to signify, according to the opinion of those that hold the soul's transmigration, that this was the fifth time she had burnt herself with the same husband, and that there remained but two more for perfection; as if she had that time this remembrance, or some prophetic spirit. But here ended not this infernal tragedy: I thought it was only by way of ceremony that these five women sung and danced about the pit; but I was altogether surprised when I saw that the flame having taken hold of the clothes of one of them, she cast herself, with her head foremost, into the pit; and that after her, another, being overcome by the flame and the smoke, did the like; and my astonishment redoubled afterwards, when I saw that the remaining three took one another again by the hand, continued their dance without any apparent fear; and that at length they precipitated themselves, one after another, into the fire, as their companions had done. I learnt that these had been five slaves, who, having seen their mistress extremely afflicted at the sickness of her husband, and heard her promise him, that she would not survive him, but burn herself with him, were so touched with compassion and tenderness towards this their mistress, that they engaged themselves in a promise to follow her in her resolution, and to burn themselves with her. — BERNIER.

This excellent traveller relates an extraordinary circumstance which occurred at one of these sacrifices. A woman was engaged in some love-intrigues with a young Mahomedan, her neighbor, who was a tailor, and could play finely upon the tabor. This woman, in the hopes she had of marrying this young man, poisoned her husband, and presently came away to tell the tailor, that it was time to be gone together, as they had projected, or else she should be obliged to burn herself. The young man, fearing lest he might be entangled in a mischievous business, fluttily refused her. The woman, not at all surprised at it, went to her relations, and advertised them of the sudden death of her husband, and openly protested that she would not survive him, but burn herself with him. Her kindred, well satisfied with so generous a resolution, and the great honor she did to the whole family, presently had a pit made and filled with wood, exposing the corpse upon it, and kindling the fire. All being prepared, the woman goes to embrace and bid farewell to all her kindred that were there about the pit, among whom was also the tailor, who had been invited to play upon the tabor that day, with many others of that sort of men, according to the custom of the country. This fury of a woman being also come to this young man, made sign as if she would bid him farewell with the rest; but, instead of gently embracing him, she taketh him with all her force about his collar, pulls him to the pit, and tumbleth him, together with herself, into the ditch, where they both were soon despatched. — BERNIER.

The Hindoos sometimes erect a chapel on the spot where one of these sacrifices has been performed, both on account of the soul of the deceased, and as a trophy of her virtue. I remember to have seen one of these places, where the spot on which the funeral pile had been erected, was enclosed and covered with bamboos, formed into a kind of bower, planted with flowering creepers. The inside was set round with flowers, and at one end there was an image. — CRAWFORD.

Some of the Yogees, who smear themselves with ashes, use none but what they collect from funeral piles, — human ashes! — PIETRO DELLA VALLE.

From a late investigation, it appears, that the number of women who sacrifice themselves within thirty miles round Calcutta every year, is, on an average, upwards of two hundred. The Pundits have already been called on to produce the sanction of their Shasters for this custom. The passages exhibited are vague and general in their meaning, and differently interpreted by the same castes. Some sacred verses commend the practice, but none command it; and the Pundits refer once more to custom. They have, however, intimated, that if government will pass a regulation, amercing by fine every Brahmin who attends a burning, or every Zemindar who permits him to attend it, the practice cannot possibly long continue; for that the ceremony, unsanctified by the presence of the priests, will lose its dignity and consequence in the eyes of the people.

The civilized world may expect soon to hear of the abolition of this opprobrium of a Christian administration, the female sacrifice; which has subsisted, to our certain knowledge, since the time of Alexander the Great. — CLAUDIUS BUCHANAN.

This practice, however, was manifestly unknown when the Institutes of Menu were written. Instructions are there given for the conduct of a widow: "Let her," it is said, "emaciate her body, by living voluntarily on pure flowers, roots, and fruit; but let her not, when her lord is deceased, even pronounce the name of another man. Let her continue till death forgiving all injuries, performing harsh duties, avoiding every sensual pleasure, and cheerfully practising the incomparable rules of virtue, which have been followed by such women as were devoted to one only husband. Many thousands of Brahmins, having avoided sensuality from their early youth, and having left no issue in their families, have ascended nevertheless to heaven; and, like those abstemious men, a virtuous wife ascends to heaven, though she have no child, if, after the decease of her lord, she devote herself to pious austerity; but a widow, who, from a wish to bear children, slights her deceased husband by marrying again, brings disgrace on herself here below, and shall be excluded from the seat of her lord." — Inst. of Menu, ch. 5, 157—161.

Second marriages were permitted to men. — Ibid., 167, 8, 9.

Lo! Arvalan appears. — II. 1, p. 569.

Many believe that some souls are sent back to the spot where their bodies were burnt, or where their ashes are preserved, to wait there until the new bodies they are destined to occupy be ready for their reception. This appears to correspond with an opinion of Platon, which, with many other tenets of that philosopher, was adopted by the early Christians; and an ordinance of the Romish church is still extant, prohibiting having lights or making merriment in church-yards at night, lest they should disturb the souls that might come thither. — CRAWFURD.

According to the Danish missionaries, the souls of those who are untimely slain wander about as diabolical spectres, doing evil to mankind, and possessing those whom they persecute. — NIECAMP, i. 10, § 14.

The inhabitants of the hills near Rajamahall believe that when God sends a messenger to summon a person to his presence, if the messenger should mistake his object, and carry off another, he is desired by the Deity to take him away; but as the earthly mansion of this soul must be decayed, it is destined to remain mid-way between heaven and earth, and never can return to the presence of God. Whoever commits homicide without a divine order, and whoever is killed by a snake, as a punishment for some concealed crime, will be doomed to the same state of wandering; and whoever hangs himself will wander eternally with a rope about his neck. — Asiat. Researches.

Pope Benedict XII. drew up a list of 117 heretical opinions held by the Armenian Christians, which he sent to the king of Armenia, — instead of any other assistance, when that prince applied to him for aid against the Mahomedans. This paper was first published by Bernino, and exhibits a curious mixture of mythologies. One of their opinions was, that the souls of the adult wander about in the air till the day of judgment; neither hell, nor the heavenly, nor the terrestrial paradise, being open to them till that day shall have passed.

Davenant, in one of his plays, speculates upon such a state of wandering as the lot of the soul after death: —

I must to darkness go, hover in clouds,
Or in remote untroubled air, silent
As thought, or what is uncreated yet;
Or I must rest in some cold shade, and shall Perhaps ne'er see that everlasting spring
Of which philosophy so long has dreamt,
And seems rather to wish than understand.

Love and Honor.

I know no other author who has so often expressed to those who could understand him, his doubts respecting a future state, and how burdensome he felt them.

Undying as I am! — II. 3, p. 570.

The Soul is not a thing of which a man may say, it hath been, it is about to be, or is to be hereafter; for it is a thing without birth; it is ancient, constant, and eternal, and is not to be destroyed in this its mortal frame. How can the man who believeth that this thing is incorruptible, eternal, inexhaustible, and without birth, think that he can either kill or cause it to be killed! As a man throweth away old garments and putteth on new, even so the Soul, having quitted its old mortal frames, entereth into others which are new. The weapon divideth it not, the fire burneth it not, the water corrupteth it not, the wind drieth it not away; — for it is indivisible, inconsumable, incorruptible, and is not to be dried away — it is eternal, universal, permanent, immovable; it is invisible, inconceivable, and unalterable. — BHAGVAT GEETA.

It was my hour of folly. — II. 5, p. 570.

"Among the qualities required for the proper execution of public business, mention is made, 'That a man must be able to keep in subjection his lust, his anger, his avarice, his folly, and his pride.' The folly there specified is not to be understood in the usual sense of the word in an European idiom, as a negative quality, or the mere want of sense, but as a kind of obstinately stupid lethargy, or perverse absence of mind, in which the will is not altogether passive: it seems to be a weakness peculiar to Asia, for we cannot find a term by which to express the precise idea in the European languages. It operates somewhat like the violent impulse of fear, under which men will utter falsehoods totally incompatible with each other, and utterly contrary to their own opinion, knowledge, and conviction; and, it may be added, also, their inclination and intention.

"A very remarkable instance of this temporary frenzy happened lately in the supreme Court of Judicature at Calcutta, where a man (not an idiot) swore, upon a trial, that he was no kind of relation to his brother, who was then in Court, and who had constantly supported him from his infancy; and that he lived in a house by himself, for which he paid the rent from his own pocket, when it was proved that he was not worth a rupee, and when the person, in whose house he had always resided, stood at the bar close to him.

"Another conjecture, and that exceedingly acute and ingenious, has been started upon this folly, that it may mean the deception which a man permits to be imposed on his judgment by his passions; as acts of rapacity and avarice are often committed by men who ascribe them to prudence and a just assertion of their own right; malice and rancor pass for justice, and brutality for spirit. This opinion, when thoroughly examined, will very nearly tally with the former; for all the passions, as well as fear, have an equal efficacy to disturb and distort the mind: but, to account for the folly here spoken of as being the offspring of the passions, instead of drawing a parallel between it and the impulses of those passions, we must suppose the impulses to act with infinitely more violence upon an Asiatic mind than we can ever have seen exemplified in Europe. It is, however, something like the madness so inimitably delineated in the Hero of Cervantes, sensible enough upon some occasions, and at the same time completely wild, and unconscious of itself upon others, and that, too, originally produced by an effort of the will, though, in the end, overpowering and superseding its functions." — HALHED.

But I, all naked feeling and raw life. — II. 5, p. 570.

By the vital souls of those men who have committed sin in the body, another body, composed of nerves, with five sensations, in order to be susceptible of torment, shall certainly be assumed after death; and being intimately united with those minute nervous particles, according to their distribution, they shall feel in that new body the pangs inflicted in each case by the sentence of Yama. — Inst. of Menu.

Henry More, the Platonist, has two applicable stanzas in his Song of the Soul: —

Like to a light fast lock'd in lantern dark,
Whereby by night our wary steps we guide

In slabby streets, and dirty channels mark,
Some weaker rays through the black top do glide,
And flusher streams, perhaps, from horny side;
But when we've past the peril of the way,
Arrived at home, and laid that ease aside,—
The naked light how clearly doth it ray,
And spread its joyful beams as bright as summer's day.

Even so the soul, in this contracted state,
Confined to these straight instruments of sense,
More dull and narrowly doth operate;
At this hole hears,— the sight must ray from thence,— Here tastes, there smells;—but when she's gone from hence,
Liko naked lamp she is one shining sphere,
And round about has perfect cognoscence;
Whate'er in her horizon doth appear,
She is one orb of sense, all eye, all airy ear.

Amid the uncouth allegory, and more uncouth language, of this strange series of poems, a few passages are to be found of exceeding beauty. Milton, who was the author's friend, had evidently read them.

Mariataly. — II. 8, p. 570.

Mariataly, as Sonnerat spells the name, was wife of the penitent Chamadaguini, and mother of Parassourama, who was, in part, an incarnation of Veeshno. This goddess, says Sonnerat, commanded the elements, but could not preserve that empire longer than her heart was pure. One day, while she was collecting water out of a tank, and, according to her custom, was making a bowl of earth to carry it to the house, she saw on the surface of the water some figures of Grindovers, (Glendoveers,) which were flying over her head. Struck with their beauty, her heart admitted an impure thought, and the earth of the bowl dissolved. From that time she was obliged to make use of an ordinary vessel. This discovered to Chamadaguini that his wife had deviated from purity; and in the excess of his rage, he ordered his son to drag her to the place where criminals were executed, and to behead her. The order was executed; but Parassourama was so much afflicted for the loss of his mother, that Chamadaguini told him to take up the body, and fasten the head upon it, and repeat a prayer (which he taught him for that purpose) in her ear, and then his mother would come to life again. The son ran eagerly to perform what he was ordered, but, by a very singular blunder, he joined the head of his mother to the body of a Parichi, who had been executed for her crimes; a monstrous union, which gave to this woman the virtues of a goddess, and the vices of a criminal. The goddess, becoming impure by such a mixture, was driven from her house, and committed all kinds of cruelties. The De-verkels, perceiving the destruction she made, appeased her by giving her power to cure the small-pox, and promising that she should be implored for that disorder. Mariataly is the great goddess of the Parias;—to honor her, they have a custom of dancing with several pots of water on their heads, placed one above the other; these pots are adorned with the leaves of the Margosies, a tree consecrated to her.

The little songsters of the sky
Sit silent in the sultry hour. — IV. 2, p. 572.

The tufted lark, fixed to this fruitful land, says Sonnini, speaking of Egypt, never forsakes it; it seems, however, that the excessive heat annoys him. You may see these birds, as well as sparrows, in the middle of the day, with their bills half open, and the muscles of their breasts agitated, breathing with difficulty, and as if they panted for respiration. The instinct which induces them to prefer those means of subsistence which are easily obtained, and in abundance, although attended with some suffering, resembles the mind of man, whom a thirst for riches engages to brave calamities and dangers without number.

The watchman. — V. 1, p. 574.

The watchmen are provided with no offensive weapons excepting a sling; on the contrary, they continue the whole day standing, in one single position, upon a pillar of clay raised about ten feet, where they remain bellowing continually, that they may terrify, without hurting, the birds who feed upon the crop. Every considerable field contains several such sentinels, stationed at different corners, who repeat the call from one to another so incessantly, that the invaders have hardly any opportunity of making a good livelihood in the field.

These watchmen are forced, during the rains, to erect, instead of a clay pillar, a scaffolding of wood as high as the crop, over which they suspend a roof of straw, to shelter their naked bodies from the rain. — TENNANT.

The Golden Palaces. — V. 1, p. 574.

Every thing belonging to the Sovereign of Ava has the addition of shoe, or golden, annexed to it; even his majesty's person is never mentioned but in conjunction with this precious metal. When a subject means to affirm that the king has heard any thing, he says, "It has reached the golden ears;" he who obtained admission to the royal presence has been at the "golden feet." The perfume of otto of roses, a nobleman observed one day, "was an odor grateful to the golden nose." — SYMES.

A cloud, ascending in the eastern sky,
Sails slowly o'er the vale,

And darkens round, and closes in the night. — V. 3, p. 574.

At this season of the year, it is not uncommon, towards the evening, to see a small black cloud rising in the eastern part of the horizon, and afterwards spreading itself to the north-west. This phenomenon is always attended with a violent storm of wind, and flashes of the strongest and most vivid lightning and heavy thunder, which is followed by rain. These storms sometimes last for half an hour or more; and, when they disperse, they leave the air greatly freshened, and the sky of a deep, clear and transparent blue. When they occur near the full moon, the whole atmosphere is illuminated by a soft but brilliant silver light, attended with gentle airs. — HONGES.

A white flag, flapping to the winds of night,
Marks where the tiger seized a human prey. — V. 4, p. 574.

It is usual to place a small, white, triangular flag, fixed to a bamboo staff, of ten or twelve feet long, at the place where a tiger has destroyed a man. It is common for the passengers, also, each to throw a stone or brick near the spot, so that, in the course of a little time, a pile, equal to a good wagon-load, is collected. This custom, as well as the fixing a rag on any particular thorn-bush, near the fatal spot, is in use, likewise, on various accounts. Many brambles may be seen in a day's journey, completely covered with this motley assemblage of remnants. The sight of the flags and piles of stones imparts a certain melancholy, and perhaps altogether devoid of apprehension. They may be said to be of service in pointing out the places most frequented by tigers. — Oriental Sports, vol. ii. p. 22.

Gently he steals away with silent tread. — V. 9, p. 575.

This part of the poem has been censured, upon the ground that Ladurlad's conduct in thus forsaking his daughter is inconsistent with his affection for her. There is a passage in Mr. Milman's version of Nala and Damayanti so curiously resembling it in the situation of the two persons, that any one might suppose I had imitated the Sanscrit, if Kehama had not been published five-and-twenty years before Mr. Milman's most characteristic specimen of Indian poetry. Indeed, it is to him that I am obliged for pointing out the very singular coincidence.

"Mighty is thy father's kingdom — once was mine as mighty,
too;
Never will I there seek refuge — in my base extremity.

There I once appeared in glory — to the exalting of thy pride ;
Shall I now appear in misery — to the increasing of thy shame ? ”

Nala thus to Damayanti — spake again, and yet again,
Comforting the noble lady — scant in half a garment clad.
Both together, by one garment — covered, roamed they here and there ;

Wearied out by thirst and famine — to a cabin drew they near,
When they reached that lowly cabin — then did great Nishadha's king

With the princess of Vidarbha — on the hard earth seat them
down ;

Naked, with no mat to rest on — wet with mire and stained with dust.

Weary then with Damayanti — on the earth he fell asleep.
Sank the lovely Damayanti — by his side with sleep oppress'd,
She thus plung'd in sudden misery — she the tender, the devout.

But while on the cold earth slumbered — Damayanti, all distraught,

Nala in his mind by sorrow — might no longer calmly sleep ;
For the losing of his kingdom — the desertion of his friends,
And his weary forest wanderings — painful on his thought arose ;

“ If I do it, what may follow ? — what if I refuse to do ?

Were my instant death the better — or to abandon her I love.
But to me too deep devoted — suffers she distress and shame ;
Reft of me, she home may wander — to her royal father's house ;

Faithful wandering ever with me — certain sorrow will she bear,

But if separated from me — chance of solace may be hers.”
Long within his heart he pondered — and again, again weighed o'er.

Best he thought it Damayanti — to desert, that wretched
king.

From her virtue none dare harm her — in the lonely forest
way,

Her the fortunate, the noble, my devoted wedded wife.
Thus his mind on Damayanti — dwelt in its perverted thought,
Wrought by Kali's evil influence — to desert his lovely wife.
Of himself without a garment — and of her with only one
As he thought, approached he near her — to divide that single robe.

“ How shall I divide the garment — by my loved one unper-ceived ? ”

Pondering this within his spirit — round the cabin Nala went ;
In that narrow cabin's circuit — Nala wandered here and
there,

Till he found without a scabbard — shining, a well-tempered
sword.

Then when half that only garment — he had severed and put on,

In her sleep Vidarbha's princess — with bewildered mind he fled.

Yet, his cruel heart relenting — to the cabin turns he back ;
On the slumbering Damayanti — gazing, sadly wept the king ; “ Thou that sun nor wind hath ever — roughly visited, my love !

On the hard earth in a cabin — sleepest with thy guardian gone.

Thus attired in half a garment — she that eye so sweetly smiled,

Like to one distracted, beauteous — how at length will she awake !

How will't fare with Bhima's daughter — lone, abandoned by her lord,

Wandering in the savage forest — where wild beasts and serpents dwell !

May the suns and winds of heaven — may the genii of the woods,

Noblest, may they all protect thee — thine own virtue thy best guard.”

To his wife of peerless beauty — on the earth, 'twas thus he spoke.

Then of sense bereft by Kali — Nala hastily set forth ;
And departing, still departing — he returned again, again ;
Dragged away by that bad demon — ever by his love drawn back.

Nala, thus his heart divided — into two conflicting parts,
Like a swing goes backward, forward — from the cabin, to and fro.

Torn away at length by Kali — flies afar the frantic king,
Leaving there his wife in slumber — making miserable moans.
Reft of sense, possessed by Kali — thinking still on her he left,
Passed he in the lonely forest — leaving his deserted wife.

Pollear. — V. 14, p. 575.

The first and greatest of the sons of Seveo is Pollear ; he presides over marriages : the Indians build no house without having first carried a Pollear on the ground, which they sprinkle with oil, and throw flowers on it every day. If they do not invoke it before they undertake any enterprise, they believe that God will make them forget what they wanted to undertake, and that their labor will be in vain. He is represented with an elephant's head, and mounted on a rat ; but in the pagodas they place him on a pedestal, with his legs almost crossed. A rat is always put before the door of his chapel. This rat was a giant, called Gudja-mouga-chouria, on whom the gods had bestowed immortality, as well as great powers, which he abused, and did much harm to mankind.
Pollear, entreated by the sages and penitents to deliver them, pulled out one of his tusks, and throw it against Gudjamouga-chouria ; the tooth entered the giant's stomach, and overthrew him, who immediately changed himself into a rat as large as a mountain, and came to attack Pollear ; who sprung on his back, telling him, that hereafter he should ever be his carrier.

The Indians, in their adoration of this god, cross their arms, shut the fist, and in this manner give themselves several blows on the temples ; then, but always with the arms crossed, they take hold of their ears, and make three inclinations, bending the knee ; after which, with their hands joined, they address their prayers to him, and strike their forehead. They have a great veneration for this deity, whose image they place in all temples, streets, highways, and in the country, at the foot of some tree ; that all the world may have an opportunity of invoking him before they undertake any concern ; and that travellers may make their adorations and offerings to him before they pursue their journey. — SONNERAT.

The Glendoveers. — VI. p. 576.

This word is altered from the Grindovers of Sonnerat who describes these celestial children of Casyapa as famous for their beauty ; they have wings, he adds, and fly in the air with their wives. I do not know whether they are the Gand-harras of the English Orientalists. The wings with which they are attired in the poem are borrowed from the neglected story of Peter Wilkins. At a recent sale of manuscripts, the author's assignment of this book to Dodsley for ten guineas was brought to light, and it then appeared that his name, which till then had been unknown, was R. Paltock. Nothing more has been discovered concerning him. His book, however, is a work of great genius, and I know that both Sir Walter Scott and Mr. Coleridge thought as highly of it as I do. His winged people are the most beautiful creatures of imagination that ever were devised. I copy his minute description of the graundee, as he calls it ; — Stothard has made some delightful drawings of it in the Novelist's Magazine.

“ She first threw up two long branches, or ribs, of the whalebone, as I called it before, (and indeed for several of its properties, as toughness, elasticity, and pliability, nothing I have ever seen can so justly be compared to it,) which were jointed behind to the upper bone of the spine, and which, when not extended, lie bent over the shoulders on each side of the neck forwards, from whence, by nearer and nearer approaches, they just meet at the lower rim of the belly in a sort of point ; but, when extended, they stand their whole length above the shoulders, not perpendicularly, but spreading outwards, with a web of the softest and most pliable and spongy membrane that can be imagined in the interstices between them, reaching from their root or joint on the back up above the hinder part of the head, and near half way their own length ; but, when closed, the membrane falls down in the middle upon the neck, like a handkerchief. There are also two other ribs, rising, as it were, from the same root, which, when open, run horizontally, but not so long as the others. These are filled up in the interstice between them and the upper ones with the same membrane; and on the lower side of this is also a deep flap of the membrane, so that the arms can be either above or below it in flight, and are always above it when closed. This last rib, when shut, flaps under the upper one, and also falls down with it before to the waist; but it is not joined to the ribs below. Along the whole spine-bone runs a strong, flat, broad, gristly cartilage, to which are joined several other of these ribs, all which open horizontally, and are filled in the interstices with the above membrane, and are jointed to the ribs of the person just where the plane of the back begins to turn towards the breast and belly; and, when shut, wrap the body round to the joints on the contrary side, folding neatly one side over the other.

“At the lower spine are two more ribs extended horizontally when open, jointed again to the hips, and long enough to meet the joint on the contrary side across the belly: and from the hip-joint, which is on the outermost edge of the hip-bone, runs a pliable cartilage quite down the outside of the thigh and leg to the ankle; from which there branch out divers other ribs, horizontally also when open, but, when closed, they encompass the whole thigh and leg, rolling inwards across the back of the leg and thigh, till they reach and just cover the cartilage. The interstices of these are filled up with the same membrane. From the two ribs which join to the lower spine-bone, there hangs down a sort of short apron, very full of plaits, from hip-joint to hip-joint, and reaches below the buttocks, half way or more to the hams. This has also several small limber ribs in it. Just upon the lower spine-joint, and above the apron, as I call it, there are two other long branches, which when close, extend upon the back from the point they join at below to the shoulders, where each rib has a clasper, which reaching over the shoulders, just under the fold of the uppermost branch or ribs, hold up the two ribs flat to the back, like a V, the interstices of which are filled up with the aforesaid membrane. This last piece, in flight, falls down almost to the ankles, where the two clasps, lapping under each leg within-side, hold it very fast; and then, also, the short apron is drawn up, by the strength of the ribs in it, between the thighs, forward and covers as far as the rim of the belly. The whole arms are covered also from the shoulders to the wrist with the same delicate membrane, fastened to ribs of proportionable dimensions, and jointed to a cartilage on the outside in the same manner as on the legs. It is very surprising to feel the difference of these ribs when open and when closed; for closed they are as pliable as the finest whalebone, or more so; but, when extended, are as strong and stiff as a bone. They are tapering from the roots, and are broader or narrower, as best suits the places they occupy, and the stress they are put to, up to their points, which are almost as small as a hair. The membrane between them is the most elastic thing I ever met with, occupying no more space, when the ribs are closed, than just from rib to rib, as flat and smooth as possible; but, when extended in some postures, will dilate itself surprisingly.

“It is the most amazing thing in the world to observe the large expansion of this graundee when open, and, when closed, (as it all is in a moment, upon the party's descent,) to see it fit so close and compact to the body as no tailor can come up to it; and then the several ribs lie so justly disposed in the several parts, that instead of being, as one would imagine, a disadvantage to the shape, they make the body and limbs look extremely elegant; and, by the different adjustment of their linca on the body and limbs, the whole, to my fancy, somewhat resembles the dress of the old Roman warriors in their nuskins; and, to appearance, seems much more noble than any fictitious garb I ever saw, or can frame a notion of to myself.”

Mount Himakoot. — VI. 3, p. 576.

Dushmanta. Say, Matali, what mountain is that which, like an evening cloud, pours exhilarating streams, and forms a golden zone between the western and eastern seas?

Matali. That, O king! is the mountain of Gandharvas, named Hémacúta: the universe contains not a more excellent place for the successful devotion of the pious. There Casyapa, father of the immortals, ruler of men, son of Marichi, who sprang from the self-existent, resides with his consort Aditi, blessed in holy retirement. — We now enter the sanctuary of him who rules the world, and the groves which are watered by streams from celestial sources.

Dushmanta. I see with equal amazement both the pious and their awful retreat. It becomes, indeed, pure spirits to feed on balmy air in a forest blooming with trees of life; to bathe in rills dyed yellow with the golden dust of the lotus, and to fortify their virtue in the mysterious bath; to meditate in caves, the pebbles of which are unblenished gems; and to restrain their passions, even though nymphs of exquisite beauty frolic around them. In this grove alone is attained the summit of true piety, to which other hermits in vain aspire. — SACONTALA.

*Her death predoom'd
To that black hour of midnight, when the Moon
Hath turn'd her face away,
Unwilling to behold
The unhappy end of guilt!* — VI. 4, p. 576.

I will now speak to thee of that time in which, should a devout man die, he will never return; and of that time in which, dying, he shall return again to earth.

Those holy men who are acquainted with Brahma, departing this life in the fiery light of day, in the bright season of the moon, within the six months of the sun's northern course, go unto him: but those who depart in the gloomy night of the moon's dark season, and whilst the sun is yet within the southern path of his journey, ascend for a while into the regions of the moon, and again return to mortal birth. These two, Light and Darkness, are esteemed the World's eternal ways: he who walketh in the former path returneth not; whilst he who walketh in the latter cometh back again upon the earth. — KREESHNA, in the Bhagvat Geeta.

Indra. — VI. 4, p. 577.

The Indian God of the visible Heavens is called Indra, or the King; and Divespetir, Lord of the Sky. He has the character of the Roman Genius, or chief of the Good Spirits. His consort is named Sachi; his celestial city, Amaravati; his palace, Vaijaganta; his garden, Nandana; his chief elephant, Airevat; his charioteer, Matali; and his weapon, Vajra, or the thunderbolt. He is the regent of winds and showers, and, though the East is peculiarly under his care, yet his Olympus is Meru, or the North Pole, allegorically represented as a mountain of gold and gems. He is the Prince of the beneficent Genii. — Sir W. JONES.

A distinct idea of Indra, the King of Immortals, may be collected from a passage in the ninth section of the Geeta.

“These having, through virtue, reached the mansion of the king of Suras, feast on the exquisite heavenly food of the Gods; they who have enjoyed this lofty region of SWERGA, but whose virtue is exhausted, revisit the habitation of mortals.”

He is the God of thunder and the five elements, with inferior Genii under his command; and is conceived to govern the eastern quarter of the world, but to preside, like the Genius or Agathodæmon of the ancients, over the celestial bands, which are stationed on the summit of MERU, or the North Pole, where he solaces the Gods with nectar and heavenly music.

The Cinnaras are the male dancers in SWERGA, or the Heaven of Indra, and the Apsaras are his dancing girls, answering to the fairies of the Persians, and to the damsels called in the Koran hhîru lûyân, or, with antelope's eyes. — Sir W. JONES.

*I have seen Indra tremble at his prayers,
And at his dreadful penances turn pale.* — VI. 4, p. 577.

Of such penances Mr. Halhed has produced a curious specimen.

“In the wood Midhoo, which is on the confines of the kingdoms of Brege, Tarakee selected a pleasant and beautiful spot, adorned with verdure and blossoms, and there exercised himself in penance and mortification, externally with the sincerest piety, but in reality, the most malignant intention, and with the determined purpose of oppressing the Devetas; penances such as credulity itself was astonished to hear; and they are here recounted:—

1. For a hundred years, he held up his arms and one foot towards heaven, and fixed his eyes upon the sun the whole time.

2. For a hundred years, he remained standing on tiptoe.

3. For a hundred years more, he nourished himself with nothing but water.

4. For a hundred years more, he lived upon nothing but air.

5. For a hundred years more, he stood and made his adorations in the river.

6. For a hundred years more he made those adorations buried up to his neck in the earth.

7. For a hundred years more, enveloped with fire.

8. For a hundred years more, he stood upon his head with his feet towards heaven.

9. For a hundred years more, he stood upon the palm of one hand resting on the ground.

10. For a hundred years more, he hung by his head from the branch of a tree.

11. For a hundred years more, he hung from a tree with his head downwards.

When he at length came to a respite from these severe mortifications, a radiant glory encircled the devotee, and a flame of fire, arising from his head, began to consume the whole world."—From the Seva Pooraan, MAURICE'S History of Hindustan.

You see a pious Yogi, motionless as a pollard, holding his thick, bushy hair, and fixing his eyes on the solar orb. Mark—his body is half covered with a white ant's edifice made of raised clay; the skin of a snake supplies the place of his sacerdotal thread, and part of it girds his loins; a number of knotty plants encircle and wound his neck, and surrounding birds' nests almost conceal his shoulders.

Dushmanta. I bow to a man of his austere devotion.—SACONTALA.

That even Seeva's self,

The Highest, cannot grant and be secure.—VI. 4, p. 577.

It will be seen from the following fable, that Seeva had once been reduced to a very humiliating employment by one of Kehama's predecessors:—

Ravana, by his power and infernal arts, had subjugated all the gods and demigods, and forced them to perform menial offices about his person and household. Indra made garlands of flowers to adorn him withal; Agni was his cook; Surya supplied light by day, and Chandra by night; Varuna purveyed water for the palace; Kavra furnished cash. The whole nava-graha (the nine planetary spheres) sometimes arranged themselves into a ladder, by which, they serving as steps, the tyrant ascended his throne. Brahma (for the great gods were there also; and I give this anecdote as I find it in my memoranda, without any improved arrangement)—Brahma was a herald, proclaiming the giant's titles, the day of the week, month, &c. daily in the palace,—a sort of speaking almanac: Mahadeva, (i. e. Seeva,) in his Avatara of Kandeh-roo, performed the office of barber, and trimmed the giants' beards: Vishnu had the honorable occupation of instructing and drilling the dancing and singing girls, and selecting the fairest for the royal bed: Ganesa had the care of the cows, goats, and herds: Vayu swept the house; Yama washed the linen;—and in this manner were all the gods employed in the menial offices of Ravana, who rebuked and flogged them in default of industry and attention. Nor were the female divinities exempted; for Bhuvani, in her name and form of Satni, was head Aya, or nurse, to Ravana's children; Lakshmi and Saraswati were also among them, but it does not appear in what capacity.—MOORE'S Hindu Pantheon, p. 333.

Seeva was once in danger even of annihilation. "In passing from the town of Silgut to Deonbully," says Colonel Wilks, "I became accidentally informed of a sect, peculiar, as I since understand, to the north-eastern parts of Mysoor, the women of which universally undergo the amputation of the first joints of the third and fourth fingers of their right hands. On my arrival at Deonbully, after ascertaining that the request would not give offence, I desired to see some of these women; and, the same afternoon, seven of them attended at my tent. The sect is a subdivision of the Murresoo Wokul,* and belongs to the fourth great class of the Hindoos, viz. the Souder. Every woman of the sect, previously to piercing the ears of her eldest daughter, preparatory to her being betrothed in marriage, must necessarily undergo this mutilation, which is performed by the blacksmith of the village for a regulated fee, by a surgical process sufficiently rude. The finger to be amputated is placed on a block; the blacksmith places a chisel over the articulation of the joint, and chops it off at a single blow. If the girl to be betrothed is motherless, and the mother of the boy have not before been subject to the operation, it is incumbent on her to perform the sacrifice. After satisfying myself with regard to the facts of the case, I inquired into the origin of so strange a practice, and one of the women related, with great fluency, the following traditional tale, which has since been repeated to me, with no material deviation, by several others of the sect.

A Rachas (or giant) named Vrica, and in after times Bushman-soor, or the giant of the ashes, had, by a course of austere devotion to Mahadeo, (Seeva), obtained from him the promise of whatever boon he should ask. The Rachas accordingly demanded, that every person on whose head he should place his right hand might instantly be reduced to ashes; and Mahadeo conferred the boon, without suspicion of the purpose for which it was designed.

The Rachas no sooner found himself possessed of this formidable power, than he attempted to use it for the destruction of his benefactor. Mahadeo fled, the Rachas pursued, and followed the fugitive so closely as to chase him into a thick grove; where Mahadeo, changing his form and bulk, concealed himself in the centre of a fruit, then called tunda pundoo, but since named linga tunda, from the resemblance which its kernel thenceforward assumed to the ling, the appropriate emblem of Mahadeo.

The Rachas having lost sight of Mahadeo, inquired of a husbandman, who was working in the adjoining field, whether he had seen the fugitive, and what direction he had taken. The husbandman, who had attentively observed the whole transaction, fearful of the future resentment of Mahadeo, and equally alarmed for the present vengeance of the giant, answered aloud, that he had seen no fugitive, but pointed, at the same time, with the little finger of his right hand, to the place of Mahadeo's concealment.

In this extremity,† Vishnou descended, in the form of a beautiful damsel, to the rescue of Mahadeo. The Rachas became instantly enamored;—the damsel was a pure Brahmin, and might not be approached by the unclean Rachas. By degrees she appeared to relent; and as a previous condition to farther advances, enjoined the performance of his ablutions in a neighboring pool. After these were finished, she prescribed, as a further purification, the performance of the Sandia,—a ceremony in which the right hand is successively applied to the breast, to the crown of the head, and to other parts of the body. The Rachas, thinking only of love, and forgetful of the powers of his right hand, performed the Sandia, and was himself reduced to ashes.

Mahadeo now issued from the linga tunda, and, after the proper acknowledgments for his deliverance, proceeded to discuss the guilt of the treacherous husbandman, and determined on the loss of the finger with which he had offended, as the proper punishment of his crime.

The wife of the husbandman, who had just arrived at the field with food for her husband, hearing this dreadful sentence, threw herself at the feet of Mahadeo. She represented the certain ruin of her family, if her husband should be disabled for some months from performing the labors of the farm, and besought the Deity to accept two of her fingers, instead of one from her husband. Mahadeo, pleased with so sincere a proof of conjugal affection, accepted the exchange, and ordained that her female posterity, in all future generations, should sacrifice two fingers at his temple, as a memorial of the transaction, and of their exclusive devotion to the God of the Ling.

* Murresoo, or Mursoo, in the Hala Canara, signifies rude, uncivilized;—Wokul, a husbandman.

† Dignus vindice notus.

The practice is, accordingly, confined to the supposed posterity of this single woman, and is not common to the whole sect of Murresoo-Wokul. I ascertained the actual number of families who observed this practice in three successive districts through which I afterwards passed, and I conjecture that, within the limits of Mysoor, they may amount to about two thousand houses.

The Hill of Sectec, in the talook of Colar, where the giant was destroyed, is (according to this tradition) formed of the ashes of Busmaa-soor. It is held in particular veneration by this sect, as the chief seat of their appropriate sacrifice; and the fact of its containing little or no moisture is held to be a miraculous proof that the ashes of the giant continue to absorb the most violent and continued rain. This is a remarkable example of easy credulity. I have examined the mountain, which is of a sloping form, and composed of coarse granite."—Hist. Sketches of the South of India, vol. i. p. 442, note.

The Ship of Heaven. — VII. 1, p. 578.

I have converted the Vimana, or self-moving Car of the Gods, into a Ship. Captain Wilford has given the history of its invention,—and, what is more curious, has attempted to settle the geography of the story.

"A most pious and venerable sage, named RISHI'CE'SA, being very far advanced in years, had resolved to visit, before he died, all the famed places of pilgrimage; and, having performed his resolution, he bathed at last in the sacred water of the Ca'li, where he observed some fishes engaged in amorous play, and reflecting on their numerous progeny, which would sport like them in the stream, he lamented the improbability of leaving any children: but, since he might possibly be a father, even at his great age, he went immediately to the king of that country, HIRANYAVERNA, who had fifty daughters, and demanded one of them in marriage. So strange a demand gave the prince great uneasiness: yet he was unwilling to incur the displeasure of a saint whose imprecations he dreaded; he, therefore, invoked Hari, or Vishnu, to inspire him with a wise answer, and told the hoar philosopher, that he should marry any one of his daughters, who, of her own accord, should fix on him as her bridegroom. The sage, rather disconcerted, left the palace; but, calling to mind the two sons of ASWINI, he hastened to their terrestrial abode, and requested that they would bestow on him both youth and beauty: they immediately conducted him to Abhimatada, which we suppose to be Abydos, in Upper Egypt; and, when he had bathed in the pool of Rapagavana, he was restored to the flower of his age, with the graces and charms of CA'MA'DE'VA. On his return to the palace, he entered the secret apartments, called antahpara, where the fifty princesses were assembled; and they were all so transported with the vision of more than human beauty, that they fell into an ecstasy, whence the place was afterwards named Mohast-han, or Mohana, and is, possibly, the same with Mohannan. They no sooner had recovered from their trance, than each of them exclaimed, that she would be his bride; and their altercation having brought HIRANYAVERNA into their apartment, he terminated the contest by giving them all in marriage to RISHI'CE'SA, who became the father of a hundred sons; and, when he succeeded to the throne, built the city of Suc-laveriddhana, framed vimanas, or celestial, self-moving cars, in which he visited the gods, and made gardens, abounding in delights, which rivalled the bowers of INDRA; but, having obtained the desire which he formed at Matoyasangama, or the place where the fish were assembled, he resigned the kingdom to his eldest son HIRANYAVRIDDAH, and returned, in his former shape, to the banks of the Ca'li, where he closed his days in devotion."—WILFORD. Asiatic Researches.

Dushmaata. In what path of the winds are we now journeying?

Matali. This is the way which leads along the triple river, heaven's brightest ornament, and causes yon luminaries to roll in a circle with diffused beams: it is the course of a gentle breeze which supports the floating forms of the gods; and this path was the second step of Vishnu when he confounded the proud Bali.

Dushmanta. The car itself instructs me that we are moving over clouds pregnant with showers; for the circumference of its wheels disperses pellucid water.

The Raining Tree. — VII. 9, p. 579

The island of Fierro is one of the most considerable of the Canaries; and I conceive that name to be given it upon this account, that its soil, not affording so much as a drop of fresh water, seems to be of iron; and, indeed, there is in this island neither river, nor rivulet, nor well, nor spring, save that only towards the sea-side, there are some wells; but they lie at such a distance from the city, that the inhabitants can make no use thereof. But the great Preserver and Sustainer of all remedies this inconvenience by a way so extraordinary, that a man will be forced to sit down and acknowledge that he gives in this an undeniable demonstration of his goodness and infinite providence.

For in the midst of the island, there is a tree, which is the only one of its kind, inasmuch as it hath no resemblance to those mentioned by us in this relation, nor to any other known to us in Europe. The leaves of it are long and narrow, and continue in a constant verdure, winter and summer; and its branches are covered with a cloud, which is never dispelled, but resolved into a moisture, which causes to fall from its leaves a very clear water, and that in such abundance, that the cisterns, which are placed at the foot of the tree to receive it, are never empty, but contain enough to supply both men and beasts. — MANDELSLO.

Feyjoo denies the existence of any such tree, upon the authority of P. Tallandier, a French Jesuit, (quoted in Mém. de Trevoux, 2715, art. 97,) who visited the island. "Assi no dudo," he adds, "que este Fenix de les plantas es ten fingido como el de las aves."—Theat. Crit. Tom. ii. Disc. 2, § 65. What authority is due to the testimony of this French Jesuit I do not know, never having seen his book; but it appears, from the undoubted evidence of GLAS, that the existence of such a tree is believed in the Canaries, and positively affirmed by the inhabitants of Fierro itself.

"There are," says this excellent author, "only three fountains of water in the whole island; one of them is called Acof,* which, in the language of the ancient inhabitants, signifies river; a name, however, which does not seem to have been given it on account of its yielding much water, for in that respect it hardly deserves the name of a fountain. More to the northward is another called Hapio; and in the middle of the island is a spring, yielding a stream about the thickness of a man's finger. This last was discovered in the year 1565, and is called the Fountain of Anton Hernandez. On account of the scarcity of water, the sheep, goats, and swine here do not drink in the summer, but are taught to dig up the roots of fern, and chew them to quench their thirst. The great cattle are watered at those fountains, and at a place where water distils from the leaves of a tree. Many writers have made mention of this famous tree; some in such a manner as to make it appear miraculous; others again deny the existence of any such tree, among whom is Father Feyjoo, a modern Spanish author, in his Theatro Critico. But he, and those who agree with him in this matter, are as much mistaken as they who would make it appear miraculous. This is the only island of all the Canaries which I have not been in; but I have sailed with natives of Hierro, who, when questioned about the existence of this tree, answered in the affirmative.

The author of the History of the Discovery and Conquest has given us a particular account of it, which I shall relate here at large. "The district in which this tree stands is called Tigulahe; near to which, and in the cliff, or steep rocky ascent that surrounds the whole island, is a narrow gutter or gully, which commences at the sea, and continues to the summit of the cliff, where it joins or coincides with a

valley, which is terminated by the steep front of a rock. On the top of this rock grows a tree, called, in the language of the ancient inhabitants, Garse, i. e. Sacred or Holy Tree, which, for many years, has been preserved sound, entire, and fresh. Its leaves constantly distil such a quantity of water as is sufficient to furnish drink to every living creature in Hierro; nature having provided this remedy for the drought of the island. It is situated about a league and a half from the sea. Nobody knows of what species it is, only that it is called Til. It is distinct from other trees, and stands by itself; the circumference of the trunk is about twelve spans, the diameter four, and in height, from the ground to the top of the highest branch, forty spans: The circumference of all the branches together is one hundred and twenty feet. The branches are thick and extended; the lowest commence about the height of an ell from the ground. Its fruit resembles the acorn, and tastes something like the kernel of a pine nut, but is softer and more aromatic. The leaves of this tree resemble those of the laurel, but are larger, wider, and more curved; they come forth in a perpetual succession, so that the tree always remains green. Near to it grows a thorn, which fastens on many of its branches, and interweaves with them; and, at a small distance from the Garse, are some beech-trees, bresos, and thorns. On the north side of the trunk are two large tanks, or cisterns, of rough stone, or rather one cistern divided, each half being twenty feet square, and sixteen spans in depth. One of these contains water for the drinking of the inhabitants, and the other that which they use for their cattle, washing, and such like purposes. Every morning, near this part of the island, a cloud or mist arises from the sea, which the south and easterly winds force against the fore-mentioned steep cliff; so that the cloud, having no vent but by the gutter, gradually ascends it, and from thence advances slowly to the extremity of the valley, where it is stopped and checked by the front of the rock which terminates the valley, and then rests upon the thick leaves and wide-spreading branches of the tree; from whence it distils in drops during the remainder of the day, until it is at length exhausted, in the same manner that we see water drip from the leaves of trees after a heavy shower of rain. This distillation is not peculiar to the Garse, or Til, for the bresos which grow near it likewise drop water; but their leaves being but few and narrow, the quantity is so trifling, that, though the natives save some of it, yet they make little or no account of any but what distils from the Til; which, together with the water of some fountains, and what is saved in the winter season, is sufficient to serve them and their flocks. This tree yields most water in those years when the Levant, or easterly winds have prevailed for a continuance; for by these winds only the clouds or mists are drawn hither from the sea. A person lives on the spot near which this tree grows, who is appointed by the Council to take care of it and its water, and is allowed a house to live in, with a certain salary. He every day distributes to each family of the district seven pots or vessels full of water, besides what he gives to the principal people of the island.²²

Whether the tree which yields water at this present time be the same as that mentioned in the above description, I cannot pretend to determine, but it is probable there has been a succession of them; for Pliny, describing the Fortunate Islands, says, "In the mountains of Ombrion are trees resembling the plant Ferula, from which water may be procured by pressure. What comes from the black kind is bitter, but that which the white yields is sweet and palatable." — GLAS'S History of the Canary Islands.

Cordeyro (Historia Insulana, lib. ii. c. 5) says, that this tree resembles what in other places is called the Til (Tilia), the Linden Tree; and he proceeds, from these three letters, to make it an emblem of the Trinity. The water, he says, was called the Agua Santa, and the tree itself the Santa Arvore, — appellations not ill bestowed. According to his account the water was delivered out in stated portions.

There is an account of a similar tree in Cockburne's Travels; but this I believe to be a work of fiction. Bernal Diaz, however, mentions one as growing at Naco, in Honduras, "Que en mitad de la siesta, por recio sol que hiziesse, parecia que la sombra del arbol refrescava al carazon, caia del uno como rozio muy delgado que confortava las cabezas." — 206.

There may be some exaggeration in the accounts of the Fierro Tree, but that the story has some foundation I have no doubt. The islanders of St. Thomas say, that they have a sort of trees whose leaves continually are distilling water. (Barbot. in Churchle, 405.) It is certain that a dew falls in hot weather from the lime, — a fact of which any person may easily convince himself. The same property has been observed in other English trees, as appears by the following extract from the Monthly Magazine: —

"In the beginning of August, after a sunshiny day, the air became suddenly misty about six o'clock; I walked, however, by the road-side from seven to eight, and observed, in many places, that a shower of big drops of water was falling under the large trees, although no rain fell elsewhere. The road and path continued dusty, and the field-gates showed no signs of being wetted by the mist. I have often noticed the like fact, but have not met with a satisfactory explanation of this power in trees to condense mist."

I am not the only poet who has availed himself of the Fierro Tree. It is thus introduced in the Columbus of Carara, — a singular work, containing, amid many extravagancies, some passages of rare merit: —

*Ecce autem inspector miri dum devius ignis
Fertur, in occursum miræ mogis incidit unda.
Æquoris in medio diffusi largiter arbor
Stabat, apaca, ingens, ævoque intacta priori,
Grata quies Nymphis, et grata colentibus umbram

CARRARA. Columbus. Lib. iii. pp. 53—57.

Nared. — VII. 11, p. 579.

A very distinguished son of Brahma, named Nared, bears a strong resemblance to Hermes or Mercury; he was a wise legislator, great in arts and in arms, an eloquent messenger of the Gods, either to one another or to favored mortals, and a musician of exquisite skill. His invention of the Vina, or Indian lute, is thus described in the poem entitled Magha: "Nared sat watching from time to time his large Vina, which, by the impulse of the breeze, yielded notes that pierced successively the regions of his ear, and proceeded by musical intervals." — Asiatic Researches, Sir W. JONES.

The Vina is an Æolian harp. The people of Amboyaa have a different kind of Æolian instrument, which is thus described in the first account of D'Entrecasteaux's Voyage; "Being on the sea-shore, I heard some wind-instruments, the harmony of which, though sometimes very correct, was intermixed with discordant notes that were by no means unpleasing. These sounds, which were very musical, and formed fine cadences, seemed to come from such a distance, that I for some time imagined the natives were having a concert beyond the roadstead, near a myriameter from the spot where I stood. My ear was greatly deceived respecting the distance, for I was not a hundred meters from the instrument. It was a bamboo at least twenty meters in height, which had been fixed in a vertical situation by the sea-side. I remarked between each knot a slit about three centimeters long by a centimeter and a half wide; these slits formed so many holes, which, when the wind introduced itself into them, gave agreeable and diversified sounds. As the knots of this long bamboo were very numerous, care had been taken to make holes in different directions, in order that, on whatever side the wind blew, it might always meet with some of them. I cannot convey a better idea of the sound of this instrument, than by comparing them to those of the Harmonica." — LABILLARDIERE. Voyage in Search of La Perouse.

Nareda, the mythological offspring of Sarasvati, patroness of music, is famed for his talents in that science. So great were they, that he became presumptuous; and emulating the divine strains of Krishna, he was punished by having his Vina placed in the paws of a bear, whence it emitted sounds far sweeter than the minstrelsy of the mortified musician. I have a picture of this joke, in which Krishna is forcing his reluctant friend to attend to his rough-visaged rival, who is ridiculously touching the chords of poor Nareda's Vina, accompanied by a brother Bruin on the cymbals. Krishna passed several practical jokes on his humble and affectionate friend: he metamorphosed him once into a woman, at another time into a bear. — MOORE'S Hindu Pantheon, p. 204.

Sole Rajah, the Omnipotent below. — VII. 11, p. 580.

No person has given so complete a sample of the absurdity of Oriental titles as the Dutch traveller Struys, in his enumeration of "the proud and blasphemous titles of the King of Siam, — they will hardly bear sense," says the translator, in what he calls, by a happy blunder, "the idiotism of our tongue."

The Alliance, written with letters of fine gold, being full of godlike glory. The most Excellent, containing all wise sciences. The most Happy, which is not in the world among men. The Best and most Certain that is in Heaven, Earth, and Hell. The greatest Sweet, and friendly Royal Word; whose powerful sounding properties and glorious fame range through the world, as if the dead were raised by a godlike power, and wonderfully purged from ghostly and corporal corruption. At this both spiritual and secular men admire with a special joy, whereas no dignity may be herewith compared. Proceeding from a friendly, illustrious, unconquerable, most mighty and most high Lord; and a royal Crown of Gold, adorned with nine sorts of precious stones. The greatest, clearest, and most godlike Lord of unblamable Souls. The most Holy, seeing every where, and protecting Sovereign of the city JUDIA, whose many streets and open gates are thronged by troops of men, which is the chief metropolis of the whole world, the royal throne of the earth, that is adorned with nine sorts of stones and most pleasant valleys. He who guides the reins of the world, and has a horse more than the Gods of fine gold and of precious stones; they the godlike Lords of thrones and of fine gold; the White, Red, and Round-tayPd Elephants, — which excellent creatures are the chiefest of the nine sorts of Gods. To none hath the divine Lord given, in whose hand is the victorious sword; who is like the fiery-armed God of Battails, to the most illustrious.

The second is as blasphemous as the first, though hardly wells so far out of sense.

The highest PADUCCO SYRY SULTAN, NELMONAM WELGACA, NEMOCHADIN MAGIVITHA, JOUKEN DER EAUTEN ALLAULA FYLAN, King of the whole world; who makes the water rise and flow. A King that is like a God, and shines like the sun at noon-day. A King that gives a glance like the Moon when it is at full. Elected of God to be worthy as the North Star, being of the race and offspring of the great Alexander; with a great understanding, as a round orb, that tumbles hither and thither, able to guess at the depth of the great sea. A King that hath amended all the funerals of the departed Saints, and is as righteous as God, and of such power, that all the world may come and shelter under his wings. A King that doth right in all things, as the Kings of old have done. A King more liberal than all Kings. A King that hath many mines of gold that God hath lent him; who hath built temples half gold and half brass; sitting upon a throne of pure gold, and of all sorts of precious stones. A King of the white Elephant, which Elephant is the King of all Elephants, before whom many thousands of other Elephants must bow and fall upon their knees. He whose eyes shine like the morning-star. A King that hath Elephants with four teeth, red, purple, and pied. Elephants, ay, and a BYTESAQUES Elephant; for which God has given him many and divers sorts of apparel wrought with most fine gold, ennobled with many precious stones: and, besides these, so many Elephants used in battle, having harnesses of iron, their teeth tipped with steel, and their harnesses laid over with shining brass. A King that has many hundred horses, whose trappings are wrought with fine gold, and adorned with precious stones of every sort that are found in the universal world where the Sun shines, and these shod with fine gold: besides so many hundred horses that are used in war of every kind. A King who has all Emperours, Kings, Princes, and Sovereigns in the whole world from the rising to the going down of the sun, under subjection; — and such as can obtain his favor are by him promoted to great honor; but, on the contrary, such as revolt, he burns with fire. A King who can show the power of God, and whatever God has made.

And so, by this time, I hope you have heard enough of a King of Elephants and Horses, though not a word of his Asses. — STRUYS.

The Sacrifice. — VIII. p. 581.

The Asvamedha, or sacrifice of a horse. Considerable difficulties usually attended that ceremony; for the consecrated horse was to be set at liberty for a certain time, and followed at a distance by the owner, or his champion, who was usually one of his near kinsman; and, if any person should attempt to stop it in its rambles, a battle must inevitably ensue; besides, as the performer of a hundred Asvamedhas became equal to the God of the firmament, Indra was perpetually on the watch, and generally carried off the sacred animal by force or by fraud. — WILFORD. Asiat. Res.

Mr. Halhed gives a very curious account of this remarkable sacrifice: —

“The Ashum-meed-Jugg does not merely consist in the performance of that ceremony which is open to the inspection of the world, namely, bringing a horse and sacrificing him; but Ashum-meed is to be taken in a mystic signification, as implying that the sacrificer must look upon himself to be typified in that horse, such as he shall be described, because the religious duty of the Ashum-meed-Jugg comprehends all those other religious duties, to the performance of which all the wise and holy direct all their actions, and by which all the sincere professors of every different faith aim at perfection: the mystic signification thereof is as follows:

“The head of that unblemished horse is the symbol of the morning; his eyes are the sun; his breath the wind; his wide-opening mouth is the Bishwaner, or that innate warmth which invigorates all the world; his body typifies one entire year; his back paradise; his belly the plains; his hoofs this earth; his sides the four quarters of the heavens; the bones thereof the intermediate spaces between the four quarters; the rest of his limbs represent all distinct matter; the places where those limbs meet, or his joints, imply the months and halves of the months, which are called peche (or fortnights); his feet signify night and day; and night and day are of four kinds.

1. The night and day of Eirhna, 2. The night and day of angels, 3. The night and day of the world of the spirits of deceased ancestors, 4. The night and day of mortals; these four kinds are typified in his four feet. The rest of his bones are the constellations of the fixed stars, which are the twenty-eight stages of the moon’s course, called the Lunar year: his flesh is the clouds; his food the sand; his tendons the river; his spleen and his liver the mountains; the hair of his body the vegetables, and his long hair the trees, the fore part of his body typifies the first half of the day, and the hinder part the latter half; his yawning is the flash of the lightning, and his turning himself is the thunder of the cloud; his urine represents the rain, and his mental reflection is his only speech. The golden vessels, which are prepared before the horse is let loose, are the light of the day, and the place where those vessels are kept is a type of the Ocean of the East; the silver vessels which are prepared after the horse is let loose, are the light of the night; and the place where those vessels are kept is a type of the Ocean of the West; these two sorts of vessels are always before and after the horse. The Arabian horse, which, on account of his swiftness, is called the Hly, is the performer of the journeys of angels; the Tajee, which is of the race of Persian horses, is the performer of the journeys of the Kundherps (or good spirits); the Wazba, which is of the race of the deformed Tajee horses, is the performer of the journeys of the Jins (or demons); and the Ashoo, which is of the race of Turkish horses, is the performer of the journeys of mankind. This one horse, which performs these several services, on account of his four different sorts of riders, obtains the four different appellations. The place where this horse remains is the great ocean, which signifies the great spirit of Perm-Atma, or the Universal Soul, which proceeds also from that Perm-Atma, and is comprehended in the same Perm-Atma. The intent of this sacrifice is, that a man should consider himself to be in the place of that horse, and look upon all these articles as typified in himself; and, conceiving the Atma (or divine soul) to be an ocean, should let all thought of self be absorbed in that Atma.” — HALHED, from Daral Shekrah.

Compare this specimen of Eastern sublimity with the description of the horse in Job! Compare it also with the account of the Bengal horses, in the very amusing work of Captain Williamson, — “which said horses,” he says, “have generally Roman noses, and sharp, narrow foreheads, much white in their eyes, ill shaped ears, square heads, thin necks, narrow chests, shallow girths, lank bellies, cat hams, goose rumps, and switch tails.” — Oriental Sports, vol. ii. p. 295.

The bowl that in its vessel floats. — VIII. 5, p. 581.

The day and night are here divided into four quarters, each of six hours, and these again into fifteen parts, of twenty-four minutes each. For a chronometer they use a kind of dish of thin brass, at the bottom of which there is a little hole: this is put into a vessel with water, and it runs full in a certain time. They begin their first quarter at six in the morning. They strike the quarters and subdivisions of time with a wooden hammer, upon a flat piece of iron or steel, of about ten inches in diameter, which is called a garnial, and gives a pretty smart sound, which can be heard at some distance. The quarters are first struck, and then as many times as the brass dish has run full in that quarter. None but the chief men of a district are allowed to have a garnial, and still they may not strike the first division of the first quarter, which is a privilege reserved to the nabob alone. Those who attend at these clocks must be of the Bramin cast. — STAVORINUS.

*Lo! the time-taper's flame, ascending slow,
Creeps up its coil.* — VIII. 7, p. 582.

They make a sort of paste of the dust of a certain sort of wood, (the learned and rich men of sandal, eagle-wood, and others that are odoriferous,) and of this paste they make sticks of several sorts, drawing them through a hole, that they may be of an equal thickness. They commonly make them one, two, or three yards long, about the thickness of a goose-quill, to burn in the pagods before their idols, or to use like a match to convey fire from one thing to another. These sticks or ropes they coil, beginning at the centre, and so form a spiral, conical figure, like a fisherman's wheel, so that the last circle shall be one, two, or three spans in diameter, and will last one, two, or three days, or more, according as it is in thickness. There are of them in the temples that last ten, twenty, and thirty days. This thing is hung up by the centre, and is lighted at the lower end, whence the fire gently and insensibly runs round all the coil, on which there are generally five marks, to distinguish the five parts of the night. This method of measuring time is so exact and true, that they scarce ever find any considerable mistake in it. The learned travellers, and all others, who will rise at a certain hour to follow their business, hang a little weight at the mark that shows the hour they have a mind to rise at, which, when the fire comes thither, drops into a brass basin set under it; and so the noise of it falling awakes them, as our alarm-clocks do. — GEMELLI CARERI.

*At noon the massacre begun,
And night closed in before the work of death was done.*
VIII. 11, p. 582.

Of such massacres the ancient and modern history of the East supply but too many examples. One may suffice:

After the surrender of the Ilbars Khan, Nadir prohibited his soldiers from molesting the inhabitants; but their rapacity was more powerful than their habits of obedience, or even their dread of his displeasure, and they accordingly began to plunder. The instant Nadir heard of their disobedience, he ordered the offenders to be brought before him, and the officers were beheaded in his presence, and the private soldiers dismissed with the loss of their ears and noses. The executioners toiled till sunset, when he commanded the headless trunks with their arms to be carried to the main-guard, and there to be exposed for two days, as an example to others. I was present the whole time, and saw the wonderful hand of God, which employs such instruments for the execution of his divine vengeance; although not one of the executioners was satisfied with Nadir Shah, yet nobody dared to disobey his commands:—a father beheaded his son, and a brother a brother, and yet presumed not to complain. — ANOUL KUNREM.

*Behold his lowly home,
By yonder broad-bough'd Plane o'ershaded.* — IX. 3, p. 582.

The plane-tree, that species termed the Platanus Orientalis, is commonly cultivated in Cashmere, where it is said to arrive at a greater perfection than in other countries. This tree, which, in most parts of Asia, is called the Chinur, grows to the size of an oak, and has a taper, straight trunk, with a silver-colored bark; and its leaf, not unlike an expanded hand, is of a pale green. When in full foliage, it has a grand and beautiful appearance; and, in the hot weather, it affords a refreshing shade. — FORSTER.

The marriage bower. — IX. 4, p. 583

The Pandal is a kind of arbor or bower raised before the doors of young married women. They set up two or three poles, seven or eight foot in length, round which the leaves of the Pisac-tree, the symbol of joy, are entwined. These poles support others that are laid crossways, which are covered with leaves, in order to form a shade. The Siriperes are allowed to set up no more than three pillars, and the infringing of this custom would be sufficient to cause an insurrection. — A. ROGER, in Picart.

The market-flag. — IX. 6, p. 583.

Many villages have markets on particular days, when not only fruits, grain, and the common necessaries of life are sold, but occasionally manufactures of various descriptions. These markets are well known to all the neighboring country, being on appointed days of the week, or of the lunar month; but, to remind those, who may be travelling, of their vicinity to the means of supply, a naugaurah, or large kettle-drum, is beat during the forenoon, and a small flag, usually of white linen, with some symbolical figures in colors, or with a colored border, is hoisted on a very long bamboo, kept upright by means of ropes fastened to pins driven into the ground. The flags of Hindoo villages are generally square and plain; those of the Mussulman's towns are ordinarily triangular, and bear the type of their religion, viz. a double-bladed cimeter. — Oriental Sports, vol. i. p. 103.

*There, from the intolerable heat,
The buffaloes retreat.* — IX. 7, p. 583.

About noon, in hot weather, the buffalo throws herself into the water or mud of a tank, if there be one accessible at a convenient distance; and leaving nothing above water but her nose, continues there for five or six hours, or until the heat abates. — BUCHANAN.

In the hot season, when water becomes very scarce, the buffaloes avail themselves of any puddle they may find among the covers, wherein they roll and rub themselves, so as in a very short time to change what was at first a shallow flat, into a deep pit, sufficient to conceal their own bulk. The humidity of the soil, even when the water may have evaporated, is particularly gratifying to these animals, which cannot bear heat, and which, if not indulged in a free access to the water, never thrive. — Oriental Sports, vol. i. p. 259.

The buffalo not only delights in the water, but will not thrive unless it have a swamp to wallow in. There, rolling themselves, they speedily work deep hollows, wherein they lay immersed. No place seems to delight the buffalo more than the deep verdure on the confines of fields and marshes, especially if surrounded by tall grass, so as to afford concealment and shade, while the body is covered by the water. In such situations they seem to enjoy a perfect ecstasy, having, in general, nothing above the surface but their eyes and nostrils, the horns being kept low down, and, consequently, entirely hidden from view. — Oriental Sports, vol. ii. p. 49.

Captain Beaver describes these animals as to be found during the heat of the day in the creeks and on the shores of the Island of Bulama, almost totally immerged in water, little more than their heads appearing above it.

Mount Meru. — X. p. 581.

According to the orthodox Hindus, the globe is divided into two hemispheres, both called Meru; but the superior hemisphere is distinguished by the name of Sumeru, which implies beauty and excellence, in opposition to the lower hemisphere, or Cumeru, which signifies the reverse: by Meru, without any adjunct, they generally mean the higher or northern hemisphere, which they describe, with a profusion of poetic imagery, as the seat of delights; while they represent Cumeru as the dreary habitation of demons, in some parts intensely cold, and in others so hot that the waters are continually boiling. In strict propriety, Meru denotes the pole and the polar regions; but it is the celestial north pole round which they place the gardens and metropolis of Indra, while Yama holds his court in the opposite polar circle, or the station of Asuras, who warred with the Saras, or gods of the firmament. — WILFORD. Asiatic Researches.

In the Vayu Purānā, we are told, that the water or Ogha of the ocean, coming down from heaven like a stream of Anrita upon Meru, encircles it through seven channels, for the space of 81,000 Yojanas, and then divides into four streams, which, falling from the immense height of Meru, rest themselves in four lakes, from which they spring over the mountains through the air, just brushing the summits. This wild account was not unknown in the west; for this passage is translated almost verbally, by Pliny and Q. Curtius, in speaking of the Ganges. Cum magno fragore ipsius statim fontis Ganges erumpit, et magnorum montium juga recto alveo stringit, et ab ipso primis mollis planities contingat, in quodam lacu hospitatur. The words in Italics are from Pliny, (vi. c. 18,) the others from Curtius, (viii. c. 9.) — CAPT. WILFORD. As. Res. vol. viii. p. 322. Calcutta edition.

The Swarganga, or Mandacini, rises from under the feet of Veeshno, at the polar star, and, passing through the circle of the moon, it falls upon the summit of Meru; where it divides into four streams, flowing towards the four cardinal points. These four branches pass through four rocks, carved into the shape of four heads of different animals. The Ganges, running towards the south, passes through a cow's head: to the west is a horse's head, from which flows the Chaashu or Oxus; towards the east, is the head of an elephant, from which flows the river Sita; and to the north, is a lion's head, from which flows the Bhadrasama. — WILFORD. As. Res. v. viii. p. 317. Calc. edition.

The mountains through which the Ganges flows at Hurdwar, present the spectator with the view of a grand natural amphitheatre; their appearance is rugged, and destitute of verdure; they run in ridges and bluff points, in a direction east and west: at the back of the largest range rise, towering to the clouds, the lofty mountains of Himalayah, whose tops are covered with perpetual snow, which, on clear days, present a most sublime prospect. Their large jagged masses, broken into a variety of irregular shapes, added to their stupendous height, impress the mind with an idea of antiquity and grandeur, coeval with the creation; and the eternal frost with which they are incrustated, appears to preclude the possibility of mortals ever attaining their summit.

In viewing this grand spectacle of nature, the traveller may easily yield his assent to, and pardon the superstitious veneration of, the Hindoo votary, who, in the fervor of his imagination, assigns the summit of these icy regions as the abode of the great Mahadeo, or First Cause, where, seated on his throne of ice, he is supposed to receive the homage of the surrounding universe. — FRANKLIN'S Life of George Thomas, p. 41.

At Gangóttara, three small streams fall down from impassable snowy precipices, and unite into a small basin below, which is considered by the Hindus as the source of the Ganges, over which, at that place, a man can step. This is one of the five Tirthas, or stations, more eminently sacred than the rest upon this sacred river. Narayana Shastri, who gave this account, had visited it. — BUCHANAN.

The mountain, called Cailasa Cuogri, is exceedingly lofty. On its summit there is a Bhowjputr tree, from the root of which sprouts or gushes a small stream, which the people say is the source of the Ganges, and that it comes from Vaicon'tha, or Heaven, as is also related in the Purānas; although this source appears to the sight to flow from the spot where grows this Bhowjputr tree, which is at an ascent of some miles; and yet above this there is a still loftier summit, where no one goes: but I have heard that, on that uppermost pinnacle, there is a fountain or cavity, to which a Jogui somehow penetrated, who, having immersed his little finger in it, it became petrified. — PURANA POORA. Asiatic Researches.

Respecting the true source of the Ganges much uncertainty still prevails. In vain one of the most powerful sovereigns of Indostan, the emperor Achar, at the close of the sixteenth century, sent a number of men, an army of discoverers, provided with every necessary, and the most potent recommendations, to explore the course of the mighty river which adorned and fertilized the vast extent of his dominions. They were not able to penetrate beyond the famous Mouth of the Cow. This is an immense aperture, in a ridge of the mountains of Thibet, to which the natives of India have given this appellation, from the fancied or real resemblance of the rocks which form the stupendous chasm, to the mouth of an animal esteemed sacred throughout Indostan from the remotest antiquity. From this opening, the Ganges, precipitating itself into a large and deep basin at the foot of the mountains, forms a cataract, which is called Gangotri. The impracticability of scaling these precipitous rocks, and advancing beyond this formidable pass, has prevented the tracing whence this rushing mass of water takes its primary rise. — WILCOCKE, Note to Stavorinus.

The birth of Ganges. — X. 2, p. 584.

I am indebted to Sir William Jones's Hymn to Ganga, for this fable: —

“Above the stretch of mortal ken,
On bless'd Cailasa's top, where every stem
Glow'd with a vegetable gem,
Mahe'sa stood, the dread and joy of men;
While Pārvasi, to gain a boon,
Fix'd on his locks a beamy moon,
And hid his frontal eye in jocund play,
With reluctant sweet delay.
All nature straight was lock'd in dim eclipse,
Till Brahmans pure, with hallow'd lips,
And warbled prayers, restored the day;
When Ganga from his brow, by heavenly fingers press'd,
Sprang radiant, and, descending, graced the caverns of the west.”

The descent of the Ganges is related in the Ramayana, one of the most celebrated of the sacred books of the Bramins. This work the excellent and learned Baptist missionaries at Serampore are at this time employed in printing and translating; one volume has arrived in Europe, and from it I am tempted here to insert an extract of considerable length. The reader will be less disposed to condemn the fictions of Kehama as extravagant, when he compares them with this genuine specimen of Hindoo fable. He will perceive, too, that no undue importance has been attributed to the Horse of the Sacrifice in the Poem.

“The son of Kooshika having, in mellifluous accents, related these things to Rama, again addressed the descendant of Kakootitha. Formerly, O hero! there was a king of Hyoodhya, named Sugura, the Sovereign of Men, virtuous, desirous of children, but childless; O Rama! the daughter of Vidurbhakeshinee, virtuous, attached to truth, was his chief consort, and the daughter of Urishitunemi, Soomuti, unequalled in beauty, his second spouse. With these two consorts, the great king, going to Himuvat, engaged in sacred austerities on the mountain in whose sacred stream Bhrigoo constantly bathed. A hundred years being completed, the sage Bhrigoo, clothed with truth, rendered propitious by his austerities, granted him this blessing: O sinless One! thou shalt obtain a most numerous progeny; thy fame, O chief of men! will be unparalleled in the universe. From one of thy consorts, O sire! shall spring the founder of thy race, and, from the other, sixty thousand sons.

“The queens, pleased, approached the chief of men who was thus speaking, and, with hands respectfully joined, asked, O Brahman! who shall be the one son, and who shall produce the multitude? We, O Brahman! desire to hear. May thy words be verified. Hearing their request, the most virtuous Bhrigoo replied in these admirable words: Freely say which of these favors ye desire, whether the one, founder of the family, or the multitude of valiant, renowned, energetic sons. O Rama! son of Rughoo, Keshinee hearing the words of the sage, in the presence of the king accepted the one son, the founder of the family; and Soomuti, sister of Soopurna, accepted the sixty thousand sons, active and renowned. The king, O son of Rughoo! having respectfully circumambulated the sage, bowing the head, returned with his spouses to his own city.

“After some time had elapsed, his eldest spouse Keshinee bore to Sugura a son, named Usumunja; and Soomuti, O chief of men! brought forth a gourd, from which, on its being opened, came forth sixty thousand sons. These, carefully brought up by their nurses, in jars filled with clarified butter, in process of time attained the state of youth ;* and, after a long period, the sixty thousand sons of Sugura, possessed of youth and beauty, became men. The eldest son, the offspring of Sugura, O son of Rughoo! chief of men, seizing children, would throw them into the waters of the Suruyoo, and sport himself with their drowning pangs. This evil person, the distresser of good men, devoted to the injury of the citizens, was by his father expelled from the city. The son of Usumnja, the heroic Ungshooman, in conversation courteous and affectionate, was esteemed by all.

"After a long time, O chief of men! Sugura formed the steady resolve, 'I will perform a sacrifice.' Versed in the Veda, the king, attended by his instructors, having determined the things relating to the sacrificial work, began to prepare the sacrifice.

"Hearing the words of Vishwa-mitra, the son of Rughoo, highly gratified in the midst of the story, addressed the sage, bright as the ardent flame, Peace be to Thee: I desire, O Brahman, to hear this story at large, how my predecessors performed the sacrifice. Hearing his words, Vishwa-mitra, smiling, pleasantly replied to Rama: 'Attend, then, O Rama! to the story of Sugura, repeated at full length. Where the great mountain Himavat, the happy father-in-law of Shunkura, and the mountain Bindhyo, overlooking the country around, proudly vie with each other, there was the sacrifice of the great Sugura performed. That land, sacred and renowned, is the habitation of Rakshuses. At the command of Sugura, the hero Ungshooman, O Rama! eminent in archery, a mighty charioteer, was the attendant (of the horse.†) While the king was performing the sacrifice, a serpent, assuming the form of Ununta, rose from the earth, and seized the sacrificial horse. The sacrificial victim being stolen, all the priests, O son of Rughoo! going to the king, said, Thy consecrated horse has been stolen by some one in the form of a serpent. Kill the thief, and bring back the sacred horse. This interruption in the sacrifice portends evil to us all. Take those steps, O king! which may lead to the completion of the sacrifice. Having heard the advice of his instructors, the king, calling his sixty thousand sons into the assembly, said, I perceive that the Rakshuses have not been to this great sacrifice. A sacrifice of the Nagas is now performing by the sages, and some god, in the form of a serpent, has stolen the devoted horse. Whoever he be, who, at the time of the Deeksha, has been the cause of this afflictive circumstance, this unhappy event, whether he be gone to Patala, or whether he remain in the waters, kill him, O sons! and bring back my victim. May success attend you, O my sons! At my command traverse the sea-girt earth, digging with mighty labor, till you obtain a sight of the horse; each one piercing the earth to the depth of a yojuna, go you in search of him who stole the sacred horse. Being consecrated by the Deeksha, I, with my grandson, and my teachers, will remain with the sacrifice unfinished, till I again behold my devoted horse.'

"Thus instructed by their father Sugura, they, in obedience to him, went with cheerful mind, O Rama! to the bottom of the earth. The strong ones, having gone over the earth without obtaining a sight of the horse, each of these mighty men pierced the earth to the depth of a yojuna, with their mighty arm, the stroke of which resembled the thunderbolt. Pierced by Kooddalas,‡ by Purighas,§ by Shoolas,|| by Moos-hulas,¶ and Shuktis, the earth cried out as in darkness. Then arose, O Raghuva! a dreadful cry of the serpents, the Usooras, the Rakshuses, and other creatures, as of beings suffering death. These angry youths, O son of Rughoo! dug the earth even to Patala, to the extent of sixty thousand yojunas. Thus, O prince! the sons of the sovereign of men traversed Jambhodweepa, enclosed with mountains, digging

* The Hindoos call a child Bala, till it attains the age of fifteen years old. From the sixteenth year to the fiftieth, Youvana, or a state of youth, is supposed to continue. Each of these has several subdivisions; and in certain cases the period admits of variation, as appears to have been the case here.

wherever they came. The gods now, with the Gundhurwas and the great serpents, struck with astonishment, went all of them to Bruhma, and, bowing even to the foot of the great spirit, they, full of terror, with dejected countenance, addressed him thus: 'O Deva! O divine One! the whole earth, covered with mountains and woods, with rivers and continents, the sons of Sugura are now digging up. By these digging, O Bruhma! the mightiest beings are killed. This is the stealer of our consecrated victims; by this (fellow) our horse was taken away.' Thus saying, these sons of Sugura destroy all creatures. O most Powerful! having heard this, it becomes thee to interpose, before these horse-seekers destroy all thy creatures endued with life."

Thus far the thirty-second Section, describing the digging of earth.

SECTION THIRTY-THREE.

"Hearing the words of the gods, the divine Bruhma replied to these affrighted ones, stupefied with the Yuma-like power of these youths: The wise Vasoo-deva, the great Madhuva, who claims the earth for his spouse, that divine one, residing in the form of Kupila, supports the earth. By the fire of his wrath he will destroy the sons of the king. This piercing of the earth must, I suppose, be perceived by him, and he will (effect) the destruction of the long-sighted sons of Sugura. The thirty-three gods,* enemy subduing, having heard the words of Bruhma, returned home full of joy. The sons of Sugura highly renowned, thus digging the earth, a sound was produced resembling that of conflicting elements. Having encompassed and penetrated the whole earth, the sons of Sugura, returning to their father, said, The whole earth has been traversed by us; and all the powerful gods, the Danavas, the Ruckshuses, the Pishachas, the serpents, and hydras are† killed; but we have not seen thy horse, nor the thief. What shall we do? Success be to thee: be pleased to determine what more is proper. The virtuous king, having heard the words of his sons, O son of Rughoo! angrily replied, Again commence digging. Having penetrated the earth, and found the stealer of the horse, having accomplished your intention, return again. Attentive to the words of their father, the great Sugura, the sixty thousand descended to Patala, and there renewed their digging. There, O chief of men! they saw the elephant of that quarter of the globe, in size resembling a mountain, with distorted eyes, supporting with his head this earth, with its mountains and forests, covered with various countries, and adorned with numerous cities. When, for the sake of rest, O Kakootsha! the great elephant, through distress, refreshes himself by moving his head, an earthquake is produced.

"Having respectfully circumambulated this mighty elephant, guardian of the quarter, they, O Rama! praising him, penetrated into Patala. After they had thus penetrated the east quarter, they opened their way to the south. Here they saw that great elephant Muha-pudma, equal to a huge mountain, sustaining the earth with his head. Beholding him, they were filled with surprise; and, after the usual circumambulation, the sixty thousand sons of the great Sugura perforated the west quarter. In this these mighty ones saw the elephant Soumunusa, of equal size. Having respectfully saluted him, and inquired respecting his health, these valiant ones digging, arrived at the north. In this quarter, O chief of Rughoo! they saw the snow-white elephant Bhudra, supporting this earth with his beautiful body. Circumambulating him, they again penetrated the earth, and proceeding north-east to that renowned quarter; all the sons of Sugura, through anger, pierced the earth again. There all those magnanimous ones, terrible in swiftness, and of mighty prowess, saw Kupila, Vasodeva the eternal,‡ and near him the horse feeding. Filled, O son of Rughoo! with unparalleled joy, they all, knowing him to be the stealer of the horse, with eyes starting with rage, seizing their spades and their langulas, and even trees and stones, ran towards him full of wrath, calling out, Stop, stop! thou art the stealer of our sacrificial horse: Thou stupid one, know that we who have found thee are the sons of Rughoo. Kupila, filled with excessive anger, uttered from his nostrils a loud sound, and instantly, O Kakooshta! by Kupila of immeasurable power, were all the sons of Sugura turned to a heap of ashes.*

Thus far the thirty-third Section, describing the interview with Kupila.

SECTION THIRTY-FOUR.

"O son of Rughoo! Sugura, perceiving that his sons had been absent a long time, thus addressed his grandson, illustrious by his own might: Thou art a hero, possessed of science, in prowess equal to thy predecessors. Search out the fate of thy paternal relatives, and the person by whom the horse was stolen, that we may avenge ourselves on these subterraneous beings, powerful and great. Take thy cimeter and bow, O beloved one! and finding out thy deceased paternal relatives, destroy my adversary. The proposed end being thus accomplished, return. Bring me happily through this sacrifice.

"Thus particularly addressed by the great Sugura, Ungshooman, swift and powerful, taking his bow and cimeter, departed. Urged by the king, the chief of men traversed the subterraneous road dug by his great ancestors. There the mighty one saw the elephant of the quarter, adored by the gods, the Danuvas and Rukshuses, the Pishachas, the birds and the serpents. Having circumambulated him, and asked concerning his welfare, Ungshooman inquired for his paternal relatives, and the stealer of the sacred victim. The mighty elephant of the quarter hearing, replied, O son of Usumunja! thou wilt accomplish thine intention, and speedily return with the horse. Having heard this, he, with due respect, inquired, in regular succession, of all the elephants of the quarters. Honored by all these guardians of the eight sides of the earth, acquainted with speech, and eminent in eloquence, he was told, Thou wilt return with the horse. Upon this encouraging declaration, he swiftly went to the place where lay his paternal relatives, the sons of Sugura, reduced to a heap of ashes. (At this sight) the son of Usumunja, overwhelmed with sorrow on account of their death, cried out with excess of grief. In this state of grief, the chief of men beheld, grazing near, the sacrificial horse. The illustrious one, desirous of performing the funeral obsequies of these sons of the king, looked around for a receptacle of water, but in vain. Extending his eager view, he saw, O Rama! the sovereign of birds, the uncle of his paternal relatives, Soopurna, in size resembling a mountain. Vinuteya, of mighty prowess, addressed him thus: Grieve not, O chief of men! this slaughter is approved by the universe. These great ones were reduced to ashes by Kupila of unmeasurable might. It is not proper for thee, O wise one! to pour common water upon these ashes. Gunga, O chief of men! is the eldest daughter of Himuvut. With her sacred stream, O valiant one! perform the funeral ceremonies for thine ancestors. If the purifier of the world flow on them, reduced to a heap of ashes, these ashes being wetted by Gunga, the illuminator of the world, the sixty thousand sons of thy grandfather will be received into heaven. May success attend thee! Bring Gunga to the earth from the residence of the gods. If thou art able, O chief of men! possessor of the ample share, let the descent of Gunga be accomplished by thee. Take the horse, and go forth. It is thine, O hero! for to complete the great paternal sacrifice.

"Having heard these words of Soopurna, Ungshooman, the heroic, speedily seizing the horse, returned. Then, O son of Rughoo! being come to the king, who was still performing the initiatory ceremonies, he related to him the whole affair, and the advice of Soopurna.

"After hearing the terror-inspiring relation of Ungshooman, the king finished the sacrifice, in exact conformity to the tenor and spirit of the ordinance; having finished his sacrifice, the sovereign of the earth returned to his palace. The king, however, was unable to devise any way for the descent of Gunga from heaven: after a long time, unable to fix upon any method, he departed to heaven, having reigned thirty thousand years.

"Sugura having, O Rama! paid the debt of nature, the people chose Ungshooman, the pious, for their sovereign. Ungshooman, O son of Rughoo! was a very great monarch.

His son was called Dwileepa. Having placed him on the throne, he, O Raguva! retiring to the pleasant top of Mount Himuvut, performed the most severe austerities. This excellent sovereign of men, illustrious as the immortals, was exceedingly desirous of the descent of Gunga; but not obtaining his wish, the renowned monarch, rich in sacred austerities, departed to heaven, after having abode in the forest sacred to austerities thirty-two thousand years. Dwileepa, the highly energetic, being made acquainted with the slaughter of his paternal great uncles, was overwhelmed with grief; but was still unable to fix upon a way of deliverance. How shall I accomplish the descent of Gunga? How shall I perform the funeral ablutions of these relatives? How shall I deliver them? In such cogitations was his mind constantly engaged. While these ideas filled the mind of the king, thoroughly acquainted with sacred duties, there was born to him a most virtuous son, called Bhugee-rutha. The illustrious king Dwileepa performed many sacrifices, and governed the kingdom for thirty thousand years; but, O chief of men! no way of obtaining the deliverance of his ancestors appearing, he, by a disease, discharged the debt of nature. Having installed his own son Bhugee-rutha in the kingdom, the lord of men departed to the paradise of Indra, through the merits of his own virtuous deeds.

"The pious, the royal sage, Bhugee-rutha, O son of Rughoo! was childless. Desirous of offspring, yet childless, the great monarch intrusted the kingdom to the care of his counsellors; and, having his heart set on obtaining the descent of Gunga, engaged in a long course of sacred austerities upon the mountain Gokurna. With hands erected, he, O son of Rughoo! surrounded in the hot season with five fires,* according to the prescribed ordinance in the cold season lying in water; and in the rainy season exposed to the descending clouds, feeding on fallen leaves, with his mind restrained, and his sensual feelings subdued, this valiant and great king continued a thousand years in the practice of the most severe austerities. The magnanimous monarch of mighty arm having finished this period, the divine Bruhma, the lord of creatures, the supreme governor, was highly pleased; and with the gods, going near to the great Bhugee-rutha, employed in sacred austerities, said to him, I am propitious. O performer of sacred vows! ask a blessing. The mighty, the illustrious Bhugee-rutha, with hands respectfully joined, replied to the sire of all, O divine one! if thou art pleased with me, if the fruit of my austerities may be granted, let all the sons of Sugura obtain water for their funeral rites. The ashes of the great ones being wetted by the water of Gunga, let all my ancestors ascend to the eternal heaven.† Let a child, O divine one! be granted to us, that our family become not extinct. O God! let this great blessing be granted to the family of Ikshwakoo. The venerable sire of all replied to the king thus requesting in the sweetest and most pleasing accents: Bhugee-rutha, thou mighty charioteer, be this great wish of thine heart accomplished. Let prosperity attend thee, thou increaser of the family of Ikshwakoo! Engage Ilura, O king! to receive (in her descent) Gunga the eldest daughter of the mountain Himuvut. The earth, O king! cannot sustain the descent of Gunga, nor beside Shoolee‡ do I behold any one, O king! able to receive her. The creator having thus replied to the king, and spoken to Gunga, returned to heaven with Maeroots and all the gods."

Thus far the thirty-fourth Section, describing the gift of the blessing to Bughee-rutha.

SECTION THIRTY-FIVE.

"Pruja-puti being gone, Bhugee-rutha, O Rama! with uplifted arm, without support, without a helper, immovable as a dry tree, and feeding on air, remained day and night on the tip of his great toe upon the afflicted earth. A full year having now elapsed, the husband of Ooma, and the lord of animals, who is revered by all worlds, said to the king, I am propitious to thee, O chief of men! I will accomplish thy utmost desire. To him the sovereign replied, O Hura, receive Gunga! Bhurga,* thus addressed, replied, I will perform thy desire; I will receive her on my head, the daughter of the mountain. Muleshwra then, mounting on the summit of Himuvut, addressed Gunga, the river flowing in the ether, saying, Descend, O Gunga! The eldest daughter of Himuvut, adored by the universe, having heard the words of the lord of Ooma, was filled with anger, and assuming, O Rama! a form of amazing size, with insupportable celerity, fell from the air upon the auspicious head of Shiva. The goddess Gunga, irresistible, thought within herself, I will bear down Shunkura with my stream, and enter Patala. The divine Hura, the three-eyed God, was aware of her proud resolution, and, being angry, determined to prevent her design. The purifier, fallen upon the sacred head of Roodra, was detained, O Rama! in the recesses of the orb of his Juta, resembling Himuvut, and was unable, by the greatest efforts, to descend to the earth. From the borders of the orb of his Juta, the goddess could not obtain regress, but wandered there for many series of years. Thus situated, Bhugee-rutha beheld her wandering there, and again engaged in severe austerities.

"With these austerities, O son of Rughoo! Hura being greatly pleased, discharged Gunga towards the Lake Vindoo. In her flowing forth seven streams were produced. Three of these streams, † beautiful, filled with water conveying happiness, ‡ Hladinee, § Pavunee, ¶ and Nulinee, || directed their course eastward, while †† Soochukohoo, ‡‡ Seeta,  and Sind-hoo, ††† three pellucid mighty rivers, flowed to the west. The seventh of these streams followed king Bhugee-rutha. The royal sage, the illustrious Bhugee-rutha, seated on a resplendent car, led the way, while Gunga followed. Pouring down from the sky upon the head of Shunkura, and afterwards upon the earth, her streams rolled along with a shrill sound. The earth was willingly chosen by the fallen fishes, the turtles, the porpoises, and the birds. The royal sages, the Gundhurvas, the Yukshas, and the Siddhas, beheld her falling from the ether to the earth; yea, the gods, immeasurable in power, filled with surprise, came thither with chariots resembling a city, horses, and elephants, and litters, desirous of seeing the wonderful and unparalleled descent of Gunga into the world. Irradiated by the descending gods, and the splendor of their ornaments, the cloudless atmosphere shone with the splendor of a hundred suns, while, by the uneasy porpoises, the serpents, and the fishes, the air was convulsed as with lightning. Through the white foam of the waters, spreading in a thousand directions, and the flights of water-fowl, the atmosphere appeared filled with autumnal clouds. The water, pure from defilement, falling from the head of Shunkura, and thence to the earth, ran in some places with a rapid stream, in others in a tortuous current; here widely spreading, there descending into caverns, and again spouting upward; in some places it moved slowly, stream uniting with stream; while repelled in others, it rose upwards, and again fell to the earth. Knowing its purity, the sages, the Gundhurvas, and the inhabitants of the earth, touched the water fallen from the body of Bhuvaa. ††† Those who, through a curse, had fallen from heaven to earth, having performed ablution in this stream, became free from sin; cleansed from sin by this water, and restored to happiness, they entered the sky, and returned again to heaven. By this illustrious stream was the world rejoiced, and by performing ablution in Gunga, became free from impurity.

"The royal sage, Bhugee-rutha, full of energy, went before, seated on his resplendent car, while Gunga followed after. The gods, O Rama! with the sages, the Dityas, the Danuvas, the Rakshuses, the chief Gundhurvas, and Yukshas, with the Kinnuras, the chief serpents, and all the Upsuras, together, with aquatic animals, following the chariot of Bhugee-rutha, attended Gunga. Whither king Bhugee-rutha went, thither went the renowned Gunga, the chief of streams, the destroyer of all sin.

"After this, Gunga, in her course, inundated this sacrificial ground of the great Juhnoo of astonishing deeds, who was then offering sacrifice. Juhnoo, O Rughuva! perceiving her pride enraged, drank up the whole of the water of Gunga — a most astonishing deed! At this the gods, the Gundhurvas, and the sages, exceedingly surprised, adored the great Juhnoo, the most excellent of men, and named Gunga the daughter of this great sage.

"The illustrious chief of men, pleased, discharged Gunga from his ears. Having liberated her, he, recognizing the great Bhugee-rutha, the chief of kings, then present, duly honored him, and returned to the place of sacrifice. From this deed Gunga, the daughter of Juhnoo, obtained the name Jahnavee.

"Gunga now went forward again, following the chariot of Bhugee-rutha. Having reached the sea, the chief of streams proceeded to Patala, to accomplish the work of Bhugee-rutha. The wise and royal sage, having, with great labor, conducted Gunga thither, there beheld his ancestors reduced to ashes. Then, O chief of Rughoo's race, that heap of ashes, bathed by the excellent waters of Gunga, and purified from sin, the sons of the king obtained heaven. Having arrived at the sea, the king, followed by Gunga, entered the subterraneous regions, where lay the sacred ashes. After these, O Rama! had been laved by the water of Gunga, Bruhma, the lord of all, thus addressed the king: O chief of men! thy predecessors, the sixty thousand sons of the great Sugura, are all delivered by thee; and the great and perennial receptacle of water, called by Sugura's name, shall henceforth be universally known by the appellation of Sagura.* As long, O king! as the waters of the sea continue in the earth, so long shall the sons of Sugura remain in heaven, in all the splendor of gods.

"This Gunga, O king! shall be thy eldest daughter, known throughout the three worlds (by the name) Bhagee-ruthee; and because she passed through the earth, the chief of rivers shall be called Gunga † throughout the universe. (She shall also be) called Tripathaga, on account of her proceeding forward in three different directions, watering the three worlds. Thus is she named by the gods and sages. She is called Gunga, O sovereign of the Vashyas! on account of her flowing through Gang; ‡ and her third name, O thou observer of vows! is Bhagee-ruthee. O, accomplished one! through affection to thee, and regard to me, these names will remain; as long as Gunga, the great river, shall remain in the world, so long shall thy deathless fame live throughout the universe. O lord of men! O king! perform here the funeral rites of all thine ancestors. Relinquish thy vows, § O king! this devout wish of theirs was not obtained by thine ancestors highly renowned, chief among the pious; not by Ungshooman, unparalleled in the universe, so earnestly desiring the descent of Gunga, O beloved one! was this object of desire obtained. Nor, O possessor of prosperity! O sinless one! could she be (obtained) by thine illustrious father Dwiteepa, the Rajarshi eminently accomplished, whose energy was equal to that of a Muhurshi, and who, established in all the virtues of the Kshutras, in sacred austerities equalled myself. This great design has been fully accomplished by thee, O chief of men! Thy fame, the blessing so much desired, will spread throughout the world. O subduer of enemies! this descent of Gunga has been effected by thee. This Gunga is the great abode of virtue; by this deed thou art become possessed of the divinity itself. In this stream constantly bathe thyself, ¶ chief of men! Purified, O most excellent of mortals, be a partaker of the fruit of holiness; perform the funeral ceremonies of all thy ancestors. May blessings attend thee, O chief of men! I return to heaven.

"The renowned one, the sovereign of the gods, the sire of the universe, having thus spoken, returned to heaven.

"King Bhugee-rutha, the royal sage, having performed the funeral ceremonies of the descendants of Sugura, in proper order of succession, according to the ordinance; the renowned one having also, O chief of men! performed the customary ceremonies, and purified himself, returned to his own city, where he governed the kingdom. Having (again,) O Raghura! possessed of abundant wealth, obtained their king, his people rejoiced; their sorrow was completely removed; they increased in wealth and prosperity, and were freed from disease.

"Thus, O Rama! has the story of Ganga been related at large by me. May prosperity attend thee: may every good be thine. The evening is fast receding. He who causes this relation, securing wealth, fame, longevity, posterity, and heaven, to be heard among the Brahmans, the Kshatriyas, or the other tribes of men, his ancestors rejoice, and to him are the gods propitious: and he who hears this admirable story of the descent of Ganga, ensuring long life, shall obtain, O Kakoottha! all the wishes of his heart. All his sins shall be destroyed, and his life and fame be abundantly prolonged."

Parvati. — X. 2, p. 584.

All the Devatas, and other inhabitants of the celestial regions, being collected at the summons of Bhagavat, to arrange the ceremonials of the marriage of Seeva and Parvati, first came Brahma, mounted on his goose, with the Reyshees at his stirrup; next Veeshnu, riding on Garuda, his eagle, with the chank, the chakra, the club, and the pedive in his hands; Eendra also, and Yama, and Cuvera, and Varuna, and the rivers Ganga and Jumna, and the seven Seas. The Gandarvas also, and Apsaras, and Vasookee, and other serpents, in obedience to the commands of Seeva, all dressed in superb chains and habits of ceremony, were to be seen in order amidst the crowded and glittering cavalcade.

And now, Seeva, after the arrival of all the Devetas, and the completion of the preparations for the procession, set out, in the utmost pomp and splendor, from the mountain Kilas. His third eye flamed like the sun, and the crescent on his forehead assumed the form of a radiated diadem; his snakes were exchanged for chains and necklaces of pearls and rubies, his ashes for sandal and perfume, and his elephant's skin for a silken robe, so that none of the Devetas in brilliance came near his figure. The bridal attendants now spread wide abroad the carpet of congratulation, and arranged in order the banquet of bliss. Nature herself assumed the appearance of renovated youth, and the sorrowing universe recalled its long-forgotten happiness. The Gandarvas and Apsaras began their melodious songs, and the Genes and Keeners displayed the magic of their various musical instruments. The earth and its inhabitants exulted with tongues of glorification and triumph; fresh moisture invigorated the withered victims of time; a thousand happy and animating conceptions inspired the hearts of the intelligent, and enlightened the wisdom of the thoughtful: The kingdom of external forms obtained gladness; the world of intellect acquired brightness. The dwellers upon earth stocked the casket of their ideas with the jewels of delight, and reverend pilgrims exchanged their heads for pearls. The joy of those on earth ascended up to heaven, and the Tree of the bliss of those in Heaven extended its auspicious branches downwards to the earth. The eyes of the Devetas flamed like torches on beholding these scenes of rapture, and the hearts of the just kindled like touchwood on hearing these ravishing symphonies. Thus Seeva set off like a garden in full blow, and paradise was eclipsed by his motion. — MAURICE, from the Seeva-Pooraun.

Thereat the heart of the Universe stood still. — X. 2, p. 584.

Long after these lines were written, I was amused at finding a parallel passage in a sermon:

Quando o Sol parou ás vozes de Josué, aconteceram no mundo todas aquellas consequencias, que parando o movimento celesste, consideram os Filosofos. As plantas por todo aquelle tempo nam creceram; as calidades dos elementos, e dos mixtos, nam se alteraram; a geraçam e corrupçam com que se conserva o mundo, cessou; os artes e os exercicios de hum e outro Emisferio estiveram suspensos; os Antipodas nam trabalharam, porque, lhes faltava a luz, os de cima caçados de tan comprido dia deixavom o trabalho; estes pasmados de verem o Sol que se nam movia;

aquelles tambem pasmados de esperarem pelo Sol, que nam chegava, cuidavam que se acabara para elles a luz; imaginavam que se acabara o mundo: tudo era lagrimas, tudo assombros, tudo horrores, tudo confusoes. — VIEIRA, Sermoes, tom. ix. p. 505.

Surya. — X. 16, p. 586.

Surya, the Sun. The poets and painters describe his car as drawn by seven green horses, preceded by Arun, or the Dawn who acts as his charioteer, and followed by thousands of genii, worshipping him, and modulating his praises. Surya is believed to have descended frequently from his car in a human shape, and to have left a race on earth, who are equally renowned in the Indian stories with the Heliadae of Greece. It is very singular that his two sons, called Asvinau or Asvini-cumarau, in the Dual, should be considered as twin brothers, and painted like Castor and Pollux; but they have each the character of Æsculapius among the gods, and are believed to have been born of a nymph, who, in the form of a mare, was impregnated with sunbeams. — Sir W. JONES.

That sun, O daughter of Ganga! thou which nothing is higher, to which nothing is equal, enlightens the summit of the sky — with the sky enlightens the earth — with the earth enlightens the lower worlds; enlightens the higher worlds, enlightens other worlds; — it enlightens the breast, — enlightens all besides the breast. — Sir W. JONES, from the Veda.

Forgetful of his Dragon foe. — X. 16, p. 586.

Ra'hu was the son of Cas'yapa and Dity, according to some authorities; but others represent Sinhica' (perhaps the sphinx) as his natural mother. He had four arms; his lower parts ended in a tail like that of a dragon; and his aspect was grim and gloomy, like the dorkaess of the chaos, whence he had also the name of Tamos. He was the adviser of all mischief among the Daityas, who had a regard for him; but among the Devetas it was his chief delight to sow dissension; and when the gods had produced the amrit, by churning the ocean, he disguised himself like one of them, and received a portion of it; but the Sun and Moon having discovered his fraud, Vishnu severed his head and two of his arms from the rest of his monstrous body. That part of the nectareous fluid which he had time to swallow secured his immortality: his trunk and dragon-like tail fell on the mountain of Malaya, where Mini, a Brahman, carefully preserved them by the name of Ce'tu; and, as if a complete body had been formed from them, like a dismembered polyp, he is even said to have adopted Ce'tu as his own child. The head, with two arms, fell on the sands of Barbara, where Pi't'he'na's was then walking with Sinhica', by some called his wife: They carried the Daitya to their palace, and adopted him as their son; whence he acquired the name of Paite he'nasi. This extravagant fable is, no doubt, astronomical; Ra'hu and Ce'tu being clearly the nodes, or what astrologers call the head and tail of the dragon. It is added, that they appeased Vishnu, and obtained re-admission to the firmament, but were no longer visible from the earth, their enlightened sides being turned from it; that Ra'hu strives, during eclipses, to wreak vengeance on the Sun and Moon, who detected him; and that Ce'tu often appears as a comet, a whirlwind, a fiery meteor, a water-spout, or a column of sand. — WILFORD. Asiatic Researches.

Saras. — X. 18, p. 586.

The word Sara, in Sanscrit, signifies both wine and true wealth; hence, in the first Chand of the Ramayan of VALMIE, it is expressly said that the Devetas, having received the Sara, acquired the title of Saras, and the Daityas that of Asura, from not having received it. The Veda is represented as that wine and true wealth. — PATERSON. Asiat. Researches.

Camdeo. — X. 19, p. 586.

Eternal CAMA! or doth SMARA bright,
Or proud ANANGA, give the more delight?

Sir W. JONES.

He was the son of MAYA, or the general attracting power, and married to RETIV, or Affection, and his bosom friend is BESSENT, or Spring. He is represented as a beautiful youth, sometimes conversing with his mother and consort in the midst of his gardens and temples; sometimes riding by moonlight on a parrot or lory, and attended by dancing girls or nymphs, the foremost of whom bears his colors, which are a fish on a red ground. His favorite place of resort is a large tract of country round Agra, and principally the plains of Matra, where KRISHNEN also, and the nine GORJA, who are clearly the Apollo and Muses of the Greeks, usually spend the night with music and dance. His bow of sugar-cane or flowers, with a string of bees, and his fee arrows, each pointed with an Indian blossom of a heating quality, are allegories equally new and beautiful.

It is possible that the words Dipuc and Cupid, which have the same signification, may have the same origin; since we know that the old Etrurians, from whom great part of the Roman language and religion was derived, and whose system had a near affinity with that of the Persians and Indians, used to write their lines alternately forwards and backwards, as furrows are made by the plough. — SIR W. JONES.

Mahadeva and Parvati were playing with dice at the ancient game of Chaturanga, when they disputed, and parted in wrath; the goddess retiring to the forest of Gauri, and the god repairing to Cushtadwip. They severally performed rigid acts of devotion to the Supreme Being; but the fires which they kindled blazed so vehemently as to threaten a general conflagration. The Devas, in great alarm, hastened to Brahma, who led them to Mahadeva, and supplicated him to recall his consort; but the wrathful deity only answered, That she must come by her own free choice. They accordingly despatched Ganga, the river goddess, who prevailed on Parvati to return to him, on condition that his love for her should be restored. The celestial mediators then employed Cama-Deva, who wounded Mahadeva with one of his flowery arrows; but the angry divinity reduced him to ashes with a flame from his eye. Parvati soon after presented herself before him in the form of a Cirati, or daughter of a mountaineer, and seeing him enamored of her, resumed her own shape. In the place where they were reconciled, a grove sprang up, which was named Camavana; and the relenting god, in the character of Cameswara, consoled the afflicted Reti, the widow of Cama, by assuring her that she should rejoin her husband when he should be born again in the form of Pradyumna, son of Crishna, and should put Sambara to death. This favorable prediction was in due time accomplished, and Pradyumna having sprung to life, he was instantly seized by the demon Sambara, who placed him in a chest, which he threw into the ocean; but a large fish, which had swallowed the chest, was caught in a net, and carried to the palace of a tyrant, where the unfortunate Reti had been compelled to do menial service. It was her lot to open the fish, and seeing an infant in the chest, she nursed him in private, and educated him, till he had sufficient strength to destroy the malignant Sambara. He had before considered Reti as his mother; but the minds of them both being irradiated, the prophecy of Mahadeva was remembered, and the God of Love was again united with the Goddess of Pleasure. — WILFORD. Asiatic Researches.

Eating his very core of life away. — XI. 5, p. 588.

One of the wonders of this country is the Jiggerkhar, (or liver-eater.) One of this class can steal away the liver of another by looks and incantations. Other accounts say, that, by looking at a person, he deprives him of his senses, and then steals from him something resembling the seed of a pomegranate, which he hides in the calf of his leg. The Jiggerkhar throws on the fire the grain before described, which thereupon spreads to the size of a dish, and he distributes it amongst his fellows, to be eaten; which ceremony concludes the life of the fascinated person. A Jiggerkhar is able to communicate his art to another, which he does by learning him the incantations and by making him eat a bit of the liver-cake. If any one cut open the calf of the magician's leg, extract the grain, and give it to the afflicted person to eat, he immediately recovers. Those Jiggerkhars are mostly women. It is said, moreover, that they can bring intelligence from a great distance in a short space of time; and if they are thrown into a river, with a stone tied to them, they nevertheless will not sink. In order to deprive any one of this wicked power, they brand his temples, and every joint in his body, cram his eyes with salt, suspend him for forty days in a subterraneous cavern, and repeat over him certain incantations. In this state he is called Detche-reh. Although, after having undergone this discipline, he is not able to destroy the liver of any one, yet he retains the power of being able to discover another Jiggerkhar, and is used for detecting those disturbers of mankind. They can also cure many diseases, by administering a potion, or by repeating an incantation. Many other marvellous stories are told of these people. — AYEEN ACEERY.

An Arabian old woman, by name Meluk, was thrown in prison, on a charge of having bewitched, or, as they call it, eaten the heart of a young native of Ormuz, who had lately, from being a Christian, turned Mahommedan. The cause of offence was, that the young man, after keeping company some time with one of her daughters, had forsaken her: he himself, who was in a pitiable condition, and in danger of his life, was one of her accusers. This sort of witchcraft, which the Indians call eating the heart, and which is what we call bewitching as sorcerers do by their venomous and deadly looks, is not a new thing, nor unheard of elsewhere; for many persons practised it formerly in Selavonia, and the country of the Triballes, as we learn from Ortelius, who took the account from Pliny, who, upon the report of Isigones, testifies, that this species of enchantment was much in use among these people, and many others whom he mentions, as it is at present here, especially among the Arabians who inhabit the western coast of the Persian gulf, where this art is common. The way in which they do it is only by the eyes and the mouth, keeping the eyes fixed steadily upon the person whose heart they design to eat, and pronouncing, between their teeth, I know not what diabolical words, by virtue of which, and by the operation of the devil, the person, how hale and strong soever, falls immediately into an unknown and incurable disease, which makes him appear phthisical, consumes him little by little, and at last destroys him. And this takes place faster or slower as the heart is eaten, as they say; for these sorcerers can either eat the whole or a part only; that is, can consume it entirely and at once, or bit by bit, as they please. The vulgar give it this name, because they believe that the devil, acting upon the imagination of the witch when she mutters her wicked words, represents invisibly to her the heart and entrails of the patient, taken out of his body, and makes her devour them. In which these wretches find so delightful a task, that very often, to satisfy their appetite, without any impulse of resentment or enmity, they will destroy innocent persons, and even their nearest relatives, as there is a report that our prisoner killed one of her own daughters in this manner.

This was confirmed to me by a similar story, which I heard at Ispahan, from the mouth of P. Sebastian de Jesus, a Portuguese Augustinian, a man to be believed, and of singular virtue, who was prior of their convent when I departed. He assured me, that, in one of the places dependent upon Portugal, on the confines of Arabia Felix, I know not whether it was at Mascate or at Ormuz, an Arab having been taken up for a similar crime, and convicted of it, for he confessed the fact, the captain, or governor of the place, who was a Portuguese, that he might better understand the truth of these black and devilish actions, of which there is no doubt in this country, made the sorcerer be brought before him before he was led to his punishment, and asked him, if he could eat the inside of a cucumber without opening it, as well as the heart of a man? The sorcerer said yes; and, in order to prove it, a cucumber was brought: he looked at it, never touching it, steadily for some time, with his usual enchantments, and then told the captain he had eaten the whole inside; and accordingly when it was opened, nothing was found but the rind. This is not impossible; for the devil, of whom they make use in these operations, having, in the order of nature, greater power than all inferior creatures, can, with God's permission, produce these effects, and others more marvellous.

The same father told me, that one of these sorcerers, whether it was the same or not I do not know, having been taken for a similar offence, was asked if he could eat the heart of the Portuguese captain? and he replied no; for the Franks had a certain thing upon the breast, which covered them like a cuirass, and was so impenetrable, that it was proof against all his charms. This can be nothing else but the virtue of baptism, the armor of the faith, and the privileges of the sons of the church, against which the gates of hell cannot prevail.

To return, however, to my first subject: — This witch of Combru made some difficulty at first to confess her guilt; but seeing herself pressed with threats of death, and being led, in fact, to the public square, where I saw her with the sick young man, she said, that though she had not been the cause of his complaint, perhaps she could cure it, if they would let her remain alone with him, in his house, without interruption; by which she tacitly confessed her witchcraft: for it is held certain in these countries, that these wicked women can remove the malady which they have caused, if it be not come to the last extremity. And of many remedies which they use to restore health to the sufferers, there is one very extraordinary, which is, that the witch casts something out of her mouth, like the grain of a pomegranate, which is believed to be a part of the heart she had eaten. The patient picks it up immediately, as part of his own intestines, and greedily swallows it; and by this means, as if his heart was replaced in his body, he recovers by degrees his health. I dare not assure you of these things as certainly true, not having myself seen them, surpassing as they do the course of nature. If they are as is said, it can be only in appearance, by the illusions of the devil; and if the afflicted recover actually their health, it is because the same devil ceases to torment them. Without dwelling longer upon these curious speculations, — the witch having given hopes that she would cure the patient, the officers promised that she should receive no injury, and they were both sent home; but an archer was set over her as a guard, that she might not escape. — PIETRO DELLA VALLE.

The Calis. — XI. 6, p. 588.

The Calis and Pandaris are the protectresses of cities; each city has its own. They address prayers to these tutelary divinities, and build temples to them, offering to them blood in sacrifice, and sometimes human victims. These objects of worship are not immortal, and they take their name from the city over which they preside, or from the form in which they are represented. They are commonly framed of a gigantic stature, having several arms, and the head surrounded with flames; several fierce animals are also placed under their feet. — SONNERAT.

*Sani, the dreadful God, who rides abroad
Upon the King of the Ravens.* — XI. 6, p. 588.

Major Moor has a curious remark upon this subject: —

“Sani being among the astrologers of India, as well as with their sapient brethren of Europe, a planet of malignant aspects, the ill-omened raven may be deemed a fit Vahan for such a dreaded being. But this is not, I think, a sufficient reason for the conspicuous introduction of the raven into the mythological machinery of the Hindu system, so accurate, so connected, and so complete in all its parts; although the investigations that it hath hitherto undergone have not fully developed or reached such points of perfection. Now let me ask the reason, why, both in England and in India, the raven is so rare a bird? It breeds every year, like the crow, and is much longer lived; and while the latter bird abounds every where, to a degree bordering on nuisance, a pair of ravens, for they are seldom seen singly or in trios, are scarcely found duplicated in any place. Perhaps, take England or India over, two pair of ravens will not be found, on an average, in the extent of five hundred or a thousand acres. I know not, for I write where I have no access to books, if our naturalists have sought the theory of this; or whether it may have first occurred to me, which it did while contemplating the character and attributes of Sani, that the raven destroys its young; and if this notion be well founded, and on no other can I account for the rareness of the annual-breeding, long-lived raven, we shall at once see the propriety of symbolizing it with Saturn, or Kronos, or Time, devouring or destroying his own offspring.” — Moon’s Hindu Pantheon, p. 311.

“It is remarked by Naturalists, that young ravens are forsaken before they are fledged; and therefore they would starve, if Providence had not appointed that the scraps of raw meat dropped round the nest should engender maggots and worms which serve to support them till they are in a condition to rove for food. And thus it is he feedeth the ravens.”
From an old Magazine.

*A thousand eyes were quenched in endless night
To form that magic globe.* — XI. 8, p. 588.

A similar invention occurs in Dr. Beaumont’s Psyche, one of the most extraordinary poems in our language. I am far from claiming any merit for such inventions, which no man can value more cheaply, — but such as it is, I am not beholden for it to this forgotten writer, whose strange, long, but by no means uninteresting work I had never read till after two editions of Kehama were printed: —

A stately mirror’s all-enamell’d case
The second was; no crystal ever yet
Smiled with such pureness: never ladies’ glass
Its owner flattered with so smooth a cheat.
Nor could Narcissus’ fount with such delight
Into his fair destruction him invite.

For He in that and self-love being drown’d,
Agenor from him pluck’d his dotting eyes,
And, shuffled in her fragments, having found
Old Jezabel, he stole the dog’s due prize.
Goliath’s staring bacins too he got,
Which he with Pharaoh’s all together put.

But not content with these, from Phaeton,
From Joab, Icarus, Nebuchadnezzar,
From Philip and his world-devouring son,
From Sylla, Catiline, Tully, Pompey, Caesar,
From Herod, Cleopatra, and Sejanus,
From Agrippina and Domitianus,

And many surly stoics, theirs he pull’d;
Whose proudest humors having drained out,
He blended in a fudge and polish’d mould;
Which up he fill’d with what from heaven he brought,
In extract of those looks of Lucifer,
In which against his God he breathed war.

Then to the North, that glassy kingdom, where Establish’d frost and ice forever reign,
He sped his course, and meeting Boreas there,
Pray’d him this liquid mixture to restrain.
When lo! as Boreas oped his mouth and blew
For his command, the slime all solid grew.

Thus was the mirror forged, and contain’d
The vigor of those self-admiring eyes
Agenor’s witchcraft into it had strain’d;
A dangerous juncture of proud fallacies;
Whose fair looks so enamored him, that he,
Thrice having kiss’d it, named it Philanty.

Inchanted Psyche ravish’d was to see
The Glass herself upon herself reflect
With trebled majesty. The sun, when he
Is by Aurora’s rosent fingers deck’d,
Views not his reprocessed self so fair
Upon the eastern main, as she did here.

Be true unto yourselves. — XII. 3, p. 590.

The passage in which Menu exhorts a witness to speak the truth is one of the few sublime ones in his Institutes. “The soul itself is its own witness; the soul itself is its own refuge; offend not thy conscious soul, the supreme internal witness of men! — The sinful have said in their hearts, None see us. Yes, the gods distinctly see them, and so does the spirit within their breasts. — The guardian deities of the firmament, of the earth, of the waters, of the human heart, of the moon, of the sun, and of fire, of punishment after death, of the winds, of night, of both twilights, and of justice, perfectly know the state of all spirits clothed with bodies — O friend to virtue! that supreme Spirit, which thou believest one and the same with thyself, resides in thy bosom perpetually, and is an all-knowing inspector of thy goodness or of thy wickedness. If thou beest not at variance, by speaking falsely, with Yama, the subduer of all, with Vaivaswata the punisher, with that great Divinity who dwells in thy breast, — go not on a pilgrimage to the river Ganga, nor to the plains of Curu, for thou hast no need of expiation. — Ch. viii. pp. 84, 85, 86, 91, 92.

The Aunnay Birds. — XII. 6, p. 590.

The Aunnays act a considerable part in the history of the Nella Rajah, an amusing romance, for a translation of which we are indebted to Mr. Kindersley. They are milk-white, and remarkable for the gracefulness of their walk.

The Bannian Tree. — XIII. 5, p. 591.

The Burghut, or Bannian, often measures from twenty-four to thirty feet in girth. It is distinguished from every other tree hitherto known, by the very peculiar circumstance of throwing out roots from all its branches. These, being pendent, and perfectly lax, in time reach the ground, which they penetrate, and ultimately become substantial props to the very massy horizontal boughs, which, but for such a support, must either be stopped in their growth, or give way, from their own weight. Many of these quondam roots, changing their outward appearance from a brown, rough rind to a regular bark, not unlike that of the beech, increase to a great diameter. They may be often seen from four to five feet in circumference, and in a true perpendicular line. An observer, ignorant of their nature, might think them artificial, and that they had been placed for the purpose of sustaining the boughs from which they originated. They proceed from all the branches indiscriminately, whether near or far removed from the ground. They appear like new swabs, such as are in use on board ships: however, few reach sufficiently low to take a hold of the soil, except those of the lower branches. I have seen some do so from a great height, but they were thin, and did not promise well. Many of the ramifications pendent from the higher boughs are seen to turn round the lower branches, but without any obvious effect on either; possibly, however, they may derive sustenance even from that partial mode of communication. The height of a full-grown Bannian may be from sixty to eighty feet; and many of them, I am fully confident, cover at least two acres. Their leaves are similar to, but rather larger than those of the laurel. The wood of the trunk is used only for fuel; it is light and brittle; but the pillars formed by the roots are valuable, being extremely elastic and light, working with ease, and possessing great toughness: it resembles a good kind of ash. — Oriental Field Sports, vol. ii. p. 113.

..... the Well

*Which they, with sacrifice of rural pride,
Have wedded to the cocoa-grove beside.* — XIII. 6, p. 592.

It is a general practice, that, when a plantation is made, a well should be dug at one of its sides. The well and the top are married; a ceremony at which all the village attends, and in which often much money is expended. The well is considered as the husband, as its waters, which are copiously furnished to the young trees during the first hot season, are supposed to cherish and impregnate them. Though vanity and superstition are evidently the basis of these institutions, yet we cannot help admiring their effects, so beautifully ornamenting a torrid country, and affording such general convenience. — Oriental Sports, p. 10.

Tanks. — XIII. 6, p. 592.

Some of these tanks are of very great extent, often covering eight or ten acres; and, besides having steps of masonry, perhaps fifty or sixty feet in breadth, are faced with brick-work, plastered in the most substantial manner. The corners are generally ornamented with round or polygon pavilions of a neat appearance. — Oriental Sports, vol. ii. p. 116.

There are two kinds of tanks, which we confound under one common name, though nothing can be more different. The first is the Fray, which is formed by throwing a mound or bank across a valley or hollow ground, so that the rain water collects in the upper part of the valley, and is let out on the lower part by sluices, for the purposes of cultivation. The other kind is the Culam, which is formed by digging out the earth, and is destined for supplying the inhabitants with water for domestic purposes. The Culams are very frequently lined on all the four sides with cut stone, and are the most elegant works of the natives. — BUCHANAN.

Where there are no springs or rivers to furnish them with water, as it is in the northern parts, where there are but two or three springs, they supply this defect by saving of rain water; which they do by casting up great banks in convenient places, to stop and contain the rains that fall, and so save it till they have occasion to let it out into the fields. They are made rounding like a (), or half moon. Every town has one of these ponds, which if they can but get filled with water, they count their corn is as good as in the barn. It was no small work to the ancient inhabitants to make all these banks, of which there is a great number, being some two, some three, fathoms in height, and in length some above a mile, some less, not all of a size. They are now grown over with great trees, and so seem natural hills. When they would use the water, they cut a gap in one end of the bank, and so draw the water by little and little, as they have occasion, for the watering their corn.

These ponds, in dry weather, dry up quite. If they should dig these ponds deep, it would not be so convenient for them. It would, indeed, contain the water well, but would not so well, nor in such plenty, empty out itself into their grounds. In these ponds are alligators, which, when the water is dried up, depart into the woods and down to the rivers, and, in the time of rains, come up again into the ponds. They are but small, nor do use to catch people, nevertheless they stand in some fear of them.

The corn they sow in these parts is of that sort that is soonest ripe, fearing lest their waters should fail. As the water dries out of these ponds, they make use of them for fields, treading the mud with buffaloes, and then sowing rice thereon, and frequently casting up water with scoops on it. — KNOX, p. 9.

The Lotus. — XIII. 6, p. 592.

The lotus abounds in the numerous lakes and ponds of the province of Garah; and we had the pleasure of comparing several varieties; single and full, white, and tinged with deep or with faint tints of red. To a near view, the simple elegance of the white lotus gains no accession of beauty from the multiplication of its petals, nor from the tinge of gandy hue; but the richest tint is most pleasing, when a lake, covered with full-blown lotus, is contemplated. — Journey from Mirzaput to Nagpur. — Asiatic Annual Register, 1806.

They built them here a Bower, &c. — XIII. 7, p. 592

The materials of which these houses are made are always easy to be procured, and the structure is so simple, that a spacious, and by no means uncomfortable dwelling, suited to the climate, may be erected in one day. Our habitation, consisting of three small rooms, and a hall open to the north, in little more than four hours was in readiness for our reception; fifty or sixty laborers completed it in that time, and on emergency could perform the work in much less. Bamboos, grass for thatching, and the ground ratan, are all the materials requisite: not a nail is used in the whole edifice. A row of strong bamboos, from eight to ten feet high, are fixed firm in the ground, which describe the outline, and are the supporters of the building: smaller bamboos are then tied horizontally, by strips of the ground ratan, to these upright posts; the walls, composed of bamboo mats, are fastened to the sides with similar ligatures: bamboo rafters are quickly raised, and a roof formed, over which thatch is spread in regular layers, and bound to the roof by filaments of ratan. A floor of bamboo grating is next laid in the inside, elevated two or three feet above the ground: this grating is supported on bamboos, and covered with mats and carpets. Thus ends the process, which is not more simple than effectual. When the workmen take pains, a house of this sort is proof against very inclement weather. We experienced, during our stay at Meeday, a severe storm of wind and rain, but no water penetrated, nor thatch escaped: and if the tempest should blow down the house, the inhabitants would run no risk of having their brains knocked out, or their bones broken; the fall of the whole fabric would not crush a lady's lap-dog. — SYMES'S Embassy to Ava.

Jungle-grass. — XIII. 7, p. 592.

In this district the long grass called jungle is more prevalent than I ever yet noticed. It rises to the height of seven or eight feet, and is topped with a beautiful white down, resembling a swan's feather. It is the mantle with which nature here covers all the uncultivated ground, and at once veils the indolence of the people and the nakedness of their land. It has a fine showy appearance, as it undulates in the wind, like the waves of the sea. Nothing but the want of greater variety to its color prevents it from being one of the finest and most beautiful objects in that rich store of productions with which nature spontaneously supplies the improvident natives. — TENNANT.

*In such libations, poured in open glades,
Beside clear streams and solitary shades,
The Spirits of the virtuous dead delight*. — XIII. 7, p. 592.

The Hindoos are enjoined by the Veds to offer a cake, which is called Peenda, to the ghosts of their ancestors, as far back as the third generation. This ceremony is performed on the day of the new moon in every month. The offering of water is in like manner commanded to be performed daily; and this ceremony is called Turpan, to satisfy, to appease. The souls of such men as have left children to continue their generation, are supposed to be transported, immediately upon quitting their bodies, into a certain region called the Petree Log, where they may continue in proportion to their former virtues, provided these ceremonies be not neglected; otherwise they are precipitated into Nark, and doomed to be born again in the bodies of unclean beasts; and until, by repeated regenerations, all their sins are done away, and they attain such a degree of perfection as will entitle them to what is called Mooktee, eternal salvation, by which is understood a release from future transmigration, and an absorption in the nature of the godhead, who is called Brahm. — WILKINS. Note to the Bhagvat Gecta.

The divine manes are always pleased with an oblation in empty glades, naturally clean, on the banks of rivers, and in solitary spots. — Inst. of Menu.

Voomdavee. — XIII. 8, p. 592.

This wife of Vecshnoo is the Goddess of the Earth and of Patience. No direct adoration is paid her; but she is held to be a silent and attentive spectator of all that passes in the world. — KINDERSLEY.

Tassel-grass. — XIII. 11, p. 592.

The Surput, or tassel-grass, which is much the same as the guinea-grass, grows to the height of twelve or fourteen feet. Its stem becomes so thick as to resemble in some measure a reed. It is very strong, and grows very luxuriantly: it is even used as a fence against cattle; for which purpose, it is often planted on banks excavated from ditches, to enclose fields of corn, &c. It grows wild in all the uncultivated parts of India, but especially in the lower provinces, in which it occupies immense tracts; sometimes mixing with, and rising above, coppices; affording an asylum for elephants, rhinoceroses, tigers, &c. It frequently is laid by high winds, of which breeding sows fail not to take advantage, by forming their nests, and concealing their young under the prostrate grass. — Oriental Sports, vol. i. p. 32.

*Lo! from his trunk, upturn'd, aloft he flings
The grateful shower; and now,
Plucking the broad-leaved bough
Of yonder plane, he moves it to and fro*. — XIII. 11, p. 592.

Nature has provided the elephant with means to cool its heated surface, by enabling it to draw from its throat, by the aid of its trunk, a copious supply of saliva, which the animal spurts with force very frequently all over its skin. It also sucks up dust, and blows it over its back and sides, to keep off the flies, and may often be seen fanning itself with a large bough, which it uses with great ease and dexterity. — Oriental Sports, vol. i. p. 100.

*Till his strong temples, bathed with sudden dew,
Their fragrance of delight and love diffuse*. — XIII. 11, p. 592.

The Hindoo poets frequently allude to the fragrant juice which oozes, at certain seasons, from small ducts in the temples of the male elephant, and is useful in relieving him from the redundant moisture, with which he is then oppressed; and they even describe the bees as allured by the scent, and mistaking it for that of the sweetest flowers. When Krishna visited Sanc'ha-dwip, and had destroyed the demon who infested that delightful country, he passed along the bank of a river, and was charmed with a delicious odor, which its waters diffused in their course. He was eager to view the source of so fragrant a stream, but was informed by the natives that it flowed from the temples of an elephant, immensely large, milk-white, and beautifully formed; that he governed a numerous race of elephants; and that the odoriferous fluid which exuded from his temples in the season of love had formed the river; that the Devas, or inferior gods, and the Apsaras, or nymphs, bathed and sported in its waters, impassioned and intoxicated with the liquid perfume. — WILFORD. Asiatic Researches.

*The antic Monkeys, whose wild gambols late
Shook the whole wood*. — XIII. 12, p. 593.

They are so numerous on the island of Bulama, says Captain Beaver in his excellent book, that I have seen on a calm evening, when there was not an air sufficiently strong to agitate a leaf, the whole surrounding wood in as much motion, from their playful gambols among its branches, as if it had blown a strong wind.

*Not that in emulous skill that sweetest bird
Her rival strain would try*. — XIII. 12, p. 593.

I have been assured by a credible eye-witness, that two wild antelopes used often to come from their woods to the place where a more savage beast, Sirajuddaulah, entertained himself with concerts, and that they listened to the strains with an appearance of pleasure till the monster, in whose soul there was no music, shot one of them, to display his archery. A learned native of this country told me that he had frequently seen the most venomous and malignant snakes leave their holes, upon hearing tunes on a flute, which, as he supposed, gave them peculiar delight. An intelligent Persian, who repeated his story again and again, and permitted me to write it down from his lips, declared, he had more than once been present when a celebrated lutanist, Mirza Mohammed, surnamed Balbul, was playing to a large company, in a grove near Shiraz, where he distinctly saw the nightingales trying to vie with the musician; sometimes warbling on the trees, sometimes fluttering from branch to branch, as if they wished to approach the instrument whence the melody proceeded, and at length dropping on the ground, in a kind of ecstasy, from which they were soon raised, he assured me, by a change of the mode. I hardly know, says Sir William Jones, how to disbelieve the testimony of men who had no system of their own to support, and could have no interest in deceiving me. — Asiatic Researches.

No idle ornaments deface

Her natural grace. — XIII. 13, p. 593.

The Hindoo Wife, in Sir William Jones's poem, describes her own toilet tasks: —

Nor were my night thoughts, I confess,
Free from solicitude for dress;
How best to bind my flowing hair
With art, yet with an artless air, —
My hair, like musk in scent and hue,
Oh! blacker far, and sweeter too!
In what nice braid, or glossy curl,
To fix a diamond or a pearl,
And where to smooth the love-spread talls
With nard or jasmijn's fragrant oils;
How to adjust the golden Treica,*
And most adorn my forehead sleek;
What Condals † should emblaze my ears,
Like Seita's ‡ waves, or Seita's § tears;
How elegantly to dispose
Bright circlets for my well-formed nose;
With strings of rubies how to deck,
Or emerald rows, my stately neck;
While some that ebon tower embraced,
Some pendent sought my slender waist;
How next my purpled veil to choose
From silken stores of varied hues,
Which would attract the roving view,
Pink, violet, purple, orange, blue;
The loveliest mantle to select,
Or unembellish'd or bedeck'd;
And how my twisted scarf to place
With most inimitable grace,
(Too thin its warp, too fine its woof,
For eyes of males not beauty-proof;)
What skirts the mantle best would suit,
Ornate, with stars, or tissued fruit,
The flower-embroider'd or the plain,
With silver or with golden vein;
The Chury || bright, which gayly shows
Fair objects aptly to compose;
How each smooth arm, and each soft wrist,
By richest Cosces ¶ might be kiss'd,
While some my taper ankles round,
With sunny radiance tinged the ground

See how he kisses the lip of my rival, and imprints on her forehead an ornament of pure musk, black as the young antelope on the lunar orb! Now, like the husband of Reti, he fixes white blossoms on her dark locks, where they gleam like flashes of lightning among the curled clouds. On her breasts, like two firmaments, he places a string of gems like a radiant constellation; he binds on her arms, graceful as the stalks of the water-lily, and adorned with hands glowing like the petals of its flower, a bracelet of sapphires, which resemble a cluster of bees. Ah! see how he ties round her waist a rich girdle illumined with golden bells, which seem to laugh as they tinkle, at the inferior brightness of the leafy garlands which lovers hang on their bowers, to propitiate the god of desire. He places her soft foot, as he reclines by her side, on his ardent bosom, and stains it with the ruddy hue of Yavaca. — Songs of Jayadeva.

* Properly Teica, an ornament of gold placed above the nose.

Sandal-streak. — XIII. 13, p. 593.

The Hindoos, especially after bathing, paint their faces with ochre and sandal-wood ground very fine into a pulp

The custom is principally confined to the male sex, though the women occasionally wear a round spot, either of sandal, which is of a light dun color, or of singuliff; that is, a preparation of vermilion, between the eyebrows, and a stripe of the same running up the front of the head, in the furrow made according to the general practice of dividing all the frontal hair equally to the right and left, where it is rendered smooth, and glazed by a thick morilage, made by steeping linseed for a while in water. When dry, the hair is all firmly matted together, and will retain its form for many days together. — Oriental Sports, vol. i. p. 271.

Nor arm nor ankle-ring — XIII. 13, p. 593

Glass rings are universally worn by the women of the Decan, as an ornament on the wrists; and their applying closely to the arm is considered as a mark of delicacy and beauty, for they must of course be passed over the hand. In doing this, a girl seldom escapes without drawing blood, and rubbing part of the skin from her hand; and as every well-dressed girl has a number of rings on each arm, and as these are frequently breaking, the poor creatures suffer much from their love of admiration. — BUCHANAN.

The dear retreat. — XIII. 13, p. 593.

There is a beautiful passage in Statius, which may be quoted here: it is in that poet's best manner: —

*Qualis vicino volueris jam sedula pertu,
Janque timens quâ fronde domum suspendat inanem,
Providet hinc ventos, hinc anxia cogitat angues,
Hinc homines; tandem dubia placet umbra, novisque
Vix stetit in ramis, et protinus arbor amat.*

Achil. ii. 212.

Jaga-Naut. — XIV. p. 593.

This temple is to the Hindoos what Mecca is to the Mahomedans. It is resorted to by pilgrims from every quarter of India. It is the chief seat of Brahminical power, and a strong-hold of their superstition. At the annual festival of the Butt Jatra, seven hundred thousand persons (as has been computed by the Pundits in College) assemble at this place. The number of deaths in a single year, caused by voluntary devotement, by imprisonment for non-payment of the demands of the Brahmins, or by the scarcity of provisions for such a multitude, is incredible. The precincts of the place are covered with bones. — CLAUDIUS BUCHANAN.

Many thousands of people are employed in carrying water from Hurdwar to Juggernat, for the uses of that temple. It is there supposed to be peculiarly holy, as it issues from what is called the Cow's Mouth. This superstitious notion is the cause of as much lost labor as would long since have converted the largest province of Asia into a garden. The numbers thus employed are immense; they travel with two flasks of the water slung over the shoulder by means of an elastic piece of bamboo. The same quantity which employs, perhaps, fifteen thousand persons, might easily be carried down the Ganges in a few boats annually. Princes and families of distinction have this water carried to them in all parts of Hindostan; it is drunk at feasts, as well as upon religious occasions. — TENNANT.

A small river near Kinouge is held by some as even more efficacious in washing away moral defilement than the Ganges itself. Dr. Tennant says, that a person in Ceylon drinks daily of this water, though at the distance of, perhaps, three thousand miles, and at the expense of five thousand rupees per month!

No distinction of castes is made at this temple, but all, like a nation descended from one common stock, eat, drink, and make merry together. — STAVORINUS.

The seven-headed Idol. — XIV. 1, p. 593.

The idol of Jaggernat is in shape like a serpent, with seven heads; and on the cheeks of each head it hath the form of a wing upon each cheek, which wings open, and shut, and flap, as it is carried in a stately chariot, and the idol in the midst of it; and one of the moguls sitting behind it in the chariot, upon a convenient place, with a canopy, to keep the sun from injuring of it.

When I, with horror, beheld these strange things, I called to mind the eighteenth chapter of the Revelations, and the first verse, and likewise the sixteenth and seventeenth verses of the said chapter, in which places there is a beast, and such idolatrous worship mentioned; and those sayings in that text are herein truly accomplished in the sixteenth verse; for the Brahmins are all marked in the forehead, and likewise all that come to worship the idol are marked also in their foreheads. — BRUTON. Churchill's Collection.

The Chariot of the God. — XIV. 2, p. 593.

The size of the chariot is not exaggerated. Speaking of other such, Niccamp says, Carras tam horrendæ magnitudinis sunt, ut vel mille homines uni traheudo vix sufficiant. — V. i. 10, § 18.

They have built a great chariot, that goeth on sixteen wheels of a side, and every wheel is five feet in height, and the chariot itself is about thirty feet high. In this chariot, on their great festival days, at night, they place their wicked god Jaggernat; and all the Brahmins, being in number nine thousand, then attend this great idol, besides of ashmen and jackeires some thousands, or more than a good many.

The chariot is most richly adorned with most rich and costly ornaments; and the aforesaid wheels are placed very complete in a round circle, so artificially that every wheel doth its proper office without any impediment; for the chariot is aloft, and in the centre betwixt the wheels: they have also more than two thousand lights with them. And this chariot, with the idol, is also drawn with the greatest and best men of the town; and they are so eager and greedy to draw it, that whosoever, by shouldering, crowding, shoving, heaving, thrusting, or any violent way, can but come to lay a hand upon the ropes, they think themselves blessed and happy; and when it is going along the city, there are many that will offer themselves as a sacrifice to this idol, and desperately lie down on the ground, that the chariot-wheels may run over them, whereby they are killed outright; some get broken arms, some broken legs; so that many of them are so destroyed, and by this means they think to merit heaven. — BRUTON. Churchill's Collection.

They sometimes lie down in the track of this machine a few hours before its arrival, and, taking a soporiferous draught, hope to meet death asleep. — CLAUDIUS BUCHANAN.

A harlot-band. — XIV. 8, p. 594.

There are in India common women, called Wives of the Idol. When a woman has made a vow to obtain children, if she brings into the world a beautiful daughter, she carries her to Bod, so their idol is called, with whom she leaves her. This girl, when she is arrived at a proper age, takes an apartment in the public place, hangs a curtain before the door, and waits for those who are passing, as well Indians as those of other sects among whom this debauchery is permitted. She prostitutes herself for a certain price, and all that she can thus acquire she carries to the priest of the idol, that he may apply it to the service of the temple. Let us, says the Mohammedan relater, bless the almighty and glorious God, that he has chosen us, to exempt us from all the crimes into which men are led by their unbelief. — Anciennes Relations.

Incited, unquestionably, says Mr. Maurice, by the hieroglyphic emblem of vice so conspicuously elevated, and so strikingly painted in the temples of Mahadeo, the priests of that deity industriously selected the most beautiful females that could be found, and, in their tenderest years, with great pomp and solemnity, consecrated them (as it is impiously called) to the service of the presiding divinity of the pagoda.

They were trained up in every art to delude and to delight; and to the fascination of external beauty, their artful betrayers added the attractions arising from mental accomplishments. This was an invariable rule of the Hindoos, that women have no concern with literature, dispensed with upon this infamous occasion. The moment these hapless victims reached maturity, they fell victims to the lust of the Brahmins. They were early taught to practise the most alluring blandishments, to roll the expressive eye of wanton pleasure, and to invite to criminal indulgence, by stealing upon the beholder the tender look of voluptuous languishing. They were instructed to mould their elegant and airy forms into the most enticing attitudes and the most lascivious gestures, while the rapid and graceful motion of their feet, adorned with golden bells, and glittering with jewels, kept unison with the exquisite melody of their voices. Every pagoda has a band of these young sirens, whose business, on great festivals, is to dance in public before the idol, to sing hymns in his honor, and in private to enrich the treasury of that pagoda with the wages of prostitution. These women are not, however, regarded in a dishonorable light; they are considered as wedded to the idol, and they partake of the veneration paid to him. They are forbidden ever to desert the pagoda where they are educated, and are never permitted to marry; but the offspring, if any, of their criminal embraces are considered as sacred to the idol: the boys are taught to play on the sacred instruments used at the festivals, and the daughters are devoted to the abandoned occupations of their mothers. — Indian Antiquities.

These impostors take a young maid, of the fairest they can meet with, to be the bride, (as they speak and bear the besotted people in hand,) of Jagannat, and they leave her all night in the temple (whether they have carried her) with the idol, making her believe that Jagannat himself will come and embrace her, and appointing her to ask him, whether it will be a fruitful year, what kind of processions, feasts, prayers, and alms he demands to be made for it. In the mean time one of these lustful priests enters at night by a little back door into the temple, dollowereth this young maid, and maketh her believe any thing he pleaseth; and the next day, being transported from this temple into another, with the same magnificence she was carried before upon the chariot of triumph, on the side of Jagannat, her bridegroom: these Brahmins make her say aloud, before all the people, whatsoever she hath been taught of these cheats, as if she had learnt it from the very mouth of Jagannat. — BERNIER.

Baly. — XV. p. 595.

The fifth incarnation was in a Bramin dwarf, under the name of Vamen; it was wrought to restrain the pride of the giant Baly. The latter, after having conquered the gods, expelled them from Sorgon; he was generous, true to his word, compassionate, and charitable. Vichenou, under the form of a very little Bramin, presented himself before him while he was sacrificing, and asked him for three paces of land to build a hut. Baly ridiculed the apparent imbecility of the dwarf, in telling him that he ought not to limit his demand to a bequest so trifling; that his generosity could bestow a much larger donation of land. Vamen answered, that being of so small a stature, what he asked was more than sufficient. The prince immediately granted his request, and, to ratify his donation, poured water into his right hand; which was no sooner done, than the dwarf grew so prodigiously, that his body filled the universe! He measured the earth with one pace, and the heavens with another, and then summoned Baly to give him his word for the third. The prince then recognized Vichenou, adored him, and presented his head to him; but the god, satisfied with his submission, sent him to govern the Padalon, and permitted him to return every year to the earth, the day of the full moon, in the month of November. — SONNERAT'S Voyages, vol. i. p. 24.

The Sacred Cord. — XV. 4, p. 596.

The Brahmins who officiate at the temple generally go with their heads uncovered, and the upper part of the body naked. The Zennar, or sacred string, is hung round the body from the left shoulder; a piece of white cotton cloth is wrapped round the loins, which descends under the knee, but lower on the left side than on the other; and in cold weather they sometimes cover their bodies with a shawl, and their heads with a red cap. The Zennar is made of a particular kind of perennial cotton, called Vermana: it is composed of a certain number of threads of a fixed length. The Zennar worn by the Khatries has fewer threads than that worn by the Brahmans; and that worn by the Bhyse fewer than that worn by the Khatries; but those of the Soodra caste are excluded from this distinction, none of them being permitted to wear it. — CHAUFURD.

The city of Baly. — XV. 7, p. 596.

Ruins of Mahābalipûr, the City of the great Baly.

A rock or rather hill of stone, is that which first engrosses the attention on approaching the place; for as it rises abruptly out of a level plain of great extent, consists chiefly of one single stone, and is situated very near to the sea-beach, it is such a kind of object as an inquisitive traveller would naturally turn aside to examine. Its shape is also singular and romantic, and, from a distant view, has an appearance like some antique and lofty edifice. On coming near to the foot of the rock from the north, works of imagery and sculpture crowd so thick upon the eye, as might seem to favor the idea of a petrified town, like those that have been fabled in different parts of the world, by too credulous travellers. Proceeding on by the foot of the hill, on the side facing the sea, there is a pagoda rising out of the ground, of one solid stone, about sixteen or eighteen feet high, which seems to have been cut upon the spot, out of a detached rock, that has been found of a proper size for that purpose. The top is arched, and the style of architecture, according to which it is formed, different from any now used in those parts. A little farther on, there appears upon a huge surface of stone that juts out a little from the side of the hill, a numerous group of human figures, in bass-relief, considerably larger than life, representing the most remarkable persons whose actions are celebrated in the Mahābhārit, each of them in an attitude, or with weapons, or other insignia, expressive of his character, or of some one of his most famous exploits. All these figures are doubtless much less distinct than they were at first; for upon comparing these and the rest of the sculptures that are exposed to the sea-air, with others at the same place, whose situation has afforded them protection from that element, the difference is striking — the former being every where much defaced, while the others are fresh as recently finished. An excavation in another part of the east side of the great rock appears to have been made on the same plan, and for the same purpose that Chowtries are usually built in that country, that is to say, for the accommodation of travellers. The rock is hollowed out to the size of a spacious room, and two or three rows of pillars are left, as a seeming support to the mountainous mass of stone which forms the roof.

The ascent of the hill on the north is, from its natural shape, gradual and easy at first, and is in other parts rendered more so by very excellent steps, cut out in several places where the communication would be difficult or impracticable without them. A winding stair of this sort leads to a kind of temple cut out of the solid rock, with some figures of idols in high relief upon the walls, very well finished. From this temple there are flights of steps, that seem to have led to some edifice formerly standing upon the hill; nor does it seem absurd to suppose that this may have been a palace, to which this temple may have appertained; for besides the small detached ranges of stairs that are here and there cut in the rock and seem as if they had once led to different parts of one great building, there appear in many places small water channels cut also in the rock, as if for drains to a house; and the whole top of the hill is strewed with small round pieces of brick, which may be supposed, from their appearance, to have been worn down to their present form during the lapse of many ages. On a plain surface of the rock, which may once have served as the floor of some apartment, there is a platform of stone, about eight or nine feet long, by three or four wide, in a situation rather elevated, with two or three steps leading up to it, perfectly resembling a couch or bed, and a lion very well executed at the upper end of it, by way of pillow: the whole of one piece being part of the hill itself. This the Bramins, inhabitants of the place, call the bed of Dhermarajah, or Judishter, the eldest of the five brothers, whose exploits are the leading subject in the Mahābhārit. And at a considerable distance from this, at such a distance, indeed, as the apartments of the women might be supposed to be from that of the men, is a bath, excavated also from the rock, with steps in the inside, which the Bramins call the Bath of Dropedy, the wife of Judishter and his brothers. How much credit is due to this tradition, and whether this stone couch may not have been anciently used as a kind of throne, rather than a bed, is matter for future inquiry. A circumstance, however, which may seem to favor this idea is, that a throne, in the Sanscrit and other Hindoo languages, is called Singhāsen, which is compounded of Sing, a lion, and āsen, a seat.

But though these works may be deemed stupendous, they are surpassed by others that are to be seen at the distance of about a mile, or a mile and half, to the south of the hill. They consist of two pagodas, of about thirty feet long, by twenty feet wide, and about as many in height, cut out of the solid rock, and each consisting originally of one single stone. Their form is different from the style of architecture according to which idol temples are now built in that country. These sculptures approach nearer to the Gothic taste, being surmounted by arched roofs or domes, not semicircular, but composed of two segments of circles meeting in a point at top. Near these also stand an elephant full as big as life, and a lion much larger than the natural size, both hewn also out of one stone.

The great rock is about fifty or one hundred yards from the sea; but close to the sea are the remains of a pagoda built of brick, and dedicated to Sib, the greatest part of which has evidently been swallowed up by that element; for the door of the innermost apartment, in which the idol is placed, and before which there are always two or three spacious courts surrounded with walls, is now washed by the waves, and the pillar used to discover the meridian at the time of founding the pagoda, is seen standing at some distance in the sea. In the neighborhood of this building there are some detached rocks, washed also by the waves, on which there appear sculptures, though now much worn and defaced. And the natives of the place declared to the writer of this account, that the more aged people among them remembered to have seen the tops of several pagodas far out in the sea, which, being covered with copper, (probably gilt,) were particularly visible at sunrise, as their shining surface used then to reflect the sun's rays, but that now that effect was no longer produced, as the copper had since become incrustated with mould and verdigris. — CHAMBERS. Asiatic Researches.

Daniel has a beautiful passage concerning Richard II. — sufficiently resembling this part of the poem to be inserted here:

To Flint, from thence, into a restless bed,
That miserable night he comes conveyed;
Poorly provided, poorly followed,
Uncourted, unrespected, unobey'd;
Where, if uncertain Sleep but hovered
Over the drooping cares that heavy weigh'd,
Millions of figures Fantasy presents
Unto that sorrow waken'd grief augments.

His new misfortune makes deluded Sleep
Say 'twas not so: — false dreams the truth deny.
Wherewith he starts; feels waking cares do creep
Upon his soul, and give his dreams the lie,
Then sleeps again; — and then again as deep
Deceits of darkness mock his misery.

The Anllay. — XVI. 2, p. 598.

This monster of Hindoo imagination is a horse with the trunk of an elephant, but bearing about the same proportion to the elephant in size, that the elephant itself does to a common sheep. In one of the prints to Mr. Kindersley's "Specimens of Hindoo Literature," an anllay is represented taking up an elephant with his trunk.

Malecheren, (which is probably another name for Baly,) in an excursion which he made one day alone, and in disguise, came to a garden in the environs of his city Mahâbalipoor, where was a fountain so inviting, that two celestial nymphs had come down to bathe there. The Rajah became enamored of one of them, who condescended to allow of his attachment to her; and she and her sister nymph used thenceforward to have frequent interviews with him in that garden. On one of those occasions they brought with them a male inhabitant of the heavenly regions, to whom they introduced the Rajah, and between him and Malecheren a strict friendship ensued; in consequence of which he agreed, at the Rajah's earnest request, to carry him in disguise to see the court of the divine Inder—a favor never before granted to any mortal. The Rajah returned from thence with new ideas of splendor and magnificence, which he immediately adopted in regulating his court and his retinue, and in beautifying his seat of government. By this means Mahâbalipoor became soon celebrated beyond all the cities of the earth; and an account of its magnificence having been brought to the gods assembled at the court of Inder, their jealousy was so much excited at it, that they sent orders to the God of the Sea to let loose his billows, and overflow a place which impiously pretended to vie in splendor with their celestial mansions. This command he obeyed, and the city was at once overflowed by that furious element; nor has it ever since been able to rear its head. — CHAMBERS. Asiatic Researches.

Brahma is considered as the immediate creator of all things, and particularly as the disposer of each person's fate, which he inscribes within the skull of every created being, and which the gods themselves cannot avert. — KINDERSLEY, p. 21. NIECAMP, vol. i. p. 10, § 7.

It is by the sutures of the skull that these lines of destiny are formed. See also a note to Thalaba (Book V. p. 273,) upon a like superstition of the Mahommedans.

Quand on leur reproche quelque vice, ou qu'on les reprend d'une mauvaise action, ils répondent froidement, que cela est écrit sur leur tête, et qu'ils n'ont pu faire autrement. Si vous paraissez étonné de ce langage nouveau, et que vous demandiez à voir où cela est écrit, ils vous montrent les diverses jointures du crâne de leur tête, prétendant que les sutures même sont les caractères de cette écriture mystérieuse. Si vous les pressiez de déchiffrer ces caractères, et de vous faire connaître ce qu'ils signifient, ils avouent qu'ils ne le savent pas. Mais puisque vous ne savez pas lire cette écriture, disois-je quelquefois à ces gens entêtés, qui est-ce donc qui vous la lit? qui est-ce qui vous en explique le sens, et qui vous fait connaître ce qu'elle contient? D'ailleurs ces prétendus caractères étant les mêmes sur la tête de tous les hommes, d'où vient qu'ils agissent si différemment, et qu'ils sont si contraires les uns aux autres dans leurs vues, dans leurs dessein, et dans leurs projets?

The Seven Earths. — XIX. 6, p. 605.

The seas which surround these earths are, 1. of salt water, enclosing our inmost earth; 2. of fresh water; 3. of tyre, curdled milk; 4. of ghee, clarified butter; 5. of cauloo, a liquor drawn from the pullum tree; 6. of liquid sugar; 7. of milk. The whole system is enclosed in one broad circumference of pure gold, beyond which reigns impenetrable darkness. — KINDERSLEY.

I know not whether the following fable was invented to account for the saltness of our sea: —

“Agastya is recorded to have been very low in stature; and one day, previously to the rectifying the too oblique posture of the earth, walking with Veeshnu on the shore of the ocean, the insolent Deep asked the god who that dwarf was strutting by his side. Veeshnu replied, it was the patriarch Agastya going to restore the earth to its true balance. The sea, in utter contempt of his pygmy form, dashed him with his spray as he passed along; on which the sage, greatly incensed at the designed affront, scooped up some of the water in the hollow of his hand, and drank it off: he again and again repeated the draught, nor desisted till he had drained the bed of the ocean of the entire volume of its waters. Alarmed at this effect of his holy indignation, and dreading an universal drought, the Devetas made intercession with Agastya to relent from his anger, and again restore an element so necessary to the existence of nature, both animate and inanimate. Agastya, pacified, granted their request, and discharged the imbibed fluid in a way becoming the histories of a gross physical people to relate, but by no means proper for this page; a way, however, that evinced his sovereign power, while it marked his ineffable contempt for the vain fury of an element, contending with a being armed with the delegated power of the Creator of all things. After this miracle, the earth being, by the same power, restored to its just balance, Agastya and Veeshnu separated; when the latter, to prevent any similar accident occurring, commanded the great serpent (that is, of the sphere) to wind its enormous folds round the seven continents, of which, according to Sanscreeet geography, the earth consists, and appointed, as perpetual guardians, to watch over and protect it, the eight powerful genii, so renowned in the Hindoo system of mythology, as presiding over the eight points of the world.” — MAURICE.

The Pauranics (said Ramachandra to Sir William Jones) will tell you that our earth is a plane figure, studded with eight mountains, and surrounded by seven seas of milk, nectar, and other fluids; that the part which we inhabit is one of seven islands, to which eleven smaller isles are subordinate; that a god, riding on a huge elephant, guards each of the eight regions; and that a mountain of gold rises and gleams in the centre. — Asiatic Researches.

Mount Calasay. — XIX. 6, p. 605.

The residence of Izora is upon the silver mount Calaja, to the south of the famous mountain Mahameru, being a most delicious place, planted with all sorts of trees, that bear fruit all the year round. The roses and other flowers send forth a most odoriferous scent; and the pond at the foot of the mount is enclosed with pleasant walks of trees, that afford an agreeable shade, whilst the peacocks and divers other birds entertain the ear with their harmonious noise, as the beautiful women do the eyes. The circumjacent woods are inhabited by a certain people called Munis, or Rixis, who, avoiding the conversation of others, spend their time in offering daily sacrifices to their god.

It is observable that, though these pagans are generally black themselves, they do represent these Rixis to be of a fair complexion, with long, white beards, and long garments hanging crossways, from about the neck down over the breast. They are in such high esteem among them, they believe that whom they bless are blessed, and whom they curse are cursed.

Within the mountain lives another generation, called Jeraguinneru and Quendra, who are free from all trouble, spend their days in continual contemplation, praises, and prayers to God. Round about the mountain stand seven ladders, by which you ascend to a spacious plain, in the middle whereof is a bell of silver, and a square table, surrounded with nine precious stones, of divers colors. Upon this table lies a silver rose, called Tamora Pua, which contains two women as bright and fair as a pearl: one is called Brigasiri, i. e. the Lady of the Mouth; the other Tarasiri, i. e. the Lady of the Tongue,—because they praise God with the mouth and tongue. In the centre of this rose is the triangle of Quivelinga, which they say is the permanent residence of God.—BALDEUS.

Unnatural hands suspended.—XXI. 5, p. 607.

I heard a voice crying out under my window; I looked out and saw a poor young girl lamenting the unhappy case of her sister. On asking what was the matter, the reply was, Boot Laggeosa, a demon has seized her. These unhappy people say Boot Laggeosa, if a child newly born will not suck; and they expose it to death in a basket, hung on the branch of a tree. One day, as Mr. Thomas and I were riding out, we saw a basket hung in a tree, in which an infant had been exposed, the skull of which remained, the rest having been devoured by ants.—Periodical Accounts of the Baptist Missionaries.

The footless Fowl of Heaven.—XXI. 6, p. 607.

There is a bird that falls down out of the air dead, and is found sometimes in the Molucca Islands, that has no feet at all. The bigness of her body and bill, as likewise the form of them, is much the same as a swallow’s; but the spreading out of her wings and tail has no less compass than an eagle’s. She lives and breeds in the air, comes not near the earth but for her burial, for the largeness and lightness of her wings and tail sustain her without lassitude. And the laying of her eggs, and breeding of her young, is upon the back of the male, which is made hollow, as also the breast of the female, for the more easy incubation. Also two strings, like two shoemaker’s ends, come from the hinder parts of the male, wherewith it is conceived that he is fastened closer to the female, while she hatches her eggs on the hollow of his back. The dew of heaven is appointed her for food, her region being too far removed from the approach of flies and such like insects.

This is the entire story and philosophy of this miraculous bird in Cardan, who professes himself to have seen it no less than thrice, and to have described it accordingly. The contrivances whereof, if the matter were certainly true, are as evident arguments of a Divine Providence, as that coppering, with the Greek * inscription upon it, was an undeniable monument of the artifice and finger of man.

But that the reproach of over-much credulity may not lie upon Cardan alone, Scaliger, who lay at catch with him to take him tripping wherever he could, cavils not with any thing in the whole narration but the bigness of wings and the littleness of the body; which he undertakes to correct from one of his own which was sent him by Orvesanus from Java. Nay, he confirms what his antagonist has wrote, partly by history and partly by reason; affirming, that himself, in his own garden, found two little birds with membranaceous wings utterly devoid of legs; their form was near to that of a bat's. Nor is he deterred from the belief of the perpetual flying of the Manucodiata, by the gaping of the feathers of her wings, which seem thereby less fit to sustain her body, but further makes the narration probable by what he has observed in kites hovering in the air, as he saith, for a whole hour together without flapping of her wings, or changing place. And he has found also how she may sleep in the air, from the example of fishes, which he has seen sleeping in the water without sinking themselves to the bottom, and without changing place, but lying stock still, pinnulis tantum nescia quid motuancule mediantes, only wagging a little their fins, as heedlessly and unconcernedly as horses while they are asleep wag their ears to displace the flies that sit upon them. Wherever Scaliger admitting that the Manucodiata is perpetually on the wing in the air, he must of necessity admit also that manner of incubation that Cardan describes, else how could their generations continue?

Franciscus Hernandez affirms the same with Cardan expressly in every thing; as also Eusebius Nierembergicus, who is so taken with the story of this bird, that he could not abstain from celebrating her miraculous properties in a short but elegant copy of verses; and does after, though confidently opposed, assert the main matter again in prose.

Such are the suffrages of Cardan, Scaliger, Hernandez, Nierembergicus. But Aldrovandus rejects that fable of her feeding on the dew of heaven, and of her incubation on the back of the male, with much scorn and indignation. And as for the former, his reasons are no ways contemptible, he alleging that dew is a body not perfectly enough mixed, or heterogeneal enough for food, nor the hard bill of the bird made for such easie uses as sipping this soft moisture.

To which I know not what Cardan and the rest would answer, unless this, that they mean by dew the more unctuous moisture of the air, which as it may not be alike every where, so these birds may be fitted with a natural sagacity to find it out where it is. That there is dew in this sense day and night, (as well as in the morning,) and in all seasons of the year; and therefore a constant supply of moisture and spirits to their perpetual flying, which they more copiously imbibe by reason of their exercise: That the thicker parts of this moisture stick and convert into flesh, and that the lightness of their feathers is so great, that their pains in sustaining themselves are not over-much. That what is homogeneal and simple to our sight is fit enough to be the rudiments of generation, all animals being generated of a kind of clear crystalline liquor; and that, therefore, it may be also of nutrition; that orpine and sea-house-leek are nourished and grow, being hung in the air, and that dock-weed has its root no deeper than near the upper parts of the water; and, lastly, that the bills of these birds are for their better flying, by cutting the way, and for better ornament; for the rectifying also and composing of their feathers, while they swim in the air with as much ease as swans do in rivers.

To his great impatience against their manner of incubation, they would happily return this answer: That the way is not ridiculous; but it may be rather necessary from what Aldrovandus himself not only acknowledges but contends for, namely, that they have no feet at all. For hence it is manifest that they cannot light upon the ground, nor any where rest on their bellies, and be able to get on wing again, because they cannot creep out of holes of rocks, as swifts and such like short-footed birds can, they having no feet at all to creep with. Besides, as Aristotle well argues concerning the long legs of certain water-fowl, that they were made so long, because they were to wade in the water and catch fish, adding that excellent aphorism, τὰ γὰρ ὄρνατα πρὸς τὸ ἔργον ἢ φύσει ποιεῖ ἀλλ' οὐ τὸ ἔργον πρὸς τὰ ὄρνατα, so may we rationally conclude, will they say, that as the long legs of these water-fowl imply a design of their haunting the water, so want of legs in these Manucodiatas argue they are never to come down to the earth, because they can neither stand there nor get off again. And if they never come on the earth, or any other resting-place, where can their eggs be laid or hatched but on the back of the male?

Besides that Cardan pleases himself with that Antiphonic in nature, that as the Ostrich being a bird, yet never flies in the air, and never rests upon the earth. And as for Aldrovandus, his presumption from the five several Manucodiatas that he had seen, and in which he could observe no such figuration of parts as implied a fitness for such a manner of incubation, Cardan will answer, Myself has seen three, and Scaliger one, who both agree against you.

However, you see that both Cardan, Aldrovandus, and the rest, do jointly agree in allowing the Manucodiata no feet, as also in furnishing her with two strings, hanging at the hinder parts of her body, which Aldrovandus will have to be in the female as well as in the male, though Cardan's experience reacheth not so far.

But Pighafetta and Clusius will easily end this grand controversy betwixt Cardan and Aldrovandus, if it be true which they report, and if they speak of the same kind of Birds of Paradise. For they both affirm that they have feet a palm long, and that with all confidence imaginable; but Nierembergicus on the contrary affirms, that one that was an eye-witness, and that had taken up one of these birds newly dead, told him that it had no feet at all. Johnston also gives his suffrage with Nierembergicus in this, though with Aldrovandus he rejects the manner of their incubation.

But unless they can raise themselves from the ground by the stiffness of some of the feathers of their wings, or rather by virtue of those nervous strings which they may have a power to stiffen when they are alive, by transfusing spirits into them, and making them serve as well instead of legs to raise them from the ground as to hang upon the boughs of trees, by a slight thing being able to raise or hold up their light-feathered bodies in the air, as a small twig will us in the water, I should rather incline to the testimony of Pighafetta and Clusius than to the judgment of the rest, and believe those mariners that told him that the legs are pulled off by them that take them, and exenterate them and dry them in the sun for either their private use or sale.

Which conclusion would the best solve the credit of Aristotle, who long since has so peremptorily pronounced, ὅτι πτηνὸν μόνον οὐδὲν ἴστυ ὡπερ νευσικὸν μόνον ἴστυ ἰχθὺς, — that there is not any bird that only flies as the fish only swims.

But thus our Bird of Paradise is quite flown and vanished into a figment or fable. But if any one will condole the loss of so convincing an argument for a Providence that fits one thing to another, I must take the freedom to tell him, that, unless he be a greater admirer of novelty than a searcher into the indissoluble consequences of things, I shall supply his meditation with what of this nature is as strongly conclusive, and remind, that it will be his own reproach if he cannot spy as clear an inference from an ordinary truth as from either an uncertainty or a fiction. And in this regard, the bringing this doubtful narration into play may not justly seem to no purpose, it carrying so serious and castigatory a piece of pleasantry with it.

The Manucodiata's living on the dew is no part of the convictiveness of a Providence in this story: But the being excellently well provided of wings and feathers, tanta leuitatis suppellectile exornata, as Nierembergicus speaks, being so well furnished with all advantages for lightness, that it seems harder for her to sink down, as he conceits, than to be borne up in the air; that a bird thus fitted for that region should have no legs to stand on the earth, this would be a considerable indication of a discriminating Providence, that on purpose avoids all uselessness and superfluities.

The other remarkable, and it is a notorious one, is the cavity on the back of the male and in the breast of the female, for incubation; and the third and last, the use of those strings, as Cardan supposes, for the better keeping them together in incubation.

If these considerations of this strange story strike so strongly upon thee as to convince thee of a Providence, think it humor, and not judgment, if what I put in lieu of them, and is but ordinary, have not the same force with thee.

For is not the fish's wanting feet, (as we observed before,) she being sufficiently supplied with fins in so thick an element as the water, as great an argument for a Providence as so light a bird's wanting feet in that thinner element of the air, the extreme lightness of her furniture being appropriated to the thinness of that element? And is not the same Providence seen, and that as conspicuously, in allotting but very short legs to those birds that are called Apodee both in Plinie and Aristotle, upon whom she has bestowed such large and strong wings, and a power of flying so long and swift, as in giving no legs at all to the Manucodiata, who has still a greater power of wing and lightness of body?

And as for the cavities on the back of the male and in the breast of the female, is that design of nature any more certain and plain than in the genital parts of the male and female in all kinds of animals? What greater argument of counsel and purpose of fitting one thing for another can there be than that? And if we should make a more inward search into the contrivances of these parts in an ordinary hen, and consider how or by what force an egg of so great a growth and bigness is transmitted from the ovarium through the infundibulum into the processus of the uterus, the membranes being so thin and the passage so very small, to see to the principle of that motion cannot be thought less than divine.

And if you would compare the protuberant paps of teats in the females of beasts with that cavity in the breast of the Manucodiata, whether of them, think you, is the plainer pledge of a knowing and designing Providence?

And, lastly, for the strings that are conceived to hold together the male and female in their incubiture, what a toy is it, if compared with those invisible links and ties that engage ordinary birds to sit upon their eggs, they having no visible allurements to such a tedious service? — HENRY MORE'S Antidote against Atheism, b. ii. ch. 11.

"Mankind," says Jeremy Taylor, "now taken in his whole constitution and design, are like the Birds of Paradise, which travellers tell us of in the Molucca Islands, born without legs, but by a celestial power they have a recompense made to them for that defect, and they always hover in the air and feed on the dew of Heaven: so are we Birds of Paradise, but cast out from thence, and born without legs, — without strength to walk in the laws of God, or to go to Heaven; but by a Power from above, we are adopted in our new birth to a celestial conversation; we feed on the dew of Heaven; 'the just does live by faith,' and breathes in this new life by the Spirit of God." — Vol. ix. 339. Heber's edition.

Yama was a child of the Sun, and thence named Vairasvata; another of his titles was Dharmaraja, or King of Justice; and a third Pitripati, or Lord of the Patriarchs: but he is chiefly distinguished as Judge of departed souls; for the Hindus believe that, when a soul leaves its body, it immediately repairs to Yamapur, or the city of Yama, where it receives a just sentence from him, and thence either ascends to Sveerga, or the first Heaven; or is driven down to Narac, the region of serpents; or assumes on earth the form of some animal, unless its offence has been such, that it ought to be condemned to a vegetable, or even to a mineral prison. — Sir W. JONES.

There is a story concerning Yamen which will remind the reader, in its purport, of the fable of Love and Death. "A famous penitent, Morugandumagarexi by name, had, during a long series of years, served the gods with uncommon and most exemplary piety. This very virtuous man, having no children, was extremely desirous of having one, and therefore daily besought the god Xiven, (or Seeva,) to grant him one. At length the god heard his desire, but, before he indulged it him, he asked him, whether he would have several children, who should be long-lived and wicked, or one virtuous and prudent, who should die in his sixteenth year. The penitent chose the latter: his wife conceived, and was happily delivered of the promised son, whom they named Marcandem. The boy, like his father, zealously devoted himself to the worship of Xiven; but as soon as he had attained his sixteenth year, the officers of Yhamen, god of death, were sent on the earth, to remove him from thence.

"Young Marcandem, being informed on what errand they were come, told them, with a resolute air, that he was resolved not to die, and that they might go back, if they pleased. They returned to their master, and told him the whole affair. Yhamen immediately mounted his great buffalo, and set out. Being come, he told the youth that he acted very rashly in refusing to leave the world, and it was unjust in him, for Xiven had promised him a life only of sixteen years, and the term was expired. But this reason did not satisfy Marcandem, who persisted in his resolution not to die; and, fearing lest the god of death should attempt to take him away by force, he ran to his oratory, and taking the Lingam, clasped it to his breast. Meantime Yhamen came down from his buffalo, threw a rope about the youth's neck, and held him fast therewith, as also the Lingam, which Marcandem grasped with all his strength, and was going to drag them both into hell, when Xiven issued out of the Lingam, drove back the king of the dead, and gave him so furious a blow that he killed him on the spot.

"The god of death being thus slain, mankind multiplied so that the earth was no longer able to contain them. The gods represented this to Xiven, and he, at their entreaty, restored Yhamen to life, and to all the power he had before enjoyed. Yhamen immediately despatched a herald to all parts of the world, to summon all the old men. The herald got drunk before he set out, and, without staying till the fumes of the wine were dispelled, mounted an elephant, and rode up and down the world, pursuant to his commission; and, instead of publishing this order, he declared, that it was the will and pleasure of Yhamen that, from this day forward, all the leaves, fruits, and flowers, whether ripe or green, should fall to the ground. This proclamation was no sooner issued than men began to yield to death. But before Yhamen was killed, only the old were deprived of life, and now people of all ages are summoned indiscriminately." — PICART.

*And Brahma's region, where the heavenly Hours
Weave the vast circle of his age-long day.*

XXIII. 5, p. 611.

They who are acquainted with day and night know that the day of Brahma is as a thousand revolutions of the Yuogs, and that his night extendeth for a thousand more. On the coming of that day all things proceed from invisibility to visibility; so, on the approach of night, they are all dissolved away in that which is called invisible. The universe, even, having existed, is again dissolved; and now again, on the approach of day, by divine necessity, it is reproduced. That which, upon the dissolution of all things else, is not destroyed, is superior and of another nature from that visibility: it is invisible and eternal. He who is thus called invisible and incorruptible is even he who is called the Supreme Abode; which men having once obtained, they never more return to earth: that is my mansion. — KREESHNA, in the Bhagavat Geeta.

The guess, that Brahma and his wife Saraswadi may be Abraham and Sarah, has more letters in its favor than are usually to be found in such guesses. — NIECAMP, p. i. c. 10, § 2.

The true cause why there is no idol of Brahma, (except the head, which is his share in the Trimourter,) is probably to be found in the conquest of his sect. A different reason, however, is implied in the Veda: "Of Him, it says, whose glory is so great, there is no image: — He is the incomprehensible Being which illumines all, delights all, whence all proceeded; — that by which they live when born, and that to which all must return." — Moor's Hindu Pantheon, p. 4.

*Two forms inseparable in unity,
Hath Yama. — XXIII. 13, p. 612.*

The Dharma-Raja, or king of justice, has two countenances; one is mild and full of benevolence; those alone who abound with virtue see it. He holds a court of justice, where are many assistants, among whom are many just and pious kings; Chitragupta acts as chief secretary. These holy men determine what is dharma and adharma, just and unjust. His (Dharma-Raja's) servant is called Carmala: he brings the righteous on celestial cars, which go of themselves, whenever holy men are to be brought in, according to the directions of the Dharma-Raja, who is the sovereign of the Pitris. This is called his divine countenance, and the righteous alone do see it. His other countenance, or form, is called Yama; this the wicked alone can see: it has large teeth and a monstrous body. Yama is the lord of Patala; there he orders some to be beaten, some to be cut to pieces, some to be devoured by monsters, &c. His servant is called Cashmala, who, with ropes round their necks, drags the wicked over rugged paths, and throws them headlong into hell. He is unmerciful, and hard is his heart; every body trembles at the sight of him. — WILFORD. Asiatic Researches.

Black of aspect, red of eye. — XXIII. 13, p. 613.

Punishment is the Magistrate; Punishment is the Inspirer of Terror; Punishment is the Defender from Calamity; Punishment is the Guardian of those that sleep; Punishment, with a black aspect and a red eye, tempts the guilty. — HALL-HEED'S Gentoo Code, ch. xxi. sect. 8.

Azyrooea, — XXIII. 15, p. 613.

In Patala (or the infernal regions) resides the sovereign Queen of the Nagas, (large snakes or dragons;) she is beautiful, and her name is Asyoreua. There, in a cave, she performed Taparya with such rigorous austerity, that fire sprang from her body, and formed numerous agnitiraths (places of sacred fire) in Patala. These fires, forcing their way through the earth, waters, and mountains, formed various openings or mouths, called from thence the flaming mouths, or jwla muihi. By Samudr (Oceanus) a daughter was born unto her, called Rama-Devi. She is most beautiful; she is Laeshmi; and her name is Asyotcarsha, or Asyoterishta. Like a jewel she remains concealed in the Ocean. — WILFORD. Asiat. Res.

He came in all his might and majesty. — XXIV. 2, p. 613.

What is this to the coming of Seeva, as given us by Mr. Maurice, from the Seeva Paurana?

"In the place of the right wheel blazed the Sun, in the place of the left was the Moon; instead of the brazen nails and bolts, which firmly held the ponderous wheels, were distributed Bramins on the right hand, and Reyshees on the left; in lieu of the canopy on the top of the chariot was overspread the vault of Heaven; the counterpoise of the wheels was on the east and west, and the four Semordres were instead of the cushions and bolsters; the four Vedas were placed as the horses of the chariot, and Saraswaty was for the bell; the piece of wood by which the horses are driven was the three-lettered Mantra, while Brama himself was the charioteer, and the Naeshatras and stars were distributed about it by way of ornaments. Sumaru was in the place of a bow, the serpent Seschanaga was stationed as the string, Veeshnu instead of an arrow, and fire was constituted its point. Ganges and other rivers were appointed its precursors; and the setting out of the chariot, with its appendages and furniture, one would affirm to be the year of twelve months gracefully moving forwards.

"When Seeva, with his numerous troops and prodigious army, was mounted, Brama drove so furiously, that thought itself, which, in its rapid career, compasses Heaven and Earth, could not keep pace with it. By the motion of the chariot Heaven and Earth were put into a tremor; and, as the Earth was not able to bear up under this burden, the Cow of the Earth, Kam-deva, took upon itself to support the weight. Seeva went with intention to destroy Treepoor; and the multitude of Devetas, and Reyshees, and Apsaras who waited on his stirrup, opening their mouths, in transports of joy and praise, exclaimed, Jaya! Jaya! so that Parvati, not being able to bear his absence, set out to accompany Seeva, and in an instant was up with him; while the light which brightened on his countenance, on the arrival of Parvati, surpassed all imagination and description. The Genii of the eight regions, armed with all kinds of weapons, but particularly with agny-astra, or fire darts, like moving mountains, advanced in front of the army; and Eendra and other Devatas, some of them mounted on elephants, some on horses, others on chariots, or on camels or buffaloes, were stationed on each side, while all the other order of Devetas, to the amount of some lacks, formed the centre. The Munietuvaras, with long hair on their heads, like Saniasis, holding their staves in their hands, danced as they went along; the Syddyias, who revolve about the heavens, opening their mouths in praise of Seeva rained flowers upon his head; and the vaulted heaven, which is like an inverted goblet, being appointed in the place of a drum, exalted his dignity by its majestic resounding."

Throughout the Hindoo fables there is the constant mistake of bulk for sublimity.

*By the attribute of Deity, self-multiplied,
The Almighty Man appear'd on every side.*

XXIV. 2, p. 613.

This more than polypus power was once exerted by Krishna on a curious occasion.

It happened in Dwarka, a splendid city built by Viswakarma, by command of Krishna, on the sea-shore, in the province of Guzerat, that his musical associate, Nareda, had no wife or substitute; and he hinted to his friend the decency of sparing him one from his long catalogue of ladies. Krishna generously told him to win and wear any one he chose, not immediately in requisition for himself. Nareda accordingly went wooing to one house, but found his master there; to a second, — he was again forestalled; a third, the same; to a fourth, fifth, the same: in fine, after the round of sixteen thousand of these domiciliary visits, he was still forced to sigh and keep single; for Krishna was in every house, variously employed, and so domesticated, that each lady congratulated herself on her exclusive and uninterrupted possession of the ardent deity. — MOOR'S Hindu Pantheon, p. 204.

Eight of the chief gods have each their sacti, or energy, proceeding from them, differing from them in sex, but in every other respect exactly like them, with the same form, the same decorations, the same weapons, and the same vehicle. — Asiat. Res. 8vo edit. vol. viii. p. 68, 82.

The manner in which this divine power is displayed by Kehama, in his combat with Yamen, will remind some readers of the Irishman, who brought in four prisoners, and being asked how he had taken them, replied, he had surrounded them.

The Amreeta, or Drink of Immortality.

XXIV. 9, p. 614.

Mr. Wilkins has given the genuine history of this liquor, which was produced by churning the sea with a mountain.

"There is a fair and stately mountain, and its name is Meroo, a most exalted mass of glory, reflecting the sunny rays from the splendid surface of its gilded horns. It is clothed in gold, and is the respected haunt of Devs and Gandharvas. It is inconceivable, and not to be encompassed by sinful man; and it is guarded by dreadful serpents. Many celestial medicinal plants adorn its sides; and it stands, piercing the heaven with its aspiring summit, a mighty hill, inaccessible even by the human mind. It is adorned with trees and pleasant streams, and resoundeth with the delightful songs of various birds.

"The Soors, and all the glorious hosts of heaven, having ascended to the summit of this lofty mountain, sparkling with precious gems, and for eternal ages raised, were sitting in solemn synod, meditating the discovery of the Amreeta, the Water of Immortality. The Dev Narayan being also there, spoke unto Brahma, whilst the Soors were thus consulting together, and said, 'Let the Ocean, as a pot of milk, be churned by the united labor of the Soors and Asoors; and when the mighty waters have been stirred up, the Amreeta shall be found. Let them collect together every medicinal herb, and every precious thing, and let them stir the Ocean, and they shall discover the Amreeta.'

"There is also another mighty mountain, whose name is Mandar, and its rocky summits are like towering clouds. It is clothed in a net of the entangled tendrils of the twining creeper, and resoundeth with the harmony of various birds. Innumerable savage beasts infest its borders; and it is the respected haunt of Kennars, Devs, and Apsars. It standeth eleven thousand Yojan above the earth, and eleven thousand more below its surface.

"As the united bands of Devs were unable to remove this mountain, they went before Vreshnoo, who was sitting with Brahma, and addressed them in these words: 'Exert, O masters! your most superior wisdom to remove the mountain Mandar, and employ your utmost power for our good.'

'Veshnoo and Brahma having said, 'It shall be according to your wish,' he with the lotus eye directed the King of Serpents to appear; and Ananta arose, and was instructed in that work by Brahma, and commanded by Narayan to perform it. Then Ananta, by his power, took up that king of mountains, together with all its forests and every inhabitant thereof; and the Soors accompanied him into the presence of the Ocean, whom they addressed, saying, 'We will stir up thy waters to obtain the Amrecta.' And the Lord of the Waters replied, 'Let me also have a share, seeing I am to bear the violent agitation that will be caused by the whirling of the mountain!' Then the Soors and Asoors spoke unto Koorna-raj, the King of the Tortoises, upon the strand of the Ocean, and said, 'My lord is able to be the supporter of this mountain.' The Tortoise replied, 'Be it so;' and it was placed upon his back.

'So the mountain being set upon the back of the Tortoise, Eendra began to whirl it about as it were a machine. The mountain Mandar served as a churn, and the serpent Vasoukee for the rope; and thus in former days did the Dees, and Asoors, and the Danoos, begin to stir up the waters of the ocean for the discovery of the Amrecta.

'The mighty Asoors were employed on the side of the serpent's head, whilst all the Soors assembled about his tail. Ananta, that sovereign Dev, stood near Narayan.

'They now pull forth the serpent's head repeatedly, and as often let it go; whilst there issued from his mouth, thus violently drawing to and fro by the Soors and Asoors, a continual stream of fire and smoke and wind, which ascending in thick clouds, replete with lightning, it began to rain down upon the heavenly bands, who were already fatigued with their labor; whilst a shower of flowers was shaken from the top of the mountain, covering the heads of all, both Soors and Asoors. In the mean time the roaring of the ocean, whilst violently agitated with the whirling of the mountain Mandar by the Soors and Asoors, was like the bellowing of a mighty cloud. Thousands of the various productions of the waters were torn to pieces by the mountain, and confounded with the briny flood; and every specific being of the deep, and all the inhabitants of the great abyss which is below the earth, were annihilated; whilst, from the violent agitation of the mountain, the forest trees were dashed against each other, and precipitated from its utmost height, with all the birds thereon; from whose violent confrication a raging fire was produced, involving the whole mountain with smoke and flame, as with a dark-blue cloud, and the lightning's vivid flash. The lion and the retreating elephant are overtaken by the devouring flames, and every vital being and every specific thing are consumed in the general conflagration.

'The raging flames, thus spreading destruction on all sides, were at length quenched by a shower of cloud-borne water, poured down by the immortal Eendra. And now a heterogeneous stream of the concocted juices of various trees and plants ran down into the briny flood.

'It was from this milk-like stream of juices, produced from those trees and plants and a mixture of melted gold, that the Soors obtained their immortality.

'The waters of the Ocean now being assimilated with those juices, were converted into milk, and from that milk a kind of butter was presently produced; when the heavenly bands went again into the presence of Brahma, the granter of boons, and addressed him, saying, 'Except Narayan, every other Soor and Asoor is fatigued with his labor, and still the Amrecta doth not appear; wherefore the churning of the Ocean is at a stand.' Then Brahma said unto Narayan, 'Endue them with recruited strength, for thou art their support.' And Narayan answered and said, 'I will give fresh vigor to such as cooperate in the work. Let Mandar be whirled about, and the bed of the ocean be kept steady.'

'When they heard the words of Narayan, they all returned again to the work, and began to stir about with great force that butter of the ocean, when there presently arose from out the troubled deep, first the Moon, with a pleasing countenance, shining with ten thousand beams of gentle light; next followed Sree, the goddess of fortune, whose seat is the white

lily of the waters; then Soora-Devec, the goddess of wine, and the white horse called Oohisrava. And after these there was produced from the unctuous mass the jewell Koustoobh, that glorious sparkling gem worn by Narayan on his breast; also Pareerjat, the tree of plenty, and SooraShee, the cow that granted every heart's desire.

'The moon, Soora-Devec, the goddess of Sree, and the Horse, as swift as thought, instantly marched away towards the Dees, keeping in the path of the Sun.

'Then the Dev Dhamantaree, in human shape, came forth, holding in his hand a white vessel filled with the immortal juice Amrecta. When the Asoors beheld these wondrous things appear, they raised their tumultuous voices for the Amrecta, and each of them clamorously exclaimed, 'This of right is mine.'

'In the mean time Travat, a mighty elephant, arose, now kept by the god of thunder; and as they continued to churn the ocean more than enough, that deadly poison issued from its bed, burning like a raging fire, whose dreadful fumes in a moment spread throughout the world, confounding the three regions of the universe with the mortal stench, until Seev, at the word of Brahma, swallowed the fatal drug, to save mankind; which, remaining in the throat of that sovereign Dev of magic form, from that time he hath been called Neel-Kant, because his throat was stained blue.

'When the Asoors beheld this miraculous deed, they became desperate, and the Amrecta and the goddess Sree became the source of endless hatred.

'Then Narayan assumed the character and person of Mohence Moya, the power of enchantment, in a female form of wonderful beauty, and stood before the Asoors, whose minds being fascinated by her presence, and deprived of reason, they seized the Amrecta, and gave it unto her.

'The Asoors now clothe themselves in costly armor, and, seizing their various weapons, rush on together to attack the Soors. In the mean time Narayan, in the female form, having obtained the Amrecta from the hands of their leader, the hosts of Soors, during the tumult and confusion of the Asoors, drank of the living water.

'And it so fell out, that whilst the Soors were quenching their thirst for immortality, Rahoo, an Asoor, assumed the form of a Soor, and began to drink also; and the water had but reached his throat, when the Sun and Moon, in friendship to the Soors, discovered the deceit; and instantly Narayan cut off his head as he was drinking, with his splendid weapon Chakra. And the gigantic head of the Asoor, emblem of a mountain's summit, being thus separated from his body by the Chakra's edge, bounded into the heavens with a dreadful cry, whilst his ponderous trunk fell, cleaving the ground asunder, and shaking the whole earth unto its foundation, with all its islands, rocks, and forests; and from that time the head of Rahoo resolved an eternal enmity, and continueth, even unto this day, at times to seize upon the Sun and Moon.

'Now Narayan, having quitted the female figure he had assumed, began to disturb the Asoors with sundry celestial weapons; and from that instant a dreadful battle was commenced, on the ocean's briny strand, between the Asoors and the Soors. Innumerable sharp and missile weapons were hurled, and thousands of piercing darts and battle-axes fell on all sides. The Asoors vomit blood from the wounds of the Chakra, and fall upon the ground pierced by the sword, the spear, and spiked club. Heads, glittering with polished gold, divided by the Pattees' blade, drop incessantly; and mangled bodies, wallowing in their gore, lay like fragments of mighty rocks, sparkling with gems and precious ores. Millions of sighs and groans arise on every side; and the sun is overcast with blood, as they clash their arms, and wound each other with their dreadful instruments of destruction.

'Now the battle is fought with the iron-spiked club, and, as they close, with clinched fist; and the din of war ascendeth to the heavens. They cry, 'Pursue! strike! fell to the ground!' so that a horrid and tumultuous noise is heard on all sides.

'In the midst of this dreadful hurry and confusion of the fight, Nar and Narayan entered the field together. Narayan, beholding a celestial bow in the hand of Nar, it reminded him of his Chakra, the destroyer of the Asoors. The faithful weapon, by name Soodarsan, ready at the mind's call, flew down from heaven with direct and refulgent speed, beautiful, yet terrible to behold: and being arrived, glowing like the sacrificial flame, and spreading terror around, Narayan, with his right arm formed like the elephantine trunk, hurled forth the ponderous orb, the speedy messenger and glorious ruin of hostile towns; who, raging like the final all-destroying fire, shot bounding with desolating force, killing thousands of the Soors in his rapid flight, burning and involving, like the lament flame, and cutting down all that would oppose him. Anon he climbeth the heavens, and now again darteth into the field like a Peasach, to feast in blood.

“Now the dauntless Soors strive, with repeated strength, to crush the Soors with rocks and mountains, which, hurled in vast numbers into the heavens, appeared like scattered clouds, and fell, with all the trees thereon, in millions of fear-exciting torrents, striking violently against each other with a mighty noise; and in their fall the earth, with all its fields and forests, is driven from its foundation: they thunder furiously at each other as they roll along the field, and spend their strength in mutual conflict.

“Now Nar, seeing the Soors overwhelmed with fear, filled up the path to Heaven with showers of golden-headed arrows, and split the mountain summits with his unerring shafts; and the Soors, finding themselves again sore pressed by the Soors, precipitately flee; some rush headlong into the briny waters of the ocean, and others hide themselves within the bowels of the earth.

“The rage of the glorious Chakra, Soodarsan, which for a while burnt like the oil-fed fire, now grew cool, and he retired into the heavens from whence he came. And the Soors having obtained the victory, the mountain Mandar was carried back to its former station with great respect, whilst the waters also retired, filling the firmament and the heavens with their dreadful roarings.

“The Soors guarded the Amrecta with great care, and rejoiced exceedingly because of their success. And Eendra, with all his immortal bands, gave the water of life unto Narayan, to keep it for their use.” — MAHABHARAT.

Amrita, or Immortal, is, according to Sir William Jones, the name which the mythologists of Tibet apply to a celestial tree, bearing ambrosial fruit, and adjoining to four vast rocks, from which as many sacred rivers derive their several streams.

TACITUS Hist. lib. 3, c. 51.

TO GROSVENOR CHARLES BEDFORD,

THIS POEM IS INSCRIBED,

IN LASTING MEMORIAL OF A LONG AND UNINTERRUPTED FRIENDSHIP,

BY HIS OLD SCHOOLFELLOW,

ROBERT SOUTHEY.

As the ample Moon,
In the deep stillness of a summer even
Rising behind a thick and lofty Grove,
Burns like an unconsuming fire of light
In the green trees; and kindling on all sides
Their leafy umbrage, turns the dusky veil
Into a substance glorious as her own,
Yea, with her own incorporated, by power
Capacious and serene; — like power abides
In Man's celestial Spirit; Virtue thus
Sets forth and magnifies herself; thus feeds
A calm, a beautiful and silest fire,
From the encumbrances of mortal life,
From error, disappointment, — nay, from guilt;
And sometimes, so relenting Justice wills,
From palpable oppressions of Despair.

WORDSWORTH.

PREFACE.

THIS poem was commenced at Keswick, Dec. 2, 1809, and finished there July 14, 1814.

A French translation, by M. B. de S., in three volumes 12mo., was published in 1820, and another by M. le Chevalier * * *, in one volume 8vo., 1821. Both are in prose.

When the latest of these versions was nearly ready for publication, the publisher, who was also the printer, insisted upon having a life of the author prefixed. The French public, he said, knew nothing of M. Southey, and in order to make the book sell, it must be managed to interest them for the writer. The Chevalier represented as a conclusive reason for not attempting any thing of the kind, that he was not acquainted with M. Southey's private history. “Would you believe it?” says a friend of the translator's, from whose letter I transcribe what follows; “this was his answer verbatim: ‘N'importe, écrivez toujours; brodez, brodez-la un peu; que ce soit vrai ou non ce ne fait rien; qui prendra la peine de s'informer?’” Accordingly a Notice sur M. Southey was composed, not exactly in conformity with the publisher's notions of biography, but from such materials as could be collected from magazines and other equally unauthentic sources.

In one of these versions a notable mistake occurs, occasioned by the French pronunciation of an English word. The whole passage indeed, in both versions, may be regarded as curiously exemplifying the difference between French and English poetry.

“The lamps and tapers now grew pale,
And through the eastern windows slanting fell
The roseate ray of morn. Within those walls
Returning day restored no cheerful sounds
Or joyous motions of awakening life;
But in the stream of light the speckled motes
As if in mimicry of insect play,
Floated with mazy movement. Sloping down
Over the altar pass'd the pillar'd beam,
And rested on the sinful woman's grave
As if it enter'd there, a light from Heaven.
So be it! cried Pelayo, even so!
As in a momentary interval,
When thought expelling thought, had left his mind
Open and passive to the influxes
Of outward sense, his vacant eye was there,—
So be it, Heavenly Father, even so!
Thus may thy vivifying goodness shed
Forgiveness there; for let not thou the groans
Of dying penitence, nor my bitter prayers
Before thy mercy-seat, be heard in vain!
And thou, poor soul, who from the dolorous house
Of weeping and of pain, dost look to me
To shorten and assuage thy penal term,
Pardon me that these hours in other thoughts
And other duties than this garb, this night
Enjoin, should thus have past! Our mother-land
Exacted of my heart the sacrifice;
And many a vigil must thy son perform
Henceforth in woods and mountain fastnesses,
And tented fields, outwatching for her sake
The starry host, and ready for the work
Of day, before the sun begins his course.”*

Il se livrait à toutes ces réflexions, quand la lumière des lampes et des cierges commença à pâlir, et que les premières teintes de l'aurore se montrèrent à travers les hautes croisées tournées vers l'orient. Le retour du jour ne ramena point dans ces murs des sons joyeux ni les mouvemens de la vie qui se réveille; les seuls papillons de nuit, agitant leurs ailes pesantes, bourdonnaient encore sous les voûtes ténébreuses. Bientôt le premier rayon du soleil glissant obliquement par-dessus l'autel, vint s'arrêter sur la tombe de la femme pécheresse, et la lumière du ciel sembla y pénétrer. “Que ce présage s'accomplisse,” s'écria Pelage, qui absorbé dans ses méditations, fixait en ce moment ses yeux sur le tombeau de sa mère; “Dieu de miséricorde, qu'il en soit ainsi! Puisse ta bonté vivifiante y verser de même le pardon! Que les sanglots de la pénitence expirante, et que mes prières amères ne montent point en vain devant le trône éternel. Et toi, pauvre âme, qui de ton séjour douloureux de souffrances et de larmes, espères en moi pour abrégér et adoucir ton supplice, temporaire, pardonne moi d'avoir, sous ces habits et dans cette nuit, détourné mes pensées sur d'autres devoirs. Notre patrie comme a exigé de moi ce sacrifice, et ton fils doit dorénavant accomplir plus d'une velle dans la profondeur des forêts sur la cime des monts, dans les plaines couvertes de tentes, observant, pour l'amour de l'Espagne, la marche des astres de la nuit, et préparant l'ouvrage de sa journée avant que le soleil ne commence sa course.”—T. i. pp. 175—177.

In the other translation the motes are not converted into moths, — but the image is omitted.

Consumées dans des soins pareils les rapides heures s'écouloient, les lampes et les torches commençoient à pâlir, et l'oblique rayon du matin dorait déjà les vitraux élevés qui regardoient vers l'Orient: le retour du jour ne ramenoit point, dans cette sombre enceinte, les sons joyeux, ni le tableau mourant de la vie qui se réveille; mais, tombant d'en haut, le céleste rayon, passant au-dessus de l'autel, vint frapper le tombeau de la femme pécheresse. “Ainsi soit-il,” s'écria Pelage; “ainsi soit-il, ô dieu Créateur! Puisse ta vivifiante bonté verser ainsi le pardon en ce lieu! Que les gémissemens d'une mort pénitente, que mes amères prières ne soient pas arrivées en vain devant la trône de miséricorde! Et toi, qui, de ton séjour de souffrances et de larmes, regardes vers ton fils, pour abrégér et soulager tes peines, pardonne, si d'autres devoirs ont rempli les heures que cette nuit et cet habit m'enjoignoient de te consacrer! Notre patrie exigeoit ce sacrifice; d'autres vigiles m'attendent dans les bois et les défilés de nos montagnes; et bientôt sous la tente, il me faudra veiller, le soir, avant que le ciel ne se couvre d'étoiles, être prêt pour le travail du jour, avant que le soleil ne commence sa course.”—Pp. 92, 93.

A very good translation, in Dutch verse, was published in two volumes, 8vo, 1823-4, with this title:—“Rodrigo de Goth, Koning van Spanje. Naar het Engelsch van Southey gevolgd, door Vrouwe Katharina Wilhelmina Bilderdijk. Te 's Gravenhage.” It was sent to me with the following epistle from her husband, Mr. Willem Bilderdijk.

“Roberto Southey, viro spectatissimo,
Gulielmus Bilderdijk, S. P. D.

“Etsi ea nunc temporis passim invaluerit opinio, poetarum genus quam maxima gloria cupiditate flagrare, mihi tamen contraria semper insedit persuasio, qui divinæ Poëseos altitudinem veramque laudem non nisi ab iis cognosci putavi quorum præ cæteris e meliori luto fluxerit præcordia Titan, neque aut verè aut justè judicari vatem nisi ab iis qui eodem afflata moveantur. I went to Leyden in 1825, for the purpose of seeing the writer of this epistle, and the lady who had translated my poem, and addressed it to me in some very affecting stanzas. It so happened, that on my arrival in that city, I was laid up under a surgeon's care; they took me into their house, and made the days of my confinement as pleasurable as they were memorable. I have never been acquainted with a man of higher intellectual power, nor of greater learning, nor of more various and extensive knowledge than Bilderdijk, confessedly the most distinguished man of letters in his own country. His wife was worthy of him. I paid them another visit the following year. They are now both gone to their rest, and I shall not look upon their like again.

Soon after the publication of Roderick, I received the following curious letter from the Ettrick Shepherd, (who had passed a few days with me in the preceding autumn,) giving me an account of his endeavors to procure a favorable notice of the poem in the Edinburgh Review.

“Edinburgh, Dec. 15, 1814.

“MY DEAR SIR,

“I was very happy at seeing the post-mark of Keswick, and quite proud of the pleasure you make me believe my “Wake” has given to the beautiful and happy group at Greta Hall. Indeed, few things could give me more pleasure, for I left my heart a sojourner among them. I have had a higher opinion of matrimony since that period than ever I had before; and I desire that you will positively give my kindest respects to each of them individually.

“The Pilgrim of the Sun is published, as you will see by the Papers, and if I may believe some communications that I have got, the public opinion of it is high; but these communications to an author are not to be depended on.

“I have read Roderick over and over again, and am the more and more convinced that it is the noblest epic poem of the age. I have had some correspondence and a good deal of conversation with Mr. Jeffrey about it, though he does not agree with me in every particular. He says it is too long, and wants elasticity, and will not, he fears, be generally read, though much may be said in its favor. I had even teased him to let me review it for him, on account, as I said, that he could not appreciate its merits. I copy one sentence out of the letter he sent in answer to mine:—

““For Southey I have, as well as you, great respect, and when he will let me, great admiration; but he is a most provoking fellow, and at least as conceited as his neighbor Wordsworth. I cannot just trust you with his Roderick; but I shall be extremely happy to talk over that and other kindred subjects with you; for I am every way disposed to give Southey a lavish allowance of praise; and few things would give me greater pleasure than to find he had afforded me a fair opportunity. But I must do my duty according to my own apprehensions of it.”

“I supped with him last night, but there was so many people that I got but little conversation with him; but what we had was solely about you and Wordsworth. I suppose you have heard what a crushing review he has given the latter. I still found him persisting in his first asseveration, that it was heavy; but what was my pleasure to find that he had only got to the seventeenth division! I assured him he had the marrow of the thing to come at as yet, and in that I was joined by Mr. Alison. There was at the same time a Lady M—— joined us at the instant; short as her remark was, it seemed to make more impression on Jeffrey than all our arguments:— ‘Oh, I do love Southey!’ that was all.

“I have no room to tell you more. But I beg that you will not do any thing, nor publish any thing that will nettle Jeffrey for the present, knowing, as you do, how omnipotent he is with the fashionable world, and seemingly so well disposed toward you.

“I am ever yours most truly,

“JAMES HOGG.

“I wish the Notes may be safe enough. I never looked at them. I wish these large quartos were all in hell burning.”

The reader will be as much amused as I was with poor Hogg's earnest desire that I would not say any thing which might tend to frustrate his friendly intentions.

But what success the Shepherd met,
Is to the world a secret yet.

There can be no reason, however, for withholding what was said in my reply of the crushing review which had been given to Mr. Wordsworth's poem: — "He crush the Excursion!! Tell him he might as easily crush Skiddaw!" KESWICK, 15 June, 1833.

ORIGINAL PREFACE.

THE history of the Wisi-Goths for some years before their overthrow is very imperfectly known. It is, however, apparent that the enmity between the royal families of Chindasuintho and Wamba was one main cause of the destruction of the kingdom, the latter party having assisted in betraying their country to the Moors for the gratification of their own revenge. Theodofred and Favila were younger sons of King Chindasuintho; King Witiza, who was of Wamba's family, put out the eyes of Theodofred, and murdered Favila, at the instigation of that Chieftain's wife, with whom he lived in adultery. Pelayo, the son of Favila, and afterwards the founder of the Spanish monarchy, was driven into exile. Roderick, the son of Theodofred, recovered the throne, and put out Witiza's eyes in vengeance for his father; but he spared Orpas, the brother of the tyrant, as being a Priest, and Ebba and Sisibert, the two sons of Witiza, by Pelayo's mother. It may be convenient thus briefly to premise these circumstances of an obscure portion of history, with which few readers can be supposed to be familiar; and a list of the principal persons who are introduced, or spoken of, may as properly be prefixed to a Poem as to a Play.

- WITIZA, King of the Wisi-Goths; dethroned and blinded by Roderick.
- THEODOFRED, son of King Chindasuintho, blinded by King Witiza.
- FAVILA, his brother; put to death by Witiza. The Wife of Favila, Witiza's adulterous mistress.
- (These four persons are dead before the action of the poem commences.)*
- * * * * *
- RODERICK, the last King of the Wisi-Goths; son of Theodofred.
- PELAYO, the founder of the Spanish Monarchy; son of Favila.
- GAUDIOSA, his wife.
- GUISLA, his sister.
- FAVILA, his son.
- HERMESIND, his daughter.
- RUSILLA, widow of Theodofred, and mother of Roderick.
- COUNT PEDRO, . . . } powerful Lords of Cantabria.
- COUNT ECDON, . . . }
- ALPHONSO, Count Pedro's son, afterwards King.
- URBAN, Archbishop of Toledo.
- ROMANO, a Monk of the Caulian Schools, near Merida.
- ABDALAZIZ, the Moorish governor of Spain.
- EGILONA, formerly the wife of Roderick, now of ABULCACEM, . . . } [Abdalaziz.
- ALCAHMAN, }
- AYUB, } Moorish Chiefs.
- IBRAHIM, }
- MAGUED, }

- ORPAS, brother to Witiza, and formerly Archbishop of Seville, now a renegade.
- SISIBERT, } sons of Witiza and of Pelayo's mother.
- EBBA, }
- NUMACIAN, a renegade, governor of Gegio.
- COUNT JULIAN, . . . a powerful Lord among the Wisi-Goths, now a renegade.
- FLORINDA, his daughter, violated by King Roderick.
- * * * * *
- ADOSINDA, daughter of the Governor of Auria.
- ODOAR, Abbot of St. Felix
- SIVERIAN, Roderick's foster-father.
- FAVINIA, Count Pedro's wife.

The four latter persons are imaginary. All the others are mentioned in history. I ought, however, to observe, that Romano is a creature of monkish legends; and that that of Roderick's mother, Ruscilo, has been altered to Rusilla, for the sake of euphony.

I.

RODERICK AND ROMANO.

LONG had the crimes of Spain cried out to Heaven:
 At length the measure of offence was full.
 Count Julian call'd the invaders; not because Inhuman priests with unoffending blood
 Had stain'd their country; not because a yoke
 Of iron servitude oppress'd and gall'd
 The children of the soil: a private wrong
 Roused the remorseless Baron. Mad to wreak
 His vengeance, for his violated child,
 On Roderick's head, in evil hour for Spain,
 For that unhappy daughter, and himself,—
 Desperate apostate!—on the Moors he call'd;
 And like a cloud of locusts, whom the South
 Wafts from the plains of wasted Africa,
 The Mussulmen upon Iberia's shore
 Descend. A countless multitude they came;
 Syrian, Moor, Saracen, Greek renegade,
 Persian, and Copt, and Tatar, in one bond
 Of erring faith conjoin'd,—strong in the youth
 And heat of zeal,—a dreadful brotherhood,
 In whom all turbulent vices were let loose;
 While Conscience, with their impious creed accus'd
 Drunk as with wine, had sanctified to them
 All bloody, all abominable things.

Thou, Calpe, saw'st their coming; ancient Roek
 Renown'd, no longer now shalt thou be call'd
 From Gods and Heroes of the years of yore,
 Kronos, or hundred-handed Briareus,
 Bacchus, or Hercules; but doom'd to bear
 The name of thy new conqueror, and thenceforth
 To stand his everlasting monument.
 Thou saw'st the dark-blue waters flash before
 Their ominous way, and whiten round their keels;
 Their swarthy myriads darkening o'er thy sands.
 There, on the beach, the Misbelievers spread
 Their banners, flaunting to the sun and breeze;
 Fair shone the sun upon their proud array,
 White turbans, glittering armor, shields engrail'd
 With gold, and cimeters of Syrian steel;
 And gently did the breezes, as in sport,

Curl their long flags outrolling, and display
The blazon'd scrolls of blasphemy. Too soon
The gales of Spain from that unhappy land
Wafted, as from an open charnel-house,
The taint of death; and that bright sun, from fields
Of slaughter, with the morning dew drew up
Corruption through the infected atmosphere.

Then fell the kingdom of the Goths; their hour
Was come, and Vengeance, long withheld, went loose.

Famine and Pestilence had wasted them,
And Treason, like an old and eating sore,
Consumed the bones and sinews of their strength;
And, worst of enemies, their Sins were arm'd
Against them. Yet the sceptre from their hands
Pass'd not away inglorious, nor was shame
Left for their children's lasting heritage;
Eight summer days, from morn till latest eve,
The fatal fight endured, till perfidy
Prevailing to their overthrow, they sunk
Defeated, not dishonor'd. On the banks
Of Chrysus, Roderick's royal car was found,
His battle-horse Orelia, and that helm
Whose horns, amid the thickest of the fray
Eminent, had mark'd his presence. Did the stream

Receive him with the undistinguish'd dead,
Christian and Moor, who clogg'd its course that day?

So thought the Conqueror; and from that day forth,
Memorial of his perfect victory,
He bade the river bear the name of Joy.
So thought the Goths; they said no prayer for him,
For him no service sung, nor mourning made,
But charged their crimes upon his head, and cursed
His memory.

Bravely in that eight-days' fight
The King had striven, — for victory first, while hope

Remain'd, then desperately in search of death.
The arrows pass'd him by to right and left;
The spear-point pierced him not; the cimeter
Glanced from his helmet. Is the shield of Heaven,
Wretch that I am, extended over me?
Cried Roderick; and he dropp'd Orelia's reins,
And threw his hands aloft in frantic prayer, —
Death is the only mercy that I crave,
Death soon and short, death and forgetfulness!
Aloud he cried; but in his inmost heart
There answer'd him a secret voice, that spake
Of righteousness and judgment after death,
And God's redeeming love, which fain would save
The guilty soul alive. 'Twas agony,
And yet 'twas hope; — a momentary light,
That flash'd through utter darkness on the Cross
To point salvation, then left all within Dark as before. Fear, never felt till then,
Sudden and irresistible as stroke
Of lightning, smote him. From his horse he dropp'd,
Whether with human impulse, or by Heaven
Struck down, he knew not; loosen'd from his wrist
The sword-chain, and let fall the sword, whose hilt
Clung to his palm a moment ere it fell,
Glued there with Moorish gore. His royal robe,

His horned helmet and enamell'd mail,
He cast aside, and taking from the dead
A peasant's garment, in those weeds involved
Stole like a thief in darkness from the field.

Evening closed round to favor him. All night
He fled, the sound of battle in his ear
Ringing, and sights of death before his eyes,
With forms more horrible of eager fiends
That seem'd to hover round, and gulfs of fire
Opening beneath his feet. At times the groan
Of some poor fugitive, who, bearing with him
His mortal hurt, had fallen beside the way,
Roused him from these dread visions, and he call'd
In answering groans on his Redeemer's name,
That word the only prayer that pass'd his lips,
Or rose within his heart. Then would he see
The Cross whereon a bleeding Savior hung,
Who call'd on him to come and cleanse his soul
In those all-healing streams, which from his wounds,

As from perpetual springs, forever flow'd.
No hart e'er panted for the water-brooks
As Roderick thirsted there to drink and live;
But Hell was interposed; and worse than Hell —
Yea, to his eyes more dreadful than the fiends
Who flock'd like hungry ravens round his head, —
Florinda stood between, and warn'd him off
With her abhorrent hands, — that agony
Still in her face, which, when the deed was done,
Inflicted on her ravisher the curse
That it invoked from Heaven. — Oh, what a night
Of waking horrors! Nor, when morning came,
Did the realities of light and day
Bring aught of comfort; wheresoe'er he went
The tidings of defeat had gone before;
And leaving their defenceless homes to seek
What shelter walls and battlements might yield,
Old men with feeble feet, and tottering babes,
And widows with their infants in their arms,
Hurried along. Nor royal festival,
Nor sacred pageant, with like multitudes
E'er fill'd the public way. All whom the sword
Had spared were here; bed-ridden infirmity
Alone was left behind; the cripple plied
His crutches; with her child of yesterday
The mother fled, and she whose hour was come
Fell by the road.

Less dreadful than this view
Of outward suffering which the day disclosed,
Had night and darkness seem'd to Roderick's heart,
With all their dread creations. From the throng
He turn'd aside, unable to endure
This burden of the general woe; nor walls,
Nor towers, nor mountain fastnesses he sought;
A firmer hold his spirit yearn'd to find,
A rock of surer strength. Unknowing where,
Straight through the wild he hasten'd on all day,
And with unslacken'd speed was travelling still When evening gather'd round. Seven days, from morn

Till night, he travell'd thus; the forest oaks,
The fig-grove by the fearful husbandman
Forsaken to the spoiler, and the vines,
Where fox and household dog together now

Fed on the vintage, gave him food; the hand
Of Heaven was on him, and the agony
Which wrought within, supplied a strength beyond
All natural force of man.

When the eighth eve
Was come, he found himself on Ana's banks,
Fast by the Caolian Schools. It was the hour
Of vespers; but no vesper-bell was heard,
Nor other sound, than of the passing stream,
Or stork, who, flapping with wide wing the air,
Sought her broad nest upon the silent tower.
Brethren and pupils thence alike had fled
To save themselves within the embattled walls
Of neighboring Merida. One aged Monk
Alone was left behind; he would not leave
The sacred spot beloved, for having served
There, from his childhood up to ripe old age,
God's holy altar, it became him now,
He thought, before that altar to await
The merciless misbelievers, and lay down
His life, a willing martyr. So he staid
When all were gone, and duly fed the lamps,
And kept devotedly the altar dress'd,
And duly offer'd up the sacrifice.
Four days and nights he thus had pass'd alone,
In such high mood of saintly fortitude,
That hope of Heaven became a heavenly joy;
And now at evening to the gate he went,
If he might spy the Moors,—for it seem'd long
To tarry for his crown.

Before the Cross
Roderick had thrown himself; his body raised,
Half kneeling, half at length he lay; his arms
Embraced its foot, and from his lifted face
Tears streaming down bedew'd the senseless stone.
He had not wept till now; and at the gush
Of these first tears, it seem'd as if his heart,
From a long winter's icy thrall let loose,
Had open'd to the genial influences
Of Heaven. In attitude, but not in act
Of prayer he lay; an agony of tears
Was all his soul could offer. When the Monk
Beheld him suffering thus, he raised him up,
And took him by the arm, and led him in;
And there, before the altar, in the name
Of Him whose bleeding image there was hung,
Spake comfort, and adjured him in that name
There to lay down the burden of his sins.
Lo! said Romano, I am waiting here
The coming of the Moors, that from their hands
My spirit may receive the purple robe
Of martyrdom, and rise to claim its crown.
That God who willeth not the sinner's death
Hath led thee hither. Threescore years and five,
Even from the hour when I, a five-years' child,
Enter'd the schools, have I continued here,
And served the altar: not in all those years
Hath such a contrite and a broken heart
Appear'd before me. O my brother, Heaven
Hath sent thee for thy comfort, and for mine,
That my last earthly act may reconcile
A sinner to his God.

Then Roderick knelt
Before the holy man, and strove to speak.
Thou seest, he cried,—thou seest,—but memory

And suffocating thoughts repress'd the word,
And shudderings like an ague-fit, from head
To foot convulsed him; till at length, subduing
His nature to the effort, he exclaim'd,
Spreading his hands and lifting up his face,
As if resolved in penitence to bear
A human eye upon his shame,—Thou seest
Roderick the Goth! That name would have sufficed
To tell its whole abhorred history:
He not the less pursued,—the ravisher,
The cause of all this ruin! Having said,
In the same posture motionless he knelt,
Arms straighten'd down, and hands outspread, and eyes
Raised to the Monk, like one who from his voice
Awaited life or death.

All night the old man
Pray'd with his penitent, and minister'd
Unto the wounded soul, till he infused
A healing hope of mercy that allay'd
Its heat of anguish. But Romano saw
What strong temptations of despair beset,
And how he needed in this second birth,
Even like a yearling child, a fosterer's care.
Father in Heaven, he cried, thy will be done!
Surely I hoped that I this day should sing
Hosannahs at thy throne; but thou hast yet
Work for thy servant here. He girt his loins,
And from her altar took, with reverent hands,
Our Lady's image down: In this, quoth he,
We have our guide, and guard, and comforter,
The best provision for our perilous way.
Fear not but we shall find a resting-place;
The Almighty's hand is on us.

They went forth;
They cross'd the stream; and when Romano turn'd
For his last look toward the Caolian towers,
Far off the Moorish standards in the light
Of morn were glittering, where the miscreant host
Toward the Lusitanian capital
To lay their siege advanced; the eastern breeze
Bore to the fearful travellers far away
The sound of horn and tambour o'er the plain.
All day they hasten'd, and when evening fell,
Sped toward the setting sun, as if its line
Of glory came from Heaven to point their course.
But feeble were the feet of that old man
For such a weary length of way; and now
Being pass'd the danger, (for in Merida
Sacaru long in resolute defence
Withstood the tide of war,) with easier pace
The wanderers journey'd on; till having cross'd
Rich Tagus, and the rapid Zezere,
They from Albardos' hoary height beheld
Pine-forest, fruitful vale, and that fair lake
Where Alcoa, mingled there with Baza's stream,
Rests on its passage to the western sea,
That sea the aim and boundary of their toil.

The fourth week of their painful pilgrimage
Was full, when they arrived where from the land
A rocky hill, rising with steep ascent,
O'erhung the glittering beach; there, on the top,
A little, lowly hermitage they found,
And a rude Cross, and at its foot a grave,

Bearing no name, nor other monument.
 Where better could they rest than here, where faith,
 And secret penitence, and happiest death,
 Had bless'd the spot, and brought good Angels
 down,
 And open'd, as it were, a way to Heaven?
 Behind them was the desert, offering fruit
 And water for their need; on either side
 The white sand sparkling to the sun; in front,
 Great Ocean with its everlasting voice,
 As in perpetual jubilee, proclaim'd
 The wonders of the Almighty, filing thus
 The pauses of their fervent orisons.
 Where better could the wanderers rest than here?

II.

RODERICK IN SOLITUDE.

TWELVE months they sojourn'd in their solitude,
 And then beneath the burden of old age
 Romano sunk. No brethren were there here
 To spread the sackcloth, and with ashes strow
 That penitential bed, and gather round
 To sing his requiem, and with prayer and psalm
 Assist him in his hour of agony.
 He lay on the bare earth, which long had been
 His only couch; beside him Roderick knelt,
 Moisten'd from time to time his blacken'd lips,
 Received a blessing with his latest breath,
 Then closed his eyes, and by the nameless grave
 Of the fore-tenant of that holy place
 Consign'd him, earth to earth.

Two graves are here;
 And Roderick, transverse at their feet, began
 To break the third. In all his intervals
 Of prayer, save only when he search'd the woods
 And fill'd the water-cruise, he labor'd there;
 And when the work was done, and he had laid
 Himself at length within its narrow sides
 And measured it, he shook his head to think
 There was no other business now for him.
 Poor wretch, thy bed is ready, he exclaim'd,
 And would that night were come! — It was a task,
 All gloomy as it was, which had beguiled
 The sense of solitude; but now he felt
 The burden of the solitary hours:
 The silence of that lonely hermitage
 Lay on him like a spell; and at the voice
 Of his own prayers, he started, half aghast.
 Then, too, as on Romano's grave he sat
 And pored upon his own, a natural thought
 Arose within him, — well might he have spared
 That useless toil; the sepulchre would be
 No hiding-place for him; no Christian hands
 Were here who should compose his decent corpse
 And cover it with earth. There he might drag
 His wretched body at its passing hour;
 But there the Sea-Birds of her heritage
 Would rob the worm, or peradventure seize,
 Ere death had done its work, their helpless prey.
 Even now they did not fear him: when he walk'd
 Beside them on the beach, regardlessly

They saw his coming; and their whirring wings
 Upon the height had sometimes fann'd his cheek,
 As if, being thus alone, humanity
 Had lost its rank, and the prerogative
 Of man were done away.

For his lost crown
 And sceptre never had he felt a thought
 Of pain; repentance had no pangs to spare
 For trifles such as these, — the loss of these
 Was a cheap penalty; — that he had fallen
 Down to the lowest depth of wretchedness,
 His hope and consolation. But to lose
 His human station in the scale of things, —
 To see brute nature scorn him, and renounce
 Its homage to the human form divine; —
 Had then Almighty vengeance thus reveal'd
 His punishment, and was he fallen indeed
 Below fallen man, below redemption's reach, —
 Made lower than the beasts, and like the beasts
 To perish! — Such temptations troubled him
 By day, and in the visions of the night;
 And even in sleep he struggled with the thought,
 And waking with the effort of his prayers,
 The dream assail'd him still.

A wilder form
 Sometimes his poignant penitence assumed,
 Starting with force revived from intervals
 Of calmer passion, or exhausted rest;
 When floating back upon the tide of thought
 Remembrance to a self-excusing strain
 Beguiled him, and recall'd in long array
 The sorrows and the secret impulses
 Which to the abyss of wretchedness and guilt
 Led their unwary victim. The evil hour
 Return'd upon him, when reluctantly
 Yielding to worldly counsel his assent,
 In wedlock to an ill-assorted mate
 He gave his cold, unwilling hand: then came
 The disappointment of the barren bed,
 The hope deceived, the soul dissatisfied,
 Home without love, and privacy from which Delight was banish'd first, and peace too soon
 Departed. Was it strange that, when he met
 A heart attuned, — a spirit like his own,
 Of lofty pitch, yet in affection mild,
 And tender as a youthful mother's joy, —
 Oh, was it strange if, at such sympathy,
 The feelings, which within his breast repell'd
 And chill'd, had shrunk, should open forth like flowers

After cold winds of night, when gentle gales
 Restore the genial sun? If all were known,
 Would it indeed be not to be forgiven? —
 (Thus would he lay the unction to his soul,)
 If all were truly known, as Heaven knows all,
 Heaven, that is merciful as well as just, —
 A passion slow and mutual in its growth,
 Pure as fraternal love, long self-conceal'd,
 And when confess'd in silence, long-controll'd;
 Treacherous occasion, human frailty, fear
 Of endless separation, worse than death, —
 The purpose and the hope with which the Fiend
 Tempted, deceived, and madden'd him; — but then
 As at a new temptation would he start,
 Shuddering beneath the intolerable shame,

And elinch in agony his matted hair;
While in his soul the perilous thought arose,
How easy 'twere to plunge where yonder waves
Invited him to rest.

Oh for a voice
Of comfort,— for a ray of hope from Heaven!
A hand that from these billows of despair
May reach and snatch him ere he sink ingulf'd!
At length, as life, when it hath lain long time
Oppress'd beneath some grievous malady,
Seems to rouse up with re-collected strength,
And the sick man doth feel within himself
A second spring, so Roderick's better mind
Arose to save him. Lo! the western sun
Flames o'er the broad Atlantic; on the verge
Of glowing ocean rests; retiring then
Draws with it all its rays, and sudden night
Fills the whole cope of heaven. The penitent
Knelt by Romano's grave, and falling prone,
Clasp'd with extended arms the funeral mould.
Father! he cried; Companion! only friend,
When all beside was lost! thou too art gone,
And the poor sinner whom from utter death
Thy providential hand preserved, once more
Totters upon the gulf. I am too weak
For solitude,— too vile a wretch to bear
This everlasting commune with myself.
The Tempter hath assail'd me; my own heart
Is leagu'd with him; Despair hath laid the nets
To take my soul, and Memory, like a ghost,
Haunts me, and drives me to the toils. O Saint,
While I was bless'd with thee, the hermitage
Was my sure haven! Look upon me still,
For from thy heavenly mansion thou canst see
The suppliant; look upon thy child in Christ.
Is there no other way for penitence?
I ask not martyrdom; for what am I
That I should pray for triumphs, the fit meed
Of a long life of holy works like thine;
Or how should I presumptuously aspire
To wear the heavenly crown resign'd by thee,
For my poor sinful sake? Oh point me thou
Some humblest, painfulest, severest path,—
Some new austerity, unheard of yet
In Syrian fields of glory, or the sands
Of holiest Egypt. Let me bind my brow
With thorns, and barefoot seek Jerusalem,
Tracking the way with blood; there, day by day,
Inflit upon this guilty flesh the scourge,
Drink vinegar and gall, and for my bed
Hang with extended limbs upon the Cross,
A nightly crucifixion!— any thing
Of action, difficulty, bodily pain,
Labor, and outward suffering,— any thing
But stillness and this dreadful solitude!
Romano! Father! let me hear thy voice
In dreams, O sainted Soul! or from the grave
Speak to thy penitent; even from the grave
Thine were a voice of comfort.

Thus he cried,
Easing the pressure of his burden'd heart
With passionate prayer; thus pour'd his spirit forth,
Till, with the long, impetuous effort spent,
His spirit fail'd, and, laying on the grave
His weary head as on a pillow, sleep

Fell on him. He had pray'd to hear a voice
Of consolation, and in dreams a voice
Of consolation came. Roderick, it said,—
Roderick, my poor, unhappy, sinful child,
Jesus have mercy on thee! — Not if Heaven
Had opened, and Romano, visible
In his beatitude, had breathed that prayer; —
Not if the grave had spoken, had it pierced
So deeply in his soul, nor wrung his heart
With such compunctious visitings, nor given
So quick, so keen a pang. It was that voice
Which sung his fretful infancy to sleep
So patiently; which soothed his childish griefs,
Counsell'd, with anguish and prophetic tears,
His headstrong youth. And lo! his Mother stood
Before him in the vision; in those weeds
Which never from the hour when to the grave
She follow'd her dear lord Theodofred
Rusilla laid aside; but in her face
A sorrow that bespake a heavier load
At heart, and more unmitigated woe,—
Yea, a more mortal wretchedness than when Witiza's ruffians and the red-hot brass
Had done their work, and in her arms she held
Her eyeless husband; wiped away the sweat
Which still his tortures forced from every pore;
Cool'd his scorch'd lids with medicinal herbs,
And pray'd the while for patience for herself
And him, and pray'd for vengeance too, and found
Best comfort in her curses. In his dream,
Groaning he knelt before her to beseech
Her blessing, and she raised her hands to lay
A benediction on him. But those hands
Were chain'd, and casting a wild look around,
With thrilling voice she cried, Will no one break
These shameful fetters? Pedro, Theudemir,
Athanagild, where are ye? Roderick's arm
Is wither'd; — Chiefs of Spain, but where are ye?
And thou, Pelayo, thou our surest hope,
Dost thou, too, sleep? — Awake, Pelayo! — up! —
Why tarriest thou, Deliverer? — But with that She broke her bonds, and, lo! her form was changed!

Radiant in arms she stood! a bloody Cross
Gleam'd on her breastplate; in her shield display'd,
Erect a lion ramp'd; her helmed head
Rose like the Berecynthian Goddess crown'd
With towers, and in her dreadful hand the sword
Red as a firebrand blazed. Anon the tramp
Of horsemen, and the din of multitudes
Moving to mortal conflict, rang around;
The battle-song, the clang of sword and shield,
War-cries, and tumult, strife, and hate, and rage,
Blasphemous prayers, confusion, agony,
Rout, and pursuit, and death; and over all
The shout of victory, — Spain and Victory!
Roderick, as the strong vision master'd him,
Rush'd to the fight rejoicing: starting then,
As his own effort burst the charm of sleep,
He found himself upon that lonely grave
In moonlight and in silence. But the dream
Wrought in him still; for still he felt his heart
Pant, and his wither'd arm was trembling still;
And still that voice was in his ear which call'd
On Jesus for his sake.

Oh, might he hear
That actual voice! and if Rusilla lived, —
If shame and anguish for his crimes not yet
Had brought her to the grave, — sure she would bless

Her penitent child, and pour into his heart
Prayers and forgiveness, which like precious balm
Would heal the wounded soul. Nor to herself
Less precious, or less healing, would the voice
That spake forgiveness flow. She wept her son
Forever lost, cut off with all the weight
Of unrepented sin upon his head,
Sin which had weigh'd a nation down — what joy
To know that righteous Heaven had in its wrath
Remember'd mercy, and she yet might meet
The child whom she had borne, redeem'd, in bliss!
The sudden impulse of such thoughts confirm'd
That unacknowledged purpose, which till now
Vainly had sought its end. He girt his loins,
Laid holiest Mary's image in a cleft
Of the rock, where, shelter'd from the elements,
It might abide till happier days came on,
From all defilement safe; pour'd his last prayer
Upon Romano's grave, and kiss'd the earth
Which cover'd his remains, and wept as if
At long leave-taking, then began his way.

III.

ADOSINDA.

'Twas now the earliest morning; soon the Sun,
Rising above Albardos, pour'd his light
Amid the forest, and with ray aslant
Entering its depth, illumed the branchless pines,
Brighten'd their bark, tinged with a redder hue
Its rusty stains, and cast along the floor
Long lines of shadow, where they rose erect
Like pillars of the temple. With slow foot
Roderick pursued his way; for penitence,
Remorse which gave no respite, and the long
And painful conflict of his troubled soul,
Had worn him down. Now, brighter thoughts
arose,

And that triumphant vision floated still
Before his sight with all her blazonry,
Her castled helm, and the victorious sword
That flash'd like lightning o'er the field of blood.
Sustain'd by thoughts like these, from morn till eve
He journey'd, and drew near Leyria's walls.

'Twas even-song time, but not a bell was heard;
Instead thereof, on her polluted towers,
Bidding the Moors to their unhallow'd prayer,
The erier stood, and with his sohoreus voice
Fill'd the delicious vale where Lena winds
Through groves and pastoral meads. The sound, the sight

Of turban, girdle, robe, and cimeter,
And tawny skins, awoke contending thoughts
Of anger, shame, and anguish in the Goth;
The face of human-kind so long unseen
Confused him now, and through the streets he went
With hagg'd mien, and countenance like one

Crazed or bewilder'd. All who met him turn'd,
And wonder'd as he pass'd. One stopp'd him short
Put alms into his hand, and then desired,
In broken Gothic speech, the moon-struck man
To bless him. With a look of vacaney
Roderick received the alms; his wandering eye
Fell on the money; and the fallen King,
Seeing his own royal impress on the piece,
Broke out into a quick, convulsive voice,
That seem'd like laughter first, but ended soon
In hollow groans suppress'd: the Mussulman
Shrunk at the ghastly sound, and magnified
The name of Allah as he hasten'd on.
A Christian woman, spinning at her door,
Beheld him, and, with sudden pity touch'd,
She laid her spindle by, and running in,
Took bread, and following after, call'd him back,
And placing in his passive hands the loaf,
She said, Christ Jesus for his mother's sake
Have mercy on thee! With a look that seem'd
Like idioty he heard her, and stood still,
Staring awhile; then, bursting into tears,
Wept like a child, and thus relieved his heart,
Full even to bursting else with swelling thoughts.
So through the streets, and through the northern gate,

Did Roderick, reckless of a resting-place,
With feeble yet with hurried step pursue
His agitated way; and when he reach'd
The open fields, and found himself alone
Beneath the starry canopy of Heaven,
The sense of solitude, so dreadful late,
Was then repose and comfort. There he stopp'd
Beside a little rill, and brake the loaf;
And shedding o'er that long untasted food
Painful but quiet tears, with grateful soul
He breathed thanksgiving forth, then made his bed
On heath and myrtle.

But when he arose
At day-break, and pursued his way, his heart
Felt lighten'd that the shock of mingling first
Among his fellow-kind was overpast;
And journeying on, he greeted whom he met
With such short interchange of benison
As each to other gentle travellers give,
Recovering thus the power of social speech
Which he had long disused. When hunger press'd,
He ask'd for alms: slight supplication served;
A countenance so pale and woe-begone
Moved all to pity; and the marks it bore
Of rigorous penance and austerest life,
With something, too, of majesty that still Appear'd amid the wreck, inspired a sense
Of reverence too. The goat-herd on the hills
Open'd his scrip for him; the babe in arms,
Affrighted at his visage, turn'd away,
And clinging to the mother's neck in tears,
Would yet again look up, and then again
Shrink back, with cry renew'd. The bolder imps
Sporting beside the way, at his approach
Brake off their games for wonder, and stood still
In silence; some among them cried, A Saint!
The village matron, when she gave him food,
Besought his prayers; and one entreated him
To lay his healing hands upon her child,

For with a sore and hopeless malady
Wasting it long had lain, — and sure, she said
He was a man of God.

Thus travelling on,
He pass'd the vale where wild Arunca pours
Its wintry torrents; and the happier site
Of old Conimbrica, whose ruin'd towers
Bore record of the fierce Alani's wrath.
Mondego, too, he cross'd, not yet renown'd
In poet's amorous lay; and left behind
The walls at whose foundation pious hands
Of Priest, and Monk, and Bishop meekly toil'd, —
So had the insulting Arian given command.

Those stately palaces and rich domains
Were now the Moor's; and many a weary age
Must Coimbra wear the misbeliever's yoke,
Before Fernando's banner through her gate
Shall pass triumphant, and her hallow'd Mosque
Behold the hero of Bivar receive
The knighthood which he glorified so oft
In his victorious fields. Oh, if the years
To come might then have risen on Roderick's soul,
How had they kindled and consoled his heart! —
What joy might Douro's haven then have given,
Whence Portugal, the faithful and the brave,
Shall take her name illustrious! — what, those walls

Where Mumadona one day will erect
Convent, and town, and towers, which shall become
The cradle of that famous monarchy!
What joy might these prophetic scenes have given, —

What ample vengeance on the Mussulman,
Driven out with foul defeat, and made to feel
In Africa the wrongs he wrought to Spain;
And still pursued by that relentless sword,
Even to the farthest Orient, where his power
Received its mortal wound!

Oh years of pride!

In undiscoverable futurity,
Yet unevolved, your destined glories lay;
And all that Roderick in these fated scenes
Beheld, was grief and wretchedness, — the waste
Of recent war, and that more mournful calm
Of joyless, helpless, hopeless servitude.
'Twas not the ruin'd walls of church or tower,
Cottage, or hall, or convent, black with smoke;
'Twas not the unburied bones, which, where the dogs

And crows had strown then, lay amid the field
Bleaching in sun or shower, that wrung his heart
With keenest anguish: 'twas when he beheld
The turban'd traitor show his shameless front
In the open eye of Heaven, — the renegade,
On whose base, brutal nature, unredeem'd,
Even black apostasy itself could stamp
No deeper reprobation at the hour
Assign'd fall prostrate; and unite the names
Of God and the Blasphemer, — impious prayer, —
Most impious, when from unbelieving lips
The accurs'd utterance came. Then Roderick's
heart

With indignation burnt, and then he long'd
To be a King again, that so, for Spain
Betray'd and his Redeemer thus renounced,

He might inflict due punishment, and make
These wretches feel his wrath. But when he saw
The daughters of the land, — who, as they went
With cheerful step to church, were wont to show
Their innocent faces to all passers' eyes,
Freely, and free from sin as when they look'd
In adoration and in praise to Heaven, —
Now mask'd in Moorish mufflers, to the Mosque
Holding unaccompanied their jealous way,
His spirit seem'd at that unhappy sight
To die away within him, and he, too,
Would fain have died, so death could bring with it
Entire oblivion.

Rent with thoughts like these.

He reach'd that city, once the seat renown'd
Of Suevi kings, where, in contempt of Rome
Degenerate long, the North's heroic race
Raised first a rival throne; now from its state
Of proud regality debased and fallen.
Still bounteous nature o'er the lovely vale,
Where like a Queen rose Braeara august,
Pour'd forth her gifts profuse; perennial springs
Flow'd for her habitants, and genial suns,
With kindly showers to bless the happy clime,
Combined in vain their gentle influences;
For patient servitude was there, who bow'd
His neck beneath the Moor, and silent grief
That eats into the soul. The walls and stones
Seem'd to reproach their dwellers; stately piles
Yet undecay'd, the mighty monuments
Of Roman pomp, Barbaric palaces,
And Gothic halls, where haughty Barons late
Gladden'd their faithful vassals with the feast
And flowing bowl, alike the spoiler's now.

Leaving these captive scenes behind, he cross'd
Cavado's silver current, and the banks
Of Lima, through whose groves, in after years,
Mournful yet sweet, Diogo's amorous lute
Prolong'd its tuneful echoes. But when now,
Beyond Arnoya's tributary tide,
He came where Minho roll'd its ampler stream
By Auria's ancient walls, fresh horrors met
His startled view; for prostrate in the dust
Those walls were laid, and towers and temples stood

Tottering in frightful ruins, as the flame
Had left them black and bare; and through the streets,

All with the recent wreck of war bestrown,
Helmet and turban, cimeter and sword,
Christian and Moor in death promiscuous lay,
Each where they fell; and blood-flakes, parch'd and crack'd
Like the dry slime of some receding flood;
And half-burnt bodies, which allured from far
The wolf and raven, and to impious food
Tempted the houseless dog.

A thrilling pang,
A sweat like death, a sickness of the soul,
Came over Roderick. Soon they pass'd away,
And admiration in their stead arose,
Stern joy and inextinguishable hope,
With wrath, and hate, and sacred vengeance now
Indissolubly link'd. O valiant race,

O people excellently brave, he cried,
True Goths ye fell, and faithful to the last ;
Though overpower'd, triumphant, and in death
Unconquer'd ! Holy be your memory !
Bless'd and glorious now and evermore
Be your heroic names ! — Led by the sound,
As thus he cried aloud, a woman came Toward him from the ruins. For the love
Of Christ, she said, lend me a little while
Thy charitable help ! — Her words, her voice,
Her look, more horror to his heart convey'd
Than all the havock round ; for though she spake
With the calm utterance of despair, in tones
Deep breathed and low, yet never sweeter voice
Pour'd forth its hymns in ecstasy to Heaven.
Her hands were bloody, and her garments stain'd
With blood, her face with blood and dust defiled.
Beauty and youth, and grace and majesty,
Had every charm of form and feature given ;
But now upon her rigid countenance
Severest anguish set a fixedness
Ghastlier than death.

She led him through the streets
A little way along, where four low walls,
Heap'd rudely from the ruins round, enclosed
A narrow space : and there upon the ground
Four bodies, decently composed, were laid,
Though horrid all with wounds and clotted gore :
A venerable ancient, by his side
A comely matron, for whose middle age,
(If ruthless slaughter had not intervened,)
Nature, it seem'd, and gentle Time, might well
Have many a calm declining year in store ;
The third an arm'd warrior, on his breast
An infant, over whom his arms were cross'd.
There, — with firm eye and steady countenance,
Unflinching, she address'd him, — there they lie,
Child, Husband, Parents, — Adosinda's all !
I could not break the earth with these poor hands,
Nor other tomb provide, — but let that pass !
Auria itself is now but one wide tomb
For all its habitants : — What better grave ?
What worthier monument ? — Oh, cover not
Their blood, thou Earth ! and ye, ye bless'd Souls
Of Heroes and of murder'd Innocents,
Oh, never let your everlasting cries
Cease round the Eternal Throne, till the Most High
For all these unexampled wrongs hath given
Full, overflowing vengeance !

While she spake,
She raised her lofty hands to Heaven, as if Calling for justice on the Judgment-seat ;
Then laid them on her eyes, and, leaning on,
Bent o'er the open sepulchre.

But soon,
With quiet mien collectedly, like one
Who from intense devotion, and the act
Of ardent prayer, arising, girds himself
For this world's daily business she arose,
And said to Roderick, Help me now to raise
The covering of the tomb.

With half-burnt planks,
Which she had gather'd for this funeral use,
They roof'd the vault ; then, laying stones above,
They closed it down ; last, rendering all secure,

Stones upon stones they piled, till all appear'd
A huge and shapeless heap. Enough, she cried ;
And taking Roderick's hands in both her own,
And wringing them with fervent thankfulness,
May God show mercy to thee, she exclaim'd,
When most thou needest mercy ! Who thou art
I know not ; not of Auria, — for of all
Her sons and daughters, save the one who stands
Before thee, not a soul is left alive.
But thou hast render'd to me, in my hour
Of need, the only help which man could give.
What else of consolation may be found
For one so utterly bereft, from Heaven
And from myself must come. For deem not thou
That I shall sink beneath calamity :
This visitation, like a lightning-stroke,
Hath scathed the fruit and blossom of my youth ;
One hour hath orphan'd me, and widow'd me,
And made me childless. In this sepulchre
Lie buried all my earthward hopes and fears,
All human loves and natural charities ; —
All womanly tenderness, all gentle thoughts,
All female weakness too, I bury here,
Yea, all my former nature. There remain
Revenge and death : — the bitterness of death
Is past, and Heaven already hath vouchsafed
A foretaste of revenge.

Look here ! she cried,
And drawing back, held forth her bloody hands, —
'Tis Moorish ! — In the day of massacre,
A captain of Alcahman's murderous host Reserved me from the slaughter. Not because
My rank and station tempted him with thoughts
Of ransom, for amid the general waste
Of ruin all was lost ; — nor yet, be sure,
That pity moved him, — they who from this race
Accurs'd for pity look, such pity find
As ravenous wolves show the defenceless flock.
My husband at my feet had fallen ; my babe, —
Spare me that thought, O God ! — and then — even then,

Amid the maddening throes of agony
Which rent my soul, — when, if this solid Earth
Had open'd, and let out the central fire,
Before whose all-involving flames wide Heaven
Shall shrivel like a scroll, and be consumed,
The universal wreck had been to me
Relief and comfort ; — even then this Moor
Turn'd on me his libidinous eyes, and bade
His men reserve me safely for an hour
Of dalliance, — me ! — me in my agonies !
But when I found for what this miscreant child
Of Hell had snatch'd me from the butchery,
The very horror of that monstrous thought
Saved me from madness ; I was calm at once, —
Yet comforted and reconciled to life ;
Hatred became to me the life of life,
Its purpose and its power.

The glutton Moors
At length broke up. This hell-dog turn'd aside
Toward his home ; we travell'd fast and far,
Till by a forest edge at eve he pitched
His tents. I wash'd and ate at his command,
Foreing revolted nature ; I composed
My garments, and bound up my scatter'd hair ;

And when he took my hand, and to his couch
Would fain have drawn me, gently I retired
From that abominable touch, and said,
Forbear to-night, I pray thee, for this day
A widow, as thou seest me, am I made;
Therefore, according to our law, must watch
And pray to-night. The loathsome villain paused
Ere he assented, then laid down to rest;
While, at the door of the pavilion, I
Knelt on the ground, and bowed my face to earth;
But when the neighboring tents had ceased their stir,

The fires were out, and all were fast asleep,
Then I arose. The blessed Moon from Heaven
Lent me her holy light. I did not pray
For strength, for strength was given me as I drew
The cimeter, and standing o'er his couch,
Raised it in both my hands with steady aim,
And smote his neck. Upward, as from a spring
When newly open'd by the husbandman,
The villain's life-blood spouted. Twice I struck,
So making vengeance sure; then, praising God,
Retired amid the wood, and measured back
My patient way to Auria, to perform
This duty which thou seest

As thus she spake,

Roderick, intently listening, had forgot
His crown, his kingdom, his calamities,
His crimes,—so like a spell upon the Goth
Her powerful words prevail'd. With open lips,
And eager ear, and eyes which, while they watch'd
Her features, caught the spirit that she breathed,
Mute and enrapt he stood, and motionless;
The vision rose before him; and that shout,
Which, like a thunder-peal, victorious Spain
Sent through the welkin, rung within his soul
Its deep, prophetic echoes. On his brow
The pride and power of former majesty
Dawn'd once again, but changed and purified;
Duty and high heroic purposes
Now hallow'd it, and, as with inward light,
Illumed his meagre countenance austere.

Awhile in silence Adosinda stood,
Reading his alter'd visage and the thoughts
Which thus transfigured him. Ay, she exclaim'd,
My tale hath moved thee! it might move the dead,
Quicken captivity's dead soul, and rouse
This prostrate country from her mortal trance:
Therefore I live to tell it; and for this Hath the Lord God Almighty given to me
A spirit not mine own and strength from Heaven;
Dealing with me as in the days of old
With that Bethulian Matron when she saved
His people from the spoiler. What remains
But that the life which he hath thus preserved
I consecrate to him? Not veil'd and vow'd
To pass my days in holiness and peace;
Nor yet between sepulchral walls immured,
Alive to penitence alone; my rule
He hath himself prescribed, and hath infused
A passion in this woman's breast, wherein
All passions and all virtues are combined;
Love, hatred, joy, and anguish, and despair,
And hope, and natural piety, and faith,

Make up the mighty feeling. Call it not Revenge! thus sanctified, and thus sublimed,
'Tis duty, 'tis devotion. Like the grace
Of God, it came and saved me; and in it
Spain must have her salvation. In thy hands
Here, on the grave of all my family,
I make my vow.

She said, and, kneeling down,
Placed within Roderick's palms her folded hands.
This life, she cried, I dedicate to God,
Therewith to do him service in the way
Which he hath shown. To rouse the land against
This impious, this intolerable yoke,—
To offer up the invader's hateful blood,—
This shall be my employ, my rule and rite,
Observances and sacrifice of faith;
For this I hold the life which he hath given,
A sacred trust; for this, when it shall suit
His service, joyfully will lay it down.
So deal with me as I fulfil the pledge,
O Lord my God, my Savior, and my Judge.

Then rising from the earth, she spread her arms,
And looking round with sweeping eyes exclaim'd,
Auria, and Spain, and Heaven receive the vow!

IV.

THE MONASTERY OF ST. FELIX.

Trus long had Roderick heard her powerful words
In silence, awed before her; but his heart
Was fill'd the while with swelling sympathy,
And now with impulse not to be restrain'd
The feeling overpower'd him. Hear me too,
Auria, and Spain, and Heaven! he cried; and thou
Who risest thus above mortality,
Sufferer and patriot, saint and heroine,
The servant and the chosen of the Lord,—
For surely such thou art,—receive in me
The first-fruits of thy calling. Kneeling then,
And placing, as he spake, his hand in hers,
As thou hast sworn, the royal Goth pursued,
Even so I swear; my soul hath found at length
Her rest and refuge; in the invader's blood
She must efface her stains of mortal sin,
And in redeeming this lost land, work out
Redemption for herself. Herein I place
My penance for the past, my hope to come,
My faith and my good works; here offer up
All thoughts and passions of mine inmost heart,
My days and nights,—this flesh, this blood, this life,

Yea, this whole being, do I here devote
For Spain. Receive the vow, all Saints in Heaven,
And prosper its good end!—Clap now your wings,
The Goth with louder utterance, as he rose,
Exclaim'd,—clap now your wings exultingly,
Ye ravenous fowl of Heaven; and in your dens
Set up, ye wolves of Spain, a yell of joy;
For, lo! a nation hath this day been sworn
To furnish forth your banquet; for a strife

Hath been commenced, the which, from this day
 forth,
 Permits no breathing-time, and knows no end
 Till in this land the last invader bow
 His neck beneath the exterminating sword.

Said I not rightly? Adosinda cried;
 The will which goads me on is not mine own;
 'Tis from on high, — yea, verily of Heaven!
 But who art thou who hast profess'd with me,
 My first sworn brother in the appointed rule?
 Tell me thy name.

Ask any thing but that!
 The fallen King replied. My name was lost
 When from the Goths the sceptre pass'd away.
 The nation will arise regenerate;
 Strong in her second youth, and beautiful,
 And like a spirit which hath shaken off
 The clog of dull mortality, shall Spain
 Arise in glory. But for my good name
 No resurrection is appointed here.
 Let it be blotted out on earth: in Heaven
 There shall be written with it penitence,
 And grace, and saving faith, and such good deeds
 Wrought in atonement as my soul this day
 Hath sworn to offer up.

Then be thy name,
 She answer'd, Maccabee, from this day forth;
 For this day art thou born again; and like
 Those brethren of old times, whose holy names
 Live in the memory of all noble hearts
 For love and admiration, ever young, —
 So for our native country, for her hearths
 And altars, for her cradles and her graves,
 Hast thou thyself devoted. Let us now
 Each to our work — among the neighboring hills,
 I to the vassals of my father's house;
 Thou to Visonia. Tell the Abbot there
 What thou hast seen at Auria; and with him
 Take counsel who, of all our Baronage,
 Is worthiest to lead on the sons of Spain,
 And wear upon his brow the Spanish crown.
 Now, brother, fare thee well! we part in hope,
 And we shall meet again, be sure, in joy.

So saying, Adosinda left the King
 Alone amid the ruins. There he stood,
 As when Elisha, on the farther bank
 Of Jordan, saw that elder prophet mount
 The fiery chariot, and the steeds of fire,
 Trampling the whirlwind, bear him up the sky:
 Thus gazing after her did Roderick stand;
 And as the immortal Tishbite left behind
 His mantle and prophetic power, even so
 Had her inspiring presence left infused
 The spirit which she breathed. Gazing he stood,
 As at a heavenly visitation there
 Vouchsafed in mercy to himself and Spain;
 And when the heroic mourner from his sight
 Had pass'd away, still reverential awe
 Held him suspended there and motionless.
 Then turning from the ghastly scene of death
 Up murmuring Lona, he began toward
 The holy Bierzo his obedient way. [vale
 Sil's ample stream he cross'd, where through the

Of Orras, from that sacred land it bears
 The whole collected waters; northward then,
 Skirting the heights of Aguiar, he reach'd
 That consecrated pile amid the wild,
 Which sainted Fructuoso in his zeal
 Rear'd to St. Felix, on Visonia's banks.

In commune with a priest of age mature,
 Whose thoughtful visage and majestic mien
 Bespake authority and weight of care,
 Odoar, the venerable Abbot, sat,
 When ushering Roderick in, the Porter said,
 A stranger came from Auria, and required
 His private ear. From Auria? said the old man;
 Comest thou from Auria, brother? I can spare
 Thy painful errand then, — we know the worst.

Nay, answer'd Roderick, but thou hast not heard
 My tale. Where that devoted city lies
 In ashes, mid the ruins and the dead
 I found a woman, whom the Moors had borne
 Captive away; but she, by Heaven inspired
 And her good heart, with her own arm had wrought
 Her own deliverance, smiting in his tent
 A lustful Moorish miscreant, as of yore
 By Judith's holy deed the Assyrian fell.
 And that same spirit which had strengthen'd her
 Work'd in her still. Four walls with patient toil
 She rear'd, wherein, as in a sepulchre,
 With her own hands she laid her murder'd babe,
 Her husband and her parents, side by side;
 And when we cover'd in this shapeless tomb,
 There, on the grave of all her family,
 Did this courageous mourner dedicate
 All thoughts and actions of her future life
 To her poor country. For she said, that Heaven,
 Supporting her, in mercy had vouchsafed
 A foretaste of revenge; that, like the grace
 Of God, revenge had saved her; that in it
 Spain must have her salvation; and henceforth
 That passion, thus sublimed and sanctified,
 Must be to all the loyal sons of Spain
 The pole-star of their faith, their rule and rite,
 Observances and worthiest sacrifice.
 I took the vow, unworthy as I am,
 Her first sworn follower in the appointed rule;
 And then we parted; she among the hills
 To rouse the vassals of her father's house;
 I at her bidding hitherward, to ask
 Thy counsel, who, of our old Baronage,
 Shall place upon his brow the Spanish crown.

The Lady Adosinda? Odoar cried.
 Roderick made answer, So she call'd herself.

Oh, none but she! exclaim'd the good old man,
 Clasp'd his hands, which trembled as he spake,
 In act of pious passion raised to Heaven, —
 Oh, none but Adosinda! — none but she, —
 None but that noble heart, which was the heart
 Of Auria while it stood, its life and strength,
 More than her father's presence, or the arm
 Of her brave husband, valiant as he was.
 Hers was the spirit which inspired old age,
 Ambitious boyhood, girls in timid youth,

And virgins in the beauty of their spring,
 And youthful mothers, doting, like herself,
 With ever-anxious love. She breathed through all
 That zeal and that devoted faithfulness,
 Which to the invader's threats and promises
 Turn'd a deaf ear alike; which in the head
 And flood of prosperous fortune check'd his course,
 Repell'd him from the walls, and when at length
 His overpowering numbers forced their way,
 Even in that uttermost extremity
 Unyielding, still from street to street, from house
 To house, from floor to floor, maintain'd the fight;
 Till by their altars falling, in their doors,
 And on their household hearths, and by their beds
 And cradles, and their fathers' sepulchres,
 This noble army, gloriously revenged,
 Embraced their martyrdom. Heroic souls!
 Well have ye done, and righteously discharged
 Your arduous part! Your service is perform'd,
 Your earthly warfare done! Ye have put on
 The purple robe of everlasting peace!
 Ye have received your crown! Ye bear the palm
 Before the throne of Grace!

With that he paused,
 Checking the strong emotions of his soul.
 Then, with a solemn tone, addressing him,
 Who shared his secret thoughts, Thou knowest,
 he said,

O Urban, that they have not fallen in vain;
 For by this virtuous sacrifice they thinu'd
 Alcahman's thousands; and his broken force,
 Exhausted by their dear-bought victory,
 Turn'd back from Auria, leaving us to breathe
 Among our mountains yet. We lack not here Good hearts, nor valiant hands. What walls, or towers,

Or battlements are like these fastnesses,
 These rocks, and glens, and everlasting hills?
 Give but that Aurian spirit, and the Moors
 Will spend their force as idly on these holds
 As round the rocky girdle of the land
 The wild Cantabrian billows waste their rage.
 Give but that spirit! — Heaven hath given it us,
 If Adosinda thus, as from the dead,
 Be granted to our prayers!

And who art thou,
 Said Urban, who hast taken on thyself
 This rule of warlike faith? Thy countenance
 And those poor weeds bespeak a life ere this Devoted to austere observances.

Roderick replied, I am a sinful man,
 One who in solitude hath long deplored
 A life misspent; but never bound by vows,
 Till Adosinda taught me where to find
 Comfort, and how to work forgiveness out.
 When that exalted woman took my vow,
 She call'd me Maccabee; from this day forth
 Be that my earthly name. But tell me now,
 Whom shall we rouse to take upon his head
 The crown of Spain? Where are the Gothic Chiefs?
 Sacaru, Theudemir, Athanagild,
 All who survived that eight-days' obstinate fight,

When clogg'd with bodies, Chrysus scarce could force

Its bloody stream along? Witiza's sons,
 Bad offspring of a stock accurs'd, I know,
 Have put the turban on their recreant heads.
 Where are your own Cantabrian Lords? I ween,
 Eudon, and Pedro, and Pelayo now
 Have ceased their rivalry. If Pelayo live,
 His were the worthy heart and rightful hand
 To wield the sceptre and the sword of Spain.

Odoar and Urban eyed him while he spake,
 As if they wonder'd whose the tongue might be Familiar thus with Chiefs and thoughts of state.
 They scann'd his countenance, but not a trace
 Betray'd the Royal Goth: sunk was that eye
 Of sovereignty, and on the emaciate cheek
 Had penitence and anguish deeply drawn
 Their furrows premature, — forestalling time,
 And shedding upon thirty's brow more snows
 Than threescore winters in their natural course
 Might else have sprinkled there. It seems indeed
 That thou hast pass'd thy days in solitude,
 Replied the Abbot, or thou wouldst not ask
 Of things so long gone by. Athanagild
 And Theudemir have taken on their necks
 The yoke. Sacaru play'd a nobler part.
 Long within Merida did he withstand
 The invader's hot assault; and when at length,
 Hopeless of all relief, he yielded up
 The gates, disdain'd in his fathers' land
 To breathe the air of bondage, with a few
 Found faithful till the last, indignantly
 Did he toward the ocean bend his way,
 And shaking from his feet the dust of Spain,
 Took ship, and hoisted sail through seas unknown
 To seek for freedom. Our Cantabrian Chiefs
 All have submitted, but the wary Moor
 Trusteth not all alike. At his own Court
 He holds Pelayo, as suspecting most
 That calm and manly spirit; Pedro's son
 There too is held as hostage, and secures
 His father's faith; Count Eudon is despised,
 And so lives unmolested. When he pays
 His tribute, an uncomfortable thought
 May then perhaps disturb him; — or more like
 He meditates how profitable 'twere
 To be a Moor; and if apostasy
 Were all, and to be unbaptized might serve, —
 But I waste breath upon a wretch like this;
 Pelayo is the only hope of Spain,
 Only Pelayo.

If, as we believe,
 Said Urban then, the hand of Heaven is here,
 And dreadful though they be, yet for wise end
 Of good, these visitations do its work;
 And dimly as our mortal sight may scan
 The future, yet methinks my soul descries
 How in Pelayo should the purposes
 Of Heaven be best accomplish'd. All too long,
 Here in their own inheritance, the sons
 Of Spain have groan'd beneath a foreign yoke,
 Punic and Roman, Kelt, and Goth, and Greek:
 This latter tempest comes to sweep away
 All proud distinctions which commingling blood

And time's long course have fail'd to efface; and now

Perchance it is the will of Fate to rear
Upon the soil of Spain a Spanish throne,
Restoring in Pelayo's native line
The sceptre to the Spaniard.

Go thou, then,
And seek Pelayo at the Conqueror's Court.
Tell him the mountaineers are unsubdued;
The precious time they needed hath been gain'd
By Auria's sacrifice, and all they ask
Is him to guide them on. In Odoar's name
And Urban's, tell him that the hour is come.

Then, pausing for a moment, he pursued:—
The rule which thou hast taken on thyself
Toledo ratifies: 'tis meet for Spain,
And as the will divine, to be received,
Observed, and spread abroad. Come hither thou,
Who for thyself hast chosen the good part:
Let me lay hands on thee, and consecrate
Thy life unto the Lord.

Me! Roderick cried;
Me! sinner that I am!—and while he spake
His wither'd cheek grew paler, and his limbs
Shook. As thou goest among the infidels,
Pursued the Primate, many thou wilt find
Fallen from the faith; by weakness some betray'd,
Some led astray by baser hope of gain,
And haply, too, by ill example led
Of those in whom they trusted. Yet have these
Their lonely hours, when sorrow, or the touch
Of sickness, and that awful power divine
Which hath its dwelling in the heart of man,
Life of his soul, his monitor and judge,
Move them with silent impulse; but they look
For help, and finding none to succor them,
The irrevocable moment passeth by.
Therefore, my brother, in the name of Christ
Thus I lay hands on thee, that in His name
Thou with His gracious promises mayst raise
The fallen, and comfort those that are in need,
And bring salvation to the penitent.
Now, brother, go thy way: the peace of God
Be with thee, and his blessing prosper us!

V.

RODERICK AND SIVERIAN.

BETWEEN St. Felix and the regal seat
Of Abdalaziz, ancient Cordoba,
Lay many a long day's journey interposed;
And many a mountain range hath Roderick cross'd,
And many a lovely vale, ere he beheld
Where Betis, winding through the unbounded plain,
Roll'd his majestic waters. There, at eve,
Entering an inn, he took his humble seat
With other travellers round the crackling hearth,
Where heath and cistus gave their fragrant flame.
That flame no longer, as in other times,
Lit up the countenance of easy mirth

And light discourse: the talk which now went round

Was of the grief that press'd on every heart;
Of Spain subdued; the sceptre of the Goths
Broken; their nation and their name effaced;
Slaughter and mourning, which had left no house
Unvisited; and shame, which set its mark
On every Spaniard's face. One who had seen
His sons fall bravely at his side, bewail'd
The unhappy chance which, rescuing him from
death,

Left him the last of all his family;
Yet he rejoiced to think that none who drew
Their blood from him remain'd to wear the yoke,
Be at the miscreant's beck, and propagate
A breed of slaves to serve them. Here sat one
Who told of fair possessions lost, and babes
To goodly fortunes born, of all bereft.
Another for a virgin daughter mourn'd,
The lewd barbarian's spoil. A fourth had seen
His only child forsake him in his age,
And for a Moor renounce her hope in Christ.
His was the heaviest grief of all, he said;
And clinching, as he spake, his hoary locks,
He cursed King Roderick's soul.

Oh, curse him not!
Roderick exclaim'd, all shuddering as he spake.
Oh, for the love of Jesus, curse him not!
Sufficient is the dreadful load of guilt
That lies upon his miserable soul!
O brother, do not curse that sinful soul,
Which Jesus suffer'd on the cross to save!

But then an old man, who had sat thus long
A silent listener, from his seat arose,
And moving round to Roderick, took his hand;
Christ bless thee, brother, for that Christian speech,
He said; and shame on me that any tongue
Readier than mine was found to utter it!
His own emotion fill'd him while he spake,
So that he did not feel how Roderick's hand
Shook like a palsied limb; and none could see
How, at his well-known voice, the countenance
Of that poor traveller suddenly was changed,
And sunk with deadlier paleness; for the flame
Was spent, and from behind him, on the wall
High hung, the lamp with feeble glimmering play'd.

Oh, it is ever thus! the old man pursued;
The crimes and woes of universal Spain
Are charged on him; and curses, which should aim
At living heads, pursue beyond the grave
His poor unhappy soul! As if his sin
Had wrought the fall of our old monarchy!
As if the Mussulmen, in their career,
Would ne'er have overleap'd the gulf which parts
Iberia from the Mauritanian shore,
If Julian had not beckon'd them!—Alas!
The evils which drew on our overthrow,
Would soon by other means have wrought their
end,
Though Julian's daughter should have lived and died
A virgin vow'd and veil'd.

Touch not on that,

Shrinking with inward shiverings at the thought,
 The penitent exclaim'd Oh, if thou lovest
 The soul of Roderick, touch not on that deed!
 God, in his mercy, may forgive it him,
 But human tongue must never speak his name
 Without reproach and utter infamy,
 For that abhorred act. Even thou — But here
 Siverian taking up the word, brake off,
 Unwittingly, the incautious speech. Even I,
 Quoth he, who nursed him in his father's hall,—
 Even I can only for that deed of shame
 Offer in agony my secret prayers.
 But Spain hath witness'd other crimes as foul:
 Have we not seen Favila's shameless wife,
 Throned in Witiza's ivory car, parade
 Our towns with regal pageantry, and bid
 The murderous tyrant in her husband's blood
 Dip his adulterous hand? Did we not see
 Pelayo, by that bloody king's pursuit,
 And that unnatural mother, from the land
 With open outcry, like an outlaw'd thief,
 Hunted? And saw ye not Theodofred,
 As through the streets I guided his dark steps,
 Roll mournfully toward the noon-day sun
 His blank and senseless eyeballs? Spain saw this,
 And suffer'd it! — I seek not to excuse
 The sin of Roderick. Jesu, who beholds
 The burning tears I shed in solitude,
 Knows how I plead for him in midnight prayer.
 But if, when he victoriously revenged
 The wrongs of Chindasuintho's house, his sword
 Had not for mercy turn'd aside its edge,
 Oh what a day of glory had there been Upon the banks of Chrysus! Curse not him,
 Who in that fatal conflict to the last
 So valiantly maintain'd his country's cause;
 But if your sorrow needs must have its vent
 In curses, let your imprecations strike
 The caitiffs, who, when Roderick's horn'd helm
 Rose eminent amid the thickest fight,
 Betraying him who spared and trusted them,
 Forsook their King, their Country, and their God,
 And gave the Moor his conquest.

Ay! they said,

These were Witiza's hateful progeny;
 And in an evil hour the unhappy King
 Had spared the viperous brood. With that they talk'd

How Sisibert and Ebba through the land
 Guided the foe; and Orpas, who had cast
 The mitre from his renegado brow,
 Went with the armies of the infidels;
 And how in Hispalis, even where his hands
 Had minister'd so oft the bread of life,
 The circumcised apostate did not shame
 To show in open day his turban'd head.
 The Queen too, Egilona, one exclaim'd;
 Was she not married to the enemy,
 The Moor, the Misbeliever? What a heart
 Were hers, that she could pride and plume herself
 To rank among his herd of concubines, [say
 Having been what she had been! And who could
 How far domestic wrongs and discontent
 Had wrought upon the King! — Hereat the old man,

Raising beneath the knit and curly brow
 His mournful eyes, replied, This I can tell,
 That that unquiet spirit and unblest,
 Though Roderick never told his sorrows, drove Rusilla from the palace of her son.
 She could not bear to see his generous mind
 Wither beneath the unwholesome influence,
 And cankering at the core. And I know well,
 That oft, when she deplored his barren bed,
 The thought of Egilona's qualities
 Came like a bitter medicine for her grief,
 And to the extinction of her husband's line,
 Sad consolation, reconciled her heart.

But Roderick, while they communed thus, had ceased

To hear, such painfulest anxiety
 The sight of that old, venerable man
 Awoke. A sickening fear came over him:
 The hope which led him from his hermitage
 Now seem'd forever gone; for well he knew
 Nothing but death could break the ties which bound
 That faithful servant to his father's house.
 She then for whose forgiveness he had yearn'd,
 Who in her blessing would have given and found
 The peace of Heaven, — she then was to the grave
 Gone down disconsolate at last; in this,
 Of all the woes of her unhappy life
 Unhappiest, that she did not live to see
 God had vouchsafed repentance to her child.
 But then a hope arose that yet she lived;
 The weighty cause which led Siverian here
 Might draw him from her side; better to know
 The worst than fear it. And with that he bent
 Over the ambers, and with head half raised
 Aslant, and shadow'd by his hand, he said,
 Where is King Roderick's mother? lives she still?

God hath upheld her, the old man replied;
 She bears this last and heaviest of her griefs,
 Not as she bore her husband's wrongs, when hope
 And her indignant heart supported her;
 But patiently, like one who finds from Heaven
 A comfort which the world can neither give Nor take away. — Roderick inquired no more;
 He breathed a silent prayer in gratitude,
 Then wrapt his cloak around him, and lay down
 Where he might weep unseen.

When morning came,
 Earliest of all the travellers he went forth,
 And linger'd for Siverian by the way,
 Beside a fountain, where the constant fall
 Of water its perpetual gurgling made,
 To the wayfaring or the musing man
 Sweetest of all sweet sounds. The Christian hand,
 Whose general charity for man and beast
 Built it in better times, had with a cross
 Of well-hewn stone crested the pious work,
 Which now the misbelievers had cast down,
 And broken in the dust it lay defiled.
 Roderick beheld it lying at his feet,
 And gathering reverently the fragments up,
 Placed them within the cistern, and restored
 With careful collocation its dear form, —
 So might the waters, like a crystal shrine,

Preserve it from pollution. Kneeling then,
O'er the memorial of redeeming love
He bent, and mingled with the fount his tears,
And pour'd his spirit to the Crucified.

A Moor came by, and seeing him, exclaim'd,
Ah, Kaffer! worshipper of wood and stone,
God's curse confound thee! And as Roderick
turn'd

His face, the miscreant spurn'd him with his foot
Between the eyes. The indignant King arose,
And fell'd him to the ground. But then the Moor
Drew forth his dagger, rising as he cried,
What! dar'st thou, thou infidel and slave,
Strike a believer? and he aim'd a blow [arm,
At Roderick's breast. But Roderick caught his
And closed, and wrench'd the dagger from his hold,—

Such timely strength did those emaciate limbs
From indignation draw, — and in his neck
With mortal stroke he drove the avenging steel
Hilt deep. Then, as the thirsty sand drank in
The expiring miscreant's blood, he look'd around
In sudden apprehension, lest the Moors
Had seen them; but Siverian was in sight,
The only traveller, and he smote his mule,
And hasten'd up. Ah, brother! said the old man,
Thine is a spirit of the ancient mould!
And would to God a thousand men like thee
Had fought at Roderick's side on that last day
When treason overpower'd him! Now, alas!
A manly Gothic heart doth ill accord
With these unhappy times. Come, let us hide
This carrion, while the favoring hour permits.

So saying, he alighted. Soon they scoop'd
Amid loose-lying sand a hasty grave,
And levell'd over it the easy soil.
Father, said Roderick, as they journey'd on,
Let this thing be a seal and sacrament
Of truth between us. Wherefore should there be Concealment between two right Gothic hearts
In evil days like ours? What thou hast seen
Is but the first fruit of the sacrifice,
Which on this injured and polluted soil,
As on a bloody altar, I have sworn
To offer to insulted Heaven for Spain,
Her vengeance and her expiation. This
Was but a hasty act, by sudden wrong
Provoked: but I am bound for Cordoba,
On weighty mission from Visonia sent,
To breathe into Pelayo's ear a voice
Of spirit-stirring power, which like the trump
Of the Archangel, shall awake dead Spain.
The northern mountaineers are unsubdued;
They call upon Pelayo for their chief;
Odoar and Urban tell him that the hour
Is come. Thou, too, I ween, old man, art charged,
With no light errand, or thou wouldst not now
Have left the ruins of thy master's house.

Who art thou? cried Siverian, as he search'd
The wan and wither'd features of the King.
Thy face is of a stranger; but thy voice
Disturbs me like a dream.

Roderick replied,
Thou seest me as I am, — a stranger; one
Whose fortunes in the general wreck were lost,
His name and lineage utterly extinct,
Himself in mercy spared, surviving all; —
In mercy, that the bitter cup might heal
A soul diseased. Now, having cast the slough
Of old offences, thou beholdest me
A man new-born; in second baptism named,
Like those who in Judea bravely raised
Against the Heathen's impious tyranny
The banner of Jehovah, Maccabee;
So call me. In that name hath Urban laid
His consecrating hands upon my head;
And in that name have I myself for Spain
Devoted. Tell me now why thou art sent
To Cordoba; for sure thou goëst not
An idle gazer to the Conqueror's court.

Thou judgest well, the old man replied. I, too,
Seek the Cantabrian Prince, the hope of Spain,
With other tidings charged, for other end
Designed, yet such as well may work with thine.
My noble mistress sends me to avert
The shame that threatens his house. The renegade
Numacian, he who, for the infidels,
Oppresses Gegio, insolently woos
His sister. Moulded in a wicked womb,
The unworthy Guisla hath inherited
Her mother's leprous taint; and, willingly,
She to the circumcised and upstart slave,
Disdaining all admonishment, gives ear.
The Lady Gaudiosa sees in this,
With the quick foresight of maternal care,
The impending danger to her husband's house,
Knowing his generous spirit ne'er will brook
The base alliance. Guisla lewdly sets
His will at nought; but that vile renegade,
From hatred, and from avarice, and from fear,
Will seek the extinction of Pelayo's line.
This, too, my venerable mistress sees;
Wherefore these valiant and high-minded dames
Send me to Cordoba; that, if the Prince
Cannot, by timely interdiction, stop
The irrevocable act of infamy,
He may, at least, to his own safety look,
Being timely warn'd.

Thy mistress sojourns then
With Gaudiosa, in Pelayo's hall?
Said Roderick. 'Tis her natural home, rejoin'd
Siverian: Chindasuintho's royal race
Have ever shared one lot of weal or woe;
And she who hath beheld her own fair shoot,
The goodly summit of that ancient tree,
Struck by Heaven's bolt, seeks shelter now beneath
The only branch of its majestic stem
That still survives the storm.

Thus they pursued
Their journey, each from other gathering store
For thought, with many a silent interval
Of mournful meditation, till they saw
The temples and the towers of Cordoba
Shining majestic in the light of eve.
Before them, Betis roll'd his glittering stream,
In many a silvery winding traced afar

Amid the ample plain. Behind the walls
 And stately piles, which crown'd its margin, rich
 With olives, and with sunny slope of vines,
 And many a lovely hamlet interspersed,
 Whose citron bowers were once the abode of peace,
 Height above height, reeding hills were seen
 Imbued with evening hues; and over all
 The summits of the dark sierra rose,
 Lifting their heads amid the silent sky.
 The traveller who, with a heart at ease,
 Had seen the goodly vision, would have loved
 To linger, seeking with insatiate sight
 To treasure up its image, deep impress'd,
 A joy for years to come. O Cordoba,
 Exclaim'd the old man, how princely are thy towers,
 How fair thy vales, thy hills how beautiful!
 The sun who sheds on thee his parting smiles
 Sees not in all his wide career a scene
 Lovelier, nor more exuberantly blest
 By bounteous earth and heaven. The very gales
 Of Eden waft not from the immortal bowers
 Odors to sense more exquisite, than these
 Which, breathing from thy groves and gardens, now

Recall in me such thoughts of bitterness.
 The time has been when happy was their lot
 Who had their birthright here; but happy now
 Are they who to thy bosom are gone home,
 Because they feel not in their graves the feet
 That trample upon Spain. 'Tis well that age
 Hath made me like a child, that I can weep:
 My heart would else have broken, overcharged,
 And I, false servant, should lie down to rest
 Before my work is done.

Hard by their path,
 A little way without the walls, there stood
 An edifice, whereto, as by a spell, Siverian's heart was drawn. Brother, quoth he,
 'Tis like the urgency of our return
 Will brook of no retardment; and this spot
 It were a sin if I should pass, and leave
 Unvisited. Beseech you turn with me,
 The while I offer up one duteous prayer.

Roderick made no reply. He had not dared
 To turn his face toward those walls; but now
 He follow'd where the old man led the way.
 Lord! in his heart the silent sufferer said,
 Forgive my feeble soul, which would have shrunk
 From this,—for what am I that I should put
 The bitter cup aside! O let my shame
 And anguish be accepted in thy sight?

 VI.

RODERICK IN TIMES PAST.

THE mansion whitherward they went, was one
 Which in his youth Theodofred had built:
 Thither had he brought home, in happy hour,
 His blooming bride; there fondled on his knee
 The lovely boy she bore him. Close beside,

A temple to that Saint he rear'd, who first,
 As old tradition tells, proclaim'd to Spain
 The gospel-tidings; and in health and youth,
 There mindful of mortality, he saw
 His sepulchre prepared. Witiza took
 For his adulterous leman and himself
 The stately pile: but to that sepulchre,
 When from captivity and darkness death
 Enlarged him, was Theodofred consign'd;
 For that unhappy woman, wasting then
 Beneath a mortal malady, at heart
 Was smitten, and the Tyrant at her prayer
 This poor and tardy restitution made.
 Soon the repentant sinner follow'd him;
 And calling on Pelayo ere she died,
 For his own wrongs, and for his father's death,
 Implor'd forgiveness of her absent child,—
 If it were possible he could forgive
 Crimes black as hers, she said. And by the pangs
 Of her remorse,—by her last agonies,—
 The unutterable horrors of her death,—
 And by the blood of Jesus on the cross
 For sinners given, did she beseech his prayers
 In aid of her most miserable soul.
 Thus mingling sudden shrieks with hopeless vows,
 And uttering frantically Pelayo's name,
 And crying out for merey in despair,
 Here had she made her dreadful end, and here
 Her wretched body was deposited.
 That presenee seem'd to desecrate the place:
 Thenceforth the usurper shunn'd it with the heart
 Of conscious guilt; nor could Rusilla bear
 These groves and bowers, which, like funereal shades,
 Oppress'd her with their monumental forms:
 One day of bitter and severe delight,
 When Roderick came for vengeance, she endured,
 And then forever left her bridal halls.

Oh, when I last beheld you princely pile,
 Exclaim'd Siverian, with what other thoughts
 Full, and elate of spirit, did I pass
 Its joyous gates! The weedy which through
 The interstices of those neglected courts
 Uncheck'd had flourish'd long, and seeded there,
 Was trampled then and bruised beneath the feet
 Of thronging crowds. Here, drawn in fair array,
 The faithful vassals of my master's house,
 Their javelins sparkling to the morning sun,
 Spread their triumphant banners; high-plumed helms

Rose o'er the martial ranks, and prancing steeds
 Made answer to the trumpet's stirring voice;
 While yonder towers shook the dull silence off
 Which long to their deserted walls had elung,
 And with redoubling echoes swell'd the shout
 That hail'd victorious Roderick. Louder rose
 The acclamation, when the dust was seen
 Rising beneath his chariot-wheels far off;
 But nearer as the youthful hero came,
 All sounds of all the multitude were hush'd,
 And from the thousands and ten thousands here,
 Whom Cordoba and Hispalis sent forth,—
 Yea, whom all Bætica, all Spain pour'd out
 To greet his triumph,—not a whisper rose

To Heaven, such awe and reverence master'd
them,

Such expectation held them motionless.
Conqueror and King he came ; but with no joy
Of conquest, and no pride of sovereignty
That day display'd ; for at his father's grave
Did Roderick come to offer up his vow
Of vengeance well perform'd. Three coal-black steeds

Drew on his ivory chariot : by his side,
Still wrapt in mourning for the long-deceased,
Rusilla sat ; a deeper paleness blanch'd
Her faded countenance, but in her eye
The light of her majestic nature shone.
Bound, and expecting at their hands the death
So well deserved, Witiza follow'd them ;
Aghast and trembling, first he gazed around,
Wildly from side to side ; then from the face
Of universal execration shrunk,
Hanging his wretched head abased ; and poor
Of spirit, with unmanly tears deplored
His fortune, not his crimes. With bolder front,
Confiding in his priestly character,
Came Orpas next ; and then the spurious race
Whom in unhappy hour Favila's wife
Brought forth for Spain. O mercy ill bestow'd,
When Roderick, in compassion for their youth,
And for Pelayo's sake, forbore to crush
The brood of vipers !

Err perchance he might,
Replied the Goth, suppressing, as he spake,
All outward signs of pain, though every word
Went like a dagger to his bleeding heart ; —
But sure, I ween, that error is not placed
Among his sins. Old man, thou mayst regret
The mercy ill deserved, and worse return'd,
But not for this wouldst thou reproach the King !

Reproach him ? cried Siverian ; — I reproach
My child, — my noble boy, — whom every tongue
Bless'd at that hour, — whose love fill'd every heart
With joy, and every eye with joyful tears !
My brave, my beautiful, my generous boy !
Brave, beautiful, and generous as he was,
Never so brave, so beautiful, so great
As then, — not even on that glorious day,
When on the field of victory, elevate
Amid the thousands who acclaim'd him King,
Firm on the shield above their heads upraised,
Erect he stood, and waved his bloody sword —
Why dost thou shake thy head as if in doubt ?
I do not dream, nor fable ! Ten short years
Have scarcely past away, since all within
The Pyrenean hills, and the three seas
Which girdled Spain, echoed in one response
The acclamation from that field of fight —
Or doth aught ail thee, that thy body quakes
And shudders thus ?

'Tis but a chill, replied
The King, in passing from the open air
Under the shadow of this thick-set grove.

Oh ! if this scene awoke in thee such thoughts
As swell my bosom here, the old man pursued,
Sunshine, or shade, and all things from without,

Would be alike indifferent. Gracious God,
Only but ten short years, — and all so changed !
Ten little years since in yon court he check'd
His fiery steeds. The steeds obey'd his hand,
The whirling wheels stood still, and when he leap'd

Upon the pavement, the whole people heard,
In their deep silence, open-ear'd, the sound.
With slower movement from the ivory seat
Rusilla rose, her arm, as down she stepp'd,
Extended to her son's supporting hand ;
Not for default of firm or agile strength,
But that the feeling of that solemn hour
Subdued her then, and tears bedim'd her sight.
Howbeit when to her husband's grave she came,
On the sepulchral stone she bow'd her head
Awhile ; then rose collectedly, and fix'd
Upon the scene her calm and steady eye.
Roderick, — oh, when did valor wear a form
So beautiful, so noble, so august ?
Or vengeance, when did it put on before
A character so awful, so divine ?

Roderick stood up, and reaching to the tomb
His hands, my hero cried, Theodofred !
Father ! I stand before thee once again,
According to thy prayer, when kneeling down
Between thy knees I took my last farewell ;
And vow'd by all thy sufferings, all thy wrongs,
And by my mother's days and nights of woe,
Her silent anguish, and the grief which then
Even from thee she did not seek to hide,
That, if our cruel parting should avail
To save me from the Tyrant's jealous guilt,
Surely should my avenging sword fulfil
Whate'er he omen'd. Oh that time, I cried,
Would give the strength of manhood to this arm,
Already would it find a manly heart
To guide it to its purpose ! And I swore
Never again to see my father's face,
Nor ask my mother's blessing, till I brought,
Dead or in chains, the Tyrant to thy feet.
Boy as I was, before all Saints in Heaven,
And highest God, whose justice slumbereth not,
I made the vow. According to thy prayer,
In all things, O my father, is that vow
Perform'd, alas, too well ! for thou didst pray,
While, looking up, I felt the burning tears
Which from thy sightless sockets stream'd, drop
down, —

That to thy grave, and not thy living feet,
The oppressor might be led. Behold him there,
Father ! Theodofred ! no longer now
In darkness, from thy heavenly seat look down,
And see before thy grave thine enemy
In bonds, awaiting judgment at my hand !

Thus while the hero spake, Witiza stood
Listening in agony, with open mouth,
And head, half-raised, toward his sentence turn'd ;
His eyelids stiffen'd and pursed up, — his eyes
Rigid, and wild, and wide ; and when the King
Had ceased, amid the silence which ensued,
The dastard's chains were heard, link against link
Clinking. At length upon his knees he fell,
And lifting up his trembling hands, outstretch'd

In supplication, — Mercy ! he exclaim'd, — Chains, dungeons, darkness, — any thing but death ! —

I did not touch his life.

Roderick replied,
His hour, whenever it had come, had found
A soul prepared : he lived in peace with Heaven ;
And life prolong'd for him, was bliss delay'd.
But life, in pain, and darkness, and despair,
For thee, all leprous as thou art with crimes,
Is mercy. — Take him hence, and let him see
The light of day no more !

Such Roderick was
When last I saw these courts, — his theatre
Of glory ; — such when last I visited
My master's grave ! Ten years have hardly held Their course, ten little years — break, break, old
heart —

Oh, why art thou so tough ?

As thus he spake,
They reach'd the church. The door before his hand

Gave way ; both blinded with their tears, they went Straight to the tomb ; and there Siverian knelt,
And bow'd his face upon the sepulchre,
Weeping aloud ; while Roderick, overpower'd,
And calling upon earth to cover him,
Threw himself prostrate on his father's grave.

Thus as they lay, an awful voice, in tones
Severe, address'd them. Who are ye, it said,
That with your passion thus, and on this night,
Disturb my prayers ? Starting they rose ; there stood

A man before them of majestic form
And stature, clad in sackcloth, bare of foot,
Pale and in tears, with ashes on his head.

VII.

RODERICK AND PELAYO.

'Twas not in vain that on her absent son,
Pelayo's mother, from the bed of death,
Call'd for forgiveness, and in agony
Besought his prayers ; all guilty as she was,
Sure he had not been human, if that cry
Had fail'd to pierce him. When he heard the tale,
He bless'd the messenger, even while his speech
Was faltering, — while from head to foot he shook
With icy feelings from his inmost heart
Effused. It changed the nature of his woe,
Making the burden more endurable :
The life-long sorrow that remain'd, became
A healing and a chastening grief, and brought
His soul, in close communion, nearer Heaven.
For he had been her first-born, and the love
Which at her breast he drew, and from her smiles,
And from her voice of tenderness imbibed,
Gave such unnatural horror to her crimes,
That when the thought came over him, it seem'd
As if the milk which with his infant life
Had blended thrill'd like poison through his frame.

It was a woe beyond all reach of hope,
'Till with the dreadful tale of her remorse
Faith touch'd his heart ; and ever from that day
Did he for her who bore him, night and morn,
Pour out the anguish of his soul in prayer :
But chiefly as the night return'd, which heard
Her last expiring groans of penitence,
Then through the long and painful hours, before
The altar, like a penitent himself,
He kept his vigils ; and when Roderick's sword
Subdued Witiza, and the land was free,
Duly upon her grave he offer'd up
His yearly sacrifice of agony
And prayer. This was the night, and he it was
Who now before Siverian and the King
Stood up in sackcloth.

The old man, from fear
Recovering and from wonder, knew him first.
It is the Prince ! he cried, and bending down,
Embraced his knees. The action and the word
Awaken'd Roderick ; he shook off the load
Of struggling thoughts, which, pressing on his heart,
Held him like one entranced ; yet, all untaught
To bend before the face of man, confused
Awhile he stood, forgetful of his part.
But when Siverian cried, My Lord, my Lord,
Now God be praised that I have found thee thus,
My Lord and Prince, Spain's only hope and mine !
Then Roderick, echoing him, exclaim'd, My Lord,
And Prince, Pelayo ! — and approaching near,
He bent his knee obeisant : but his head
Earthward inclined ; while the old man, looking up
From his low gesture to Pelayo's face,
Wept at beholding him for grief and joy.

Siverian ! cried the chief, — of whom hath Death
Bereaved me, that thou comest to Cordoba ?
Children, or wife ? — Or hath the merciless scythe
Of this abhorr'd and jealous tyranny
Made my house desolate at one wide sweep ?

They are as thou couldst wish, the old man
replied,
Wert thou but lord of thine own house again,
And Spain were Spain once more. A tale of ill
I bear, but one that touches not the renege
Like what thy tears forebode. The renegade
Numacian woos thy sister, and she lends
To the vile slave, unworthily, her ear :
The Lady Gaudiosa hath in vain
Warn'd her of all the evils which await
A union thus accurs'd : she sets at nought
Her faith, her lineage, and thy certain wrath.

Pelayo, hearing him, remain'd awhile
Silent ; then turning to his mother's grave, —
O thou poor dust, hath then the infectious taint
Survived thy dread remorse, that it should run
In Guisla's veins ? he cried ; — I should have heard
This shameful sorrow any where but here ? —
Humble thyself, proud heart ; thou, gracious
Heaven,
Be merciful ! — it is the original flaw, —
And what are we ? — a weak, unhappy race,

Born to our sad inheritance of sin
 And death! — He smote his forehead as he spake,
 And from his head the ashes fell, like snow
 Shaken from some dry beech-leaves, when a bird Lights on the bending spray. A little while
 In silence, rather than in thought, he stood
 Passive beneath the sorrow: turning then,
 And what doth Gaudiosa counsel me?
 He ask'd the old man; for she hath ever been
 My wise and faithful counsellor. — He replied,
 The Lady Gaudiosa bade me say
 She sees the danger which on every part Besets her husband's house. — Here she had ceased;
 But when my noble Mistress gave in charge,
 How I should tell thee that in evil times
 The bravest counsels ever are the best,
 Then that high-minded Lady thus rejoined: —
 Whatever be my Lord's resolve, he knows
 I bear a mind prepared.

Brave spirits! cried
 Pelayo, worthy to remove all stain
 Of weakness from their sex! I should be less
 Than man, if, drawing strength where others find
 Their hearts most open to assault of fear,
 I quail'd at danger. Never be it said
 Of Spain, that in the hour of her distress
 Her women were as heroes, but her men
 Perform'd the woman's part.

Roderick at that
 Look'd up, and taking up the word, exclaim'd,
 O Prince, in better days the pride of Spain,
 And prostrate as she lies, her surest hope,
 Hear now my tale. The fire which seem'd extinct
 Hath risen revigorate: a living spark
 From Auria's ashes, by a woman's hand
 Preserved and quicken'd, kindles far and wide
 The beacon-flame o'er all the Asturian hills.
 There hath a vow been offer'd up, which binds
 Us and our children's children to the work
 Of holy hatred. In the name of Spain
 That vow hath been pronounced, and register'd
 Above, to be the bond whereby we stand
 For condemnation or acceptance. Heaven
 Received the irrevocable vow, and Earth
 Must witness its fulfilment; Earth and Heaven
 Call upon thee, Pelayo! Upon thee
 The spirits of thy royal ancestors
 Look down expectant; unto thee, from fields
 Laid waste, and hamlets burnt, and cities sack'd,
 The blood of infancy and helpless age
 Cries out; thy native mountains call for thee,
 Echoing from all their arm'd sons thy name.
 And deem not thou that hot impatience goads
 Thy countrymen to counsels immature.
 Odoar and Urban from Visonia's banks
 Send me, their sworn and trusted messenger,
 To summon thee, and tell thee in their name
 That now the hour is come: For sure it seems,
 Thus saith the Primate, Heaven's high will to rear
 Upon the soil of Spain a Spanish throne,
 Restoring in thy native line, O Prince,
 The sceptre to the Spaniard. Worthy son
 Of that most ancient and heroic race,
 Which with unweariable endurance still

Hath striven against its mightier enemies,
 Roman or Carthaginian, Greek or Goth;
 So often by superior arms oppress'd,
 More often by superior arts beguiled;
 Yet, amid all its sufferings, all the waste
 Of sword and fire remorselessly employ'd,
 Unconquer'd and unconquerable still; —
 Son of that injured and illustrious stock,
 Stand forward thou, draw forth the sword of Spain,
 Restore them to their rights, too long withheld,
 And place upon thy brow the Spanish crown.

When Roderick ceased, the princely Mountaineer
 Gazed on the passionate orator awhile,
 With eyes intently fix'd, and thoughtful brow;
 Then turning to the altar, he let fall
 The sackcloth robe, which late, with folded arms,
 Against his heart was press'd; and stretching forth
 His hands toward the crucifix, exclaim'd,
 My God and my Redeemer! where but here,
 Before thy awful presence, in this garb,
 With penitential ashes thus bestrown,
 Could I so fitly answer to the call
 Of Spain, and for her sake, and in thy name,
 Accept the Crown of Thorns she proffers me?

And where but here, said Roderick in his heart,
 Could I so properly, with humbled knee
 And willing soul, confirm my forfeiture? —
 The action follow'd on that secret thought:
 He knelt, and took Pelayo's hand, and cried,
 First of the Spaniards, let me with this kiss
 Do homage to thee here, my Lord and King! —
 With voice unchanged and steady countenance
 He spake; but when Siverian follow'd him,
 The old man trembled as his lips pronounced
 The faltering vow; and rising he exclaim'd,
 God grant thee, O my Prince, a better fate
 Than thy poor kinsman's, who in happier days Received thy homage here! Grief choked his speech,
 And, bursting into tears, he sobb'd aloud.
 Tears too adown Pelayo's manly cheek
 Roll'd silently. Roderick alone appear'd
 Unmoved and calm; for now the royal Goth
 Had offer'd his accepted sacrifice,
 And therefore in his soul he felt that peace
 Which follows painful duty well perform'd, —
 Perfect and heavenly peace, — the peace of God.

VIII.

ALPHONSO.

Fain would Pelayo have that hour obey'd
 The call, commencing his adventurous flight,
 As one whose soul impatiently endured
 His country's thralldom, and in daily prayer
 Imploring her deliverance, cried to Heaven,
 How long, O Lord, how long! — But other thoughts
 Curbing his spirit, made him yet awhile
 Sustain the weight of bondage. Him alone,

Of all the Gothic baronage, the Moors
 Watch'd with regard of wary policy, —
 Knowing his powerful name, his noble mind,
 And how in him the old Iberian blood,
 Of royal and remotest ancestry,
 From undisputed source flow'd undefiled;
 His mother's after-guilt attainting not
 The claim legitimate he derived from her,
 Her first-born in her time of innocence.
 He, too, of Chindasuintho's regal line
 Sole remnant now, drew after him the love
 Of all true Goths, uniting in himself
 Thus, by this double right, the general heart
 Of Spain. For this the renegado crew,
 Wretches in whom their conscious guilt and fear
 Engender'd cruelest hatred, still advised
 The extinction of Pelayo's house; but most
 The apostate Prelate, in iniquity
 Witiza's genuine brother as in blood,
 Orpas, pursued his life. He never ceased
 With busy zeal, true traitor, to infuse
 His deadly rancor in the Moorish chief;
 Their only danger, ever he observed,
 Was from Pelayo; root his lineage out,
 The Caliph's empire then would be secure,
 And universal Spain, all hope of change
 Being lost, receive the Prophet's conquering law.
 Then did the Arch-villain urge the Moor at once
 To cut off future peril, telling him
 Death was a trusty keeper, and that none
 E'er broke the prison of the grave. But here
 Keen malice overshot its mark; the Moor,
 Who from the plunder of their native land
 Had bought the recreant crew that join'd his arms,
 Or cheaplier with their own possessions bribed
 Their sordid souls, saw through the flimsy show
 Of policy wherewith they sought to cloak
 Old enmity and selfish aims: he scorn'd
 To let their private purposes incline
 His counsels, and believing Spain subdued,
 Smiled, in the pride of power and victory,
 Disdainful at the thought of further strife.
 Howbeit he held Pelayo at his court,
 And told him that, until his countrymen
 Submissively should lay their weapons down,
 He from his children and paternal hearth
 Apart must dwell; nor hope to see again
 His native mountains and their vales beloved,
 Till all the Asturian and Cantabrian hills
 Had bow'd before the Caliph; Cordoba
 Must be his nightly prison till that hour
 This night, by special favor from the Moor
 Ask'd and vouchsafed he past without the walls,
 Keeping his yearly vigil; on this night,
 Therefore, the princely Spaniard could not fly,
 Being thus in strongest bonds by honor held;
 Nor would he by his own escape expose
 To stricter bondage, or belike to death,
 Count Pedro's son. The ancient enmity
 Of rival houses from Pelayo's heart
 Had, like a thing forgotten, past away;
 He pitied child and parent, separated
 By the stern mandate of unfeeling power,
 And almost with a father's eyes beheld
 The boy, his fellow in captivity.

For young Alphonso was in truth an heir
 Of nature's largest patrimony; rich
 In form and feature, growing strength of limb,
 A gentle heart, a soul affectionate,
 A joyous spirit fill'd with generous thoughts,
 And genius heightening and ennobling all;
 The blossom of all manly virtues made
 His boyhood beautiful. Shield, gracious Heaven,
 In this ungenial season perilous, —
 Thus would Pelayo sometimes breathe in prayer
 The aspirations of prophetic hope, — [let Shield, gracious Heaven, the blooming tree! and
 This goodly promise, for thy people's sake,
 Yield its abundant fruitage.

When the Prince,
 With hope, and fear, and grief, and shame, disturb'd,
 And sad remembrance, and the shadowy light
 Of days before him, thronging as in dreams,
 Whose quick succession fill'd and overpower'd
 Awhile the unresisting faculty,
 Could, in the calm of troubled thoughts subdued,
 Seek in his heart for counsel, his first care
 Was for the boy; how best they might evade
 The Moor, and renegade's more watchful eye;
 And leaving in some unsuspecting guise
 The city, through what unfrequented track
 Safeliest pursue with speed their dangerous way.
 Consumed in cares like these, the fleeting hours
 Went by. The lamps and tapers now grew pale,
 And through the eastern window slanting fell
 The roseate ray of morn. Within those walls
 Returning day restored no cheerful sounds
 Or joyous motions of awakening life;
 But in the stream of light the speckled notes,
 As if in mimicry of insect play,
 Floated with mazy movement. Sloping down
 Over the altar pass'd the pillar'd beam,
 And rested on the sinful woman's grave
 As if it enter'd there, a light from Heaven.
 So be it! cried Pelayo, even so!
 As in a momentary interval,
 When thought expelling thought, had left his mind
 Open and passive to the influxes
 Of outward sense, his vacant eye was there, —
 So be it, Heavenly Father, even so!
 Thus may thy vivifying goodness shed
 Forgiveness there; for let not thou the groans
 Of dying penitence, nor my bitter prayers
 Before thy mercy-seat, be heard in vain!
 And thou, poor soul, who, from the dolorous house
 Of weeping and of pain, dost look to me
 To shorten and assuage thy penal term,
 Pardon me that these hours in other thoughts
 And other duties than this garb, this night
 Enjoin, should thus have past! Our mother-land
 Exacted of my heart the sacrifice;
 And many a vigil must thy son perform
 Henceforth in woods and mountain fastnesses,
 And tented fields, outwateling for her sake
 The starry host, and ready for the work
 Of day, before the sun begins his course.

The noble Mountaineer, concluding then
 With silent prayer the service of the night,
 Went forth. Without the porch, awaiting him,

He saw Alphonso, pacing to and fro
 With patient step and eye reverted oft.
 He, springing forward when he heard the door
 Move on its heavy hinges, ran to him,
 And welcomed him with smiles of youthful love.
 I have been watching yonder moon, quoth he,
 How it grew pale and paler as the sun
 Scatter'd the flying shades; but woe is me,
 For on the towers of Cordoba the while
 That baleful crescent glitter'd in the morn,
 And with its insolent triumph seem'd to mock
 The omen I had found. — Last night I dream'd
 That thou wert in the field in arms for Spain,
 And I was at thy side: the infidels
 Beset us round, but we with our good swords
 Hew'd out a way. Methought I stabb'd a Moor
 Who would have slain thee; but with that I woke
 For joy, and wept to find it but a dream.

Thus, as he spake, a livelier glow o'erspread
 His cheek, and starting tears again suffused
 The brightening lustre of his eyes. The Prince
 Regarded him a moment steadfastly,
 As if in quick resolve; then, looking round
 On every side with keen and rapid glance,
 Drew him within the church. Alphonso's heart
 Throbb'd with a joyful boding as he mark'd
 The calmness of Pelayo's countenance
 Kindle with solemn thoughts, expressing now
 High purposes of resolute hope. He gazed
 All eagerly to hear what most he wish'd.
 If, said the Prince, thy dream were verified,
 And I indeed were in the field in arms
 For Spain, wouldst thou be at Pelayo's side? —
 If I should break these bonds, and fly to rear
 Our country's banner on our native hills,
 Wouldst thou, Alphonso, share my dangerous flight?

Dear boy, — and wilt thou take thy lot with me
 For death, or for deliverance?

Shall I swear?

Replied the impatient boy; and laying hand
 Upon the altar, on his knee he bent,
 Looking towards Pelayo with such joy
 Of reverential love, as if a God
 Were present to receive the eager vow.
 Nay, quoth Pelayo: what hast thou to do
 With oaths? — Bright emanation as thou art,
 It were a wrong to thy unsullied soul,
 A sin to nature, were I to require
 Promise or vow from thee! Enough for me
 That thy heart answers to the stirring call.
 Alphonso, follow thou in happy faith
 Always the indwelling voice that counsels thee;
 And then, let fall the issue as it may,
 Shall all thy paths be in the light of Heaven,
 The peace of Heaven be with thee in all hours.

How then, exclaim'd the boy, shall I discharge
 The burden of this happiness, — how ease
 My overflowing soul? — Oh gracious God,
 Shall I behold my mother's face again, —
 My father's hall, — my native hills and vales,
 And hear the voices of their streams again, —
 And free as I was born amid those scenes

Beloved, maintain my country's freedom there, —
 Or, failing in the sacred enterprise,
 Die as becomes a Spaniard? — Saying thus,
 He lifted up his hands and eyes toward
 The image of the Crucified, and cried,
 O Thou who didst with thy most precious blood
 Redeem us, Jesu! help us while we seek Earthly redemption from this yoke of shame,
 And misbelief, and death.

The noble boy
 Then rose, and would have knelt again to clasp
 Pelayo's knees, and kiss his hand in act
 Of homage; but the Prince, preventing this,
 Bent over him in fatherly embrace,
 And breathed a fervent blessing on his head.

 IX.

FLORINDA.

THERE sat a woman like a supplicant,
 Muffled and cloak'd, before Pelayo's gate,
 Awaiting when he should return that morn.
 She rose at his approach, and bow'd her head,
 And, with a low and trembling utterance,
 Besought him to vouchsafe her speech within
 In privacy. And when they were alone,
 And the doors closed, she knelt and clasp'd his knees,
 Saying, A boon! a boon! This night, O Prince,
 Hast thou kept vigil for thy mother's soul:
 For her soul's sake, and for the soul of him
 Whom once, in happier days, of all mankind
 Thou heldest for thy chosen bosom friend,
 Oh, for the sake of his poor suffering soul,
 Refuse me not!

How should I dare refuse,
 Being thus adjured? he answer'd. Thy request
 Is granted, woman, — be it what it may,
 So it be lawful, and within the bounds
 Of possible achievement: — aught unfit
 Thou wouldst not with these adjurations seek.
 But who thou art, I marvel, that dost touch
 Upon that string, and ask in Roderick's name! —
 She bared her face, and, looking up, replied,
 Florinda! — Shrinking then, with both her hands
 She hid herself, and bow'd her head abased
 Upon her knee, — as one who, if the grave
 Had oped beneath her, would have thrown herself,
 Even like a lover, in the arms of Death.

Pelayo stood confused: he had not seen
 Count Julian's daughter since, in Roderick's court,
 Glittering in beauty and in innocence,
 A radiant vision, in her joy she moved;
 More like a poet's dream, or form divine,
 Heaven's prototype of perfect womanhood,
 So lovely was the presence, — than a thing
 Of earth and perishable elements.
 Now had he seen her in her winding-sheet,
 Less painful would that spectacle have proved;
 For peace is with the dead, and piety
 Bringeth a patient hope to those who mourn

O'er the departed; but this alter'd face,
 Bearing its deadly sorrow character'd,
 Came to him like a ghost, which in the grave
 Could find no rest. He, taking her cold hand,
 Raised her, and would have spoken; but his tongue
 Fail'd in its office, and could only speak
 In under tones compassionate her name.

The voice of pity soothed and melted her;
 And when the Princee bade her be comforted,
 Proffering his zealous aid in whatso'er
 Might please her to appoint, a feeble smile
 Pass'd slowly over her pale countenance,
 Like moonlight on a marble statue. Heaven
 Requite thee, Prince! she answer'd. All I ask
 Is but a quiet resting-place, wherein
 A broken heart, in prayer and humble hope,
 May wait for its deliverance. Even this
 My most unhappy fate denies me here.
 Grievs which are known too widely and too well
 I need not now remember. I could bear
 Privation of all Christian ordinances;
 The woe which kills hath saved me too, and made
 A temple of this ruin'd tabernacle,
 Wherein redeeming God doth not disdain.
 To let his presence shine. And I could bear
 To see the turban on my father's brow, —
 Sorrow beyond all sorrows, — shame of shames, —
 Yet to be borne, while I with tears of blood,
 And throes of agony, in his behalf
 Implore and wrestle with offended Heaven.
 This I have borne resign'd: but other ills,
 And worse, assail me now; the which to bear,
 If to avoid be possible, would draw
 Damnation down. Orpas, the perjured Priest,
 The apostate Orpas, claims me for his bride.
 Obdurate as he is, the wretch profanes
 My sacred woe, and woos me to his bed,
 The thing I am, — the living death thou seest!

Miscreant! exclaim'd Pelayo. Might I meet
 That renegado, sword to cimeter,
 In open field, never did man approach
 The altar for the sacrifice in faith
 More sure, than I should hew the villain down!
 But how should Julian favor his demand? —
 Julian, who hath so passionately loved
 His child, so dreadfully revenged her wrongs!

Count Julian, she replied, hath none but me,
 And it hath, therefore, been his heart's desire
 To see his ancient line by me preserved.
 This was their covenant when, in fatal hour
 For Spain, and for themselves, in traitorous bond
 Of union they combined. My father, stung
 To madness, only thought of how to make
 His vengeance sure; the Prelate, calm and cool,
 When he renounced his outward faith in Christ,
 Indulged at once his hatred of the King,
 His inbred wickedness, and a haughty hope,
 Versed as he was in treasons, to direct
 The invaders by his secret policy,
 And at their head, aided by Julian's power,
 Reign as a Moor upon that throne to which
 The priestly order else had barr'd his way.

The African hath conquer'd for himself;
 But Orpas coveteth Count Julian's lands,
 And claims to have the covenant perform'd.
 Friendless, and worse than fatherless, I come
 To thee for succor. Send me secretly, —
 For well I know all faithful hearts must be
 At thy devotion, — with a trusty guide
 To guard me on the way, that I may reach
 Some Christian land, where Christian rites are free,
 And there discharge a vow, alas! too long,
 Too fatally delay'd. Aid me in this
 For Roderick's sake, Pelayo! and thy name
 Shall be remember'd in my latest prayer.

Be comforted! the Prince replied; but when
 He spake of comfort, twice did he break off
 The idle words, feeling that earth had none
 For grief so irremediable as hers.
 At length he took her hand, and pressing it,
 And forcing through involuntary tears
 A mournful smile affectionate, he said,
 Say not that thou art friendless while I live!
 Thou couldst not to a readier ear have told
 Thy sorrows, nor have ask'd in fitter hour
 What for my country's honor, for my rank,
 My faith, and sacred knighthood, I am bound
 In duty to perform; which not to do
 Would show me undeserving of the names
 Of Goth, Prince, Christian, even of Man. This
 day,
 Lady, prepare to take thy lot with me,
 And soon as evening closes meet me here.
 Duties bring blessings with them, and I hold
 Thy coming for a happy augury,
 In this most awful crisis of my fate.

X.

RODERICK AND FLORINDA.

WITH sword and breastplate, under rustic weeds
 Conceal'd, at dusk Pelayo pass'd the gate,
 Florinda following near, disguised alike.
 Two peasants on their mules they seem'd, at eve
 Returning from the town. Not distant far,
 Alphonso by the appointed orange-grove,
 With anxious eye and agitated heart,
 Watch'd for the Prince's coming. Eagerly
 At every foot-fall through the gloom he strain'd
 His sight, nor did he recognize him when
 The Chieftain thus accompanied drew nigh:
 And when the expected signal called him on,
 Doubting this female presence, half in fear
 Obey'd the call. Pelayo too perceived
 The boy was not alone; he not for that Delay'd the summons, but lest need should be,
 Laying hand upon his sword, toward him bent
 In act soliciting speech, and low of voice
 Inquired, if friend or foe. Forgive me, cried
 Alphonso, that I did not tell thee this,
 Full as I was of happiness, before.
 'Tis Hoya, servant of my father's house,
 Unto whose dutiful care and love, when sent

To this vile bondage, I was given in charge.
 How could I look upon my father's face,
 If I had in my joy deserted him,
 Who was to me found faithful? — Right! replied
 The Prince; and viewing him with silent joy,
 Blessed the Mother, in his heart he said,
 Who gave thee birth! but sure of womankind
 Most blessed she whose hand her happy stars
 Shall link with thine! and with that thought the form

Of Hermesind, his daughter, to his soul
 Came in her beauty.

Soon, by devious tracks,
 They turn'd aside. The favoring moon arose,
 To guide them on their flight through upland paths
 Remote from frequentage, and dales retired,
 Forest and mountain glen. Before their feet
 The fire-flies, swarming in the woodland shade,
 Sprung up like sparks, and twinkled round their way;

The timorous blackbird, starting at their step,
 Fled from the thicket with shrill note of fear;
 And far below them in the peopled dell,
 When all the soothing sounds of eve had ceased,
 The distant watch-dog's voice at times was heard,
 Answering the nearer wolf. All through the night
 Among the hills they travell'd silently;
 Till when the stars were setting, at what hour
 The breath of Heaven is coldest, they beheld
 Within a lonely grove the expected fire,
 Where Roderick and his comrade anxiously Look'd for the appointed meeting. Halting there,
 They from the burden and the bit relieved
 Their patient bearers, and around the fire
 Partook of needful food and grateful rest.

Bright rose the flame replenish'd; it illumed
 The cork-tree's furrow'd rind, its rifts, and swells,
 And redder scars, — and where its aged boughs
 O'erbrow'd the travellers, cast upon the leaves
 A floating, gray, unrealizing gleam.
 Alphonso, light of heart, upon the heath
 Lay carelessly dispread, in happy dreams
 Of home; his faithful Hoya slept beside.
 Years and fatigue to old Siverian brought Easy oblivion; and the Prince himself,
 Yielding to weary nature's gentle will,
 Forgot his cares awhile. Florinda sat
 Beholding Roderick with fix'd eyes intent,
 Yet unregardant of the countenance
 Whereon they dwelt; in other thoughts absorb'd,
 Collecting fortitude for what she yearn'd,
 Yet trembled to perform. Her steady look
 Disturb'd the Goth, albeit he little ween'd
 What agony awaited him that hour.
 Her face, well nigh as changed as his, was now
 Half-hidden, and the lustre of her eye
 Extinct; nor did her voice awaken in him
 One startling recollection when she spake,
 So altered were its tones.

Father, she said,
 All thankful as I am to leave behind
 The unhappy walls of Cordoba, not less
 Of consolation doth my heart receive

At sight of one to whom I may disclose
 The sins which trouble me, and at his feet
 Lay down repentantly, in Jesu's name,
 The burden of my spirit. In his name
 Hear me, and pour into a wounded soul
 The balm of pious counsel. — Saying thus,
 She drew toward the minister ordain'd,
 And kneeling by him, Father, dost thou know
 The wretch who kneels beside thee? she inquired.
 He answered, Surely we are each to each
 Equally unknown.

Then said she, Here thou seest
 One who is known too fatally for all, —
 The daughter of Count Julian. — Well it was
 For Roderick that no eye beheld him now;
 From head to foot a sharper pang than death
 Thrill'd him; his heart, as at a mortal stroke, Ceased from its functions: his breath fail'd, and when

The power of life, recovering, set its springs
 Again in action, cold and clammy sweat
 Starting at every pore suffused his frame.
 Their presence help'd him to subdue himself;
 For else, had none been nigh, he would have fallen
 Before Florinda prostrate on the earth,
 And in that mutual agony belike
 Both souls had taken flight. She mark'd him not,
 For having told her name, she bow'd her head,
 Breathing a short and silent prayer to Heaven,
 While, as a penitent, she wrought herself
 To open to his eye her hidden wounds.

Father, at length she said, all tongues amid
 This general ruin shed their bitterness
 On Roderick, load his memory with reproach,
 And with their curses persecute his soul. —
 Why shouldst thou tell me this? exclaim'd the Goth,

From his cold forehead wiping, as he spake,
 The death-like moisture; — why of Roderick's guilt

Tell me? Or thinkest thou I know it not?
 Alas! who hath not heard the hideous tale
 Of Roderick's shame! Babes learn it from their nurses,

And children, by their mothers unreprieved,
 Link their first execrations to his name.
 Oh, it hath caught a taint of infamy,
 That, like Iscariot's, through all time shall last,
 Reeking and fresh forever!

There! she cried,
 Drawing her body backward where she knelt,
 And stretching forth her arms with head upraised, —

There! it pursues me still! — I came to thee,
 Father, for comfort, and thou heapest fire
 Upon my head. But hear me patiently,
 And let me undeceive thee; self-abased,
 Not to arraign another, do I come; —
 I come a self-accuser, self-condemn'd
 To take upon myself the pain deserved;
 For I have drank the cup of bitterness,
 And having drank therein of heavenly grace,
 I must not put away the cup of shame.

Thus as she spake she falter'd at the close,
 And in that dying fall her voice sent forth
 Somewhat of its original sweetness. Thou! —
 Thou self-abased! exclaim'd the astonish'd King; —
 Thou self-condemn'd! — The cup of shame for thee!
 Thee — thee, Florinda! — But the very excess
 Of passion check'd his speech, restraining thus
 From further transport, which had haply else
 Master'd him; and he sat like one entranced,
 Gazing upon that countenance so fallen,
 So changed: her face, raised from its muffler now,
 Was turn'd toward him, and the fire-light shone
 Full on its mortal paleness; but the shade
 Conceal'd the King.

She roused him from the spell
 Which held him like a statue motionless.
 Thou, too, quoth she, dost join the general curse,
 Like one, who, when he sees a felon's grave,
 Casting a stone there as he passes by,
 Adds to the heap of shame. Oh, what are we,
 Frail creatures as we are, that we should sit
 In judgment, man on man! and what were we,
 If the All-merciful should mete to us
 With the same rigorous measure wherewithal
 Sinner to sinner metes! But God beholds
 The secrets of the heart, — therefore his name
 Is Merciful. Servant of God, see thou
 The hidden things of mine, and judge thou then
 In charity thy brother who hath fallen. —
 Nay, hear me to the end! I loved the King, —
 Tenderly, passionately, madly loved him.
 Sinful it was to love a child of earth
 With such entire devotion as I loved
 Roderick, the heroic Prince, the glorious Goth!
 And yet methought this was its only crime,
 The imaginative passion seem'd so pure;
 Quiet and calm like duty, hope nor fear
 Disturb'd the deep contentment of that love;
 He was the sunshine of my soul, and like
 A flower, I liv'd and flourish'd in his light.
 Oh, bear not with me thus impatiently!
 No tale of weakness this, that in the act
 Of penitence, indulgent to itself,
 With garrulous palliation half repeats
 The sin it ill repents. I will be brief,
 And shrink not from confessing how the love
 Which thus began in innocence, betray'd
 My unsuspecting heart; nor me alone,
 But him, before whom, shining as he shone
 With whatsoever is noble, whatsoever
 Is lovely, whatsoever good and great,
 I was as dust and ashes, — him, alas!
 This glorious being, this exalted Prince,
 Even him, with all his royalty of soul,
 Did this ill-omen'd, this accursed love,
 To his most lamentable fall betray
 And utter ruin. Thus it was: The King,
 By counsels of cold statesmen ill-advised,
 To an unworthy mate had bound himself
 In politic wedlock. Wherefore should I tell
 How Nature upon Egilona's form,
 Profuse of beauty, lavishing her gifts,
 Left, like a statue from the graver's hands,
 Deformity and hollowness beneath
 The rich external? For the love of pomp

And emptiest vanity, hath she not incur'd
 The grief and wonder of good men, the jibes
 Of vulgar ribaldry, the reproach of all;
 Profaning the most holy sacrament
 Of marriage, to become chief of the wives
 Of Abdalaziz, of the Infidel,
 The Moor, the tyrant-enemy of Spain!
 All know her now; but they alone who knew
 What Roderick was, can judge his wretchedness,
 To that light spirit and unfeeling heart
 In hopeless bondage bound. No children rose
 From this unhappy union, towards whom
 The springs of love, within his soul confined,
 Might flow in joy and fulness; nor was he
 One, like Witiza, of the vulgar crew,
 Who in promiscuous appetite can find
 All their vile nature seeks. Alas for man!
 Exuberant health diseases him, frail worm!
 And the slight bias of untoward chance
 Makes his best virtue from the even line,
 With fatal declination, swerve aside.
 Ay, thou mayst groan for poor mortality, —
 Well, Father, mayst thou groan!

My evil fate

Made me an inmate of the royal house,
 And Roderick found in me, if not a heart
 Like his, — for who was like the heroic Goth? —
 One which at least felt his surpassing worth,
 And loved him for himself. — A little yet
 Bear with me, reverend Father, for I touch
 Upon the point, and this long prologue goes,
 As justice bids, to palliate his offence,
 Not mine. The passion, which I fondly thought
 Such as fond sisters for a brother feel,
 Grew day by day, and strengthen'd in its growth,
 Till the beloved presence had become Needful as food or necessary sleep,
 My hope, light, sunshine, life, and every thing.
 Thus lapp'd in dreams of bliss, I might have liv'd
 Contented with this pure idolatry,
 Had he been happy; but I saw and knew
 The inward discontent and household griefs
 Which he subdued in silence; and alas!
 Pity with admiration mingling then,
 Alloy'd, and lower'd, and humanized my love,
 Till to the level of my lowliness
 It brought him down; and in this treacherous heart
 Too often the repining thought arose,
 That if Florinda had been Roderick's Queen,
 Then might domestic peace and happiness
 Have bless'd his home and crown'd our wedded loves.

Too often did that sinful thought recur,
 Too feebly the temptation was repell'd.

See, Father, I have probed my inmost soul;
 Have search'd to its remotest source the sin;
 And tracing it through all its specious forms
 Of fair disguisement, I present it now,
 Even as it lies before the eye of God,
 Bare and exposed, convicted and condemn'd.
 One eve, as in the bowers which overhang
 The glen where Tagus rolls between his rocks
 I roam'd alone, alone I met the King.
 His countenance was troubled, and his speech

Like that of one whose tongue to light discourse
At fits constrain'd, betrays a heart disturb'd :
I too, albeit unconscious of his thoughts,
With anxious looks reveal'd what wandering words
In vain essay'd to hide. A little while
Did this oppressive intercourse endure,
Till our eyes met in silence, each to each
Telling their mutual tale, then consciously
Together fell abash'd. He took my hand,
And said, Florinda, would that thou and I
Earlier had met! Oh, what a blissful lot
Had then been mine, who might have found in thee

The sweet companion and the friend endear'd,
A fruitful wife and crown of earthly joys!
Thou too shouldst then have been of womankind
Happiest, as now the loveliest. — And with that,
First giving way to passion first disclosed,
He press'd upon my lips a guilty kiss, —
Alas! more guiltily received than given.
Passive and yielding, and yet self-reproach'd,
Trembling I stood, upheld in his embrace ;
When coming steps were heard, and Roderick said,
Meet me to-morrow, I beseech thee, here,
Queen of my heart! Oh meet me here again,
My own Florinda, meet me here again! —
Tongue, eye, and pressure of the impassion'd hand
Solicited and urged the ardent suit,
And from my hesitating, hurried lips
The word of promise fatally was drawn.
O Roderick, Roderick! hadst thou told me all
Thy purpose at that hour, from what a world
Of woe had thou and I — The bitterness
Of that reflection overcame her then,
And chok'd her speech. But Roderick sat the while

Covering his face with both his hands close-press'd,
His head bow'd down, his spirit to such point
Of sufferance knit, as one who patiently
Awaits the uplifted sword.

Till now, said she,

Resuming her confession, I had lived,
If not in innocence, yet self-deceived,
And of my perilous and sinful state
Unconscious. But this fatal hour reveal'd
To my awakening soul her guilt and shame :
And in those agonies with which remorse,
Wrestling with weakness and with cherish'd sin,
Doth triumph o'er the lacerated heart,
That night — that miserable night — I vow'd,
A virgin dedicate, to pass my life
Immured ; and, like redeem'd Magdalen,
Or that Egyptian penitent, whose tears
Fretted the rock, and moisten'd round her cave
The thirsty desert, so to mourn my fall.
The struggle ending thus, the victory
Thus, as I thought, accomplish'd, I believed
My soul was calm, and that the peace of Heaven
Descended to accept and bless my vow ;
And in this faith, prepared to consummate
The sacrifice, I went to meet the King.
See, Father, what a snare had Satan laid!
For Roderick came to tell me that the Church
From his unfruitful bed would set him free,
And I should be his Queen.

O let me close

The dreadful tale! I told him of my vow ;
And from sincere and scrupulous piety,
But more, I fear me, in that desperate mood
Of obstinate will perverse, the which, with pride,
And shame, and self-reproach, doth sometimes
make

A woman's tongue, her own worst enemy,
Run counter to her dearest heart's desire, —
In that unhappy mood did I resist
All his most earnest prayers to let the power
Of holy Church, never more rightfully
Invoked, he said, than now in our behalf,
Release us from our fatal bonds. He urged
With kindling warmth his suit, like one whose life

Hung on the issue ; I dissembled not
My cruel self-reproaches, nor my grief,
Yet desperately maintain'd the rash resolve ;
Till, in the passionate argument, he grew
Incensed, inflamed, and madden'd or possess'd —
For Hell too surely at that hour prevail'd,
And with such subtle toils enveloped him,
That even in the extremity of guilt
No guilt he purported, but rather meant
An amplest recompense of life-long love
For transitory wrong, which fate perverse —
Thus madly he deceived himself — compell'd,
And therefore stern necessity excused.
Here then, O Father, at thy feet I own
Myself the guiltier ; for full well I knew
These were his thoughts, but vengeance master'd me,
And in my agony I cursed the man
Whom I loved best.

Dost thou recall that curse ?

Cried Roderick, in a deep and inward voice,
Still with his head depress'd, and covering still
His countenance. Recall it? she exclaim'd ;
Father, I come to thee because I gave
The reins to wrath too long, — because I wrought
His ruin, death, and infamy. — O God,
Forgive the wicked vengeance thus indulged,
As I forgive the King! — But teach me thou
What reparation more than tears and prayers
May now be made ; — how shall I vindicate
His injured name, and take upon myself —
Daughter of Julian, firmly he replied,
Speak not of that, I charge thee! On his fame
The Ethiop dye, fixed ineffaceably,
Forever will abide ; so it must be,
So should be : 'tis his rightful punishment ;
And if to the full measure of his sin
The punishment hath fallen, the more our hope
That through the blood of Jesus he may find
That sin forgiven him.

Pausing then, he raised

His hand, and pointed where Siverian lay
Stretch'd on the heath. To that old man, said he,
And to the mother of the unhappy Goth,
Tell, if it please thee, — not what thou hast pour'd
Into my secret ear, but that the child
For whom they mourn with anguish unallay'd,
Sinn'd not from vicious will, or heart corrupt,
But fell by fatal circumstance betray'd.

And if in charity to them thou sayest
 Something to palliate, something to excuse
 An act of sudden frenzy when the Fiend
 O'ercame him, thou wilt do for Roderick
 All he could ask thee, all that can be done
 On earth, and all his spirit could endure.

Venturing towards her an imploring look,
 Wilt thou join with me for his soul in prayer?
 He said, and trembled as he spake. That voice
 Of sympathy was like Heaven's influence,
 Wounding at once and comforting the soul.
 O Father, Christ requite thee! she exclaim'd;
 Thou hast set free the springs which withering griefs
 Have closed too long. Forgive me, for I thought
 Thou wert a rigid and un pitying judge;
 One whose stern virtue, feeling in itself
 No flaw of frailty, heard impatiently
 Of weakness and of guilt. I wrong'd thee,
 Father! —

With that she took his hand, and kissing it,
 Bathed it with tears. Then in a firmer speech,
 For Roderick, for Count Julian, and myself,
 Three wretchedest of all the human race,
 Who have destroyed each other and ourselves,
 Mutually wrong'd and wronging, let us pray!

 XI.

COUNT PEDRO'S CASTLE.

TWELVE weary days with unremitting speed,
 Shunning frequented tracks, the travellers
 Pursued their way; the mountain path they chose,
 The forest or the lonely heath wide-spread,
 Where cistus shrubs sole seen exhaled at noon
 Their fine balsamic odor all around;
 Strow'd with their blossoms, frail as beautiful,
 The thirsty soil at eve; and when the sun
 Relumed the gladden'd earth, opening anew
 Their stores exuberant, prodigal as frail,
 Whiten'd again the wilderness. They left
 The dark Sierra's skirts behind, and cross'd
 The wilds where Ana, in her native hills,
 Collects her sister springs, and hurries on
 Her course melodious amid loveliest glens,
 With forest and with fruitage overbower'd.
 These scenes profusely blest by Heaven they left,
 Where o'er the hazel and the quince the vine
 Wide-mantling spreads; and clinging round the cork

And ilex, hangs amid their dusky leaves
 Garlands of brightest hue, with reddening fruit
 Pendent, or clusters cool of glassy green.
 So holding on o'er mountain and o'er vale,
 Tagus they cross'd, where, midland on his way,
 The King of Rivers rolls his stately stream;
 And rude Alverches' wide and stony bed,
 And Duero distant far, and many a stream
 And many a field obscure, in future war
 For bloody theatre of famous deeds
 Foredoom'd; and deserts where, in years to come,

Shall populous towns arise, and crested towers,
 And stately temples rear their heads on high.

Cautious, with course circuitous they shunn'd
 The embattled city, which, in eldest time,
 Thrice-greatest Hernes built, so fables say,
 Now subjugate, but fated to behold
 Erelong the heroic Prince (who, passing now
 Unknown and silently the dangerous track,
 Turns thither his regardant eye) come down
 Victorious from the heights, and bear abroad
 Her banner'd Lion, symbol to the Moor
 Of rout and death through many an age of blood.
 Lo, there the Asturian hills! Far in the west,
 Huge Rabanal and Foncebadon huge,
 Preëminent, their giant bulk display,
 Darkening with earliest shade, the distant vales
 Of Leon, and with evening premature.
 Far in Cantabria eastward, the long line
 Extends beyond the reach of eagle's eye,
 When buoyant in mid-heaven the bird of Jove
 Soars at his loftiest pitch. In the north, before
 The travellers the Erbasian mountains rise,
 Bounding the land beloved, their native land.

How then, Alphonso, did thy eager soul
 Chide the slow hours and painful way, which seem'd

Lengthening to grow before their lagging pace!
 Youth of heroic thought and high desire,
 'Tis not the spur of lofty enterprise
 That with unequal throbbing hurries now
 The unquiet heart, now makes it sink dismay'd;
 'Tis not impatient joy which thus disturbs
 In that young breast the healthful spring of life;
 Joy and ambition have forsaken him.
 His soul is sick with hope. So near his home,
 So near his mother's arms; — alas! perchance
 The long'd-for meeting may be yet far off
 As earth from heaven. Sorrow, in these long months

Of separation, may have laid her low;
 Or what if at his flight the bloody Moor
 Hath sent his ministers of slaughter forth,
 And he himself should thus have brought the sword
 Upon his father's head? — Sure Hoya too
 The same dark presage feels, the fearful boy
 Said in himself; or wherefore is his brow
 Thus overcast with heaviness, and why
 Looks he thus anxiously in silence round?

Just then that faithful servant raised his hand,
 And turning to Alphonso with a smile,
 He pointed where Count Pedro's towers far off
 Peer'd in the dell below; faint was the smile,
 And while it sat upon his lips, his eye
 Retain'd its troubled speculation still.
 For long had he look'd wistfully in vain,
 Seeking where far or near he might espy
 From whom to learn if time or chance had wrought
 Change in his master's house: but on the hills
 Nor goatherd could he see, nor traveller,
 Nor huntsman early at his sports afield,
 Nor angler following up the mountain glen
 His lonely pastime; neither could he hear

Carol, or pipe, or shout of shepherd's boy,
Nor woodman's axe, for not a human sound
Disturb'd the silence of the solitude.

Is it the spoiler's work? At yonder door
Behold the favorite kidling bleats unheard;
The next stands open, and the sparrows there
Boldly pass in and out. Thither he turn'd
To seek what indications were within;
The chestnut-bread was on the shelf, the churn,
As if in haste forsaken, full and fresh;
The recent fire had moulder'd on the hearth;
And broken cobwebs mark'd the whiter space
Where from the wall the buckler and the sword
Had late been taken down. Wonder at first
Had mitigated fear; but Hoya now
Return'd to tell the symbols of good hope,
And they prick'd forward joyfully. Erelong
Pereceptible above the ceaseless sound
Of yonder stream, a voice of multitudes,
As if in loud acclaim, was heard far off;
And nearer as they drew, distincter shouts
Came from the dell, and at Count Pedro's gate
The human swarm were seen, — a motley group,
Maids, mothers, helpless infancy, weak age,
And wondering children, and tumultuous boys,
Hot youth, and resolute manhood gather'd there,
In uproar all. Anon the moving mass
Falls in half circle back; a general cry
Bursts forth; exultant arms are lifted up,
And caps are thrown aloft, as through the gate
Count Pedro's banner came. Alphonso shriek'd
For joy, and smote his steed and gallop'd on.

Fronting the gate, the standard-bearer holds
His precious charge. Behind, the men divide
In order'd files; green boyhood presses there,
And waning eld, pleading a youthful soul,
Entreats admission. All is ardor here,
Hope, and brave purposes, and minds resolved.
Nor where the weaker sex is left apart
Doth aught of fear find utterance, though perchance
Some paler cheeks might there be seen, some eyes
Big with sad bodings, and some natural tears.
Count Pedro's war-horse in the vacant space
Strikes with impatient hoof the trodden turf,
And gazing round upon the martial show,
Proud of his stately trappings, flings his head,
And snorts and champs the bit, and neighing shrill
Wakes the near echo with his voice of joy.
The page beside him holds his master's spear,
And shield, and helmet. In the castle-gate
Count Pedro stands, his countenance resolved,
Put mournful, for Favinia on his arm
Hung, passionate with her fears, and held him back.
Go not, she cried, with this deluded crew?
She hath not, Pedro, with her frantic words
Bereft thy faculty, — she is crazed with grief,
And her delirium hath infected these:
But, Pedro, thou art calm; thou dost not share
The madness of the crowd; thy sober mind
Surveys the danger in its whole extent,
And sees the certain ruin, — for thou know'st
I know thou hast no hope. Unhappy man,
Why then for this most desperate enterprise

Wilt thou devote thy son, thine only child?
Not for myself I plead, nor even for thee;
Thou art a soldier, and thou canst not fear
The face of death; and I should welcome it
As the best visitant whom Heaven could send.
Not for our lives I speak then, — were they worth
The thought of preservation; — Nature soon
Must call for them; the sword that should cut short
Sorrow's slow work were merciful to us.
But spare Alphonso! there is time and hope
In store for him. O thou who gavest him life,
Seal not his death, his death and mine at once!

Peace! he replied: thou know'st there is no choice;
I did not raise the storm; I cannot turn
Its course aside! but where yon banner goes
Thy Lord must not be absent! Spare me then,
Favinia, lest I hear thy honor'd name
Now first attainted with deserved reproach.
The boy is in God's hands. He who of yore
Walk'd with the sons of Judah in the fire,
And from the lions' den drew Daniel forth
Unhurt, can save him, — if it be his will.

Even as he spake, the astonish'd troop set up
A shout of joy which rung through all the hills.
Alphonso heeds not how they break their ranks
And gather round to greet him; from his horse
Precipitate and panting off he springs.
Pedro grew pale, and trembled at his sight;
Favinia clasp'd her hands, and looking up
To Heaven as she embraced the boy, exclaim'd,
Lord God, forgive me for my sinful fears;
Unworthy that I am, — my son, my son!

XII.

THE VOW.

ALWAYS I knew thee for a generous foe,
Pelayo! said the Count; and in our time
Of enmity, thou too, I know, didst feel
The feud between us was but of the house,
Not of the heart. Brethren in arms henceforth
We stand or fall together; nor will I
Look to the event with one misgiving thought, —
That were to prove myself unworthy now
Of Heaven's benignant providence, this hour,
Scarcely by less than miracle, vouchsafed.
I will believe that we have days in store
Of hope, now risen again as from the dead, —
Of vengeance, — of portentous victory, —
Yea, maugre all unlikelihoods, — of peace.
Let us then here indissolubly knit
Our ancient houses, that those happy days,
When they arrive, may find us more than friends,
And bound by closer than fraternal ties.
Thou hast a daughter, Princee, to whom my heart
Yearns now, as if in winning infancy
Her smiles had been its daily food of love.
I need not tell thee what Alphonso is, —
Thou know'st the boy!

Already had that hope,
 Replied Pelayo, risen within my soul.
 O Thou, who, in thy mercy, from the house
 Of Moorish bondage hast deliver'd us,
 Fulfil the pious purposes for which
 Here, in thy presence, thus we pledge our hands!

Strange hour to plight espousals! yielding half
 To superstitious thoughts, Favina cried,
 And these strange witnesses! — The times are strange,
 With thoughtful speech composed her Lord replies;
 And what thou seest accords with them. This day
 Is wonderful; nor could auspicious Heaven
 With fairer or with fitter omen gild
 Our enterprise, when, strong in heart and hope,
 We take the field, preparing thus for works
 Of piety and love. Unwillingly
 I yielded to my people's general voice,
 Thinking that she who with her powerful words
 To this excess had roused and kindled them,
 Spake from the spirit of her griefs alone,
 Not with prophetic impulse. Be that sin
 Forgiven me! and the calm and quiet faith
 Which, in the place of incredulity,
 Hath fill'd me, now that seeing I believe,
 Doth give of happy end to righteous cause
 A presage, not presumptuous, but assured.

Then Pedro told Pelayo how from vale
 To vale the exalted Adosinda went,
 Exciting sire and son, in holy war
 Conquering or dying, to secure their place
 In Paradise; and how reluctantly,
 And mourning for his child by his own act
 Thus doom'd to death, he bade with heavy heart
 His banner be brought forth. Devoid alike
 Of purpose and of hope himself, he meant
 To march toward the western Mountaineers,
 Where Odoar by his counsel might direct Their force conjoin'd. Now, said he, we must haste
 To Cangas, there, Pelayo, to secure,
 With timely speed, I trust in God, thy house.

Then looking to his men, he cried, Bring forth
 The armor which in Wamba's wars I wore. —
 Alphonso's heart leapt at the auspicious words.
 Count Pedro mark'd the rising glow of joy, —
 Doubly to thee, Alphonso, he pursued,
 This day above all other days is blest,
 From whence, as from a birth-day, thou wilt date
 Thy life in arms!

Rejoicing in their task,
 The servants of the house, with emulous love,
 Dispute the charge. One brings the cuirass, one
 The buckler; this exultingly displays
 The sword; his comrade lifts the helm on high;
 The greaves, the gauntlets they divide; a spur
 Seems now to dignify the officious hand
 Which for such service bears it to his Lord.
 Greek artists in the imperial city forged
 That splendid armor, perfect in their craft;
 With curious skill they wrought it, framed alike
 To shine amid the pageantry of war,

And for the proof of battle. Many a time
 Alphonso from his nurse's lap had stretch'd
 His infant hands toward it eagerly,
 Where gleaming to the central fire it hung
 High in the hall; and many a time had wish'd,
 With boyish ardor, that the day were come
 When Pedro to his prayers would grant the boon,
 His dearest heart's desire. Count Pedro then
 Would smile, and in his heart rejoice to see
 The noble instinct manifest itself.
 Then, too, Favina, with maternal pride,
 Would turn her eyes exulting to her Lord,
 And in that silent language bid him mark
 His spirit in his boy; all danger then
 Was distant, and if secret forethought faint
 Of manhood's perils, and the chance of war,
 Hateful to mothers, pass'd across her mind,
 The ill remote gave to the present hour
 A heighten'd feeling of secure delight.

No season this for old solemnities,
 For wassailry and sport; — the bath, the bed,
 The vigil, — all preparatory rites
 Omitted now, — here, in the face of Heaven,
 Before the vassals of his father's house,
 With them in instant peril to partake
 The chance of life or death, the heroic boy
 Dons his first arms; the coated scales of steel
 Which o'er the tunic to his knees depend,
 The hose, the sleeves of mail; bareheaded then
 He stood. But when Count Pedro took the spurs,
 And bent his knee in service to his son,
 Alphonso from that gesture half drew back,
 Starting in reverence, and a deeper hue
 Spread o'er the glow of joy which flush'd his cheeks.

Do thou the rest, Pelayo! said the Count;
 So shall the ceremony of this hour
 Exceed in honor what in form it lacks.
 The Prince from Hoya's faithful hand receiv'd
 The sword; he girt it round the youth, and drew
 And placed it in his hand; unsheathing then
 His own good falchion, with its burnish'd blade
 He touch'd Alphonso's neck, and with a kiss
 Gave him his rank in arms.

Thus long the crowd
 Had look'd intently on, in silence hush'd;
 Loud and continuous now with one accord,
 Shout following shout, their acclamations rose;
 Blessings were breathed from every heart, and joy,
 Powerful alike in all, which, as with force
 Of an inebriating cup, inspired
 The youthful, from the eye of age drew tears.
 The uproar died away, when, standing forth,
 Roderick, with lifted hand, besought a pause
 For speech, and moved towards the youth. I, too,
 Young Baron, he began, must do my part;
 Not with prerogative of earthly power,
 But as the servant of the living God,
 The God of Hosts. This day thou promisest
 To die, when honor calls thee, for thy faith,
 For thy liege Lord, and for thy native land;
 The duties which at birth we all contract,
 Are by the high profession of this hour
 Made thine especially. Thy noble blood,

The thoughts with which thy childhood hath been fed,
 And thine own noble nature more than all,
 Are sureties for thee. But these dreadful times
 Demand a further pledge; for it hath pleased
 The Highest, as he tried his Saints of old,
 So in the fiery furnace of his wrath
 To prove and purify the sons of Spain;
 And they must knit their spirits to the proof,
 Or sink, forever lost. Hold forth thy sword,
 Young Baron, and before thy people take
 The vow which, in Toledo's sacred name,
 Poor as these weeds bespeak me, I am here
 To minister with delegated power.

With reverential awe was Roderick heard
 By all, so well authority became
 That mien, and voice, and countenance austere.
 Pelayo with complacent eye beheld
 The unlook'd-for interposal, and the Count
 Bends toward Alphonso his approving head.
 The youth, obedient, loosen'd from his belt
 The sword, and looking, while his heart beat fast,
 To Roderick, reverently expectant stood.

O noble youth, the Royal Goth pursued,
 Thy country is in bonds; an impious foe
 Oppresses her; he brings with him strange laws,
 Strange language, evil customs, and false faith,
 And forces them on Spain. Swear that thy soul
 Will make no covenant with these accursed,
 But that the sword shall be from this day forth
 Thy children's portion, to be handed down
 From sire to son, a sacred heritage,
 Through every generation, till the work
 Be done, and this insulted land hath drunk
 In sacrifice the last invader's blood!

Bear witness, ancient Mountains! cried the youth,
 And ye, my native Streams, who hold your course
 Forever;—this dear Earth, and yonder Sky,
 Be witness! for myself I make the vow,
 And for my children's children. Here I stand
 Their sponsor, binding them in sight of Heaven,
 As by a new baptismal sacrament,
 To wage hereditary, holy war,
 Perpetual, patient, persevering war,
 Till not one living enemy pollute
 The sacred soil of Spain.

So, as he ceased,
 While yet toward the clear, blue firmament
 His eyes were raised, he lifted to his lips
 The sword, with reverent gesture bending then,
 Devoutly kiss'd its cross.

And ye! exclaimed
 Roderick, as, turning to the assembled troop,
 He motion'd with authoritative hand,—
 Ye children of the hills and sons of Spain!

Through every heart the rapid feeling ran,—
 For us! they answer'd all with one accord,
 And at the word they knelt: People and Prince,
 The young and old, the father and the son,
 At once they knelt; with one accord they cried,

For us, and for our seed! with one accord
 They cross'd their fervent arms, and with bent head
 Inclined toward that awful voice from whence
 The inspiring impulse came. The Royal Goth
 Made answer,—I receive your vow for Spain
 And for the Lord of Hosts: your cause is good;
 Go forward in his spirit and his strength.

Ne'er in his happiest hours had Roderick
 With such commanding majesty dispensed
 His princely gifts, as dignified him now,
 When, with slow movement, solemnly upraised,
 Toward the kneeling troop he spread his arms,
 As if the expanded soul diffused itself,
 And carried to all spirits with the act
 Its effluent inspiration. Silently
 The people knelt, and when they rose, such awe
 Held them in silence, that the eagle's cry,
 Who far above them, at her highest flight
 A speck scarce visible, gyrod round and round,
 Was heard distinctly; and the mountain stream,
 Which from the distant glen sent forth its sounds
 Wafted upon the wind, grew audible
 In that deep hush of feeling, like the voice
 Of waters in the stillness of the night.

 XIII.

COUNT EUDON.

THAT awful silence still endured, when one,
 Who to the northern entrance of the vale
 Had turn'd his casual eye, exclaim'd, The Moors! —

For from the forest verge a troop were seen
 Hastening toward Pedro's hall. Their forward
 speed

Was check'd when they beheld his banner spread,
 And saw his order'd spears in prompt array,
 Marshalled to meet their coming. But the pride
 Of power and insolence of long command
 Prick'd on their Chief presumptuous: We are come

Late for prevention, cried the haughty Moor,
 But never time more fit for punishment!
 These unbelieving slaves must feel and know
 Their master's arm!—On, faithful Mussulmen,
 On—on,—and hew down the rebellious dogs!—
 Then, as he spurr'd his steed, Allah is great!
 Mahommed is his Prophet! he exclaim'd,
 And led the charge.

Count Pedro met the Chief
 In full career; ne bore him from his horse
 A full spear's length upon the lance transfix'd;
 Then leaving in his breast the mortal shaft,
 Pass'd on, and, breaking through the turban'd files,
 Open'd a path. Pelayo, who that day
 Fought in the ranks afoot, for other war
 Yet unequipp'd, pursued and smote the foe,
 But ever on Alphonso, at his side,
 Retained a watchful eye. The gallant boy
 Gave his good sword that hour its earliest taste

Of Moorish blood,—that sword, whose hungry edge,
 Through the fair course of all his glorious life,
 From that auspicious day, was fed so well.
 Cheap was the victory now for Spain achieved;
 For the first fervor of their zeal inspired
 The Mountaineers,—the presence of their Chiefs,
 The sight of all dear objects, all dear ties,
 The air they breathed, the soil whereon they trod,
 Duty, devotion, faith, and hope, and joy.
 And little had the misbelievers ween'd
 In such impetuous onset to receive
 A greeting deadly as their own intent;
 Victims they thought to find, not men prepared
 And eager for the fight; their confidence
 Therefore gave way to wonder, and dismay
 Effected what astonishment began.
 Scatter'd before the impetuous Mountaineers,
 Buckler, and spear, and cimeter they dropp'd,
 As in precipitate rout they fled before
 The Asturian sword: the vales, and hills, and rocks,
 Received their blood, and where they fell the wolves
 At evening found them.

From the fight apart

Two Africans had stood, who held in charge
 Count Eudon. When they saw their countrymen
 Falter, give way, and fly before the foe,
 One turn'd toward him with malignant rage,
 And saying, Infidel! thou shalt not live
 To join their triumph! aim'd against his neck
 The moony falchion's point. His comrade raised
 A hasty hand, and turn'd its edge aside,
 Yet so that o'er the shoulder glancing down,
 It scarr'd him as it pass'd. The murderous Moor,
 Not tarrying to secure his vengeance, fled;
 While he of milder mood, at Eudon's feet
 Fell and embraced his knees. The mountaineer
 Who found them thus, withheld at Eudon's voice
 His wrathful hand, and led them to his Lord.

Count Pedro, and Alphonso, and the Prince
 Stood on a little rocky eminence
 Which overlook'd the vale. Pedro had put
 His helmet off, and with sonorous horn
 Blew the recall; for well he knew what thoughts,
 Calm as the Prince appear'd and undisturb'd,
 Lay underneath his silent fortitude;
 And how at this eventful juncture speed
 Imported more than vengeance. Thrice he sent
 The long-resounding signal forth, which rung
 From hill to hill, reëchoing far and wide.
 Slow and unwillingly his men obey'd
 The swelling horn's reiterated call;
 Repining that a single foe escaped
 The retribution of that righteous hour.
 With lingering step reluctant from the chase
 They turn'd,—their veins full-swollen, their sinews strung
 For battle still, their hearts unsatisfied;
 Their swords were dropping still with Moorish
 blood,
 And where they wiped their reeking brows, the stain

Of Moorish gore was left. But when they came
 Where Pedro, with Alphonso at his side,
 Stood to behold their coming, then they press'd,
 All emulous, with gratulation round,
 Extolling, for his deeds that day display'd,
 The noble boy. Oh! when had Heaven, they said,
 With such especial favor manifest
 Illustrated a first essay in arms!
 They bless'd the father from whose loins he sprung,
 The mother at whose happy breast he fed;
 And pray'd that their young hero's fields might be
 Many, and all like this.

Thus they indulged

The honest heart, exuberant of love,
 When that loquacious joy at once was check'd,
 For Eudon and the Moor were brought before
 Count Pedro. Both came fearfully and pale,
 But with a different fear: the African
 Felt, at this crisis of his destiny,
 Such apprehension as without reproach
 Might blanch a soldier's cheek, when life and death
 Hang on another's will, and helplessly
 He must abide the issue. But the thoughts
 Which quail'd Count Eudon's heart, and made his limbs

Quiver, were of his own unworthiness,
 Old enmity, and that he stood in power
 Of hated and hereditary foes.
 I came not with them willingly! he cried,
 Addressing Pedro and the Prince at once,
 Rolling from each to each his restless eyes
 Aghast,—the Moor can tell I had no choice;
 They forced me from my castle:—in the fight
 They would have slain me:—see, I bleed! The Moor

Can witness that a Moorish cimeter
 Inflicted this:—he saved me from worse hurt:—
 I did not come in arms:—he knows it all;—
 Speak, man, and let the truth be known to clear
 My innocence!

Thus as he ceased, with fear
 And rapid utterance, panting open-mouth'd,
 Count Pedro half repress'd a mournful smile,
 Wherein compassion seem'd to mitigate
 His deep contempt. Methinks, said he, the Moor
 Might with more reason look himself to find
 An intercessor, than be call'd upon
 To play the pleader's part. Didst thou then save
 The Baron from thy comrades?

Let my Lord

Show mercy to me, said the Mussulman,
 As I am free from falsehood. We were left,
 I and another, holding him in charge;
 My fellow would have slain him when he saw
 How the fight fared; I turn'd the cimeter
 Aside, and trust that life will be the meed
 For life by me preserved.

Nor shall thy trust,
 Rejoin'd the Count, be vain. Say further now,
 From whence ye came;—your orders, what—what force
 In Gegio; and if others like yourselves
 Are in the field.

The African replied,
 We came from Gegio, order'd to secure

This Baron on the way, and seek thee here
To bear thee hence in bonds. A messenger
From Cordoba, whose speed denoted well
He came with urgent tidings, was the cause
Of this our sudden movement. We went forth
Three hundred men; an equal force was sent
For Cangas, on like errand, as I ween.
Four hundred in the city then were left.
If other force be moving from the south,
I know not, save that all appearances
Denote alarm and vigilance

The Prince

Fix'd upon Eudon then his eye severe;
Baron, he said, the die of war is cast;
What part art thou prepared to take? against,
Or with the oppressor?

Not against my friends,—

Not against you!—the irresolute wretch replied,
Hasty, yet faltering in his fearful speech;
But,—have ye weigh'd it well?—It is not yet
Too late,—their numbers,—their victorious force,
Which hath already trodden in the dust
The sceptre of the Goths:—the throne destroy'd,—

Our towns subdued,—our country overrun,—
The people to the yoke of their new Lords
Resign'd in peace—Can I not mediate?—
Were it not better through my agency
To gain such terms,—such honorable terms?—

Terms! cried Pelayo, cutting short at once
That dastard speech, and cheeking, ere it grew
Too powerful for restraint, the incipient wrath
Which in indignant murmurs breathing round,
Rose like a gathering storm, learn thou what terms
Asturias, this day speaking by my voice,
Doth constitute to be the law between Thee and thy Country. Our portentous age,
As with an earthquake's desolating force,
Hath loosen'd and disjointed the whole frame
Of social order, and she calls not now
For service with the force of sovereign will.
That which was common duty in old times,
Becomes an arduous, glorious virtue now;
And every one, as between Hell and Heaven,
In free election must be left to choose.
Asturias asks not of thee to partake
The cup which we have pledged; she claims from none

The dauntless fortitude, the mind resolved,
Which only God can give;—therefore such peace
As thou canst find where all around is war,
She leaves thee to enjoy. But think not, Count,
That because thou art weak, one valiant arm,
One generous spirit must be lost to Spain!
The vassal owes no service to the Lord
Who to his Country doth acknowledge none.
The summons which thou hast not heart to give,
I and Count Pedro over thy domains
Will send abroad; the vassals who were thine
Will fight beneath our banners, and our wants
Shall from thy lands, as from a patrimony
Which hath reverted to the common stock,
Be fed: such tribute, too, as to the Moors
Thou renderest, we will take It is the price

Which in this land for weakness must be paid
While evil stars prevail. And mark me, Chief!
Fear is a treacherous counsellor! I know
Thou think'st that beneath his horses' hoofs
The Moor will trample our poor numbers down;
But join not, in contempt of us and Heaven,
His multitudes! for if thou shouldst be found
Against thy country, on the readiest tree
Those recreant bones shall rattle in the wind,
When the birds have left them bare.

As thus he spake,

Count Eudon heard and trembled: every joint
Was loosen'd, every fibre of his flesh
Thrill'd, and from every pore effused, cold sweat
Clung on his quivering limbs. Shame forced it forth,

Envy, and inward consciousness, and fear
Predominant, which stifled in his heart
Hatred and rage. Before his livid lips
Could shape to utterance their essay'd reply,
Compassionately Pedro interposed.
Go, Baron, to the Castle, said the Count;
There let thy wound be look'd to, and consult Thy better mind at leisure. Let this Moor
Attend upon thee there, and when thou wilt,
Follow thy fortunes—To Pelayo then
He turn'd, and saying, All-too-long, O Prince,
Hath this unlook'd-for conflict held thee here,—
He bade his gallant men begin their march.

Flush'd with success, and in auspicious hour,
The Mountaineers set forth. Blessings and prayers
Pursued them at their parting, and the tears
Which fell were tears of fervor, not of grief.
The sun was verging to the western slope
Of Heaven, but they till midnight travell'd on;
Renewing then at early dawn their way,
They held their unremitting course from morn
Till latest eve, such urgent cause impell'd;
And night had closed around, when to the vale
Where Sella in her ampler bed receives
Pionia's stream they came. Massive and black
Pelayo's castle there was seen; its lines
And battlements against the deep blue sky
Distinct in solid darkness visible.
No light is in the tower. Eager to know
The worst, and with that fatal certainty
To terminate intolerable dread,
He spurr'd his courser forward. All his fears
Too surely are fulfill'd,—for open stand
The doors, and mournfully at times a dog
Fills with his howling the deserted hall.
A moment overcome with wretchedness,
Silent Pelayo stood! recovering then,
Lord God, resign'd he cried, thy will be done!

XIV.

THE RESCUE.

COUNT, said Pelayo, Nature hath assign'd
Two sovereign remedies for human grief;

Religion, surest, firmest, first and best,
 Strength to the weak, and to the wounded balm ;
 And strenuous action next. Think not I came
 With unprovided heart. My noble wife,
 In the last solemn words, the last farewell
 With which she charged her secret messenger,
 Told me that whatsoe'er was my resolve,
 She bore a mind prepared. And well I know
 The evil, be it what it may, hath found
 In her a courage equal to the hour.
 Captivity, or death, or what worse pangs,
 She in her children may be doom'd to feel,
 Will never make that steady soul repent
 Its virtuous purpose. I, too, did not cast
 My single life into the lot, but knew
 These dearer pledges on the die were set ;
 And if the worst have fallen, I shall but bear
 That in my breast, which, with transfiguring power
 Of piety, makes chastening sorrow take
 The form of hope, and sees, in Death, the friend
 And the restoring Angel. We must rest
 Perforce, and wait what tidings night may bring,
 Haply of comfort. Ho, there ! kindle fires,
 And see if aught of hospitality
 Can yet within these mournful walls be found !

Thus while he spake, lights were descried far off
 Moving among the trees, and coming sounds
 Were heard as of a distant multitude.
 Anon a company of horse and foot,
 Advancing in disorderly array,
 Came up the vale ; before them and beside
 Their torches flash'd on Sella's rippling stream ;
 Now gleam'd through chestnut groves, emerging
 now,
 O'er their huge boughs and radiated leaves
 Cast broad and bright a transitory glare.
 That sight inspired with strength the mountaineers ;
 All sense of weariness, all wish for rest
 At once were gone ; impatient in desire
 Of second victory alert they stood ;
 And when the hostile symbols, which from far
 Imagination to their wish had shaped,
 Vanish'd in nearer vision, high-wrought hope
 Departing, left the spirit pall'd and blank.
 No turban'd race, no sons of Africa
 Were they who now came winding up the vale,
 As waving wide before their horses' feet
 The torch-light floated, with its hovering glare
 Blackening the incumbent and surrounding night.
 Helmet and breastplate glitter'd as they came,
 And spears erect ; and nearer as they drew
 Were the loose folds of female garments seen
 On those who led the company. Who then
 Had stood beside Pelayo, might have heard
 The beating of his heart.

But vainly there
 Sought he with wistful eye the well-known forms
 Beloved ; and plainly might it now be seen,
 That from some bloody conflict they return'd
 Victorious, — for at every saddle-bow
 A gory head was hung. Anon, they stopp'd,
 Levelling, in quick alarm, their ready spears.
 Hold ! who goes there ? cried one. A hundred tongues

Sent forth with one accord the glad reply, Friends and Asturians. Onward moved the lights, —
 The people knew their lord.

Then what a shout
 Rung through the valley ! From their clay-built nests,
 Beneath the overbrowng battlements,
 Now first disturb'd, the affrighted martins flew,
 And uttering notes of terror short and shrill,
 Amid the yellow glare and lurid smoke
 Wheel'd giddily. Then plainly was it shown
 How well the vassals loved their generous lord,
 How like a father the Asturian Prince
 Was dear. They crowded round ; they clasp'd his knees ;
 They snatch'd his hand ; they fell upon his neck, —
 They wept ; — they blest Almighty Providence,
 Which had restored him thus from bondage free ;
 God was with them and their good cause, they said ;
 His hand was here. — His shield was over them, —
 His spirit was abroad, — His power displayed ;
 And pointing to their bloody trophies then,
 They told Pelayo, there he might behold
 The first fruits of the harvest they should soon
 Reap in the field of war ! Benignantly,
 With voice, and look, and gesture, did the Prince
 To these warm greetings of tumultuous joy
 Respond ; and sure, if at that moment aught
 Could for a while have overpower'd those fears
 Which, from the inmost heart, o'er all his frame
 Diffused their chilling influence, worthy pride,
 And sympathy of love, and joy, and hope,
 Had then possess'd him wholly. Even now
 His spirit rose ; the sense of power, the sight
 Of his brave people, ready where he led
 To fight their country's battles, and the thought
 Of instant action, and deliverance, —
 If Heaven, which thus far had protected him,
 Should favor still, — revived his heart, and gave Fresh impulse to its spring. In vain he sought,
 Amid that turbulent greeting, to inquire
 Where Gaudiosa was, his children where,
 Who call'd them to the field, who captain'd them ;
 And how these women, thus with arms and death
 Environ'd, came amid their company ;
 For yet, amid the fluctuating light
 And tumult of the crowd, he knew them not.

Guisla was one. The Moors had found in her
 A willing and concerted prisoner.
 Gladly to Gegio, to the renegade,
 On whom her loose and shameless love was bent,
 Had she set forth ; and in her heart she curs'd
 The busy spirit, who, with powerful call
 Rousing Pelayo's people, led them on
 In quick pursuit, and victoriously
 Achieved the rescue, to her mind perverse
 Unwelcome as unlook'd for. With dismay
 She recognized her brother, dreaded now
 More than he once was dear ; her countenance
 Was turn'd toward him, — not with eager joy
 To court his sight, and meeting its first glance,
 Exchange delightful welcome, soul with soul :
 Hers was the conscious eye, that cannot choose

But look to what it fears. She could not shun
His presence, and the rigid smile constrain'd,
With which she coldly dress'd her features, ill
Conceal'd her inward thoughts, and the despite
Of obstinate guilt and unrepentant shame.
Sullenly thus, upon her mule she sat,
Waiting the greeting which she did not dare
Bring on. But who is she that, at her side,
Upon a stately war-horse eminent,
Holds the loose rein with careless hand? A helm
Presses the clusters of her flaxen hair;
The shield is on her arm; her breast is mail'd;
A sword-belt is her girdle, and right well
It may be seen that sword hath done its work
To-day, for upward from the wrist her sleeve
Is stiff with blood. An unregardant eye,
As one whose thoughts were not of earth, she cast
Upon the turmoil round. One countenance
So strongly mark'd, so passion-worn, was there,
That it recall'd her mind. Ha! Maccabee!
Lifting her arm, exultingly she cried,
Did I not tell thee we should meet in joy?
Well, Brother, hast thou done thy part,—I, too,
Have not been wanting! Now be His the praise
From whom the impulse came!

That startling call,
That voice so well remember'd, touch'd the Goth
With timely impulse now; for he had seen
His Mother's face,—and at her sight, the past
And present mingled like a frightful dream,
Which from some dread reality derives
Its deepest horror. Adosinda's voice
Dispersed the waking vision. Little deem'd
Rusilla, at that moment, that the child,
For whom her supplications day and night
Were offer'd, breathed the living air. Her heart
Was calm; her placid countenance, though grief
Deeper than time had left its traces there,
Retain'd its dignity serene; yet, when Siverian, pressing through the people, kiss'd
Her reverend hand, some quiet tears ran down.
As she approach'd the Prince, the crowd made way
Respectful. The maternal smile which bore
Her greeting, from Pelayo's heart at once
Dispell'd its boding. What he would have ask'd
She knew, and bending from her palfrey down,
Told him that they for whom he look'd were safe,
And that in secret he should hear the rest.

 XV.

RODERICK AT CANGAS.

How calmly gliding through the dark-blue sky
The midnight Moon ascends! Her placid beams
Through thinly-scatter'd leaves and boughs grotesque,
Mottle with mazy shades the orchard slope;
Here, o'er the chestnut's fretted foliage, gray
And massy, motionless they spread; here shine
Upon the crags, deepening with blacker night
Their chasms; and there the glittering argentry
Ripples and glances on the confluent streams.

A lovelier, purer light than that of day
Rests on the hills; and oh, how awfully
Into that deep and tranquil firmament
The summits of Auseva rise serene!
The watchman on the battlements partakes
The stillness of the solemn hour; he feels
The silence of the earth, the endless sound
Of flowing water soothes him, and the stars,
Which in that brightest moonlight well nigh quench'd
Scarce visible, as in the utmost depth
Of yonder sapphire infinite, are seen,
Draw on, with elevating influence,
Toward eternity the attemper'd mind.
Musing on worlds beyond the grave he stands,
And to the Virgin Mother silently
Prefers her hymn of praise.

The mountaineers
Before the castle, round their mouldering fires,
Lie on the hearth outstretch'd. Pelayo's hall
Is full, and he upon his careful couch
Hears all around the deep and long-drawn breath
Of sleep; for gentle night hath brought to these Perfect and undisturb'd repose, alike
Of corporal powers and inward faculty.
Wakeful the while he lay, yet more by hope
Than grief or anxious thoughts possess'd,—though grief

For Guisla's guilt, which freshen'd in his heart
The memory of their wretched mother's crime,
Still made its presence felt, like the dull sense
Of some perpetual inward malady;
And the whole peril of the future lay
Before him clearly seen. He had heard all;
How that unworthy sister, obstinate
In wrong and shameless, rather seem'd to woo
The upstart renegado than to wait
His wooing; how, as guilt to guilt led on,
Spurning at gentle admonition first,
When Gaudiosa hopelessly forbore
From further counsel, then in sullen mood
Resentful, Guisla soon began to hate
The virtuous presence before which she felt
Her nature how inferior, and her fault
How foul. Despiteful thus she grew, because Humbled, yet unrepentant. Who could say
To what excess bad passions might impel
A woman thus possess'd? She could not fail
To mark Siverian's absence, for what end
Her conscience but too surely had divined;
And Gaudiosa, well aware that all
To the vile paramour was thus made known,
Had to safe hiding-place, with timely fear,
Removed her children. Well the event had proved
How needful was that caution; for at night
She sought the mountain solitudes, and morn
Beheld Numacian's soldiers at the gate.
Yet did not sorrow in Pelayo's heart
For this domestic shame prevail that hour,
Nor gathering danger weigh his spirit down.
The anticipated meeting put to flight
These painful thoughts: to-morrow will restore
All whom his heart holds dear; his wife beloved,
No longer now remember'd for regret,
Is present to his soul with hope and joy;

His inward eye beholds Favila's form
In opening youth robust, and Hermesind,
His daughter, lovely as a budding rose ;
Their images beguile the hours of night,
Till with the earliest morning he may seek
Their secret hold.

The nightingale not yet
Had ceased her song, nor had the early lark
Her dewy nest forsaken, when the Prince
Upward beside Pionia took his way
Toward Auseva. Heavily to him,
Impatient for the morrow's happiness,
Long night had linger'd ; but it seem'd more long
To Roderick's aching heart. He, too, had watch'd
For dawn, and seen the earliest break of day,
And heard its earliest sounds ; and when the Prince
Went forth, the melancholy man was seen
With pensive pace upon Pionia's side
Wandering alone and slow. For he had left
The wearying place of his unrest, that morn
With its cold dews might bathe his throbbing brow,
And with its breath allay the feverish heat
That burnt within. Alas ! the gales of morn
Reach not the fever of a wounded heart !
How shall he meet his Mother's eye, how make
His secret known, and from that voice revered
Obtain forgiveness, — all that he has now
To ask, ere on the lap of earth in peace
He lay his head resign'd ? In silent prayer
He supplicated Heaven to strengthen him
Against that trying hour, there seeking aid
Where all who seek shall find ; and thus his soul
Received support, and gather'd fortitude,
Never than now more needful, for the hour
Was nigh. He saw Siverian drawing near,
And with a dim but quick foreboding met
The good old man ; yet when he heard him say,
My Lady sends to seek thee, like a knell
To one expecting and prepared for death,
But fearing the dread point that hastens on,
It smote his heart. He follow'd silently,
And knit his suffering spirit to the proof.

He went resolved to tell his Mother all,
Fall at her feet, and drinking the last dregs
Of bitterness, receive the only good
Earth had in store for him. Resolved for this
He went ; yet was it a relief to find
That painful resolution must await
A fitter season, when no eye but Heaven's Might witness to their mutual agony.
Count Julian's daughter with Rusilla sat ;
Both had been weeping, both were pale, but calm.
With head as for humility abased
Roderick approach'd, and bending, on his breast
He cross'd his humble arms. Rusilla rose
In reverence to the priestly character,
And with a mournful eye regarding him,
Thus she began : — Good Father, I have heard
From my old faithful servant and true friend,
Thou didst reprove the inconsiderate tongue,
That in the anguish of its spirit pour'd
A curse upon my poor unhappy child.
O Father Maccabee, this is a hard world,
And hasty in its judgments ! Time has been,

When not a tongue within the Pyrenees
Dared whisper in dispraise of Roderick's name,
Lest, if the conscious air had caught the sound,
The vengeance of the honest multitude
Should fall upon the traitorous head, or brand
For life-long infamy the lying lips.
Now, if a voice be raised in his behalf,
'Tis noted for a wonder, and the man
Who utters the strange speech shall be admired
For such excess of Christian charity.
Thy Christian charity hath not been lost ; —
Father, I feel its virtue : — it hath been Balm to my heart ; — with words and grateful tears, —
All that is left me now for gratitude, —
I thank thee, and beseech thee in thy prayers
That thou wilt still remember Roderick's name.

Roderick so long had to this hour look'd on,
That when the actual point of trial came,
Torpid and numb'd it found him ; cold he grew,
And as the vital spirits to the heart
Retreated o'er his wither'd countenance,
Deathly and damp, a whiter paleness spread.
Unmoved the while, the inward feeling seem'd,
Even in such dull insensibility
As gradual age brings on, or slow disease,
Beneath whose progress lingering life survives
The power of suffering. Wondering at himself,
Yet gathering confidence, he raised his eyes,
Then slowly shaking as he bent his head,
O venerable Lady, he replied,
If aught may comfort that unhappy soul,
It must be thy compassion, and thy prayers.
She whom he most hath wrong'd, she who alone
On earth can grant forgiveness for his crime,
She hath forgiven him ; and thy blessing now
Were all that he could ask, — all that could bring Profit or consolation to his soul,
If he hath been, as sure we may believe,
A penitent sincere.

Oh, had he lived,
Replied Rusilla, never penitence
Had equal'd his ! full well I know his heart,
Vehement in all things. He would on himself
Have wreak'd such penance as had reach'd the height
Of fleshly suffering — yea, which being told
With its portentous rigor should have made
The memory of his fault, o'erpower'd and lost
In shuddering pity and astonishment,
Fade like a feebler horror. Otherwise
Seem'd good to Heaven. I murmur not, nor doubt
The boundless mercy of redeeming love.
For sure I trust that not in his offence
Harden'd and reprobate was my lost son,
A child of wrath, cut off ! — that dreadful thought,
Not even amid the first fresh wretchedness,
When the ruin burst around me like a flood,
Assail'd my soul. I ever deem'd his fall
An act of sudden madness ; and this day
Hath in unlook'd-for confirmation given
A livelier hope, a more assur'd faith.
Smiling benignant then amid her tears,
She took Florinda by the hand, and said,

I little thought that I should live to bless
Count Julian's daughter! She hath brought to me
The last, the best, the only comfort earth
Could minister to this afflicted heart,
And my gray hairs may now unto the grave
Go down in peace.

Happy, Florinda cried,
Are they for whom the grave hath peace in store!
The wrongs they have sustain'd, the woes they bear,
Pass not that holy threshold, where Death heals
The broken heart. O Lady, thou mayst trust
In humble hope, through Him who on the Cross
Gave his atoning blood for lost mankind,
To meet beyond the grave thy child forgiven.
I too with Roderick there may interchange Forgiveness. But the grief which wastes away
This mortal frame, hastening the happy hour
Of my enlargement, is but a light part
Of what my soul endures! — that grief hath lost
Its sting: — I have a keener sorrow here, —
One which, — but God forefend that dire event, —
May pass with me the portals of the grave,
And with a thought, like sin which cannot die,
Imbitter Heaven. My father hath renounced
His hope in Christ! It was his love for me
Which drove him to perdition — I was born
To ruin all who loved me, — all I loved!
Perhaps I sinn'd in leaving him; — that fear
Rises within me to disturb the peace
Which I should else have found.

To Roderick then
The pious mourner turn'd her suppliant eyes:
O Father, there is virtue in thy prayers!
I do beseech thee offer them to Heaven
In his behalf! For Roderick's sake, for mine,
Wrestle with Him whose name is Merciful,
That Julian may with penitence be touch'd,
And clinging to the Cross, implore that grace
Which ne'er was sought in vain. For Roderick's sake
And mine, pray for him! We have been the cause
Of his offence! What other miseries
May from that same unhappy source have risen,
Are earthly, temporal, repairable all; —
But if a soul be lost through our misdeeds,
That were eternal evil! Pray for him,
Good Father Maccabee, and be thy prayers
More fervent, as the deeper is the crime.

While thus Florinda spake, the dog who lay
Before Rusilla's feet, eyeing him long
And wistfully, had recognized at length,
Changed as he was and in those sordid weeds,
His royal master. And he rose and lick'd
His wither'd hand, and earnestly look'd up
With eyes whose human meaning did not need
The aid of speech; and moan'd, as if at once
To court and chide the long-withheld caress.
A feeling uncommix'd with sense of guilt
Or shame, yet painfulest, thrill'd through the King;
But he to self-control now long inured,
Repress'd his rising heart, nor other tears,
Full as his struggling bosom was, let fall

Than seem'd to follow on Florinda's words.
Looking toward her then, yet so that still
He shunn'd the meeting of her eye, he said,
Virtuous and pious as thou art, and ripe
For Heaven, O Lady, I must think the man
Hath not by his good Angel been cast off
For whom thy supplications rise. The Lord,
Whose justice doth in its unerring course
Visit the children for the sire's offence,
Shall He not in his boundless merey hear
The daughter's prayer, and for her sake restore
The guilty parent? My soul shall with thine
In earnest and continual duty join. —
How deeply, how devoutly, He will know
To whom the cry is raised!

Thus having said,
Deliberately, in self-possession still,
Himself from that most painful interview
Dispeeding, he withdrew. The watchful dog
Follow'd his footsteps close. But he retired
Into the thickest grove; there yielding way
To his o'erburden'd nature, from all eyes
Apart, he cast himself upon the ground,
And threw his arms around the dog, and cried,
While tears stream'd down, Thou, Theron, thou hast known
Thy poor lost master, — Theron, none but thou!

COVADONGA.

MEANTIME Pelayo up the vale pursued
Eastward his way, before the sun had climb'd
Auseva's brow, or shed his silvering beams
Upon Europa's summit, where the snows
Through all revolving seasons hold their seat.
A happy man he went, his heart at rest,
Of hope, and virtue, and affection full,
To all exhilarating influences
Of earth and heaven alive. With kindred joy
He heard the lark, who from her airy height,
On twinkling pinions poised, pour'd forth profuse,
In thrilling sequence of exuberant song,
As one whose joyous nature overflow'd
With life and power, her rich and rapturous strain.
The early bee, buzzing along the way,
From flower to flower, bore gladness on its wing
To his rejoicing sense; and he pursued,
With quicken'd eye alert, the frolic hare,
Where from the green herb in her wanton path
She brush'd away the dews. For he long time,
Far from his home and from his native hills,
Had dwelt in bondage; and the mountain breeze,
Which he had with the breath of infancy
Inhaled, such impulse to his heart restored,
As if the seasons had roll'd back, and life
Enjoy'd a second spring.

Through fertile fields
He went, by cots with pear-trees overbower'd,
Or spreading to the sun their trellised vines;
Through orchards now, and now by thymy banks,
Where wooden hives in some warm nook were hid

From wind and shower ; and now through shadowy paths,

Where hazels fringed Pionia's vocal stream ;
Till where the loftier hills to narrower bound
Confine the vale, he reach'd those huts remote,
Which should hereafter to the noble line
Of Soto origin and name impart ;
A gallant lineage, long in fields of war
And faithful chronieler's enduring page
Blazon'd ; but most by him illustrated,
Avid of gold, yet greedier of renown,
Whom not the spoils of Atabalipa
Could satisfy insatiate, nor the fame
Of that wide empire overthrown appease ;
But he to Florida's disastrous shores
In evil hour his gallant comrades led,
Through savage woods and swamps, and hostile tribes,

The Apalachian arrows, and the snares
Of wiler foes, hunger, and thirst, and toil ;
Till from ambition's feverish dream the touch
Of Death awoke him ; and when he had seen
The fruit of all his treasures, all his toil,
Foresight, and long endurance, fade away,
Earth to the restless one refusing rest,
In the great river's midland bed he left
His honor'd bones.

A mountain rivulet,
Now calm and lovely in its summer course,
Held by those huts its everlasting way
Towards Pionia. They, whose flocks and herds
Drink of its water, call it Deva. Here
Pelayo southward up the ruder vale
Traced it, his guide unerring. Amid heaps
Of mountain wreck, on either side thrown high,
The wide-spread traces of its wintry might,
The tortuous channel wound ; o'er beds of sand
Here silently it flows ; here, from the rock
Rebutted, curls and eddies ; plunges here
Precipitate ; here roaring among crags,
It leaps, and foams, and whirls, and hurries on.
Gray alders here and bushy hazels hid
The mossy side ; their wreath'd and knotted feet,
Bared by the current, now against its force
Repaying the support they found, upheld
The bank secure. Here, bending to the stream,
The birch fantastic stretch'd its rugged trunk,
Tall and erect from whence, as from their base,
Each like a tree, its silver branches grew.
The cherry here hung, for the birds of heaven,
Its rosy fruit on high. The elder there
Its purple berries o'er the water bent,
Heavily hanging. Here, amid the brook,
Gray as the stone to which it elung, half root,
Half trunk, the young ash rises from the rock ;
And there its parent lifts a lofty head,
And spreads its graceful boughs ; the passing wind
With twinkling motion lifts the silent leaves,
And shakes its rattling tufts.

Soon had the Prince
Behind him left the farthest dwelling-place
Of man ; no fields of waving corn were here,
Nor wicker storehouse for the autumnal grain,
Vineyard, nor bowery fig, nor fruitful grove ;
Only the rocky vale, the mountain stream,

Incumbent crags, and hills that over hills
Arose on either hand, here hung with woods,
Here rich with heath, that o'er some smooth ascent

Its purple glory spread, or golden gorse ;
Bare here, and striated with many a hue,
Scored by the wintry rain ; by torrents here
Riven, and with overhanging rocks abrupt.
Pelayo, upward as he cast his eyes
Where crags loose-hanging o'er the narrow pass
Impended, there beheld his country's strength
Insuperable, and in his heart rejoiced.
Oh that the Mussulman were here, he cried,
With all his myriads ! While thy day endures,
Moor ! thou mayst lord it in the plains ; but here
Hath nature, for the free and brave, prepared
A sanctuary, where no oppressor's power,
No might of human tyranny, can pierce

The tears which started then sprang not alone
From lofty thoughts of elevating joy ;
For love and admiration had their part,
And virtuous pride. Here then thou hast retired,
My Gaudiosa ! in his heart he said ;
Excellent woman ! ne'er was richer boon
By fate benign to favor'd man indulged,
Than when thou wert, before the face of Heaven,
Given me to be my children's mother, brave
And virtuous as thou art ! Here thou hast fled,
Thou, who wert nursed in palaces, to dwell
In rocks and mountain caves ! — The thought was proud,

Yet not without a sense of inmost pain ;
For never had Pelayo, till that hour,
So deeply felt the force of solitude.
High over head, the eagle soar'd serene,
And the gray lizard, on the rocks below,
Bask'd in the sun : no living creature else,
In this remotest wilderness, was seen ;
Nor living voice was there, — only the flow
Of Deva, and the rushing of its springs,
Long in the distance heard, which nearer now,
With endless repercussion deep and loud,
Throbb'd on the dizzy sense.

The ascending vale,
Long straiten'd by the narrowing mountains,
here

Was closed. In front, a rock, abrupt and bare,
Stood eminent, in height exceeding far
All edifice of human power, by King,
Or Caliph, or barbaric Sultan rear'd,
Or mightier tyrants of the world of old,
Assyrian or Egyptian, in their pride ;
Yet, far above, beyond the reach of sight,
Swell after swell, the heathery mountain rose
Here, in two sources, from the living rock
The everlasting springs of Deva gush'd.
Upon a smooth and grassy plat below,
By nature there, as for an altar, dress'd,
They join'd their sister stream, which from the earth

Well'd silently. In such a scene, rude man,
With pardonable error, might have knelt,
Feeling a present Deity, and made
His offering to the fountain Nymph devout

The arching rock disclosed, above the springs,
 A cave, where hugest son of giant birth,
 That e'er of old in forest of romance
 'Gainst knights and ladies waged discourteous war,
 Erect within the portal, might have stood.
 The broken stone allow'd for hand and foot
 No difficult ascent, above the base
 In height a tall man's stature, measured thrice.
 No holier spot than Covadonga Spain
 Boasts in her wide extent, though all her realms
 Be with the noblest blood of martyrdom,
 In elder or in later days, enrich'd,
 And glorified with tales of heavenly aid
 By many a miracle made manifest;
 Nor in the heroic annals of her fame
 Doth she show forth a scene of more renown.
 Then, save the hunter, drawn in keen pursuit
 Beyond his wonted haunts, or shepherd's boy,
 Following the pleasure of his straggling flock,
 None knew the place.

Pelayo, when he saw

Those glittering sources and their sacred cave,
 Took from his side the bugle, silver-tipt,
 And with a breath long drawn, and slow expired,
 Sent forth that strain, which, echoing from the walls

Of Cangas, went to tell his glad return
 When from the chase he came. At the first sound
 Favila started in the cave, and cried,
 My father's horn! — A sudden flush suffused
 Hermesind's cheek, and she with quicken'd eye
 Look'd eager to her mother silently;
 But Gaudiosa trembled and grew pale,
 Doubting her sense deceived. A second time
 The bugle breathed its well-known notes abroad;
 And Hermesind around her mother's neck
 Threw her white arms, and earnestly exclaim'd,
 'Tis he! — But when a third and broader blast
 Rung in the echoing archway, ne'er did wand,
 With magic power endued, call up a sight
 So strange, as sure in that wild solitude
 It seem'd, when from the bowels of the rock
 The mother and her children hastened forth;
 She in the sober charms and dignity
 Of womanhood mature, nor verging yet
 Upon decay; in gesture like a Queen,
 Such inborn and habitual majesty
 Ennobled all her steps — or Priestess, chosen
 Because within such faultless work of Heaven
 Inspiring Deity might seem to make Its habitation known, — Favila such
 In form and stature as the Sea Nymph's son,
 When that wise Centaur from his cave well pleased
 Beheld the boy divine his growing strength
 Against some shaggy lionet essay,
 And fixing in the half-grown mane his hands,
 Roll with him in fierce dalliance intertwined.
 But like a creature of some higher sphere
 His sister came; she scarcely touch'd the rock,
 So light was Hermesind's aerial speed.
 Beauty, and grace, and innocence in her
 In heavenly union shone. One who had held
 The faith of elder Greece, would sure have thought
 She was some glorious nymph of seed divine,

Oread or Dryad, of Diana's train
 The youngest and the loveliest: yea, she seem'd
 Angel, or soul beatified, from realms
 Of bliss, on errand of parental love,
 To earth re-sent, — if tears and trembling limbs
 With such celestial natures might consist.

Embraced by all, in turn embracing each,
 The husband and the father for a while Forgot his country and all things beside:
 Life hath few moments of such pure delight,
 Such foretaste of the perfect joy of Heaven.
 And when the thought recurr'd of sufferings past,
 Perils which threaten'd still, and arduous toil
 Yet to be undergone, remember'd griefs
 Heighten'd the present happiness; and hope
 Upon the shadows of futurity
 Shone like the sun upon the morning mists,
 When driven before his rising rays they roll,
 And melt, and leave the prospect bright and clear.

When now Pelayo's eyes had drank their fill
 Of love from those dear faces, he went up
 To view the hiding-place. Spacious it was
 As that Sicilian cavern in the hill,
 Wherein earth-shaking Neptune's giant son
 Duly at eve was wont to fold his flock,
 Ere the wise Ithacan, over that brute force
 By wiles prevailing, for a life-long night
 Seel'd his broad eye. The healthful air had here
 Free entrance, and the cheerful light of heaven;
 But at the end, an opening in the floor
 Of rock disclosed a wider vault below,
 Which never sunbeam visited, nor breath
 Of vivifying morning came to cheer.
 No light was there but that which from above
 In dim reflection fell, or found its way,
 Broken and quivering, through the glassy stream,
 Where through the rock it gush'd. That shadowy light
 Sufficed to show, where from their secret bed
 The waters issued; with whose rapid course,
 And with whose everlasting cataracts
 Such motion to the chill, damp atmosphere
 Was given, as if the solid walls of rock
 Were shaken with the sound.

Glad to respire

The upper air, Pelayo hasten'd back
 From that drear den. Look! Hermesind ex-
 claim'd,
 Taking her father's hand; thou hast not seen
 My chamber: — See! — did ever ringdove choose
 In so secure a nook her hiding-place,
 Or build a warmer nest? 'Tis fragrant too,
 As warm, and not more sweet than soft; for thyme
 And myrtle with the elastic leath are laid,
 And, over all, this dry and pillowy moss, —
 Smiling she spake. Pelayo kiss'd the child,
 And, sighing, said within himself, I trust
 In Heaven, when'er thy May of life is come,
 Sweet bird, that thou shalt have a blither bower!
 Fithier, he thought, such chamber might beseem
 Some hermit of Hilarion's school austere,
 Or old Antonius, he who from the hell

Of his bewilder'd phantasy saw fiends
 In actual vision, a foul throng grotesque
 Of all horrific shapes and forms obscene
 Crowd in broad day before his open eyes.
 That feeling east a momentary shade
 Of sadness o'er his soul. But deeper thoughts,
 If he might have foreseen the things to come,
 Would there have fill'd him; for within that cave

His own remains were one day doom'd to find
 Their final place of rest; and in that spot,
 Where that dear child with innocent delight
 Had spread her mossy couch, the sepulchre
 Shall in the consecrated rock be hewn,
 Where with Alphonso, her beloved lord,
 Laid side by side, must Hermesind partake
 The everlasting marriage-bed, when he,
 Leaving a name perdurable on earth,
 Hath changed his earthly for a heavenly crown.
 Dear child, upon that fated spot she stood,
 In all the beauty of her opening youth,
 In health's rich bloom, in virgin innocence,
 While her eyes sparkled and her heart o'erflow'd
 With pure and perfect joy of filial love.

Many a slow century since that day hath fill'd
 Its course, and countless multitudes have trod
 With pilgrim feet that consecrated cave;
 Yet not in all those ages, amid all
 The untold concourse, hath one breast been swollen
 With such emotions as Pelayo felt
 That hour. O Gaudiosa, he exclaim'd,
 And thou couldst seek for shelter here, amid
 This awful solitude, in mountain caves!
 Thou noble spirit! Oh, when hearts like thine
 Grow on this sacred soil, would it not be
 In me, thy husband, double infamy,
 And tenfold guilt, if I despair'd of Spain?
 In all her visitations, favoring Heaven
 Hath left her still the unconquerable mind;
 And thus being worthy of redemption, sure
 Is she to be redeem'd.

Beholding her
 Through tears he spake, and press'd upon her lips
 A kiss of deepest love. Think ever thus,
 She answer'd, and that faith will give the power
 In which it trusts. When to this mountain hold
 These children, thy dear images, I brought,
 I said within myself, Where should they fly
 But to the bosom of their native hills?
 I brought them here as to a sanctuary,
 Where, for the temple's sake, the indwelling
 God

Would guard his supplicants. O my dear Lord,
 Proud as I was to know that they were thine,
 Was it a sin if I almost believed,
 That Spain, her destiny being link'd with theirs,
 Must save the precious charge?

So let us think,
 The chief replied, so feel, and teach, and act.
 Spain is our common parent: let the sons
 Be to the parent true, and in her strength
 And Heaven, their sure deliverance they will find.

XVII.

RODERICK AND SIVERIAN.

O HOLIEST Mary, Maid and Mother! thou
 In Covadonga, at thy rocky shrine,
 Hast witness'd whatsoe'er of human bliss
 Heart can conceive most perfect! Faithful love,
 Long cross'd by envious stars, hath there attain'd
 Its crown, in endless matrimony given;
 The youthful mother there hath to the font
 Her first-born borne, and there, with deeper sense
 Of gratitude for that dear babe redeem'd
 From threatening death, return'd to pay her vows.
 But ne'er on nuptial, nor baptismal day,
 Nor from their grateful pilgrimage discharged,
 Did happier group their way down Deva's vale
 Rejoicing hold, than this blest family,
 O'er whom the mighty Spirit of the Land
 Spread his protecting wings. The children, free
 In youthhead's happy season from all cares
 That might disturb the hour, yet capable
 Of that intense and unalloyed delight
 Which childhood feels when it enjoys again
 The dear parental presence long deprived;
 Nor were the parents now less bless'd than they,
 Even to the height of human happiness;
 For Gaudiosa and her Lord that hour
 Let no misgiving thoughts intrude: she fix'd
 Her hopes on him, and his were fix'd on Heaven,
 And hope in that courageous heart derived
 Such rooted strength and confidence assured
 In righteousness, that 'twas to him like faith —
 An everlasting sunshine of the soul,
 Illumining and quickening all its powers.

But on Pionia's side meantime a heart
 As generous, and as full of noble thoughts,
 Lay stricken with the deadliest bolts of grief.
 Upon a smooth gray stone sat Roderick there;
 The wind above him stirr'd the hazel boughs,
 And murmuring at his feet the river ran.
 He sat with folded arms and head declined
 Upon his breast, feeding on bitter thoughts,
 Till nature gave him in the exhausted sense
 Of woe a respite something like repose;
 And then the quiet sound of gentle winds
 And waters with their lulling consonance
 Beguiled him of himself. Of all within Oblivious there he sat, sentient alone
 Of outward nature, — of the whispering leaves
 That soothed his ear, — the genial breath of Heaven
 That fann'd his cheek, — the stream's perpetual
 flow,
 That, with its shadows and its glancing lights,
 Dimples and thread-like motions infinite,
 Forever varying and yet still the same,
 Like time toward eternity, ran by.
 Resting his head upon his master's knees,
 Upon the bank beside him Theron lay.
 What matters change of state and circumstance,
 Or lapse of years, with all their dread events,
 To him? What matters it that Roderick wears

The crown no longer, nor the sceptre wields?—
It is the dear-loved hand, whose friendly touch
Had flatter'd him so oft; it is the voice,
At whose glad summons to the field so oft
From slumber he had started, slaking off
Dreams of the chase, to share the actual joy;
The eye, whose recognition he was wont
To watch and welcome with exultant tongue

A coming step, unheard by Roderick, roused
His watchful ear, and turning he beheld
Siverian. Father, said the good old man,
As Theron rose and fawn'd about his knees,
Hast thou some charm, which draws about thee thus
The hearts of all our house, — even to the beast
That lacks discourse of reason, but too oft,
With uncorrupted feeling and dumb faith,
Puts lordly man to shame? — The king replied,
'Tis that mysterious sense by which mankind
To fix their friendships and their loves are led,
And which with fainter influence doth extend
To such poor things as this. As we put off
The cares and passions of this fretful world,
It may be too that we thus far approach
To elder nature, and regain in part
The privilege through sin in Eden lost.
The timid hare soon learns that she may trust
The solitary penitent, and birds
Will light upon the hermit's harmless hand.

Thus Roderick answer'd in excursive speech,
Thinking to draw the old man's mind from what Might touch him else too nearly, and himself
Disposed to follow on the lure he threw,
As one whom such imaginations led
Out of the world of his own miseries.
But to regardless ears his words were given,
For on the dog Siverian gazed the while,
Pursuing his own thoughts. Thou hast not felt, Exclaim'd the old man, the earthquake and the storm;
The kingdom's overthrow, the wreck of Spain,
The ruin of thy royal master's house,
Have reach'd not thee! — Then turning to the King,
When the destroying enemy drew nigh
Toledo, he continued, and we fled
Before their fury, even while her grief
Was fresh, my Mistress would not leave behind
This faithful creature. Well we knew she thought
Of Roderick then, although she named him not;
For never since the fatal certainty
Fell on us all, hath that unhappy name,
Save in her prayers, been known to pass her lips
Before this day. She names him now, and weeps;
But now her tears are tears of thankfulness;
For blessed hath thy coming been to her
And all who loved the King.

His faltering voice
Here fail'd him, and he paused: recovering soon,
When that poor injured Lady, he pursued,
Did in my presence to the Prince absolve
The unhappy King —

Absolve him! Roderick cried,
And in that strong emotion turn'd his face

Sternly toward Siverian, for the sense
Of shame and self-reproach drove from his mind
All other thoughts. The good old man replied,
Of human judgments humanly I speak.
Who knows not what Pelayo's life hath been?
Not happier in all dear domestic ties,
Than worthy for his virtue of the bliss
Which is that virtue's fruit; and yet did he Absolve, upon Florinda's tale, the King.
Siverian, thus he said, what most I hoped,
And still within my secret heart believed,
Is now made certain. Roderick hath been More sinn'd against than sinning. And with that
He clasp'd his hands, and, lifting them to Heaven,
Cried, Would to God that he were yet alive!
For not more gladly did I draw my sword
Against Witiza in our common cause,
Than I would fight beneath his banners now,
And vindicate his name!

Did he say this?
The Prince? Pelayo? in astonishment
Roderick exclaim'd. — He said it, quoth the old man.

None better knew his kinsman's noble heart,
None loved him better, none bewail'd him more:
And as he felt, like me, for his reproach
A deeper grief than for his death, even so
He cherish'd in his heart the constant thought
Something was yet untold, which, being known,
Would palliate his offence, and make the fall
Of one, till then, so excellently good,
Less monstrous, less revolting to belief,
More to be pitied, more to be forgiven.

While thus he spake, the fallen King felt his face
Burn, and his blood flow fast. Down, guilty thoughts!
Firmly he said within his soul; lie still,
Thou heart of flesh! I thought thou hadst been quell'd,
And quell'd thou shalt be! Help me, O my God,
That I may crucify this inward foe!
Yea, thou hast help'd me, Father! I am strong,
O Savior, in thy strength.

As he breath'd thus
His inward supplications, the old man
Eyed him with frequent and unsteady looks.
He had a secret trembling on his lips,
And hesitated, still irresolute
In utterance to embody the dear hope:
Fain would he have it strengthen'd and assured
By this concurring judgment, yet he fear'd
To have it chill'd in cold accoil. At length
Venturing, he brake with interrupted speech
The troubled silence. Father Maccabee,
I cannot rest till I have laid my heart
Open before thee. When Pelayo wish'd
That his poor kinsman were alive to rear
His banner once again, a sudden thought —
A hope — a fancy — what shall it be call'd?
Possess'd me, that perhaps the wish might see
Its glad accomplishment, — that Roderick lived,
And might in glory take the field once more
For Spain. — I see thou startest at the thought!
Yet spurn it not with hasty unbelief,

As though 'twere utterly beyond the scope
Of possible contingency. I think
That I have calmly satisfied myself
How this is more than idle fancy, more
Than mere imaginations of a mind
Which from its wishes builds a baseless faith.
His horse, his royal robe, his horned helm,
His mail and sword were found upon the field ;
But if King Roderick had in battle fallen,
That sword, I know, would only have been found
Clinch'd in the hand which, living, knew so well
To wield the dreadful steel ! Not in the throng
Confounded, nor amid the torpid stream,
Opening with ignominious arms a way
For flight, would he have perish'd ! Where the strife

Was hottest, ring'd about with slaughter'd foes,
Should Roderick have been found : by this sure mark

Ye should have known him, if nought else re-
main'd,

That his whole body had been gored with wounds,
And quill'd with spears, as if the Moors had felt
That in his single life the victory lay,
More than in all the host !

Siverian's eyes

Shone with a youthful ardor while he spake ;
His gathering brow grew stern ; and as he raised
His arm, a warrior's impulse character'd
The impassion'd gesture. But the King was calm,
And heard him with unchanging countenance ;
For he had taken his resolve, and felt
Once more the peace of God within his soul,
As in that hour when by his father's grave
He knelt before Pelayo.

Soon the old man

Pursued in calmer tones — Thus much I dare
Believe, that Roderick fell not on that day
When treason brought about his overthrow.
If yet he live, for sure I think I know
His noble mind, 'tis in some wilderness,
Where, in some savage den inhumed, he drags
The weary load of life, and on his flesh,
As on a mortal enemy, inflicts
Fierce vengeance with immitigable hand.
Oh that I knew but where to bend my way
In his dear search ! my voice perhaps might reach
His heart, might reconcile him to himself,
Restore him to his mother ere she dies,
His people and his country : with the sword,
Them and his own good name should he redeem.
Oh might I but behold him once again
Leading to battle these intrepid bands,
Such as he was, — yea, rising from his fall
More glorious, more beloved ! Soon, I believe,
Joy would accomplish then what grief hath fail'd
To do with this old heart, and I should die
Clasping his knees with such intense delight,
That when I woke in Heaven, even Heaven itself
Could have no higher happiness in store.

Thus fervently he spake, and copious tears
Ran down his cheeks. Full oft the Royal Goth,
Since he came forth again among mankind,

Had trembled lest some curious eye should read
His lineaments too closely ; now he long'd
To fall upon the neck of that old man,
And give his full heart utterance. But the sense
Of duty, by the pride of self-control
Corroborate, made him steadily repress
His yearning nature. Whether Roderick live,
Paying in penitence the bitter price
Of sin, he answered, or if earth hath given
Rest to his earthly part, is only known
To him and Heaven. Dead is he to the world ;
And let not these imaginations rob
His soul of thy continual prayers, whose aid
Too surely, in whatever world, he needs.
The faithful love that mitigates his fault,
Heavenward address'd, may mitigate his doom.
Living or dead, old man, be sure his soul, —
It were unworthy else, — doth hold with thine
Entire communion ! Doubt not he relies
Firmly on thee, as on a father's love,
Counts on thy offices, and joins with thee
In sympathy and fervent act of faith,
Though regions, or though worlds, should intervene.

Lost as he is, to Roderick this must be Thy first, best, dearest duty ; next must be
To hold right onward in that noble path,
Which he would counsel, could his voice be heard.
Now therefore aid me, while I call upon
The Leaders and the People, that this day
We may acclaim Pelayo for our King.

XVIII.

THE ACCLAMATION.

Now, when from Covadonga, down the vale
Holding his way, the princely mountaineer
Came with that happy family in sight
Of Cangas and his native towers, far off
He saw before the gate, in fair array,
The assembled land. Broad banners were dis-
play'd,
And spears were sparkling to the sun ; shields shone,
And helmets glitter'd, and the blaring horn,
With frequent sally of impatient joy,
Provoked the echoes round. Well he areeds,
From yonder ensigns and augmented force,
That Odoar and the Primate from the west
Have brought their aid ; but wherefore all were thus

Instructed as for some great festival,
He found not, till Favila's quicker eye
Catching the ready buckler, the glad boy
Leap'd up, and clapping his exultant hands,
Shouted, King ! King ! my father shall be King
This day ! Pelayo started at the word,
And the first thought which smote him brought a sigh

For Roderick's fall ; the second was of hope,
Deliverance for his country, for himself
Enduring fame, and glory for his line.
That high prophetic forethought gather'd strength,

As looking to his honor'd mate, he read
Her soul's accordant augury; her eyes
Brighten'd; the quicken'd action of the blood
Ting'd with a deeper hue her glowing cheek,
And on her lips there sat a smile which spake
The honorable pride of perfect love,
Rejoicing, for her husband's sake, to share
The lot he chose, the perils he defied,
The lofty fortune which their faith foresaw.

Roderick, in front of all the assembled troops,
Held the broad buckler, following to the end
That steady purpose to the which his zeal
Had this day wrought the Chiefs. Tall as himself,
Erect it stood beside him, and his hands
Hung resting on the rim. This was an hour
That sweeten'd life, repaid and recompens'd
All losses; and although it could not heal
All griefs, yet laid them for a while to rest.
The active, agitating joy that fill'd
The vale, that with contagious influence spread Through all the exulting mountaineers, that gave
New ardor to all spirits, to all breasts
Inspired fresh impulse of excited hope,
Moved every tongue, and strengthen'd every limb, --

That joy which every man reflected saw
From every face of all the multitude,
And heard in every voice, in every sound,
Reach'd not the King. Aloof from sympathy,
He from the solitude of his own soul
Beheld the busy scene. None shared or knew
His deep and incommunicable joy;
None but that heavenly Father, who alone
Beholds the struggles of the heart, alone
Sees and rewards the secret sacrifice.

Among the chiefs conspicuous, Urban stood,
He whom, with well-weigh'd choice, in arduous time,

To arduous office the consenting Church
Had call'd when Sindered, fear-smitten, fled:
Unfaithful shepherd, who for life alone
Solicitous, forsook his flock, when most
In peril and in suffering they required
A pastor's care. Far off at Rome he dwells
In ignominious safety, while the Church
Keeps in her annals the deserter's name,
But from the service, which with daily zeal
Devout her ancient prelacy recalls,
Blots it, unworthy to partake her prayers.
Urban, to that high station thus being call'd,
From whence disanimating fear had driven
The former primate, for the general weal
Consulting first, removed with timely care
The relics and the written works of Saints,
Toledo's choicest treasure, prized beyond
All wealth, their living and their dead remains;
These to the mountain fastnesses he bore
Of unsubdued Cantabria, there deposed,
One day to be the boast of yet unbuilt
Oviedo, and the dear idolatry
Of multitudes unborn. To things of state
Then giving thought mature, he held advice
With Odoar, whom of counsel competent

And firm of heart he knew. What then they plann'd,
Time and the course of overruled events
To earlier act had ripen'd, than their hope
Had ever in its gladdest dream proposed;
And here by agents unforeseen, and means
Beyond the scope of foresight brought about,
This day they saw their dearest heart's desire
Accorded them; all-able Providence
Thus having ordered all, that Spain this hour
With happiest omens, and on surest base,
Should from its ruins rear again her throne.

For acclamation and for sacring now
One form must serve, more solemn for the breach
Of old observances, whose absence here
Deeplier impress'd the heart, than all display
Of regal pomp and wealth pontifical,
Of vestments radiant with their gems, and stiff
With ornature of gold; the glittering train,
The long procession, and the full-voiced choir.
This day the forms of piety and war
In strange but fitting union must combine.
Not in his alb, and cope, and orary,
Came Urban now, nor wore he mitre here,
Precious or auriophrygiate; bare of head
He stood, all else in arms complete, and o'er
His gorget's iron rings the pall was thrown
Of wool undyed, which on the Apostle's tomb
Gregory had laid, and sanctified with prayer;
That from the living Pontiff and the dead,
Replete with holiness, it might impart
Doubly derived its grace. One Page beside Bore his broad-shadow'd helm; another's hand
Held the long spear, more suited in these times
For Urban, than the crosier richly wrought
With silver foliature, the elaborate work
Of Grecian or Italian artist, train'd
In the eastern capital, or sacred Rome,
Still o'er the west predominant, though fallen.
Better the spear befits the shepherd's hand
When robbers break the fold. Now he had laid
The weapon by, and held a natural cross
Of rudest form, unpeel'd, even as it grew
On the near oak that morn.

Mutilate alike
Of royal rites was this solemnity.
Where was the rubied crown, the sceptre where,
And where the golden pome, the proud array
Of ermines, aureate vests, and jewelry,
With all which Leuvigild for after kings
Left, ostentatious of his power? The Moor
Had made his spoil of these, and on the field
Of Xeres, where contending multitudes
Had trampled it beneath their bloody feet,
The standard of the Goths forgotten lay
Defiled, and rotting there in sun and rain.
Utterly is it lost; nor evermore
Herald or antiquary's patient search
Shall from forgetfulness avail to save
Those blazon'd arms, so fatally of old
Renown'd through all the affrighted Occident.
That banner, before which imperial Rome
First to a conqueror bow'd her head abased;
Which when the dreadful Hun, with all his powers,

Came like a deluge rolling o'er the world,
 Made head, and in the front of battle broke
 His force, till then resistless; which so oft
 Had with alternate fortune braved the Frank;
 Driven the Byzantine from the farthest shores
 Of Spain, long lingering there, to final flight;
 And of their kingdoms and their name despoil'd
 The Vandal, and the Alan, and the Sueve;
 Blotted from human records is it now
 As it had never been. So let it rest
 With things forgotten! But Oblivion ne'er
 Shall cancel from the historic roll, nor Time,
 Who changeth all, obscure that fated sign,
 Which brighter now than mountain snows at noon
 To the bright sun displays its argent field.

Rose not the vision then upon thy soul,
 O Roderick, when within that argent field
 Thou saw'st the rampant Lion, red as if Upon some noblest quarry he had roll'd,
 Rejoicing in his satiate rage, and drunk
 With blood and fury? Did the auguries
 Which open'd on thy spirit bring with them
 A perilous consolation, deadening heart
 And soul, yea, worse than death — that thou through all

Thy checker'd way of life, evil and good,
 Thy errors and thy virtues, hadst but been
 The poor, mere instrument of things ordain'd, —
 Doing or suffering, impotent alike
 To will or act, — perpetually bemock'd
 With semblance of volition, yet in all
 Blind worker of the ways of destiny!
 That thought intolerable, which in the hour
 Of woe indignant conscience had repell'd,
 As little might it find reception now,
 When the regenerate spirit self-approved
 Beheld its sacrifice complete. With faith
 Elate, he saw the banner'd Lion float
 Refulgent, and recall'd that thrilling shout
 Which he had heard when on Romano's grave
 The joy of victory woke him from his dream,
 And sent him with prophetic hope to work
 Fulfilment of the great events ordain'd,
 There in imagination's inner world
 Prefigured to his soul.

Alone, advanced
 Before the ranks, the Goth in silence stood,
 While from all voices round, loquacious joy
 Mingled its buzz continuous with the blast
 Of horn, shrill pipe, and tinkling cymbals' clash,
 And sound of deafening drum. But when the Prince

Drew nigh, and Urban, with the Cross upheld,
 Stepp'd forth to meet him, all at once were still'd
 With instantaneous hush; as when the wind,
 Before whose violent gusts the forest oaks,
 Tossing like billows their tempestuous heads,
 Roar like a raging sea, suspends its force,
 And leaves so dead a calm that not a leaf
 Moves on the silent spray. The passing air
 Bore with it from the woodland undisturb'd
 The ringdove's wooing, and the quiet voice
 Of waters warbling near.

Son of a race

Of Heroes and of Kings! the Primate thus
 Address'd him, Thou in whom the Gothic blood,
 Mingling with old Iberia's, hath restored
 To Spain a ruler of her native line,
 Stand forth, and in the face of God and man
 Swear to uphold the right, abate the wrong,
 With equitable hand, protect the Cross
 Whereon thy lips this day shall seal their vow,
 And underneath that hallow'd symbol, wage
 Holy and inextinguishable war
 Against the accurs'd nation that usurps
 Thy country's sacred soil!

So speak of me

Now and forever, O my countrymen!
 Replied Pelayo; and so deal with me
 Here and hereafter, thou Almighty God,
 In whom I put my trust!

Lord God of Hosts,

Urban pursued, of Angels and of Men
 Creator and Disposer, King of Kings,
 Ruler of Earth and Heaven, — look down this day,
 And multiply thy blessings on the head
 Of this thy servant, chosen in thy sight!
 Be thou his counsellor, his comforter,
 His hope, his joy, his refuge, and his strength;
 Crown him with justice, and with fortitude;
 Defend him with thine all-sufficient shield;
 Surround him every where with the right hand
 Of thine all-present power, and with the might
 Of thine omnipotence; send in his aid
 Thy unseen Angels forth, that potently
 And royally against all enemies
 He may endure and triumph! Bless the land
 O'er which he is appointed; bless thou it
 With the waters of the firmament, the springs
 Of the low-lying deep, the fruits which Sun
 And Moon mature for man, the precious stores
 Of the eternal hills, and all the gifts
 Of Earth, its wealth and fulness!

Then he took

Pelayo's hand, and on his finger placed
 The mystic circlet. — With this ring, O Prince,
 To our dear Spain, who like a widow now
 Mourneth in desolation, I thee wed:
 For weal or woe thou takest her, till death
 Dispart the union. Be it blest to her,
 To thee, and to thy seed!

Thus when he ceased,
 He gave the awaited signal. Roderick brought
 The buckler: Eight for strength and stature chosen
 Came to their honor'd office: Round the shield
 Standing, they lower it for the Chieftain's feet,
 Then, slowly raised upon their shoulders, lift
 The steady weight. Erect Pelayo stands,
 And thrice he brandishes the burnish'd sword,
 While Urban to the assembled people cries,
 Spaniards, behold your King! The multitude
 Then sent forth all their voice with glad acclaim,
 Raising the loud Real; thrice did the word
 Ring through the air, and echo from the walls
 Of Cangas. Far and wide the thundering shout,
 Rolling among reduplicating rocks,
 Peal'd o'er the hills, and up the mountain vales.
 The wild ass starting in the forest glade
 Ran to the covert; the affrighted wolf

Skulk'd through the thicket to a closer brake ;
The sluggish bear, awakened in his den,
Roused up and answer'd with a sullen growl,
Low-breathed and long ; and at the uproar seared,
The brooding eagle from her nest took wing.

Heroes and Chiefs of old ! and ye who bore
Firm to the last your part in that dread strife,
When Julian and Witiza's viler race
Betray'd their country, hear ye from yon Heaven
The joyful acclamation which proclaims
That Spain is born again ! O ye who died
In that disastrous field, and ye who fell
Embracing with a martyr's love your death
Amid the flames of Auria ; and all ye
Victims innumerable, whose cries unheard
On earth, but heard in Heaven, from all the land
Went up for vengeance ; not in vain ye cry
Before the eternal throne ! — Rest, innocent blood !
Vengeance is due, and vengeance will be given.
Rest, innocent blood ? The appointed age is come !
The star that harbingers a glorious day [there
Hath risen ! Lo, there the Avenger stands ! Lo,
He brandishes the avenging sword ! Lo, there
The avenging banner spreads its argent field
Refulgent with auspicious light ! — Rejoice,
O Leon, for thy banner is displayed ;
Rejoice with all thy mountains, and thy vales
And streams ! And thou, O Spain, through all thy realms,

For thy deliverance cometh ! Even now,
As from all sides the misereant hosts move on ; —
From southern Betis ; from the western lands,
Where through redundant vales smooth Minho flows,

And Douro pours through vine-clad hills the wealth
Of Leon's gathered waters ; from the plains
Burgensian, in old time Vardulia call'd,
But in their castellated strength erelong
To be design'd Castille, a deathless name ;
From midland regions where Toledo reigns
Proud city on her royal eminence,
And Tagus bends his sickle round the scene
Of Roderick's fall ; from rich Rioja's fields ;
Dark Ebro's shores ; the walls of Salduba,
Seat of the Sedetanians old, by Rome
Cæsarian and August denominate,
Now Zaragoza, in this later time
Above all cities of the earth renown'd
For duty perfectly perform'd ; — East, West,
And South, where'er their gather'd multitudes,
Urged by the speed of vigorous tyranny,
With more than with commensurable strength
Haste to prevent the danger, crush the hopes
Of rising Spain, and rivet round her neck
The eternal yoke, — the ravenous fowls of heaven
Flock there presentient of their food obscene,
Following the accursed armies, whom too well
They know their purveyors long. Pursue their march,

Ominous attendants ! Ere the moon hath fill'd
Her horns, these purveyors shall become the prey,
And ye on Moorish, not on Christian flesh
Wearying your beaks, shall clog your scaly feet
With foreign gore. Soon will ye learn to know,

Followers and harbingers of blood, the flag
Of Leon where it bids you to your feast !
Terror and flight shall with that flag go forth,
And Havock and the Dogs of War and Death
Thou Covadonga with the tainted stream
Of Deva, and thus now rejoicing vale,
Soon its primal triumphs wilt behold !
Nor shall the glories of the noon be less
Than such miraculous promise of the dawn :
Witness Clavijo, where the dreadful cry
Of Santiago, then first heard o'erpower'd
The Akbar, and that holier name blasphemed
By misbelieving lips ! Simaneas, thou
Be witness ! And do ye your record bear,
Tolosan mountains, where the Almohade
Beheld his myriads scatter'd and destroy'd,
Like locusts swept before the stormy North !
Thou too, Salado, on that later day
When Africa received her final foil,
And thy swollen stream incarnadined, roll'd back
The invaders to the deep, — there shall they toss
Till, on their native Mauritanian shore,
The waves shall cast their bones to whiten there.

XIX.

RODERICK AND RUSILLA.

When all had been perform'd, the royal Goth
Look'd up towards the chamber in the tower,
Where, gazing on the multitude below,
Alone Rusilla stood. He met her eye,
For it was singling him amid the crowd ;
Obeying then the hand which beckon'd him,
He went with heart prepared, nor shrinking now,
But arm'd with self-approving thoughts that hour.
Entering in tremulous haste, he closed the door,
And turn'd to clasp her knees ; but lo, she spread
Her arms, and catching him in close embrace,
Fell on his neck, and cried, My Son, my Son ! —
Erelong, controlling that first agony
With effort of strong will, backward she bent,
And gazing on his head, now shorn and gray,
And on his furrow'd countenance, exclaim'd,
Still, still my Roderick ! the same noble mind !
The same heroic heart ! Still, still my Son ! — Changed, — yet not wholly fallen, — not wholly lost,
He cried, — not wholly in the sight of Heaven
Unworthy, O my Mother, nor in thine !
She lock'd her arms again around his neck,
Saying, Lord, let me now depart in peace !
And bow'd her head again, and silently
Gave way to tears.

When that first force was spent,
And passion in exhaustion found relief, —
I knew thee, said Rusilla, when the dog
Rose from my feet, and lick'd his master's hand.
All flash'd upon me then ; the instinctive sense
That goes unerringly where reason fails, —
The voice, the eye, — a mother's thoughts are quick, —
Miraculous as it seem'd, — Siverian's tale, —

Florinda's, — every action, — every word, —
Each strengthening each, and all confirming all,
Reveal'd thee, O my Son ! but I restrain'd
My heart, and yielded to thy holier will
The thoughts which rose to tempt a soul not yet
Wean'd wholly from the world.

What thoughts ? replied

Roderick. That I might see thee yet again
Such as thou wert, she answer'd; not alone
To Heaven and me restored, but to thyself, — Thy Crown, — thy Country, — all within thy reach;

Heaven so disposing all things, that the means
Which wrought the ill, might work the remedy.
Methought I saw thee once again the hope, —
The strength, — the pride of Spain ! The miracle
Which I beheld made all things possible.

I know the inconstant people, how their mind,
With every breath of good or ill report,
Fluctuates, like summer corn before the breeze ;
Quick in their hatred, quicker in their love,
Generous and hasty, soon would they redress
All wrongs of former obloquy. — I thought
Of happiness restored, — the broken heart
Heal'd, — and Count Julian, for his daughter's sake,

Turning in thy behalf against the Moors
His powerful sword : — all possibilities,
That could be found or fancied, built a dream
Before me ; such as easiest might illude
A lofty spirit train'd in palaces,
And not alone amid the flatteries
Of youth with thoughts of high ambition fed
When all is sunshine, but through years of woe,
When sorrows sanctified their use, upheld
By honorable pride and earthly hopes.
I thought I yet might nurse upon my knee
Some young Theodofred, and see in him
Thy Father's image and thine own renew'd,
And love to think the little hand which there
Play'd with the bauble should in after days
Wield the transmitted sceptre ; — that through him
The ancient seed should be perpetuate, —
That precious seed revered so long, desired
So dearly, and so wondrously preserved.

Nay, he replied, Heaven hath not with its bolts
Scathed the proud summit of the tree, and left
The trunk unflaw'd ; ne'er shall it clothe its boughs
Again, nor push again its scions forth,
Head, root, and branch, all mortified alike ! —
Long ere these locks were shorn had I cut off
The thoughts of royalty ! Time might renew
Their growth, as for Manoah's captive son,
And I too on the miscreant race, like him,
Might prove my strength regenerate ; but the hour,
When, in its second best nativity,
My soul was born again through grace, this heart
Died to the world. Dreams such as thine pass now
Like evening clouds before me ; if I think
How beautiful they seem, 'tis but to feel
How soon they fade, how fast the night shuts in.
But in that World to which my hopes look on,
Time enters not, nor Mutability ;
Beauty and goodness are unfading there ;

Whatever there is given us to enjoy,
That we enjoy forever, still the same. —
Much might Count Julian's sword achieve for Spain

And me, but more will his dear daughter's soul
Effect in Heaven ; and soon will she be there,
An Angel at the throne of Grace, to plead
In his behalf and mine.

I knew thy heart,
She answer'd, and subdued the vain desire.
It was the World's last effort. Thou hast chosen
The better part. Yes, Roderick, even on earth
There is a praise above the monarch's fame,
A higher, holier, more enduring praise,
And this will yet be thine !

O tempt me not,
Mother ! he cried ; nor let ambition take
That specious form to cheat us ! What but this,
Fallen as I am, have I to offer Heaven ?
The ancestral sceptre, public fame, content
Of private life, the general good report,
Power, reputation, happiness, — whate'er
The heart of man desires to constitute
His earthly weal, — unerring Justice claim'd
In forfeiture. I with submitted soul
Bow to the righteous law and kiss the rod.
Only while thus submitted, suffering thus, —
Only while offering up that name on earth,
Perhaps in trial offer'd to my choice,
Could I present myself before thy sight ;
Thus only could endure myself, or fix
My thoughts upon that fearful pass, where Death
Stands in the Gate of Heaven ! — Time passes on,
The healing work of sorrow is complete ;
All vain desires have long been weeded out,
All vain regrets subdued ; the heart is dead,
The soul is ripe and eager for her birth.
Bless me, my Mother ! and come when it will
The inevitable hour, we die in peace.

So saying, on her knees he bow'd his head ;
She raised her hands to Heaven and blest her child
Then bending forward, as he rose, embraced
And clasp'd him to her heart, and cried, Once more
Theodofred, with pride behold thy son !

XX.

THE MOORISH CAMP.

THE times are big with tidings ; every hour
From east, and west, and south, the breathless scouts
Bring swift alarms in ; the gathering foe,
Advancing from all quarters to one point,
Close their wide crescent. Nor was aid of fear
To magnify their numbers needed now ;
They came in myriads. Africa had pour'd
Fresh shoals upon the coast of wretched Spain ;
Lured from their hungry deserts to the scene
Of spoil, like vultures to the battle-field,
Fierce, unrelenting, habited in crimes,
Like bidden guests the mirthful ruffians flock

To that free feast which in their Prophet's name
 Rapine and Lust proclaim'd. Nor were the chiefs
 Of victory less assured, by long success
 Elate, and proud of that o'erwhelming strength,
 Which, surely they believed, as it had roll'd
 Thus far uncheck'd, would roll victorious on,
 Till, like the Orient, the subjected West
 Should bow in reverence at Mahommed's name;
 And pilgrims, from remotest Arctic shores,
 Tread with religious feet the burning sands
 Of Araby, and Mecca's stony soil.
 Proud of his part in Roderick's overthrow,
 Their leader Abulcaceem came, a man
 Unmitigable, long in war renown'd.
 Here Magned comes, who on the conquer'd walls
 Of Cordoba, by treacherous fear betray'd,
 Planted the moony standard: Ibrahim here,
 He, who, by Genil and in Darro's vales,
 Had for the Moors the fairest portion won
 Of all their spoils, fairest and best maintain'd,
 And to the Alpuxarras given in trust
 His other name, through them preserved in song.
 Here too Alcahman, vaunting his late deeds
 At Auria, all her children by the sword
 Cut off, her bulwarks razed, her towers laid low,
 Her dwellings by devouring flames consumed,
 Bloody and hard of heart, he little ween'd,
 Vain-boastful chief! that from those fatal flames
 The fire of retribution had gone forth,
 Which soon should wrap him round.

The renegades

Here too were seen, Ebba and Sisibert;
 A spurious brood, but of their parent's crimes
 True heirs, in guilt begotten, and in ill
 Train'd up. The same unnatural rage that turn'd
 Their swords against their country, made them seek,
 Unmindful of their wretched mother's end,
 Pelayo's life. No enmity is like
 Domestic hatred. For his blood they thirst,
 As if that sacrifice might satisfy
 Witiza's guilty ghost, efface the shame
 Of their adulterous birth, and one crime more
 Crowning a hideous course, emancipate
 Thenceforth their spirits from all earthly fear.
 This was their only care; but other thoughts
 Were rankling in that elder villain's mind,
 Their kinsman Orpas, he of all the crew
 Who in this fatal visitation fell,
 The foulest and the falsest wretch that e'er
 Renounced his baptism. From his cherish'd views
 Of royalty cut off, he coveted
 Count Julian's wide domains, and hopeless now
 To gain them through the daughter, laid his toils
 Against the father's life, — the instrument
 Of his ambition first, and now design'd
 Its victim. To this end, with cautious hints,
 At favoring season ventured, he possess'd
 The leader's mind; then, subtly fostering
 The doubts himself had sown, with bolder charge
 He bade him warily regard the Count,
 Lest underneath an outward show of faith
 The heart uncircumcised were Christian still;
 Else, wherefore had Florinda not obey'd
 Her dear-loved sire's example, and embraced
 The saving truth? Else, wherefore was her hand,

Plighted to him so long, so long withheld,
 Till she had found a fitting hour to fly
 With that audacious Prince, who now, in arms,
 Defied the Caliph's power; — for who could doubt
 That in his company she fled, perhaps
 The mover of his flight? What if the Count
 Himself had plann'd the evasion which he feign'd
 In sorrow to condemn? What if she went,
 A pledge assured, to tell the mountaineers
 That when they met the Mussulmen in the heat
 Of fight, her father, passing to their side,
 Would draw the victory with him? — Thus he breathed

Fiend-like in Abulcaceem's ear his schemes
 Of murderous malice; and the course of things,
 Ere long, in part approving his discourse,
 Aided his aim, and gave his wishes weight.
 For scarce on the Asturian territory
 Had they set foot, when, with the speed of fear,
 Count Eudon, nothing doubting that their force
 Would like a flood sweep all resistance down,
 Hasten'd to plead his merits; — he alone,
 Found faithful in obedience through reproach
 And danger, when the madden'd multitude
 Hurried their chiefs along, and high and low
 With one infectious frenzy seized, provoked
 The invincible in arms. Pelayo led
 The raging crew, — he doubtless the prime spring
 Of all these perilous movements; and 'twas said
 He brought the assurance of a strong support,
 Count Julian's aid, for in his company
 From Cordoba, Count Julian's daughter came.

Thus Eudon spake before the assembled chiefs:
 When instantly a stern and wrathful voice
 Replied, I know Pelayo never made
 That senseless promise! He who raised the tale
 Lies foully; but the bitterest enemy
 That ever hunted for Pelayo's life
 Hath never with the charge of falsehood touch'd
 His name.

The Baron had not recognized
 Till then, beneath the turban's shadowing folds,
 Julian's swart visage, where the fiery skies
 Of Africa, through many a year's long course,
 Had set their hue inburnt. Something he sought
 In quick excuse to say of common fame,
 Lightly believed and busily diffused,
 And that no enmity had moved his speech
 Repeating rumor's tale. Julian replied,
 Count Eudon, neither for thyself nor me
 Excuse is needed here. The path I tread
 Is one wherein there can be no return,
 No pause, no looking back! A choice like mine
 For time and for eternity is made,
 Once and forever! and as easily
 The breath of vain report might build again
 The throne which my just vengeance overthrew,
 As in the Caliph and his Captain's mind
 Affect the opinion of my well-tried truth.
 The tidings which thou givest me of my child
 Touch me more vitally; bad though they be,
 A secret apprehension of aught worse
 Makes me with joy receive them.

Then the Count

To Abuleacem turn'd his speech, and said,
I pray thee, Chief, give me a messenger
By whom I may to this unhappy child
Despatch a father's bidding, such as yet
May win her back. What I would say requires
No veil of privacy; before ye all
The errand shall be given.

Boldly he spake,
Yet wary in that show of open truth,
For well he knew what dangers girt him round
Amid the faithless race. Blind with revenge,
For them in madness had he sacrificed
His name, his baptism, and his native land,
To feel, still powerful as he was, that life
Hung on their jealous favor. But his heart
Approved him now, where love, too long restrain'd,
Resumed its healing influence, leading him
Right on with no misgiving. Chiefs, he said,
Hear me, and let your wisdom judge between
Me and Prince Orpas! — Known it is to all,
Too well, what mortal injury provoked
My spirit to that vengeance which your aid
So signally hath given. A covenant
We made when first our purpose we combined,
That he should have Florinda for his wife,
My only child; so should she be, I thought,
Revenged and honor'd best. My word was given
Truly, nor did I cease to use all means
Of counsel or command, entreating her Sometimes with tears, seeking sometimes with threats

Of an offended father's curse to enforce
Obedience; that, she said, the Christian law
Forbade; moreover she had vow'd herself
A servant to the Lord. In vain I strove
To win her to the Prophet's saving faith,
Using perhaps a rigor to that end
Beyond permitted means, and to my heart,
Which loved her dearer than its own life-blood,
Abhorrent. Silently she suffer'd all;
Or, when I urged her with most vehemence,
Only replied, I knew her fix'd resolve,
And craved my patience but a little while,
Till death should set her free. Touch'd as I was,
I yet persisted, till at length, to escape
The ceaseless importunity, she fled:
And verily I fear'd, until this hour,
My rigor to some fearfuler resolve
Than flight, had driven my child. Chiefs, I appeal

To each and all, and, Orpas, to thyself
Especially, if, having thus essay'd
All means that law and nature have allow'd
To bend her will, I may not rightfully
Hold myself free, that promise being void
Which cannot be fulfill'd.

Thou sayest then,
Orpas replied, that from her false belief
Her stubborn opposition drew its force.
I should have thought that from the ways corrupt
Of these idolatrous Christians, little care
Might have sufficed to wean a duteous child,
The example of a parent so beloved
Leading the way; and yet I will not doubt
Thou didst enforce with all sincerity

And holy zeal upon thy daughter's mind
The truths of Islam.

Julian knit his brow,
And scowling on the insidious renegade,
He answer'd, By what reasoning my poor mind
Was from the old idolatry reclaim'd,
None better knows than Seville's mitred chief,
Who, first renouncing errors which he taught,
Led me his follower to the Prophet's pale.
Thy lessons I repeated as I could;
Of graven images, unnatural vows,
False records, tabling creeds, and juggling priests,
Who, making sanctity the cloak of sin,
Laugh'd at the fools on whose credulity
They fatten'd. To these arguments, whose worth
Prince Orpas, least of all men, should impeach,
I added, like a soldier bred in arms,
And to the subtleties of schools unused,
The flagrant fact, that Heaven with victory,
Where'er they turn'd, attested and approved
The chosen Prophet's arms. If thou wert still
The mitred Metropolitan, and I
Some wretch of Arian or of Hebrew race,
Thy proper business then might be to pry
And question me for lurking flaws of faith.
We Mussulmen, Prince Orpas, live beneath
A wiser law, which with the iniquities
Of thine old craft, hath abrogated this
Its foulest practice!

As Count Julian ceased,
From underneath his black and gather'd brow
There went a look, which with these wary words
Bore to the heart of that false renegade
Their whole envenom'd meaning. Haughtily
Withdrawing then his alter'd eyes, he said,
Too much of this! Return we to the sun
Of my discourse. Let Abuleacem say,
In whom the Caliph speaks, if with all faith
Having essay'd in vain all means to win
My child's consent, I may not hold henceforth
The covenant discharged.

The Moor replied,
Well hast thou said, and rightly mayst assure
Thy daughter that the Prophet's holy law
Forbids compulsion. Give thine errand now;
The messenger is here.

Then Julian said,
Go to Pelayo, and from him entreat
Admittance to my child, where'er she be.
Say to her, that her father solemnly
Annuls the covenant with Orpas pledged,
Nor with solicitations, nor with threats,
Will urge her more, nor from that liberty
Of faith restrain her, which the Prophet's law,
Liberal as Heaven from whence it came, to all
Indulges. Tell her that her father says
His days are number'd, and beseeches her
By that dear love, which from her infancy
Still he hath borne her, growing as she grew,
Nursed in our weal and strengthen'd in our woe,
She will not in the evening of his life
Leave him forsaken and alone. Enough
Of sorrow, tell her, have her injuries
Brought on her father's head; let not her act
Thus aggravate the burden. Tell her, too,

That when he pray'd her to return, he wept
Profusely as a child; but bitterer tears
Than ever fell from childhood's eyes, were those Which traced his hardy cheeks.

With faltering voice

He spake, and after he had ceased from speech
His lip was quivering still. The Moorish chief
Then to the messenger his bidding gave.
Say, cried he, to these rebel infidels,
Thus Abuleacem, in the Caliph's name
Exhorteth them: Repent and be forgiven!
Nor think to stop the dreadful storm of war,
Which, conquering and to conquer, must fulfil
Its destined circle, rolling eastward now,
Back from the subjugated west, to sweep
Thrones and dominions down, till in the bond
Of unity all nations join, and Earth
Acknowledge, as she sees one Sun in heaven,
One God, one Chief, one Prophet, and one Law.
Jerusalem, the holy City, bows
To holier Mecca's creed; the Crescent shines
Triumphant o'er the eternal pyramids;
On the cold altars of the worshippers
Of Fire, moss grows, and reptiles leave their slime;
The African idolatries are fallen,
And Europe's senseless gods of stone and wood
Have had their day. Tell these misguided men,
A moment for repentance yet is left,
And mercy the submitted neck will spare
Before the sword is drawn; but once unsheath'd,
Let Auria witness how that dreadful sword
Accomplisheth its work! They little know
The Moors, who hope in battle to withstand
Their valor, or in flight escape their rage!
Amid our deserts, we hunt down the birds
Of heaven, — wings do not save them! Nor shall rocks,

And holds, and fastnesses, avail to save
These mountaineers. Is not the Earth the Lord's?
And we, his chosen people, whom he sends
To conquer and possess it in his name?

XXI.

THE FOUNTAIN IN THE FOREST.

THE second eve had closed upon their march
Within the Asturian border, and the Moors
Had pitch'd their tents amid an open wood
Upon the mountain side. As day grew dim,
Their scatter'd fires shone with distincter light
Among the trees, above whose top the smoke
Diffused itself, and stain'd the evening sky.
Erelong the stir of occupation ceased,
And all the murmur of the busy host,
Subsiding, died away, as through the camp
The crier, from a knoll, proclaim'd the hour
For prayer appointed, and with sonorous voice,
Thrice, in melodious modulation full,
Pronounced the highest name. There is no God
But God, he cried; there is no God but God!
Mahommed is the Prophet of the Lord!

Come ye to prayer! to prayer! The Lord is great!

There is no God but God! — Thus he pronounced
His ritual form, mingling with holiest truth
The audacious name accursed. The multitude
Made their ablutions in the mountain stream
Obedient, then their faces to the earth
Bent in formality of easy prayer.

An arrow's flight above that mountain stream
There was a little glade, where underneath
A long, smooth, mossy stone a fountain rose.
An oak grew near, and with its ample boughs
O'ercanopied the spring; its fretted roots
Emboss'd the bank, and on their tufted bark Grew plants which love the moisture and the shade;

Short ferns, and longer leaves of wrinkled green
Which bent toward the spring, and when the wind
Made itself felt, just touch'd with gentle dip
The glassy surface, ruffled ne'er but then,
Save when a bubble rising from the depth
Burst, and with faintest circles mark'd its place,
Or if an insect skimm'd it with its wing,
Or when in heavier drops the gather'd rain
Fell from the oak's high bower. The mountain roe,
When, having drank there, he would bound across,

Drew up upon the bank his meeting feet,
And put forth half his force. With silent lapse
From thence through mossy banks the water stole,
Then murmuring hastened to the glen below.
Diana might have loved in that sweet spot
To take her noontide rest; and when she stoop'd
Hot from the chase to drink, well pleased had seen
Her own bright crescent, and the brighter face
It crown'd, reflected there

Beside that spring

Count Julian's tent was pitch'd upon the glade;
There his ablutions Moor-like he perform'd,
And Moor-like knelt in prayer, bowing his head
Upon the mossy bank. There was a sound
Of voices at the tent when he arose.

And lo! with hurried step a woman came
Toward him; rightly then his heart presaged,
And ere he could behold her countenance,
Florinda knelt, and with uplifted arms
Embraced her sire. He raised her from the ground,
Kiss'd her, and clasp'd her to his heart, and said,
Thou hast not then forsaken me, my child!
Howe'er the inexorable will of Fate
May, in the world which is to come, divide
Our everlasting destinies, in this
Thou wilt not, O my child, abandon me!
And then, with deep and interrupted voice,
Nor seeking to restrain his copious tears,
My blessing be upon thy head, he cried,
A father's blessing! Though all faiths were false,
It should not lose its worth! — She lock'd her hands
Around his neck, and gazing in his face
Through streaming tears, exclaim'd, Oh, never more,

Here or hereafter, never let us part!
And breathing then a prayer in silence forth,
The name of Jesus trembled on her tongue.

Whom hast thou there? cried Julian, and drew back,

Seeing that near them stood a meagre man
In humble garb, who rested with raised hands
On a long staff, bending his head like one
Who, when he hears the distant vesper-bell,
Halts by the way, and, all unseen of men,
Offers his homage in the eye of Heaven.
She answered, Let not my dear father frown
In anger on his child! Thy messenger
Told me that I should be restrain'd no more
From liberty of faith, which the new law
Indulged to all; how soon my hour might come
I knew not, and although that hour will bring Few terrors, yet methinks I would not be Without a Christian comforter in death.

A Priest! exclaimed the Count, and drawing back,

Stoop'd for his turban, that he might not lack
Some outward symbol of apostasy;
For still in war his wonted arms he wore,
Nor for the cimeter had changed the sword
Accustomed to his hand. He covered now
His short, gray hair, and under the white folds,
His swarthy brow, which gather'd as he rose,
Darken'd. Oh, frown not thus! Florinda said;
A kind and gentle counsellor is this,
One who pours balm into a wounded soul,
And mitigates the griefs he cannot heal.
I told him I had vow'd to pass my days
A servant of the Lord, yet that my heart,
Hearing the message of thy love, was drawn
With powerful yearnings back. Follow thy heart—

It answers to the call of duty here,
He said, nor canst thou better serve the Lord
Than at thy father's side.

Count Julian's brow,

While thus she spake, insensibly relax'd.
A Priest, cried he, and thus with even hand
Weigh vows and natural duty in the scale?
In what old heresy hath he been train'd?
Or in what wilderness hath he escaped
The domineering Prelate's fire and sword?
Come hither, man, and tell me who thou art!

A sinner, Roderick, drawing nigh, replied,
Brought to repentance by the grace of God,
And trusting for forgiveness through the blood
Of Christ in humble hope.

A smile of scorn

Julian assumed, but merely from the lips
It came; for he was troubled while he gazed
On the strong countenance and thoughtful eye
Before him. A new law hath been proclaim'd,
Said he, which overthrows in its career
The Christian altars of idolatry.
What think'st thou of the Prophet?—Roderick
Made answer, I am in the Moorish camp,
And he who asketh is a Mussulman.
How then should I reply?—Safely, rejoin'd
The renegade, and freely mayst thou speak
To all that Julian asks. Is not the yoke
Of Mecca easy, and its burden light?—

Spain hath not found it so, the Goth replied,
And groaning, turn'd away his countenance.

Count Julian knit his brow, and stood awhile
Regarding him with meditative eye
In silence. Thou art honest too! he cried;
Why, 'twas in quest of such a man as this
That the old Grecian search'd by lantern light,
In open day, the city's crowded streets;
So rare he deem'd the virtue. Honestly,
And sense of natural duty in a Priest!
Now for a miracle, ye Saints of Spain!
I shall not pry too closely for the wires,
For, seeing what I see, ye have me now
In the believing mood!

O blessed Saints,

Florinda cried, 'tis from the bitterness,
Not from the hardness of the heart, he speaks!
Hear him! and in your goodness give the scoff
The virtue of a prayer! So saying, she raised
Her hands, in fervent action clasp'd, to Heaven,
Then as, still clasp'd, they fell, toward her sire
She turn'd her eyes, beholding him through tears
The look, the gesture, and that silent woe,
Soften'd her father's heart, which in this hour
Was open to the influences of love.
Priest, thy vocation were a blessed one,
Said Julian, if its mighty power were used
To lessen human misery, not to swell
The mournful sum, already all-too-great.
If, as thy former counsel should imply,
Thou art not one who would for his craft's sake
Fret with corrosives and inflame the wound,
Which the poor sufferer brings to thee in trust
That thou with virtuous balm wilt bind it up,—
If, as I think, thou art not one of those Whose villany makes honest men turn Moors,
Thou then wilt answer with unbias'd mind
What I shall ask thee, and exorcise thus
The sick and feverish conscience of my child,
From inbred phantoms, fiend-like, which possess
Her innocent spirit. Children we are all
Of one great Father, in whatever clime
Nature or chance hath cast the seeds of life,
All tongues, all colors; neither after death
Shall we be sorted into languages
And tints,—white, black, and tawny, Greek and Goth,

Northmen and offspring of hot Africa,
The All-Father, He in whom we live and move,
He the indifferant Judge of all, regards
Nations, and hues, and dialects alike;
According to their works shall they be judged,
When even-handed Justice in the scale
Their good and evil weighs. All creeds, I ween,
Agree in this, and hold it orthodox.

Roderick, perceiving here that Julian paused,
As if he waited for acknowledgment
Of that plain truth, in motion of assent
Inclined his brow complacently, and said,
Even so: What follows?—This, resumed the Count;
That creeds, like colors, being but accident,
Are therefore in the scale imponderable;—

Thou seest my meaning; — That from every faith,
As every clime, there is a way to Heaven;
And thou and I may meet in Paradise.

Oh grant it, God! cried Roderick fervently,
And smote his breast. Oh grant it, gracious God!
Through the dear blood of Jesus, grant that he
And I may meet before the mercy-throne!
That were a triumph of Redeeming Love,
For which admiring Angels would renew
Their hallelujahs through the choir of Heaven!
Man! quoth Count Julian, wherefore art thou moved

To this strange passion? I require of thee
Thy judgment, not thy prayers!

Be not displeas'd!

In gentle voice subdued the Goth replies;
A prayer, from whatsoever lips it flow,
By thine own rule should find the way to Heaven,
So that the heart in its sincerity
Straight forward breathe it forth. I, like thyself,
Am all untrain'd to subtilties of speech,
Nor competent of this great argument
Thou openest; and perhaps shall answer thee
Wide of the words, but to the purport home.
There are to whom the light of gospel truth
Hath never reach'd; of such I needs must deem
As of the sons of men who had their day
Before the light was given. But, Count, for those Who, born amid the light, to darkness turn,
Wilful in error, — I dare only say,
God doth not leave the unhappy soul without
An inward monitor, and till the grave
Open, the gate of mercy is not closed

Priest-like! the renegade replied, and shook
His head in scorn. What is not in the craft
Is error, and for error there shall be
No mercy found in Him whom yet ye name
The Merciful!

Now God forbid, rejoin'd
The fallen King, that one who stands in need
Of mercy for his sins should argue thus
Of error! Thou hast said that thou and I,
Thou dying in name a Mussulman, and I
A servant of the Cross, may meet in Heaven.
Time was when in our fathers' ways we walk'd
Regardlessly alike; faith being to each —
For so far thou hast reason'd rightly — like
Our country's fashion and our mother-tongue,
Of mere inheritance, — no thing of choice
In judgment fix'd, nor rooted in the heart.
We have the arrows of calamity
Sore stricken; sinking underneath the weight
Of sorrow, yet more heavily oppress'd
Beneath the burden of my sins, I turn'd
In that dread hour to Him who from the Cross
Calls to the heavy-laden. There I found
Relief and comfort; there I have my hope,
My strength, and my salvation; there, the grave
Ready beneath my feet, and Heaven in view,
I to the King of Terrors say, Come, Death, —
Come quickly! Thou too wert a stricken deer,
Julian, — God pardon the unhappy hand
That wounded thee! — but whither didst thou go

For healing? Thou hast turn'd away from Him,
Who saith, Forgive, as ye would be forgiven;
And, that the Moorish sword might do thy work,
Received the creed of Mecca: with what fruit
For Spain, let tell her cities sack'd, her sons
Slaughter'd, her daughters than thine own dear child

More foully wrong'd, more wretched! For thyself,
Thou hast had thy fill of vengeance, and, perhaps,
The cup was sweet; but it hath left behind
A bitter relish! Gladly would thy soul
Forget the past; as little canst thou bear
To send into futurity thy thoughts.
And for this Now, what is it, Count, but fear, —
However bravely thou mayst bear thy front, —
Danger, remorse, and stinging obloquy?
One only hope, one only remedy,
One only refuge yet remains. — My life
Is at thy mercy, Count! Call, if thou wilt,
Thy men, and to the Moors deliver me!
Or strike thyself! Death were from any hand
A welcome gift; from thine, and in this cause,
A boon indeed! My latest words on earth
Should tell thee that all sins may be effaced,
Bid thee repent, have faith, and be forgiven!
Strike, Julian, if thou wilt, and send my soul
To intercede for thine, that we may meet,
Thou, and thy child, and I, beyond the grave.

Thus Roderick spake, and spread his arms as if
He offer'd to the sword his willing breast,
With looks of passionate persuasion fix'd
Upon the Count, who, in his first access
Of anger, seem'd as though he would have call'd
His guards to seize the Priest. The attitude
Disarm'd him, and that fervent zeal sincere,
And more than both, the look and voice, which like

A mystery troubled him. Florinda too
Hung on his arm with both her hands, and cried,
O father, wrong him not! he speaks from God!
Life and salvation are upon his tongue!
Judge thou the value of that faith whereby,
Reflecting on the past, I murmur not,
And to the end of all look on with joy
Of hope assured!

Peace, innocent! replied
The Count, and from her hold withdrew his arm;
Then, with a gather'd brow of mournfulness
Rather than wrath, regarding Roderick, said,
Thou preachest that all sins may be effaced;
Is there forgiveness, Christian, in thy creed
For Roderick's crime? — For Roderick and for thee,
Count Julian, said the Goth, and, as he spake,
Trembled through every fibre of his frame,
The gate of Heaven is open. Julian threw
His wrathful hand aloft, and cried, Away!
Earth could not hold us both, nor can one Heaven
Contain my deadliest enemy and me!

My father, say not thus! Florinda cried;
I have forgiven him! I have pray'd for him!
For him, for thee, and for myself I pour
One constant prayer to Heaven! In passion then
She knelt, and bending back, with arms and face

Raised toward the sky, the suppliant exclaim'd,
Redeemer, heal his heart! It is the grief
Which festers there that hath bewilder'd him!
Save him, Redeemer! by thy precious death
Save, save him, O my God! Then on her face
She fell, and thus with bitterness pursued
In silent throes her agonizing prayer.

Afflict not thus thyself, my child, the Count
Exclaim'd; O dearest, be thou comforted;
Set but thy heart at rest, I ask no more!
Peace, dearest, peace! — and weeping as he spake,
He knelt to raise her. Roderick also knelt;
Be comforted, he cried, and rest in faith
That God will hear thy prayers! they must be heard.

He who could doubt the worth of prayers like thine,
May doubt of all things! Sainted as thou art
In sufferings here, this miracle will be
Thy work and thy reward!

Then, raising her,
They seated her upon the fountain's brink,
And there beside her sat. The moon had risen,
And that fair spring lay blackened half in shade,
Half like a burnish'd mirror in her light.
By that reflected light Count Julian saw
That Roderick's face was bathed with tears, and pale

As monumental marble. Friend, said he,
Whether thy faith be fabulous, or sent
Indeed from Heaven, its dearest gift to man,
Thy heart is true: and had the mitred Priest
Of Seville been like thee, or hadst thou held
The place he fill'd; — but this is idle talk, —
Things are as they will be; and we, poor slaves,
Fret in the harness as we may, must drag
The Car of Destiny where'er she drives,
Inexorable and blind!

Oh wretched man!
Cried Roderick, if thou seekest to assuage
Thy wounded spirit with that deadly drug,
Hell's subtlest venom; look to thine own heart,
Where thou hast Will and Conscience to belie
This juggling sophistry, and lead thee yet
Through penitence to Heaven!

Whate'er it be
That governs us, in mournful tone the Count
Replied, Fate, Providence, or Allah's will,
Or reckless Fortune, still the effect the same,
A world of evil and of misery!
Look where we will, we meet it; wheresoe'er
We go, we bear it with us. Here we sit
Upon the margin of this peaceful spring,
And oh! what volumes of calamity
Would be unfolded here, if either heart
Laid open its sad records! Tell me not
Of goodness! Either in some freak of power
This frame of things was fashion'd, then cast off
To take its own wild course, the sport of chance;
Or the bad Spirit o'er the Good prevails,
And in the eternal conflict hath arisen
Lord of the ascendant!

Rightly wouldst thou say,
Were there no world but this! the Goth replied.
The happiest child of earth that e'er was mark'd

To be the minion of prosperity,
Richest in corporal gifts and wealth of mind,
Honor and fame attending him abroad,
Peace and all dear domestic joys at home,
And sunshine till the evening of his days
Closed in without a cloud, — even such a man
Would from the gloom and horror of his heart
Confirm thy fatal thought, were this world all!
Oh! who could bear the haunting mystery,
If death and retribution did not solve
The riddle, and to heavenliest harmony
Reduce the seeming chaos! — Here we see
The water at its well-head; clear it is,
Not more transpicuous the invisible air;
Pure as an infant's thoughts; and here to life
And good directed all its uses serve.
The herb grows greener on its brink; sweet flowers
Bend o'er the stream that feeds their freshened roots;
The red-breast loves it for his wintry haunts;
And when the buds begin to open forth,
Builds near it with his mate their brooding nest;
The thirsty stag, with widening nostrils, there
Invigorated draws his copious draught;
And there, amid its flags, the wild boar stands,
Nor suffering wrong nor meditating hurt.
Through woodlands wild and solitary fields,
Unsullied thus it holds its bounteous course;
But when it reaches the resorts of men,
The service of the city there defiles
The tainted stream; corrupt and foul it flows
Through loathsome banks and o'er a bed impure,
Till in the sea, the appointed end to which
Through all its way it hastens, 'tis received,
And, losing all pollution, mingles there
In the wide world of waters. So is it
With the great stream of things, if all were seen;
Good the beginning, good the end shall be,
And transitory evil only make
The good end happier. Ages pass away,
Thrones fall, and nations disappear, and worlds
Grow old and go to wreck; the soul alone
Endures, and what she chooseth for herself,
The arbiter of her own destiny,
That only shall be permanent.

But guilt,
And all our suffering? said the Count. The Goth
Replied, Repentance taketh sin away,
Death remedies the rest. — Soothed by the strain
Of such discourse, Julian was silent then,
And sat contemplating. Florinda too
Was calm'd. If sore experience may be thought
To teach the uses of adversity,
She said, alas! who better learn'd than I
In that sad school! Methinks, if ye would know
How visitations of calamity
Affect the pious soul, 'tis shown ye there!
Look yonder at that cloud, which, through the sky
Sailing alone, doth cross, in her career,
The rolling Moon! I watch'd it as it came,
And deem'd the deep opaque would blot her beams;
But, melting like a wreath of snow, it hangs
In folds of wavy silver round, and clothes
The orb with richer beauties than her own,
Then passing, leaves her in her light serene

Thus having said, the pious sufferer sat,
Beholding with fix'd eyes that lovely orb,
Till quiet tears confus'd in dizzy light
The broken moonbeams. They too by the toil
Of spirit, as by travail of the day
Subdued, were silent, yielding to the hour.
The silver cloud diffusing slowly past,
And now into its airy elements
Resolved is gone; while through the azure depth
Alone in heaven the glorious Moon pursues
Her course appointed, with indifferent beams
Shining upon the silent hills around,
And the dark tents of that unholy host,
Who, all unconscious of impending fate,
Take their last slumber there. The camp is still;
The fires have moulder'd, and the breeze which stirs
The soft and snowy embers, just lays bare
At times a red and evanescent light,
Or for a moment wakes a feeble flame.
They by the fountain hear the stream below,
Whose murmurs, as the wind arose or fell,
Fuller or fainter reach the ear attuned.
And now the nightingale, not distant far,
Began her solitary song, and pour'd
To the cold moon a richer, stronger strain
Than that with which the lyric lark salutes
The new-born day. Her deep and thrilling song
Seem'd with its piercing melody to reach
The soul, and in mysterious unison
Blend with all thoughts of gentleness and love.
Their hearts were open to the healing power
Of nature; and the splendor of the night,
The flow of waters, and that sweetest lay
Came to them like a copious evening dew
Falling on vernal herbs which thirst for rain.

 XXII.

THE MOORISH COUNCIL.

Thus they beside the fountain sat, of food
And rest forgetful, when a messenger
Summon'd Count Julian to the Leader's tent.
In council there, at that late hour, he found
The assembled Chiefs, on sudden tidings call'd
Of unexpected weight from Cordoba.
Jealous that Abdalaziz had assumed
A regal state, affecting in his court
The forms of Gothic sovereignty, the Moors,
Whom artful spirits of ambitious mould
Stirr'd up, had risen against him in revolt:
And he who late had in the Caliph's name
Ruled from the Ocean to the Pyrenees,
A mutilate and headless carcass now,
From pitying hands received beside the road
A hasty grave, scarce hidden there from dogs
And ravens, nor from wintry rains secure.
She, too, who in the wreck of Spain preserved
Her queenly rank, the wife of Roderick first,
Of Abdalaziz after, and to both
Alike unhappy, shared the ruin now
Her counsels had brought on; for she had led
The infatuate Moor, in dangerous vauntery,

To these aspiring forms, — so should he gain
Respect and honor from the Mussulman,
She said, and that the obedience of the Goths
Follow'd the sceptre. In an evil hour
She gave the counsel, and in evil hour
He lent a willing ear; the popular rage
Fell on them both; and they to whom her name
Had been a mark for mockery and reproach,
Shudder'd with human horror at her fate.
Ayub was heading the wild anarchy;
But where the cement of authority
Is wanting, all things there are dislocate:
The mutinous soldiery, by every cry
Of rumor set in wild career, were driven
By every gust of passion, setting up
One hour, what in the impulse of the next,
Equally unreasoning, they destroy'd; thus all
Was in misrule where uproar gave the law,
And ere from far Damascus they could learn
The Caliph's pleasure, many a moon must pass.
What should be done? should Abulcacem march
To Cordoba, and in the Caliph's name
Assume the power which to his rank in arms
Rightly devolved, restoring thus the reign
Of order? or pursue, with quicken'd speed,
The end of this great armament, and crush
Rebellion first, then to domestic ills
Apply his undivided mind and force
Victorious? What, in this emergency,
Was Julian's counsel, Abulcacem ask'd;
Should they accomplish soon their enterprise?
Or would the insurgent infidels prolong
The contest, seeking by protracted war
To weary them, and trusting in the strength
Of these wild hills?

Julian replied, The Chief

Of this revolt is wary, resolute,
Of approved worth in war: a desperate part
He for himself deliberately hath chosen,
Confiding in the hereditary love
Borne to him by these hardy mountaineers —
A love which his own noble qualities
Have strengthen'd so that every heart is his.
When ye can bring them to the open proof
Of battle, ye will find them in his cause
Lavish of life; but well they know the strength
Of their own fastnesses, the mountain paths
Impervious to pursuit, the vantages
Of roek, and pass, and woodland, and ravine;
And hardly will ye tempt them to forego
These natural aids wherein they put their trust
As in their stubborn spirit, each alike
Deem'd by themselves invincible, and so
By Roman found and Goth — beneath whose sway
Slowly persuaded rather than subdued
They came, and still through every change retain'd
Their manners obstinate and barbarous speech.
My counsel, therefore, is, that we secure
With strong increase of force the adjacent posts,
And chiefly Gegio, leaving them so mann'd
As may abate the hope of enterprise,
Their strength being told. Time, in a strife like this,
Becomes the ally of those who trust in him:
Make then with Time your covenant. Old feuds

May disunite the chiefs: some may be gain'd
By fair entreaty, others by the stroke
Of nature, or of policy, cut off.
This was the counsel which in Cordoba
I offer'd Abdalaziz: in ill hour
Rejecting it, he sent upon this war
His father's faithful friend! Dark are the ways
Of Destiny! Had I been at his side,
Old Muza would not now have mourn'd his age
Left childless, nor had Ayub dared defy
The Caliph's represented power. The case
Calls for thine instant presence, with the weight
Of thy legitimate authority.

Julian, said Orpas, turning from beneath
His turban to the Count a crafty eye,
Thy daughter is return'd; doth she not bring
Some tidings of the movements of the foe?
The Count replied, When child and parent meet
First reconciled from discontents which wrung
The hearts of both, ill should their converse be
Of warlike matters! There hath been no time
For such inquiries, neither should I think
To ask her touching that for which I know
She hath neither eye nor thought.

There was a time —
Orpas with smile malignant thus replied —
When in the progress of the Caliph's arms
Count Julian's daughter had an interest
Which touch'd her nearly! But her turn is served,
And hatred of Prince Orpas may beget
Indifference to the cause. Yet Destiny
Still guideth to the service of the faith
The wayward heart of woman; for as one
Delivered Roderick to the avenging sword,
So hath another at this hour betray'd
Pelayo to his fall. His sister came
At nightfall to my tent a fugitive.
She tells me that, on learning our approach,
The rebel to a cavern in the hills
Had sent his wife and children, and with them
Those of his followers, thinking, there conceal'd,
They might be safe. She, moved by injuries
Which stung her spirit, on the way escaped,
And for revenge will guide us. In reward
She asks her brother's forfeiture of lands
In marriage with Numacian: something too
Touching his life, that for her services
It might be spared, she said; — an after-thought
To salve decorum, and if conscience wake,
Serve as a sop; but when the sword shall smite
Pelayo and his dangerous race, I ween,
That a thin kerchief will dry all the tears
The Lady Guisla sheds!

'Tis the old taint!
Said Julian mournfully; from her mother's womb
She brought the inbred wickedness which now
In ripe infection blossoms. Woman, woman,
Still to the Goths art thou the instrument
Of overthrow; thy virtue and thy vice
Fatal alike to them!

Say rather, cried
The insidious renegade, that Allah thus
By woman punisheth the idolatry
Of those who raise a woman to the rank

Of godhead, calling on their Mary's name
With senseless prayers. In vain shall they invoke
Her trusted succor now! Like silly birds,
By fear betray'd, they fly into the toils;
And this Pelayo, who, in lengthen'd war
Baffling our force, has thought perhaps to reign
Prince of the Mountains, when we hold his wife
And offspring at our mercy, must himself
Come to the lure.

Enough, the Leader said;
This unexpected work of favoring Fate
Opens an easy way to our desires,
And renders further counsel needless now.
Great is the Prophet whose protecting power
Goes with the faithful forth! The rebels' days
Are number'd; Allah hath deliver'd them
Into our hands!

So saying he arose;
The Chiefs withdrew; Orpas alone remain'd
Obedient to his indicated will.
The event, said Abulcaem, hath approved
Thy judgment in all points; his daughter comes
At the first summons, even as thou saidst;
Her errand with the insurgents done, she brings
Their well-concerted project back, a safe
And unexpected messenger; — the Moor —
The shallow Moor — must see and not perceive;
Must hear and understand not; yea, must bear,
Poor easy fool, to serve their after-mirth,
A part in his own undoing! But just Heaven
With this unlook'd-for incident hath marr'd
Their plots, and the sword shall cut this web
Of treason.

Well, the renegade replied,
Thou knowest Count Julian's spirit, quick in wiles,
In act audacious. Baffled now, he thinks
Either by instant warning to apprise
The rebels of their danger, or preserve
The hostages when fallen into our power,
Till secret craft contrive, or open force
Win their enlargement. Haply, too, he dreams
Of Cordoba, the avenger and the friend
Of Abdalaziz, in that cause to arm
Moor against Moor, preparing for himself
The victory o'er the enfeebled conquerors.
Success in treason hath imbolden'd him,
And power but serves him for fresh treachery, false
To Roderick first, and to the Caliph now.

The guilt, said Abulcaem, is confirm'd,
The sentence past; all that is now required
Is to strike sure and safely. He hath with him
A veteran force devoted to his will,
Whom to provoke were perilous; nor less
Of peril lies there in delay: what course
Between these equal dangers should we steer?

They have been train'd beneath him in the wars
Of Africa, the renegade replied;
Men are they, who, from their youth up, have found
Their occupation and their joy in arms;
Indifferent to the cause for which they fight,
But faithful to their leader, who hath won

By license largely given, yet temper'd still
 With exercise of firm authority,
 Their whole devotion. Vainly should we seek
 By proof of Julian's guilt to pacify
 Such martial spirits, unto whom all creeds
 And countries are alike; but take away
 The head, and forthwith their fidelity
 Goes at the market price. The act must be Sudden and secret; poison is too slow.
 Thus it may best be done; the Mountaineers,
 Doubtless, ere long will rouse us with some spur
 Of sudden enterprise; at such a time
 A trusty minister approaching him
 May smite him, so that all shall think the spear
 Comes from the hostile troops.

Right counsellor!

Cried Abulcaem, thou shalt have his lands,
 The proper meed of thy fidelity:
 His daughter thou mayst take or leave. Go now
 And find a faithful instrument to put
 Our purpose in effect! — And when 'tis done, —
 The Moor, as Orpas from the tent withdrew,
 Muttering pursued, — look for a like reward
 Thyself! That restless head of wickedness
 In the grave will brood no treasons. Other babes
 Scream when the Devil, as they spring to life,
 Infects them with his touch; but thou didst stretch
 Thine arms to meet him, and, like mother's milk,
 Suck the congenial evil! Thou hast tried Both laws, and, were there ought to gain, wouldst prove

A third as readily; but when thy sins
 Are weigh'd, 'twill be against an empty scale,
 And neither Prophet will avail thee then!

XXIII.

THE VALE OF COVADONGA.

THE camp is stirring, and ere day hath dawn'd
 The tents are struck. Early they rise whom Hope Awakens, and they travel fast with whom
 She goes companion of the way. By noon
 Hath Abulcaem in his speed attain'd
 The Vale of Cangas. Well the trusty scouts
 Observe his march, and, fleet as mountain roes,
 From post to post, with instantaneous speed,
 The warning bear: none else is nigh: the vale
 Hath been deserted, and Pelayo's hall
 Is open to the foe, who on the tower
 Hoist their white signal-flag. In Sella's stream
 The misbelieving multitudes perform,
 With hot and hasty hand, their noontide rite,
 Then hurryingly repeat the Impostor's prayer.
 Here they divide; the Chieftain halts with half
 The host, retaining Julian and his men,
 Whom where the valley widen'd he disposed,
 Liable to first attack, that so the deed
 Of murder plann'd with Orpas might be done.
 The other force the Moor Alcahman led,
 Whom Guisla guided up Pionia's stream
 Eastward to Soto. Ibrahim went with him,
 Proud of Granada's snowy heights subdued,

And boasting of his skill in mountain war;
 Yet sure he deem'd an easier victory
 Awaited him this day. Little, quoth he,
 Weens the vain Mountaineer, who puts his trust
 In dens and rocky fastnesses, how close Destruction is at hand! Belike he thinks
 The Humma's happy wings have shadow'd him,
 And therefore Fate with royalty must crown
 His chosen head! Pity the cimeter
 With its rude edge so soon should interrupt
 The pleasant dream!

There can be no escape
 For those who in the cave seek shelter, cried
 Alcahman; yield they must, or from their holes
 Like bees we smoke them out. The Chief perhaps
 May reign awhile King of the wolves and bears,
 Till his own subjects hunt him down, or kites
 And crows divide what hunger may have left
 Upon his ghastly limbs. Happier for him
 That destiny should this day to our hands
 Deliver him; short would be his sufferings then;
 And we right joyfully should in one hour
 Behold our work accomplish'd, and his race Extinct.

Thus these, in mockery and in thoughts
 Of bloody triumph, to the future blind,
 Indulged the scornful vein; nor deem'd that they
 Whom to the sword's unsparing edge they doom'd,
 Even then in joyful expectation pray'd
 To Heaven for their approach, and, at their post
 Prepared, were trembling with excess of hope.
 Here in these mountain straits the Mountaineer
 Had felt his country's strength insuperable;
 Here he had pray'd to see the Mussulman
 With all his myriads; therefore had he look'd
 To Covadonga as a sanctuary
 Apt for concealment, easy of defence;
 And Guisla's flight, though to his heart it sent
 A pang more poignant for their mother's sake,
 Yet did it further in its consequence
 His hope and project, surer than decoy
 Well-laid, or best-concerted stratagem.
 That sullen and revengeful mind, he knew,
 Would follow to the extremity of guilt
 Its long fore-purposed shame: the toils were laid,
 And she who by the Mussulmen full sure
 Thought on her kindred her revenge to wreak,
 Led the Moors in.

Count Pedro and his son
 Were hovering with the main Asturian force
 In the wider vale to watch occasion there,
 And with hot onset when the alarm began
 Pursue the vantage. In the fated straits
 Of Deva had the King disposed the rest:
 Amid the hanging woods, and on the cliffs,
 A long mile's length on either side its bed,
 They lay. The lever, and the axe, and saw
 Had skilfully been plied; and trees and stones,
 A dread artillery, ranged on crag, and shelf,
 And steep descent, were ready at the word
 Precipitate to roll resistless down.
 The faithful maiden not more wistfully
 Looks for the day that brings her lover home; —
 Scarce more impatiently the horse endures
 The rein, when loud and shrill the hunter's horn

Rings in his joyous ears, than at their post
The Mountaineers await their certain prey ;
Yet mindful of their Prince's order, oft
And solemnly enforced, with eagerness
Subdued by minds well-master'd, they expect
The appointed signal.

Hand must not be raised,
Foot stirr'd, nor voice be utter'd, said the Chief,
Till the word pass: impatience would mar all.
God hath deliver'd over to your hands
His enemies and ours, so we but use
The occasion wisely. Not till the word pass
From man to man transmitted, "In the name
"Of God, for Spain and Vengeance!" let a hand
Be lifted; on obedience all depends.
Their march below with noise of horse and foot,
And haply with the clang of instruments,
Might drown all other signal, this is sure ;
But wait it calmly; it will not be given
Till the whole line hath enter'd in the toils.
Comrades, be patient, so shall none escape
Who once set foot within these straits of death.
Thus had Pelayo on the Mountaineers
With frequent and impressive charge enforced
The needful exhortation. This alone
He doubted, that the Mussulmen might see
The perils of the vale, and warily
Forbear to enter. But they thought to find,
As Guisla told, the main Asturian force
Seeking concealment there, no other aid
Soliciting from these their native hills ;
And that, the babes and women having fallen
In thralldom, they would lay their weapons down,
And supplicate forgiveness for their sake.
Nor did the Moors perceive in what a strait
They enter'd; for the morn had risen o'ercast,
And when the Sun had reach'd the height of heaven,
Dimly his pale and beamless orb was seen
Moving through mist. A soft and gentle rain,
Scarce heavier than the summer's evening dew,
Descended, — through so still an atmosphere,
That every leaf upon the moveless trees
Was studded o'er with rain-drops, bright and full,
None falling till from its own weight o'erswollen
The motion came.

Low on the mountain side
The fleecy vapor hung, and in its veil,
With all their dreadful preparations, wrapp'd
The Mountaineers; — in breathless hope they lay,
Some blessing God in silence for the power
This day vouchsafed; others with fervency
Of prayer and vow invoked the Mother-Maid,
Beseeching her that in this favoring hour
She would be strongly with them. From below,
Meantime, distinct they heard the passing tramp
Of horse and foot, continues as the sound
Of Deva's stream, and barbarous tongues commix'd
With laughter, and with frequent shouts, — for all
Exultant came, expecting sure success;
Blind wretches, over whom the ruin hung!

They say, quoth one, that though the Prophet's soul
Doth, with the black-eyed Houris bathe in bliss,
Life hath not left his body, which bears up

By its miraculous power the holy tomb,
And holds it, at Medina, in the air,
Buoyant between the temple's floor and roof;
And there the Angels fly to him with news
From East, West, North, and South, of what befalls

His faithful people. If, when he shall hear
The tale of this day's work, he should, for joy,
Forget that he is dead, and walk abroad, —
It were as good a miracle as when He sliced the moon! Sir Angel, hear me now,
Whoe'er thou be'st who art about to speed
From Spain to Araby! when thou hast got
The Prophet's ear, be sure thou tellest him
How bravely Ghauleb did his part to-day,
And with what special reverence he alone
Desired thee to commend him to his grace! —
Fie on thee, scoffer that thou art! replied
His comrade; thou wilt never leave these gibes
Till some commission'd arrow through the teeth
Shall nail the offending tongue. Hast thou not heard

How, when our clay is leaven'd first with life,
The ministering Angel brings it from that spot
Whereon 'tis written in the eternal book
That soul and body must their parting take,
And earth to earth return? How knowest thou
But that the spirit who compounded thee,
To distant Syria from this very vale
Bore thy component dust, and Azrael here
Awaits thee at this hour? — Little thought he
Who spake, that, in that valley, at that hour,
One death awaited both!

Thus they pursued
Toward the cave their inauspicious way.
Weak childhood there, and ineffective age,
In the chambers of the rock, were placed secure;
But of the women, all whom with the babes
Maternal care detain'd not, were aloft
To aid in the destruction; by the side
Of fathers, brethren, husbands, station'd there,
They watch and pray. Pelayo in the cave,
With the venerable primate, took his post.
Ranged on the rising cliffs, on either hand,
Vigilant sentinels, with eye intent,
Observe his movements, when to take the word
And pass it forward. He, in arms complete,
Stands in the portal; a stern majesty
Reign'd in his countenance severe that hour,
And in his eye a deep and dreadful joy
Shone, as advancing up the vale he saw
The Moorish banners. God hath blinded them!
He said; the measure of their crimes is full!
O Vale of Deva, famous shalt thou be
From this day forth forever; and to these Thy springs shall unborn generations come
In pilgrimage, and hallow with their prayers
The cradle of their native monarchy!

There was a stirring in the air; the sun
Prevail'd, and gradually the brightening mist
Began to rise and melt. A jutting crag
Upon the right projected o'er the stream,
Not farther from the cave than a strong hand
Expert, with deadly aim, might cast the spear,

Or a strong voice, pitch'd to full compass, make
 Its clear articulation heard distinct.
 A venturous dalesman, once ascending there
 To rob the eagle's nest, had fallen, and hung
 Among the heather, wondrously preserved :
 Therefore had he with pious gratitude
 Placed on that overhanging brow a Cross,
 Tall as the mast of some light fisher's skiff,
 And from the vale conspicuous. As the Moors
 Advanced, the Chieftain in the van was seen,
 Known by his arms, and from the crag a voice
 Pronounced his name, — Alcahman! ho, look up,
 Alcahman! As the floating mist drew up,
 It had divided there, and open'd round
 The Cross; part clinging to the rock beneath,
 Hovering and waving part in fleecy folds,
 A canopy of silver light condensed
 To shape and substance. In the midst there stood
 A female form, one hand upon the Cross,
 The other raised in menacing act; below
 Loose flow'd her raiment, but her breast was arm'd,
 And helmeted her head. The Moor turn'd pale,
 For on the walls of Auria he had seen
 That well-known figure, and had well believed
 She rested with the dead. What, ho! she cried,
 Alcahman! In the name of all who fell
 At Auria in the massacre, this hour
 I summon thee before the throne of God
 To answer for the innocent blood! This hour,
 Moor, Miscreant, Murderer, Child of Hell, this hour
 I summon thee to judgment! — In the name
 Of God! for Spain and Vengeance!

Thus she closed

Her speech; for taking from the Primate's hand
 That oaken cross which at the sacring rites
 Had served for crosier, at the cavern's mouth,
 Pelayo lifted it and gave the word.
 From voice to voice on either side it pass'd
 With rapid repetition, — In the name
 Of God! for Spain and Vengeance! and forthwith,
 On either side, along the whole defile,
 The Asturians, shouting in the name of God,
 Set the whole ruin loose! Huge trunks and stones,
 And loosen'd crags, down, down they roll'd with rush,
 And bound, and thundering force. Such was the fall,
 As when some city, by the laboring earth
 Heaved from its strong foundations, is cast down,
 And all its dwellings, towers, and palaces,
 In one wide desolation prostrated.
 From end to end of that long strait, the crash
 Was heard continuous, and, commix'd with sounds
 More dreadful, shrieks of horror, and despair,
 And death, — the wild and agonizing cry
 Of that whole host in one destruction whelm'd.
 Vain was all valor there, all martial skill;
 The valiant arm is helpless now; the feet
 Swift in the race avail not now to save;
 They perish; all their thousands perish there, —
 Horsemen and infantry, they perish all, —
 The outward armor and the bones within Broken, and bruised, and crush'd. Echo prolong'd
 The long uproar: a silence then ensued,

Through which the sound of Deva's stream was heard,
 A lonely voice of waters, wild and sweet;
 The lingering groan, the faintly-utter'd prayer,
 The louder curses of despairing death,
 Ascended not so high. Down from the cave
 Pelayo hastes; the Asturians hasten down;
 Fierce and immitigable down they speed
 On all sides; and along the vale of blood
 The avenging sword did mercy's work that hour.

 XXIV.

RODERICK AND COUNT JULIAN.

THou hast been busy, Death! this day, and yet
 But half thy work is done; the Gates of Hell
 Are throng'd, yet twice ten thousand spirits more,
 Who from their warm and healthful tenements
 Fear no divorce, must, ere the sun go down,
 Enter the world of woe! The Gate of Heaven
 Is open too, and Angels round the throne
 Of Mercy on their golden harps this day
 Shall sing the triumphs of Redeeming Love.

There was a Church at Cangas dedicate
 To that Apostle unto whom his Lord
 Had given the keys — a humble edifice,
 Whose rude and time-worn structure suited well
 That vale among the mountains. Its low roof
 With stone plants and with moss was overgrown,
 Short fern, and richer weeds, which from the eaves
 Hung their long tresses down. White lichens clothed

The sides, save where the ivy spread, which bower'd
 The porch, and clustering round the pointed wall,
 Wherein two bells, each open to the wind,
 Hung side by side, threaded with hairy shoots
 The double niche; and climbing to the cross,
 Wreathed it, and half conceal'd its sacred form
 With bushy tufts luxuriant. Here in the font —
 Borne hither with rejoicing and with prayers
 Of all the happy land, who saw in him
 The lineage of their ancient Chiefs renew'd —
 The Prince had been immersed: and here within
 An oaken galilee, now black with age,
 His old Iberian ancestors were laid.

Two stately oaks stood nigh, in the full growth
 Of many a century. They had flourish'd there
 Before the Gothic sword was felt in Spain,
 And when the ancient sceptre of the Goths
 Was broken, there they flourish'd still. Their boughs,
 Mingled on high, and stretching wide around,
 Form'd a deep shade, beneath which canopy,
 Upon the ground Count Julian's board was spread;
 For to his daughter he had left his tent,
 Pitched for her use hard by. He at the board
 Sat with his trusted Captains, Gunderick,
 Felix and Miro, Theudered and Paul,
 Basil and Cottila, and Virimar,

Men through all fortunes faithful to their Lord,
 And to that old and tried fidelity,
 By personal love and honor held in ties
 Strong as religious bonds. As there they sat,
 In the distant vale a rising dust was seen,
 And frequent flash of steel, — the flying fight
 Of men who, by a fiery foe pursued,
 Put forth their coursers at full speed, to reach
 The aid in which they trust. Up sprung the Chiefs,
 And hastily taking helm, and shield, and spear,
 Sped to their post.

Amid the chestnut groves
 On Sella's side, Alphonso had in charge
 To watch the foe: a prowling band came nigh,
 Whom, with the ardor of impetuous youth,
 He charged, and followed them in close pursuit:
 Quick succors join'd them; and the strife grew hot,
 Ere Pedro, hastening to bring off his son,
 Or Julian and his Captains, — bent alike
 That hour to abstain from combat, (for by this Full sure they deem'd Alcáman had secured
 The easy means of certain victory,) —
 Could reach the spot. Both thus in their intent
 According, somewhat had they now allay'd
 The fury of the fight, though still spears flew,
 And strokes of sword and mace were interchanged,
 When, passing through the troop, a Moor came up
 On errand from the Chief, to Julian sent;
 A fatal errand fatally perform'd
 For Julian, for the Chief, and for himself,
 And all that host of Mussulmen he brought;
 For while with well-dissembled words he lured
 The warrior's ear, the dexterous ruffian mark'd
 The favoring moment and unguarded place,
 And plunged a javelin in his side. The Count
 Fell, but in falling called to Cottila, — Treachery! the Moor! the Moor! — He too on whom

He call'd had seen the blow from whence it came,
 And seized the Murderer. Miscreant! he ex-
 claim'd,
 Who set thee on? The Mussulman, who saw
 His secret purpose baffled, undismayed,
 Replies, What I have done is authorized;
 To punish treachery and prevent worse ill,
 Orpas and Abulcacem sent me here;
 The service of the Caliph and the Faith
 Required the blow.

The Prophet and the Fiend
 Reward thee then! cried Cottila; meantime
 Take thou from me thy proper earthly need;
 Villain! — and lifting, as he spake, the sword,
 He smote him on the neck; the trenchant blade
 Through vein and artery pass'd and yielding bone;
 And on the shoulder, as the assassin dropp'd,
 His head half-severed fell. The curse of God
 Fall on the Caliph, and the Faith, and thee!
 Stamping for anguish, Cottila pursued;
 African dogs, thus is it ye requite
 Our services? — But dearly shall ye pay
 For this day's work! — O fellow-soldiers, here,
 Stretching his hands toward the host, he cried,
 Behold your noble leader basely slain!
 He who for twenty years hath led us forth
 To war, and brought us home with victory, —

Here he lies foully murdered, — by the Moors, —
 Those whom he trusted, whom he served so well!
 Our turn is next! but neither will we wait
 Idly, nor tamely fall!

Amid the grief,
 Tumult, and rage, of those who gather'd round,
 When Julian could be heard, I have yet life,
 He said, for vengeance. Virimar, speed thou
 To yonder Mountaineers, and tell their Chiefs
 That Julian's veteran army joins this day
 Pelayo's standard! The command devolves
 On Gunderick. Fellow-soldiers, who so well
 Redress'd the wrongs of your old General,
 Ye will not let his death go unrevenged! —
 Tears then were seen on many an iron cheek,
 And groans were heard from many a resolute heart,
 And vows with imprecations mix'd went forth,
 And curses check'd by sobs. Bear me apart,
 Said Julian, with a faint and painful voice,
 And let me see my daughter ere I die.

Scarce had he spoken when the pitying throng
 Divide before her. Eagerly she came;
 A deep and fearful lustre in her eye,
 A look of settled woe, — pale, deadly pale,
 Yet to no lamentations giving way,
 Nor tears nor groans; — within her breaking heart
 She bore the grief, and kneeling solemnly
 Beside him, raised her awful hands to heaven,
 And cried, Lord God! be with him in this hour!
 Two things have I to think of, O my child —
 Vengeance and thee, said Julian. For the first
 I have provided: what remains of life
 As best may comfort thee may so be best
 Employ'd; let me be borne within the church,
 And thou, with that good man who follows thee,
 Attend me there.

Thus when Florinda heard
 Her father speak, a gleam of heavenly joy
 Shone through the anguish of her countenance.
 O gracious God, she cried, my prayers are heard;
 Now let me die! — They raised him from the earth;
 He, knitting, as they lifted him, his brow,
 DREW in, through open lips and teeth firm-closed,
 His painful breath, and on the lance laid hand,
 Lest its long shaft should shake the mortal wound.
 Gently his men, with slow and steady step,
 Their suffering burden bore, and in the Church
 Before the altar laid him down, his head
 Upon Florinda's knees. — Now, friends, said he,
 Farewell. I ever hoped to meet my death
 Among ye, like a soldier, — but not thus!
 Go join the Asturians; and in after-years,
 When of your old commander ye shall talk,
 How well he loved his followers, what he was
 In battle, and how basely he was slain,
 Let not the tale its fit completion lack,
 But say how bravely was his death revenged.
 Vengeance! in that good word doth Julian make
 His testament; your faithful swords must give
 The will its full performance. Leave me now;
 I have done with worldly things. Comrades, farewell,
 And love my memory!

They with copious tears

Of burning anger, grief exasperating
 Their rage, and fury giving force to grief,
 Hasten'd to form their ranks against the Moors.
 Julian meantime toward the altar turn'd
 His languid eyes. That Image, is it not
 St. Peter? he inquired; he who denied
 His Lord, and was forgiven? — Roderick rejoin'd,
 It is the Apostle; and may that same Lord,
 O Julian, to thy soul's salvation bless
 The seasonable thought!

The dying Count

Then fix'd upon the Goth his earnest eyes.
 No time, said he, is this for bravery,
 As little for dissemblance. I would fain
 Die in the faith wherein my fathers died,
 Whereto they pledged me in mine infancy.
 A soldier's habits, he pursued, have steel'd
 My spirit, and perhaps I do not fear
 This passage as I ought. But if to feel
 That I have sinn'd, and from my soul renounce
 The Impostor's faith, which never in that soul
 Obtain'd a place, — if at the Savior's feet,
 Laden with guilt, to cast myself and cry,
 Lord, I believe! help thou my unbelief!
 If this in the sincerity of death
 Sufficeth, — Father, let me from thy lips
 Receive the assurances with which the Church
 Doth bless the dying Christian.

Roderick raised

His eyes to heaven, and crossing on his breast
 His open palms — Mysterious are thy ways
 And merciful, O gracious Lord! he cried,
 Who to this end hast thus been pleased to lead
 My wandering steps! O Father, this thy son
 Hath sinn'd and gone astray: but hast not Thou
 Said, When the sinner from his evil ways
 Turneth, that he shall save his soul alive,
 And Angels at the sight rejoice in Heaven!
 Therefore do I, in thy most holy name,
 Into thy family receive again
 Him who was lost, and in that name absolve
 The Penitent. — So saying, on the head
 Of Julian solemnly he laid his hands.
 Then to the altar tremblingly he turn'd,
 And took the bread, and breaking it, pursued —
 Julian! receive from me the Bread of Life!
 In silence reverently the Count partook
 The reconciling rite, and to his lips
 Roderick then held the consecrated cup.

Me too! exclaim'd Florinda, who till then
 Had listen'd speechlessly; thou Man of God,
 I also must partake! The Lord hath heard
 My prayers! one sacrament, — one hour, — one grave, —
 One resurrection!

That dread office done,
 Count Julian with amazement saw the Priest
 Kneel down before him. By the sacrament
 Which we have here partaken, Roderick cried,
 In this most awful moment; by that hope, —
 That holy faith which comforts thee in death,
 Grant thy forgiveness, Julian, ere thou diest!
 Behold the man who most hath injured thee!
 Roderick, the wretched Goth, the guilty cause

Of all thy guilt, — the unworthy instrument
 Of thy redemption, — kneels before thee here,
 And prays to be forgiven!

Roderick! exclaim'd

The dying Count, — Roderick! — and from the floor
 With violent effort half he raised himself;
 The spear hung heavy in his side, and pain
 And weakness overcame him, that he fell Back on his daughter's lap. O Death, cried he, —
 Passing his hand across his cold, damp brow, —
 Thou tamest the strong limb, and conquerest
 The stubborn heart! But yesterday I said
 One Heaven could not contain mine enemy
 And me; and now I lift my dying voice
 To say, Forgive me, Lord, as I forgive [eyes
 Him who hath done the wrong! — He closed his
 A moment; then with sudden impulse cried, —
 Roderick, thy wife is dead, — the Church hath power

To free thee from thy vows, — the broken heart
 Might yet be heal'd, the wrong redress'd, the throne
 Rebuilt by that same hand which pull'd it down,
 And these cursed Africans — Oh for a month
 Of that waste life which millions misbestow! —
 His voice was passionate, and in his eye
 With glowing animation while he spake
 The vehement spirit shone: its effort soon
 Was past, and painfully, with feeble breath,
 In slow and difficult utterance he pursued, —
 Vain hope, if all the evil was ordain'd,
 And this wide wreck the will and work of Heaven,
 We but the poor occasion! Death will make
 All clear, and, joining us in better worlds,
 Complete our union there! Do for me now
 One friendly office more: — draw forth the spear,
 And free me from this pain! — Receive his soul,
 Savior! exclaim'd the Goth, as he perform'd
 The fatal service. Julian cried, O friend! —
 True friend! — and gave to him his dying hand.
 Then said he to Florinda, I go first,
 Thou followest! — kiss me, child! — and now, good night!

When from her father's body she arose,
 Her cheek was flush'd, and in her eyes there beam'd
 A wilder brightness. On the Goth she gazed,
 While underneath the emotions of that hour
 Exhausted life gave way. O God! she said,
 Lifting her hands, thou hast restored me all, —
 All — in one hour! — and round his neck she threw
 Her arms, and cried, My Roderick! mine in Heaven!
 Groaning, he clasp'd her close, and in that act
 And agony her happy spirit fled.

XXV.

RODERICK IN BATTLE.

EIGHT thousand men had to Asturias march'd
 Beneath Count Julian's banner; the remains

Of that brave army which in Africa
So well against the Mussulman made head,
Till sense of injuries insupportable,
And raging thirst of vengeance, overthrew
Their leader's noble spirit. To revenge
His quarrel, twice that number left their bones,
Slain in unnatural battle, on the field
Of Xeres, when the sceptre from the Goths
By righteous Heaven was reft. Others had fallen Consumed in sieges, alway by the Moor
To the front of war opposed. The policy,
With whatsoever show of honor cloak'd,
Was gross, and this surviving band had oft
At their carousals, of the flagrant wrong,
Held such discourse as stirs the mounting blood,
The common danger with one discontent
Affecting chiefs and men. Nor had the bonds
Of rooted discipline and faith attach'd
Thus long restrain'd them, had they not known well

That Julian in their just resentment shared,
And fix'd their hopes on him. Slight impulse now
Sufficed to make these fiery martialists
Break forth in open fury; and though first
Count Pedro listen'd with suspicious ear
To Julian's dying errand, deeming it
Some new decoy of treason, — when he found
A second legate follow'd Virimar,
And then a third, and saw the turbulence
Of the camp, and how against the Moors in haste
They form'd their lines, he knew that Providence
This hour had for his country interposed,
And in such faith advanced to use the aid
Thus wondrously ordain'd. The eager Chiefs
Hasten to greet him, Cottila and Paul,
Basil and Miro, Theudered, Gunderick,
Felix, and all who held authority;
The zealous services of their brave host
They proffer'd, and besought him instantly
To lead against the African their force
Combined, and in good hour assail a foe
Divided, nor for such attack prepared.

While thus they communed, Roderick from the church
Came forth, and seeing Pedro, bent his way
Toward them. Sirs, said he, the Count is dead;
He died a Christian, reconciled to Heaven,
In faith; and when his daughter had received
His dying breath, her spirit too took flight.
One sacrament, one death, united them:
And I beseech ye, ye who from the work
Of blood which lies before us may return, —
If, as I think, it should not be my fate, —
That in one grave with Christian ceremonies
Ye lay them side by side. In Heaven I ween
They are met through mercy: — ill befall the man
Who should in death divide them! — Then he turn'd

His speech to Pedro in an under voice.
The King, said he, I know, with noble mind
Will judge of the departed; Christian-like
He died, and with a manly penitence:
They who condemn him most should call to mind

How grievous was the wrong which madden'd
him;

Be that remember'd in his history,
And let no shame be offer'd his remains.

As Pedro would have answer'd, a loud cry
Of menacing imprecation from the troops
Arose; for Orpas, by the Moorish Chief
Sent to allay the storm his villany
Had stirr'd, came hastening on a milk-white steed,
And at safe distance having check'd the rein,
Beckon'd for parley. 'Twas Orelio
On which he rode, Roderick's own battle-horse,
Who from his master's hand had went to feed,
And with a glad docility obey
His voice familiar. At the sight the Goth
Started, and indignation to his soul
Brought back the thoughts and feelings of old times.

Suffer me, Count, he cried, to answer him,
And hold these back the while! Thus having said,
He waited no reply, but as he was,
Bareheaded, in his weeds, and all unarm'd,
Advanced toward the renegade. Sir Priest,
Quoth Orpas as he came, I hold no talk
With thee; my errand is with Gunderick
And the Captains of the host, to whom I bring Such liberal offers and clear proof —

The Goth,
Breaking with scornful voice his speech, ex-
claim'd,
What, could no steed but Roderick's serve thy turn!

I should have thought some sleek and sober mule,
Long train'd in shackles to procession pace,
More suited to my lord of Seville's use
Than this good war-horse, — he who never bore
A villain, until Orpas cross'd his back! —
Wretch! cried the astonish'd renegade, and stoop'd,
Foaming with anger, from the saddle-bow,
To reach his weapon. Ere the hasty hand,
Trembling in passion, could perform its will,
Roderick had seized the reins. How now, he cried,
Orelio! old companion, — my good horse, —
Off with this recreant burden! — And with that
He raised his hand, and rear'd and back'd the steed,
To that remember'd voice and arm of power
Obedient. Down the helpless traitor fell,
Violently thrown, and Roderick over him
Thrice led, with just and unrelenting hand,
The trampling hoofs. Go, join Witiza now,
Where he lies howling, the avenger cried,
And tell him Roderick sent thee!

At that sight,
Count Julian's soldiers and the Asturian host
Set up a shout, a joyful shout, which rung
Wide through the welkin. Their exulting cry
With louder acclamation was renew'd,
When from the expiring miscreant's neck they saw
That Roderick took the shield, and round his own
Hung it, and vaulted in the seat. My horse!
My noble horse! he cried, with flattering hand
Patting his high-arch'd neck! the renegade —
I thank him for't — hath kept thee daintily!

Orelio, thou art in thy beauty still,
 Thy pride and strength! Orelio, my good horse,
 Once more thou bearest to the field thy Lord,
 He who so oft hath fed and cherish'd thee,
 He for whose sake, wherever thou wert seen,
 Thou wert by all men honor'd. Once again
 Thou hast thy proper master! Do thy part
 As thou wert wont; and bear him gloriously,
 My beautiful Orelio, — to the last —
 'The happiest of his fields! — Then he drew forth
 The cimeter, and waving it aloft,
 Rode toward the troops; its unaccustom'd shape
 Disliked him. Renegade in all things! cried
 The Goth, and cast it from him; to the Chiefs
 Then said, If I have done ye service here,
 Help me, I pray you, to a Spanish sword!
 The trustiest blade that e'er in Bilbilis
 Was dipp'd, would not to-day be misbestowed
 On this right hand! — Go, some one, Gunderick
 cried,
 And bring Count Julian's sword. Whoe'er thou
 art,
 The worth which thou hast shown avenging him
 Entitles thee to wear it. But thou goest
 For battle unequipp'd; — haste there, and strip
 Yon villain of his armor!

Late he spake,
 So fast the Moors came on. It matters not,
 Replied the Goth; there's many a mountaineer,
 Who in no better armor cased this day
 Than his wonted leathern gipion, will be found
 In the hottest battle, yet bring off untouch'd
 The unguarded life he ventures. — Taking then
 Count Julian's sword, he fitted round his wrist
 The chain, and eyeing the elaborate steel
 With stern regard of joy — The African
 Under unhappy stars was born, he cried,
 Who tastes thy edge! — Make ready for the charge!
 They come — they come! — On, brethren, to the field! —
 The word is, Vengeance!

Vengeance was the word;
 From man to man, and rank to rank it pass'd,
 By every heart enforced, by every voice
 Sent forth in loud defiance of the foe.
 The enemy in shriller sounds return'd
 Their Akbar and the Prophet's trusted name.
 The horsemen lower'd their spears, the infantry,
 Deliberately, with slow and steady step,
 Advanced; the bow-strings twang'd, and arrows
 hiss'd,
 And javelins hurtled by. Anon the hosts
 Met in the shock of battle, horse and man
 Conflicting; shield struck shield, and sword, and mace,
 And curtle-axe on helm and buckler rung;
 Armor was riven, and wounds were interchanged,
 And many a spirit from its mortal hold
 Hurried to bliss or bale. Well did the Chiefs
 Of Julian's army in that hour support
 Their old esteem; and well Count Pedro there
 Enhanced his former praise; and by his side,
 Rejoicing like a bridegroom in the strife,
 Alphonso through the host of infidels

Bore on his bloody lance dismay and death.
 But there was worst confusion and uproar,
 There widest slaughter and dismay, where, proud
 Of his recover'd Lord, Orelio plunged
 Through thickest ranks, trampling beneath his feet
 The living and the dead. Where'er he turns,
 The Moors divide and fly. What man is this,
 Appall'd they say, who to the front of war
 Bareheaded offers thus his naked life?
 Replete with power he is, and terrible,
 Like some destroying Angel! Sure his lips
 Have drank of Kaf's dark fountain, and he comes Strong in his immortality! Fly! fly!
 They said; this is no human foe! — Nor less
 Of wonder fill'd the Spaniards when they saw
 How flight and terror went before his way,
 And slaughter in his path. Behold, cries one,
 With what command and knightly ease he sits
 The intrepid steed, and deals from side to side
 His dreadful blows! Not Roderick in his power
 Bestrode with such command and majesty
 That noble war-horse. His loose robe this day
 Is death's black banner, shaking from its folds
 Dismay and ruin. Of no mortal mould
 Is he who in that garb of peace affronts
 Whole hosts, and sees them scatter where he turns!
 Auspicious Heaven beholds us, and some Saint Revisits earth!

Ay, cries another, Heaven
 Hath ever with especial bounty bless'd
 Above all other lands its favor'd Spain;
 Choosing her children forth from all mankind
 For its peculiar people, as of yore
 Abraham's ungrateful race beneath the Law.
 Who knows not how on that most holy night
 When peace on Earth by Angels was proclaim'd,
 The light which o'er the fields of Bethlehem shone,
 Irradiated whole Spain? not just display'd,
 As to the Shepherds, and again withdrawn;
 All the long winter hours from eve till morn
 Her forests, and her mountains, and her plains,
 Her hills and valleys, were imbathed in light,
 A light which came not from the sun, or moon,
 Or stars, by secondary powers dispensed,
 But from the fountain-springs, the Light of Light
 Effluent. And wherefore should we not believe
 That this may be some Saint or Angel, charged
 To lead us to miraculous victory?
 Hath not the Virgin Mother, oftentimes Descending, clothed in glory, sanctified
 With feet adorable our happy soil! —
 Mark'd ye not, said another, how he cast
 In wrath the unhallow'd cimeter away,
 And called for Christian weapon? Oh, be sure
 This is the aid of Heaven! On, comrades, on!
 A miracle to-day is wrought for Spain!
 Victory and Vengeance! Hew the miscreants
 down,
 And spare not! hew them down in sacrifice!
 God is with us! his Saints are in the field!
 Victory, miraculous Victory!
 Thus they
 Inflamed with wild belief the keen desire
 Of vengeance on their enemies abhorr'd.
 The Moorish Chief, meantime, o'erlooked the fight

From an eminence, and cursed the renegade
Whose counsels sorting to such ill effect
Had brought this danger on. Lo, from the East
Comes fresh alarm! a few poor fugitives
Well nigh with fear exanimate came up,
From Covadonga flying, and the rear
Of that destruction, scarce with breath to tell
Their dreadful tale. When Abulcacec heard,
Stricken with horror, like a man bereft
Of sense, he stood. O Prophet, he exclaim'd,
A hard and cruel fortune hast thou brought
This day upon thy servant! Must I then
Here with disgrace and ruin close a life
Of glorious deeds? But how should man resist
Fate's irreversible decrees, or why
Murmur at what must be? They who survive
May mourn the evil which this day begins:
My part will soon be done!—Grief then gave way
To rage, and cursing Guisla, he pursued—
Oh that that treacherous woman were but here!
It were a consolation to give her
The evil death she merits!

That reward
She hath had, a Moor replied. For when we reach'd

The entrance of the vale, it was her choice
There in the farthest dwellings to be left,
Lest she should see her brother's face; but thence
We found her flying at the overthrow,
And visiting the treason on her head,
Pierced her with wounds.—Poor vengeance for a host

Destroyed! said Abulcacec in his soul.
Howbeit, resolving to the last to do
His office, he roused up his spirit. Go,
Strike off Count Eudon's head! he cried; the fear
Which brought him to our camp will bring him else
In arms against us now; for Sisibert
And Ebba, he continued thus in thought,
Their uncle's fate forever bars all plots
Of treason on their part; no hope have they
Of safety but with us. He call'd them then
With chosen troops to join him in the front
Of battle, that, by bravely making head,
Retreat might now be won. Then fiercer raged
The conflict, and more frequent cries of death,
Mingling with imprecations and with prayers,
Rose through the din of war.

By this the blood
Which Deva down her fatal channel pour'd,
Purpling Pionia's course, had reach'd and stain'd
The wider stream of Sella. Soon far off
The frequent glance of spears and gleam of arms
Were seen, which sparkled to the westering orb,
Where down the vale impatient to complete
The glorious work so well that day begun,
Pelayo led his troops. On foot they came,
Chieftains and men alike; the Oaken Cross
Triumphant, borne on high, precedes their march,
And broad and bright the argent banner shone.
Roderick, who, dealing death from side to side,
Had through the Moorish army now made way,
Beheld it flash, and judging well what aid
Approach'd, with sudden impulse that way rode,
To tell of what had pass'd,—lest in the strife

They should engage with Julian's men, and mar
The mighty consummation. One ran on
To meet him fleet of foot, and having given
His tale to this swift messenger, the Goth
Halted awhile to let Orelio breathe.
Siverian, quoth Pelayo, if mine eyes
Deceive me not, yon horse, whose reeking sides
Are red with slaughter, is the same on whom
The apostate Orpas in his vauntery
Wont to parade the streets of Cordoba.
But thou shouldst know him best; regard him well;
Is't not Orelio?

Either it is he,
The old man replied, or one so like to him,
Whom all thought matchless, that similitude
Would be the greater wonder. But behold,
What man is he who in that disarray
Doth with such power and majesty bestride
The noble steed, as if he felt himself
In his own proper seat? Look, how he leans
To cherish him; and how the gallant horse
Curves up his stately neck, and bends his head,
As if again to court that gentle touch,
And answer to the voice which praises him!
Can it be Maccabee? rejoind the King,
Or are the secret wishes of my soul
Indeed fulfill'd, and hath the grave given up
Its dead?—So saying, on the old man he turn'd
Eyes full of wide astonishment, which told
The incipient thought that for incredible
He spake no further. But enough had pass'd,
For old Siverian started at the words
Like one who sees a spectre, and exclaim'd,
Blind that I was to know him not till now!
My Master, O my Master!

He meantime
With easy pace moved on to meet their march.
King, to Pelayo he began, this day,
By means scarce less than miracle, thy throne
Is stablish'd, and the wrongs of Spain revenged.
Orpas, the accursed, upon yonder field
Lies ready for the ravens. By the Moors
Traacherously slain, Count Julian will be found
Before Saint Peter's altar; unto him
Grace was vouchsafed; and by that holy power
Which at Visonia by the Primate's hand
Of his own proper act to me was given,
Unworthy as I am,—yet sure I think
Not without mystery, as the event hath shown,—
Did I accept Count Julian's penitence,
And reconcile the dying man to Heaven.
Beside him hath his daughter gone to rest.
Deal honorably with his remains, and let
One grave with Christian rites receive them both.
Is it not written that as the Tree falls
So it shall lie?

In this and at things else,
Pelayo answer'd, looking wistfully
Upon the Goth, thy pleasure shall be done.
Then Roderick saw that he was known, and turn'd
His head away in silence. But the old man
Laid hold upon his bridle, and look'd up
In his master's face, weeping and silently.
Thereat the Goth, with fervent pressure, took
His hand, and bending down toward him, said,

My good Siverian, go not thou this day
To war! I charge thee keep thyself from harm!
Thou art past the age for combats, and with whom Hereafter should thy mistress talk of me
If thou wert gone? — Thou seest I am unarm'd;
Thus disarray'd as thou beholdest me,
Clean through yon miscreant army have I cut
My way unhurt; but being once by Heaven
Preserved, I would not perish with the guilt
Of having wilfully provoked my death.
Give me thy helmet and thy cuirass! — Nay, —
Thou wert not wont to let me ask in vain,
Nor to oppose me when my will was known!
To thee, methinks, I should be still the King.

Thus saying, they withdrew a little way
Within the trees. Roderick alighted there,
And in the old man's armor dight himself.
Dost thou not marvel by what wondrous chance,
Said he, Orelio to his master's hand
Hath been restored? I found the renegade
Of Seville on his back, and hurl'd him down
Headlong to the earth. The noble animal
Rejoicingly obey'd my hand to shake
His recreant burden off, and trample out
The life which once I spared in evil hour.
Now let me meet Witiza's viperous sons
In yonder field, and then I may go rest
In peace, — my work is done!

And nobly done!
Exclaim'd the old man. Oh! thou art greater
now

Than in that glorious hour of victory
When grovelling in the dust Witiza lay,
The prisoner of thy hand! — Roderick replied,
O good Siverian, happier victory
Thy son hath now achieved, — the victory
Over the world, his sins, and his despair.
If on the field my body should be found,
See it, I charge thee, laid in Julian's grave,
And let no idle ear be told for whom
Thou mournest. Thou wilt use Orelio
As doth beseem the steed which hath so oft
Carried a King to battle; — he hath done
Good service for his rightful Lord to-day,
And better yet must do. Siverian, now
Farewell! I think we shall not meet again
Till it be in that world where never change
Is known, and they who love shall part no more.
Commend me to my mother's prayers, and say
That never man enjoy'd a heavenlier peace
Than Roderick at this hour. O faithful friend,
How dear thou art to me these tears may tell!

With that he fell upon the old man's neck;
Then vaulted in the saddle, gave the reins,
And soon rejoind'd the host. On, comrades, on!
Victory and Vengeance! he exclaim'd, and took
The lead on that good charger, he alone
Horsed for the onset. They, with one consent,
Gave all their voices to the inspiring cry,
Victory and Vengeance! and the hills and rocks
Caught the prophetic shout and roll'd it round.
Count Pedro's people heard amid the heat
Of battle, and return'd the glad acclaim.

The astonish'd Mussulmen, on all sides charged,
Hear that tremendous cry; yet manfully
They stood, and every where, with gallant front,
Opposed in fair array the sheek of war.
Desperately they fought, like men expert in arms,
And knowing that no safety could be found,
Save from their own right hands. No former day
Of all his long career had seen their chief
Approved so well; nor had Witiza's sons
Ever before this hour achieved in fight
Such feats of resolute valor. Sisibert
Beheld Pelayo in the field afoot,
And twice essay'd beneath his horse's feet
To thrust him down. Twice did the Prince evade
The shock, and twice upon his shield received
The fratricidal sword. Tempt me no more,
Son of Witiza, cried the indignant chief,
Lest I forget what mother gave thee birth!
Go meet thy death from any hand but mine!
He said, and turn'd aside. Fittest from me!
Exclaim'd a dreadful voice, as through the throng
Orelio forced his way: fittest from me
Receive the rightful death too long withheld!
'Tis Roderick strikes the blow! And as he spake,
Upon the traitor's shoulder fierce he drove
The weapon, well-bestow'd. He in the seat
Totter'd and fell. The Avenger hasten'd on
In search of Ebba; and in the heat of fight
Rejoicing, and forgetful of all else,
Set up his cry, as he was wont in youth —
Roderick the Goth! — his war-cry known so well.
Pelayo eagerly took up the word,
And shouted out his kinsman's name beloved —
Roderick the Goth! Roderick and Victory!
Roderick and Vengeance! Odoar gave it forth;
Urban repeated it, and through his ranks
Count Pedro sent the cry. Not from the field
Of his great victory, when Witiza fell,
With louder acclamations had that name
Been borne abroad upon the winds of heaven.
The unreflecting throng, who yesterday,
If it had pass'd their lips, would with a curse
Have clogg'd it, echoed it as if it came
From some celestial voice in the air, reveal'd
To be the certain pledge of all their hopes.
Roderick the Goth! Roderick and Victory!
Roderick and Vengeance! O'er the field it
spread,
All hearts and tongues uniting in the cry;
Mountains, and rocks, and vales reëchoed round,
And he, rejoicing in his strength, rode on,
Laying on the Moors with that good sword, and smote,
And overthrew, and scatter'd, and destroy'd,
And trampled down; and still at every blow
Exultingly he sent the war-cry forth,
Roderick the Goth! Roderick and Victory!
Roderick and Vengeance!

Thus he made his way,
Smiting and slaying, through the astonish'd ranks,
Till he beheld, where, on a fiery barb,
Ebba, performing well a soldier's part,
Dealt to the right and left his deadly blows.
With mutual rage they met. The renegade
Displays a cimeter, the splendid gift

Of Walid from Damascus sent; its hilt
Emboss'd with gems, its blade of perfect steel,
Which, like a mirror sparkling to the sun
With dazzling splendor, flash'd. The Goth objects
His shield, and on its rim received the edge
Driven from its aim aside, and of its force
Diminish'd. Many a frustrate stroke was dealt
On either part, and many a foïn and thrust
Ain'd and rebated; many a deadly blow
Straight, or reverse, delivered and repell'd.
Roderick at length with better speed hath reach'd
The apostate's turban, and through all its folds
The true Cantabrian weapon making way
Attain'd his forehead. Wretch! the avenger cried,
It comes from Roderick's hand! Roderick the Goth!

Who spared, who trusted thee, and was betray'd!
Go tell thy father now how thou hast sped
With all thy treasons! Saying thus, he seized
The miserable, who, blinded now with blood,
Reel'd in the saddle; and with sidelong step
Backing Orelio, drew him to the ground.
He shrieking, as beneath the horse's feet
He fell, forgot his late-learnt creed, and called On Mary's name. The dreadful Goth pass'd on,
Still plunging through the thickest war, and still Scattering, where'er he turn'd, the affrighted ranks.

O who could tell what deeds were wrought that
day;
Or who endure to hear the tale of rage,
Hatred, and madness, and despair, and fear,
Horror, and wounds, and agony, and death,
The cries, the blasphemies, the shrieks, and groans,
And prayers, which mingled with the din of arms
In one wild uproar of terrific sounds;
While over all predominant was heard,
Reiterate from the conquerors o'er the field,
Roderick the Goth! Roderick and Victory!
Roderick and Vengeance! — Woe for Africa!
Woe for the circumcised! Woe for the faith
Of the lying Ishmaelite that hour! The Chiefs
Have fallen; the Moors, confused, and captainless,
And panic-stricken, vainly seek to escape
The inevitable fate. Turn where they will,
Strong in his cause, rejoicing in success,
Insatiate at the banquet of revenge,
The enemy is there; look where they will,
Death hath environed their devoted ranks:
Fly where they will, the avenger and the sword
Await them, — wretches! whom the righteous arm
Hath overtaken! — Join'd in bonds of faith
Accurs'd, the most flagitious of mankind
From all parts met are here; the apostate Greek,
The vicious Syrian, and the sullen Copt,
The Persian cruel and corrupt of soul,
The Arabian robber, and the prowling sons
Of Africa, who from their thirsty sands
Pray that the locusts on the peopled plain
May settle and prepare their way. Conjoined
Beneath an impious faith, which sanctifies
To them all deeds of wickedness and blood, —
Yea, and halloos them on, — here are they met
To be conjoin'd in punishment this hour.
For plunder, violation, massacre,

All hideous, all unutterable things,
The righteous, the immitigable sword
Exacts due vengeance now! the cry of blood
Is heard: the measure of their crimes is full;
Such mercy as the Moor at Auria gave,
Such mercy hath he found this dreadful hour!

The evening darken'd, but the avenging sword
Turn'd not away its edge till night had closed
Upon the field of blood. The Chieftains then
Blew the recall, and from their perfect work
Return'd rejoicing, all but he for whom
All look'd with most expectance. He full sure
Had thought upon that field to find his end
Desired, and with Florinda in the grave
Rest, in indissoluble union join'd.
But still where through the press of war he went
Half-arm'd, and like a lover seeking death,
The arrows pass'd him by to right and left;
The spear-point pierced him not; the cimeter
Glanced from his helmet; he, when he beheld
The rout complete, saw that the shield of Heaven
Had been extended over him once more,
And bowed before its will. Upon the banks
Of Sella was Orelio found, his legs
And flanks incarnadined, his poitral smeared
With froth, and foam, and gore, his silver mane
Sprinkled with blood, which hung on every hair,
Aspersed like dew-drops; trembling there he stood
From the toil of battle, and at times sent forth
His tremulous voice far echoing loud and shrill,
A frequent, anxious cry, with which he seem'd
To call the master whom he loved so well,
And who had thus again forsaken him.
Siverian's helm and cuirass on the grass
Lay near; and Julian's sword, its hilt and chain
Clotted with blood; but where was he whose hand
Had wielded it so well that glorious day? —

Days, months, and years, and generations pass'd,
And centuries held their course, before, far off
Within a hermitage near Viseu's walls
A humble tomb was found, which bore inscribed
In ancient characters King Roderick's name.

NOTES.

Count Julian called the invaders. — I. p. 649. col. 2.

The story of Count Julian and his daughter has been treated as a fable by some authors, because it is not mentioned by the three writers who lived nearest the time. But those writers state the mere fact of the conquest of Spain as briefly as possible, without entering into particulars of any kind; and the best Spanish historians and antiquaries are persuaded that there is no cause for disbelieving the uniform and concurrent tradition of both Moors and Christians.

For the purposes of poetry, it is immaterial whether the story be true or false. I have represented the Count as a man both sinned against and sinning, and equally to be commiserated and condemned. The author of the Tragedy of Count Julian has contemplated his character in a grander point of view, and represented him as a man self-justified in bringing an army of foreign auxiliaries to assist him in delivering his country from a tyrant, and foreseeing, when it is too late to recede, the evils which he is thus bringing upon her.

Not victory that o'er shadows him, sees he !
No airy and light passion stirs abroad
To ruffle or to soothe him ; all are quell'd
Beneath a mightier, sterner, stress of mind :
Wakeful he sits, and lonely and unmoved,
Beyond the arrows, views, or shouts of men :
As oftentimes an eagle, when the sun
Throws o'er the varying earth his early ray,
Stands solitary, stands immovable
Upon some highest cliff, and rolls his eye,
Clear, constant, unobservant, unabased,
In the cold light, above the dews of morn.

Act 5, Scene 2.

Parts of this tragedy are as fine in their kind as any thing which can be found in the whole compass of English poetry.

Juan de Mena places Count Julian with Orpas, the renegade Archbishop of Seville, in the deepest pit of hell.

*Na buenamente te puedo callar
Orpas maldito, ni a ti Julian,
Pues soys en el oulle mas hondo de afin,
Que no se redime jamas por llorar :
Qual ya crueza vos pudo indignar
A vender un dia las tierras y leyes
De Espana, las quales pejanca de reyes
En años a tantos no pudo cobrar.*

Copla 91.

A Portuguese poet, Andre da Sylva Mascarenhas, is more indulgent to the Count, and seems to consider it as a mark of degeneracy in his own times, that the same crime would no longer provoke the same vengeance. His catalogue of women who have become famous by the evil of which they have been the occasion, begins with Eve, and ends with Anne Boleyn.

*Louvar se pode ao Conde o sentimento
Da offensa da sua honestidade,
Se o nam vituperara co erucato

Nesta nossa infeliz lasciva idade,

Que o crime frequentado nam se estranha.*

Never has any country been so cursed by the spirit of persecution as Spain. Under the Heathen Emperors it had its full share of suffering, and the first fatal precedent of appealing to the secular power to punish heresy with death, occurred in Spain. Then came the Arian controversy. There was as much bigotry, as much rancor, as little of the spirit of Christianity, and as much intolerance, on one part as on the other : but the successful party were better politicians, and more expert in the management of miracles.

Near to the city of Osen, or Ossel, there was a famous Catholic church, and a more famous baptistery, which was in the form of a cross. On Holy Thursday in every year, the bishop, the clergy, and the people assembled there, saw that the baptistery was empty, and enjoyed a marvellous fragrance, which differed from that of any, or all, flowers and spices, for it was an odor which came as the vesper of the divine virtue that was about to manifest itself. Then they fastened the doors of the church, and sealed them. On Easter Eve the doors were opened, the baptistery was found full of water, and all the children born within the preceding twelve months were baptized. Theudiselo, an Arian king, set his seal also upon the doors for two successive years, and set a guard there. Still the miraculous baptistery was filled. The third year he suspected pipes, and ordered a trench to be dug round the building ; but before the day of trial arrived, he was murdered, as opportunely as Arius himself. The trench was dry, but the workmen did not dig deep enough, and the miracle was continued. When the victory of the Catholic party was complete, it was no longer necessary to keep it up. The same baptistery was employed to convince the Spaniards of their error in keeping Easter. In Brito's time, a few ruins, called Osela, were shown near the river Cambria ; the broken baptistery was then called the Bath, and some wild superstitions which the peasantry related bore traces of the original legend. The trick was not uncommon ; it was practised in Sicily and in other places. The story, however, is of some value, as showing that baptism was administered * only once a year, (except in cases of danger,) that immersion was the manner, and that infants were baptized.

Arianism seems to have lingered in Spain long after its defeat. The names Pelayo (Pelagius) and Arias certainly appear to indicate a cherished heresy, and Brito † must have felt this when he deduced the former name from Saint Pelayo of the tenth century ; for how came the Saint by it, and how could Brito have forgotten the founder of the Spanish monarchy ?

In the latter half of the eleventh century, the Count of Barcelona, Ramon Berenguer, Cop de estopa, as he was called, for his bushy head, made war upon some Christians who are said to have turned Arians, and took the castles into which they retired. ‡ By the number of their castles, which he gave to those chiefs who assisted him in conquering them, they appear to have been numerous. It is not improbable that those people were really what they are called ; for Arian has never been, like Manichean, a term ignorantly and indiscriminately given to heretics of all descriptions ; and there is no heresy which would be so well understood in Spain, and so likely to have revived there.

The feelings of the triumphant party toward their opponents are well marked by the manner in which St. Isidore speaks of the death of the emperor Valens. Thraciam ferro incendiisque depopulantur, delectoque Romanorum exercitu ipsa Valentem jaculo vulneratum, in quadam villa fugientem succenderunt, ut merito ipse ab eis civis temporali cremaretur incendio, qui tam pulchras animas ignibus aternis § tradiderat. If the truth of this opinion should be doubted, there is a good Athanasian miracle in the Chronicle || of S. Isidore and Melitus, to prove it. A certain Arian, by name Olympius, being in the bath, blasphemed the Holy Trinity, and, behold ! being struck by an angel with three fiery darts, he was visibly consumed.

With regard to the Arians, the Catholics only did to the others as the others would have done to them ; but the persecution of the Jews was equally unprovoked and inhuman. They are said to have betrayed many towns to the Moors ; and it would be strange indeed if they had not, by every means in their power, assisted in overthrowing a government under which they were miserably oppressed. St. Isidore has a memorable passage relating to their cruel persecution and compulsory conversion under Sisebut ; Qui initio regni Judaeos ad Fidem Christianam permovens umulationem quidem habuit, sed non secundum scientiam : potestate enim compulsi, quos provocare fidei ratione oportuit. Sed sicut est scriptum sive per occasionem sive per veritatem, Christus annuntiat, in hoc gaudeo et gaudebo. — S. Isidor. Christ. Goth. Espana Sagrada, 6, 502.

The Moorish conquest procured for them an interval of repose, till the Inquisition was established, and by its damnable

* In the seventeenth and last council of Toledo, it was decreed that the baptistery should be shut up, and sealed with the episcopal seal, during the whole year, till Good Friday ; on that day the bishop in his pontificals, was to open it with great solemnity, in token that Christ, by his passion and resurrection, had opened the way to heaven for mankind, as on that day the hope was opened of obtaining redemption through the holy sacrament of baptism. — Morales, 12, 62, 3.

acts put all former horrors out of remembrance. When Toledo was recovered from the Moors by Alonso VI., the Jews of that city waited upon the conqueror, and assured him that they were part of the ten tribes whom Nebuchadnezzar had transported into Spain; not the descendants of the Jerusalem Jews who had crucified Christ. Their ancestors, they said, were entirely innocent of the crucifixion; for when Caiaphas the high-priest had written to the Toledan synagogues to ask their advice respecting the person who called himself the Messiah, and whether he should be slain, the Toledan Jews returned for answer, that in their judgment the prophecies seemed to be fulfilled in this person, and, therefore, he ought not by any means to be put to death. This reply they produced in the original Hebrew, and in Arabic, as it had been translated by command of King Galfre. Alonso gave ear to the story, had the letter rendered into Latin and Castilian, and deposited it among the archives of Toledo. The latter version is thus printed by Sandoval:—

Levi Archisynagogo, et Samuel, et Joseph, homes bonos del Aljama de Toledo, a Eleazar Mayd gran Sacerdote, e a Samuel Canad, y Anas, y Cayphas, homes bonos de la Aljama de la Terra Santa, Salud en el Dios de Israel.

Azarias voso home, Mucso en ley nos aduzo las cartas que vos nos embiavades, por las quales nos faciades saber como passava la facienda del Profeta Nazaret, que diz que facie muchas sennas. Colo por esta vila, non ha mucho, un cierto Samuel, fil de Amacias, et fablo nusco, et conto muchas bondades deste home, que ye, que es home homildoso et mauso, que fabla con los lazeriaos, que faz a todos bien, e que faciendole a el mal, el non faz mal a ninguem; et que es home fuerte con superbos et homes malos, et que vos malamente teniades enemiga con ele, por quanto en faz el descubria vossos pecados, ca por quanto fucia esto, le aviades mala voluntad. Et perquirimos deste home, en que año, o mes o dia, avia nacido: et que nos lo dixesse: fulamos que el dia de la sua Natividade foron vistos en estas partes tres soles macile a macle, fizieron soldemente un sol; et cuando nosos padres cataron esta senna, asmalos dixeron que celo el Messias naceria, et que por aventara era ja nacido. Catad hermanos si por aventura ha ja venido et non le ayades acatado. Relataba tambien el susodicho home, que el suo payle recantava, que ciertos Magos, homes de mucha sapiencia, en la sua Natividade legaron a tierra santa, perquiriendo lugar donde el niño sancto era nacido; y que Herodes voso Rey se asmo, et disposto junto a homes sabios de sua vila, e perquirio donde naceria el Infante, por quien perquirian Magos, et le respondieron, en Betlem de Juda, segun que Micheas depergino profeta. Et que dixeron aqueles Magos, que una estrella de gran craredad, de luenec aluzo a tierra santa: catad non sca esta que la profezia, cataran Reyes, et andaran en craridad de la sua Natividade. Otrosi, catad non persigades al que forades tenudos mucho honrar et recibir de bon talante. Mais fazed lo que tuvieres por bien aguisala; nos vos dezimos que nin por consejo, nin por noso alcaidio reuirmos en consentimiento de la sua morte. Ca, si nos esto fiziessemos, logo seria nusco, que la profezia que diz, congregaronse de consuno contra el Sennor, et contra el suo Messias. E damos vos este consrjo, moquiera sodes homes de muyta sapreça, que tengades grande aficamento sobre tamana faziendo, porque el Dios de Israel enojado con nusco, non destruya cosa segunda de voso segundo templo. Ca sepades cierto, cedo ha de ser destruyda; et por esta rason nosos antepassados, que salieron de captiverio de Babylonia, siendo suo Capitane Pyrrro, que embio Rey Cyro, et aluzo nusco muytas riqueças que tollo de Babylonia el año de sesenta et nueve de captividade, et foron recebidos en Toledo de Gentiles que y moracan, et edificaron una grande Alama, et non quisieron bolver a Jerusalem otra vegada a edificar Temple, ariendo ser destruydo otra vegada. De Toledo catorze dias del mes Nisan, Era de Cesar diez y ocho, y de Augusto Octaviano setenta y uno. —Sandoval, 71.

Had Alonso been as zealous as some of his Gothic predecessors, or his most Catholic successors, he might have found a fair pretext in this letter for ordering all the Jews of Toledo to the font, unless they would show cause why they should adhere to the opinion of Caiaphas and the Jerusalem Jews, rather than to that of their own ancestors.

General Vallaney believes that the Spanish Jews were brought into the Peninsula by Nebuchadnezzar, and admits these Toledans as authority. He quotes Count de Gebelin, and refers to Strabo and Ezekiel. The proof from Ezekiel rests upon the word Orb, Earb, Warb, or Gharb; which is made into Algarve!

A Jew in Tirante el Blanco (p. 2, c. 74, f. 243) explains the difference between the different races of Jews. They are three, he says. One, the progeny of those who took counsel for the death of Christ; and they were known by this, that they were in continual motioo, hands and feet, and never could rest; neither could their spirit ever be still, and they had very little shame. The second were the descendants of those who put in execution and assisted at the various parts of the sufferings and death of Christ, and they never could look any man in the face, nor could they, without great difficulty, ever look up to heaven. The third were the children of David, who did all they could to prevent the death of Christ, and shut themselves up in the temple that they might not witness it. These are affable, good men, who love their neighbors; a quiet, peaceable race, who can look any where.

Thomas Tamaio de Vargas, the editor of the spurious Luitprand, says, that not only many Hebrew words are mixed with the old Spanish, but that, prô dolar! the black and stinking Jewish blood had been mingled with the most pure blood of the Spaniards, (p. 93.) They were very anxious, he says, to intermarry, and spoil the pure blood. And he adds, that the Spaniards call them putos, quia putant. “But,” says Sir Thomas Browne, “that an unsavory odor is gentilitious, or national to the Jews, we cannot well concede. And if, (according to good relations,) where they may freely speak it, they forbear not to boast that there are at present many thousand Jews in Spain, France, and England, and some dispensed withal even to the degree of priesthood, it is a matter very considerable, and could they be smelled out, would much advantage not only the church of Christ, but also the coffers of princes. — The ground that begat or propagated this assertion might be the distasteful averseness of the Christian from the Jew upon the villany of that fact, which made them abominable, and ‘stink in the nostrils of all men.’ Which real practice and metaphorical expression did after proceed into a literal construction, but was a fraudulent illation; for such an evil savor their father Jacob acknowledged in himself, when he said his sons had made him stink in the land, that is, to be abominable unto the inhabitants thereof. Another cause is urged by Campegius, and much received by Christians; that this ill savor is a curse derived upon them by Christ, and stands as a badge or brand of a generation that crucified their Salvator. But this is a conceit without all warrant, and an easy way to take off dispute in what point of obscurity soever.” Vulgar Errors, Book iv. ch. 10.

The Mahomedans also hold a like opinion of the unsavoriness of the Jews, and account for it by this legend, which is given by Sale. “Some of the children of Israel abandoned their dwellings because of a pestilence, or, as others say, to avoid serving in a religious war; but as they fled, God struck them all dead in a certain valley. About eight days or more after, when their bodies were corrupted, the Prophet Ezekiel happening to pass that way, at the sight wept; whereupon God said to him, ‘Call to them, O Ezekiel, and I will restore them to life.’ And accordingly, on the prophet’s call, they all arose, and lived several years after; but they retained the color and stench of dead corpses as long as they lived, and the clothes they wore were changed as black as pitch, which qualities they transmitted to their posterity.”

One of our own travellers* tells us of a curious practical application of this belief in Barbary. “The Moors of Tangier,” he says, “when they want rain, and have prayed in vain for it, set the Jews to work, saying, that though God would not grant it to the prayers of the faithful, he would to the Jews, in order to be rid of their stink.” Ludicrous as this is, South has a passage concerning the Jews, which is little more reasonable, in one of his sermons. “The truth is,” he says, “they were all along a cross, odd, untoward sort of people, and such as God seems to have chosen, and (as the Prophets sometimes phrase it) to have espoused to himself, upon the very same account that Socrates espoused Xantippe, only for her extreme ill conditions, above all that he could possibly find or pick out of that sex: and so the fittest argument both to

Of the condition of slaves under the Spanish Wisigoths, I have given an account in the Introduction to the Chronicle of the Cid. This also, like the persecution of the Jews, must greatly have facilitated the Moorish conquest. Another facilitating cause was, that notwithstanding their frequent civil disturbances, they had in great measure ceased to be a warlike people. The many laws in the Fuero Juzgo, for compelling men to military service, prove this. These laws are full of complaints that the people would avoid the service if they could. Habits of settled life seem throughout Europe to have eliminated the northern conquerors, till the Normans renovated the race, and the institutions of chivalry and the crusades produced a new era.

Gibel-al-Tarif, the mountain of Tarif, is the received etymology of Gibraltar: Ben Hazel, a Granadan Moor, says expressly, that the mountain derived its name from this general. Its former appellations may be seen in the Historia de Gibraltar, by Don Ignacio Lopez de Ayala. The derivation of the word Calpe is not known: Florian de Ocampo identifies it with the English word galloping, in a passage which may amuse the Spanish scholar. "La segunda nombradía fue llamarle Calpe, cuya razon, segun dicen algunos, procedio de que los Andaluces ancianos en su lengua vieja solian llamar Calpeas y Calpes a qualesquier cosas enhiestas y levantadas, agora fuesen peñaseos, o pizarras, o maderos, o piedras menores, como lo significamos en los diez y ocho capitulos precedentes: y dicen que con estar alli junto de Gibraltar sobre sus morinas el risco, que ya dice muy encumbrado y enhiesto, qual hoy dia parece, lo llamaban Calpes aquellas Andaluces pasados: y por su respecto la mesma poblacion vino tambien a tener despues aquel proprio nombre. No faltan otras personas que siguiendo las Escrituras Griegas pongan esta razon del nombre Calpes mucho diversamente, diciendo, que quando los cosarios Argonautas desembarcaron en España, cerca del estrecho, segun ya lo declaramos, el tiempo que hacian sus exercicios arriba dichos, de saltos y luchas, y rousicas acordadas, bien asi como los pastores Españoles comarcanos recibian contentamientos grande, mirado las tales desenrolturas y ligerezas, no menos aquellos Griegos recien venidos notaban algunos juegos, dado que trabajosos y difíciles, que los mesmos pastores obraban entre si para su recreacion y deporte; particularmente consideraran un regocijo de caballos, donde ciertos dias aplazados venian todos a se juntar como para cosa de gran pandonor."

"El qual regocijo hacian desta manera. Tomaban yeguas en pelo, quanto mas corredoras y ligeras podian haber, y puestos ellos encima desnudos sin alguna ropa, ataban en las quixadas barbicachos de rama, torcidos y mojados a manera de freno, con que salian del puesto dos a dos a la par corriendo lo mas que sus yeguas podian, para llegar a cierta senal de pizarras enhiestas o de maderos hincados y le cantados en fin de la carrera. Venidos al medio trecho de su corrida saltaban de las yeguas en tierra, no les parando ni deteniendo: y asi trabados por el barbicacho, corrian tambien ellos á pie, sin las dexar, puesto que mas furia llevasen: porque si las dexaban ó se desprendian dellas, y no sustentaban el freno continuamente, hasta ser pasada la carrera, perdian la reputacion y las apuestas, quedando tan amenguados y vencidos, quanto quedaria triunfante quien primero llegase con su yegua para tomar la presa que tenian en el fin de la carrera sobre las pizarras a maderos hincados. Quando saltaban de sus yeguas, dicen que les iban hablando porque no se detuviesen, vocandoles y diciendoles a menudo palabras animosas y dulces: llamabanles pies hermosas, generosas en el correr, casta real, hembras preciosas, acrecentadoras de sus honras, y mas otras razones muchas con que las tenian vezadas, a no se parar ni perder el *impetu comenzado: de manera que los tropes en este punto, los pandonores y regocijos de correr, y de no mostrar floxedad era cosa mucho de notar, asi por la parte de los hombres, como por parte de las yeguas. A los Griegos Argonautas les parecia juugo tan varonil que muchas veces lo probaron tambien ellos a recueta de los Espanoles, como quiera que jamas pudieron tener aquella vigilancia ni ligereza, ni reciera que tenian estos otros para durar con sus yeguas. Y dado que las tales yeguas corriesen harto furiosas, y les ensenasen muchos dias antes a seguir estas parejas, quanto mejor entendian a la verdad, ni las de los unos, ni las de los otros corrian tanto despues que saltaban dellas, como quando los traian encima: y asi las palabras que los Griegos en aquella sazón puestos a pie hablaban eran tambien al mesmo proposito conformes a las de los Andaluces Españoles en su lengua provincial, nombrandolas Calopes, Calopes, Calopes a la cantina, que fue palabra Griega, compuesta de dos vocablos: uno Calos, que significa cosa hermosa, ligera y agraciada: otro Pus, que quiere decir pie, como que las llamasen pies agraciados, o pies desenrocados y ligeros: y por abreviar mas el vocablo, para que sus yeguas lo pudiesen mas presto sentir, acortabanlo con una letra menos en el medio, y en lugar de nombrarlas Calopes, les decian Calpes, que significa lo mesmo Calopes: la qual palabra me parece dura todavia hasta nuestro siglo presente, donde pocas letras mudadas, por decir Calopes o Calpes, lo pronunciamos Galopes, quando los caballos y yeguas, o qualesquier otros animales, no corren a todo poder sino trote largo seguido. Vino desto que las mesmas fiestas y manera del juego se nombraron Calpes: dado que para conmigo bastara saber la victoria deste juego consistir en ligereza de pies, y por eso solo deberse llamar Calpes a Calpe, sin añadir lo que hablaban a las yeguas, pues aquello primero comprehende bastantemente la razon deste vocablo. Pero si todavia fue cierto que les decian aquellas palabras quando corrian sus parejas, ninguna cosa daña dexarlas aqui puestas." — Coronica General de Espana, e. 38.*

Against them.* — I. p. 650, col. 1.

The following description of the state of the Christian world when the Saracens began their conquests, is taken from a singular manuscript, "where in the history of the Crusades and of all the Mahomedan emperors from A. D. 558, to A. D. 1588, is gathered out of the Chronikes of William Archbishop of Tyreus, the protoscribe of Palestine, of Basilus Jhohannes Heraldus, and sundry others, and reduced into a poem epike by Robert Barret, 1610." The author was an old soldier, whose language is a compound of Josuah Sylvester and King Cambyzes, with a strong relish of Ancient Pistol.

Now in this sin-flood age not only in East
Did the impious imps the faithful persecute,
But like affliction them pursued in West,
And in all parts the good trod under foot;
For faith in some was cold, from others fled,
And fear of God dislodged out human hearts;

Astrea flown to skies, and in her stead
 Iniquity enthronized; in all parts
 Violence had vogue, and on sathanized earth
 Fraud, Mischief, Murder martialled the Camp;
 Sweet Virtue fled the field: Hope, out of breath;
 And Vice, all-stainer, every soul did stamp;
 So that it seem'd World drew to's evening tide,
 Nought else expecting but Christ's second coming;
 For Charity was cold on every side,
 And Truth and Trust were gone from earth a-mumming.
 All things confused ran, so that it seemed
 The World return would to his chaos old;
 Princes the path of justice not esteemed,
 Headlong with prince ran people young and old.
 All saint confederations infringed,
 And for light cause would prince with prince enquarrel;
 Countries bestreamed with blood, with fire besinged,
 All set to each, all murders sorts unbarrelled.
 No wight his own could own; 'twas current coin
 Each man to strip, provided he were rich.
 The church sacrileged, choir made cot for swine,
 And zealous ministers were made to scriteche.
 Robbing was made fair purchase, murder manhood,
 And none secure by land ne sea could pass;
 The humble, heartless, ireful hearts ran wood,
 Esteemed most who mischief most could dress;
 All lubrick lusts shameless without comptroll
 Ran full career; each would a rider be;
 And Heaven's friend, all saint Continency,
 Was banished quite: Lasciviousness did roll,
 Frugality, healthful Sobriety
 No place could find; all parts enquartered were
 With Bacchus-brutes and Satyres-luxury.
 All lawless games bore sway, with blasphemes roare,
 'Twixt Clerk and Laick difference was none,
 Disguized all, phantastic out of norme;
 But as the Prophet says, as Priests do run,
 So run the people, peevisish in disform.
 The Bishops graded once, dumb dogs become,
 Their heads sin vincting, flocks abandon soon;
 Princes applauders, person-acceptors,
 The good's debarrers and the bad's abettors;
 Fleshly all, all filthy simonized,
 Preferring profit 'fore the Eternal's praise.
 The church enslaved, court all atheized,
 The commons kankred, all all in distrayes;
 The plotting politician's pate admired,
 Their skill consisting in preventions scull,
 Pathicks preferred, Cyprin ware desired,
 Ocean of mischiefs flowing moon-tide full:
 So that it seem'd that all flesh desperately
 Like wolf-scared sheep were plunged headlong down
 In pit of hell: puddled all pestfully
 The court, church, commons, province, city, town;
 All haggards; none reclaimed once could be,
 Ne by the word, the word 'bused by organs bad,
 Ne yet by signs that spotted ebrystal sky,
 Ne other prodigies, presages sad,
 Neither gust shakings of this settled globe;
 Neither sharpe pencil of war, famine, pest,
 Could once one ray engrave in steeled breast,
 Or Christians cause their sin-jagged robe disrobe.

Thus stood the sad state of that sin-stain'd time,
 And Christians of this our all-zeal cold time,
 Let us now par'lel that time with our time,
 Our parallel'd time will parallel that time,
 Then triple-saint, thou just geometer true,
 Our time not parallel by thy justice line,
 But with thy megy's paralleling brow,
 Reform our crimeful Angles by grace thine.

Roderick's royal ear. — I. p. 650, col. 1.

“Roderike, the first day after the battayle, observing the auncient guise of his country, came into the fielde apparilled in a gowne of beaten golde, having also on his head a crown of gold, and golden shoes, and all his other apparuile set with rich pearles and precious stones, ryding in a horse-litter of ivorie, drawne by two goodly horses; which order the Goths used alwayes in battailles for this consideration, that the soul-diours, well-knowing their king could not escape away by flight from them, shuld be assured that there was none other way but either to die together in that place, or else to winne the victorie; for it had bene a thing most shamefull and reproachful for to forsake their prince and anyointed soveraigne. Which custome and maner many free confederate cities of Italie following, trimmed and adorned for the warres a certain chayre of estado, called Carocio, wherein were set the penons and ensignes of all the confederates; this chayre, in battaile, was drawn by many oxen, wherby the whole hoast was given to understand that they could not with any honesty flie, by reason of the slow pace and unwelldinesse of those heave beasts.” — A Notable Historie of the Saracens, draven out of Augustine Curio, and sundry other good Authours. By Thomas Newton, 1575.

The author of the chivalrous Chronicle of King Don Rodrigo gives a singular description of this ear, upon the authority of his pretended original Eleastras; for he, “seeing that calamities went on increasing, and that the destruction of the Goths was at hand, thought that if things were to end as they had begun, it would be a marvel if there should be in Spain any king or lord of the lineage of the Goths after the death of King Don Rodrigo; and therefore it imported much that he should leave behind him a remembrance of the customs of the Gothic kings, and of the manner in which they were wont to enter into battle, and how they went to war. And he says, that the king used to go in a car made after a strange fashion. The wheels of this car were made of the bones of elephants, and the axletree was of fine silver, and the perch was of fine gold. It was drawn by two horses, who were of great size and gentle; and upon the ear there was pitched a tent, so large that it covered the whole ear, and it was of fine cloth of gold, upon which were wrought all the great feats in arms which had been achieved until that time; and the pillar of the tent was of gold, and many stones of great value were set in it, which sent forth such splendor, that by night there was no need of any other light therein. And the ear and the horses bore the same adornments as the king, and these were full of pearls the largest which could be found. And in the middle of the ear there was a seat placed against the pillar of the tent; and this seat was of great price, insomuch that the value of it cannot be summed up, so many and so great were the stones which were set in it; and it was wrought so subtly, and of such rare workmanship, that they who saw it marvelled thereat. And upon this seat the king was seated, being lifted up so high that all in the host, little or great, might behold him. And in this manner it was appointed that the king should go to war. And round about the ear there were to go a thousand knights, who had all been knighted by the hand of the king, all armed; and in the day of battle they were to be on foot round about the car; and all plighted homage to the king not to depart from it in any manner whatsoever, and that they would rather receive their death there, than go from their place beside the car. And the king had his crown upon his head. And in this guise all the kings of the Goths, who had been lords of Spain, were to go to battle; and this custom they had all observed till the King Don Rodrigo; but he, because of the great grief which he had in his heart, would never ascend the car, neither did he go in it into the battle."—Part i. c. 215.

*Entró Rodrigo en la batalla fiero,
Armado en blanca de un arnes dorada,

Que la aparta del árbol, que saltea
Su blanca, verde, y pulida librea.*

*Assi Rodrigo el miserable dia
Ultima de esta guerra desdichada,
Queda en el campo, donde ya tenia
La magestad del ombro derribada:
Alli la rata purpura yacia
Teñida en sangre, y en sudor vañada,
Alli el verde laurel, y el ceptro de oro,
Siendo el árbol su cuerpo, el viento el Moro.*

*That helm
Whose horns, amid the thickest of the fray
Eminent, had mark'd his presence. — I. p. 650, col. 1.*

Morales describes this horned helmet from a coin. "Tiene de la una parte su rastro, harto diferente de los que en las otras Monedas de estas Reyes parecen. Tiene manera de estar armado, y sale por cima de la celada unas puntas como cuernas pequeñas y derechos por ambos lados, que la hacen extraño y espantable." Florez has given this coin in his Medallas de Espana, from the only one which was known to be in existence, and which was then in the collection of the Infante D. Gabriel. It was struck at Egitzania, the present Idana, and, like all the coins of the Visigoth kings, is of the rudest kind. The lines which Morales describes are sufficiently apparent, and if they are not intended for horns, it is impossible to guess what else they may have been meant to represent.

"These Gothic coins," says P. D. Jeronymo Contador de Argote, "have a thousand barbarisms, as well in their letters as in other circumstances. They mingle Greek characters with Latin ones; and in what regards the relief or figure, nothing can be more dissimilar than the representation to the thing which it is intended to represent. I will relate what happened to me with one, however much D. Egidio de Albornos de Macedo may reprehend me for it in his Parecer Anathomico. Valerio Pinto de Sa, an honorable citizen of Braga, of whom, in various parts of these Memoirs, I have made well-deserved mention, and of whose friendship I have been proud ever since I have been in that city, gave me, some six or seven years ago, a gold coin of King Leovigildo, who was the first of the Gothic kings of Spain that coined money, for till then both Goths and Sueves used the Roman. I examined it leisurely, and what I clearly saw was a cross on the one side upon some steps, and some ill-shaped letters around it; and on the reverse something, I knew not what: It seemed to me like a tree, or a stake which shot out some branches: Round about were some letters, more distinct; I could not, however, ascertain what they signified. It happened about that time that I had the honor of a visit from the most illustrious Sr. D. Francisco de Almeida, then a most worthy Academician of the Royal Academy, and at present a most deserving and eminent Principal of the Holy Patriarchal Church. He saw this coin, and he also was puzzled by the side which represented what I called a tree. He asked me to lend it him, that he might examine it more at leisure. He took it away, and after some days returned it, saying, that he had examined it with a microscope, and that what I had taken for a stake was without question the portrait of King Leovigildo. I confess that I was not yet entirely satisfied: however, I showed it afterwards to divers persons, all of whom said they knew not what the said figure could be; but when I desired them to see if it could be this portrait, they all agreed that it was. This undeceived me, and by looking at the coin in every possible light, at last I came to see it also, and acknowledge the truth with the rest. And afterwards I found in the Dialogues of Antonio Agostinho, treating of these Gothic coins, that there are some of such rude workmanship, that where a face should be represented, some represent a pitcher, and others an urn." — Memorias de Braga, t. iii. p. lix.

He bade the river bear the name of Joy. — I. p. 650, col. 1.

Guadalete had been thus interpreted to Florez. (Espana Sagrada, t. 9, p. 53.) Earlier writers had asserted (but without proof) that the Ancients called it Lethe, and the Moors added to these names their word for river. Lope de Vega alludes to this opinion:

*Siempre lamentable Guadalete
Que llera tanta sangre al mar de España,
Si por olvido se llamava el Lete
Trueque este nombre la victoria estraña,
Y llamase memoria deste dia
En que Espana perdía la que tenia.*

*Que por dande à la mar entrava apenas
Diferenciando el agua, ya se via
Con roza humor de las sangrientas venas
Por donde le cartava y dividia:
Gran tiempo conservaron sus arenas
(Y piensa que ha llegada a la edad mia)
Reliquias del estrago y piedras echas
Armas, hierros de lanza y de flechas.*

The French Jesuits relate of one of their converts in Canada à Huron, by name Jean Armand Andeouarahan, that once estant en guerre eschauffé au combat, il s'enfonça si avant dans les darts et les flèches des ennemis, qu'il fut abandonné des siens dans le plus fort de la meslée. Ce fut alors qu'il se recommanda plus particulièrement à Dieu: il sentit pour lors un secours si présent, que du depuis, appuyé sur cette mesme confiance, il est toujours le premier et le plus arant dans les périls, et jamais ne pâlit, pour quelqur danger qu'il envisage. Je voyois, disoit-il, comme une gresle de flèches venir fondre sur moy; je n'arois point d'autre bouclier pour les arrester, que la croyance seule que Dieu disposant de ma vie, il en feroit selon sa volonté. Chose étrange! les flèches s'écartoient à mes deux costez, ainsi, disoit-il, que fait l'eau lors qu'elle rencontre la pointe d'un vaisseau qui va contre marée. — *Relation de la N. The site of this monastery, which was one of the most flourishing seminaries of that age, is believed to have been two leagues from Merida, upon the Guadiana, where the Ermita, or Chapel of Cubillana, stands at present, or was standing a few years ago. The legend, from which I have taken such circumstances as might easily have happened, and as suited my plan, was invented by a race of men who, in the talent of invention, have left all poets and romancers far behind them. Florez refers to Brito for it, and excuses himself from relating it, because it is not necessary to his * subject; — in reality he neither believed the story, nor chose to express his objections to it. His disbelief was probably founded upon the suspicious character of Brito, who was not at that time so decidedly condemned by his countrymen as he is at present. I give the legend from this veracious Cistercian. Most of his other fabrications have been exploded, but this has given rise to a popular and fashionable idolatry, which still maintains its ground.

“The monk did not venture to leave him alone in that desolate state, and taking him apart, besought him by the passion of Jesus Christ to consent that they twain should go together, and save a venerable image of the Virgin Mary our Lady, which in that convent flourished with great miracles, and had been brought from the city of Nazareth by a Greek monk, called Cyriac, at such time as a heresy in the parts of the East arose against the use and veneration of images; and with it a relic of the Apostle St. Bartholomew, and another of St. Bras, which were kept in an ivory coffer, for it would be a great sacrilege to leave them exposed to the ill treatment of barbarians, who, according to public fame, left neither temple nor sacred place which they did not profane, casting the images into the fire, and dragging them at their horses' tails for a greater opprobrium to the baptized people. The King, seeing himself thus conjured by the passion of our Redeemer Jesus Christ, in whom alone he had consolation and hope of remedy, and considering the piety of the thing in which he was chosen for companion, let himself be overcome by his entreaties; and taking in his arms the little image of our Lady, and Romano the coffer with the relics, and some provision for the journey, they struck into the middle of Portugal, having their faces alway towards the west, and seeking the coast of the ocean sea, because in those times it was a land more solitary, and less frequented by people, where they thought the Moors would not reach so soon, because, as there were no countries to conquer in those parts, there was no occasion which should lead them thither. Twenty-and-six days the two companions travelled without touching at any inhabited place, and after enduring many difficulties in crossing mountains and fording rivers, they had sight of the ocean sea on the 22d of November, being the day of the Virgin Martyr St. Cecilia; and as if in that place they should have an end of their labors, they took some comfort, and gave thanks to God, for that he had saved them from the hand of their enemies. The place which they reached is in the Coutos of Alcoaça, near to where we now see the town of Pederneira, on the eastern side of which there risers, in the midst of certain sands, a hill of rock and firm land, somewhat prolonged from north to south, so lofty and well proportioned that it seemeth miraculously placed in that site, being surrounded on all sides with plains covered with sand, without height or rock to which it appears connected. And forasmuch as the manner thereof draws to it the eyes of who-soever beholds this work of nature, the king and the monk desired to ascend the height of it, to see whether it would afford a place for them in which to pass their lives. They found there a little hermitage with a holy crucifix, and no other signs of man, save only a plain tomb, without writing or epitaph to declare whose it might be. The situation of the place, which, ascending to a notable height, gives a prospect by sea and by land as far as the eyes can reach, and the sudden sight of the crucifix, caused in the mind of the king such excitement and so great consolation, that, embracing the foot of the cross, he lay there melting away in rivers of tears, not now of grief for the kingdoms and dominions which he had lost, but of consolation in seeing that in exchange the crucified Jesus himself had in this solitary mountain offered himself to him, in whose company he resolved to pass the remainder of his life; and this he declared to the monk, who, to content him, and also because he saw that the place was convenient for contemplation, approved the king's resolve, and abode there with him some days; during which, perceiving some inconvenience in living upon the summit of the mountain, from whence it was necessary to descend with much labor, whenever they would drink, or seek for herbs and fruits for their food; and moreover, understanding that it was the king's desire to remain there alone, that he might vent himself in tears and exclamations, which he made oftentimes before the image of Christ, he went with his consent to a place little more than a mile from the mountain, which being on the one side smooth and of easy approach, hangs on the other over the sea with so huge a precipice that it is two hundred fathoms in perpendicular height, from the top of the rock to the water. There, between two great rocks, each of which projects over the sea, hanging suspended from the height in such a form, that they seem to threaten destruction to him who sees them from the beach, Romano found a little cave, made naturally in the cliff, which he enlarged with some walls of loose stone, built up with his own hands, and having thus made a sort of hermitage, he placed therein the image of the Virgin Mary of Nazareth, which he had brought from the Caulinean convent, and which being small, and of a dark color, with the infant Jesus in its arms, hath in the countenance a certain perfection, with a modesty so remarkable, that at first sight it presents something miraculous; and having been known and venerated so great a number of years, during many of which it was in a place which did not protect it from the injuries of weather, it hath never been painted, neither hath it been found necessary to renew it. The situation of this hermitage was, and is now, within sight of the mountain where the king dwelt; and though the memorials from whence I am deriving the circumstances of these events do not specify it, it is to be believed that they often saw each other, and held such divine communion as their mode of life and the holiness of the place required; especially considering the great temptations of the Devil which the king suffered at the beginning of his penitence, for which the counsels and instructions of the monk would be necessary, and the aid of his prayers, and the presence of the relics of St. Bartholomew, which miraculously saved him many times from various illusions of the enemy. And in these our days there are seen upon the top of the mountain, in the living rock, certain human footsteps, and others of a different form, which the common people, without knowing the person, affirm to be the footsteps of St. Bartholomew and the Devil, who was there defeated and his illusions confounded by the saint, coming in aid of a devout man who called upon him in the force of his tribulation. This must have been the king, (though the common people know it not,) whom the saint thus visibly aided, and he chose that for a memorial of this aid, and of the power which God has given him over the evil spirits, these marks should remain impressed upon the living rock. And the ancient name of the mountain being Seano, it was changed into that of the Apostle, and is called at present St. Bartholomew's; and the hermitage which remains upon the top of it is under the invocation of the same saint and of St. Bras, which must have arisen from the relics of these two saints that Romano brought with him and left with the king for his consolation, when he withdrew with the image of Our Lady to the place of which we have spoken, where he lived little more than a year; and then knowing the time of his death, he communicated it to the king, beseeching him that, in requital for the love with which he had accompanied him, he would remember to pray to God for his soul, and would give his body to the earth, from which it had sprung; and that having to depart from that land, he would leave there the image and the relics, in such manner as he should dispose them before he died. With that Romano departed to enjoy the reward deserved by his labors, leaving the king with fresh occasion of grief for want of so good a companion. Of what more passed in this place, and of the temptations and tribulations which he endured till the end of his life, there is no authentic historian, nor memorial which should certify them, more than some relations mingled with fabulous tales in the ancient Chronicle of King Don Rodrigo, where, among the truths which are taken from the Moor Rasis, there are many things notoriously impossible; such as the journey which the king took, being guided by a white cloud till he came near Viseo; and the penance in which he ended his life there, enclosing himself alive in a certain tomb with a serpent which he had bred for that purpose. But as these are things difficult to believe, we will pass them over in silence, leaving to the judgment of the curious the credit which an ancient picture deserves, still existing near Viseo, in the church of St. Michael, over the tomb of the said King Don Roderick, in which is seen a serpent painted with two heads; and in the tomb itself, which is of wrought stone, a round hole, through which they say that the snake entered. That which is certain of all this is, as our historians relate, that the king came to this place, and in the hermitage of St. Michael, which we now see near Viseo, ended his days in great penance, no man knowing the manner thereof; neither was there any other memorial clearer than that in process of time a writing was found upon a certain tomb in this church with these words: HIC REQUIESCIT RUDERICUS ULTIMUS REX GOTHORUM, Here rests Roderick, the last King of the Goths. I remember to have seen these very words written in black upon an arch of the wall, which is over the tomb of the king, although the Archbishop Don Rodrigo, and they who follow him, give a longer inscription, not observing that all which he has added are his own curses and imprecations upon Count Don Julian, (as Ambrosio de Morales has properly remarked, following the Bishop of Salamanca and others,) and not parts of the same inscription, as they make them. The church in which is the tomb of the king is at present very small, and of great antiquity, especially the first chapel, joined to which on either side is a cell of the same length, but narrow, and dark also, having no more light than what enters through a little window opening to the east. In one of these cells (that which is on the south side) it is said that a certain hermit dwelt, by whose advice the king governed himself in the course of his penance; and at this time his grave is shown close to the walls of the chapel, on the Epistle side. In the other cell (which is on the north) the king passed his life, paying now, in the straitness of that place, for the largeness of his palaces, and the liberties of his former life, whereby he had offended his Creator. And in the wall of the chapel which answers to the Gospel side, there remains a sort of arch, in which the tomb is seen, wherein are his bones; and it is devoutly visited by the natives, who believe that through his means the Lord does miracles there upon persons afflicted with agues and other like maladies. Under the said arch, in the part answering to it in the inside of the cell, I saw painted on the wall the hermit and the king, with the serpent with two heads, and I read the letters which are given above, all defaced by time, and bearing marks of great antiquity, yet so that they could distinctly be seen. The tomb is flat, and made of a single stone, in which a man's body can scarcely find room. When I saw it was open, the stone which had served to cover it not being there, neither the bones of the king, which they told me had been carried into Castille some years before, but in what manner they knew not, nor by whose order; neither could I discover, by all the inquiries which I made among the old people of that city, who had reason to be acquainted with a thing of so much importance, if it were as certain as some of them affirmed it to be." — BRITO, Monarchia Lusitania, P. ii.

"The great venerableness of the Image of our Lady of Nazareth which the king left hidden in the very place where Romano in his lifetime had placed it, and the continual miracle which she showed formerly, and still shows," induced F. Bernardo de Brito to continue the history of this Image, which, no doubt, he did the more willingly because he bears a part in it himself. In the days of Affonso Henriquez, the first king of Portugal, this part of the country was governed by D. Fuas Roupinho, a knight famous in the Portuguese chronicles, who resided in the castle at Porto de Mos. This Dom Fuas, "when he saw the land secure from enemies, used often to go out hunting among the sands and thickets between the town and the sea, where, in those days, there used to be great store of game, and even now, though the land is so populous, there is still some; and as he followed this exercise, the proper pastime of noble and spirited men, and came sometimes to the sea-shore, he came upon that remarkable rock, which, being level on the side of the north, and on a line with the flat country, ends towards the south in a precipice over the waves of the sea, of a prodigious height, causing the greater admiration to him who, going over the plain country without finding any irregularity, finds himself, when least expecting it, suddenly on the summit of such a height. And as he was curiously regarding this natural wonder, he perceived between the two biggest cliffs which stand out from the ground and project over the sea, a sort of house built of loose stones, which, from its form and antiquity, made him go himself to examine it; and descending by the chasm between the two rocks, he entered into a low cavern, where, upon a little altar, he saw the venerable Image of the Virgin Mary of Nazareth, being of such perfection and modesty as are found in very few images of that size. The Catholic knight venerated it with all submission, and would have removed it to his castle of Porto de Mos, to have it held in more veneration, but that he feared to offend it if he should move it from a habitation where it had abode for so many years. This consideration made him leave it for the present in the same place and manner in which he found it; and although he visited it afterwards when in course of the chase he came to those parts, nevertheless he never took in hand to improve the poor hermitage in which it was, nor would he have done it, if the Virgin had not saved him from a notorious danger of death, which, peradventure, God permitted as a punishment for his negligence, and in this manner to make the virtue of the Holy Image manifest to the world. It was thus, that going to his ordinary exercise of the chase, in the month of September, in the year of Christ 1182, and on the 14th of the month, being the day on which the church celebrates the festival of the Exaltation of the Cross upon the which Christ redeemed the human race, as the day rose thick with clouds, which ordinarily arise from the sea, and the country round about could not be seen by reason of the clouds, save for a little space, it befell that the dogs put up a stag, (if indeed it were one,) and Dom Fuas pressing his horse in pursuit, without fear of any danger, because he thought it was all plain ground, and the mist hindered him from seeing where he was, found himself upon the very edge of the rock on the precipice, two hundred fathoms above the sea, at a moment when it was no longer in his power to turn the reins, nor could he do any thing more than invoke the succors of the Virgin Mary, whose image was in that place; and she succored him in such a manner, that less than two palms from the edge of the rock, on a long and narrow point thereof, the horse stopped as if it had been made of stone, the marks of his hoofs remaining in proof of the miracle imprinted in the living rock, such as at this day they are seen by all strangers and persons on pilgrimage, who go to visit the Image of Our Lady; and it is a notable thing, and deserving of serious consideration, to see that in the midst of this rock, upon which the miracle happened, and on the side towards the east, and in a part where, because it is suspended in the air, it is not possible that any human being could reach, Nature herself has impressed a cross as if nailed to the hardness of the rock, as though she had sanctified that cliff therewith, and marked it with that holy sign, to be the theatre in which the miraculous circumstance was to be celebrated; which, by reason that it took place on the day of the Exaltation of the Cross, seemed as if it showed the honor and glory which should from thence redound to the Lord who redeemed us thereon. Dom Fuas, seeing himself delivered from so great danger, and knowing from whence the grace had come to him, went to the little hermitage, where, with that great devotion which the presence of the miracle occasioned, he gave infinite thanks to Our Lady, accusing himself before her of having neglected to repair the house, and promising all the amends which his possibility permitted. His huntsmen afterwards arrived, following the track of the horse, and knowing the marvel which had occurred, they prostrated themselves before the Image of Our Lady, adding with their astonishment to the devotion of Dom Fuas, who, hearing that the stag had not been seen, and that the dogs had found no track of him in any part, though one had been represented before him to draw him on, understood that it was an illusion of the Devil, seeking by that means to make him perish miserably. All these considerations enhanced the greatness of the miracle, and the obligations of Dom Fuas, who, tarrying there some days, made workmen come from Leyria and Porto de Mos, to make another hermitage, in which the Lady should be more venerated; and as they were demolishing the first, they found placed between the stones of the altar a little box of ivory, and within it relics of St. Bras, St. Bartholomew, and other saints, with a parchment, wherein a relation was given of how and at what time those relics and the image were brought there, according as has been aforesaid. A vaulted chapel was soon made, after a good form for times so ancient, over the very place where the Lady had been; and to the end that it might be seen from all sides, they left it open with four arches, which in process of time were closed, to prevent the damage which the rains and storms did within the chapel, and in this manner it remains in our days. The Lady remained in her place, being soon known and visited by the faithful, who flocked there upon the fame of her appearance: the valiant and holy king D. Afonso Henriquez, being one of the first whom Dom Fuas advised of what had happened, and he, accompanied with the great persons of his court, and with his son, D. Saneho, came to visit the Image of the Lady, and see with his own eyes the marks of so rare a miracle as that which had taken place; and with his consent, D. Fuas made a donation to the Lady of a certain quantity of land round about, which was at that time a wild thicket, and for the greater part is so still, being well nigh all wild sands incapable of giving fruit, and would produce nothing more than heath and some wild pine-trees. And because it establishes the truth of all that I have said, and relates in its own manner the history of the Image of the Lady, I will place it here in the form in which I saw it in the Record Room at Alcobaca, preserving throughout the Latin and the barbarism of its composition; which is as follows:—

“ Sab nomine Patris, nec non et ejus prolis, in unius potentia Deitatis, incipit carta donationis, necnon et devotionis, quam ego Fuas Ropinho tenens Porto de Mos, et terram de Albardos usque Leirenã, et Turres Vetores, facio Ecclesie Sante Mariæ de Nazareth, quæ de paucis tempore surgit fundata super mare, ubi de sæculis antiquis jacebat, inter lapides et spinas multas, de tota illa terra quæ jacet inter flumina quæ venit per Alcobaz, et aquam nuncupatam de furatorio, et dividitur de isto modo: de illa foze de flumine Alcobaz, quomodo vadit per aquas bellas, deinde inter mare et nata de Putayas usque: finit in ipso furatorio, quam ego obtinui de rege Alfonso, et per suum consensum facio præsentem seriem ad prædictam Ecclesiam Beate Mariæ Virginis, quam feci supra mare, ut in sæculis perpetuis memorentur mirabilia Dei, et sit notum omnibus hominibus, quomodo a morte fuerim salvatus per pietatem Dei et Beate Mariæ quam vocant de Nazaret, tali sucesu. This deed, which establishes all the principal facts that I have related, did not take effect, because the lands of which it disposed were already part of the Coutos of Alcobaca, which King Don Afonso had given some years before to our father St. Bernard; and Dom Fuas compensated for them with certain properties near Pombal, as is proved by another writing annexed to the former, but which I forbear to insert, as appertaining little to the thread of my history; and resuming the course thereof, you must know, that the image of the Virgin Mary of Nazareth remained in the chapel which Dom Fuas made for it, till the year of Christ 1377, in the which, King Dom Fernando of Portugal founded for it the house in which it now is, having been enlarged and beautified by Queen Dona Lianor, wife of King Dom Joam II., and surrounded with porticoes by King Dom Manoel. And now in our times a chapel (Capela mor) of good fabric has been built, with voluntary contributions, and the rents of the brotherhood; and in the old hermitage founded by Dom Fuas I., with the help of some devout persons, had another chapel opened under ground, in order to discover the very rock and cavern in which the Holy Image had been hidden so great a number of years; there is a descent to it by eight or ten steps, and a notable consolation it is to those who consider the great antiquity of that sanctuary. And for that the memory of things so remarkable ought not to be lost, I composed an inscription briefly recounting the whole: and Dr. Ruy Lourenço, who was then Provedor of the Comarea of Leyria, and visitor of the said church for the king, ordered it to be engraven in marble. It is as follows—

“ Sacra Virginis Mariæ veneranda Imago, a Monasterio Cauliniana prope Emeritam, quo Gothorum tempore, a Nazareth translata, miraculis claruerat, in generali Hispania clade, Ann. Dni. DCCXIII. a Romano monacho, comite, ut fertur, Rode rico Rege, ad hanc extremam orbis partem adducitur, in qua dum unus moritur, alter proficiscitur, per CCCCLXIX. annos inter duo hæc prærupta saxa sub parvo delituit tugurio: deinde a Fua Ropinio, Portus Molaram duce, anno Domini MCLXXXII, (ut ipse in donatione testatur) inventa, dum incaute agitato equo fugacem, sicutumque forte, insequitur cervum, ad ultimumque immanis hujus præcipitii eucum, jam jam ruiturus accedit, nomine Virginis invocato, a ruina, et mortis faucibus ereptus, hoc ei prius dedicat sacellum; tandem a Ferdinando Portugalie Rege, ad majus aliud templum, quod ipse a fundamentis creverat transfertur. Ann. Domini MCCCCLXXVII. Virgini et perpetuati. D. D. F. B. D. B. ex voto."

From these things, taken as faithfully as I possibly could from the deed of gift and from history, we see clearly the great antiquity of the sanctuary, since it is 893 years since the Image of the Lady was brought to the place where it now is; and although we do not know the exact year in which it was brought from Nazareth, it is certain at least that it was before King Recaredo, who began to reign in the year of Christ 586; so that it is 1021 years, a little more or less, since it came to Spain; and as it came then, as one well known, and celebrated for miracles in the parts of the East, it may well be understood that this is one of the most famous and ancient Images, and nearest to the times of the apostles, that the world at present possesses. — BRITO Monarchia Lusitana, p. 2, l. 7, c. 4.

This legend cannot have been invented before Emanuel's reign, for Duarte Galvão says nothing of it in his Chronicle of Afonso Henriquez, though he relates the exploits and death of D. Fuas Roupinho. I believe there is no earlier authority for it than Bernardo de Brito himself. It is one of many articles of the same kind from the great manufactory of Alcobãça, and is at this day as firmly believed by the people of Portugal as any article of the Christian faith. How indeed should they fail to believe it? I have a print — it is one of the most popular devotional prints in Portugal — which represents the miracle. The diabolical stag is flying down the precipice, and looking back with a wicked turn of the head, in hopes of seeing Dom Fuas follow him; the horse is rearing up with his hind feet upon the brink of the precipice; the knight has dropped his hunting-spear, his cocked hat is falling behind him, and an exclamation to the Virgin is coming out of his mouth. The Virgin with a crown upon her head, and the Babe with a crown upon his, at her breast, appear in the sky amidst clouds of glory. N. S. de Nazaré is written above this precious print, and this more precious information below it, — O. Emo Snr. Cardinal Patriarcha concede 50 dias de Indulga. a qm. rezar huma have Ma. diante desta Image. His Eminency the Cardinal Patriarch grants fifty days indulgence to whosoever shall say an Ave-Maria before this Image. The print is included, and plenty of Ave-Marias are said before it in full faith, for this Nossa Senhora de Nazaré is in high vogue. Before the French invasion, this famous Image used annually to be escorted by the Court to Cape Espichel. In 1796 I happened to be upon the Tagus at the time of her embarkation at Belem. She was carried in a sort of sedan-chair, of which the fashion resembled that of the Lord Mayor's coach; a processional gun-boat preceded the Image and the Court, and I was literally caught in a shower of rockets, if any of which had fallen upon the heretical heads of me and my companion, it would not improbably have been considered as a new miracle wrought by the wonder-working Senhora.

In July, 1808, the French, under General Thomieres, robbed this church of Our Lady of Nazareth; their booty, in jewels and plate, was estimated at more than 200,000 cruzados. Jose Accursio das Neves, the Portuguese historian of those disastrous times, expresses his surprise that no means should have been taken by those who had the care of these treasures, for securing them in time. Care, however, seems to have been taken of the Great Diana of the Temple, for though it is stated that they destroyed or injured several images, no mention is made of any insult or damage having been offered to this. They sacked the town and set fire to it, but it escaped with the loss of only thirteen or fourteen houses; the suburb or village, on the beach, was less fortunate; there only four houses of more than 300 remained unconsumed, and all the boats and fishing-nets were destroyed. — Historia da Invasão, &c. t. 4, p. 85.

Spreading his hands, and lifting up his face, &c.

I. p. 651, col. 2.

My friend Walter Scott's Vision of Don Roderick supplies a singular contrast to the picture which is represented in this passage. I have great pleasure in quoting the stanzas; if the contrast had been intentional, it could not have been more complete.

But, far within, Toledo's Prelate lent
An ear of fearful wonder to the King;
The silver lamp a fitful lustre sent,
So long that sad confession witnessing;
For Roderick told of many a hidden thing,
Such as are loathly utter'd to the air,
When Fear, Remorse, and Shame, the bosom wring,
And Guilt his secret burden cannot bear,
And Conscience seeks in speech a respite from Despair

Full on the Prelate's face, and silver hair,
The stream of failing light was feebly roll'd;
But Roderick's visage, though his head was bare,
Was shadow'd by his hand and mantle's fold,
While of his hidden soul the sins he told.
Proud Alaric's descendant could not brook,
That mortal man his bearing should behold,
Or boast that he had seen, when conscience shook,
Fear tame a monarch's brow, remorse a warrior's look.

This part of the story is thus nakedly stated by Dr. Andre da Sylva Mascarenhas, in a long narrative poem with this title — A destruição de Espanha, Restauração Summaria de mesma.

*Some new austerity, unheard of yet
In Syrian fields of glory, or the sands
Of holiest Egypt. — II. p. 653, col. I.*

Egypt has been, from the earliest ages, the theatre of the most abject and absurd superstitions, and very little benefit was produced by a conversion which exchanged crocodiles and monkeys for monks and mountebanks. The first monastery is said to have been established in that country by St. Anthony the Great, towards the close of the third century. He who rests in solitude, said the saint, is saved from three conflicts, — from the war of hearing, and of speech, and of sight; and he has only to maintain the struggle against his own heart. (Acta Sanctorum, t. ii. p. 143.) Indolence was not the only virtue which he and his disciples introduced into the catalogue of Christian perfections. S. Eufraxia entered a convent consisting of a hundred and thirty nuns, not one of whom had ever washed her feet; the very mention of the bath was an abomination to them. (Acta Sanctorum, March 13.) St. Macarius had renounced most of the decencies of life; but he returned one day to his convent, humbled and mortified, exclaiming, — I am not yet a monk, but I have seen monks! for he had met two of these wretches stark naked. — Acta Sanctorum, i. p. 107.

The principles which these madmen established were, that every indulgence is sinful; that whatever is gratifying to the body, must be injurious to the soul; that in proportion as man inflicts torments upon himself, he pleases his Creator; that the ties of natural affection wean the heart from God; and that every social duty must be abandoned by him who would be perfect. The doctrine of two principles has never produced such practical evils in any other system as in the Romish. Mañes, indeed, attributes all evil to the equal power of the Evil Principle, (that power being only for a time,) but some of the corrupted forms of Christianity actually exclude a good one!

There is a curious passage in the Bibliotheca Orientalis of Assemanus, in which the deserts are supposed to have been originally intended for the use of these saints, compensating for their sterility by the abundant crop of virtues which they were to produce. In illâ vero soli castitate, quæ procul a Nilî ripis quaquaversus latissime protrahitur, non urbes, non domicilia, non agri, non arbores, sed desertum, arena, feræ; non tamen hanc terræ partem (ut Eucherii verbis utar) inutilem; et inhonoratam dimisit Deus, quum in primordiis rerum omnia in sapientia fecerit, et singula quæque futuris usibus apta distingueret; sed cuncta non magis præsentis magnificentiâ, quam futuri præscientiâ creans, venturis, ut arbitror, Sanctis Eremum paravit. Credo, his illam locupletem fructibus voluit, et pro indulgentioris naturæ vice, hanc Sanctorum dare fecundiam, ut sic pinguescerent fines deserti: Et quum irrigaret de superioribus suis montes, abundaret quoque multiplicatu frugæ convalles locorumque damna supplicet, quum habitacionem sterilem habitatore ditaret.

“If the ways of religion,” says South, “are ways of pleasantness, such as are not ways of pleasantness are not truly and properly ways of religion. Upon which ground it is easy to see what judgment is to be passed upon all those affected, uncommanded, absurd austerities, so much prized and exercised by some of the Romish profession. Pilgrimages, going barefoot, hair-shirts and whips, with other such gospel-artillery, are their only helps to devotion; things never enjoined, either by the prophets under the Jewish, or by the apostles under the Christian economy, who yet surely understood the proper and the most efficacious instruments of piety, as well as any confessor or friar of all the order of St. Francis, or any casuist whatsoever.

“It seems that with them a man sometimes cannot be a penitent unless he also turns vagabond, and foots it to Jerusalem, or wanders over this or that part of the world to visit the shrines of such or such a pretended saint, though perhaps in his life ten times more ridiculous than themselves. Thus, that which was Cain’s error, is become their religion. He that thinks to expiate a sin by going barefoot, only makes one folly the atonement for another. Paul, indeed, was scourged and beaten by the Jews, but we never read that he beat or scourged himself; and if they think that his keeping under of his body imports so much, they must first prove that the body cannot be kept under by a virtuous mind, and that the mind cannot be made virtuous but by a scourge, and consequently that thongs and whip-cord are means of grace, and things necessary to salvation. The truth is, if men’s religion lies no deeper than their skin, it is possible that they may scourge themselves into very great improvements.

“But they will find that bodily exercise touches not the soul, and that neither pride, nor lust, nor covetousness, was ever mortified by corporal discipline; ’tis not the back, but the heart that must bleed for sin; and, consequently, that in their whole course they are like men out of their way; let them lash on never so fast, they are not at all the nearer to their journey’s end; and howsoever they deceive themselves and others, they may as well expect to bring a cart as a soul to Heaven by such means.” — Sermons, vol. i. p. 34.

The history of Europe during the dark ages abounds with examples of exoculation, as it was called by those writers who endeavored, towards the middle of the 17th century, to introduce the style-ornate into our prose after it had been banished from poetry. In the East, the practice is still continued. When Albuquerque took possession of Ormuz, he sent to Portugal fifteen of its former kings, whom he found there, each of whom, in his turn, had been deposed and blinded!

In the semi-barbarous stage of society, any kind of personal blemish seems to have been considered as disqualifying a prince from the succession, like the law of the Nazarenes. Yorwerth, the son of Owen Gwynedh, was set aside in Wales because of his broken nose; Count Oliba, in Barcelona, because he could never speak till he had stamped with his foot three times like a goat. Aquest Oliba frare del Conte cu Grifa no era a dret de sos membras. Car lo dit Oliba james no podia parlar, si primer no donas colps ab lo pen en terra quart o sine regades, axi comsi fos cabra; e per aquesta raho li fou imposat lo nom, dient li Olibra Cabreta, e per aquest accident lo dit Oliba perde la successio del frare en lo Comtat de Barcelona, e fou donat lo dit Comtat o en Borrell, Comte de Urgell, qui era son cosin germa. — Père Tomich, e. xxviii. ff. 20.

In the treaty between our Henry V. and Charles VI. of France, by which Henry was appointed King of France after Charles’s decease, it was decreed that the French should “swear to become liege men and vassals to our said son King Henry, and obey him as the true King of France, and without any opposition or dispute shall receive him as such, and never pay obedience to any other as king or regent of France, but to our said son King Henry, unless our said son should lose life or limb, or be attacked by a mortal disease, or suffer diminution in person, state, honor,* or goods.”

Lope de Vega alludes to the blindness of Theodofred in his Jerusalem Conquistada: —

A remarkable instance of the inconvenient manner in which the b and the v are indiscriminately used by the Spaniards, occurs here in the original edition. The w not being used in that language, it would naturally be represented by vv; and here, the printer, using most unluckily his typographical license, has made the word Vbitisa.

"The Spaniards," says that late worthy Jo. Sandford, some time fellow of Magdalene college, in Oxford, (in his Spanish Grammar, 1632,) "do with a kind of wantonness so confound the sound of b with v, that it is hard to determine when and in what words it should retain its own power of a labial letter, which gave just cause of laughter at that Spaniard who, being in conversation with a French lady, and minding to commend her children for fair, said unto her, using the Spanish liberty in pronouncing the French, — Madame, vous avez des vtaux enfans, telling her that she had calves to her children, instead of saying, beaux enfans, fair children. Neither can I well justify him who wrote veeneficio for beneficio."

Conimbrica, whose ruined towers

Bore record of the fierce Alani's wrath. — III. p. 655, col. 1.

The Roman Conimbrica stood about two leagues from the present Coimbra, on the site of Condeyxa Velha. Ataces, king of the Alanes, won it from the Sueves, and, in revenge for its obstinate resistance, dispeopled it, making all its inhabitants, without distinction of persons, work at the foundation of Coimbra where it now stands. Hermenerico, the king of the Sueves, attacked him while thus employed, but was defeated and pursued to the Douro; peace was then made, and Sindasunda, daughter of the conquered, given in marriage to the conqueror. In memory of the pacification thus effected, Ataces bore upon his banners a damsel in a tower, with a dragon vert on one side, and a lion rouge on the other, the bearings of himself and his marriage-father; and this device being sculptured upon the towers of Coimbra, still remains as the city arms. Two letters of Arisbert, bishop of Porto, to Samerius, archdeacon of Braga, which are preserved at Alcobaca, relate these events as the news of the day, — that is, if the authority of Alcobacan records, and of Bernardo de Brito, can be admitted. — Mon. Lus. 26, 3.

Ataces was an Arian, and therefore made the Catholic bishops and priests work at his new city; but his queen converted him.

Gasper Estaço has shown that this is the name of the foundress of Guimaraens, and that it is not, as some writers had supposed, erroneously thus written, because the words Muma and Dona followed each other in the deeds of gift wherein it is preserved; the name being frequently found with its title affixed thus, Dma Mumadna.

Diogo Bernardes, one of the best of the Portuguese poets, was born on the banks of the Lima, and passionately fond of its scenery. Some of his sonnets will bear comparison with the best poems of their kind. There is a charge of plagiarism against him for having printed several of Camoens's sonnets as his own; to obtain any proofs upon this subject would be very difficult; this, however, is certain, that his own undisputed productions resemble them so closely in unaffected tenderness and in sweetness of diction, that the whole appear like the works of one author.

Of this saint, and the curious institutions which he formed, and the beautiful tract of country in which they were placed, I have given an account in the third edition of Letters from Spain and Portugal, vol. i. p. 103.

*Sacaru indignantly
Did he toward the ocean bend his way,
And, shaking from his feet the dust of Spain,
Took ship, and hoisted sail through seas unknown
To seek for freedom.* — IV. p. 659, col. 2.

This tale, which is repeated by Bleda, rests on no better authority than that of Abulcacim,* which may, however, be admitted, so far as to show that it was a prevalent opinion at his time.

Antonio Galvam, in his Tratado dos Descobrimentos Antigos e Modernos, relates a current, and manifestly fabulous story, which has been supposed to refer to Sacaru, and the companions of his emigration. "They say," he says, "that at this time, A. D. 1447, a Portuguese ship sailing out of the Straits of Gibraltar, was carried by a storm much farther to the west than she had intended, and came to an island where there were seven cities, and where our language was spoken; and the people asked whether the Moors still occupied Spain, from whence they had fled after the loss of King Don Rodrigo. The contramaster of the ship said, that he brought away a little sand from the island, and sold it to a goldsmith in Lisbon, who extracted from it a good quantity of gold. It is said that the Infante D. Pedro, who governed at that time, ordered these things to be written in the Casa do Tombo. And some will have it that these lands and islands at which the Portuguese touched, were those which are now called the Antilhas and New Spain." (P. 24.)

This Antilia, or Island of the Seven Cities, is laid down in Martin Behaim's map; the story was soon improved by giving seven bishops to the seven cities: and Galvam has been accused by Hornius of having invented it to give his countrymen the honor of having discovered the West Indies! Now, it is evident that Antonio Galvam relates the story as if he did not believe it, — contam — they relate, — and, dixit, it is said, — never affirming the fact, nor making any inference from it, but merely stating it as a report; and it is certain, which perhaps Hornius did not know, that there never lived a man of purer integrity than Antonio Galvam; a man whose history is disgraceful, not to his country, but to the government under which he lived, and whose uniform and unsullied virtue entitles him to rank among the best men that have ever done honor to human nature.

The writers who repeat this story of the Seven Islands and their bishops, have also been pleased to find traces of Sacaru in the new world, for which the imaginary resemblances to Christianity which were found in Yucatan and other places, serve them as proofs. — Gregorio Garcia, Origen de los Indios, l. iv. c. 20.

The work of Abulcacim, in which the story first appears, has been roundly asserted to be the forgery of the translator, Miguel de Luna. The Portuguese academician, Contador de Argote, speaking of this romantic history, acquits him of the fraud, which has with little reflection been laid to his charge. Pedraça, he says, in the Grandezas de Granada, and Rodrigo Caro, in the Grandezas de Sevilla, both affirm that the original Arabic exists in the Escorial, and Escolano asserts the same, although Nicholas Antonio says that the catalogues of that library do not make mention of any such book. If Luna had forged it, it would not have had many of those blunders which are observed in it; nor is there any reason for imputing such a fraud to Luna, a man well skilled in Arabic, and of good reputation. What I suspect is, that the book was composed by a Granadan Moor, and the reason which induces me to form this opinion is, the minuteness with which he describes the conquest which Tarif made of those parts of the kingdom of Granada, of the Alpuxarras and the Serra Nevada, pointing out the etymologies of the names of places, and other circumstances, which any one who reads with attention will observe. As to the time in which the composer of this amusing romance flourished, it was certainly after the reign of Bedeci Aben Habuz, who governed, and was Lord of, Granada about the year 1013, as Marmel relates, after the Arabian writers; and the reason which I have for this assertion is, that in the romance of Abuleacim the story is told which gave occasion to the said Bedeci Aben Habuz to set up in Granada that famous vane, which represents a knight upon horseback in bronze, with a spear in the right hand, and a club in the left, and these words in Arabic, — Bedeci Aben Habuz says, that in this manner Andalusia must be kept! the figure moves with every wind, and veers about from one end to another. — Memorias de Braga, t. iii. p. 120.

In the fabulous Chronicle of D. Rodrigo, Sacarus, as he is there called, is a conspicuous personage; but the tale of his emigration was not then current, and the author kills him before the Moors appear upon the stage. He seems to have designed him as a representation of perfect generosity.

*All too long,
Here in their own inheritance, the sons
Of Spain have groan'd beneath a foreign yoke.*
IV. p. 659, col. 2.

There had been a law to prohibit intermarriages between the Goths and Romans; this law Recesuintho annulled,* observing, in his edict, that the people ought in no slight degree to rejoice at the repeal. It is curious that the distinction should have existed so long; but it is found also in a law of Wamba's, and doubtless must have continued till both names were lost together in the general wreck. The vile principle was laid down in the laws of the Wisigoths, that such as the root is, such ought the branch to be, — gran confusion es de linage, quando el fiyo non semeja al padre, que aquello que de la raiz, deba er en a cima, and upon this principle a law was made to keep the children of slaves, slaves also.

“Many men well versed in history,” says Contador de Argote, (Memorias de Braga, 3, 273,) “think, and think rightly, that this was a civil war, and that the monarchy was divided into two factions, of which the least powerful availed itself of the Arabs as auxiliaries; and that these auxiliaries made themselves masters, and easily effected their intent by means of the divisions in the country.”

“The natives of Spain,” says Joam de Barros, “never bore much love to the Goths, who were strangers and comelings, and when they came had no right there, for the whole belonged to the Roman empire. It is believed that the greater part of those whom the Moors slew were Goths, and it is said that, on one side and on the other, in the course of two years there were slain by the sword seven hundred thousand men. The Christians who escaped chose that the name of Goths should be lost; and though some Castillians complain that the race should be extinguished, saying with Don Jorge Manrique,

*Pues la sangre de los Godos
y el linage y la nobleza tan crecida,
por quantas vias y modos
se sume su grande alteza
en esta vida,*

* Fuero Juzgo, L. 3. tit. 1. leg. 1.

I must say that I see no good foundation for this; for they were a proud nation and barbarous, and were a long time heretics of the sects of Arius and Eutyehius and Pelagius, and can be praised as nothing except as warriors, who were so greedy for dominion, that wherever they reached they laid every thing bare like locusts, and therefore the emperor ceded to them this country. The people who dwelt in it before were a better race, always praised and feared, and respected by the Romans, loyal and faithful and true and reasonable: and if the Goths afterwards were worthy of any estimation they became so here: for as plants lose their bitterness and improve by being planted and translated into a good soil, (as is said of peaches,) so does a good land change its inhabitants, and of rustic and barbarous make them polished and virtuous.

“The Moors did not say that they came against the Christians, but against the Goths, who had usurped Spain; and it appears that to the people of the land it mattered little whether they were under Goths or Moors; or indeed it might not be too much to say that they preferred the Moors, not only because all new things and changes would be pleasing, but because they were exasperated against the Goths for what they had done against the Christians, (i. e. the Catholics,) and for the bad government of King Witiza.”

“You are not to think,” says the Chronicler, “that Count Don Julian and the Bishop Don Orpas came of the lineage of the Goths, but of the lineage of the Cæsars, and therefore they were not grieved that the good lineage should be destroyed.” — Chr. del K. D. Rodrigo, p. i. e. 248.

For this fact there is the unquestionable testimony of Isidorus Pacensis. Per idem tempus in Æra 735, anno imperii ejus 9. Arabum 97. Abdalaziz omnem Hispaniam per tres annos sub censuario jugo pacificans, cum Hispali divitiis et honorum fascibus cum Regina Hispania in conjugio copulata, filias Regum ac Principum pellieatas, et imprudenter distraetas astuaret, seditione suorum facta, orationi instans, consilio Ajub, occidit: atque eo Hispaniam retinente, mense impleto, Alahor in regno Hesperie per principia jussa succedit, cui de morte Abdalaziz ita edicitur, ut quasi consilio Egilonis Regie conjugis quondam Ruderici regis, quom sibi sociaberat, jugum Arabicum a sua cervice conaretur acertere, et regnum in vasum Hiberia sibi met retemptare. — Espana Sagrada, t. viii. 302.

Florez relates the story in the words of the old translation of an Arabic original imputed to Rasis. “When Belazin, the son of Muza, remained for Lord of Spain, and had ordered his affairs right well, they told him tidings of Ulaca, who had been the wife of King D. Rodrigo, that she was a right worthy dame, and right beautiful, and of a great lineage, and that she was a native of Africa; whereupon he sent for her, and ordered that beasts should be given her, and much property, and men-servants and maid-servants, and all things that she could require, till she could come to him. And they brought her unto him, and when he saw her, he was well pleased with her, and said, Ulaca, tell me of thy affairs, and conceal nothing from me; for thou knowest I may do with thee according to my will, being my captive. And when she heard this, it increased the grief which she had in her heart, and her sorrow was such, that she had well nigh fallen dead to the ground, and she replied weeping and said, Baron, what wouldst thou know more of my affairs? For doth not all the world know, that I, a young damsel, being married with King

D. Rodrigo, was with him Lady of Spain, and dwelt in honor and in all pleasure, more than I deserved; and therefore it was God's will that they should endure no longer? And now I am in dishonor greater than ever was dame of such high state: For I am plundered, and have not a single palm of inheritance; and I am a captive, and brought into bondage. I also have been mistress of all the land that I behold. Therefore, Sir, have pity upon my misfortunes; and in respect of the great lineage which you know to be mine, suffer not that wrong or violence be offered me by any one; and, Sir, if it be your grace you will ransom me. There are men I know who would take compassion on me, and give you for me a great sum. And Belazin said to her, Be certain that so long as I live, you shall never go from my house. And Ulaea said, What then, Sir, would you do with me? and Belazin said, I will that you should remain in my house, and there you shall be free from all wretchedness, with my other wives. And she said, In an evil day was I born, if it is to be true that I have been wife of the honored king of Spain, and now have to live in a stranger's house as the concubine and captive of another! And I swear unto God whose pleasure it is to dismay me thus, that I will rather seek my own death as soon as I can; for I will endure no more misery, seeing that by death I can escape it. And when Belazin saw that she thus lamented, he said to her, Good dame, think not that we have concubines, but by our law we may have seven wives, if we can maintain them, and therefore you shall be my wife, like each of the others; and all things which your law requires that a man should do for his wife, will I do for you; and therefore you have no cause to lament; and be sure that I will do you much honor, and will make all who love me serve and honor you, and you shall be mistress of all my wives. To this she made answer and said, Sir, offer me no violence concerning my law, but let me live as a Christian: And to this Belazin was nothing loth, and he granted it, and his marriage was performed with her according to the law of the Moors; and every day he liked her more, and did her such honor that greater could not be. And it befell that Belazin being one day with Ulaea, she said to him, Sir, do not think it ill if I tell you of a thing in which you do not act as if you knew the custom. And he said, Wherein is it that I err? Sir, said she, because you have no crown, for no one was ever confirmed in Spain, except he had a crown upon his head. He said, This which you say is nothing, for we have it not of our lineage, neither is it our custom to wear a crown. She said, Many good reasons are there why a crown is of use, and it would injure you nothing, but be well for you, and when you should wear your crown upon your head, God would know you and others also by it: And she said, You would look full comely with it, and it would be great nobleness to you, and be right fitting, and you should wear in it certain stones, which will be good for you, and avail you. And in a short time afterwards, Belazin went to dwell at Seville, and he carried Ulaea with him, and she took of her gold, and of her pearls, and of her precious stones, which she had many and good, and made him the noblest crown that ever was seen by man, and gave it him, and bade him take it, and place it where it should be well kept; and Ulaea, as she was a woman of understanding and prudence, ordered her affairs as well as Belazin, so that he loved her much and did great honor to her, and did many of those things which she desired; so that he was well pleased with the Christians, and did them much good, and showed favor unto them." — Memorias de las Reynas Catholicas, 1, p. 28.

The issue of this was fatal to Abdalaziz. In Albucaim's history, it is said that he was converted by this Christian wife, and for that reason put to death by his father. Others have supposed that by means of her influence he was endeavoring to make himself King of Spain, independent of the Caliph. A characteristic circumstance is added. Egilona was very desirous to convert her husband, and that she might at least obtain from him some mark of outward respect for her images, made the door of the apartment in which she kept them, so low, that he could not enter without bowing. — Bleda, p. 214.

The character of this Queen is beautifully conceived by the author of Count Julian:—

Beaming with virtue inaccessible
Stood Egilona; for her lord she lived,
And for the heavens that raised her sphere so high:
All thoughts were on her—all beside her own.
Negligent as the blossoms of the field,
Arrayed in candor and simplicity,
Before her path she heard the streams of joy
Murmur her name in all their cadences,
Saw them in every scene, in light, in shade,
Reflect her image; but acknowledged them
Hers most complete when flowing from her most.
All things in want of her, herself of none,
Pomp and dominion lay beneath her feet
Unfelt and unregarded: now behold
The earthly passions war against the heavenly!
Pride against love; ambition and revenge
Against devotion and compliancy—
Her glorious beams adversity hath blunted,
And coming nearer to our quiet view,
The original clay of coarse mortality
Hardens and flaws around her.

One day of bitter and severe delight. — VI. p. 663, col. 2.

I have ventured to borrow this expression from the tragedy of Count Julian. Nothing can be finer than the passage in which it occurs.

Abdalaziz. Thou lovest still thy country?

Julian. Abdalaziz,

All men with human feelings love their country.
Not the high-born or wealthy man alone,
Who looks upon his children, each one led
By its gay handmaid, from the high alcove,
And hears them once a-day; not only he
Who hath forgotten, when his guest inquires
The name of some far village all his own;
Whose rivers bound the province, and whose hills
Touch the last cloud upon the level sky:
No; better men still better love their country.
'Tis the old mansion of their earliest friends,
The chapel of their first and best devotions;
When violence, or perfidy, invades,
Or when unworthy lords hold wassail there,
And wiser heads are drooping round its moats,
At last they fix their steady and stiff eye
There, there alone—stand while the trumpet blows,
And view the hostile flames above its towers
Spire, with a bitter and severe delight.

*Restoring in thy native line, O Prince,
The sceptre to the Spaniard.* — VII. p. 666, col. 1.

This was a favorite opinion of Garibays, himself a Biscayan, but he has little better proof for it than the fact, that Gothic names disappeared with Roderick, and that Pelayo and his successors drew their nomenclature from a different stock. He says, indeed, that ancient writings are not wanting to support his opinion. Some rude commentator has written against this assertion in the margin of my copy, miente Garibay; and I am afraid the commentator is the truer man of the two.

There is a fabulous tale of Pelayo's birth, which, like many other tales of no better authority, has legends and relics to support it. The story, according to Dr. D. Christoval Lozano, in his history of Los Reyes Nuevos de Toledo, is this. Luz, niece to Egilona, and sister of Roderick, dwelt at Toledo, in the palace of King Egica. Duke Favila, her father's brother, fell in love with her, and came from his residence in Cantabria to ask her in marriage, expecting to find no other obstacle than the dispensable one of consanguinity. But it so happened, that the King was wooing Luz to become his concubine; her refusal made him jealous, as he could not conceive that it proceeded from any cause except love for another, and as his temper and power were not to be provoked without danger, Favila dared not openly make his suit. He and his mistress therefore met in private, and plighted their vows before an image of the Virgin. The consequences soon became apparent,—the more so, because, as Dr. Lozano assures us, there were at that time no fashions to conceal such things, Y mas que en aquella era no se avian inventado los guarda-infantes. The king observed the alteration in her shape, and placed spies upon her, meaning to destroy the child and punish the mother with the rigor of the law, death by fire being the punishment for such an offence. Luz was well aware of the danger. She trusted her Camarera and one servant: They made an ark: She herself, as soon as the infant was born, threw water in his face, and baptized him by the name of Pelayo: a writing was placed with him in the ark, requesting that whoever should find it would breed up the boy with care, for he was of good lineage. Money enough was added to support him for eight years, and the ark was then launched upon the Tagus, where it floated down the stream all night, all day, and all the following night. On the second morning it grounded near Alcantara, and was found by Grafeses, who happened to be Luz's uocle. The king's suspicion being confirmed by the sudden alteration in the lady's appearance, he used every means to detect her, but without avail; he even ordered all children to be examined who had been born in or around Toledo within three months, and full inquiry to be made into the circumstances of their births: To the astonishment of later historians, 35,000 of that age were found, and not one among them of suspicious extraction. The tale proceeds in the ordinary form of romance. The lady is accused of incontinence, and to be burnt, unless a champion defeats her accuser. Favila of course undertakes her defence, and of course is victorious. A second battle follows with the same success, and fresh combats would have followed, if a hermit had not brought the king to repentance. Grafeses in due time discovers the secret, and restores the child to his parents

This fabulous chronicle seems to be the oldest written source of this story, but some such tradition had probably long been current. The ark was shown at Alcantara, in the convent of St. Benito; and a description of it, with reasons why its authenticity should be admitted, may be found in Francisco de Pisa's Description de Toledo, l. iii. c. i.

And in thy name,

Accept the Crown of Thorns she proffers me. — VII. 663, col. 2.

Godfrey was actually crowned with thorns in Jerusalem, — a circumstance which has given rise to a curious question in heraldry, — thus curiously stated and commented by Robert Barret, in that part of his long poem which relates to this Prince:—

A Prince religious, if ever any,
Considering the age wherein he lived,
Vice-hater great, endued with virtues many,
True humilized, void of mundane pride;
For though he now created were great king,
Yet would he not, as royal pomp requires,
Encrowned be with crownnet glistening
Of gold and gems to mundains vain desires;
But with a pricking, pricking crown of thorn,
Bearing thereto a Christian reverence,
Sith Heaven's King, man's Redeemer, did not scorn
To wear such crown within that city's fence,
When as, cross-loden, humbly he went,
All cowering under burden of that wood,
To pay the pain of man's due punishment,
And free from Pluto's bands Prometheus brood.

To free man from hell.

By reas'n of Godfrey's great humility
Refusing golden-crownets dignity,

Some blundering in world-witted heraldry,
Not knowing how t' distinguish virtues trye,
Do question make this Christian king to set
In catalogue of gold-diademed kings;
Regarding glitter of the external jet,
And not true garnish of th' internal things;
Th' internal virtues, soul's sweet ornaments,
So pleasing to th' Eternal's sacred eyes,
In angels chorc consorting sweet concerts
Of heavenly harmony 'bove christal skies.
But we, è contra, him not only deem
A Christian king, but perfect Christian king,
A christal fanal, laoping light divine
To after-comer kings, world emp'rizing.
For he, religious prince, did not despise
The Heaven-sent gift to be anointed king,
But disesteem'd the mundane pompous guise
Tickling the hearts of princes monarching.

Annotation. Potentates regard this heaven-aspiring Prince,
Not priding, as up proves his dignity;
High throned kings aspect the starred fence
Of this true map of true kings royalty;
Not Nembrothizing in cloud-kissing towers,
Not Semramizing in prides palaces,
Not Neronizing in all sanguine hours,
Not Heliogabalizing in lusts lees;
But Joshuadizing in his Christian camp,
And Judithizing in his Salem's seat,
And Davidizing in his Sion's stamp,
And Solomonizing in all sacred heat.

Garci Fernandez Manrique surprised the Moors so often during the night, that he was called Garci Madrogi, — an appellation of the same import as Peep-of-day-boy. He founded the convent of St. Salvador de Palacios de Benagel for Benedictine nuns, and when he called up his merry men, used to say, Up, sirs, and fight, for my nuns are up and praying; Levantaos Senores à pelear, que mis monjas son levantas a rezar. — Pruebas de la Hist. de la Casa de Lara, p. 42.

Hermesind. — X. p. 670, col. 1.

Mariana derives the name of Hermesinda from the reverence in which Hermenegild was held in Spain, — a prince who has been sainted for having renounced the Homooisian creed, and raised a civil war against his father in favor of the Homooisian one. It is not a little curious, when the fate of D. Carlos is remembered, that his name should have been inserted in the calendar, at the solicitation of Philip II. ! From the same source Mariana derives the names Hermenisinda, Armengol, Ermengaud, Hermegildez, and Hermildez. But here, as Brito has done with Pelayo, he seems to forget that the name was current before it was borne by the Saint, and the derivations from it as numerous. Its root may be found in Herman, whose German name will prevail over the Latinized Arminius

The story of the Enchanted Tower at Toledo is well known to every English reader. It neither accorded with the character of my poem to introduce the fiction, nor would it have been prudent to have touched upon it after Walter Scott. The account of the Archbishop Rodrigo, and of Abulcacin, may be found in his notes. What follows here is translated from the fabulous chronicle of King Don Rodrigo.

“And there came to him the keepers of the house which was in Toledo, which they called Pleasure with Pain, the Perfect Guard, the secret of that which is to come; and it was called also by another name, the Honor of God. And these keepers came before the king, and said unto him, Sir, since God hath done thee such good, and such favor as that thou shouldst be king of all Spain, we come to require of thee that thou wouldst go to Toledo, and put thy lock upon the house which we are appointed to keep. And the king demanded of them what house was that, and wherefore he should put upon it his lock. And they said unto him, Sire, we will willingly tell thee, that thou mayst know. Sire, true it is, that when Hercules the Strong came into Spain, he made in it many marvellous things in those places where he understood that they might best remain; and thus when he was in Toledo he understood well that that city would be one of the best in Spain; and saw that the kings who should be Lords of Spain would have more pleasure to continue dwelling therein than in any other part; and seeing that things would come after many ways, some contrariwise to others, it pleased him to leave many enchantments made, to the end that after his death his power and wisdom might by them be known. And he made in Toledo a house, after the manner which we shall now describe, with great mastership, so that we have not heard tell of any other such: The which is made after this guise. There are four lions of metal under the foundation of this house: and so large are they, that a man sitting upon a great horse on the one side, and another in like manner upon the other, cannot see each other, so large are the lions. And the house is upon them, and it is entirely round, and so lofty that there is not a man in the world who can throw a stone to the top: and many have attempted this, but they never could. And there is not a man of this age who can tell you by what manner this house was made, neither whose understanding can reach to say in what manner it is worked within. But of that which we have seen without, we have to tell thee. Certes in the whole house there is no stone bigger than the head of a man, and the most of them are of jasper and marble, so clear and shining, that they seem to be crystal. They are of so many colors that we do not think there are two stones in it of the same color; and so cunningly are they joined one with another, that if it were not for the many colors, you would not believe but that the whole house was made of one entire stone. And the stones are placed in such manner one by another, that seeing them you may know all the things of the battles aforepast, and of great feats. And this is not by pictures, but the color of the stones, and the great art of joining one with the other, make it appear thus. And sans doubt he who should wish to know the truth of the great deeds of arms which have been wrought in the world, might by means of that house know it. See now in what manner Hercules was wise and fortunate, and right valiant, and acquainted with the things which were to come. And when he was Lord of Spain, he made it after this guise, which we have related unto you. And he commanded that neither King nor Lord of Spain who might come after him, should seek to know that which was within; but that every one instead should put a lock upon the doors thereof, even as he himself did, for he first put on a lock, and fastened it with his key. And after him there has been no King nor Lord in Spain, who has thought it good to go from his bidding; but every one as he came put on each his lock, according to that which Hercules appointed. And now that we have told thee the manner of the house, and that which we know concerning it, we require of thee that thou shouldst go thither, and put on thy lock on the gates thereof, even as all the kings have done who have reigned in Spain until this time. And the King Don Rodrigo hearing the marvellous things of this house, and desiring to know what there was within, and moreover being a man of great heart, wished to know of all things how they were and for what guise. He made answer, that no such lock would he put upon that house, and that by all means he would know what there was within. And they said unto him, Sire, you will not do that which has never been done in Spain; be pleased therefore to observe that which the other kings have observed. And the king said unto them, Leave off now, and I will appoint the soonest that may be how I may go to see this house, and then I will do that which shall seem good. And he would give them no other reply. And when they saw that he would give them no other reply, they dared not persist farther, and they dispeeded themselves of him, and went their way.

“Now it came to pass that the King Don Rodrigo called to mind how he had been required to put a lock upon the doors of the house which was in Toledo, and he resolved to carry into effect that unto which his heart inclined him. And one day he gathered together all the greatest knights of Spain, who were there with him, and went to see this house, and he saw that it was more marvellous than those who were its keepers had told him, and as he was thus beholding it, he said, Friends, I will by all means see what there is in this house which Hercules made. And when the great Lords who were with him heard this, they began to say unto him that he ought not to do this; for there was no reason why he should do that which never king nor Cæsar, that had been Lord of Spain since Hercules, had done until that time. And the king said unto them, Friends, in this house there is nothing but what may be seen. I am well sure that the enchantments cannot hinder me, and this being so, I have nothing to fear. And the knights said, Do that, sir, which you think good, but this is not done by our counsel. And when he saw that they were all of a different accord from that which he wished to do, he said, Now gainsay me as you will, for let what will happen I shall not forbear to do my pleasure. And forthwith he went to the doors, and ordered all the locks to be opened; and this was a great labor, for so many were the keys and the locks, that if they had not seen it, it would have been a great thing to believe. And after they were unlocked, the king pushed the door with his hand, and he went in, and the chief persons who were there with him, as many as he pleased, and they found a hall made in a square, being as wide on one part as on the other, and in it there was a bed richly furnished, and there was laid in that bed the statue of a man, exceeding great, and armed at all points, and he had the one arm stretched out, and a writing in his hand. And when the king and those who were with him saw this bed, and the man who was laid in it, they marvelled what it might be, and they said, Certes, that bed was one of the wonders of Hercules and of his enchantments. And when they saw the writing which he held in his hand, they showed it to the king, and the king went to him, and took it from his hand, and opened it and read it, and it said thus, Audacious one, thou who shalt read this writing, mark well what thou art, and how great evil through thee shall come to pass, for even as Spain was peopled and conquered by me, so by thee shall it be depopulated and lost. And I say unto thee, that I was Hercules the strong, he who conquered the greater part of the world, and all Spain; and I slew Geryon the Great, who was Lord thereof; and I alone subdued all these lands of Spain, and conquered many nations, and brave knights, and never any one could conquer me, save only Death. Look well to what thou doest, for from this world thou wilt carry with thee nothing but the good which thou hast done.

“And when the king had read the writing he was troubled, and he wished then that he had not begun this thing. Howbeit he made semblance as if it touched him not, and said that no man was powerful enough to know that which is to come, except the true God. And all the knights who were present were much troubled because of what the writing said; and having seen this they went to behold another apartment, which was so marvellous, that no man can relate how marvellous it was. The colors which were therein were four. The one part of the apartment was white as snow; and the other, which was over against it, was more black than pitch; and another part was green as a fine emerald, and that which was over against it was redder than fresh blood; and the whole apartment was bright and more lucid than crystal, and it was so beautiful, and the color thereof so fine, that it seemed as if each of the sides were made of a single stone, and all who were there present said that there was not more than a single stone in each, and that there was no joining of one stone with another, for every side of the whole four appeared to be one solid slab; and they all said, that never in the world had such a work as this elsewhere been made, and that it must be held for a remarkable thing, and for one of the wonders of the world. And in all the apartments there was no beam, nor any work of wood, neither within nor without; and as the floor thereof was flat, so also was the ceiling. Above these were windows, and so many, that they gave a great light, so that all which was within might be seen as clearly as that which was without. And when they had seen the apartment how it was made, they found in it nothing but one pillar, and that not very large, and round, and of the height of a man of mean stature: and there was a door in it right cunningly made, and upon it was a little writing in Greek letters, which said, Hercules made this house in the year of Adam three hundred and six. And when the king had read these letters, and understood that which they said, he opened the door, and when it was opened they found Hebrew letters which said, This house is one of the wonders of Hercules; and when they had read these letters they saw a niche made in that pillar, in which was a coffer of silver, right subtly wrought, and after a strange manner, and it was gilded, and covered with many precious stones, and of great price, and it was fastened with a lock of mother-of-pearl. And this was made in such a manner that it was a strange thing, and there were cut upon it Greek letters which said, It cannot be but that the king, in whose time this coffer shall be opened, shall see wonders before his death: thus said Hercules the Lord of Greece and of Spain, who knew some of those things which are to come. And when the king understood this, he said, Within this coffer lies that which I seek to know, and which Hercules has so strongly forbidden to be known. And he took the lock and broke it with his hands, for there was no other who durst break it: and when the lock was broken, and the coffer open, they found nothing within, except a white cloth folded between two pieces of copper; and he took it and opened it, and found Moors portrayed therein with turbans, and banners in their hands, and with their swords round their necks, and their bows behind them at the saddle-bow, and over these figures were letters which said, When this cloth shall be opened, and these figures seen, men appeared like them shall conquer Spain and shall be Lords thereof.

“When the King Don Rodrigo saw this, he was troubled at heart, and all the knights who were with him. And they said unto him, Now, sir, you may see what has befallen you, because you would not listen to those who counselled you not to pry into so great a thing, and because you despised the kings who were before you, who all observed the commands of Hercules, and ordered them to be observed, but you would not do this. And he had greater trouble in his heart than he had ever before felt; howbeit he began to comfort them all, and said to them, God forbid that all this which we have seen should come to pass. Nevertheless, I say, that if things must be according as they are here declared, I could not set aside that which hath been ordained, and, therefore, it appears that I am he by whom this house was to be opened, and that for me it was reserved. And seeing it is done, there is no reason that we should grieve for that which cannot be prevented, if it must needs come. And let come what may, with all my power I will strive against that which Hercules has foretold, even till I take my death in resisting it: and if you will all do in like manner, I doubt whether the whole world can take from us our power. But if by God it hath been appointed, no strength and no art can avail against his Almighty power, but that all things must be fulfilled even as to him seemeth good. In this guise they went out of the house, and he charged them all that they should tell no man of what they had seen there, and ordered the doors to be fastened in the same manner as before. And they had hardly finished fastening them, when they beheld an eagle fall right down from the sky, as if it had descended from Heaven, carrying a burning firebrand, which it laid upon the top of the house, and began to fan it with its wings; and the firebrand with the motion of the air began to blaze, and the house was kindled and burnt as if it had been made of rosin; so strong and mighty were the flames and so high did they blaze up, that it was a great marvel, and it burnt so long that there did not remain the sign of a single stone, and all was burnt into ashes. And after a while there came a great flight of birds small and black, who hovered over the ashes, and they were so many, that with the fanning of their wings, all the ashes were stirred up, and rose into the air, and were scattered over the whole of Spain; and many of those persons upon whom the ashes fell, appeared as if they had been besmeared with blood. All this happened in a day, and many said afterwards, that all those persons upon whom those ashes fell, died in battle when Spain was coquered and lost; and this was the first sign of the destruction of Spain.” — Chronica del Rey D. Rodrigo, Part I. c. 28—30.

“Y siendo verdad lo que escribiera nuestros Chronistas, y el A'caide Tarif, las letras que en este Palacio fueron halladas, no se ha de entender que faceron puestas por Hercules en su fundacion, ni por algun nigromantico, como algunos piensan, pues solo Dios sabe las cosas por venir, y aquellos a quien el es servido revelarlas: bien puede ser que fuesen puestas por alguna santa persona a quien nuestro Señor lo oviesse revelado y mandado; como revelo el castigo que avia de suceder del diluvio general en tiempo de Noe, que fue pregoutro de la justicia de Dios: y el de las ciudades de Sodomia y Gomorra a Abraham.” — Fran. do Pisa, Deser. de Toledo, l. 2, c. 31.

The Spanish ballad upon the subject, fine as the subject is, is flat as a flounder: —

*De los nobilissimos Godos que en Castilla avian reynado
Rodrigo reyno el postrero de los reyes que han passado;
en cuyo tiempo los Moros todo Espana avian ganado, sino fuera las Asturias que defendio Don Pelayo.
En Toledo esta Rodrigo
al comienço del reynado;
vinole gran voluntad
de ver lo que esto cerrado en la torre que esta alli, antigua de muchos años.
En esta torre los reyes
cada uno hecho un canaño, porque lo ordenara ansi
Hercules el afamado, que gano primero a España
de Gerion gran tirano.
Creyo el rey que avia en la torre gran thesoro alli guardado;
la torre fue luego abierta
y quitados los canados;
no ay en ella cosa alguna,
sola una eaza han hallado.
El rey la mandara abrir;
un paño dentro se ha hallado, con unas letras latinas que dizen en Castellano,
Quando aquestas cerraduras que cierran estos canados, fueren abiertas y visto
lo en el paño debuxado,
España sera perdida,
y toda ella asolada;
ganaran la gente estrana
como aqui est an figurados, los rostros muy denegridos,
los brazos arremangados,
muchas colores vestidas,
en las cabeças tocados, alçadas traeran sus señas
en cavallos cavalgando, largas lanças en sus manos,
con espadas en su lado.
Alarabes se diran,
y de aquesta tierra cstraños;
perderase toda España,
que nada no aura fineado.
El rey con sus ricos hombres todos se avian espantado, quando vieron las figuras
y letras que hemos contado;
buelven a cerrar la torre,
quedo el rey muy angustiado.*

Juan Yague de Salas relates a singular part of this miracle, which I have not seen recorded any where but in his very rare and curious poem: —

*Cantò como rompidos los eundados
De la lobrega cueva, y ñespèidas
De sus senos obscuros voces tristes
No bien articuladas, si a remiendos,*

*Repetidas adentro por el ayre,
Y una mas bronca se escucho que dice,
Desdichado Rey Ro (y uraba digo,
Quedando la R submersa entre pigarras)
La Coro perderas, y el Man, y el Ce,
No dixo el na, ni el do, ni el tro, no dixo :
Almenos no se oyo, si bien oyose
Por lasciva tirano, y por soberbio,
Que ya permite el Cielo que el de Mica
Castigue por tu causa el Reyno Godo,
Por solo que lo riges con mal modo.*

Los Amantes de Teruel, p. 29.

The Chronica General del Rey Don Alfonso gives a singular account of the first inhabitant of this fatal spot:—

“There was a king who had to name Rocas; he was of the east country from Edom, wherein was paradise, and for the love of wisdom he forsook his kingdom, and went about the world seeking knowledge. And in a country between the east and the north, he found seventy pillars; thirty were of brass, thirty of marble, and they lay upon the ground, and upon them was written all knowledge and the nature of things. These Rocas translated, and carried with him the book in which he had translated them, by which he did marvels. He came to Troy when the people under Laomedon were building the city, and seeing them he laughed. They asked him why, and he replied, that if they knew what was to happen, they would cease from their work. Then they took him and led him before Laomedon, and Laomedon asked him for why he had spoken these words, and Rocas answered, that he had spoken truth, for the people should be put to the sword, and the city be destroyed by fire. Wherefore the Trojans would have slain him, but Laomedon, judging that he spake from folly, put him in prison to see if he would repent. He, fearful of death, by his art sent a sleep upon the guards, and fled off his irons, and went his way. And he came to the seven hills by the Tiber, and there, upon a stone, he wrote the letters Roma, and Romulus found them, and gave them as a name to his city, because they bore a resemblance to his own.

“Then went King Rocas westward, and he entered Spain, and went round it and through it, till coming to the spot where Toledo stands, he discovered that it was the central place of the country, and that one day a city should there be built, and there he found a cave, into which he entered. There lay in it a huge dragon, and Rocas in fear besought the dragon not to hurt him, for they were both creatures of God. And the dragon took such love towards him, that he always brought him part of his food from the chase, and they dwelt together in the cave. One day, an honorable man of that land, by name Tartus, was hunting in that mountain, and he found a bear, and the bear fled into the cave, and Rocas, in fear, addressed him as he had done the dragon, and the bear quietly lay down, and Rocas fondled his head; and Tartus following, saw Rocas, how his beard was long, and his body covered with hair, and he thought it was a wild man, and fitted an arrow to his bow, and drew the string. Then Rocas besought him in the name of God not to slay him, and obtained security for himself and the bear under his protection. And when Tartus heard how he was a king, he invited him to leave that den and return with him, and he would give him his only daughter in marriage, and leave him all that he had. By this the dragon returned. Tartus was alarmed, and would have fled, but Rocas interfered, and the dragon threw down half an ox, for he had devoured the rest, and asked the stranger to stop and eat. Tartus declined the invitation, for he must be gone. Then said Rocas to the dragon, My friend, I must now leave you, for we have sojourned together long enough. So he departed, and married, and had two sons; and, for love of the dragon, he built a tower over the cave, and dwelt there. After his death, one of his sons built another, and King Pirros added more building, and this was the beginning of Toledo.”

Redeemed Magdalen.—X. p. 672, col. 1.

Lardner published a letter to Jonas Hanway, showing why houses for the reception of penitent harlots ought not to be called Magdalen Houses; Mary Magdalen not being the sinner recorded in the 7th chapter of Luke, but a woman of distinction and excellent character, who labored under some bodily infirmity, which our Lord miraculously healed.

In the Shibboleth of Jean Despagne is an article thus entitled: De Marie Magdelaine laquelle faussement on dit avoir este femme de mauvaise vie: Le tort que luy font les Theologiens pour la plus part en leurs sermons, en leurs livres; et specialment la Bible Angloise en l'Argument du 7e chap. de S. Luc.

“The injury,” says this Hugonot divine, “which the Romish church does to another Mary, the sister of Lazarus, has been sufficiently confuted by the orthodox. It has been ignorantly believed that this Mary, and another who was of Magdala, and the sinner who is spoken of in the 7th of Luke, are the same person, confounding the three in one. We have justified one of the three, to wit, her of Bethany, the sister of Lazarus; but her of Magdala we still defame, as if that Magdalen were the sinner of whom St. Luke speaks.

“Nothing is more common in the mouth of the vulgar than the wicked life of the Magdalen. The preachers who wish to confess souls that are afflicted with horror at their sins, represent to them this woman as one of the most immodest and dissolute that ever existed, to whom, however, God has shown mercy. And upon this same prejudice, which is altogether imaginary, has been founded a reason why the Son of God, having been raised from the dead, appeared to Mary Magdalen before any other person; for, say they, it is because she had greater need of consolation, having been a greater sinner than the others. — He who wrote the Practice of Piety places her with the greatest offenders, even with Manasses, one of the wickedest of men: and to authorize this error the more, it has been inserted in the Bible itself. For the argument to the 7th of Luke in the English version says, that the woman whose sins were in greater number than those of others — the woman, who till then had lived a wicked and infamous life — was Mary Magdalen. But, 1st, The text gives no name to this sinner: Where then has it been found? Which of the Evangelists, or what other authentic writing, has taught us the proper name or surname of the woman? For she who poured an ointment upon Christ (Matth. xxvi. John xii.) was not this sinner, nor Mary Magdalen, but a sister of Lazarus. All these circumstances show that they are two different stories, two divers actions, performed at divers times, in divers places, and by divers persons. 2dly, Where do we find that Mary Magdalen ever anointed the feet of our Savior? 3dly, Where do we find that Mary Magdalen had been a woman of evil life? The gospel tells us that she had been tormented with seven devils or evil spirits, an affliction which might happen to the holiest person in the world: But we do not see even the shadow of a word there which marks her with infamy. Why then do we still adhere to an invention not only fabulous, but injurious to the memory of a woman illustrious in piety? We ought as well to beware of bearing false witness against the dead as against the living.

“It is remarkable that neither the sinner (Luke vii.) nor the adulteress who is spoken of in the 8th of John, are named in the sacred history, any more than the thief who was converted on the cross. There are particular reasons, beyond a doubt, and we may in part conjecture them, why the Holy Spirit has abstained from relating the names of these great sinners, although converted. It is not then for us to impose them; still less to appropriate them to persons whom the Scripture does not accuse of any enormous sins.”

That Egyptian penitent.—X. p. 672, col. 1.

St. Mary the Egyptian. This is one of those religious romances which may probably have been written to edify the people, without any intention of deceiving them. Some parts of the legend are beautifully conceived. An English Romanist has versified it in eight books, under the title of the Triumph of the Cross, or Penitent of Egypt. Birmingham, 1776. He had the advantage of believing his story, — which ought to have acted like inspiration.

The dreadful Tale!—X. p. 672, col. 2.

*Amava el Rey la desigual Florinda
En ser gentil, y desdeñosa dama,*

Que quiere amor, que quando un Rey se rinda
Desaenes puedan resistir su llama.
No fue de Grecia mas hermosa y linda
La que le dio por su desdicha fama,
Ni desde el Sagitario a Cynosura
Se vio en tanto rigor tanta hermosura.

Creció el amor como el desden crecía ;
Enojose el poder ; la resistencia
Se fue aumentando, pero no podía
Sufrir un Rey sujeta competencia .
Estendiose á furor la cortesía,
Los terminos passo de la paciéncia,
Haziendo los mayores desengaños
Las horas meses, y los meses años.

Cansado ya Rodrigo de que fuesse
Teórica el amor, y intentos vanos,
Sin que demostracion alguna huviesse,
Puso su gusto en practica de manos
Pues quien de tanto amor no le tuviesse
Con los medios mas fáciles y humanas,
Como tendria entonces sufrimiento
De injusta fuerza en el rigor violento ?

Ansias, congojas, lagrimas y voces,
Amenazas, amores, fuerza, injuria,
Pruévan, pelean, llegan, dan feroces
Al que ama, rabia, al que aborrece, furia ;
Discurren los pronosticos veloces,
Que ofrece el pensamiento o quien injuria ;
Rodrigo teme, y ama, y fuerza, y ella
Quanto mas se resiste, está mas bella.

Ya viste de jazmines el desmayo
Las aladas mejillas siempre hermosas,
Ya la verguenga del clavel de Mayo,
Alexandrinas, y purpureas rosas :
Rodrigo ya como encendido rayo,
Que no respeta las sagradas cosas,
Ni se ahoga en sus lagrimas, ni mueve
Porque se abrasse, o se conierta en nieve.

Rindiose al fin la femeníl floqueza
Al varonil valor y atrevimiento ;
Quedò sin lustre la mayor belleza
Que es de una costa Virgen ornamento :
Siguió á la injusta furia la tibieza.
Apareciöse el arrepentimiento,
Que viene como sombra del pecado,
Principios del castigo del culpado.

Fue con Rodrigo este mortal disgusto,
Y quedò con Florinda la vengança,
Que le propuso el echo mas injusto
Que de muger nuestra memoria alcanza :
Dizese que no ver en el Rey gusto,
Sino de tanto amor tanta mudança
Fue la ocasion, que la muger gozada
Mas siente aborrecida que forçada.

Jerusalem Conquistada, l. 6, ff. 132.

Lope de Vega quotes scripture in proof of the opinion expressed in this last couplet. 2 Kings, ch. xiii.

Old Barret tells the story as Ancient Pistol would have done : —

“ In Ulit’s time there regalized in Spain
One Roderick, king from the Gothians race’t ;
Into whose secret heart with silent strain
Instretcht the ’sturber of hart pudike chast,
Him enamoravizing of a peece,
A peece by Nature quaintly symmetrized,
Enfayd with beauty as Helen fair of Greece :
Count Julian’s daughter of bed-wedlockized,
Ycleaped Caba ; who in court sarshined
The rest, as Hesperus the dimmed stars.
This peece the king in his Love’s-closet shrined,
Survicting her by wile, gold, gems, or forced jars.”

It is thus related in the fabulous Chronicle : — “ Despues que el Rey ovo descubierto su coraçon a la Cara, no era dia que la no requiriesse una vez o dos, y ella se defendia con buena razon : empero al cabo como el Rey no pensava cosa como en esto, un dia en la siesta embio con un donzel suyo por la Cara ; y ella vino a su mandado ; y como en essa hora no avia en toda su camara otro ninguno sino ellas todos tres, el cumplimiento con ella todo lo que puso. Empero tanto sabed que si ella quisiera dar bozes que bien fuera vnda de la reyna, mas callosse con lo que el Rey quiso fazer.” — P. 1, c. 172.

In this fabulous Chronicle Roderick’s fall is represented as the work of his stars : — “ Y aunque a las erzes pensava el gran yerro en que tocara, y en la maldad que su coraçon avia cometido, tanto era el ardor que tenia que la olvidava todo, y esto acarrea va la molandanga que le avia de venir, y la destruycion de Espana que avia de aver comienzo para se hazer ; y quiero vos dezir que so constelacion no podía escusar que esto no passasse assi ; y ya Dios lo avia dexado en su discrecion ; y el por cosa que fuesse no se podía arredrar que no toposse en ello.” — P. 1, c. 161.

“ Certes,” says the fabulous Chronicle, “ he was a Lord of greater bounty than ever had been seen before his time. — He used to say, that if all the world were his, he would rather lose it than one friend ; for the world was a thing which, if it were lost, might be recovered ; but a friend once lost could never be recovered for all the treasure in the world. And because he was thus bountiful, all those of Spain were likewise ; and they had the fame of being the most liberal men in the world, especially those of the lineage of the Goths. Never a thing was asked at his hands, whether great or small, to which he could say no ; and never king nor other great lord asked aid of him that he denied, but gave them of his treasures and of his people as much as they needed. And doubt not, but that if fortune had not ordered that in his time the lineage of the Goths should be cut off, and Spain destroyed, there was no king or emperor whom he would not have brought into subjection ; and if the whole world ought to be placed in the power of one man, (speaking of worldly things,) there never was, nor will be, a man deserving to possess it, save he alone. But as envy is the beginning of all evil, and saw how great was the goodness of this king, she never rested till she had brought about that things should be utterly reversed, even till she had destroyed him. Oh what great damage to the world will it be when God shall consent that so much bounty, and courage, and frankness, and loyalty should be destroyed forever ! All nations ought to clad themselves in wretched weeds one day in the week to mourn for the flower of the world, and especially ought the people of Spain to make such mourning.” — Chronica del Rey Don Rodrigo, p. 1, c. 55.

And again, when the last battle is approaching, he praises the king : — “ Y el Rey era el mas esforçado hombre de coraçon que nunca se oyo dezir : y el mas franco de todo lo que podía aver ; y preciara mas cobrar amigos que no quanto tesoro pudiesse estar en su reyno, hasta el dia que creyo el consejo del traydor del conde Don Julian ; y a maravilla era buen cavallero que al tiempo que el no era rey, no se hallara cavallero que a la su bondad se yqualasse, y tanto sabed que sino por estas malandanças que le vinieron, nunca cavallero al mundo de tales condiciones fue ; que nunca a el vino chico ni grande que del se partiesse despagado a culpa suya.” — P. 1, c. 213.

The manner in which Florinda calls upon her father to revenge her is curiously expressed by Lope de Vega : —

*Al escribirle tiemblan pluma y mano,
Llega el agravio, la piedad retira,
Pues quanto escribe la vengança, tanto
Quiere borrar de la verguenga el llanto.*

*No son menos las letras que soldados,
Los ringlones yleras y esquadrones,
Que al son de los suspiros van formados
Haciendo las distoncias las diciones :
Los mayores caracteres, armados
Navios, tiendas, maquinas, pendones ;
Los puntos, los incisos, los acentos
Capitanes, Aferez y Sargentos.*

*Breve processo escribe, aunque el successe
Significar quezosa determina,*

Pero en tan breve causa, en tal processo

La perdición de España se fulmina.

Jerusalem Conquistada, l. 6, ff. 138.

I remember but one of the old poets who has spoken with compassion of Florinda. It is the Portuguese Bras Garcia Mascarenhas, a writer who, with many odd things in his poem, has some fine ones.

*Refresca em Covilham agente afita,
Nam se sabe que nome entam a honrara;
Mayto deposed foy Cava Julia dita,
Por nascer nella a destituda Cava.
Nam a deslustra, antes a acredita
Filha que a honra mais que hum Rey presava;
Hespanha culpe a força sem desculpa,
Nam culpe a bella, que nam teve culpa.*

Viriato Tragico, Canto ii. St. 118.

Wamba's wars — XII. p. 675, col. 1.

In the valuable history of this king by a contemporary writer, the following character of the French is given: —

“Hujus igitur gloriosis temporibus, Galliarum terra altrix perfidie infami denotatur elogio, que utique inestimabili infidelitatis febre vexata, genita a se infidelium depasceret membra. Quid enim non in illa crudele vel lubricum? ubi conjuratorum conciliabulum, perfidia signum, obscuritas operum, fraus negotiorum, venale judicium, et quod pejus his omnibus est, contra ipsum Salvatorem nostrum et Dominum, Judaeorum blasphemantium prostibulum habebatur. Hec enim terra suo, ut ita dixerim, partu, perditionis suae sibiim preparavit excidium, et ex ventris sui generatione viperea excretionis suae nutrivit decipulam. Etenim dum multo jam tempore his febrium diversitatibus ageretur, subito in ea unius nefandi capitis prolapsione turbo infidelitatis adsurgit, et concensio perfidie per unum ad plurimos transit.” — S. Julian, Hist. Wambæ, § 5. — Espana Sagrada, 6, 544.

The bath, the bed,

The vigil. — XII. p. 675, col. 2.

The Partidas have some curious matter upon this subject.

“Cleanliness makes things appear well to those who behold them, even as propriety makes them seemly, each in its way. And therefore the ancients held it good that knights should be made cleanly. For even as they ought to have cleanliness within them in their manners and customs, so ought they to have it without in their garments, and in the arms which they wear. For albeit their business is hard and cruel, being to strike and to slay; yet notwithstanding they may not so far forego their natural inclinations, as not to be pleased with fair and goodly things, especially when they wear them. For on one part they give joy and delight, and on the other make them fearlessly perform feats of arms, because they are aware that by them they are known, and that because of them men take more heed to what they do. Therefore, for this reason, cleanliness and propriety do not diminish the hardihood and cruelty which they ought to have. Moreover, as is aforesaid, that which appears without is the signification of what they have in their inclinations within. And therefore the ancients ordained that the squire, who is of noble lineage, should keep vigil the day before he receives knighthood. And after mid-day the squires shall bathe him, and wash his head with their hands, and lay him in the goodliest bed that may be. And there the knights shall draw on his hose, and clothe him with the best garments that can be had. And when the cleansing of the body has been performed, they shall do as much to the soul, taking him to the church, where he is to labor in watching and beseeching mercy of God, that he will forgive him his sins, and guide him so that he may demean himself well in that order which he is about to receive; to the end that he may defend his law, and do all other things according as it becometh him, and that he would be his defender and keeper in all dangers and in all difficulties. And he ought to bear in mind how God is powerful above all things, and can show his power in them when he listeth, and especially in affairs of arms. For in his hand are life and death, to give and to take away, and to make the weak strong, and the strong weak. And when he is making this prayer, he must be with his knees bent, and all the rest of the time on foot, as long as he can bear it. For the vigil of knights was not ordained to be a sport, nor for any thing else, except that they, and those who go there, should pray to God to protect them, and direct them in the right way, and support them, as men who are entering upon the way of death.” — Part. ii. Tit. 21, Ley 13.

“When the vigil is over, as soon as it is day, he ought first to hear mass, and pray God to direct all his feats to his service. And afterwards he who is to knight him shall come and ask him if he would receive the order of knighthood; and if he answereth yea, then shall it be asked him, if he will maintain it as it ought to be maintained; and when he shall have promised to do this, that knight shall fasten on his spurs, or order some other knight to fasten them on, according to what manner of man he may be, and the rank which he holdeth. And this they do to signify, that as a knight putteth spurs on the right and on the left, to make his horse gallop straight forward, even so he ought to let his actions be straight forward, swerving on neither side. And then shall his sword be girt on over his brial. — Formerly it was ordained that when noble men were made knights, they should be armed at all points, as if they were about to do battle. But it was not held good that their heads should be covered, for they who cover their heads do so for two reasons: the one to hide something there which hath an ill look, and for that reason they may well cover them with any fair and becoming covering. The other reason is, when a man hath done some unseemly thing of which he is ashamed. And this in no wise becometh noble knights. For when they are about to receive so noble and so honorable a thing as knighthood, it is not fitting that they should enter into it with any evil shame, neither with fear. And when they shall have girded on his sword, they shall draw it from out the scabbard, and place it in his right hand, and make him swear these three things: first, that he shall not fear to die for his faith, if need be; secondly, for his natural Lord; thirdly, for his country; and when he hath sworn this, then shall the blow on the neck be given him, in order that these things aforesaid may come into his mind, saying, God guard him to his service, and let him perform all that he hath promised; and after this, he who hath conferred the order upon him, shall kiss him, in token of the faith and peace and brotherhood which ought to be observed among knights. And the same ought all the knights to do who are in that place, not only at that time, but whenever they shall meet with him during that whole year.” — Part. ii. Tit. 21, Ley 14.

“The gilt spurs which the knights put on have many significations; for the gold, which is so greatly esteemed, he puts upon his feet, denoting thereby, that the knight shall not for gold commit any malignity or treason, or like deed, that would detract from the honor of knighthood. The spurs are sharp, that they may quicken the speed of the horse; and this signifies that the knight ought to spur and prick on the people, and make them virtuous; for one knight with his virtues is sufficient to make many people virtuous, and on the other hand, he ought to prick a perverse people to make them fearful.” — Tirante il Blanco, p. 1, C. 19, ff. 44.

The Hermit reads to Tirante a chapter from the Arbor de battaglie, explaining the origin of knighthood. The world, it is there said, was corrupted, when God, to the intent that he might be loved, honored, served, and feared once more, chose out from every thousand men one who was more amiable, more affable, more wise, more loyal, more strong, more noble-minded, more virtuous, and of better customs than all the others: And then he sought among all heasts for that which was the goodliest, and the swiftest, and which could bear the greatest fatigue, and might be convenient for the service of man; and he chose the horse, and gave him to this man who was chosen from the thousand; and for this reason he was called cavallero, because the best animal was thus joined to the most noble man. And when Romulus founded Rome, he chose out a thousand young men to be knights, and furno nominati militi porche mille furono fatti in un tempo cavalleri. — P. 1, C. 14, ff. 40.

The custom which some kings had of knighting themselves is censured by the Partidas. — P. ii. T. 21, L. 11. It is there said, that there must be one to give, and another to receive the order. And a knight can no more knight, than a priest can ordain himself.

“The qualifications for a knight, cavallero, or horse-soldier, in the barbarous stage of society, were three: 1st, That he should be able to endure fatigue, hardship, and privations. 2dly, That he should have been used to strike, that his blows might be the more deadly. 3dly, That he should be bloody-minded, and rob, hack, and destroy the enemy without compunction. The persons, therefore, who were preferred, were mountaineers, accustomed to hunting, — carpenters, blacksmiths, stone-cutters, and butchers. But it being found that such persons would sometimes run away, it was then discovered that they who were chosen for cavaliers ought to have a natural sense of shame. And for this reason it was appointed that they should be men of family.” — Partida, ii. T. 21, L. 2. Vegetius, l. 1, c. 7.

The privileges of knighthood were at one time so great, that if the goods of a knight were liable to seizure, they could not be seized where he or his wife were present, nor even where his cloak or shield was to be found. — Part. ii. Tit. 21, Ley 23.

Canciani (T. 3, p. 34) gives a representation of Roland from the porch of the Cathedral at Verona, which is supposed to have been built about the beginning of the ninth century. The figure is identified by the inscription on the sword, — Du-rin-dar-da. The lorica, which Canciani explains, Vestica bellica maculis ferreis contexta, is illustrated by this figure. It is a coat or frock of scale-mail reaching to the knees, and with half sleeves. The only hand which appears is unarmed, as far as the elbow. The right leg also is unarmed; the other leg and foot are in the same sort of armor as the coat. The end of a loose garment appears under the mail. The shield reaches from the chin to the middle of the leg; it is broad enough at the top to cover the breast and shoulder, and slopes gradually off to the form of a long oval.

*At every saddle-bow
A gory head was hung.* — XIV. p. 679, col. 1.

This picture frequently occurs in the Spanish Chronicles. Sigurd the elder, Earl of Orkney, owed his death to a like custom. “Suddenly clapping spurs to his horse, as he was returning home in triumph, bearing, like each of his followers, one of these bloody spoils, a large front tooth in the mouth of the head which hung dangling by his side, cut the calf of his leg, — the wound mortified, and he died. The Earl must have been bare-legged.” — Torfans, quoted in Edmonston's Views of the Zetland Islands, vol. i. p. 33.

“At the synod of Mascon, laymen were enjoined to do honor to the honorable clergy by humbly bowing the head, and uncovering it, if they were both on horseback, and by alighting also if the clergymen were a-foot.” — Pierre de Marca. Hist. de Bearn, l. i. ch. 18, § 2.

“Morales, (8, 23, 3), speaking of the Asturians, mentions, with wonder, their chairs, furniture, and granaries of basket-work, — las sillas y otras cosas de servicio recias y firmas que hacen entretexidas de mimbres y varas de avellano. Y aun a me no me espantaba en aquella tierra tanto esto como ver los graneros, que ellos llaman los horreos, fabricados desta misma obra de varas entretexidas, y tan tapidas y de tanta firmeza, que sufren gran carga como buenas paredes.”

Covadonga. — XVI. p. 684, col. 1.

The valley of Covadonga is thus described by the Conde de Salduña; — and the description is a fair specimen of his poem; —

*Yace de Asturias, donde el Sol infante
Sus montes con primaras luces baña,
De Covadonga el sitio, que triunfante
Cuna fue en que nacio la insigne España
Vierte en el Sela liquidos cristales
Con Buena y Deba, que de la montaña
Deben la vida a la fragosa copa,
A quien la antigüedad llamó de Europa.*

*Aqui la juventud de un bello llano
Compite a flores, luces de la esfera;
Y burlando el Invierno y el Verano
Eterna vive en el la Primavera:
Sobre sus glebas se derrama ufano
El prodigioso cuerno de la Fiera
De Amaltea, y aromas, y colores
Confunden las matices con olores.*

*Robustos troncos, con pobladas ramas
Vuelven el sitio rustica Alameda,
Y del Sol no permiten a las llamas
Lo espeso penetrar de la Arboleda:
Pierden sus rayos las ardientes famas,
Pues la frondosidad opuesta veda
La luz al dia, y denso verde muro
Crepusculo le viste al ayre puro.*

*Siguiendo la ribera de Peonia
Al Oriente Estival, y algo inclinado
A la parte que mira al medio dia,
Otro valle se ve mas dilatado:
A la derechu de esta selva umbria
Reynazo corre, que precipitado
Va a dar a Buena en liquidos abrazos
Su podre vena en cristalinos lazos.*

*Sin passar de Reynazo el successivo
Curso, dexando presto su torrente,
Con el cristal se encuentra fugitivo
De Deba, a quien la Cueva dio la fuente:
La admiracion aqui raro motivo
Ve, formando la senda su corriente,
Pues lo estrecho del sitio peñaseoso
Hace camino del licor undoso.*

*Hecho serpiente Deva del camino
En circulo se enrosca tortuoso,
Vomitando veneno cristalino
En el liquido aljofar proceloso:
En las orillas con vivaz destino,
En tosigo se vuelve, que espumoso
Inficiona lethal al pie ligero,
Quando le pisa incanto el passagero.*

*Ya de este valle cierran las campañas,
Creciendo de sus riscos la estatura,
Desmesuradas tanto las montañas
Que ofuscan ya del Sol la lumbre pura
Son rusticos los lados, las entrañas
Del valle visten siempre la hermosura*

*Fronsidad el ayre, y de colores
El suelo taze alfombra de primores.*

*Aunque los montes con espesas breñas
El lado al sitio forman horroroso,
Y contra su verdor desnudas peñas
Compiten de lo llano lo frondoso;
Pintados pajarillos dulces senas
Al son del agua en trino sonoro
De ignorados idiomas en su canto
Dan con arpados picos dulce encanto.*

*Lo último de este valle la alta sierra
De Coradonga ocupa, donde fuerte
Se expone el Heroe al juego de la guerra,
Su temor negro ocase de la suerte:
Los que animosos este sitio encierra
El ceño despreciando de la muerte,
Su pecho encienden en la altiva llama
Que no cabra en las trompas de la Fama.*

*De Diba en ella la preciosa fuente
Al llano brota arroyos de cristales,
Donde en pequeña balsa su corriente
Se detiene en suspensos manantiales:
Después se precipita su torrente
Quanto sus ondas enfrico neutrales,
Con sanorosa ruido de la peña
El curso de sus aguas se despeña.*

*Cierra todo este valle esta robusta
Peña, donde la Cucua está divina,
Que amenaza tajada a ser injusta
Del breve llano formidable ruina:
Parece quiere ser con saña adusta
Seca padron, y fiera se destina
A erigirse epitaño peñascosa,
Sepultanda su horror el sitio hermaso.*

*De piedra viva tan tremenda altura
Que la vista al mirarla se estremece;
Fasta greña se viste, y la hermosura
De la fertilidad seca aborrece:
Es tan desmesurada su estatura
Que estrecha el ayre, y barbara parece
Que quiere que la sirvan de Cimera
Las fulminantes luces de la Esphera.*

*Como a dos picas en la peña dura
Construye en circo una abertura rara,
De una pica de alto, y dos de anchara,
Rica de sombras su mansion avara:
Ventana, ó boca de la cueva obscura
Donde el Sol no dispensa su luz clara,
Tan corta, que su centro tenebroso
Aun no admite crepusculo dudosa.*

*En este sitio puez, donde compite
La rustiquez con las pintadas flores,
Puez la pelada sierra na permite
A la vista, sino es yertos horrores:
Por el contrario el llano que en si admite
De los bellos matices los primares,
Efecto siendo de naturaleza
La union en lo fealdad, y la belleza.*

*A tiorba de cristal las dulces aves
Corresponden en trinos amorosos,
Virtiendo en blando son tonos suaves
Ecos los ayres beben armoniosos:
Enmudecen su canto quando graves
Bemoles gorgoando mas preciosos,
Es maestro á la barbara Capilla
El Ruysenor, plumada maravilla.*

*Elige este distrita la Divina
Providencia á lo grave de la hazaña,
Pues aquí su justicia determina
La monarquía fabricar de Espana:*

*A las cortas reliquias, que á la ruina
Reservó su piedad, encicnde ca saña
Religiosa, que á Imperio sin regunda
Abra futura llave Nuevo Manilo.*

El Pelayo, Cant. iv

Christoval de Mesa also describes the scene.

*. Accercandose mas, oye el sonido
Del agua, con un manso y sordo ruido.*

*El qual era de quatro claras fuentes
Que estavan de la ermita en las esquinas,
Cuyas puras de plata aguas corrientes
Mostro la blanca Luna cristalinas;
Y corriendo por partes diferentes
Eran de grande maravilla dignas,
Y en qualquiera de todas por su parte
Naturaleza se esmero con arte.*

*La una mana de una viva pena,
Y qual si tambien fuera el agua viva,
Parte la bana, y parte se despeña
Con rapida corriente fugitiva:
Después distinto un larga arroyo enseña
Que por diversas partes se derriba,
Con diferente curso en vario modo,
Hasta que a donde nace buelve todo.*

*Otra, que alta descubre ancho Orizonte,
Como agraviada del lugar segundo
Sustenta un monstruo que parece un monte,
Qual Atlante que tiene en peso el mundo:
Y como sucle el caudaloso Oronte
Dar el ancho tributo al mar profundo,
Assi se arroja con furiosas ondas,
Por las partes mas bazas y mas hondas.*

*Sale bramanda la tercera fuente,
Como un mar, y después por el arena
Va con tan mansa y placida corriente
Tan grata y sosssegada, y tan screna,
Que a las fieras, ganados, peces, gente,
Puede aplacar la sed, menguar la pena,
Y da después la buelta, y forma el cuerno
De la Luna, imitando el curso eterno.*

*Nace la quarta de una gran caverna,
Y siguiendo su prospera derrota
Parece que por arte se gobierna,
Segun va destilando gota a gota:
No vido antigua edad, edad moderna
En region muy propinqua, ó muy remota,
Fuente tan peregrina, obra tan nueva,
En gruta artificiosa, ó tosca cueva.*

Mientras con el alma fixa
En sus querridos amores
Contemplandolos se alivia.*

Soledades de Busueo.

Fuller, the Worthy, has a beautiful passage in his Church History concerning "Primitive Monks with their Piety and Painfulness."—"When the furnace of persecution in the infancy of Christianity was grown so hot, that most cities, towns, and populous places were visited with that epidemical disease, many pious men fled into deserts, there to live with more safety, and serve God with less disturbance. No wild humor to make themselves miserable, and to choose and court their own calamity, put them on this project, much less any superstitious opinion of transcendent sanctity in a solitary life, made them willingly to leave their former habitations. For whereas all men by their birth are indebted to their country, there to stay and discharge all civil relations, it had been dishonesty in them like bankrupts to run away into the wilderness to defraud their country, their creditor, except some violent occasion (such as persecution was) forced them thereunto; and this was the first original of monks in the world, so called from μόνος, because living alone by themselves.

"Here they in the deserts hoped to find rocks and stocks, yea beasts themselves, more kind than men had been to them. What would hide and heat, cover and keep warm, served them for clothes, not placing (as their successors in after ages) any holiness in their habit, folded up in the affected fashion thereof. As for their food, the grass was their cloth, the ground their table, herbs and roots their diet, wild fruits and berries their dainties, hunger their sauce, their nails their knives, their hands their cups, the next well their wine-cellar; but what their bill of fare wanted in cheer it had in grace, their life being constantly spent in prayer, reading, musing, and such like pious employments. They turned solitariness itself into society; and cleaving themselves asunder by the divine art of meditation, did make of one, two or more, opposing, answering, moderating in their own bosoms, and busy in themselves with variety of heavenly recreations. It would do one good even but to think of their goodness, and at the rebound and second hand to meditate upon their meditations. For if ever poverty was to be envied it was here. And I appeal to the moderate men of these times, whether in the height of these woful wars, they have not sometimes wisht (not out of passionate distemper, but serious recollection of themselves) some such private place to retire unto, where, out of the noise of this clamorous world, they might have reposed themselves, and served God with more quiet."

XVIII. p. 688, col. 1.

"Je ne serois pas en grande peine," says Pierre de Marca, "de rechercher les noms des Evêques des Bearn, si la sainte et loable pratique des anciens Peres d'insérer dans les Diptyches, et coyers sacrés de chascune Eglise, les noms des Evêques orthodoxes, et qui estoient deçédés dans la communion de l'Eglise Catholique, eust esté continuée jusqu' aux derniers siècles. Et je pourrois me servir en cette rencontre du moyen que l'Empereur Justinian et le cinquième Concile General employerent, pour savoir si Theodore Evêque de Mopsuestie estoit reconnu apres sa mort pour Evêque de l'Eglise qu'il avoit possédée durant sa vie. Car ils ordonnerent a l'Evêque et au Clergé de cette ville, de revoir les Diptyches de leur Eglise, et de rapporter fidellement ce qu'ils y trouveroient. Ce qu' ayant executé diligemment, ils firent rapport qu' apres avoir faicillé quatre divers cayers en parchemin, qui estoient leurs Diptyches, ils y avoient trouvé le nom de tous les Evêques de ce siege; horsmis qu' en la place de Theodore, avoit esté substitué le nom de Cyrille, qui estoit le Patriarche d' Alexandrie; lequel presidant au Concile d' Ephese avoit condanné l'heresie de Nestorius et de Theodore de Mopsuestie. D'où il apert que les noms de tous les Evêques depuis l'origine et l'establissement de chascune des Eglises estoient enregistrés dans les cayers que l'on appelloit Diptyches, et que l'on les recitoit nom par nom en leur lieu, pendant la celebration de la Liturgie, tant pour tesmoigner la continuation de la communion avec les Evêques deçédés, que l'on avoit eü avec eux-mesmes vivans, qu' afin de procurer par les prieres publiques, et par l'efficace du Sacrifice non sanglant, en la celebration du quel ils estoient recommandés a Dieu, suivant l'ordonnance des Apôtres, un grand profit, soulagement, et rafraichissement pour leurs ames, comme enseignent Cyrille de Hierusalem, Chrysostome, et Epiphane." — Histoire de Bearn, l. 4, c. 9, § 1.

"Some time before they made oblation for the dead, it was usual in some ages to recite the names of such eminent bishops, or saints, or martyrs, as were particularly to be mentioned in this part of the service. To this purpose they had certain books, which they called their Holy Books, and commonly their Diptychs, from their being folded together, wherein the names of such persons were written, that the deacon might rehearse them as occasion required in the time of divine service. Cardinal Bona and Schelstrate make three sorts of these Diptychs; one wherein the names of bishops only were written, and more particularly such bishops as had been governors of that particular church: a second, wherein the names of the living were written, who were eminent and conspicuous either for any office and dignity, or some benefaction and good work, whereby they had deserved well of the church; in this rank were the patriarchs and bishops of great sees, and the bishop and clergy of that particular church; together with the emperors and magistrates, and others most conspicuous among the people: the third was the book containing the names of such as were deceased in Catholic communion. — These therefore were of use, partly to preserve the memory of such eminent men as were dead in the communion of the church, and partly to make honorable mention of such general councils as had established the chief articles of the faith: and to erase the names either of men or councils out of these Diptychs, was the same thing as to declare that they were heterodox, and such as they thought unworthy to hold communion with, as criminals, or some way deviating from the faith. Upon this account St. Cyprian ordered the name of Geminus Victor to be left out among those that were commemorated at the holy table, because he had broken the rules of the church. And Evagrius observes of Theodorus, Bishop of Mopsuestia, that his name was struck out of the Holy Books, that is, the Diptychs, upon the account of his heretical opinions, after death. And St. Austin, speaking of Cæcilia, Bishop of Carthage, whom the Donatists falsely accused of being ordained by Traditores, or men who had delivered up the Bible to be burned in the times of persecution, tells them that if they could make good any real charge against him, they would no longer name him among the rest of the bishops, whom they believed to be faithful and innocent, at the altar." — Bingham, b. 15, ch. 3, sect. 17.

Orary. — XVIII. p. 688, col. 2.

"The Council of Laodicea has two canons concerning the little habit called the Orarium, which was a scarf or tippet to be worn upon the shoulders; and might be used by bishops, presbyters, and deacons, but not by subdeacons, singers, or readers, who are expressly debarred the use of it in that council. — The first council of Braga speaks of the tunica and the orarium as both belonging to deacons. And the third council of Braga orders priests to wear the orarium on both shoulders when they ministered at the altar. By which we learn that the tunica or surplice was common to all the clergy, the orarium on the left shoulder proper to deacons, and on both shoulders the distinguishing badge of priests. — The fourth council of Toledo is most particular in these distinctions. For in one canon it says, that if a bishop, presbyter, or deacon, be unjustly degraded, and be found innocent by a synod, yet they shall not be what they were before, unless they receive the degrees they had lost from the hands of the bishops before the altar. If he be a bishop, he must receive his orarium, his ring, and his staff: if a presbyter, his orarium and planeta: if a deacon, his orarium and alba. And in another canon, that the deacon shall wear but one orarium, and that upon his left shoulder, wherewith he is to give the signal of prayers to the people. Where we may observe also the reason of the name orarium in the ecclesiastical sense ab orando, from praying, though in common acceptation it signifies no more than an handkerchief to wipe the face, and so comes ab ore, in which signification it is sometimes used by St. Ambrose and St. Austin, as well as by the old Roman authors. But here we take it in the ecclesiastical sense for a sacred habit appropriated to bishops, priests, and deacons, in the solemnities of divine service, in which sense it appears to have been a habit distinct from that of civil and common use, by all the authorities that have been mentioned." — Bingham, b. 13, c. 8, sect. 2.

Nor ware he mitre here,

Precious or auriphrygiate. — XVIII. p. 688, col. 2.

Mitra usus antiquissimus est, et ejus triplex est species: una quæ pretiosa dicitur, quæ gemmis et lapidibus pretiosis, vel laminis aureis, vel argenteis contexta esse solet; altera auriphrygiata sine gemmis, et sine laminis aureis vel argenteis; sed vel aliquibus parvis margaritis composita, vel ex serico albo auro intermixta, vel ex tela aurea simplici sine laminis et margaritis; tertia, quæ simplex vocatur, sine auro, ex simplici serica Damascena, vel alia, aut etiam linca, ex tela alba confecta, rubris laciniis seu frangiis et vittis pendentibus. Pretiosa utitur Episcopus in solemnioribus festis, et generaliter quoadcumque in officio dicitur hymnus Te Deum laudamus, &c. et in missa Gloria in excelsis Deo. Nihilominus in eisdem festis etiam auriphrygiata uti poterit, sed potius ad commoditatem quam ex necessitate: ne scilicet Episcopus nimis gravetur, si in toto officio pretiosa utatur: propterea usu receptum est, tam in Vesperis, quam in Missis, ut pretiosa utatur Episcopus in principio et in fine Vesperarum et Missarum solemnium, ac cumulo ad Ecclesiam et redeundo ab ea: et quando laetatur manus et dat benedictionem solemnem. Intermedio autem spatio loco pretiosa accipit auriphrygiatam. — Auriphrygiata mitra utitur Episcopus ab Adventu Domini usque ad festum Nativitatis, excepta Dominica tertia Adventus, in qua dicitur Introitus Gaudete, &c. ideoque in signum lætitiæ utitur tunc pretiosa. Item a Septuagesima usque ad feriam quartam majores hebdomadæ inclusive, excepta Dominica quarta Quadragesimæ, in qua dicitur Introitus Lætare, &c. The pall

“By the way, the pall is a pontifical vestment, considerable for the matter, making, and mysteries thereof. For the matter, it is made of lamb's wool and superstitution. I say of lamb's wool, as it comes from the sheep's back, without any other artificial colour, spun, say some, by a peculiar order of nunnes, first cast into the tombe of St. Peter, taken from his body, say others, surely most sacred if from both; and superstitiously adorned with little black crosses. For the form thereof; the breadth exceeded not three fingers, one of our bachelours' lambskin hoods in Cambridge would make three of them, having two labells hanging down before and behind, which the archbishops only, when going to the altar, put about their necks, above their other pontificall ornaments. Three mysteries were couched therein. First, Humility, which beautifies the clergy above all their costly copes. Secondly, Innocency, to imitate lamb-like simplicitie. And, Thirdly, Industry, to follow him who fetched his wandering sheep home on his shoulders. But to speak plainly, the mystery of mysteries in the pall was, that the archbishops receiving it shewed therein their dependance on Rome; and a note in this manner ceremoniously taken was a sufficient acknowledgement of their subjection. And as it owned Rome's power, so in after ages it increased their profit. For, though now such palls were freely given to archbishops, whose places in Britain for the present were rather cumbersome than commodious, having little more than their paines for their labour; yet in after ages the archbishop of Canterburie's pall was sold for five thousand florenes, so that the pope might well have the golden fleece if he could sell all his lamb's wool at that rate. Onely let me add, that the author of Canterbury-book stiles this pall Tanquam grande Christi Sacramentum. It is well tanquam came in to help it, or else we should have had eight sacraments.” — Fuller's Church History, page 71.

The relics and the written works of Saints, Toledo's choicest treasure, prized beyond All wealth, their living and their dead remains; These to the mountain fastnesses he bore Of unsubdued Cantabria, there deposed, One day to be the boast of yet unbuill Oviedo, and the dear idolatry Of multitudes unborn. — XVIII, p. 688, col. 1.

“Among those,” says Morales, “who then passed from Toledo to Asturias, was the archbishop of Toledo, named Urban. — He, with a holy foresight, collected the sacred relics which he could, and the most precious books of his own church and of others, determining to carry them all to the Asturias, in order that the holy relics might not be profaned or treated with little reverence by the infidels; and that the books of the Holy Scriptures, and of the ecclesiastical offices, and the works of our holy doctors, might not be lost. — And although many relics are mentioned which the archbishop then carried from Toledo, especial mention is made of a holy ark full of many and most remarkable relics, which through divers chances and dangers, had been brought from Jerusalem to Toledo, and of which all that is fitting shall be related in its place, if it please God that this history should proceed. It is also expressly said, that the cope which Our Lady gave to St. Ildefonso, was then carried to the Asturias with the other relics; and being so capital a relic, it was a worthy thing to write of it thus particularly. Of the sacred books which were saved at that time, there are specified the Holy Scriptures, the Councils, the works of St. Isidore, and St. Ildefonso, and of St. Julian the archbishop of Toledo. And as there is at this day in the church of Oviedo that holy ark, together with many others of the relics which were then removed, so do I verily believe that there are in the library of that church three or four books of those which were then brought from Toledo. I am led to this belief by seeing that they are written in a form of Gothic letters, which being compared with writings six hundred years old, are without doubt much older, and of characters so different, that they may well be attributed to the times of the Goths. One is the volume of the Councils, another is a Santoral, another contains the books of St. Isidore de Naturis Rerum, with other works of other authors. And there are also some leaves of a Bible. — To put these sacred relics in greater security, and avoid the danger of the Moors, they hid them in a cave, and in a sort of deep pit therein, two leagues from the city of Oviedo, (which was not at that time built,) in a mountain, which was for this reason called Montesaero. It is now by a slight corruption called Mensagro; and the people of that country hold the cave in great veneration, and a great romery, or pilgrimage, is made on St. Magdalen's day. — Morales, l. 12, c. 71.

The place where the relics were deposited is curiously described in the Romantic Chronicle. He found that in this land of Asturias there was a sierra, full great, and high, the which had only two entrances, after this manner. On the one entrance, there was a great river, which was to be passed seven times, and in none of those seven places was it fordable at any time, except in the month of July. And after the river had been crost seven times, there was an ascent of a long league up a high mountain, which is full of many great trees and great thickets, wherein are many wild beasts, such as bears and boars and wolves, and there is a pass there between two rocks, which ten men might defend against the whole world, and this is the one entrance. The other is, that you must ascend this great mountain, by a path of two full leagues in length, on the one side having always the river, and the way so narrow, that one man must go before another, and one man can defend the path in such manner, that no arbalist, nor engine of other kind, nor any other thing, can hurt him, not if the whole world were to come against him. And if any one were to stumble upon this path, he would fall more than two thousand fathoms, down over rocks into the river, which lies at such a depth that the water appears blacker than pitch. And upon that mountain there is a good spring, and a plain where there are good meadows, and room enough to raise grain for eight or ten persons for a year; and the snow is always there for company, enduring from one year to another. And upon that mountain the archbishop made two churches, one to the honour of St. Mary Magdalen, and the other to the honour of St. Michael, and there he placed all these reliques, where he had no fear that any should take them; and for the honour of these relics, the archbishop consecrated the whole mountain, and appointed good guard over the sacred relics, and left there three men of good life, who were willing to remain there, serving God, and doing penance for their sins.” — P. 2, c. 48.

Of the Camara Santa, Morales has given a curious account in his Journal: the substance, with other remarkable circumstances, he afterwards thus inserted, in his great history: —

“The other church (or chapel) which King Alonso el Casto ordered to be built on the south side of the Iglesia Mayor, (or cathedral,) was with the advocacy of the Glorious Archangel St. Michael. And in order that he might elevate it, he placed under it another church of the Virgin and Martyr St. Leocadia, somewhat low, and vaulted with a strong arch, to support the great weight which was to be laid upon it. The king's motive for thus elevating this church of St. Michael, I believe certainly to have been because of the great humidity of that land. He had determined to place in this church the famous relics of which we shall presently speak, and the humidity of the region is so great, that even in summer the furniture of the houses on high ground is covered with mold. This religious prince therefore elevated the church with becoming foresight for reverence and better preservation of the precious treasure which was therein to be deposited. For this reason they call it Camara, (the chamber,) and for the many and great relics which it contains, it has most deservedly the appellation of Holy. You ascend to it by a flight of twenty-two steps, which begin in the cross of the Iglesia Mayor, (or cathedral,) and lead to a vaulted apartment twenty feet square, where there is an altar upon which mass is said; for within there is no altar, neither is mass said there by reason of the reverence shewn to so great a sanctuary; and it may be seen that K. D. Alonso intended in his plan that there should be no altar within. In this apartment or outer chapel is a great arched door, with a very strong fastening; it leads to another smaller square chamber, vaulted also, with a square door, which also is fastened with another strong fastening, and these are the fastenings and keys which the Bishop Sampyro admires for their strength and security.

"The square door is the door of the Holy Chamber, which is in the form of a complete church, and you descend to it by twelve steps. The body of this church is twenty four feet in length, and sixteen in width. Its arched roof is of the same dimensions. The roof is most richly wrought, and supported upon six columns of divers kinds of marble, all precious and right beautiful, upon which the twelve apostles are sculptured, two and two. The ground is laid with Mosaic work, with variety of columns, representing jasper ware. The Bishop Sampyro had good reason to complain of the darkness of this church, which has only one small window in the upper part of the chapel; and, therefore, in this which we call the body of the church, there are commonly three silver lamps burning, the one in the middle larger than the other two, and many other lights are kindled when the relics are shewn. These are kept within a grating, which divides the chapel from the church. The chapel has two rich marbles at the entrance; it is eighteen feet in length, and its width somewhat less; the floor and the roof are after the same fashion as those of the church, but it is one estado lower, which in those times seems to have been customary in Asturias and in Galicia, the Capillas Mayores, or principal chapels, being much lower than the body of the church. The roof of the chapel is plain, and has painted in the middle our Saviour in the midst of the four evangelists; and this performance is so ancient, that it is manifestly of the age of the founder. At this iron grating strangers are usually detained; there is a lower one within of wood, to which persons are admitted who deserve this privilege for their dignity; and few there be who easter farther. This church the king built to remove to it, as accordingly he forthwith removed, the Holy Ark, the holy bodies, and the other great relics, which, at the destruction of Spain, were hidden in the cave and well of Monsagro, and for this cause he had it built with so much care, and so richly, and with such security. —

"I have described the Camara Santa thus particularly, that what I may say of the most precious relics which it contains may be the better enjoyed. I will particularize the most principal of them, beginning with the Holy Ark, which with great reason has deserved this name. It is in the midst of the chapel, close to the wooden grate, so that you can only go round it on three sides, and it is placed upon a stone pedestal, wrought with mouldings of a palm in height. It is a vara and a half (about five feet) in length; little less than a vara wide, and about as deep, that part which is of silver, not including the height which the pedestal gives it. The cover is flat, and it is covered in all parts with silver plates of some thickness, and gilt on some places. In the front, or that side which fronts the body of the church, it has the twelve apostles in more than half relief, and on the sides there are histories of Our Lady in the same silver-work. On the flat part of the cover there is a large crucifix engraved with many other images round about it. The sides are elaborately wrought with foliage, and the whole displays great antiquity. The cover has round about it four lines in the silver, which, however, are imperfect, the silver being wanting in some places. What they contain is this, as I have copied it faithfully, with its bad Latin and other faults: —

"*Omnis conventus populi Deo dignus catholici cognoscat, quorum inclitas veneratur reliquias, intra pretiosissima presentis archaelatera. Hoc est de ligno plurimum, sicut de cruce Domini. præditus fecit hoc receptaculum, sanctorum pignoribus insignitum argento deauratum, exterius adornatum non vilibus operibus: per quod post ejus vitam mereatur consortium illorum in celestibus sanctorum jubari precibus. Hæc quidem saluti et re — Here a large piece of the silver is gone. — Novit omnis provincia in terra sine dubio. — Here there is another great chasm. — Manus et industria clericorum et præsulum, qui propter hoc convenimus cum dicto Adfonsus Principe, et cum germana lætissima Urraca nomina dicta: quibus Redemptor omnium concedit indulgentiam et suorum peccatorum veniam, per hoc sanctorum pignora Apostolorum et Sancti Justi et Pastoris, Cosmæ et Damiani, Eulalie Virginis, et Marimi, Germani, Baudili, Pantaleonis, Cypriani et Justine, Sebastiani, Facundi et Primitivi, Christophori, Cucufati, Felicis, Sulpicii.

"This inscription, with its bad Latin and other defects, and by reason of the parts that are lost, can ill be translated. Nevertheless I shall render it, in order that it may be enjoyed by all. It says thus: Know all the congregation of Catholic people, worthy of God, whose the famous relics are, which they venerate within the most precious sides of this ark. Know then that herein is great part of the wood or cross of our Lord. Of his garment for which they cast lots. Of the blessed bread whereof he ate at the supper. Of his linen, of the holy handkerchief, (the Sudario;) and of his most holy blood. Of the holy ground which he then trod with his holy feet. Of the garments of his mother the Virgin Mary, and also of her milk, which is a great wonder. With these also there are many capital relics of saints, whose names we shall write here as we can. Saint Peter, St. Thomas, St. Bartholomew. Bones of the prophets, and of all the Apostles, and of many other saints whose names are known only to the wisdom of God. The noble King Don Alonso, being full of humble devotion for all these holy relics, made this repository. adorned and enobled with pledges of the saints, and on the outside covered with silver, and gilded with no little cunning. For the which may he deserve after this life the company of these Saints in heaven, being aided by their intercession. — These holy relics were placed here by the care and by the hands of many clergy and prelates, who were here assembled with the said King D. Alonso, and with his chosen sister called Donna Urraca. To whom may the Redeemer of all grant remission and pardon of their sins, for the reverence and rich reliquary which they made for the said relics of the Apostles, and for those of the Saints, St. Justus and Pastor, St. Cosme and St. Damian, St. Eulalia the Virgin, and of the Saints Maximus, Geronanus, Baudilus, Pantaleon, Cyprianus and Justina, Sebastian, Facundus and Primitivus, Christopher, Cucufatus, Felix and Sulpicius. —

"The sum of the manner in which this Holy Ark came into Spain is this, conformably to what is written by all our grave authors. When Cosroes the King of Persia, in the time of the Emperor Heraclius, came upon the Holy Land, and took the city of Jerusalem, the bishop of that city, who was called Philip, and his clergy, with pious forethought, secreted the Holy Ark, which from the time of the Apostles had been kept there, and its stores augmented with new relics, which were deposited therein. After the victory of Cosroes, the Bishop Philip, with many of his clergy, passed into Africa, carrying with them the Holy Ark: and there it remained some years, till the Saracens entered into that province also, and then Fulgentius the Bishop of Ruspina, with providence like that which had made Philip bring it to Africa, removed it into Spain. Thus it came to the Holy Church of Toledo, and was from thence removed to Asturias, and hidden in the cave of Monsagro: finally, King D. Alonso el Casto removed it to the Camara Santa; and afterwards K. D. Alonso the Great enriched it. Thus our histories write, and the same is read in the lessons on the festival of the coming of this Holy Ark, with a sermon proper for the day, and much solemnity, the service being said on the 13th of March, after vespers, above in the church of the Camara Santa. This is a most weighty testimony which the Holy Ark possesses of its own authenticity, and of the genuineness of the most great treasure which it contains. — These also are strong testimonies, that K. D. Alonso the Great should not only have made the Ark so rich, but that this king should also have fortified the city of Oviedo, surrounding it with walls, and making for it a castle, and building also the castle of Gauzon upon the shore, for the defence and security of this holy treasure, and for another end, as he left written upon the stone of which we have elsewhere spoken. Another testimony of great authority, is the great reverence which has been shewn to this Holy Ark, from the time which is spoken of by Alonso the Great in the inscription, to these our days. This is so great that no one has dared to open it, melancholy examples being related of some daring attempts which have been made. That which occurred in our days is not mournful, but rather of much devotion and holy joy. The most illustrious Señor D. Christoval de Rojas y Sandoval, who is now the most worthy Archbishop of Seville, when he was Bishop of Oviedo, determined to open the holy Ark. For this, as the singular devotion and most holy zeal for the glory of God which he has in all things, admonished him, he made such pious preparations as the fame of so celestial a treasure shewed to be necessary. He proclaimed solemnly a fast of forty days in his church and through all his diocese, commanding that prayers should be made to our Lord, beseeching him that he would be pleased with what was intended, his Most-Illustriousness giving the example, which is very common and very edifying in his church, in himself, and in the ministers thereof. Three days before the Sunday on which the Ark was to be opened, he ordered all persons to fast, and to make greater prayers with processions. When the day arrived, he said pontifical mass, and preached, infusing with his holy exhortations much of his own devout desires into the hearts of the hearers. The mass being finished, clad as he was, he ascended to the Camara Santa, with much outward solemnity, and with much fervor of devotion internally in his heart; and having there again renewed his humble prayers to our Lord, and quickened the ardor of that sacred desire which had influenced him; on his knees as he was before the Holy Ark, he took the key to open it. At the moment when he stretched out his hand to put the key in the lock, suddenly he felt such horror and dismay, and found himself so bereft of all power (tau impossibilitato) to move it in any way, that it was impossible for him to proceed, or do any thing but remain in that holy consternation, without having strength or ability for more. And as if he had come there to oppose and prevent that which purposely, and with so much desire and preparation, he had intended to do, he desisted from his intent, and gave it up, his whole holy desire being turned into a chill of humble shrinking and fear. Among other things which his most Illustrious Lordship relates of what he then felt, he says, that his hair stood up in such a manner and with such force, that it seemed to him, as if it lifted the mitre a considerable way from his head. Now, we all know that this famous prelate has vigor and persevering courage for all the great things which he undertakes in the service of our Lord; but in this manner the Holy Ark remained unopened then, and thus I believe it will always remain, fastened more surely with veneration and reverence, and with respect of these examples, than with the strong bolt of its lock.

"In the inscription of this Holy Ark, mention is made of the relics of St. Baudilus, and by reason that he is a Saint very little known, it will be proper to say something of him. This Saint is much revered in Salamanca and in Zamora, and in both cities he has a parochial church, and in Zamora they have a good part of his relics. They have so much corrupted the name, calling him St. Boal, that the Saint is now scarcely known by his own.

"They of the church say, that the cope of St. Idefonso, which Our Lady gave him, is in the Ark. This may well be believed, since our good authors particularly relate that it was carried to Oviedo with the Holy Ark, and with the other relics, and it does not now appear among them, and there is much more reason to think that it has been very carefully put away, than that it has been lost. Also they say, that when the celestial cope was put into the Holy Ark, they took out of it the piece of the holy Sudario, in which the head of our Redeemer was wrapped up for his interment, as is said in the inscription of the Ark. This is one of the most famous relics in all Christendom, and therefore it is most richly adorned, and reverently preserved, being shown only three times in the year with the greatest solemnity. The box in which it is kept is wrought without of gold and azure, with beautiful mouldings and pictures, and other ornaments of much authority. Within this there is a square piece of wood, covered entirely with black velvet, with silver handles, and other decorations of silver round about; in the hollow of this square, the holy Sudario is stretched and fastened upon the velvet; it is a thin linen cloth, three quarters long and half a vara wide, and in many places full of the divine blood from the head of our Redeemer, in divers forms and stains of various sizes; wherein some persons observe marks of the divine countenance and other particularities. I did not perceive this; but the feeling which came upon me when I looked at it is sufficient to make me believe any thing of it; and if a wretch like me was thus affected, what must it be with those who deserve of our Lord greater regalements on such an occasion! It is exhibited to the people three times in the year; on Good Friday, and on the two festivals of the Cross in May and in September, and there is then a great concourse from all the country, and from distant parts. This part of the cross of the church where the Camara Santa is, is richly hung, and in the first apartment of the Camara, a corridor is erected for this exhibition, which is closed that day with curtains of black velvet, and a canopy that extends over the varandas. The Bishop in his pontificals, with his assistants and other grave persons, places himself behind the curtains with the Holy Sudario, holding it by the silver handles, covered with a veil. The curtains are undrawn, and the quisters below immediately begin the Miserere. The Bishop lifts the veil, and at the sight of the Holy Sudario, another music begins of the voices of the people, deeply affected with devotion, which verily penetrates all hearts. The Bishop stands some time, turning the Sacred Relic to all sides, and afterwards the veil being replaced, and the curtains redrawn, he replaces the Holy Sudario in its box. With all these solemnities, the very Illustrious and most Reverend Señor, M. D. Gonzalo de Solorzano, Bishop of Oviedo, exhibited this Holy Relic on the day of Santiago, in the year of our Redeemer 1572, in order that I might bear a more complete relation of the whole to the King our Lord, I having at that time undertaken this sacred journey by his command.

"Another chest, with a covering of crimson and brocade, contains a good quantity of bones, and some pieces of a head; which, although they are very damp, have a most sweet odor, and this all we who were present perceived, when they were shown me, and we spoke of it as of a notable and marvellous thing. The account which they of the church give of this holy body is, that it is that of St. Serrano, without knowing any thing more of it. I, considering the great dampness of the sacred bones, believe certainly that it was brought up to the Camara Santa from the church of Leocadia, which, as it has been seen, is underneath it. And there, in the altar, the great stone-chest is empty, in which King Alonso el Casto enclosed many relics, as the Bishop Sampyro writes. For myself I have always held for certain, that the body of St. Leocadia is that which is in this rich chest. And in this opinion I am the more confirmed since the year 1580, when such exquisite diligence has been used by our Spaniards in the monastery of St. Gislano, near Mons de Henao in Flanders, to verify whether the body of St. Leocadia, which they have there, is that of our Saint. The result has been, that it was ascertained beyond all doubt to be the same; since an authentic writing was found of the person who carried it thither by favor of one of our earliest kings, and he carried it from Oviedo without dispute; because, according to my researches, it is certain that it was there. Now I affirm, that the king who gave part left part also; and neither is that which is there so much, that what we saw at Oviedo might not well have been left, neither is this so much but that which is at Mons might well have been given.

"In the church below, in a hollow made for this purpose, with grates, and a gate well ornamented, is one of the vessels which our Redeemer Jesus Christ filled with miraculous wine at the marriage in Galilee. It is of white marble, of an ancient fashion, more than three feet high, and two wide at the mouth, and contains more than six arobas. And forasmuch as it is in the wall of the church of K. Alonso el Casto, and all the work about it is very ancient, it may be believed that the said king ordered it to be placed there." — Coronica General de Espana, l. 13, b. 40.

Morales gives an outline of this vessel in his Journal, and observes, that if the Christians transported it by land, particular strength and the aid of God would have been necessary to carry it so many leagues, and move it over the rugged mountains of Europa; — but, he adds, it might have come by water from Andalusia or Portugal, and in that case this would have been a land journey of only four or five leagues. In his Journal, Morales mentions certain other relics of which the church of Oviedo boasted, but for which he required better evidence than could be adduced for them. Such were a portion of Tobit's fish, and of Samson's honey-comb, with other such things, which, he says, would lessen the credit of the Ark, where, according to the Bishop of Oviedo, D. Pelayo, and Sebastian, Bishop of Salamanca, they were deposited. Of these precious relics he says nothing in his history, neither does he mention a piece of Moses's rod, a large piece of St. Bartholomew's skin, and the sole of St. Peter's shoe, all which he enumerates in his Journal, implying rather than expressing his doubts of their authenticity. As a scrupulous and faithful antiquary, Morales was accustomed to require evidence, and to investigate it; and for these he could find no other testimony than tradition and antiquity, which, as presumptive proofs, were strong corroborants of faith, but did not suffice of themselves. The Holy Ark has all the evidence which he required, and the reverence with which he regarded it, is curiously expressed in his Journal. "I have now," he says, "described the material part of the Camara Santa. The spiritual and devout character which it derives from the sacred treasures which it contains, and the feeling which is experienced upon entering it, cannot be described without giving infinite thanks to our Lord, that he has been pleased to suffer a wretch like me to enjoy it. I write this in the church before the grating, and God knows I am as it were beside myself with fear and reverence, and I can only beseech God to give me strength to proceed with that for which I have no power myself." — T. 10, Viage, p. 91.

Morales, like Origen, had given in his youth a decisive proof of the sincerity of his religious feelings, and it sometimes seems as if he had emasculated his mind as well as his body. But with all this abject superstition, he was a thoroughly pious and good man. His life is deeply interesting, and his writings, besides their great historical and antiquarian value, derive additional interest from the picture of the author's mind which they so frequently display. The portrait prefixed to the last edition of his work is singularly characteristic.

When the Sueves and Alans overran Spain, they laid siege to Lisbon, and the Saints Maxima, Julia, and Verissimus, (a most undoubted personage,) being Lisbonians, were applied to by their town's people to deliver them. Accordingly a sickness broke out in the besiegers' camp, and they agreed to depart upon payment of a sum of money. Bernardo de Brito complains that Blondus and Sabellicus, in their account of this transaction, have been so careless as to mention the money, and omit the invocation of the Saints. — *M. "Les anciennes armes estoient parlantes, comme l'on void en celles des Comtes de Castille, et des Ruis de Leon, qui prindrent des Chateaux et des Lions, pour signifier les noms vulgaires des Provinces, par le blason de leurs armes; qui ne se reportent pas a l'ancienne denomination de Castulo et de Legio, chés Plin." — Pierre de Marca, Hist. de Beam, l. 1, c. 12, § 11.

"The lion's grinders are, relevées de trois pointes un peu creusées dans leur centre, dans lesquelles les speculatifs croyent voir la figure d'une fleur de lys. Je n'ay garde de dire le contraire," says P. Labat, "il est permis a bien des gens de voir dans les nuës et dans les charbons ardents tout ce qu'il plaît à leur imagination de s'y représenter; pourquoy ne sera-t-il pas libre de voir sur les dents du Lion la figure des fleurs de lys? Je doute que les Espagnols en conviennent, eux qui prennent le Lion pour les armes et le symbole de leur monarchie; car on pourroit leur dire que c'est une marque que sans le secours de la France, leur Lion ne seroit pas fort a craindre." — Afrique Occidentale, T. ii. p. 14.

There is a place at Toledo called la Alcurnia. "El nombre de Alcurnia es Arabigo, que es dezir cosa de euerno, o en forma de euerno, lo que Christianos llamavan foz, o hoz de Tajo. Llamase assi porque desde que este rio passa por debaxo de la puente de Alcontara, va haziendo una buelta y torcedura, que en una escritura antigua se llama hoz de Tajo. Lo mesmo acontecio a Arlança cerca de Lora, de donde se llamo la hoz de Lara, como la nota Ambrosio de Morales; y en el Reyno de Toledo ay la hoz de Jucar." — Francisco de Pisa. *Amid our deserts we hunt down the birds

The Moors have a peculiar manner of hunting the partridge. In the plains of Akkermute and Jibbel Hiddid in Shedma, they take various kinds of dogs with them, from the greyhound to the shepherd's dog, and following the birds on horseback, and allowing them no time to rest, they soon fatigue them, when they are taken by the dogs. But as the Mooselmin eats nothing but what has had its throat cut, he takes out his knife, and exclaiming Bismillah, in the name of God, cuts the throat of the game. — Jackson's Morocco, p. 121.

*A hasty grave, scarce hidden there from dogs
And ravens, nor from wintry rains secure.*

XXII. p. 698, col. 1.

In composing these lines I remembered a far more beautiful passage in one of the Eclogues of the Jesuit Bussieres: —

*Artesias ruit ecce furcus, finesque propinquos
Insultans, stragem agricolis fugientibus infert.
Quid facerem? matrem, ut potui, tenerumque puellum
Raptabam, et mediis abdubam corpora silvis.
Aspera jam frigebat hyems, frondosaque quercus
Pro tecto et latebris ramos præbebat opacos;
Algentem fori matrem; fovet illa rigentem
Infantem gremio. Sub prima crepuscula lucis
Progredior, tectum miseris si forte pateret:
Silvam fusus eques telis infensus habebat;
Bona fugio, et capio compendia tuta viarum.
Conditur atra dies; caelo nox horrida surgit.
Quam longis mihi nox misero producit horis.
Quos genitus fletusque dedi: quam proxima votum
Lux fait! heu tristi lux infensissima clade!
Currebam ad notam quercum per devia tesqua.
Dux amor est. Annam video, puerumque jacentem
Affixam uberibus, dure succumbere morti.
Ipsa parens, postquam ad vocem conversa vocantis
In me amplexantem morientia lumina fixit,
Eluctantem animam glaciato corpore mittit.
Obrigui, frigusque novum penetravit in ossa:
Felix, si simili potuissem occumbere letho;
Sors infesta vetat. Restabat cura sepulchri,
Quo foderem ferrum decrat; miserabile corpus
Frondebis obtexi, puerum nec ab ubere vulsi
Sicut erat foliis tegitar; funusque paratur,
Heu nimis incertum, et primis violabile ventis.*

... their white signal-flag. — XXIII. p. 700, col. 1.

A white flag, called El Alem, the signal, is hoisted every day at twelve o'clock, to warn the people out of hearing, or at a great distance, to prepare, by the necessary preliminary ablations, to prostrate themselves before God at the service of prayer. — Jackson's Morocco, p. 149.

The Humma's happy wings have shadowed him.

XXIII. p. 700, col. 2.

The humma is a fabulous bird. The head over which its shadow once passes will assuredly be encircled with a crown. — Wilkes, S. of India, v. i. p. 423.

Among the Prerogatives et Propriétés singulières du Prophète, Gagnier states that, "Il est vivant dans son Tombeau. Il fait la prière dans ce Tombeau à chaque fois que le Crieur en fait la proclamation, et au même tems qu'on la recite. Il y a un Ange posté sur son Tombeau qui a le soin de lui donner avis des Prières que les Fidèles font pour lui." — Vie de Mahomet, l. vii. c. 18.

The common notion, that the impostor's tomb is suspended by means of a loadstone, is well known. Lahat, in his Afrique Occidentale, (T. ii. p. 143), mentions the lie of a Marabout, who, on his return from a pilgrimage to Mecca and Medina, affirmed, "que le tombeau de Mahomet étoit porté en l'air par le moyen de certains Anges qui se relayent d'heure en heures pour soutenir ce fardcau." These fables, however, are modest in comparison with those which the Franciscans and Dominicans have invented to magnify their founders.

Hast thou not heard

*How, when our clay is leaven'd first with life,
The ministering Angel brings it from that spot
Whercon 'tis written in the eternal book
That soul and body must their parting take,
And earth to earth return? — XXIII. p. 701, col. 2.*

The Persians, in their creed, have a pleasant imagination concerning the death of men. They say that every one must come and die in the place where the Angel took the earth of which he hath been made, thinking that one of these spirits has the care of forming the human creature, which he doth by mingling a little earth with the seed. — Thevenot.

They perish, all their thousands perish there.

XXIII. p. 702, col. 1.

The battle of Covadonga is one of the great miracles of Spanish history. It was asserted for many centuries, without contradiction, and is still believed by the people, that when the Moors attacked Pelayo in the cave, their weapons were turned back upon themselves; that the Virgin Mary appeared in the clouds, and that part of a mountain fell upon the Infidels, and crushed those who were flying from the destruction. In what manner that destruction might have been effected, was exemplified upon a smaller scale in the Tyrol, in the memorable war of 1809.

Barret sums up the story briefly, and in the true strain of Mine Ancient.

The Sarr'cen, hearing that th' Asturianites
Had King created, and stood on their guard,
Sends multitudes of Mohametized knights
To rouse them out their rocks, and force their ward.
Pelagius, hearing of this enterprise,
Prepares his petty power on Anseve mount;
Alchameh comes with Zazen multiplies,
Meaning Pelagius' forces to dismount.
To blows they come; but lo! a stroke divine.
The Iber, few, beats numbrous Sarracene,
Two myriads with Mahomet went to dine
In Parca's park.

The Bread of Life. — XXIV. p. 704, col. 1.

It is now admitted by the best informed of the Romish writers themselves, that, for a thousand years, no other but common or leavened bread was used in the Eucharist. The wafer was introduced about the eleventh century. And as far down as the twelfth century, the people were admitted to communicate in both kinds.

And let no shame be offer'd his remains. — XXV. p. 705, col. 2.

According to the Comendador Fernan Nunez, in his Commentary upon the Trezientas, the tomb of Count Julian was shown in his days about four leagues from Huesca, at a castle called Loarri, on the outside of a church, which was in the castle.

His wonted leathern gipion. — XXV. p. 706, col. 1.

The Musical Pilgrim in Purchas thus describes the Leonese: —

Wymmen in that land use no vullen,
But alle in lether be the wounden:
And her hevedez wonderly ben trust,
Standing in her forheved as a crest,
In rould clouthkez lappet alle be forn
Like to the prikke of a N'unicorn.
And men have doubelettez full schert,
Bare legget and light to stert. — P. 1231

Purchas supposes this very curious poem to have been written about 200 years before he published it, i. e. about 1425

It is probably much older. In entering Castille from Elvas, the author says,

Now into Castell schall we fare
Over the river, the land is bare
Full of heath and hunger also,
And Sarasneyz Governouriz theroeto.

Now Badajoz, and that part of the country, was finally recovered from the Moors in the early part of the thirteenth century. Purchas perhaps judged from the age of the manuscript, which may have been written about the time on which he fixes, and the language modernized by the transcriber.

*The light which o'er the fields of Bethlehem shone,
Irradiated whole Spain.* — XXV. p. 706, col. 2.

“Fallamos en las estorias que aquella ora que nuestro Señor Jesu Christo nascio, seyendo media noche, apareció una nure sobre España que dio tan gran claridad, e tan gran resplandor, e tan gran calor, como el sol en medio del día quando va mas opotrado sobre la tierra. E departen los sabios e dizen que se enticude por aquella que despues de Jesu Christo vernie sa mandadero a España a predicar a los gentiles la ceguedad en que estavan, e que los alumbraric con la fec de Jesu Chrysto, e aquesto fue San Pablo. Otros departen que en España avie de nascer un prinçipe chrystiano que seric señor de todo el mundo, e valdric mas por el todo el linoje de los omes, bien como esclorecio toda la tierra por la claridad de aquella nure en quanto ella duro.” — Coronica General, ff. 71.

A more extraordinary example of the divine favor towards Spain is triumphantly brought forward by Francisco de Pisa. “Our Lord God,” says he, “has been pleased to preserve these kingdoms in the purity of the Faith, like a terrestrial Paradise, by means of the Cherubim of the Holy Office, which, with its sword of fire, has defended the entrance, through the merits and patronage of the most serene Virgin Mary the Mother of God.” Ha sido servido nuestro Señor Dios conservar estos reynos de España en la cetereza de la Fe, como a un Parayso tyrrrenal, mediante el Cherubin del Santo Officio, que con su espada de fuego les ha defendido la entrada por los meritos y patrocinio de la serenissima Virgen Maria Madre de Dios.” — Desc. de Toledo, L. 1, C. 25.

This passage is truly and lamentably characteristic.

The Oaken Cross. — XXV. p. 707, col. 1.

The oaken cross which Pelayo bore in battle is said to have been preserved at Oviedo, in the Camara Santa, in company with that which the angels made for Alfonso the Great, concerning which Morales delivers a careful opinion, how much of it was made by the angels, and how much has been human workmanship. The people of Cangas, not willing that Pelayo's cross should be in any thing inferior to his successor's, insist that it fell from Heaven. Morales, however, says, it is more certain that the king had it made to go out with it to battle at Covadonga. It was covered with gold and enamel in the year 908; when Morales wrote, it was in fine preservation, and doubtless so continued till the present generation. Upon the top branch of the cross there was this inscription: Suseptum placide mancat hoc ia honore Dei, quod offerant famuli Christi Adelfousus Princeps et Scemena Regina. On the right arm, Quisquis auferre hæc donaria nostra presumpserit, fulmine divino intereat ipse. On the left, Hoc opus perfectum est, concessum est Sancto Salvatore Oveticensis Sedis. Hoc signo tuetur pius, hoc signo vincitur inimicus. On the foot, Et operatum est in Castello Gauzon anno Regni nostri XVII discurrente Era DCCCCXLVI.

“There is no other testimony,” says Morales, “that this is the cross of King Don Pelayo, than tradition handed down from one age to another. I wish the king had stated that it was so in his inscription, and I even think he would not have been silent upon this point, unless he had wished to imitate Alonso el Casto, who, in like manner, says nothing concerning the Angels upon his cross.” This passage is very characteristic of good old Ambrosio.

Like a mirror sparkling to the sun. — XXV. p. 709, col. 1.

*O, who could tell what deeds were wrought that day,
Or who endure to hear!* — XXV. p. 709, col. 1.

I have nowhere seen a more curious description of a battle between Christians and Saracens than in Barret's manuscript:

The forlorn Christian troops Moon'd troops encharge,
The Mooned troops requite them with the like;
Whilst Grecian lance cracks (thundering) Parthian targe,
Parth's flame-flash arrow Grecian through doth prick:
And whilst that Median scymetar unlimbs
The Christian knight, doth Christian curtle-axe
Unhead the Median horsemen; whilst here dims
The Pagan's goggling-eyes by Greekish axe,
The Greek unhorsed lies by Persian push,
And both all rageful grapple on the ground.
And whilst the Saracen with furious rush
The Syrian shocks, the Syrian as round
Down shouldreth Saracen: whilst Babel blade
Sends soul Byzantine to the starred cell,
Byzantine pike with like-employed trade,
Packs Babel's spirit posting down to hell.

*Who from their thirsty sands
Pray that the locusts on the peopled plain
May settle and prepare their way.* — XXV. p. 709, col. 1.

The Saharawans, or Arabs of the Desert, rejoice to see the clouds of locusts proceeding towards the north, anticipating therefrom a general mortality, which they call elkhere, the good, or the benediction; for, after depopulating the rich plains of Barbary, it affords to them an opportunity of emanating from their arid recesses, in the desert, to pitch their tents in the desolated plains, or along the banks of some river. — Jackson's Morocco, p. 106.

*But where was he whose hand
Had wielded it so well that glorious day?* — XXV. p. 709, col. 2.

The account which the Romantic Chronicle gives of Roderick after his disappearance, is in so singular a strain of fiction, that I have been tempted to translate it. It strikingly exemplifies the doctrine of penance, of which monastic history supplies many instances almost as extraordinary as this fable

Chap. 238. — How the King Don Rodrigo left the battle and arrived at a hermitage, and of that which befell him.

“Now when the King Don Rodrigo had escaped from the battle, he began to go as fast as he could upon his horse along the banks of the Guadalete, and night came on, and the horse began to fail by reason of the many wounds which he had received; and as he went thus by the river side deploring the great ruin which had come upon him, he knew not where he was, and the horse got into a quagmire, and when he was in he could not get out. And when the king saw this he alighted, and stript off all his rich arms and the furniture thereof, and took off his crown from his head, and threw them all into the quagmire, saying, Of earth was I made, and even so are all my deeds like unto mud and mire. Therefore my pomp and vanity shall be buried in this mud till it has all returned again to earth, as I myself must do. And the vile end which I have deserved will besee me well, seeing that I have been the principal cause of this great cruelty. And as he thus stript off all his rich apparel, he cast the shoes from his feet, and went his way, and wandered on towards Portuga; and he travelled so far that night and the day following, that he came to a hermitage near the sea, where there was a good man who had dwelt there serving God for full forty years; and now he was of great age, for he was well nigh a hundred years old. And he entered into the hermitage, and found a crucifix therein, being the image of our Lord Jesus Christ, even as he was crucified, and for the remembrance of Him, he bent both his knees to the ground, and clasped his hands, weeping and confessing his sins before God, for he weened not that any man in the world saw or heard him. And he said thus, O very Lord who by thy word hast made all the world from nothing which it was, and hast created all things, those which are visible to men, and those which are invisible, the heavenly as well as the earthly, and who didst incarnate thyself that thou mightst undergo thy passion and death, to save those who firmly put their trust in thee, giving up thy holy ghost from thy glorified body upon the tree of the true cross, — and who didst descend into Hell, and deliveredst thy friends from thence, and didst regale them with the glory of Heaven: And afterwards thy holy spirit came again into that most holy body, which thou wast pleased to take upon thee in this world; and, manifesting thyself for the true God which thou wert, thou didst deign to abide in this dark world forty days with their nights, and then thou didst ascend into thy heavenly glory, and didst enlighten with the grace of the Holy Ghost thy beloved disciples. I beseech thee, O Lord, that thou wouldst enlighten me, a king in tribulation, wretched and full of many sins, and deserving all evils; let not the soul which is thine, and which cost thee so dear, receive the evil and the desert of this abominable flesh; and may it please thee, O Lord, after the downfall, destruction, perdition, and desolation, which I, a miserable king, have suffered in this world, that my disconsolate soul may not be forgotten by thee, and that all this misery may be in satisfaction for my errors. And I earnestly beseech thee, O Lord, that thy grace may breathe upon me, that in this world I may make satisfaction for my sins, so that at the Great Day of Judgment I may not be condemned to the torments of hell.

“Having said these words, weeping as though he would burst, he remained there a long hour. And when the Hermit heard him say all this, he was greatly astonished, and he went unto him. And when the King saw him he was little pleased; howbeit after he had talked with him, he would rather have found him there than have been restored again to the great honor which he had lost; for the Hermit comforted him in such wise in this his tribulation, that he was right well contented; and he confessed unto him, and told him all that concerned him. And the Hermit said to him, King, thou shalt remain in this hermitage, which is a remote place, and where thou mayst lead thy life as long as it shall please God. And for me, on the third day from hence, I shall pass away out of this world; and thou shalt bury me, and thou shalt take my garments, and fulfil the time of a year in this hermitage. Take no thought as to provision for thy support, for every Friday thou shalt have it after the same manner as I, and thou shalt so husband it, that it may suffice thee for the whole week; that flesh which hath been fostered in great delight shall suffer abstinence, lest it should grow proud; and thou shalt endure hunger and cold and thirst in the love of our Lord, that he may have compassion upon thee. Thy station till the hour of sleep must always be upon that rock, where there is an oratory facing the east; and thou shalt continue the service of God in such manner as God will direct thee to do. And take heed that thy soul fall not into temptation. And since thou hast spoken this day of penitence, to-morrow thou shalt communicate and receive the true body of our Lord Jesus Christ, who will be thy protection and support against the enemy and the persecutor. And put thou thy firm trust in the sign of the Cross; and thus shalt thou please thy Savior.

“Many other things the holy Hermit said, which made the King right joyful to hear them; and there they continued till it was the hour for sleep. And the holy Hermit showed him his bed, and said, When I shall have left the company, thou wilt follow the ways which I have followed, for which our Lord will have mercy upon thee, and will extend his hand over thee, that thou mayst persevere in good, and in his holy service. And then they laid down and slept till it was the hour of matins, when they should both arise. And the Hermit awoke him, for as the King had not slept for a long time, and was moreover full weary, he would not have awaked so soon, if the Hermit had not roused him; and they said their hours. And when it was time, the Hermit said mass, and the King heard it with great devotion, and communicated with great contrition, and remained in prayer for the space of two hours. And the hour for taking food came, and the Hermit took a loaf which was made of pannick and of rye, and gave half thereof to the King, and took for himself the other half: And they ate little of it, as men who could not eat more, the one by reason of age, and the other because he was not used to such fare. And thus they continued till the third day, when the holy Hermit departed this life.

“On the third day, the pious Hermit expired at the same hour which he had said to the King, whereat the King was full sorrowful, as one who took great consolation in the lessons which he gave. And when he had thus deceased, the King by himself, with his hands, and with an oaken stick which was there, made his grave. And when he was about to bury him, he found a writing in his hand; and he took it and opened it, and found that it contained these words.

“O King, who through thy sins hast lost the great honor in which thou wert placed, take heed that thy soul also come not into the same judgment which hath fallen upon thy flesh. And receive into thy heart the instructions that I shall give thee now, and see that thou swerve not from them, nor abatest them a jot; for if thou observest them not, or departest in ought from them, thou wilt bring damnation upon thy soul; for all that thou shalt find in this writing is given thee for penance, and thou must learn with great contrition of repentance, and with humbleness of patience, to be content with that which God hath given thee to suffer in this world. And that thou mayst not be deceived in case any company should come unto thee, mark and observe this and pass in it thy life. Thou shalt arise two hours after midnight, and say thy matins within the hermitage. When the day breaks thou shalt go to the oratory, and kneeling upon the ground, say the whole hours by the breviary, and when thou hast finished them thou shalt say certain prayers of our Lord, which thou wilt find therein. And when thou hast done this, contemplate then upon the great power of our Lord, and upon his mercy, and also upon the most holy passion which he suffered for mankind upon the cross, being himself very God, and maker of all things; and how with great humility he chose to be incarnate in a poor virgin, and not to come as a king, but as a mediator among the nations. And contemplate also upon the poor life which he always led in this world, to give us an example; and that he will come at the day of judgment to judge the quick and the dead, and give to every one the meed which he hath deserved. Then shalt thou give sustenance to thy flesh of that bread of pannick and rye, which shall be brought to thee every Friday in the manner that I have said; and of other food thou shalt not eat, although it should be given or sent thee; neither shalt thou change thy bread. And when thou hast eaten give thanks to God, because he has let thee come to repentance; and then thou shalt go to the oratory, and there give praise to the Virgin our Lady holy Mary, mother of God, in such manner as shall come to thee in devotion. If, when thou hast finished, heaviness should come upon thee, thou mayst sleep, and when thou shalt have rested as long as is reasonable, return thou to thy oratory, and there remain, making thy prayers always upon thy knees, and for nothing which may befall thee depart thou from thence, till thou hast made an end of thy prayers, whether it rain or snow, or if a tempest should blow. And for as much as the flesh could sustain so many mundane pleasures, so must it suffer also celestial abstinences; two masses thou hast heard in this hermitage, and in it, it is God's will that thou shalt hear no more, for more would not be to his service. And if thou observest these things, God will have compassion upon thy deserts. And when the King had read this, he laid it upon the altar, in a place where it would be well preserved.

“ Now when the King had made a grave in which to bury the Hermit, the Devil was troubled at the good course which the King had taken, and he cast about for means how he might deceive him ; and he found none so certain as to come to him in the figure of a hermit, and keep company with him, to turn him aside from those doctrines which the Hermit had given him, that he might not fulfil his penitence. And the King being in great haste to bury the body, the Devil came to him with a long white beard, and a great hood over the eyes, and some paternosters hanging from his girdle, and supporting himself upon a staff as though he were lame, and could not go. And when he came where the King was, he humbled himself, and said unto him, Peace be with thee ! And the King turned toward that side from which he came, and when he saw him of so great age, he thought that it was some holy man who knew of the death of the Hermit, and was come to bury him ; and he humbled himself, and went towards him to kiss his hand, and the Devil would not, saying, It is not fitting that a King should kiss the hand of a poor servant of God. And the King was astonished at hearing himself named, and believed that this must needs be a man of holy life, and that he spake by some revelation ; nevertheless, he said, I am not a king, but a miserable sinner, for whom it had been better never to have been born, than that so much evil should have happened through me. And the false Hermit said to him, Think not that thou hast so much fault as thou imaginest in what has now been done, for even if thou hadst had no part in it, this destruction would have fallen at this time. And since it was ordained that it should be so, the fault is not thine ; some fault thou hadst, but it was very little. And think not that I speak this of myself ; for my words are those of a spirit made and created by the will of God, who speaks through me this and many other things, which hereafter thou shalt know, that thou mayst see how God has given me power that I should know all thy concerns, and counsel thee in what manner thou shouldst live. And albeit I have more need of rest than of labor, by reason of my age, which is far greater than my countenance shows, yet I have disposed myself to labor for the love of thee, to console thee in this thy persecution, knowing that this good man was about to die. Of a truth you may believe that on this day month I was in Rome, being there in the church of St. John de Lateran, out of which I had never gone for thirty years, till I came now to keep thee company according as I am commanded. Marvel not that a man of so great age, and crippled as I am, should have been able to traverse so much land in so short time, for certes I tell thee that he who speaks in this form which thou seest, has given me strength to go through so great a journey ; and sans doubt I feel myself as strong now as on the day when I set forth. And the King said to him, Friend of God, I rejoice much in thy coming, for that in my misfortunes I shall be by thee consoled and instructed in that which must be done to fulfil my penitence ; I rejoice also that this holy Hermit here shall receive burial from the hands of a man much more righteous than I. And the false Hermit said, Think not, King, that it is for the service of God to give to any person a name not appertaining to him. And this I say because I well know the life of this person, what it was ; and as thou knowest nothing of celestials, thou thinkest that as the tongue speaketh, even such is the heart. But I tell thee the habit doth not make the monk, and it is from such persons as these that the saying arose which is common in the world, I would have justice, but not for my own house. This I say to thee, because he commanded thee to perform a penance such as never man did, the which is, that thou shouldst eat only once a day, and that of such bread that even the shepherds’ dogs would not eat it ; and of this that thou shouldst not eat as much as thou couldst ; and appointed thee the term of a year that thou shouldst continue in this diet. Also he commanded thee that thou shouldst not hear mass during the time that thou abidest here, for that the two masses which thou hast heard should suffice ; look now if that doctrine be good, which bids a man forget the holy sacrament ! Certes I tell thee that only for that which he commanded thee to observe, his soul is consigned to a place where I would not that thine should go for all the world, if it were in my power, with all its riches.

Nevertheless, to be rid of the ill smell which he would give, it is fit that you should bury him, and while you do this I will go for food. And the King said, Friend of God, do not take this trouble, but remain still, and before noon there will come food, which will suffice for you and for me ; help me now to give burial to this good man, which will be much for the service of God, although he may have been a sinner. And the false Hermit answered, King, it would be less evil to roll him over these rocks into the sea ; but if not, let him lie thus upon the earth till the birds and the beasts devour his flesh. And the King marvelled at this : nevertheless though he believed that this false Hermit was a servant of God, he left not for that to bury the good Hermit who there lay without life, and he began by himself to carry him to the grave which he had made. And as he was employed in burying him, he saw that the false Hermit went away over the mountains at a great rate, not as one who was a cripple, but like a stout man and a young ; and he marvelled what this might mean.

Ch. 212. — How King Don Rodrigo informed himself concerning the penance which he was to perform, from the writing which the holy Hermit left him.

“ When the King had finished burying the good servant of God, he went to the altar, and took the writing in his hand, and read it to inform himself well of it. And when he had read it, he saw that of a certainty all that was said therein was for the service of God, and was of good doctrine for his soul ; and he said, that, according to the greatness of his sins, it behoved that his penitence must be severe, if he wished to save his soul. And then he called to mind the life which St. Mary Magdalen endured, for which God had mercy on her. And forthwith he went to his oratory, and began his prayers ; and he remained there till it was near noon ; and he knew that he had nothing to eat, and awaited till it should be brought him.

“ After it was mid-day the false Hermit came with a basket upon his shoulders, and went straight to where the King was, and he came sweating and weny. And the King had compassion on him, howbeit he said nothing, neither did he leave his prayers. And the false Hermit said to him, King, make an end of thy prayers, for it is time to eat ; and here I bring food. And the King lifted up his eyes and looked toward him, and he saw that there came into the hermitage a shepherd with a wallet upon his back, and he thought this must be he who brought him that which he was to eat. And so in truth it was, that that shepherd brought every Friday four loaves of pannick and rye for the holy Hermit, upon which he lived during the week. And as this shepherd knew not that the good man was dead, he did no more than put his bread upon the altar, and go his way. And the King, when he had ceased praying, rose up from the oratory, and went to the false Hermit. And he found the four loaves, and he took one, and brake it in the middle, and laid by the rest carefully, and he went out of the hermitage into the portal, where there was a table full small, and he laid a cloth upon it, and the bread which he was to eat, and the water ; and he began to bless the table, and then seated himself. And the false Hermit noted well how he blest the table, and arose from where he was, and went to the King, and said, King, take of this poor fare which I have brought, and which has been given me in alms. And he took out two loaves which were full white, and a roasted partridge, and a fowl, of which the legs were wanting ; and he placed it upon the table. And when the King saw it, his eyes were filled with tears, for he could not but call to mind his great honor in former times, and how it was now fallen, and that his table had never before been served like this. And he said, addressing himself to the Lord, Praised be thy name, thou who canst make the high low, and the low nothing. And he turned to his bread, and did eat thereof. And though he had great hunger, yet could he scarcely eat thereof, for he had never used it till in that hermitage, and now it seemed worse by reason of the white bread which that false Hermit had brought. And the false

Hermit, who saw that he gave no regard neither to the bread, nor the meat which he had brought, said to the King, Why eatest thou not of this which God has sent thee? and the King said, I came not to this hermitage to serve God, but to do penance for my sins, that my soul may not be lost. And the penance which is given me in this life, I must observe for a year, and not depart from it, lest it should prove to my great hurt. And the false Hermit said, How, King, hath it been given thee for penance, that thou shouldst let thyself die for despair? The Gospel commands not so; contrariwise it forbids man to do any such penance through which the body might be brought to death; for if in killing another, he who causes the death is held for a murderer, much more is he who killeth himself; and such thou wouldst be. And now through despair thou wouldst let thyself die of hunger, that thou mightst no longer live in this world, wherefore I say eat of this food that I have brought thee some little, that thou mayst not die. And with that he began to eat right heartily. And the King, when he beheld him, was seized with affection to do the like, howbeit he was withheld, and would eat nothing thereof. And as it was time when he would drink of the water, the false Hermit said to him, that he should drink of the wine; and the King would only taste of that water; and as he went to take of it, the false Hermit struggled with him, but he could not prevail, and the King did according to his rule, and departed not from it. And when he had eaten, he began to give thanks to God. And the false Hermit, who saw that he would have to cross himself at arising from the table, rose up before him, as one who was about to do something; and the King heeded it not. And when he had thus eaten, he went to the oratory, and began to give praises to the Virgin Mary, according as the good man had commanded him, when that traitor went to him and said, Certes this doctrine which thou holdest is no way to serve God, for sans doubt when the stomach is heated with food the will shall have no power to pray as it ought; and although the tongue may say the prayers, the heart confirms them not, being hindered by the force which nature derives from the food. Therefore I say to thee that thou oughtest to sleep first; for whilst thou art sleeping the food will settle, and the will will then be more able for contemplation. Moreover, God is not pleased with prayers without contrition, as with one who speaketh of one thing, and hath his heart placed on another, so that he can give no faith to the words which he beginneth. If thou wouldst be saved, O King, it behoves thee to listen to me; and if thou wilt not believe me, I will depart and leave thee, as one who will take no counsel, except from himself. And the King replied, If I should see that thou confirmedst the good manner of life whereof my soul hath need, according as it was appointed by the good man whom I have buried, then would I follow thy way. But I see that thy life is not that of a man of abstinence, nor of one who forsakes worldly enjoyments for the love of God; rather it seemeth by what I see in thee that thy life is a strengthening of worldly glory; for thou satisfiest thy flesh with good viands as I was wont to do, when I was puffed up with the vanities of the world. Wherefore I will in no wise follow thy way, for I see that thou art a worldly man, who deceivest God and the world, and when it comes to the end thou thyself wilt be deceived.

“The false Hermit said to him, For what reason art thou certain that the rule which this deceiver whom thou hast buried appointed for thee, will be salvation for thy soul, and that what I say to thee is not of a truth? Thou understandest me not well: I never forbade thee that thou shouldst hear mass, as he has done; for this is one of the good things that man may every day see his Savior and adore him. And seeing that he forbade thee to do this, thou mayst be certain that as he deceived his own soul, he would deceive thine also. For at the hour when man passeth away out of the world, he would fain that that same hour should be the end of all the world; and thus that enemy did, for where he went, thither he would draw thee also. Now since God hath given thee sense and reason, thou mayst clearly understand that his counsel and doctrine are deceitful, and what thou oughtest to do.

Ch. 245. — Of the reply which the King made to the Devil.

“Sans doubt, said the King, he forbade me not that I should hear mass; but because he commanded me that I should fulfil my penance here for the term of a year, as he knew the hour of his own death, so also he knew that no other person who could say mass would come to this hermitage within the year; and, therefore, he said to me, that in this hermitage I should not hear mass, but he never forbade me from hearing it.

Ch. 246. — Of the reasoning which the false Hermit made to King Don Rodrigo.

“The false Hermit said, Now thou thyself manifestest that he was not so worthy as a man ought to be who knows that which is to come. For according to thy words, he knew not that I should come here, who can say mass if I please; and if there be good judgment in thee, thou wilt understand that I must needs be nearer to God, because I know all which he had commanded thee to do, and also how he was to die. And I can know better in what place he is, than he who has commanded thee to observe this rule, knew concerning himself while he was here. But this I tell thee, that as I came to teach thee the way in which thou shouldst live, and thou wilt not follow my directions, I will return as I came. And now I marvel not at any thing which has befallen thee, for thou hast a right stubborn heart; hard and painful wilt thou find the way of thy salvation, and in vain wilt thou do all this, for it is a thing which profiteth nothing.

“Good man, said the King, all that thou shalt command me to do beyond the rule which the holy Hermit appointed me, that will I do; that in which my penance may be more severe, willingly will I do it. But in other manner I will not take thy counsel; and as thou hast talked enough of this, leave me, therefore, to my prayers. And then the King bent his knees, and began to go on with his rule. And the false Hermit, when he saw this, departed, and returned not again for a month; and all that time the King maintained his penance, in the manner which had been appointed him. And by reason that he ate only of that black bread, and drank only water, his flesh fell away, and he became such that there was not a man in the world who would have known him. Thus he remained in the hermitage, thinking of no other thing than to implore the mercy of God that he would pardon him.

Ch. 248. — Of what the false Hermit said to King Don Rodrigo to dispart him from his rule.

“King Don Rodrigo living thus, one day, between midnight and dawn, the false Hermit came to the hermitage; and not in the same figure as before, but appearing more youthful, so that he would not be known. And he called at the door, and the King looked who it might be, and saw that he was habited like a servant of God, and he opened the door forthwith. And they saluted each other. And when they saw each other, the false Hermit greeted the King, and demanded of him where the father was; and the King answered, that for more than a month there had been no person dwelling there save himself. And the false Hermit, when he heard this, made semblance as if he were afflicted with exceeding grief, and said, How came this to be, for it is not yet six weeks since I came here and confessed my sins to the father who abode here, and then departed from this hermitage to my own, which is a league from hence? And King Don Rodrigo said, Friend, know that this Hermit is now in Paradise, as I believe, and I buried him with my own hands: and he showed him the place where he lay. And when he went there he began to kiss the earth of the grave, and to make great dole and lamentation over him. And when some half hour had past, he withdrew, making semblance as if he wished to say his hours. And before the King had finished to say his, he came to him, and said, Good man, will you say mass? And the King answered, that he never said it. Then, said the false Hermit, Hear me then in penitence, for I would confess. And the King seeing that it was for the service of God to hear him in penitence, they seated themselves both at the foot of the altar. And when the false Hermit spake, it appeared that he had no sin to confess: for he began to relate many great services which he had done to God, as well in the life which he led as in other things. And before the King could absolve him he rose up, and asked if things were ready for the mass. And the King said that he knew not, and bade him look. It was now time that he should go to his oratory. And the false Hermit asked him that he should assist him in saying mass, and then he should hear it. And the King said, that for nothing in the world would he leave to fulfil his penance, according as it had been appointed him: and he went to his oratory. And the false Hermit made as if he put on the vestments and all the ornaments, and began to say mass, to the end that he might deceive the King, and make him cease to observe his penance, and come to adore the mass. And he made a watery cloud arise, so that it rained heavily where the King was. And when he saw that he could in no ways entice him, then he went to him, and said, Good man, for that you may be placed out of danger in cases which at all times will happen, seeing that you are alone, I have consecrated the body of Jesus Christ, that you may adore it every day, since you may not hear mass; and thus you may fulfil your penance as a faithful Christian. And with that he dispeeded himself, saying, In the coffer upon the altar you will find the Corpus Christi: when you rise from hence go and adore it. When he had said this, he went his way. And the King believed that what he said was true, and held that he was a good man, and of holy life.

“Now when the King had ended his prayers, which he used to say every day before he took his food, he saw a good man come towards him, clad in white garments, and with a fresh countenance and a cheerful, and a cross upon his breast. And as he arrived where the King was, he blest him; and when the King saw him he perceived that it was a revelation of God, and he joined his hands and placed himself on his knees upon the ground, weeping plentifully. And the holy man said, King, who art desirous of heavenly glory, continue the service which thou art performing for the love of my holy name; and take heed lest the enemy overcome thee, as he who many times hath overcome thee, whereby thou hast come to what thou now art. And believe none of all those who may come to thee here, for they come for no other cause but only to deceive thee, and withdraw thee from the service which thou dost me. And always observe the rule given thee by the holy man whom thou buriedst; for I am content with it, and thy soul shall receive refreshment if thou observest it. Come here, and I will show thee how the Devil thought to deceive thee, that thou mightst adore him. Then the King arose and went, alway upon his knees, following the Holy Spirit of God; and when he was within the hermitage, our Lord spake and said, Depart from hence, thou cursed one, and go thy way, for thou hast no power to deceive him who continues in my service. Get thee to the infernal pains which are suffered by those who are in the ninth torment! And at that hour the King plainly saw how from the ark, which was upon the altar, there went out a foul and filthy devil, with more than fifty tails, and as many eyes, who, uttering great yells, departed from the place. And the King was greatly dismayed at the manner in which the false Hermit had deceived him. And the Holy Spirit of God said to him, King, let thy hope be in my name, and I will alway be with thee, so thou wilt not let thyself be vanquished by the enemy. Then the Holy Spirit of God departed, and the King remained full joyful and greatly comforted, as if he had been in celestial glory. And thus he continued his life for nearly two months.

“The King was in his oratory one Sunday toward nightfall, just as the sun was setting, when he saw a man coming toward him, clad in such guise as is fitting for one who follows arms. And as he looked at him, he saw that it was the Count Don Julian who approached; and he saw that behind him there came a great power of armed people. And the false Count, when he drew nigh, made obeisance to him; and the King was amazed at seeing him, for he knew him well: nevertheless he remained still. And the false Count came to him, and would have kissed his hand, but the King would not give it, neither would he rise up from the oratory: and the false Count knelt upon the ground before him, and said, Sir, forasmuch as I am he who sinned against thee like a man who is a traitor to his Lord, and as I did it with great wrath and fury, which possessed my heart through the strength of the Devil, our Lord God hath had compassion upon me, and would not that I should be utterly lost, nor that Spain should be destroyed, nor that thou, sir, shouldst be put down from thy great honor and state, and the great lordship which thou hadst in Spain. And he has shown me, in a revelation, how thou wert here in this hermitage doing this great penance for thy sins. Wherefore I say to thee, that thou shouldst do justice upon me, and take vengeance according to thy will, as upon one who deserves it, for I acknowledge that thou wert my lord, and also the great treason into which I have fallen. Wherefore, sir, I pray and beseech thee by the one only God, that thou wilt take the power of Spain, which is there awaiting thee, and that thou wilt go forth to defend the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, and suffer not that poor Spain should be utterly destroyed, seeing that thou canst defend it and protect it. And then Count Julian drew his sword, and gave it to the King, saying, Sir, take this my sword, and with thine own hand do justice upon me, and take such vengeance as thou pleasest; for I will suffer it with much patience, seeing I have sinned against thee. And the King was greatly troubled at this sight, and at his words also, and knew not what he should do, neither what he should say. Howbeit, presently he called to mind what the Holy Spirit of God had said to him, how he should take heed lest the Devil should subdue him; and so he said nothing, but continued in his prayer. And the false Count Don Julian said to him, Sir, wilt thou not turn for the Holy Faith of Jesus Christ, which is utterly going to destruction? rise up and defend it, for I bring thee a full great power; and thus thou wilt serve God and recover the honor which thou hadst lost. Rise then and go forth, and have pity upon miserable Spain, which is about to be lost; and have compassion also upon so many people as are perishing for want of a Lord who should defend them. Now all these words were only meant to deceive him, for it was the Devil who had taken the form of Count Don Julian, and not the Count himself. But the King could no longer restrain himself from replying, and he said, Go you, Count, and defend the land with this force which you have assembled, even as you went to destroy it by the great treason which you committed against me and against God. And even as you brought the men, who are enemies of God and of his Holy Faith, and led them into Spain, so now thrust them out and defend it; for I will neither slay you, nor assist you in it. Leave me to myself; I am no longer for the world, for here I will do penance for my sins. Urge me, therefore, no more with these reasons. And the false Count Don Julian rose, and went to the great company which he had brought there, and brought them all before the King. And the King, when he beheld that great company of knights, saw some among them whom he surely thought had been slain in battle. And they all said to him with loud voices, Sir, whom wilt thou send us, that we may take him for our King and Lord to protect and defend us, seeing that thou wilt not defend the land, neither go with us? Wouldst thou give us thy nephew the Infant Don Sancho? He is dead. What then wouldst thou command us that we should do? Look to it well, sir; it is no service of God that thou shouldst let perish so great a Christianity as is every day perishing, because thou art here dwelling in this solitude. Look to it, for God will require an account at thy hands: thou hadst the charge of defending them, and thou lettest them die. And tell us what course shall we take. And when the King heard these words he was moved to compassion: and the tears came into his eyes, so that he could not restrain them; and he was in such state that his thoughts failed him, and he was silent, and made no reply to any thing that they could say. And all these companies who saw him complained so much the more, and sent forth great cries, and made a great tumult and uproar, and said, O miserable King, why wilt thou not rouse thyself for thy own sake, and for that of all thy people whom thou seest without a Lord? and thou wilt not even speak a word to comfort them, and tell them what they shall do. And all this while the King did nothing but weep, and answered them never a word. And when this vile race saw that they could not take him from thence, and that he answered them nothing, and that they could not overcome him by whatever they might do, they went forthwith from the mountain down into a plain, which was then made to appear before the King, and there they drew up their battles in such guise as the King Don Rodrigo was used to darrain them. And eft-soon he saw great multitudes of strange people, who came from the other side, and they began a battle so fierce and so cruel, that the King thought he had never seen one like it. And the one party put the other to the worst, and followed after them in pursuit. And then there came messengers to the King, telling him that his people had conquered, and had slain many of the enemy; but the King was confounded, and as it were beside himself, and heeded not, neither did he know what they said, and he answered nothing. And then they all went away, and seemed to the King that the one were pursuing the others, and this continued till the first crowing of the cock. And the King recovered his senses: howbeit he knew not whether it was a vision, or if it had indeed happened; but he called to mind that he had not completed the prayers which he made every day; and he began them again and finished them. And when he had finished, great part of the night was past, and he laid himself down to sleep. And then for three months he had no other temptation.

“The King was saying his prayers at the hour of vespers on a Tuesday, when he saw people on horseback coming toward him: and as they were about the reach of a cross-bow from him, he saw that they alighted, and that there came toward him a woman, who was full nobly clad; and when she came near, he knew her that she was La Cava, the daughter of Count Don Julian, and she seemed to him more beautiful than he had ever before seen her in his life. And when she drew nigh, she humbled herself, and said, Sir, what fortune has brought you to this wretched life in which you have so long continued? And the King held his peace, and said nothing. And that false Cava said, Sir, it is a month since a holy man, clad in white garments, and having a red cross upon his breast, appeared to me when I was with my father Count Don Julian in Toledo; where he now holds the seat of the lordship of Spain, as he who, by force of arms, has subdued the Moors, and killed or made captives of them all. At the hour when this holy man appeared to me, I was alone in my chamber, having great sorrow in my heart, because I had no certain news where you was, and whether your soul continued to live in this world, or in another. And, moreover, I was full sorrowful, because of the death of my Lady the Queen Eliaca, your wife, who is now deceased. And for these things my heart was full sorrowful, and in great trouble with griefs and thoughts, which came to me I know not from whence, and I was like one hereft of his judgment. And while I was contemplating in this state, the holy man appeared to me in such wise as I have said, and said to me, Of what art thou taking thought? Cease to lament, for without me thou canst do nothing certain of that which thou desirest. But that the dominion of Spain may not pass away from the power of the Gotths, and that he who shall have it may descend from thy seed, and be of the generation of King Don Rodrigo, it is my will that thou shouldst know where he is, and that thou shouldst go to him, and that he should go in unto thee, and that thou shouldst conceive of him a son, and shalt call his name Felbersan, the which shall be such a one that he shall reduce under his forces all the earth which is below the firmament. Depart, therefore, from hence, and go to the place where he is, and make no tardiance: for thus it becometh for the service of God, and for the weal and protection and defence of the land. And I said to him, Sir, how can this be which you tell me, seeing that King Don Rodrigo is dead; for his enemies slew him when they won the battle in which the great chivalry of Spain perished.

And he said to me, Cava, think not he is dead, for he liveth and passeth his life alone in a hermitage; of the which thy father Count Don Julian will certify thee, for he went to seek him there, and found him there when he overcame the Moors. He will tell thee that he is alive, and in what place is the hermitage wherein he abideth. And I said to him, But if King Don Rodrigo passeth his life after this manner in the service of God, he will not approach me that I may conceive of him this son who shall prove so good. And since it thus pleases you, give me a sign by which I may show him that this is pleasing to God, and that he may do this which you say, seeing so great good is to follow from it. And, moreover, he will be brought to such weakness that he will not be able to obey, by reason of the great abstinence to which his body has been subjected during his continuance there. And the holy man said to me, Care not for this, for God will give him strength; and thou shalt say to him for a sign that he may believe thee, how I told him that he should take heed lest the enemy deceive him, and how I bade the Devil depart from the altar where he was in the ark instead of the Corpus Christi, for that he should adore him. When thou tellest him this he will believe thee, and will understand that it is by the command of God. And when he had said these words he disappeared, so that I saw him no more; and I remained for a full hour, being greatly comforted, because I knew of your life, so that it seemed to me there were no other glory in this world. And when I came to myself I went incontinently to my father Count Don Julian, and told him all that had befallen me with the holy man who came in that holy vision; and I asked him if he knew aught concerning you. And he told me how he had gone to you with all his chivalry to bid you come out from thence to defend your country, which the enemies had taken from you, and that you would not; but rather commended it to him that he should undertake it, and defend the land and govern it, and that it grieved him to think that you would not be alive, because of the great abstinence which you imposed every day upon your flesh: nevertheless, since it pleases our Lord that I should have a son by you, who should be so good a man that he should recover all Spain, he would have me go to this place, where I should find you if you were alive; and right content would he be that there should remain of you so great good. And I, sir King, seeing how it pleased God that this should be accomplished, according as I have said, am come here in secret, for neither man nor woman knoweth of this, save my father Count Don Julian; for I have told my people who came with me to remain yonder, because I would go and confess to a holy man who had made his abode here more than fifty years. Now, since God is the author of this, recover yourself, and remember the time when you told me that there was nothing in the world which you loved so much as me, nor which you desired so greatly as to obtain a promise of me, the which I could not give at that hour, by reason that the Queen was living, and I knew it to be great sin. And if I come to you now, it is by command of God, for it pleases him to send me here; and, also, because the Queen is no longer in this present life. And because you are so fallen away of your strength, let us go into the hermitage, or I will order a tent to be placed here, and let us sup together, that your heart may revive and you may fulfil the command of God.

Ch. 252. — How the Devil would have deceived King Don Rodrigo, if the Holy Spirit had not visited and protected him.

“As the King heard all this, his whole body began to tremble, and his soul within him also; and all sense and power passed away from him, so that he was in a trance, and then it was revealed to him that he should take heed against that temptation. And the false Cava, who saw him thus entranced, made many burning torches of wax come there, by reason that it was cold, and because that the King should derive heat; also there was a pavilion pitched there, and a table set within it with many viands thereon, and all the people who came with her were seen to lodge themselves far away upon the mountain. And when he had recovered himself, he saw that the false Cava was drest in a close-fitting kirtle, which came half way below the knee, and she seemed to him the fairest woman that he had ever seen in his life, and it appeared to the King that she said to him, Here, sir, come and take your supper. And the King began again to tremble and lose his judgment, and fell into such a state that he knew not where he was, and it was revealed to him in that hour that he should guard against the temptation. And when he came to himself he saw that the pavilion was spread over his head; and seeing himself in that place, he looked for the oratory, and perceived that it was where it used to be; and within the pavilion he saw the false Cava, who was there with him, and that she was standing beside a bed, which was a full rich one, and that she began to take off her kirtle, and remained in her shift only, and with her long hair, which reached to her feet; and she said to him, See, sir, here in your power that which you most desired, and which is now awaiting you. Rejoice, then, and take heart, and do that which God has appointed, and which will recover Spain, and recompense the losses, and sorrows, and wrongs, which you have endured. And then she turned toward the King, for the Devil thought thus to tempt him, and make him break the penance which he had begun; and certes I ween there was no living man who would not right gladly have approached her. And then before him, in his sight, she began to comb and to plait her golden locks. And the King, seeing how beautiful she was, began to tremble all over, as if he had been struck with palsy; and he lost his judgment again, and became entranced, and remained thus a long while before he came again to himself. And it was revealed to him again that he should take heed how the Devil tempted him, and that he should have firm hope in God, and not break the penance which the holy Hermit had appointed him. But ever when he recovered from these trances, he forgot all which had been revealed to him while he was entranced; and now he found that there was a large estrado placed by him, and that La Cava was lying there beside him on some pillows, which were richly wrought in gold, undrest, as he had seen her, and that she said to him, Come, sir, for you tarry long, and it will soon be day-break. And the King seeing her so near him, then he was greatly troubled, yet could he not withdraw his eyes from her: but he called to mind how the Holy Spirit of God had bade him that he should always confide in his name, and place his true hope in the sign of the cross. And he clasped his hands, and lifted them towards Heaven, and weeping bitterly, and in great contrition, he said, O Lord and very God Jesus Christ, deliver me from all temptation, and preserve my soul, that it fall not into perdition. And while he was praying thus, he saw how there came from the hermitage a great brightness, and he said, Deliver me, Lord, from the power of the Devil, that I may not be deceived, nor withdrawn from thy holy service. And at that hour he made the sign of the cross upon his forehead, and blest himself; and at that hour the false Cava fell down the rock into the sea, with such a sound as if the whole world were falling to pieces, and with the plunge which she made the sea dashed up so high, that where the oratory was the King was wetted with the spray. And he remained in such astonishment that he could not for an hour recover himself. And when he came to himself he began to pray with great repentance, as if he had been on the point of falling into temptation. And the Holy Spirit of God came to him in that same manner in which he had seen it the former time. And he fell on his face upon the ground, and began to lament full bitterly, and to say, Lord, have mercy upon my soul, and forsake me not among mine enemies, who would withdraw me from thee. And the Holy Spirit said to him, O King, of little faith, how hast thou been on the point of perishing! And the King made no reply, for he did nothing but weep. And the Holy Spirit of God said to him, Take heed, King, lest the Devil deceive thee, and have power over thee, that thou shouldst not fulfil the penance which thou hast commenced, neither save thy soul. And the King lifted up his countenance, and had great shame to behold him. Howbeit he took courage, and said, Lord, have mercy upon me, and let me not be tempted by the enemy, for my heart is weak, and hath no power to defend itself against the false one: for my judgment is clean confounded, as one who hath no virtue if he be not aided by thy grace. Deliver me, Lord, for thy holy mercy and compassion: my salvation cannot come through the strength of my heart, for it is wholly full of fear, like a thing which is overcome. And the Holy Spirit of God said to him, Take courage and fear not, for thou shalt depart from this place sooner than thou thinkest. And when it is time I will guide thee to the place where thou shalt do thy penance, that thy soul may receive salvation. When thou shalt see a little white cloud appear above thee, and that there is no other in the sky, follow after it: and in the place where it shall stop shalt thou fulfil thy penance, according as the chief priest in that place shall appoint it thee. And take heart, and alway call to mind my holy name, and have true faith and constant hope in thy Savior. And when he had said this he departed. And the King was greatly comforted and full of grace, as one with whom God was present in his mercy. And he abode in the hermitage a whole year, according to his reckoning, and twelve days more. And one day, when it was full clear, the King looked up and saw above him the cloud of which the Holy Spirit of God had told him; and when he saw it he was full joyful, and gave many thanks to God. Nevertheless the King did not rise from his prayers, neither did the cloud move from above him. And when he had finished his prayers he looked at the cloud and saw that it moved forward.

Ch. 253. — How King Don Rodrigo departed from the hermitage, and arrived where he was to do penance.

“The King arose from the oratory and followed the cloud; and so great was the pleasure which he had, that he cared not for food, neither remembered it, but went after that his holy guide. And at night he saw how the cloud, when the sun was about to set, turned to the right of the road toward the mountains; and it went on so far, that before night had closed it came to a hermitage, in which there was a good man for a Hermit, who was more than ninety years of age, and there it stopt. And the King perceived that he was to rest there, and the good man welcomed the King, and they spake together of many things. And the King was well contented with his speech, and saw that certes he was a servant of God. And all that day the King had not eaten, and he was barefoot, and his raiment tattered: and as he had not been used to travel a-foot, and with his feet bare, his feet were swollen with blisters. And when it was an hour after night, the Hermit gave him a loaf, full small, which was made of rye, and there were ashes kneaded with it, and the King ate it: and when he had eaten they said prayers. And when they had said their hours, they lay down to sleep. And when it was midnight they arose and said their hours: and when they had said them the King went out of the hermitage, and saw that the cloud did not move: and then the King understood that he had to tarry here, or that he was to hear mass before he departed, and he asked the Hermit to hear his confession, and the Hermit confessed him. And when he had confessed, he said that he would communicate, and the good Hermit saw that it was good, and he put on his vestments and said mass: and the King heard the mass, and received the very body of our Lord Jesus Christ. And when the King had done this, he went out to look at the cloud. And as he went out of the hermitage he saw that the cloud began to move, and then he dispeided himself from the Hermit, and they embraced each other weeping, and each entreated the other, that he would bear him in mind, and remember him in his prayers. And when the King had dispeided himself, he followed after his holy guide, and the holy Hermit returned to his hermitage. And the King Don Rodrigo, notwithstanding his feet were swollen and full of blisters, and that in many places they were broken and bleeding, such and so great was the joy which he felt at going on in the course which he now held, that he endured it all as though he felt nothing. And he went, according as it seemed to him, full six leagues, and arrived at a convent of Black Monks, and there the cloud stopt, and would proceed no farther. And at that convent there was an Abbot who led an extraordinary good and holy life; and they were not there like other monks; and he was a great friend of God and of our Lady the Virgin St. Mary: and this Abbot took the King to his cell, and asked if he would eat as he was wont to do, or like the other monks; and the King said, that he would do as he should direct him. And the Abbot ordered that a loaf should be brought of pannick and maize mixed together, and a jar of water, and on the other side he had food placed such as the monks used; and the King would eat only of the pannick bread, as he had been wont to do, and he drank of the water. And when he had eaten, the Abbot asked him if he would remain that night or not, and the King said that he knew not, but that he would go out and see whether he were to go or to remain. And the Abbot said that it was the hour of vespers, and that he ought to remain; and the King went out and saw that the cloud moved, and that it behoved him to go, and he dispeeded himself from the Abbot, and they commended themselves each to the other in his prayers. And the Abbot saw plainly how that cloud had guided him, and how there was no other in the sky, and he marvelled greatly, and said, Certes this is some holy man, and he gave thanks to God. And the King went on that evening till he came to a church which was solitary and remote from peopled places: and there the cloud stopt, and he abode there that night. And the King went into the church, and found in it a lamp burning, and it rejoiced him much, for by the light of it he said his hours as well before he should sleep as after. And on the morrow when he had made his prayer, he went out of the church and beheld the cloud, and saw that it moved; and he went after it, and after two days' journey he came to a place which where it is, or what it is called, is not said, save that it is the place of his burial, for such it is. And there the cloud stopt, and proceeded no farther; and it rested without the town over an ancient hermitage. And the Elder of that place incontinently knew by the Holy Spirit how King Don Rodrigo was come there: but he knew not his name, neither who he was; and he asked him if he meant to lead his life there, and he answered that it was to be as God should please. And the Elder said to him, Friend, I am the Elder of this place, for all the others, when they knew that King Don Rodrigo and his chivalry were slain and vanquished, fled from hence for fear of the Moors, and of the traitor Count Don Julian, and they all went to the mountains to escape. And I remained, putting my trust in our Lord God, and in his holy hands; for that I would rather abide that which may befall and take my adventure here, than utterly forsake our mother holy church; while I am able I will remain here and not forsake it, but rather receive my death. And therefore I say, that if you are to abide here you must provide yourself of that whereof you have need. And the King said, Friend of God, concerning my tarrance I cannot certify you; though surely I think that I shall abide; and if for the service of God you will be pleased to send me every day that I remain a loaf of pannick and water, I shall be contented therewith. And the Elder promised this, and departed forthwith and went to his home, and sent him a loaf of pannick and water. And the cloud remained there three days over that hermitage, and when the three days were at an end, it was seen no more. And the King, when he could no longer see it, understood that there he must perform his penance, and gave many thanks to God, and was full joyful thereat. And on the morrow the Elder came to see him, and they communed with each other in such manner, that the King confessed to him all the sins which he had committed during his whole life till that time, all which he called to mind with great contrition, weeping full bitterly and groaning for his errors and sins. And the Elder was greatly astonished, and said, that on the third day from thence he would appoint him his penance. And he went to his church and confessed, and addrest himself to prayer in such guise that he neither ate nor drank, nor raised himself from one place, weeping bitterly, and beseeching God that he would show him what penance he should appoint the King; for after no other manner did he think to appoint it, than such as his holy mercy and compassion should direct. And on the third day he heard a voice which said thus: Command King Don Rodrigo that he go to a fountain which is below his hermitage, and he shall find there a smooth stone; and bid him lift it up, and under it he shall find three little serpents, the one having two heads. And bid him take that which hath two heads, and carry it away, and place it in a jar, and nurse it secretly, so that no person in the world shall know thereof, save only he and thou; and let him keep it till it wax so great that it hath made three turns within the jar, and puts its head out; and when it is of that greatness, then let him take it out, and lay it in a tomb which is there, and lie down himself with it, naked; and close the tomb well, that the serpent may not be able to go out; and in this manner God is pleased that King Don Rodrigo should do penance.

“The Elder when he heard the voice was greatly amazed at so rigorous a penance as this, and gave many thanks to God, and he went to King Don Rodrigo, and told him the manner how he had heard the voice; and the King was full joyful and content and pleased therewith, and gave many thanks to our Lord, for that he should now complete his penance and save his soul. And therewith in great joy, and shedding many tears for pleasure, he went to the fountain as he had been directed, and found the smooth stone. And when he had lifted it up, he found the three serpents according as the Elder had said, and he took that which had two heads, and he took it and put it in a great jar, such as would be a large wine vessel, and nursed it there till it was of such bigness as the voice had said. And when King Don Rodrigo saw that it was of this bigness he confessed to the Elder, weeping full bitterly, demanding favor of God that he would give him grace and strength with patience to fulfil that penance without any temptation or trouble of soul; to the end that, the penance being completed, it might please our Lord God to receive his soul into his glory. And before the fifth day after the serpent was thus big, the King and the Elder went to the tomb, and they cleansed it well within; and the King placed himself in it naked as he was born, and the serpent with him, and the Elder with a great lever laid the stone upon the top. And the King besought the Elder that he would pray to our Lord to give him grace that he might patiently endure that penance, and the Elder promised him, and thus the King remained in his tomb, and the serpent with him. And the Elder consoled him, saying to him many things to the end that he might not be dismayed, neither fall into despair, whereby he should lose the service of God. And all this was so secret that no man knew it, save only the King and the Elder. And when it was day-break the Elder went to the church and said mass, with many tears and with great devotion beseeching God that he would have mercy and compassion upon King Don Rodrigo, that with true devotion and repentance he might complete his penance in this manner, which was for his service. And when he had said mass, he went to the place where King Don Rodrigo lay, and asked him how he fared, and the King answered, Well, thanks to God, and better than he deserved, but that as yet he was just as when he went in. And the Elder strengthened him as much as he could, telling him that he should call to mind how he had been a sinner, and that he should give thanks to our Lord God, for that he had visited him in this world, and delivered him from many temptations, and had himself appointed for him this penance; the which he should suffer and take with patience, for soon he would be in heavenly glory. And the King said to him, that he well knew how according to his great sins he merited a stronger penance: but that he gave many thanks to our Lord Jesus, for that he himself had given him this penance, which he did receive and take with great patience; and he besought the Elder that he would continue to pray our Lord God that he would let him fulfil it. And the Elder said to him many good things concerning our Lord God. And the King lay there three days, during all which time the serpent would not seize on him. And when the third day, after that he had gone into the tomb, was completed, the serpent rose from his side, and crept upon his belly and his breast, and began with the one head to eat at his nature, and with the other straight toward his heart. And at this time the Elder came to the tomb, and asked him how he fared, and he said, Well, thanks to God, for now the serpent had begun to eat. And the Elder asked him at what place, and he answered at two, one right against the heart with which he had conceived all the ills that he had done, and the other at his nature, the which had been the cause of the great destruction of Spain. And the Elder said that God was with him, and exhorted him that he should be of good courage, for now all his persecutions both of the body and of the soul would have an end. And the King ceased not always to demand help of our Lord, and to entreat that of his holy mercy he would be pleased to forgive him. And the Elder went to his home, and would not seat himself to eat, but retired into his chamber, and weeping, prayed full devoutly to our Lord that he would give strength to the King that he might complete his penance. And the serpent, as he was dying for hunger, and moreover was large, had in one minute eaten the nature, and began to eat at the bowels; nevertheless he did not eat so fast, but that the King endured in that torment from an hour before night till it was past the middle of the day. And when the serpent broke through the web of the heart, he staid there and ate no further. And incontinently the King gave up his spirit to our Lord, who by his holy mercy took him into his glory. And at that hour when he expired all the bells of the place rang of themselves as if men had rung them. Then the Elder knew that the King was dead, and that his soul was saved."

Thomas Newton, in his "Notable History of the Saracens," seems to imagine that this story is allegorical. "Nowe," he says, "whereas it is reported, and written that he folowed a starre or a messenger of God, which conducted and guided him in his way; it may be so, and the same hath also happened to others; but it may as well also be understoode of a certaine secrete starre moving and directing his will.

"And whereas they say he was put by that holy man into a cave or hole, and a serpent with him that had two heads, which in two days' space gnawed all the flesh off his body from the bones; this, beyng simple taken and understood, hath no likelihood of any troth. For what sanctity, what religion, or what pietie, commandeth to kill a penitent person, and one that seeketh comfort of hys afflicted mind by amendment of life, with such horrible torments and straunge punishment? Wherefore I woulde rather think it to be spoken mysticallye, and that the serpent with two heads signifieth his sinful and gylyt conscience."

How Carestes found the grave of King Don Rodrigo at Viseo in Portugal.

"I, Carestes, vassal of King Don Alfonso of Leon, son-in-law of the Knight of God, King Don Pelayo, when the said King Don Alfonso won Viseo from the Moors who held it, found a grave in a field, upon the which were written in Gothie letters, the words which you shall here read. This grave was in front of a little church, without the town of Viseo, and the superscription of the writing was thus:—

Of the writing which was upon the grave of King Don Rodrigo.

"Here lies King Don Rodrigo, the last of the Goths. Cursed be the wrath of the traitor Julian, for it was of long endurance, and cursed be his anger, for it was obdurate and evil, for he was mad with rage, and stomachful with pride, and puffed up with folly, and void of loyalty, and unmindful of the laws, and a despiser thereof; cruel in himself, a slayer of his lord, a destroyer of his country, a traitor to his countrymen; bitter is his name; and it is as grief and sorrow in the mouth of him who pronounces it; and it shall always be cursed by all that speak of him."

That voracious chronicler Carestes then concludes his true history in these words:— "And by this which I found written upon this grave, I am of mind that King Don Rodrigo lies there, and because of the life which he led in his penitence, according as ye have heard, which also was in the same tomb written in a book of parchment, I believe without doubt that it is true, and because of the great penance which he did, that God was pleased to make it known in such manner as it past, for those who hereafter shall have to rule and govern, to the end that all men may see how soon pride is abased and humility exalted. This Chronicle is composed in memory of the noble King Don Rodrigo; that God pardon his sins, and that the son of the Virgin without stain, Jesus Christ, bring us to true repentance, who liveth and reigneth for ever and ever. Amen.

Thanks be to God!"

I believe the Archbishop Roderick of Toledo is the earliest writer who mentions this discovery. He died in 1247. The fact may very possibly have been true, for there seems to have been no intention of setting up a shrine connected with it. The archbishop's words are as follow:—

"Quid de Rege Roderico acciderit ignoratur; tamen corona vestes et insignia et calciamenta auro et lapidibus adornata, et equus qui Orelia dicebatur, in loco tremulo juxta fluvium sine corpore sunt inventa. Quid autem de corpore fuerit factum penitus ignoratur, nisi quod modernis temporibus apud Viscum civitatem Portugallie inscriptus tumulus invenitur, Hic jacet Rodericus ultimus Rex Gothorum. Maledictus furor impius Julioni quia pertinax, et indignatio, quia dura; animosus indignatione, impetuosus furor, oblitus fidelitatis, immemor religionis, contemptor divinitatis, crudelis in se, homicida in dominum, hostis in domesticos, vastator in patriam, reus in omnes, memoria ejus in omni ore amurescet, et nomen ejus in æternum putrescet."—Red. Tol. f. 3, g. 19.

Lope de Vega has made this epitaph, with its accompanying reflections, into two stanzas of Latin rhymes, which occur in the midst of one of his long poems:—

*Hoc jacet in sarcophago Rex ille
Penultimus Gothorum in Hispania,
Infelix Rodericus; viator sile,
Ne fortè pereat tota Lusitania,
Provocatus Cupidinis missile
Telo, tam magnâ affectus fait insaniâ
Quam tota Hibernia vinculis astricta
Testatur mæsta, lacrimatur victa.*

*Execrabilem Comitem Julianum
Abhorreant omnes, nomine et remoto
Patrio, appellent Erostratum Hispanum,
Nec tantum nostri, sed in orbe toto:
Dum current cali sidera, vesanum
Vociferant, testante Mauro et Gotho,
Cesset Flarindæ nomen insuave,
Cava viator est, a Cava cave.*

TO JOHN MAY,

AFTER A FRIENDSHIP OF TWENTY YEARS

THIS POEM IS INSCRIBED,

IN TESTIMONY OF THE HIGHEST ESTEEM AND AFFECTION,

BY ROBERT SOUTHEY.

ARGUMENT.

THE first part of this Poem describes a journey to the scene of war. The second is in an allegorical form; it exposes the gross material philosophy which has been the guiding principle of the French politicians, from Mirabeau to Bonaparte; and it states the opinions of those persons who lament the restoration of the Bourbons, because the hopes which they entertained from the French Revolution have not been realized; and of those who see only evil, or blind chance, in the course of human events.

To the Christian philosopher all things are consistent and clear. Our first parents brought with them the light of natural religion and the moral law; as men departed from these, they tended towards barbarous and savage life; large portions of the world are in this degenerated state; still, upon the great scale, the human race, from the beginning, has been progressive. But the direct object of Bonaparte was to establish a military despotism wherever his power extended; and the immediate and inevitable consequence of such a system is to brutalize and degrade mankind. The contest in which this country was engaged against that Tyrant, was a struggle between good and evil principles; and never was there a victory so important to the best hopes of human nature as that which was won by British valor at Waterloo, — its effects extending over the whole civilized world, and involving the vital interests of all mankind.

That victory leaves England in security and peace. In no age, and in no country, has man ever existed under circumstances so favorable to the full development of his moral and intellectual faculties, as in England at this time. The peace which she has won by the battle of Waterloo, leaves her at leisure to pursue the great objects and duties of bettering her own condition, and diffusing the blessings of civilization and Christianity.

PROEM.

ONCE more I see thee, Skiddaw! once again
 Behold thee in thy majesty serene,
 Where, like the bulwark of this favor'd plain,
 Alone thou standest, monarch of the scene —
 Thou glorious Mountain, on whose ample breast
 The sunbeams love to play, the vapors love to rest!

2.

ONCE more, O Derwent, to thy awful shores
 I come, insatiate of the accustom'd sight,
 And, listening as the eternal torrent roars,
 Drink in with eye and ear a fresh delight;
 For I have wander'd far by land and sea,
 In all my wanderings still remembering thee.

3.

Twelve years, (how large a part of man's brief
 day!)
 Nor idly nor ingloriously spent,
 Of evil and of good have held their way,
 Since first upon thy banks I pitch'd my tent.
 Hither I came in manhood's active prime,
 And here my head hath felt the touch of time.

4.

Heaven hath with goodly increase blest me here,
 Where childless and oppress'd with grief I came

With voice of fervent thankfulness sincere

Let me the blessings which are mine proclaim:
Here I possess — what more should I require? —
Books, children, leisure, — all my heart's desire.

5.

O joyful hour, when to our longing home
The long-expected wheels at length drew nigh!
When the first sound went forth, "They come,
they come!"

And hope's impatience quicken'd every eye!
"Never had man whom Heaven would heap with bliss
More glad return, more happy hour than this."

6.

Aloft on yonder bench, with arms dispread,
My boy stood, shouting there his father's name,
Waving his hat around his happy head;
And there, a younger group, his sisters came:
Smiling they stood with looks of pleased surprise,
While tears of joy were seen in elder eyes.

7.

Soon each and all came crowding round to share
The cordial greeting, the beloved sight;
What welcomings of hand and lip were there!
And when those overflowings of delight
Subsided to a sense of quiet bliss,
Life hath no purer, deeper happiness.

8.

The young companion of our weary way
Found here the end desired of all her ills;
She who, in sickness pining many a day,
Hunger'd and thirsted for her native hills,
Forgetful now of sufferings pass'd and pain,
Rejoiced to see her own dear home again.

9.

Recover'd now, the homesick mountaineer
Sat by the playmate of her infancy,
Her twin-like comrade, — render'd doubly dear
For that long absence: full of life was she,
With voluble discourse and eager mien
Telling of all the wonders she had seen.

10.

Here silently between her parents stood
My dark-eyed Bertha, timid as a dove;
And gently oft from time to time she woo'd
Pressure of hand, or word, or look of love,
With impulse shy of bashful tenderness,
Soliciting again the wish'd caress.

11.

The younger twain, in wonder lost were they,
My gentle Kate, and my sweet Isabel:
Long of our promised coming, day by day,
It had been their delight to hear and tell;
And now, when that long-promised hour was come,
Surprise and wakening Memory held them dumb.

12.

For in the infant mind, as in the old,
When to its second childhood life declines,
A dim and troubled power doth Memory hold:
But soon the light of young Remembrance shines
Renew'd, and influences of dormant love,
Waken'd within, with quickening influence move.

13.

O happy season theirs, when absence brings
Small feeling of privation, none of pain,
Yet at the present object love re-springs,
As night-closed flowers at morn expand again!
Nor deem our second infancy unblest,
When gradually composed we sink to rest.

14.

Soon they grew blithe as they were wont to be;
Her old endearments each began to seek:
And Isabel drew near to climb my knee,
And pat with fondling hand her father's cheek;
With voice, and touch, and look, reviving thus
The feelings which had slept in long disuse.

15.

But there stood one whose heart could entertain
And comprehend the fulness of the joy;
The father, teacher, playmate, was again
Come to his only and his studious boy:
And he beheld again that mother's eye
Which with such ceaseless care had watch'd his infancy.

16.

Bring forth the treasures now, — a proud display, —
For rich as Eastern merchants we return!
Behold the black Beguine, the Sister gray,
The Friars whose heads with sober motion turn,
The Ark well-fill'd with all its numerous hives, Noah, and Shem, and Ham, and Japhet, and their wives; —

17.

The tumbler, loose of limb; the wrestlers twain;
And many a toy beside of quaint device,
Which, when his fleecy troops no more can gain
Their pasture on the mountains hoar with ice,
The German shepherd carves with curious knife,
Earning in easy toil the food of frugal life.

18.

It was a group which Richter, had he view'd,
Might have deem'd worthy of his perfect skill;
The keen impatience of the younger brood,
Their eager eyes and fingers never still;
The hope, the wonder, and the restless joy
Of those glad girls and that vociferous boy! —

19.

The aged friend serene with quiet smile,
Who in their pleasure finds her own delight;
The mother's heart-felt happiness the while;
The aunts, rejoicing in the joyful sight;

And he who, in his gayety of heart,
With glib and noisy tongue perform'd the show-man's part.

20.

Scoff ye who will! but let me, gracious Heaven,
Preserve this boyish heart till life's last day!
For so that inward light by Nature given
Shall still direct, and cheer me on my way,
And, brightening as the shades of age descend,
Shine forth with heavenly radiance at the end.

21.

This was the morning light vouchsafed, which led
My favor'd footsteps to the Muses' hill,
Whose arduous paths I have not ceased to tread,
From good to better persevering still;
And if but self-approved, to praise or blame
Indifferent, while I toil for lasting fame.

22.

And, O ye nymphs of Castaly divine!
Whom I have dutifully served so long,
Benignant to your votary now incline,
That I may win your ear with gentle song,
Such as, I ween, is ne'er disown'd by you,—
A low, prelusive strain, to nature true.

23.

But when I reach at themes of loftier thought,
And tell of things surpassing earthly sense,
(Which by yourselves, O Muses, I am taught,)
Then aid me with your fuller influence,
And to the height of that great argument,
Support my spirit in her strong ascent!

24.

So may I boldly round my temples bind
The laurel which my master Spenser wore;
And free in spirit as the mountain wind
That makes my symphony, in this lone hour,
No perishable song of triumph raise,
But sing in worthy strains my Country's praise.

PART I.

THE JOURNEY.

Τῶν πολυκτονῶν γὰρ
Ὀὐκ ἀσκοποὶ Θεοὶ.....ÆSCHYLUS.

I.

FLANDERS.

1.

OUR world hath seen the work of war's debate
Consummated in one momentous day
Twice in the course of time; and twice the fate
Of unborn ages hung upon the fray:

First at Platæa, in that awful hour
When Greece united smote the Persian's power.

2.

For had the Persian triumph'd, then the spring
Of knowledge from that living source had ceased
All would have fallen before the barbarous King,
Art, Science, Freedom; the despotic East,
Setting her mark upon the race subdued,
Had stamp'd them in the mould of sensual servitude.

3.

The second day was that when Martel broke
The Mussulmen, delivering France oppress'd,
And in one mighty conflict, from the yoke
Of misbelieving Meecca saved the West;
Else had the Impostor's law destroy'd the ties
Of public weal and private charities.

4.

Such was the danger when that Man of Blood
Burst from the iron Isle, and brought again,
Like Satan rising from the sulphurous flood,
His impious legions to the battle plain:
Such too was our deliverance when the field
Of Waterloo beheld his fortunes yield.

5.

I, who, with faith unshaken from the first,
Even when the Tyrant seem'd to touch the skies,
Had look'd to see the high-blown bubble burst,
And for a fall conspicuous as his rise,
Even in that faith had look'd not for defeat
So swift, so overwhelming, so complete.

6.

Me most of all men it behoved to raise
The strain of triumph for this foe subdued,
To give a voice to joy, and in my lays
Exalt a nation's hymn of gratitude,
And blazon forth in song that day's renown,—
For I was graced with England's laurel crown.

7.

And as I once had journey'd to behold,
Far off, Ourique's consecrated field,
Where Portugal, the faithful and the bold,
Assumed the symbols of her sacred shield,
More reason now that I should bend my way
The field of British glory to survey.

8.

So forth I set upon this pilgrimage,
And took the partner of my life with me,
And one dear girl just ripe enough of age
Retentively to see what I should see;
That thus, with mutual recollections fraught,
We might bring home a store for after-thought.

9.

We left our pleasant Land of Lakes, and went
Throughout whole England's length, a weary way,
Even to the farthest shores of eastern Kent:
Embarking there upon an autumn day,

Toward Ostend we held our course all night,
And anchor'd by its quay at morning's earliest light.

10.

Small vestige there of that old siege appears,
And little of remembrance would be found,
When, for the space of three long, painful years,
The persevering Spaniard girt it round,
And gallant youths, of many a realm from far,
Went students to that busy school of war.

11.

Yet still those wars of obstinate defence
Their lessons offer to the soldier's hand;
Large knowledge may the statesman draw from thence;
And still from underneath the drifted sand
Sometimes the storm, or passing foot, lays bare
Part of the harvest Death has gather'd there.

12.

Peace be within thy walls, thou famous town,
For thy brave bearing in those times of old;
May plenty thy industrious children crown,
And prosperous merchants day by day behold
Many a rich vessel, from the injurious sea,
Enter the bosom of thy quiet quay.

13.

Embarking there, we glided on between
Strait banks raised high above the level land,
With many a cheerful dwelling, white and green,
In goodly neighborhood on either hand.
Huge-timber'd bridges o'er the passage lay,
Which wheel'd aside and gave us easy way.

14.

Four horses, aided by the favoring breeze,
Drew our gay vessel, slow, and sleek, and large;
Crack goes the whip; the steersman at his ease
Directs the way, and steady went the barge.
Ere evening closed, to Bruges thus we came, —
Fair city, worthy of her ancient fame.

15.

The season of her splendor is gone by,
Yet every where its monuments remain —
Temples which rear their stately heads on high,
Canals that intersect the fertile plain,
Wide streets and squares, with many a court and hall
Spacious and undefaced, but ancient all.

16.

Time hath not wrong'd her, nor hath Ruin sought
Rudely her splendid structures to destroy,
Save in those recent days, with evil fraught,
When Mutability, in drunken joy
Triumphant, and from all restraint released,
Let loose the fierce and many-headed beast.

17.

But for the scars in that unhappy rage
Inflicted, firm she stands and undecay'd;

Like our first sires', a beautiful old age
Is hers, in venerable years array'd;
And yet to her benignant stars may bring,
What fate denies to man, — a second spring.

18.

When I may read of tilts in days of old,
And tourneys graced by chieftains of renown,
Fair dames, grave citizens, and warriors bold,
If Fancy would portray some stately town,
Which for such pomp fit theatre should be,
Fair Bruges, I shall then remember thee.

19.

Nor did thy landscape yield me less delight,
Seen from the deck as slow it glided by,
Or when beneath us, from thy Belfroy's height,
Its boundless circle met the bending sky;
The waters smooth and straight, thy proper boast,
And lines of road-side trees in long perspective
lost.

20.

No happier landscape may on earth be seen,
Rich gardens all around and fruitful groves,
White dwellings trim relieved with lively green,
The pollard that the Flemish painter loves,
With aspens tall and poplars fair to view,
Casting o'er all the land a gray and willowy hue.

21.

My lot hath lain in scenes sublime and rude,
Where still devoutly I have served and sought
The Power divine which dwells in solitude.
In boyhood was I wont, with rapture fraught,
Amid those rocks and woods to wander free,
Where Avon hastens to the Severn sea.

22.

In Cintra also have I dwelt erewhile,
That earthly Eden, and have seen at eve
The sea-mists, gathering round its mountain pile,
Whelm with their billows all below, but leave
One pinnacle sole seen, whereon it stood
Like the Ark on Ararat, above the flood.

23.

And now am I a Cumbrian mountaineer;
Their wintry garment of unsullied snow
The mountains have put on, the heavens are clear,
And yon dark lake spreads silently below;
Who sees them only in their summer hour
Sees but their beauties half, and knows not half their power.

24.

Yet hath the Flemish scene a charm for me
That soothes and wins upon the willing heart;
Though all is level as the sleeping sea,
A natural beauty springs from perfect art,
And something more than pleasure fills the breast,
To see how well-directed toil is blest.

25.

Two nights have past; the morning opens well;
Fair are the aspects of the favoring sky;

Soon yon sweet chimes the appointed hour will tell,

For here to music Time moves merrily :
Aboard ! aboard ! no more must we delay, —
Farewell, good people of the Fleur de Bled !

26.

Beside the busy wharf the Trekschuit rides,
With painted plumes and tent-like awning gay ;
Carts, barrows, coaches, hurry from all sides,
And passengers and porters throng the way,
Contending all at once in clamorous speech, —
French, Flemish, English, — each confusing each.

27.

All disregardant of the Babel sound,
A swan kept oaring near with upraised eye, —
A beauteous pensioner, who daily found
The bounty of such casual company ;
Nor left us till the bell said all was done,
And slowly we our watery way begun.

28.

Europe can boast no richer, goodlier scene,
Than that through which our pleasant passage
lay,
By fertile fields and fruitful gardens green,
The journey of a short autumnal day ;
Sleek, well-fed steeds our steady vessel drew ;
The heavens were fair, and Mirth was of our crew.

29.

Along the smooth canal's unbending line,
Beguiling time with light discourse, we went,
Nor wanting savory food nor generous wine.
Ashore, too, there was feast and merriment ;
The jovial peasants at some village fair
Were dancing, drinking, smoking, gambling there.

30.

Of these, or of the ancient towers of Ghent
Renown'd, I must not tarry now to tell ;
Of picture, or of church, or monument ;
Nor how we mounted to that ponderous bell,
The Belfroy's boast, which bears old Roland's
name,
Nor yields to Oxford Tom, or Tom of Lincoln's fame ; —

31.

Nor of that sisterhood whom to their rule
Of holy life no hasty vows restrain,
Who, meek disciples of the Christian school,
Watch by the bed of sickness and of pain :
Oh what a strength divine doth Faith impart
To inborn goodness in the female heart !

32.

A gentle party from the shores of Kent
Thus far had been our comrades, as befell ;
Fortune had link'd us first, and now Consent, —
(For why should Choice divide whom Chance so well
Had join'd ?) and they to view the famous ground,
Like us, were to the Field of Battle bound.

33.

Farther as yet they look'd not than that quest, —
The land was all before them where to choose.
So we consorted here as seem'd best ;
Who would such pleasant fellowship refuse
Of ladies fair and gentle comrades free ?
Certes we were a joyous company.

34.

Yet lack'd we not discourse for graver times,
Such as might suit sage auditors, I ween ;
For some among us, in far distant climes
The cities and the ways of men had seen ;
No unobservant travellers they, but well
Of what they there had learnt they knew to tell.

35.

The one of frozen Moscovy could speak,
And well his willing listeners entertain
With tales of that inclement region bleak,
The pageantry and pomp of Catherine's reign,
And that proud city, which with wise intent
The mighty founder raised, his own great monument.

36.

And one had dwelt with Malabars and Moors,
Where fertile earth and genial heaven dispense
Profuse their bounty upon Indian shores ;
Whate'er delights the eye, or charms the sense,
The valleys with perpetual fruitage bless'd,
The mountains with unfading foliage dress'd.

37.

He those barbaric palaces had seen,
The work of Eastern potentates of old ;
And in the Temples of the Rock had been,
Awe-struck their dread recesses to behold ;
A gifted hand was his, which by its skill
Could to the eye portray such wondrous scenes at will.

38.

A third, who from the Land of Lakes with me
Went out upon this pleasant pilgrimage,
Had sojourn'd long beyond the Atlantic sea ;
Adventurous was his spirit as his age,
For he in far Brazil, through wood and waste,
Had travell'd many a day, and there his heart was placed.

39.

Wild region, — happy if at night he found
The shelter of some rude Tapuya's shed,
Else would he take his lodgment on the ground,
Or from the tree suspend his hardy bed ;
And sometimes, starting at the jaguar's cries,
See through the murky night the prowler's fiery eyes.

40.

And sometimes over thirsty deserts drear,
And sometimes over flooded plains he went ; —
A joy it was his fireside tales to hear,
And he a comrade to my heart's content :

For he of what I most desired could tell, [well.
And loved the Portugals because he knew them

41.

Here to the easy barge we bade adieu ;
Land-travellers now along the well-paved way,
Where road-side trees still lengthening on the view,
Before us and behind unvarying lay :
Through lands well labor'd to Alost we came,
Where whilome treachery stain'd the English name.

42.

Then saw we Afflighem, by ruin rent,
Whose venerable fragments strow the land ;
Grown wise too late, the multitude lament
The ravage of their own unhappy hand ;
Its records in their frenzy torn and tost,
Its precious stores of learning wreck'd and lost.

43.

Whatever else we saw was cheerful all,
The signs of steady labor well repaid ;
The grapes were ripe on every cottage wall,
And merry peasants seated in the shade
Of garner, or within the open door, [store.
From gather'd hop-vines pluck'd the plenteous

44.

Through Assche, for water and for cakes renown'd,
We pass'd, pursuing still our way, though late ;
And when the shades of night were closing round,
Brussels received us through her friendly gate,—
Proud city, fated many a change to see,
And now the seat of new-made monarchy.

II.

BRUSSELS.

1.

WHERE might a gayer spectacle be found
Than Brussels offer'd on that festive night,
Her squares and palaces irradiate round
To welcome the imperial Moscovite,
Who now, the wrongs of Europe twice redress'd,
Came there a welcome and a glorious guest?

2.

Her mile-long avenue with lamps was hung,
Innumerable, which diffused a light like day ;
Where, through the line of splendor, old and young
Paraded all in festival array ;
While fiery barges, plying to and fro,
Illumined as they moved the liquid glass below.

3.

By day with hurrying crowds the streets were throng'd,
To gain of this great Czar a passing sight ;
And music, dance, and banquetings prolong'd
The various work of pleasure through the night.

You might have deem'd, to see that joyous town,
That wretchedness and pain were there unknown.

4.

Yet three short months had scarcely pass'd away,
Since, shaken with the approaching battle's
breath,
Her inmost chambers trembled with dismay ;
And now, within her walls, insatiate Death,
Devourer whom no harvest e'er can fill,
The gleanings of that field was gathering still.

5.

Within those walls there linger'd at that hour
Many a brave soldier on the bed of pain,
Whom aid of human art should ne'er restore
To see his country and his friends again ;
And many a victim of that fell debate
Whose life yet waver'd in the scales of fate.

6.

Some I beheld, for whom the doubtful scale
Had to the side of life inclined at length ;
Emaciate was their form, their features pale,
The limbs, so vigorous late, bereft of strength ;
And for their gay habiliments of yore,
The habit of the House of Pain they wore.

7.

Some in the courts of that great hospital,
That they might taste the sun and open air,
Crawl'd out ; or sat beneath the southern wall ;
Or, leaning in the gate, stood gazing there
In listless guise upon the passers by,
Whiling away the hours of slow recovery.

8.

Others in wagons borne abroad I saw,
Albeit recovering, still a mournful sight :
Languid and helpless, some were stretch'd on straw ;
Some, more advanced, sustain'd themselves upright,
And with bold eye and careless front, methought,
Seem'd to set wounds and death again at nought.

9.

Well had it fared with these ; nor went it ill
With those whom war had of a limb bereft,
Leaving the life untouch'd, that they had still Enough for health as for existence left ;
But some there were who lived to draw the breath
Of pain through hopeless years of lingering death.

10.

Here might the hideous face of war be seen,
Stripp'd of all pomp, adornment, and disguise ;
It was a dismal spectacle, I ween,
Such as might well to the beholders' eyes
Bring sudden tears, and make the pious mind
Grieve for the crimes and follies of mankind.

11.

What had it been, then, in the recent days
Of that great triumph, when the open wound

Was festering, and along the crowded ways,
Hour after hour, was heard the incessant sound
Of wheels, which o'er the rough and stony road
Convey'd their living, agonizing load!

12.

Hearts little to the melting mood inclined Grew sick to see their sufferings; and the thought
Still comes with horror to the shuddering mind
Of those sad days when Belgian ears were taught
The British soldier's cry, half groan, half prayer,
Breathed when his pain is more than he can bear.

13.

Brave spirits, nobly had their part been done!
Brussels could show, where Senne's slow waters glide,
The cannon which their matchless valor won,
Proud trophies of the field, ranged side by side,
Where, as they stood in inoffensive row,
The solitary guard paced to and fro.

14.

Unconscious instruments of human woe,
Some for their mark the royal lilies bore,
Fix'd there when Britain was the Bourbon's foe;
And some, emboss'd in brazen letters, wore
The sign of that abhorr'd misrule, which broke
The guilty nation for a Tyrant's yoke.

15.

Others were stamp'd with that Usurper's name,—
Recorders thus of many a change were they,
Their deadly work through every change the same;
Nor ever had they seen a bloodier day,
Than when, as their late thunders roll'd around,
Brabant in all her cities felt the sound.

16.

Then ceased their occupation. From the field
Of battle here in triumph were they brought;
Ribbons and flowers, and laurels half conceal'd
Their brazen mouths, so late with ruin fraught;
Women beheld them pass with joyful eyes,
And children clapp'd their hands and rent the air with cries.

17.

Now idly on the banks of Senne they lay,
Like toys with which a child is pleased no more:
Only the British traveller bends his way
To see them on that unfrequented shore,
And, as a mournful feeling blends with pride,
Remembers those who fought, and those who died.

III.

THE FIELD OF BATTLE.

1.

SOUTHWARD from Brussels lies the field of blood,
Some three hours' journey for a well-girt man;

95

A horseman who in haste pursued his road
Would reach it as the second hour began.
The way is through a forest deep and wide,
Extending many a mile on either side.

2.

No cheerful woodland this of antic trees,
With thickets varied and with sunny glade;
Look where he will, the weary traveller sees
One gloomy, thick, impenetrable shade
Of tall, straight trunks, which move before his sight,
With interchange of lines of long green light.

3.

Here, where the woods, receding from the road,
Have left, on either hand, an open space
For fields and gardens, and for man's abode,
Stands Waterloo; a little, lowly place,
Obscure till now, when it hath risen to fame,
And given the victory its English name.

4.

What time the second Carlos ruled in Spain,
Last of the Austrian line by Fate decreed,
Here Castanaca reared a votive fane,
Praying the Patron Saints to bless with seed
His childless sovereign; Heaven denied an heir,
And Europe mourn'd in blood the frustrate prayer

5.

That temple to our hearts was hallow'd now;
For many a wounded Briton there was laid,
With such poor help as time might then allow
From the fresh carnage of the field convey'd;
And they whom human succors could not save
Here in its precincts found a hasty grave.

6.

And here, on marble tablets set on high,
In English lines by foreign workmen traced,
Are names familiar to an English eye;
Their brethren here the fit memorials placed,
Whose unadorn'd inscriptions briefly tell
Their gallant comrades' rank, and where they fell.

7.

The stateliest monument of public pride,
Enrich'd with all magnificence of art,
To honor Chieftains who in victory died,
Would wake no stronger feeling in the heart
Than these plain tablets, by the soldier's hand
Raised to his comrades in a foreign land.

8.

Not far removed you find the burial-ground,
Yet so that skirts of woodland intervene;
A small enclosure, rudely fenced around;
Three grave-stones only for the dead are seen:
One bears the name of some rich villager,
The first for whom a stone was planted there.

9.

Beneath the second is a German laid,
Whom Bremen, shaking off the Frenchman's yoke,

Sent with her sons the general cause to aid ;
 He in the fight received his mortal stroke,
 Yet for his country's aggravated woes
 Lived to see vengeance on her hated foes.

10.

A son of Erin sleeps below the third ;
 By friendly hands his body where it lay
 Upon the field of blood had been interr'd,
 And thence by those who mourn'd him borne away,
 In pious reverence for departed worth,
 Laid here with holy rites in consecrated earth.

11.

Repose in peace, brave soldiers, who have found
 In Waterloo and Soigny's shade your rest !
 Ere this hath British valor made that ground
 Sacred to you, and for your foes unblest'd,
 When Marlborough here, victorious in his might,
 Surprised the French, and smote them in their flight.

12.

Those wars are as a tale of times gone by,
 For so doth perishable fame decay, —
 Here on the ground wherein the slaughter'd lie,
 The memory of that fight is pass'd away ; —
 And even our glorious Blenheim to the field
 Of Waterloo and Wellington must yield.

13.

Soon shall we reach that scene of mighty deeds,
 In one unbending line a short league hence ;
 Aright the forest from the road recedes,
 With wide sweep trending south and westward
 thence ;
 Aleft along the line it keeps its place,
 Some half hour's distance at a traveller's pace.

14.

The country here expands, a wide-spread scene ;
 No Flemish gardens fringed with willows
 these ;
 Nor rich Brabantine pastures ever green,
 With trenches lined and rows of aspen trees ;
 In tillage here the unwooded, open land
 Returns its increase to the farmer's hand.

15.

Behold the scene where Slaughter had full sway !
 A mile before us lieth Mount St. John,
 The hamlet which the Highlanders that day
 Preserved from spoil ; yet as much farther on
 The single farm is placed, now known to fame,
 Which from the sacred hedge derives its name.

16.

Straight onward yet for one like distance more,
 And there the house of Belle Alliance stands,
 So named, I guess, by some in days of yore,
 In friendship or in wedlock joining hands :
 Little did they who call'd it thus foresee
 The place that name should hold in history !

17.

Beyond these points the fight extended not —
 Small theatre for such a tragedy !
 Its breadth scarce more, from eastern Papelot
 To where the groves of Hougoumont on high
 Rear in the west their venerable head,
 And cover with their shade the countless dead.

18.

But wouldst thou tread this celebrated ground,
 And trace with understanding eyes a scene
 Above all other fields of war renown'd,
 From western Hougoumont thy way begin ;
 There was our strength on that side, and there first,
 In all its force, the storm of battle burst.

19.

Strike eastward then across toward La Haye,
 The single farm : with dead the fields between
 Are lined, and thou wilt see upon the way
 Long wave-like dips and swells which intervene,
 Such as would breathe the war-horse, and impede,
 When that deep soil was wet, his martial speed.

20.

This is the ground whereon the young Nassau,
 Emuling that day his ancestors' renown,
 Received his hurt ; admiring Belgium saw
 The youth proved worthy of his destined crown :
 All tongues his prowess on that day proclaim,
 And children lisp his praise and bless their Prince's name.

21.

When thou hast reach'd La Haye, survey it well ;
 Here was the heat and centre of the strife ;
 This point must Britain hold whate'er befell,
 And here both armies were profuse of life :
 Once it was lost, — and then a stander by Belike had trembled for the victory.

22.

Not so the leader, on whose equal mind
 Such interests hung in that momentous day ;
 So well had he his motley troops assign'd,
 That where the vital points of action lay,
 There had he placed those soldiers whom he knew
 No fears could quail, no dangers could subdue.

23.

Small was his British force, nor had he here
 The Portugals, in heart so near allied,
 The worthy comrades of his late career,
 Who fought so oft and conquer'd at his side,
 When with the Red Cross join'd in brave advance,
 The glorious Quinas mock'd the air of France.

24.

Now of the troops with whom he took the field,
 Some were of doubtful faith, and others raw ;
 He station'd these where they might stand or yield ;
 But where the stress of battle he foresaw,
 There were his links (his own strong words I speak)
 And rivets, which no human force could break.

25.

O my brave countrymen, ye answer'd well
 To that heroic trust! Nor less did ye,
 Whose worth your grateful country aye shall tell,
 True children of our sister Germany,
 Who, while she groan'd beneath the oppressor's chain,
 Fought for her freedom in the fields of Spain.

26.

La Haye, bear witness! sacred is it hight,
 And sacred is it truly from that day;
 For never braver blood was spent in fight
 Than Britain here hath mingled with the clay.
 Set where thou wilt thy foot, thou scarce canst tread
 Here on a spot unhallow'd by the dead.

27.

Here was it that the Highlanders withstood
 The tide of hostile power, received its weight
 With resolute strength, and stemm'd and turn'd
 the flood;
 And fitly here, as in that Grecian strait,
 The funeral stone might say, Go, traveller, tell
 Scotland, that in our duty here we fell.

28.

Still eastward from this point thy way pursue.
 There grows a single hedge along the lane, —
 No other is there far or near in view:
 The raging enemy essay'd in vain
 To pass that line, — a braver foe withstood,
 And this whole ground was moisten'd with their blood.

29.

Leading his gallant men, as he was wont,
 The hot assailants' onset to repel,
 Advancing hat in hand, here in the front
 Of battle and of danger, Picton fell;
 Lamented Chief! than whom no braver name
 His country's annals shall consign to fame.

30.

Scheldt had not seen us, had his voice been heard,
 Return with shame from her disastrous coast:
 But Fortune soon to fairer fields preferr'd
 His worth approved, which Cambria long may boast:
 France felt him then, and Portugal and Spain
 His honor'd memory will for aye retain.

31.

Hence to the high-wall'd house of Papelot,
 The battle's boundary on the left, incline;
 Here thou seest Frischermont not far remote,
 From whence, like ministers of wrath divine,
 The Prussians, issuing on the yielding foe,
 Consummated their great and total overthrow.

32.

Deem not that I the martial skill should boast,
 Where horse and foot were station'd, here to tell,

What points were occupied by either host,
 And how the battle raged, and what befell,
 And how our great Commander's eagle eye,
 Which comprehended all, secured the victory.

33.

This were the historian's, not the poet's part;
 Such task would ill the gentle Muse beseem,
 Who, to the thoughtful mind and pious heart,
 Comes with her offering from this awful theme;
 Content if what she saw and gather'd there
 She may in unambitious song declare.

34.

Look how upon the Ocean's treacherous face
 The breeze and summer sunshine softly play,
 And the green-heaving billows bear no trace
 Of all the wrath and wreck of yesterday; —
 So from the field, which here we look'd upon,
 The vestiges of dreadful war were gone.

35.

Earth had received into her silent womb
 Her slaughter'd creatures: horse and man they lay,
 And friend and foe, within the general tomb.
 Equal had been their lot; one fatal day
 For all, — one labor, — and one place of rest
 They found within their common parent's breast.

36.

The passing seasons had not yet effaced
 The stamp of numerous hoofs impress'd by force
 Of cavalry, whose path might still be traced.
 Yet Nature every where resumed her course;
 Low pansies to the sun their purple gave,
 And the soft poppy blossom'd on the grave.

37.

In parts the careful farmer had renew'd
 His labors, late by battle frustrated;
 And where the unconscious soil had been imbued
 With blood, profusely there like water shed,
 There had his ploughshare turn'd the guilty
 ground,
 And the green corn was springing all around.

38.

The graves he left for natural thought humane Untouch'd; and here and there, where in the strife
 Contending feet had trampled down the grain,
 Some hardier roots were found, which of their life
 Tenacious, had put forth a second head,
 And sprung, and ear'd, and ripen'd on the dead.

39.

Some marks of wreck were scatter'd all around,
 As shoe, and belt, and broken bandoleer,
 And hats which bore the mark of mortal wound;
 Gun-flints and balls for those who closelier peer;
 And sometimes did the breeze upon its breath
 Bear from ill-cover'd graves a taint of death

40.

More vestige of destructive man was seen
 Where man in works of peace had labor'd more ;
 At Hougoumont the hottest strife had been,
 Where trees and walls the mournful record bore
 Of war's wild rage, trunks pierced with many a wound,
 And roofs and half-burnt rafters on the ground.

41.

A goodly mansion this, with gardens fair,
 And ancient groves and fruitful orchard wide,
 Its dove-cot and its decent house of prayer,
 Its ample stalls and garners well supplied,
 And spacious bartons clean, well-wall'd around,
 Where all the wealth of rural life was found.

42.

That goodly mansion on the ground was laid,
 Save here and there a blacken'd, broken wall ;
 The wounded who were borne beneath its shade
 Had there been crush'd and buried by the fall ;
 And there they lie, where they received their doom, —
 Oh, let no hand disturb that honorable tomb !

43.

Contiguous to this wreck, the little fane,
 For worship hallow'd, still uninjured stands,
 Save that its Crucifix displays too plain
 The marks of outrage from irreverent hands.
 Alas, to think such irreligious deed
 Of wrong from British soldiers should proceed !

44.

The dove-cot too remains ; scared at the fight,
 The birds sought shelter in the forest shade ;
 But still they kept their native haunts in sight,
 And, when few days their terror had allay'd,
 Forsook again the solitary wood,
 For their old home and human neighborhood.

45.

The gardener's dwelling was untouch'd ; his wife
 Fled with her children to some near retreat,
 And there lay trembling for her husband's life :
 He stood the issue, saw the foe's retreat,
 And lives unhurt, where thousands fell around,
 To tell the story of that famous ground.

46.

His generous dog was well approved that hour,
 By courage as by love to man allied ;
 He through the fiery storm and iron shower
 Kept the ground bravely by his master's side ;
 And now, when to the stranger's hand he draws,
 The noble beast seems conscious of applause.

47.

Toward the grove, the wall with musket-holes
 Is pierced ; our soldiers here their station held
 Against the foe ; and many were the souls
 Then from their fleshly tenements expell'd.
 Six hundred Frenchmen have been burnt close by,
 And underneath one mound their bones and ashes lie.

48.

One streak of blood upon the wall was traced,
 In length a man's just stature from the head ;
 There where it gush'd you saw it uneffaced :
 Of all the blood which on that day was shed,
 This mortal stain alone remain'd impress'd, —
 The all-devouring earth had drunk the rest.

49.

Here, from the heaps who strew'd the fatal plain,
 Was Howard's corse by faithful hands convey'd,
 And, not to be confounded with the slain,
 Here in a grave apart with reverence laid,
 Till hence his honor'd relics o'er the seas
 Were borne to England, there to rest in peace.

50.

Another grave had yielded up its dead,
 From whence to bear his son a father came,
 That he might lay him where his own gray head
 Ere long must needs be laid. That soldier's name
 Was not remember'd there, yet may the verse
 Present this reverent tribute to his hearse.

51.

Was it a soothing or a mournful thought,
 Amid this scene of slaughter as we stood,
 Where armies had with recent fury fought,
 To mark how gentle Nature still pursued
 Her quiet course, as if she took no care
 For what her noblest work had suffer'd there ?

52.

The pears had ripen'd on the garden wall ;
 Those leaves which on the autumnal earth were spread,
 The trees, though pierced and scarr'd with many a ball,
 Had only in their natural season shed :
 Flowers were in seed, whose buds to swell began
 When such wild havoc here was made of man !

53.

Throughout the garden, fruits, and herbs, and flowers,
 You saw in growth, or ripeness, or decay ;
 The green and well-trimm'd dial mark'd the hours
 With gliding shadow as they pass'd away ;
 Who would have thought, to see this garden fair,
 Such horrors had so late been acted there !

54.

Now, Hougoumont, farewell to thy domain !
 Might I dispose of thee, no woodman's hand
 Should e'er thy venerable groves profane ;
 Untouch'd, and like a temple should they stand,
 And, consecrate by general feeling, wave
 Their branches o'er the ground where sleep the brave.

55.

Thy ruins, as they fell, should aye remain, —
 What monument so fit for those below ?
 Thy garden through whole ages should retain
 The form and fashion which it weareth now,

That future pilgrims here might all things see,
Such as they were at this great victory.

IV.

THE SCENE OF WAR.

1.

No cloud the azure vault of heaven distain'd
That day when we the field of war survey'd ;
The leaves were falling, but the groves retain'd
Foliage enough for beauty and for shade ;
Soft airs prevail'd, and through the sunny hours
The bees were busy on the year's last flowers.

2.

Well was the season with the scene combined.
The autumnal sunshine suited well the mood
Which here possess'd the meditative mind, —
A human sense upon the field of blood,
A Christian thankfulness, a British pride,
Temper'd by solemn thought, yet still to joy allied.

3.

What British heart that would not feel a flow,
Upon that ground, of elevating pride?
What British cheek is there that would not glow
To hear our country blest and magnified? —
For Britain here was blest by old and young,
Admired by every heart, and praised by every tongue.

4.

Not for brave bearing in the field alone
Doth grateful Belgium bless the British name ;
The order and the perfect honor shown
In all things, have enhanced the soldier's fame ;
For this we heard the admiring people raise
One universal voice sincere of praise.

5.

Yet with indignant feeling they inquired
Wherefore we spared the author of this strife?
Why had we not, as highest law required,
With ignominy closed the culprit's life?
For him alone had all this blood been shed, —
Why had not vengeance struck the guilty head?

6.

O God! they said, it was a piteous thing
To see the after-horrors of the fight,
The lingering death, the hopeless suffering, —
What heart of flesh unmoved could bear the sight?
One man was cause of all this world of woe, —
Ye had him, — and ye did not strike the blow!

7.

How will ye answer to all after-time
For that great lesson which ye fail'd to give?
As if excess of guilt excused the crime,
Black as he is with blood, ye let him live!

Children of evil, take your course henceforth,
For what is Justice but a name on earth!

8.

Vain had it been with these in glozing speech
Of precedents to use the specious tongue :
This might perplex the ear, but fail to reach
The heart, from whence that honest feeling sprung ;
And had I dared my inner sense belie,
The voice of blood was there to join them in their cry.

9.

We left the field of battle in such mood
As human hearts from thence should bear
away,
And musing thus our purposed route pursued,
Which still through scenes of recent bloodshed
lay,
Where Prussia late, with strong and stern delight,
Hung on her hated foes to persecute their flight.

10.

No hour for tarrance that, or for remorse !
Vengeance, who long had hunger'd, took her fill,
And Retribution held its righteous course :
As when in elder time, the Sun stood still
On Gibeon, and the Moon above the vale
Of Ajalon hung motionless and pale.

11.

And what though no portentous day was given
To render here the work of wrath complete ;
The Sun, I ween, seem'd standing still in heaven
To those who hurried from that dire defeat ;
And when they pray'd for darkness in their flight,
The Moon arose upon them broad and bright.

12.

No covert might they find ; the open land,
O'er which so late exultingly they pass'd,
Lay all before them and on either hand ;
Close on their flight the avengers follow'd fast,
And when they reach'd Genappe, and there drew
breath,
Short respite found they there from fear and death.

13.

That fatal town betray'd them to more loss ;
Through one long street the only passage lay,
And then the narrow bridge they needs must cross
Where Dyle, a shallow streamlet, cross'd the way :
For life they fled, — no thought had they but fear,
And their own baggage chok'd the outlet here.

14.

He who had bridged the Danube's affluent stream,
With all the unbroken Austrian power in sight,
(So had his empire vanish'd like a dream,)
Was by this brook impeded in his flight, —
And then what passions did he witness there
Rage, terror, execrations, and despair!

15.

Ere through the wreck his passage could be made,
 Three miserable hours, which seem'd like years,
 Was he in that ignoble strait delay'd;
 The dreadful Prussian's cry was in his ears,
 Fear in his heart, and in his soul that hell
 Whose due rewards he merited so well.

16.

Foremost again, as he was wont to be
 In flight, though not the foremost in the strife,
 The Tyrant hurried on, of infamy
 Regardless, nor regarding ought but life; —
 O wretch! without the courage or the faith
 To die with those whom he had led to death!

17.

Meantime his guilty followers in disgrace,
 Whose pride forever now was beaten down,
 Some in the houses sought a hiding-place;
 While at the entrance of that fatal town
 Others, who yet some show of heart display'd,
 A short, vain effort of resistance made; —

18.

Feeble and ill-sustain'd! — The foe burst through:
 With unabating heat they search'd around;
 The wretches from their lurking-holes they drew, —
 Such mercy as the French had given they found;
 Death had more victims there in that one hour
 Than fifty years might else have render'd to his power.

19.

Here did we inn upon our pilgrimage,
 After such day an unfit resting-place:
 For who from ghastly thoughts could disengage
 The haunted mind, when every where the trace
 Of death was seen, — the blood-stain on the wall,
 And musket-marks in chamber and in hall!

20.

All talk, too, was of death. They show'd us here
 The room where Brunswick's body had been laid,
 Where his brave followers, bending o'er the bier,
 In bitterness their vow of vengeance made;
 Where Wellington beheld the slaughter'd Chief,
 And for a while gave way to manly grief.

21.

Duhesme, whose crimes the Catalans may tell,
 Died here; — with sabre strokes the posts are scored,
 Hewn down upon the threshold where he fell,
 Himself then tasting of the ruthless sword;
 A Brunswicker discharged the debt of Spain,
 And where he dropp'd the stone preserves the stain.

22.

Too much of life hath on thy plains been shed,
 Brabant! so oft the scene of war's debate;
 But ne'er with blood were they so largely fed
 As in this rout and wreck; when righteous Fate

Brought on the French, in warning to all times,
 A vengeance wide and sweeping as their crimes; —

23.

Vengeance for Egypt and for Syria's wrong;
 For Portugal's unutterable woes;
 For Germany, who suffer'd all too long
 Beneath these lawless, faithless, godless foes;
 For blood which on the Lord so long had cried,
 For Earth oppress'd, and Heaven insulted and defied.

24.

We follow'd from Genappe their line of flight
 To the Cross Roads, where Britain's sons sustain'd
 Against such perilous force the desperate fight;
 Deserving for that field, so well maintain'd,
 Such fame as for a like devotion's meed
 The world hath to the Spartan band decreed.

25.

Upon this ground the noble Brunswick died,
 Led on too rashly by his ardent heart;
 Long shall his grateful country tell with pride
 How manfully he chose the better part;
 When groaning Germany in chains was bound,
 He only of her Princes faithful found.

26.

And here right bravely did the German band
 Once more sustain their well-deserved applause;
 As when, revenging there their native land,
 In Spain they labor'd for the general cause.
 In this most arduous strife none more than they Endured the heat and burden of the day.

27.

Here too we heard the praise of British worth,
 Still best approved when most severely tried;
 Here were broad patches of loose-lying earth,
 Sufficing scarce the mingled bones to hide, —
 And half-uncover'd graves, where one might see
 The loathliest features of mortality.

28.

Eastward from hence we struck, and reach'd the field
 Of Ligny, where the Prussian, on that day
 By far-outnumbering force constrain'd to yield,
 Fronted the foe, and held them still at bay;
 And in that brave defeat acquired fresh claim
 To glory, and enhanced his country's fame.

29.

Here was a scene which fancy might delight
 To treasure up among her cherish'd stores,
 And bring again before the inward sight
 Often when she recalls the long-pass'd hours; —
 Well-cultured hill and dale extending wide,
 Hamlets and village spires on every side; —

30.

The autumnal-tinted groves; the upland mill,
 Which oft was won and lost amid the fray;

Green pastures water'd by the silent rill ;
 The lordly Castle yielding to decay,
 With bridge and barbican, and moat and tower,
 A fairer sight perchance than when it frown'd in power ; —

31.

The avenue before its ruin'd gate,
 Which, when the Castle, suffering less from time
 Than havock, hath foregone its strength and state,
 Uninjured flourisheth in nature's prime ;
 To us a grateful shade did it supply,
 Glad of that shelter from the noontide sky ; —

32.

The quarries deep, where many a massive block
 For some Parisian monument of pride,
 Hewn with long labor from the granite rock,
 Lay in the change of fortune cast aside ;
 But rightly with those stones should Prussia build
 Her monumental pile on Ligny's bloody field ! —

33.

The wealthy village bearing but too plain
 The dismal marks of recent fire and spoil ;
 Its decent habitants, an active train,
 And many a one at work with needful toil
 On roof or thatch, the ruin to repair, —
 May never War repeat such devastation there !

34.

Ill had we done if we had hurried by
 A scene in faithful history to be famed
 Through long succeeding ages ; nor may I
 The hospitality let pass unnamed,
 And courteous kindness on that distant ground,
 Which, strangers as we were, for England's sake we found.

35.

And dear to England should be Ligny's name ;
 Prussia and England both were proved that
 day ;
 Each generous nation to the other's fame
 Her ample tribute of applause will pay ;
 Long as the memory of those labors past,
 Unbroken may their Fair Alliance last !

36.

The tales which of that field I could unfold,
 Better it is that silence should conceal.
 They who had seen them shudder'd while they told
 Of things so hideous ; and they cried with zeal,
 One man hath caused all this, of men the worst, —
 O wherefore have ye spared his head accurst ?

37.

It fits not now to tell our farther way
 Through many a scene by bounteous nature
 blest,
 Nor how we found, where'er our journey lay,
 An Englishman was still an honor'd guest ;
 But still upon this point, where'er we went,
 The indignant voice was heard of discontent.

38.

And hence there lay, too plainly might we see,
 An ominous feeling upon every heart :
 What hope of lasting order could there be,
 They said, where Justice has not had her part ?
 Wisdom doth rule with Justice by her side ;
 Justice from Wisdom none may e'er divide.

39.

The shaken mind felt all things insecure :
 Accustom'd long to see successful crimes,
 And helplessly the heavy yoke endure,
 They now look'd back upon their fathers' times,
 Ere the wild rule of Anarchy began,
 As to some happier world, or golden age of man.

40.

As they who in the vale of years advance,
 And the dark eve is closing on their way,
 When on their mind the recollections glance
 Of early joy, and Hope's delightful day,
 Behold, in brighter hues than those of truth,
 The light of morning on the fields of youth.

41.

Those who amid these troubles had grown gray,
 Recurr'd with mournful feeling to the past ;
 Blest had we known our blessings, they would say ;
 We were not worthy that our bliss should last !
 Peaceful we were, and flourishing, and free ;
 But madly we required more liberty !

42.

Remorseless France had long oppress'd the land,
 And for her frantic projects drain'd its blood ;
 And now they felt the Prussian's heavy hand :
 He came to aid them ; bravely had he stood
 In their defence ; — but oh ! in peace how ill
 The soldier's deeds, how insolent his will !

43.

One general wish prevail'd, — if they might see
 The happy order of old times restored ;
 Give them their former laws and liberty ;
 This their desires and secret prayers implored ; —
 Forgetful, as the stream of time flows on,
 That that which passes is forever gone.

PART II.

THE VISION.

Ἐπεὶ οὐδὲν σκοπῶ τόξον,
 Ἄγε θυμέ.....PINDAR.

I.

THE TOWER.

1.

I THOUGHT upon these things in solitude,
 And mused upon them in the silent night ;

The open graves, the recent scene of blood,
Were present to the soul's creative sight;
These mournful images my mind possess'd,
And mingled with the visions of my rest.

2.

Methought that I was travelling o'er a plain
Whose limits, far beyond all reach of sense,
The aching, anxious sight explored in vain.
How I came there I could not tell, nor whence;
Nor where my melancholy journey lay;
Only that soon the night would close upon my way.

3.

Behind me was a dolorous, dreary scene,
With huge and mouldering ruins widely spread;
Wastes which had whilome fertile regions been,
Tombs which had lost all record of the dead;
And where the dim horizon seem'd to close,
Far off the gloomy Pyramids arose.

4.

Full fain would I have known what lay before,
But lifted there in vain my mortal eye;
That point with cloud and mist was cover'd o'er,
As though the earth were mingled with the sky.
Yet thither, as some power unseen impell'd,
My blind, involuntary way I held.

5.

Across the plain innumerable crowds,
Like me, were on their destined journey bent,
Toward the land of shadows and of clouds:
One pace they travelled, to one point they went;—
A motley multitude of old and young,
Men of all climes and hues, and every tongue.

6.

Erelong I came upon a field of dead,
Where heaps of recent carnage fill'd the way;
A ghastly sight, — nor was there where to tread,
So thickly slaughter'd, horse and man, they lay.
Methought that in that place of death I knew
Again the late-seen field of Waterloo.

7.

Troubled I stood, and doubtful where to go;
A cold, damp shuddering ran through all my frame;
Fain would I fly from that dread scene, when, lo!
A voice as from above pronounced my name;
And looking to the sound, by the way-side
I saw a lofty structure edified.

8.

Most like it seem'd to that aspiring Tower
Which old Ambition rear'd on Babel's plain,
As if he ween'd in his presumptuous power
To scale high Heaven, with daring pride profane;
Such was its giddy height; and round and round
The spiral steps in long ascension wound.

9.

Its frail foundations upon sand were placed,
And round about it mouldering rubbish lay;
For easily by time and storms defaced,
The loose materials crumbled in decay;
Rising so high, and built so insecure,
Ill might such perishable work endure.

10.

I not the less went up, and as I drew
Toward the top, more firm the structure seem'd,
With nicer art composed, and fair to view:
Strong and well-built, perchance, I might have deem'd
The pile, had I not seen and understood
Of what frail matter form'd, and on what base it stood

11.

There, on the summit, a grave personage
Received and welcomed me in courteous guise;
On his gray temples were the marks of age,
As one whom years, methought, should render wise.
I saw that thou wert fill'd with doubt and fear,
He said, and therefore have I call'd thee here.

12.

Hence from this eminence sublime I see
The wanderings of the erring crowd below,
And pitying thee in thy perplexity,
Will tell thee all that thou canst need to know
To guide thy steps aright. I bent my head
As if in thanks, — And who art thou? I said.

13.

He answer'd, I am Wisdom. Mother Earth
Me, in her vigor self-conceiving, bore;
And as from eldest time I date my birth,
Eternally with her shall I endure;
Her noblest offspring I, to whom alone
The course of sublunary things is known.

14.

Master! quoth I, regarding him, I thought
That Wisdom was the child divine of Heaven.
So, he replied, have fabling preachers taught,
And the dull World a light belief hath given.
But vainly would these fools my claim decry, —
Wisdom I am, and of the Earth am I.

15.

Thus while he spake I scann'd his features well;
Small but audacious was the Old Man's eye;
His countenance was hard, and seem'd to tell
Of knowledge less than of effrontery.
Instruct me then, I said, for thou shouldst know
From whence I came, and whither I must go.

16.

Art thou then one who would his mind perplex
With knowledge bootless even if attain'd?
Fond man! he answer'd; — wherefore shouldst thou vex
Thy heart with seeking what may not be gain'd?

Regard not what has been, nor what may be;
O Child of Earth, this Now is all that toucheth thee!

17.

He who performs the journey of to-day
Cares not if yesterday were shower or sun:
To-morrow let the heavens be what they may,
And what reeks he? — his wayfare will be done.
Heedless of what hereafter may befall,
Live whilst thou livest, for this life is all!

18.

I kept my rising indignation down,
That I might hear what farther he would teach;
Yet on my darken'd brow the instinctive frown,
Gathering at that abominable speech,
Maintain'd its place: he mark'd it, and pursued,
Tuning his practised tongue to subtle flattery's mood: —

19.

Do I not know thee, — that from earliest youth
Knowledge hath been thy only heart's desire?
Here seeing all things as they are in truth,
I show thee all to which thy thoughts aspire:
No vapors here impede the exalted sense,
Nor mists of earth attain this eminence.

20.

Whither thy way, thou askest me, and what
The region dark whereto thy footsteps tend,
And where, by one inevitable lot,
The course of all yon multitude must end.
Take thou this glass, whose perfect power shall aid
Thy faulty vision, and therewith explore the shade.

21.

Eager I look'd; but seeing with surprise
That the same darkness still the view o'erspread,
Half angrily I turn'd away mine eyes.
Complacent then the Old Man smiled and said,
Darkness is all! what more wouldst thou desery?
Rest now content, for farther none can spy.

22.

Now mark me, Child of Earth! he thus pursued;
Let not the hypocrites thy reason blind,
And to the quest of some unreal good
Divert with dogmas vain thine erring mind:
Learn thou, whate'er the motive they may call,
That Pleasure is the aim, and Self the spring of all.

23.

This is the root of knowledge. Wise are they
Who to this guiding principle attend;
They, as they press along the world's highway,
With single aim pursue their steady end;
No vain compunction checks their sure career;
No idle dreams deceive; their heart is here.

24.

They from the nature and the fate of man,
Thus clearly understood, derive their strength;

Knowing that as from nothing they began,
To nothing they must needs return at length;
This knowledge steels the heart and clears the mind,
And they create on earth the Heaven they find.

25.

Such, I made answer, was the Tyrant's creed
Who bruised the nations with his iron rod,
Till on yon field the wretch received his meed
From Britain, and the outstretch'd arm of God.
Behold him now, — Death ever in his view,
The only change for him, — and Judgment to ensue!

26.

Behold him when the unbidden thoughts arise
Of his old passions and unbridled power;
As the fierce tiger in confinement lies,
And dreams of blood that he must taste no
more, —
Then waking in that appetite of rage,
Frets to and fro within his narrow cage.

27.

Hath he not chosen well? the Old Man replied;
Bravely he aim'd at universal sway;
And never earthly Chief was glorified
Like this Napoleon in his prosperous day.
All-ruling Fate itself hath not the power
To alter what has been: and he has had his hour

28.

Take him, I answer'd, at his fortune's flood;
Russia his friend, the Austrian wars suceased,
When Kings, his creatures some, and some subdued,
Like vassals waited at his marriage feast;
And Europe like a map before him lay,
Of which he gave at will, or took away.

29.

Call then to mind Navarre's heroic chief,
Wandering by night and day through wood and glen,
His country's sufferings like a private grief
Wringing his heart: would Mina even then
Those perils and that sorrow have foregone
To be that Tyrant on his prosperous throne?

30.

But wherefore name I him whose arm was free?
A living hope his noble heart sustain'd,
A faith which bade him through all dangers see
The triumph his enduring country gain'd.
See Hofer with no earthly hope to aid, —
His country lost, himself to chains and death betray'd!

31.

By those he served deserted in his need;
Given to the unrelenting Tyrant's power,
And by his mean revenge condemn'd to bleed, —
Would he have barter'd, in that awful hour,

His heart, his conscience, and his sure renown,
For the malignant murderer's crimes and crown?

32.

Him too, I know, a worthy thought of fame
In that dread trance upheld; — the foresight sure
That in his own dear country his good name
Long as the streams and mountains should endure;
The herdsmen on the hills should sing his praise,
And children learn his deeds through all succeeding days.

33.

Turn we to those in whom no glorious thought
Lent its strong succor to the passive mind;
Nor stirring enterprise within them wrought; —
Who to their lot of bitterness resign'd,
Endured their sorrows by the world unknown,
And look'd for their reward to Death alone:

34.

Mothers within Gerona's leaguer'd wall, [die; —
Who saw their famish'd children pine and Widows surviving Zaragoza's fall
To linger in abhorr'd captivity; —
Yet would not have exchanged their sacred woe
For all the empire of their miscreant foe!

35.

Serene the Old Man replied, and smiled with scorn,
Behold the effect of error! thus to wear
The days of miserable life forlorn,
Struggling with evil and consumed with care; —
Poor fools, whom vain and empty hopes mislead!
They reap their sufferings for their only meed.

36.

O false one, I exclaim'd, whom canst thou fool
With such gross sophisms, but the wicked heart?
The pupils of thine own unhappy school
Are they who choose the vain and empty part;
How oft in age, in sickness, and in woe,
Have they complain'd that all was vanity below!

37.

Look at that mighty Gaznevide, Mahmood,
When, pining in his Palace of Delight,
He bade the gather'd spoils of realms subdued
Be spread before him to regale his sight,
Whate'er the Orient boasts of rich and rare, —
And then he wept to think what toys they were!

38.

Look at the Russian minion when he play'd
With pearls and jewels which surpass'd all price;
And now apart their various hues array'd,
Blended their colors now in union nice,
Then, weary of the bawbles, with a sigh,
Swept them aside, and thought that all was vanity!

39.

Wean'd by the fatal Messenger from pride,
The Syrian through the streets exposed his shroud;

And one that ravaged kingdoms far and wide
Upon the bed of sickness cried aloud,
What boots my empire in this mortal throe?
For the Grave calls me now, and I must go!

40.

Thus felt these wretched men, because decay
Had touch'd them in their vitals; Death stood by;
And Reason, when the props of flesh gave way,
Purged as with euphrasy the mortal eye.
Who seeks for worldly honors, wealth, or power,
Will find them vain indeed at that dread hour!

41.

These things are vain; but all things are not so;
The virtues and the hopes of human-kind! —
Yea, by the God who, ordering all below,
In his own image made the immortal mind,
Desires there are which draw from Him their birth,
And bring forth lasting fruits for Heaven and Earth.

42.

Therefore through evil and through good content,
The righteous man performs his part assign'd;
In bondage lingering, or with sufferings spent,
Therefore doth peace support the heroic mind;
And from the dreadful sacrifice of all,
Meek woman doth not shrink at Duty's call.

43.

Therefore the Martyr clasps the stake in faith,
And sings thanksgiving while the flames aspire;
Victorious over agony and death,
Sublime he stands, and triumphs in the fire,
As though to him Elijah's lot were given,
And that the chariot and the steeds of Heaven.

II.

THE EVIL PROPHET.

1.

With that my passionate discourse I brake;
Too fast the thought, too strong the feeling came.
Composed the Old Man listen'd while I spake,
Nor moved to wrath, nor capable of shame;
And when I ceased, unalter'd was his mien,
His hard eye unabash'd, his front serene.

2.

Hard is it error from the mind to weed,
He answer'd, where it strikes so deep a root.
Let us to other argument proceed,
And if we may, discover what the fruit
Of this long strife, — what harvest of great good
The World shall reap for all this cost of blood!

3.

Assuming then a frown as thus he said,
He stretch'd his hand from that commanding
height;

Behold, quoth he, where thrice ten thousand dead
 Are laid, the victims of a single fight!
 And thrice ten thousand more at Ligny lie,
 Slain for the prelude to this tragedy!

4.

This but a page of the great book of war, —
 A drop amid the sea of human woes! —
 Thou canst remember when the Morning Star
 Of Freedom on rejoicing France arose,
 Over her vine-clad hills and regions gay,
 Fair even as Phosphor, who foreruns the day.

5.

Such and so beautiful that Star's uprising;
 But soon the glorious dawn was overcast:
 A baleful track it held across the skies,
 Till now, through all its fatal changes past,
 Its course fulfill'd, its aspects understood,
 On Waterloo it hath gone down in blood.

6.

Where now the hopes with which thine ardent youth
 Rejoicingly to run its race began?
 Where now the reign of Liberty and Truth,
 The Rights Omnipotent of Equal Man,
 The principles should make all discord cease,
 And bid poor human-kind repose at length in peace?

7.

Behold the Bourbon to that throne by force
 Restored, from whence by fury he was cast:
 Thus to the point where it began its course,
 The melancholy cycle comes at last;
 And what are all the intermediate years? —
 What, but a bootless waste of blood and tears!

8.

The peace which thus at Waterloo ye won,
 Shall it endure with this exasperate foe?
 In gratitude for all that ye have done,
 Will France her ancient enmity forego?
 Her wounded spirit, her envenom'd will
 Ye know, — and ample means are left her still.

9.

What though the tresses of her strength be shorn;
 The roots remain untouch'd; and as of old
 The bondsman Samson felt his power return
 To his knit sinews, so shall ye behold
 France, like a giant fresh from sleep, arise
 And rush upon her slumbering enemies.

10.

Woe then for Belgium! for this ill-doom'd land,
 The theatre of strife through every age!
 Look from this eminence, whereon we stand, —
 'What is the region round us but a stage
 For the mad pastime of Ambition made,
 Whereon War's dreadful drama may be play'd?

11.

Thus hath it been from history's earliest light,
 When yonder by the Sabis Cæsar stood,

And saw his legions, raging from the fight,
 Root out the noble nation they subdued;
 Even at this day the peasant findeth there
 The relics of that ruthless massacre.

12.

Need I recall the long religious strife?
 Or William's hard-fought fields? or Marlborough's fame,
 Here purchased at such lavish price of life, —
 Or Fontenoy, or Fleurus' later name?
 Wherever here the foot of man may tread,
 The blood of man hath on that spot been shed.

13.

Shall then Futurity a happier train
 Unfold, than this dark picture of the past?
 Dreamst thou again of some Saturnian reign,
 Or that this ill-compacted realm should last?
 Its wealth and weakness to the foe are known,
 And the first shock subverts its baseless throne.

14.

O wretched country, better should thy soil
 Be laid again beneath the invading seas,
 Thou goodliest masterpiece of human toil,
 If still thou must be doom'd to scenes like these!
 O Destiny inexorable and blind!
 O miserable lot of poor mankind!

15.

Saying thus, he fix'd on me a searching eye
 Of stern regard, as if my heart to reach:
 Yet gave he now no leisure to reply;
 For ere I might dispose my thoughts for speech,
 The Old Man, as one who felt and understood
 His strength, the theme of his discourse pursued.

16.

If we look farther, what shall we behold
 But every where the swelling seeds of ill,
 Half-smother'd fires, and causes manifold
 Of strife to come; the powerful watching still
 For fresh occasion to enlarge his power,
 The weak and injured waiting for their hour?

17.

Will the rude Cossack with his spoils bear back
 The love of peace and humanizing art?
 Think ye the mighty Moscovite shall lack
 Some specious business for the ambitious heart?
 Or the black Eagle, when she moults her plume,
 The form and temper of the Dove assume?

18.

From the old Germanic chaos hath there risen
 A happier order of establish'd things?
 And is the Italian Mind from papal prison
 Set free to soar upon its native wings?
 Or look to Spain, and let her Despot tell
 If there thy high-raised hopes are answer'd well!

19.

At that appeal my spirit breathed a groan;
 But he triumphantly pursued his speech:

O Child of Earth, he cried with loftier tone,
The present and the past one lesson teach;
Look where thou wilt, the history of man
Is but a thorny maze, without a plan!

20.

The winds which have in viewless heaven their birth,
The waves which in their fury meet the clouds,
The central storms which shake the solid earth,
And from volcanoes burst in fiery floods,
Are not more vague, and purportless, and blind,
Than is the course of things among mankind!

21.

Rash hands unravel what the wise have spun;
Realms which in story fill so large a part,
Rear'd by the strong, are by the weak undone;
Barbarians overthrow the works of art,
And what force spares is sapp'd by sure decay,—
So earthly things are changed and pass away.

22.

And think not thou thy England hath a spell,
That she this general fortune should elude;
Easier to crush the foreign foe, than quell
The malice which misleads the multitude,
And that dread malady of erring zeal,
Which like a cancer eats into the commonweal.

23.

The fabric of her power is undermined;
The earthquake underneath it will have way,
And all that glorious structure, as the wind
Scatters a summer cloud, be swept away;
For Destiny, on this terrestrial ball,
Drives on her iron car, and crushes all.

24.

Thus as he ended, his mysterious form [view.
Enlarged, grew dim, and vanish'd from my
At once on all sides rush'd the gather'd storm,
The thunders roll'd around, the wild winds blew,
And as the tempest round the summit beat,
The whole frail fabric shook beneath my feet.

III.

THE SACRED MOUNTAIN.

1.

BUT then, methought, I heard a voice exclaim,
Hither, my Son, oh, hither take thy flight!
A heavenly voice which call'd me by my name,
And bade me hasten from that treacherous
height:
The voice it was which I was wont to hear,
Sweet as a Mother's to her infant's ear.

2.

I hesitated not, but at the call
Sprung from the summit of that tottering tower.

There is a motion known in dreams to all,
When, buoyant by some self-sustaining power,
Through air we seem to glide, as if set free
From all encumbrance of mortality.

3.

Thus borne aloft, I reach'd the Sacred Hill,
And left the scene of tempests far behind;
But that old tempter's parting language still Press'd like a painful burden on my mind;
The troubled soul had lost her inward light,
And all within was black as Erebus and Night.

4.

The thoughts which I had known in youth return'd,
But, oh, how changed! a sad and spectral train;
And while for all the miseries past I mourn'd,
And for the lives which had been given in vain,
In sorrow and in fear I turn'd mine eye
From the dark aspects of futurity.

5.

I sought the thickest woodland's shade profound,
As suited best my melancholy mood,
And cast myself upon the gloomy ground.
When lo! a gradual radiance fill'd the wood;
A heavenly presence rose upon my view,
And in that form divine the awful Muse I knew.

6.

Hath then that Spirit false perplex'd thy heart,
O thou of little faith! severe she cried.
Bear with me, Goddess, heavenly as thou art,
Bear with my earthly nature! I replied,
And let me pour into thine ear my grief;
Thou canst enlighten, thou canst give relief.

7.

The ploughshare had gone deep, the sower's hand
Had scatter'd in the open soil the grain;
The harrow, too, had well prepared the land;
I look'd to see the fruit of all this pain!—
Alas! the thorns and old inveterate weed
Have sprung again, and stifled the good seed.

8.

I hoped that Italy should break her chains,
Foreign and papal, with the world's applause,
Knit in firm union her divided reigns,
And rear a well-built pile of equal laws:
Then might the wrongs of Venice be forgiven,
And joy should reach Petrarca's soul in Heaven.

9.

I hoped that that abhorr'd Idolatry
Had in the stife received its mortal wound:
The Souls which from beneath the Altar cry,
At length, I thought, had their just vengeance
found;—
In purple and in scarlet clad, behold
The Harlot sits, adorn'd with gems and gold!

10.

The golden cup she bears full to the brim
Of her abominations, as of yore;

Her eyeballs with inebriate triumph swim ;
 Though drunk with righteous blood, she thirsts for more,
 Eager to reassert her influence fell,
 And once again let loose the Dogs of Hell

11.

Woe for that people, too, who by their path
 For these late triumphs first made plain the way ;
 Whom, in the Valley of the Shade of Death,
 No fears nor fiery sufferings could dismay ;
 Art could not tempt, nor violence enthrall
 Their firm devotion, faithful found through all.

12.

Strange race of haughty heart and stubborn will,
 Slavery they love, and chains with pride they wear ;
 Inflexible alike in good or ill,
 The inveterate stamp of servitude they bear.
 Oh fate perverse, to see all change withstood,
 There only where all change must needs be good !

13.

But them no foe can force, nor friend persuade ;
 Impassive souls in iron forms enclosed,
 As though of human mould they were not made,
 But of some sterner elements composed,
 Against offending nations to be sent,
 The ruthless ministers of punishment.

14.

Where are those Minas after that career
 Wherewith all Europe rang from side to side ?
 In exile wandering ! Where the Mountaineer, —
 Late, like Pelayo, the Asturian's pride ?
 Had Ferdinand no mercy for that life,
 Exposed so long for him in daily, hourly strife !

15.

From her Athenian orator of old
 Greece never listen'd to sublimer strain
 Than that with which, for truth and freedom bold,
 Quintana moved the inmost soul of Spain.
 What meed is his let Ferdinand declare —
 Chains, and the silent dungeon, and despair !

16.

For this hath England borne so brave a part !
 Spent with endurance, or in battle slain,
 Is it for this so many an English heart
 Lies mingled with the insensate soil of Spain !
 Is this the issue, this the happy birth
 In those long throes and that strong agony brought forth !

17.

And oh ! if England's fatal hour draw nigh, —
 If that most glorious edifice should fall
 By the wild hands of bestial Anarchy, —
 Then might it seem that He who ordereth all
 Doth take for sublunary things no care ; —
 The burden of that thought is more than I can bear.

18.

Even as a mother listens to her child
 My plaint the Muse divine benignant heard,
 Then answer'd, in reproving accents mild,
 What if thou seest the fruit of hope deferr'd ;
 Dost thou for this in faltering faith repine ?
 A manlier, wiser virtue should be thine !

19.

Ere the good seed can give its fruit in Spain,
 The light must shine on that bedarken'd land,
 And Italy must break her papal chain,
 Ere the soil answer to the sower's hand ;
 For, till the sons their fathers' fault repent,
 The old error brings its direful punishment.

20.

Hath not experience bade the wise man see
 Poor hope from innovations premature ?
 All sudden change is ill : slow grows the tree
 Which in its strength through ages shall endure.
 In that ungrateful earth it long may lie
 Dormant, but fear not that the seed should die.

21.

Falsely that Tempter taught thee that the past
 Was but a blind, inextricable maze ;
 Falsely he taught that evil overcast
 With gathering tempests these propitious days,
 That he in subtle snares thy soul might bind,
 And rob thee of thy hopes for human-kind.

22.

He told thee the beginning and the end
 Were indistinguishable all, and dark ;
 And when from his vain Tower he bade thee bend
 Thy curious eye, well knew he that no spark
 Of heavenly light would reach the baffled sense ;
 The mists of earth lay round him all too dense.

23.

Must I, as thou hadst chosen the evil part,
 Tell thee that Man is free and God is good ?
 These primal truths are rooted in thy heart :
 But these, being rightly felt and understood,
 Should bring with them a hope, calm, constant,
 sure,
 Patient, and on the rock of faith secure.

24.

The Monitress Divine, as thus she spake,
 Induced me gently on, ascending still,
 And thus emerging from that mournful brake
 We drew toward the summit of the hill,
 And reach'd a green and sunny place, so fair
 As well with long-lost Eden might compare.

25.

Broad cedars grew around that lovely glade,
 Exempted from decay, and never sere,
 Their wide-spread boughs diffused a fragrant
 shade ;
 The cypress incorruptible was here,
 With fluted stem and head aspiring high,
 Nature's proud column, pointing to the sky.

26.

There, too, the vigorous olive in its pride,
 As in its own Apulian soil unchecked,
 Tower'd high, and spread its glaucous foliage wide :
 With liveliest hues the mead beneath was deck'd,
 Gift of that grateful tree that with its root
 Repays the earth, from whence it feeds its fruit.

27.

There, too, the sacred bay, of brighter green,
 Exalted its rejoicing head on high ;
 And there the martyrs' holier palm was seen
 Waving its plumage as the breeze went by.
 All fruits which ripen under genial skies
 Grew there, as in another Paradise.

28.

And over all that lovely glade there grew
 All wholesome roots and plants of healing power ;
 The herb of grace, the medicinal rue,
 The poppy rich in worth as gay in flower ;
 The heart's-ease that delighteth every eye,
 And sage divine, and virtuous cuphrasy.

29.

Unwounded here Judæa's balm distill'd
 Its precious juice ; the snowy jasmine here
 Spread its luxuriant tresses wide, and fill'd
 With fragrance the delicious atmosphere ;
 More piercing still did orange-flowers dispense
 From golden groves the purest joy of sense.

30.

As low it lurk'd the tufted moss between,
 The violet there its modest perfume shed,
 Like humble virtue, rather felt than seen :
 And here the Rose of Sharon rear'd its head,
 The glory of all flowers, to sense and sight
 Yielding their full contentment of delight.

31.

A gentle river wound its quiet way
 Through this sequester'd glade, meandering
 wide ;
 Smooth as a mirror here the surface lay,
 Where the pure lotus, floating in its pride,
 Enjoy'd the breath of heaven, the sun's warm beam,
 And the cool freshness of its native stream.

32.

Here, o'er green weeds, whose tresses waved out-
 spread,
 With silent lapse the glassy waters run ;
 Here, in fleet motion o'er a pebbly bed,
 Gliding they glance and ripple to the sun ;
 The stirring breeze that swept them in its flight,
 Raised on the stream a shower of sparkling light.

33.

And all sweet birds sung there their lays of love ;
 The mellow thrush, the blackbird loud and shrill,
 The rapturous nightingale that shook the grove,
 Made the ears vibrate, and the heart-strings thrill ;
 The ambitious lark, that, soaring in the sky,
 Pour'd forth her lyric strain of ecstasy.

34.

Sometimes, when that wild chorus intermits,
 The linnet's song was heard amid the trees,
 A low, sweet voice ; and sweeter still, at fits
 The ringdove's wooing came upon the breeze ;
 While with the wind which moved the leaves among,
 The murmuring waters join'd in undersong.

35.

The hare disported here, and fear'd no ill,
 For never evil thing that glade came nigh ;
 The sheep were free to wander at their will,
 As needing there no earthly shepherd's eye ;
 The bird sought no concealment for her nest,
 So perfect was the peace wherewith those bowers were blest.

36.

All blending thus with all in one delight,
 The soul was soothed, and satisfied, and fill'd ;
 This mingled bliss of sense, and sound, and sight,
 The flow of boisterous mirth might there have still'd,
 And, sinking in the gentle spirit deep,
 Have touch'd those strings of joy which make us weep.

37.

Even thus in earthly gardens had it been,
 If earthly gardens might with these compare ;
 But more than all such influences, I ween,
 There was a heavenly virtue in the air,
 Which laid all vain, perplexing thoughts to rest,
 And heal'd, and calm'd, and purified the breast.

38.

Then said I to that guide divine, My soul,
 When here we enter'd, was o'ercharged with grief ;
 For evil doubts, which I could not control,
 Beset my troubled spirit. This relief, —
 This change, — whence are they ? Almost it might seem
 I never lived till now : — all else had been a dream.

39.

My heavenly teacher answer'd, Say not seem ; —
 In this place all things are what they appear ;
 And they who feel the past a feverish dream,
 Wake to reality on entering here.
 These waters are the Well of Life, and lo !
 The Rock of Ages there, from whence they flow

40.

Saying thus, we came upon an inner glade,
 The holiest place that human eyes might see ;
 For all that vale was like a temple made
 By Nature's hand, and this the sanctuary ;
 Where, in its bed of living rock, the Rood
 Of Man's redemption firmly planted stood.

41.

And at its foot the never-failing Well
 Of Life profusely flow'd that all might drink.

Most blessed Water! Neither tongue can tell
The blessedness thereof, nor heart can think,
Save only those to whom it hath been given
To taste of that divinest gift of Heaven.

42.

There grew a goodly Tree this Well beside;—
Behold a branch from Eden planted here,
Pluck'd from the Tree of Knowledge, said my guide.

O Child of Adam, put away thy fear,—
In thy first father's grave it hath its root;
Taste thou the bitter, but the wholesome fruit.

43.

In awe I heard, and trembled, and obey'd:
The bitterness was even as of death;
I felt a cold and piercing thrill pervade
My loosen'd limbs, and losing sight and breath,
To earth I should have fallen in my despair,
Had I not clasp'd the Cross, and been supported there.

44.

My heart, I thought, was bursting with the force
Of that most fatal fruit; soul-sick I felt,
And tears ran down in such continuous course,
As if the very eyes themselves should melt.
But then I heard my heavenly teacher say,
Drink, and this mortal stound will pass away.

45.

I stoop'd and drank of that divinest Well,
Fresh from the Rock of Ages where it ran,
It had a heavenly quality to quell
My pain:— I rose a renovated man,
And would not now, when that relief was known,
For worlds the needful suffering have foregone.

46.

Even as the Eagle (ancient storyers say)
When, faint with years, she feels her flagging wing,
Soars up toward the mid sun's piercing ray,
Then, fill'd with fire, into some living spring
Plunges, and casting there her aged plumes,
The vigorous strength of primal youth resumes;—

47.

Such change in me that blessed Water wrought;
The bitterness which, from its fatal root,
The Tree derived, with painful healing fraught,
Pass'd clean away; and in its place the fruit
Produced, by virtue of that wondrous wave,
The savor which in Paradise it gave.

48.

Now, said the heavenly Muse, thou mayst advance,
Fitly prepared toward the mountain's height.
O Child of Man, this necessary trance
Hath purified from flaw thy mortal sight,
That, with scope unconfined of vision free,
Thou the beginning and the end mayst see.

49.

She took me by the hand, and on we went;
Hope urged me forward, and my soul was strong,
With winged speed we scaled the steep ascent,
Nor seem'd the labor difficult or long,
Ere on the summit of the sacred hill
Upraised I stood, where I might gaze my fill.

50.

Below me lay, unfolded like a scroll,
The boundless region where I wander'd late,
Where I might see realms spread and oceans roll,
And mountains from their cloud-surmounting
state
Dwarf'd like a map beneath the excursive sight,
So ample was the range from that commanding height.

51.

Eastward with darkness round on every side,
An eye of light was in the farthest sky.
Lo, the beginning!— said my heavenly Guide;
The steady ray which there thou canst descry,
Comes from lost Eden, from the primal land
Of man "waved over by the fiery brand."

52.

Look now toward the end! no mists obscure,
Nor clouds will there impede the strengthen'd
sight;
Unblench'd thine eye the vision may endure.
I look'd, — surrounded with effulgent light
More glorious than all glorious hues of even,
The Angel Death stood there in the open Gate of Heaven.

IV.

THE HOPES OF MAN.

1.

Now, said my heavenly Teacher, all is clear!—
Bear the Beginning and the End in mind,
The course of human things will then appear
Beneath its proper laws; and thou wilt find,
Through all their seeming labyrinth, the plan
Which "vindicates the ways of God to Man."

2.

Free choice doth Man possess of good or ill;
All were but mockery else. From Wisdom's way,
Too oft, perverted by the tainted will,
Is his rebellious nature drawn astray;
Therefore an inward monitor is given,
A voice that answers to the law of Heaven.

3.

Frail as he is, and as an infant weak,
The knowledge of his weakness is his strength;
For succor is vouchsafed to those who seek
In humble faith sincere; and when at length
Death sets the disimbodied spirit free,
According to their deeds their lot shall be.

4.

Thus, should the chance of private fortune raise
 A transitory doubt, Death answers all.
 And in the scale of nations, if the ways
 Of Providence mysterious we may call,
 Yet, rightly view'd, all history doth impart
 Comfort, and hope, and strength to the believing heart.

5.

For through the lapse of ages may the course
 Of moral good progressive still be seen,
 Though mournful dynasties of Fraud and Force,
 Dark Vice and purblind Ignorance intervene;
 Empires and Nations rise, decay and fall,
 But still the Good survives and perseveres through all.

6.

Yea, even in those most lamentable times,
 When, every where to wars and woes a prey,
 Earth seem'd but one wide theatre of crimes,
 Good unperceived had work'd its silent way,
 And all those dread convulsions did but clear
 The obstructed path to give it free career.

7.

But deem not thou some overruling Fate,
 Directing all things with benign decree,
 Through all the turmoil of this mortal state,
 Appoints that what is best shall therefore be;
 Even as from man his future doom proceeds,
 So nations rise or fall according to their deeds.

8.

Light at the first was given to human-kind,
 And Law was written in the human heart.
 If they forsake the Light, perverse of mind,
 And wilfully prefer the evil part,
 Then to their own devices are they left,
 By their own choice of Heaven's support bereft.

9.

The individual culprit may sometimes
 Unpunish'd to his after-reckoning go:
 Not thus collective man, — for public crimes
 Draw on their proper punishment below;
 When Nations go astray, from age to age
 The effects remain, a fatal heritage.

10.

Bear witness, Egypt, thy huge monuments
 Of priestly fraud and tyranny austere!
 Bear witness thou, whose only name presents
 All holy feelings to religion dear, —
 In Earth's dark circlet once the precious gem
 Of living light, — O fallen Jerusalem!

11.

See barbarous Africa, on every side
 To error, wretchedness, and crimes resign'd!
 Behold the vicious Orient, far and wide
 Entrall'd in slavery! As the human mind
 Corrupts and goes to wreck, Earth sickens there,
 And the contagion taints the ambient air.

12.

They had the Light, and from the Light they
 turn'd;
 What marvel if they grope in darkness lost?
 They had the Law; — God's natural Law they scorn'd,
 And choosing error, thus they pay the cost!
 Wherever Falsehood and Oppression reign,
 There degradation follows in their train.

13.

What, then, in these late days had Europe been,
 This moral, intellectual heart of earth, —
 From which the nations who lie dead in sin
 Should one day yet receive their second birth, —
 To what had she been sunk if brutal Force
 Had taken unrestrain'd its impious course!

14.

The Light had been extinguish'd, — this, be sure,
 The first wise aim of conscious Tyranny,
 Which knows it may not with the Light endure.
 But where Light is not, Freedom cannot be;
 "Where Freedom is not, there no Virtue is;"
 Where Virtue is not, there no Happiness.

15.

If among hateful Tyrants of all times
 For endless execration handed down,
 One may be found surpassing all in crimes,
 One that for infamy should bear the crown,
 Napoleon is that man, in guilt the first,
 Preëminently bad among the worst.

16.

For not, like Scythian conquerors, did he tread
 From his youth up the common path of blood;
 Nor like some Eastern Tyrant was he bred
 In sensual harems, ignorant of good; —
 Their vices from the circumstance have grown;
 His, by deliberate purpose, were his own.

17.

Not led away by circumstance he err'd,
 But from the wicked heart his error came.
 By Fortune to the highest place preferr'd,
 He sought through evil means an evil aim,
 And all his ruthless measures were design'd
 To enslave, degrade, and brutalize mankind.

18.

Some barbarous dream of empire to fulfil,
 Those iron ages he would have restored,
 When Law was but the ruffian soldier's will,
 Might govern'd all, the sceptre was the sword,
 And Peace, not elsewhere finding where to dwell,
 Sought a sad refuge in the convent-cell.

19.

Too far had he succeeded! In his mould
 An evil generation had been framed,
 By no religion temper'd or controll'd,
 By foul examples of all crimes inflamed,
 Of faith, of honor, of compassion void; —
 Such were the fitting agents he employ'd.

20.

Believing as yon lying Spirit taught,
 They to that vain philosophy held fast,
 And trusted that, as they began from nought,
 To nothing they should needs return at last;
 Hence no restraint of conscience, no remorse,
 But every baleful passion took its course.

21.

And had they triumph'd, Earth had once again,
 To Violence subdued, and impious Pride,
 Verged to such state of wickedness, as when
 The Giantry of old their God defied,
 And Heaven, impatient of a world like this,
 Open'd its flood-gates, and broke up the abyss.

22.

That danger is gone by. On Waterloo
 The Tyrant's fortune in the scale was weigh'd, —
 His fortune and the World's, — and England threw
 Her sword into the balance — down it sway'd:
 And when in battle first he met that foe,
 There he received his mortal overthrow.

23.

O my brave Countrymen, with that I said, —
 For then my heart with transport overflow'd, —
 O Men of England! nobly have ye paid
 The debt which to your ancestors ye owed,
 And gather'd for your children's heritage
 A glory that shall last from age to age!

24.

And we did well when on our Mountain's height
 For Waterloo we raised the festal flame,
 And in our triumph taught the startled night
 To ring with Wellington's victorious name,
 Making the far-off mariner admire
 To see the crest of Skiddaw plumed with fire.

25.

The Moon who had in silence visited
 His lonely summit from the birth of time,
 That hour an unavailing splendor shed,
 Lost in the effulgence of the flame sublime,
 In whose broad blaze rejoicingly we stood,
 And all below a depth of blackest solitude.

26.

Fit theatre for this great joy we chose;
 For never since above the abating Flood
 Emerging, first that pinnacle arose,
 Had cause been given for deeper gratitude,
 For prouder joy to every English heart,
 When England had so well perform'd her arduous part.

27.

The Muse replied with gentle smile benign, —
 Well mayst thou praise the land that gave thee
 birth,
 And bless the Fate which made that country thine;
 For of all ages and all parts of earth,
 To choose thy time and place did Fate allow,
 Wise choice would be this England and this Now.

28.

From bodily and mental bondage, there
 Hath Man his full emancipation gain'd;
 The viewless and illimitable air
 Is not more free than Thought; all unrestrain'd,
 Nor pined in want, nor sunk in sensual sloth,
 There may the immortal Mind attain its growth.

29.

There, under Freedom's tutelary wing,
 Deliberate Courage fears no human foe;
 There, undefiled, as in their native spring,
 The living waters of Religion flow;
 There, like a beacon, the transmitted Light,
 Conspicuous to all nations, burneth bright.

30.

The virtuous will she hath, which should aspire
 To spread the sphere of happiness and light;
 She hath the power to answer her desire,
 The wisdom to direct her power aright;
 The will, the power, the wisdom thus combined,
 What glorious prospects open on mankind!

31.

Behold! she cried, and lifting up her hand,
 The shaping elements obey'd her will; —
 A vapor gather'd round our lofty stand,
 Roll'd in thick volumes o'er the Sacred Hill;
 Descending then, its surges far and near
 Fill'd all the wide subjacent atmosphere.

32.

As I have seen from Skiddaw's stony height
 The fleecy clouds scud round me on their way,
 Condense beneath, and hide the vale from sight,
 Then, opening, just disclose where Derwent lay
 Burnish'd with sunshine like a silver shield,
 Or old Enchanter's glass, for magic forms fit field;—

33.

So at her will, in that receding sheet
 Of mist wherewith the world was overlaid,
 A living picture moved beneath our feet.
 A spacious City first was there display'd,
 The seat where England from her ancient reign
 Doth rule the Ocean as her own domain.

34.

In splendor with those famous cities old, Whose power it hath surpass'd, it now might vie;
 Through many a bridge the wealthy river roll'd;
 Aspiring columns rear'd their heads on high;
 Triumphal arches spann'd the roads, and gave
 Due guerdon to the memory of the brave.

35.

A landscape follow'd, such as might compare
 With Flemish fields for well-requited toil:
 The wonder-working hand had every where
 Subdued all circumstance of stubborn soil;
 In fen and moor reclaim'd, rich gardens smiled,
 And populous hamlets rose amid the wild.

36.

There the old seaman, on his native shore,
 Enjoy'd the competence deserved so well;
 The soldier, his dread occupation o'er,
 Of well-rewarded service loved to tell;
 The gray-hair'd laborer there, whose work was done,
 In comfort saw the day of life go down.

37.

Such was the lot of old; for childhood there
 The duties which belong to life was taught:
 The good seed, early sown and nursed with care,
 This bounteous harvest in its season brought;
 Thus youth for manhood, manhood for old age
 Prepared, and found their weal in every stage.

38.

Enough of knowledge unto all was given
 In wisdom's way to guide their steps on earth,
 And make the immortal spirit fit for heaven.
 This needful learning was their right of birth;
 Further might each, who chose it, persevere;
 No mind was lost for lack of culture here.

39.

And that whole happy region swarm'd with life,—
 Village and town;—as busy bees in spring,
 In sunny days, when sweetest flowers are rife,
 Fill fields and gardens with their murmuring.
 Oh joy to see the State in perfect health!
 Her numbers were her pride, and power, and wealth.

40.

Then saw I, as the magic picture moved,
 Her shores enrich'd with many a port and pier;
 No gift of liberal Nature unimproved.
 The seas their never-failing harvest here
 Supplied, as bounteous as the air which fed
 Israel, when manna fell from heaven for bread.

41.

Many a tall vessel in her harbors lay,
 About to spread its canvass to the breeze,
 Bound upon happy errand to convey
 The adventurous colonist beyond the seas,
 Toward those distant lands where Britain blest
 With her redundant life the East and West.

42.

The landscape changed;—a region next was seen,
 Where sable swans on rivers yet unfound
 Glided through broad savannahs ever green;
 Innumerable flocks and herds were feeding round,
 And scatter'd farms appear'd, and hamlets fair,
 And rising towns, which made another Britain there.

43.

Then, thick as stars which stud the moonless sky,
 Green islands in a peaceful sea were seen;
 Darken'd no more with blind idolatry,
 Nor curst with hideous usages obscene,
 But heal'd of leprous crimes, from butchering
 strife
 Deliver'd, and reclaim'd to moral life.

44.

Around the rude Morai, the temple now
 Of truth, hosannahs to the Holiest rung:
 There, from the Christian's equal marriage-vow,
 In natural growth, the household virtues sprung;
 Children were taught the paths of heavenly peace,
 And age in hope look'd on to its release.

45.

The light those happy Islanders enjoy'd,
 Good messengers from Britain had convey'd;
 (Where might such bounty wiselier be employ'd?)
 One people with their teachers were they made,
 Their arts, their language, and their faith the same,
 And, blest in all, for all they blest the British name.

46.

Then rose a different land, where loftiest trees
 High o'er the grove their fan-like foliage rear;
 Where spicy bowers upon the passing breeze
 Diffuse their precious fragrance far and near;
 And yet untaught to bend his massive knee,
 Wisest of brutes, the elephant roams free.

47.

Ministrant there to health and public good,
 The busy axe was heard on every side,
 Opening new channels, that the noxious wood
 With wind and sunshine might be purified,
 And that wise Government, the general friend,
 Might every where its eye and arm extend.

48.

The half-brutal Bedah came from his retreat,
 To human life by human kindness won;
 The Cingalese beheld that work complete
 Which Holland in her day had well begun;
 The Candian, prospering under Britain's reign,
 Blest the redeeming hand which broke his chain.

49.

Colors and castes were heeded there no more;
 Laws which depraved, degraded, and oppress'd,
 Were laid aside, for on that happy shore
 All men with equal liberty were blest;
 And through the land, the breeze upon its swells
 Bore the sweet music of the Sabbath bells.

50.

Again the picture changed; those Isles I saw
 With every crime through three long centuries
 curst,
 While unrelenting Avarice gave the law;
 Scene of the injured Indians' sufferings first,
 Then doom'd, for Europe's lasting shame, to see
 The wider-wasting guilt of Slavery.

51.

That foulest blot had been at length effaced;
 Slavery was gone, and all the power it gave,
 Whereby so long our nature was debased,
 Baleful alike to master and to slave.
 O lovely Isles! ye were indeed a sight
 To fill the spirit with intense delight!

52.

For willing industry and cheerful toil
 Perform'd their easy task, with Hope to aid ;
 And the free children of that happy soil
 Dwelt each in peace beneath his cocoa's shade ; —
 A race who with the European mind
 The adapted mould of Africa combined.

53.

Anon, methought that in a spacious Square,
 Of some great town the goodly ornament,
 Three statutes I beheld, of sculpture fair :
 These, said the Muse, are they whom one consent
 Shall there deem worthy of the purest fame ; —
 Knowest thou who best such gratitude may claim ?

54.

Clarkson, I answer'd, first ; whom to have seen
 And known in social hours may be my pride,
 Such friendship being praise ; and one, I ween,
 Is Wilberforce, placed rightly at his side,
 Whose eloquent voice in that great cause was heard
 So oft and well. But who shall be the third ?

55.

Time, said my Teacher, will reveal the name
 Of him who with these worthies shall enjoy
 The equal honor of enduring fame ; —
 He who the root of evil shall destroy,
 And from our Laws shall blot the accursed word
 Of Slave, shall rightly stand with them prefer'd.

56.

Enough ! the Goddess cried : with that the cloud
 Obey'd, and closed upon the magic scene :
 Thus much, quoth she, is to thine hopes allow'd ;
 Ills may impede, delays may intervene,
 But scenes like these the coming age will bless,
 If England but pursue the course of righteousness.

57.

On she must go progressively in good,
 In wisdom and in weal, — or she must wane.
 Like Ocean, she may have her ebb and flood,
 But stagnates not. And now her path is plain :
 Heaven's first command she may fulfil in peace,
 Replenishing the earth with her increase.

58.

Peace she hath won, — with her victorious hand
 Hath won through rightful war auspicious peace ;
 Nor this alone, but that in every land
 The withering rule of violence may cease.
 Was ever War with such blest victory crown'd ?
 Did ever Victory with such fruits abound ?

59.

Rightly for this shall all good men rejoice,
 They most who most abhor all deeds of blood ;
 Rightly for this with reverential voice
 Exalt to Heaven their hymns of gratitude ;
 For ne'er till now did Heaven thy country bless
 With such transcendent cause for joy and thankfulness.

60.

If they in heart all tyranny abhor,
 This was the fall of Freedom's direst foe ;
 If they detest the impious lust of war,
 Here hath that passion had its overthrow ; —
 As the best prospects of mankind are dear,
 Their joy should be complete, their prayers of praise sincere.

61.

And thou to whom in spirit at this hour
 The vision of thy Country's bliss is given,
 Who feelest that she hold her trusted power
 To do the will and spread the word of Heaven, —
 Hold fast the faith which animates thy mind,
 And in thy songs proclaim the hopes of human-kind.

NOTES.

PART I.

*The second day was that when Martel broke
 The Mussulmen. — I. 3, p. 749.*

Upon this subject Miss Plumtre relates a remarkable anecdote, in the words of one of the sufferers at Lyons : —
 " At my entrance into the prison of the Recluse I found about twelve hundred of my fellow-citizens already immured there, distributed in different apartments. The doom of four fifths of them at least was considered as inevitable ; it was less a prison than a fold, where the innocent sheep patiently waited the hour that was to carry them to the revolutionary shambles. In this dreary abode, how long, how tedious did the days appear ! they seemed to have many more than twenty-four hours. Yet we were allowed to read and write, and were composed enough to avail ourselves of this privilege ; nay, we could sometimes even so far forget our situation as to sport and gambol together. The continued images of destruction and devastation which we had before our eyes, the little hope that appeared to any of us of escaping our menaced fate, so familiarized us with the idea of death, that a stoical serenity had taken possession of our minds : we had been kept in a state of fear till the sentiment of fear was lost. All our conversation bore the character of this disposition : it was reflective, but not complaining ; it was serious without being melancholy ; and often presented novel and striking ideas. One day, when we were conversing on the inevitable chain of events, and the irrevocable order of things, on a sudden one of our party exclaimed that we owed all our misfortunes to Charles Martel. We thought him raving ; but thus he reasoned to prove his hypothesis. ' Had not Charles Martel,' said he, ' conquered the Saracens, these latter, already masters of Guienne, of Saintonge, of Perigord, and of Poitou, would soon have extended their dominion over all France, and from that time we should have had no more religious quarrels, no more state disputes ; we should not now have assemblies of the people, clubs, committees of public safety, sieges, imprisonments, bloody executions.' To this man the Turkish system of government appeared preferable to the revolutionary regime ; and, all chances calculated, he preferred the bow-string of the Bashaw, rarely drawn, to the axe of the guillotine, incessantly at work."

That old siege — I. 10, p. 750.

" It is uncertain what numbers were slain during the siege of Ostend, yet it is said that there was found in a commissary's pocket, who was slain before Ostend the 7th of August, before the yielding thereof, divers remarkable notes and observations, and among the rest what number died without in the archduke's camp, of every degree.

Masters of the camp.....	7
Colonels.....	15
Sergeants Majors.....	29
Captains.....	565

Sergeants.....	1911
Corporals.....	1166
Lansquadiers.....	600
Soldiers.....	34663
Marriners.....	611

All which amount to 72124 persons; which number is not so great, considering the long siege, sickness, and the cold winters upon the sea coast, in so cold a climate, fighting against the elements. It is unknown what number died in the town, the which is thought much less, for that there were not so many in the town, and they were better lodged, had more ease, and were better victualled." — GRIMSTONE'S Hist. of the Netherlands, p. 1317.

"The besieged in Ostend had certain adventuring soldiers whom they called Lopers, of the which, among other captains, were the young captain Grenu, and captain Adam Van Leest. Their arms which they bore were a long and great pike, with a flat head at the neather end thereof, to the end that it should not sink too deep into the mud, a arquebuse hung in a scarf, as we have said of Frebuteis, a coutelas at his side, and his dagger about his neck, who would usually leap over a ditch four and twenty foot broad, skirmishing often with his enemy so as no horseman could overtake them before they had leapt over the ditches againe." — Ibid. 1299.

"In remembrance of the long siege of Ostend, and the winning of Sluce, there were certaine counters made in the United Provinces, both of silver and copper, the one having on the one side the picture of Ostend, and on the other the towns of Rhinberg, Grave, Sluce, Ardenbourg, and the forts of Isendyke and Cadsant, with this inscription round about. 'Plus triennio obsessa, hosti rudera, patriæ quatuor ex me urbes dedi. Anno 1604.' Ostend being more than three years besieged, gave the enemy a heap of stones, and to her native country four townes.

"The town of Utrecht did also make a triumphant piece of coyne both of gold and silver, where on the one side stood the siege of Ostend, and on the other the siege of Sluce, and all the forts and havens, and on both sides round about was graven,

'Jehovah prius dederat plus quam perdidimus.'" Ibid. 1318.

*Many a rich vessel, from the injurious sea,
Enter the bosom of thy quiet quay.* — I. 12, p. 750.

These lines are borrowed from Quarles; — the passage in which they occur would be very pleasing if he had not disfigured it in a most extraordinary manner.

'Saile gentle Pinnace! now the heavens are clear,
The winds blow fair: behold the harbor's near.
Tridented Neptune hath forgot to frown,
The rocks are past; the storme is overblown.
Up weather-beaten voyagers and rouse ye,
Forsake your loathed Cabbins; up and louze ye
Upon the open decks, and smell the land:
Cheare up, the welcome shoare is nigh at hand.
Saile gentle Pinnace with a prosperous gale
To the Isle of Peace: saile gentle Pinnace saile!
Fortune conduct thee; let thy keele divide
The silver streames, that thou maist safely slide
Into the bosom of thy quiet Key,
And quite thee fairly of the injurious Sea.

QUARLES'S Argalus & Parthema.

Bruges. — I, 14, p. 750.

Urbs est ad miraculum pulchra, potens, amœna, says Luigi Guicciardini. Its power is gone by, but its beauty is perhaps more impressive now than in the days of its splendor and prosperity.

M. Paquet Syphorieo, and many writers after him, mention the preservation of the monuments of Charles the Bold, and his daughter Mary of Burgundy, wife to the Archduke Maximilian; but they do not mention the name of the Beadle who preserved them at the imminent risk of his own life. Pierre Dezitter is this person's name. During the revolutionary frenzy, when the mob seemed to take most pleasure in destroying whatever was most venerable, he took these splendid tombs to pieces and buried them during the night, for which he was proscribed and a reward of 2000 francs set upon his head. Bonaparte, after his marriage into the Austrian family, rewarded him with 1000 francs, and gave 10,000 for ornamenting the chapel in which the tombs were replaced. This has been done with little taste.

..... that sisterhood whom to their rule
Of holy life no hasty vows restrain. — I. 31, p. 751.

The Beguines. Helyot is mistaken when he says (t. viii. p. 6) that the Beguinage at Meeldin is the finest in all Flanders; it is not comparable to that at Ghent, which for extent and beauty may be called the Capital of the community.

..... Alost,
Where whilome treachery stain'd the English name.
I. 41, p. 752

In 1583, "the English garrison of Alost being mutinied for their pay, the Gantois did not only refuse to give it them, but did threaten to force them out, or else to famish them. In the meantime the Prince of Parma did not let slip this opportunity to make his profit thereby, but did solicit them by fair words and promises to pay them; and these English companies, not accustomed to endure hunger and want, began to give ear unto him, for that their Colonel Sir John Norris and the States were somewhat slow to provide for their pay, for the which they intended to give order, but it was too late. For after that the English had chased away the rest of the garrison which were of the country, then did Captain Pigot, Vincent, Tailor, and others, agree to deliver up the town unto the Spaniard, giving them for their pay, which they received, thirty thousand pistolets. And so the said town was delivered unto the Spaniard in the beginning of December, and filled with Wallons. Most of these English went to serve the Prince of Parma in his camp before Eckloo, but finding that he trusted them not, they ran in a manner all away." — GRIMSTONE, 833.

It is one proof of the improved state of general feeling in the more civilized states of Europe, that instances of this kind of treachery have long since ceased even to be suspected. During the long wars in the Netherlands, nothing was more common than for officers to change their party, — considering war as a mere profession, in which their services, like those of a lawyer, were for the best bidder.

Then saw we Afflighem, by ruin rent. — I. 42, p. 752.

This magnificent Abbey was destroyed during the Revolution, — an act of popular madness which the people in its vicinity now spoke of with unavailing regret. The library was at one time the richest in Brabant; "et cetera," Luigi Guicciardini calls it, "adeo quidem, ut quod ad libros antiquos habeatur pro locupletissima simul et laudatissima universa istius tractus." The destruction of books during the Revolution was deplorably great. A bookseller at Brussels told me he had himself at one time sent off five and twenty wagon-loads for waste paper, and sold more than 100,000lb. weight for the same purpose! In this manner were the convent-libraries destroyed.

Assche, for water and for cakes renown'd. — I. 44, p. 752.

The Flemish name of these said cakes has a marvellously uncouth appearance — suyker-kackrkens, — nevertheless they are good cakes, and are sold by Judocus de Bisschop, at the sign of the Moor, next door to the Auberge la Tête-de-Bœuf. This information is for those whom it may concern.

.....when Belgian ears were taught
The British soldier's cry, half groan, half prayer,
Breathed when his pain was more than he can bear.

II. 12, p. 753.

One of our coachmen, who had been employed (like all his fraternity) in removing the wounded, asked us what was the meaning of the English word O Lord! for thus, he said, the wounded were continually crying out.

Brabant in all her cities felt the sound. — II. 15, p. 753.

The battle of the 18th was heard throughout the whole of Brabant, and in some directions far beyond it. It was distinctly heard at Herve; and I have been assured, incredible as it may seem, that it was perceived at Amiens. The firing on the 16th was heard at Antwerp, — not that of the 18th, though the scene of action was nearer.

Here Castanaca rear'd a votive fane. — III. 4, p. 753.

The following dedicatory inscription is placed over the portico of Waterloo Church: —

D. O. M.
Et D. D. Josepho et Annæ
Hoc Sacellum
Pro Desiderata Dominiis Catholicis
Caroli. 2. Hisp. Ind. Regis Belg. Principis Prosapia Fran.
Ant. Agurto Marchio de Castanaca Belg. Gubernator.

The a in Gubernator has been left out, either by the mistake of the workmen, or for want of room.

Carlos II. of Spain, one of the most wretched of men, married for his first wife Marie Louise, Lewis the Fourteenth's niece. A curious instance of the public anxiety that she should produce an heir to the throne is preserved by Florez in his Memorias de las Reinas Catholicas. When she had been married two years without issue, this strange epigram, if so it may be called, was circulated.

*Parid bella Flor de Lis
En affliction tan estrana:
Si parís, parís á España,
Si no parís, á París.*

Florez describes the dress of the bride at her espousals: it was a robe of murray velvet embroidered with fleurs de lys of gold trimmed with ermine and jewels, and with a train of seven ells long; the princesses of the blood had all long trains, but not so long, the length being according to their proximity to the throne. The description of a Queen's dress accorded well with the antiquarian pursuits of Florez; but it is amusing to observe some of the expressions of this laborious writer, a monk of the most rigid habits, whose life was spent in severe study, and in practices of mortification. In her head-dress, he says, she wore porcelain pins which supported large diamonds, — y convertian ea cielo aquel poco de tierra; and at the ball after the espousals, el Christianissimo danzó can la Catholica. These appellations sound almost as oddly as Messrs. Bogue and Bennett's description of St. Paul in a minuet, and Timothy at a card-table.

This poor Queen lived eight years with a husband whose mind and body were equally debilitated. Never were the miseries of a mere state-marriage more lamentably exemplified. In her last illness, when she was advised to implore the prayers of a personage who was living in the odor of sanctity for her recovery, she replied, Certainly I will not; — it would be folly to ask for a life which is worth so little. And when, toward the last, her Confessor inquired if any thing troubled her, her answer was that she was in perfect peace, and rejoiced that she was dying, — en paz me hallo Padre, y muy gustosa de morir. She died on the 12th of February; and such was the solicitude for an heir to the monarchy, that on the 15th of May a second marriage was concluded for the King.

The two following are the epitaphs in the church-yard: —

D. O. M.
Sacred to the memory of Lieutenant-Colonel Fitz Gerald, of the Second Regiment of Life Guards of his Britannic Majesty, who fell gloriously at the battle of La Belle Alliance, near this town, on the 18th of June, 1815, in the 41st year of his life, deeply and deservedly regretted by his family and friends. To a manly loftiness of soul he united all the virtues that could render him an ornament to his profession, and to private and social life.

Aux manes du plus vertueux des hommes, généralement estimé et regretté de sa famille et de ses amis, le Lieutenant-Colonel Fitz Gerald, de la Gard du Corps de sa Majesté Britannique, tué glorieusement à la bataille de la Belle Alliance, le 18 June, 1815

Lord Uxbridge's leg is buried in a garden opposite to the inn, or rather public-house, at Waterloo. The owner of the house in which the amputation was performed considers it as a relic which has fallen to his share. He had deposited it at first behind the house; but as he intended to plant a tree upon the spot, he considered, that as the ground there was not his own property, the boys might injure or destroy the tree, and therefore he removed the leg into his own garden, where it lies in a proper sort of coffin, under a mound of earth about three or four feet in diameter. A tuft of Michaelmas daisies was in blossom upon this mound when we were at Waterloo; but this was a temporary ornament: in November the owner meant to plant a weeping willow there. He was obliging enough to give me a copy of an epitaph which he had prepared, and which, he said, was then in the stone-cutter's hands. It is as follows:—

Ci est enterrée la Jambe de l'illustre, brave, et vaillant Comte Uxbridge, Lieutenant-Général, Commandant en Chef la Cavalerie Angloise, Belge, et Hollandoise; blessé le 18 Juin, 1815, a la mémorable bataille de Waterloo; qui par son héroïsme a concouru au triomphe de la cause du Genre humain, glorieusement décidée par l'éclatante victoire du dit jour

*When Marlborough here, victorious in his might,
Surprised the French, and smote them in their flight.*

III. 11, p. 754.

A detachment of the French was intrenched at Waterloo Chapel, August, 1705, when the Duke of Marlborough advanced to attack the French army at Over Ysche, and this detachment was destroyed with great slaughter. (Echard's Gazetteer.) The Sieur La Lande says, "on donne la chasse à une partie François qui étoit à Waterloo." Marlborough was prevented by the Deputies of the States from pursuing his advantage, and attacking the enemy, at a time when he made sure of victory. — Hist. de l'Empereur Charles VI. t. ii. p. 90.

..... *Mount St. John,
The hamlet which the Highlanders that day
Preserved from spoil.* — III. 15, p. 754.

The peasant who led us over the field resided at this hamlet. Mont St. Jean was every thing to him, and his frequent exclamations of admiration for the courage of the Highlanders in particular, and indeed of the whole army, always ended with a reference to his own dwelling-place: "if they had not fought so well, Oh mon Dieu, Mont St. Jean would have been burnt."

This was an intelligent man, of very impressive countenance and manners. Like all the peasantry with whom we conversed, he spoke with the bitterest hatred of Bonaparte, as the cause of all the slaughter and misery he had witnessed, and repeatedly expressed his astonishment that he had not been put to death. My horse, said he, was full of the wounded:—it was nothing but sawing off legs, and sawing off arms. Oh my God, and all for one man! Why did you not put him to death? I myself would have put him to death with my own hand.

Small theatre for such a tragedy. — III. 17, p. 754.

So important a battle perhaps was never before fought within so small an extent of ground. I computed the distance between Hougomont and Papelot at three miles; in a straight line it might probably not exceed two and a half.

Our guide was very much displeased at the name which the battle had obtained in England. Why call it the battle of Waterloo? he said,—call it Mont St. Jean, call it La Belle Alliance, call it Hougomont, call it La Haye Sainte, call it Papelot,—any thing but Waterloo.

..... *Admiring Belgium saw
The youth proved worthy of his destined crown.*

III. 20, p. 754.

A man at Les Quatre Bras, who spoke with the usual enthusiasm of the Prince of Orange's conduct in the campaign, declared that he fought "like a devil on horseback." Looking at a portrait of the Queen of the Netherlands, a lady observed that there was a resemblance to the Prince; a young Fleming was quite angry at this,—he could not bear that his hero should not be thought beautiful as well as brave.

Genappe. — IV. 12, p. 757.

At the Roy d'Espagne, where we were lodged, Wellington had his head-quarters on the 17th, Bonaparte on the 18th, and Blucher on the 19th. The coachmen had told us that it was an assez bon auberge; but when one of them in the morning asked how we had passed the night, he observed that no one ever slept at Genappe,—it was impossible, because of the continual passing of posts and coal-carts.

The Cross Roads. — IV. 24, p. 753.

It is odd that the inscription upon the directing-post at Les Quatre Bras, (or rather boards, for they are fastened against a house,) should be given wrongly in the account of the campaign printed at Frankfort. The real directions are,

$\frac{3}{4}$ de pte ver St. Douler
 $\frac{3}{4}$ de pte ver Genappe
 $\frac{3}{4}$ de pte ver Marbais
 $\frac{3}{4}$ de pte ver Frasné, spelt in this manner, and ill cut. I happened to copy it in a mood of superfluous minuteness.

A fat and jolly Walloon, who inhabited this corner house, ate his dinner in peace at twelve o'clock on the 16th, and was driven out by the balls flying about his ears at four the same day. This man described that part of the action which took place in his sight, with great animation. He was particularly impressed by the rage,—the absolute fury which the French displayed; they cursed the English while they were fighting, and cursed the precision with which the English grape-shot was fired, which, said the man, was neither too high nor too low, but struck right in the middle. The last time that a British army had been in this place, the Duke of York slept in this man's bed,—an event which the Walloon remembered with gratitude as well as pride, the Duke having given him a Louis d'or.

O wherefore have ye spared his head accursed! — IV. 36, p. 759.

Among the peasantry with whom we conversed this feeling was universal. We met with many persons who disliked the union with Holland, and who hated the Prussians, but none who spoke in favor or even in palliation of Bonaparte. The manner in which this ferocious beast, as they call him, has been treated, has given a great shock to the moral feelings of mankind. The almost general mode of accounting for it on the Continent, is by a supposition that England purposely let him loose from Elba in order to have a pretext for again attacking France, and crippling a country which she had left too strong, and which would soon have outstripped her in prosperity. I found it impossible to dispossess even men of sound judgment and great ability of this belief, preposterous as it is; and when they read the account of the luxuries which have been sent to St. Helena for the accommodation of this great criminal, they will consider it as the fullest proof of their opinion.

And now they felt the Prussian's heavy hand. — IV. 43, p. 759.

Wherever we went we heard one cry of complaint against the Prussians, -- except at Ligny, where the people had witnessed only their courage and their sufferings. This is the effect of making the military spirit predominate in a nation. The conduct of our men was universally extolled; but it required years of exertion and severity before Lord Wellington brought the British army to its present state of discipline. The moral discipline of an army has never perhaps been understood by any General, except the great Gustavus. Even in its best state, with all the alleviations of courtesy and honor, with all the correctives of morality and religion, war is so great an evil, that to engage in it without a clear necessity is a crime of the blackest dye. When the necessity is clear, (and such, assuredly, I hold it to have been in our struggle with Bonaparte,) it then becomes a crime to shrink from it.

What I have said of the Prussians relates solely to their conduct in an allied country; and I must also say that the Prussian officers with whom I had the good fortune to associate, were men who in every respect did honor to their profession and to their country. But that the general conduct of their troops in Belgium had excited a strong feeling of disgust and indignation we had abundant and indisputable testimony. In France they had old wrongs to revenge, — and forgiveness of injuries is not among the virtues which are taught in camps. The annexed anecdotes are reprinted from one of our newspapers, and ought to be preserved.

"A Prussian Officer, on his arrival at Paris, particularly requested to be billeted on the house of a lady inhabiting the Faubourg St. Germain. His request was complied with, and on his arriving at the lady's hotel, he was shown into a small but comfortable sitting-room, with a handsome bed-chamber adjoining it. With these rooms he appeared greatly dissatisfied, and desired that the lady should give up to him her apartment, (on the first floor,) which was very spacious, and very elegantly furnished. To this the lady made the strongest objections; but the Officer insisted, and she was under the necessity of retiring to the second floor. He afterwards sent a message to her by one of her servants, saying that he destined the second floor for his Aid-de-Camp, &c. &c. This occasioned more violent remonstrances from the lady, but they were totally unavailing, and unattended to by the Officer, whose only answer was, 'obéissez à mes ordres.' He then called for the cook, and told him he must prepare a handsome dinner for six persons, and desired the lady's butler to take care that the best wines the cellar contained should be forthcoming. After dinner he desired the hostess should be sent for; — she obeyed the summons. The Officer then addressed her, and said, 'No doubt, Madam, but you consider my conduct as indecorous and brutal in the extreme.' 'I must confess,' replied she, 'that I did not expect such treatment from an officer; as, in general, military men are ever disposed to show every degree of deference and respect to our sex.' 'You think me then a most perfect barbarian? answer me frankly.' 'If you really, then, desire my undisguised opinion of the subject, I must say, that I think your conduct truly barbarous.' 'Madam, I am entirely of your opinion; but I only wished to give you a specimen of the behavior and conduct of your son, during six months that he resided in my house, after the entrance of the French army into the Prussian capital. I do not, however, mean to follow a bad example. You will resume, therefore, your apartment to-morrow, and I will seek lodgings at some public hotel.' The lady then retired, extolling the generous conduct of the Prussian officer, and deprecating that of her son."

"Another Prussian officer was lodged at the house of Marshal Ney, in whose stables and coach-house he found a great number of horses and carriages. He immediately ordered some Prussian soldiers, who accompanied him, to take away nine of the horses and three of the carriages. Ney's servants violently remonstrated against this proceeding, on which the Prussian officer observed, 'They are my property, inasmuch as your master took the same number of horses and carriages from me when he entered Berlin with the French army.' I think you will agree with me, that the lex talionis was never more properly nor more justly resorted to."

PART II.

The Martyr. — I. 43, p. 762.

Sir Thomas Brown writes upon this subject with his usual feeling.

"We applaud not," says he, "the judgment of Machiavel, that Christianity makes men cowards, or that, with the confidence of but half dying, the despised virtues of patience and humility have abased the spirits of men, which pagan principles exalted; but rather regulated the wildness of audacities in the attempts, grounds and eternal sequels of death, wherein men of the boldest spirit are often prodigiously temerarious. Nor can we extenuate the valor of ancient martyrs, who contemned death in the uncomfortable scene of their lives, and in their decrepit martyrdoms did probably lose not many months of their days, or parted with life when it was scarce worth living. For (beside that long time past holds no consideration unto a slender time to come) they had no small disadvantage from the constitution of old age, which naturally makes men fearful, and complexionally superannuated from the bold and courageous thoughts of youth and fervent years. But the contempt of death from corporal animosity promoteth not our felicity. They may sit in the Orchestra and noblest seats of Heaven who have held up shaking hands in the fire, and humanly contended for glory." — Hydriotaphia, 17.

*In purple and in scarlet clad, behold
The Harlot sits, adorned with gems and gold!*

III. 9, p. 764.

The homely but scriptural appellation by which our fathers were wont to designate the Church of Rome has been delicately softened down by later writers. I have seen her somewhere called the Scarlet Woman, — and Helen Maria Williams names her the Dissolute of Babylon.

Let me here offer a suggestion in defence of Voltaire. Is it not probable, or rather can any person doubt, that the écrasez l'infame, upon which so horrible a charge against him has been raised, refers to the Church of Rome, under this well-known designation? No man can hold the principles of Voltaire in stronger abhorrence than I do, — but it is an act of justice to exculpate him from this monstrous accusation.

*For till the sons their fathers' faults repent,
The old error brings its direful punishment.*

III. 19, p. 765

"Political chimeras," says Count Stolberg, "are innumerable; but the most chimerical of all is the project of imagining that a people deeply sunk in degeneracy are capable of recovering the ancient grandeur of freedom. Who tosses the bird into the air after his wings are clipped? So far from restoring it to the power of flight, it will but disable it more." — Travels, iii. 139.

..... the lark
Pour'd forth her lyric strain. — III. 33, p. 766

The epithet lyric, as applied to the lark, is borrowed from one of Donne's poems. I mention this more particularly for the purpose of repairing an accidental omission in the notes to Roderick; — it is the duty of every poet to acknowledge all his obligations of this kind to his predecessors.

..... public crimes
Draw on their proper punishment below. — IV. 9, p. 768.

I will insert here a passage from one of Lord Brooke's poems. Few writers have ever given proofs of profounder thought than this friend of Sir Philip Sydney. Had his command of language been equal to his strength of intellect, I scarcely know the author whom he would not have surpassed

XXI.

Some love no equals, some superiors scorn,
 One seeks more worlds, and this will Helen have;
 This covets gold, with divers faces borne,
 These humors reign, and lead men to their grave;
 Whereby for bayes and little wages we
 Ruin ourselves to raise up tyranny.

XXII.

And as when winds among themselves do jar,
 Seas there are tost, and wave with wave must fight;
 So when power's restless humors bring forth War,
 There people bear the faults and wounds of Might;
 The error and diseases of the head
 Descending still until the limbs be dead.

XXIII.

Yet are not people's errors ever free
 From guilt of wounds they suffer by the war;
Never did any public misery
Rise of itself: God's plagues still grounded are
 On common stains of our humanity;
 And to the flame which ruineth mankind
 Man gives the matter, or at least gives wind.
A Treatie of Warres.

The extract which follows, from the same author, bears as directly upon the effects of the military system as if it had been written with a reference to Bonaparte's government. The thoughtful reader will perceive its intrinsic value, through its difficult language and uncouth versification.

LIX.

Let us then thus conclude, that only they
 Whose end in this world is the world to come,
 Whose hearts' desire is that their desires may Measure themselves by Truth's eternal doom,
 Can in the War find nothing that they prize,
 Who in the world would not be great or wise.

LX.

With these, I say, War, Conquest, Honor, Fame,
 Stand (as the world) neglected or forsaken,
 Like Error's cobwebs, in whose curious frame
 She only joys and mourns, takes and is taken;
 In which these dying, that to God live thus,
 Endure our conquests, would not conquer us.

LXI.

Where all states else that stand on power, not grace,
 And gage desire by no such spiritual measure,
 Make it their end to reign in every place,
 To war for honor, for revenge and pleasure;
 Thinking the strong should keep the weak in awe,
 And every inequality give law.

LXII.

These serve the world to rule her by her arts,
 Raise mortal trophies upon mortal passion;
 Their wealth, strength, glory, growing from those hearts
 Which to their ends they ruin and disfaction;
 The more remote from God the less remorse;
 Which still gives Honor power, Occasion force.

LXIII.

These make the Sword their judge of wrong and right,
 Their story Fame, their laws but Power and Wit;
 Their endless mine all vanities of Might,
 Rewards and Pains the mystery of it;
 And in this sphere, this wilderness of evils,
 None prosper highly but the perfect Devils.
A Treatie of Warres.

They had the Light, and from the Light they turn'd.
 IV. 12, p. 768

"Let no ignorance," says Lord Brooke, "seem to excuse mankind; since the light of truth is still near us, the tempter and accuser at such continual war within us, the laws that guide so good for them that obey, and the first shape of every sin so ugly, as whosoever does but what he knows, or forbears what he doubts, shall easily follow nature unto grace."

"God left not the world without information from the beginning; so that wherever we find ignorance, it must be charged to the account of man, as having rejected, and not to that of his Maker, as having denied, the necessary means of instruction." — HORNE'S Considerations on the Life of St. John the Baptist.

Napoleon. — IV. 15, p. 768.

It is amusing to look back upon the flattery which was offered to Bonaparte. Some poems of M^{lle}. Fanny de Beauharnois exhibit rich specimens of this kind: she praises him for la douce humanité

Que le dévorc de sa flamme.

Of the battle of Austerlitz she says,

Dans ce jour mémorable on dut finir la guerre,
Et que nommeront maints auteurs
La Trinité des Empereurs,
Vous seul en êtes le mystère.

Subsequent events give to some of these adulatory strains an interest which they would else have wanted.

Napoléon, objet de nos hommages,
Et Joséphine, objet non moins aimé,
Couple que l'Éternel l'un pour l'autre a formé,
Vous êtes ses plus beaux ouvrages.

In some stanzas, called Les Trois Bateaux, upon the vessels in which Alexander and Bonaparte held their conferences before the Peace of Tilsit, the following prophecy is introduced, with a felicity worthy of the Edinburgh Review: —

Tremble, tremble, frère Albion!
Guidé par d'heureuses étoiles,
Ces généreux bateaux, exempts d'ambition,
Vont triompher par-tout de tes cent mille voiles.

The Grand Napoléon is the

Eufun cheri de Mars et d'Apollon,
Qu'aucun revers ne peut abattre.

Here follows part of an Arabic poem by Michael Sabhag, addressed to Bonaparte on his marriage with Marie Louise, and printed, with translations in French prose and German verse, in the first volume of the Fundgruben des Orients: —

"August Prince, whom Heaven has given us for Sovereign, and who holdest among the greatest monarchs of thy age the same rank which the diadem holds upon the head of Kings,

"Thou hast reached the summit of happiness, and by thine invincible courage hast attained a glory which the mind of man can scarcely comprehend;

"Thou hast imprinted upon the front of time the remembrance of thine innumerable exploits in characters of light, one of which alone suffices with its brilliant rays to enlighten the whole universe.

"Who can resist him who is never abandoned by the assistance of Heaven, who has Victory for his guide, and whose course is directed by God himself?

"In every age Fortune produces a hero who is the pearl of his time; amidst all these extraordinary men thou shinest like an inestimable diamond in a necklace of precious stones.

"The least of thy subjects, in whatever country he may be, is the object of universal homage, and enjoys thy glory, the splendor of which is reflected upon him.

"All virtues are united in thee, but the justice which regulates all thy actions would alone suffice to immortalize thy name.

* * * * *

"Perhaps the English will now understand at last that it is folly to oppose themselves to the wisdom of thy designs, and to strive against thy fortune."

A figure of Liberty, which, during the days of Jacobinism, was erected at Aix in Provence, was demolished during the night about the time when Bonaparte assumed the empire. Among the squibs to which this gave occasion, was the following question and answer between Pasquin and Marforio. Pasquin inquires, Mais qu'est-ce qui est devenu donc de la Liberté? — Heyday, what is become of Liberty then? — To which Marforio replies, Bête! elle est morte en s'accouchant d'un Empereur — Blockhead! she is dead in bringing forth an Emperor. — Miss PLUMTRE's Narrative, ii. 382.

Well may the lines of Pindar respecting Tantalus be applied to Bonaparte.

Εἰ δὲ δὴ τιν' ἄν-δρα θνατὸν Ὀλύμπου σκοποὶ ἐτίμασαν, ἦν Τάνταλος οὗτος. Ἄλλὰ γὰρ καταπέψαι μέγαν ὄλβον οὐκ ἔδυννάσθη· κόρῳ δ' ἔλεν
Ἄταν ὑπέρροπλον.

PINDAR, OL. I.

Nam se deve accusar a Fortuna de cega, mas sô aos que della se deixam cegar. It is not Fortune, says D. Luiz da Cunha, who ought to be accused of blindness, — but they who let themselves be blinded by her. — MEMORIAS DESDE 1659 até 1706. MSS.

Lieutenant Bowerbank, in his Journal of what passed on board the Bellerophon, has applied a passage from Horace to the same effect, with humorous felicity.

I, BONE, quo virtus tua te vocat,
Grandia laturus meritorum præmia.

EPIST. 2, lib. ii. v. 37.

One bead more in this string of quotations: Un Roi philosophe, says the Comte de Puissaye, speaking of Frederick of Prussia, dans le sens de nos jours, est selon moi le plus terrible fléau que le ciel puisse envoyer aux habitans de la terre. Mais l'idée d'un Roi philosophe et despote, est un injure au sens commun, un outrage à la raison. — Mémoires, t. ii. 125.

..... On Waterloo
*The Tyrant's fortune in the scale was weigh'd,
His fortune and the World's, and England threw
Her sword into the balance.* — IV. 22, p. 769.

“How highly has Britain been honored,” says Alexander Knox, in a letter to Hannah More, written not long after the battle of Waterloo; “and yet how awfully has all undue exultation been repressed by the critical turn which, after all, effected a prosperous conclusion! It was not human wisdom which wrought our deliverance; for when policy (as well as prowess) had done its utmost, Bonaparte's return from Elba seemed at once to undo all that had been accomplished. It was not human power; for at Waterloo the prize was as much as ever to be contended for; and notwithstanding all that had been achieved, the fate of Europe once more trembled on the balance. Never, surely, did so momentous and vital a contest terminate at once so happily and so instructively.” — Knox's Remains, iv. 297.

CARMEN NUPTIALE.

The Lay of the Laureate.

TO HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS CHARLOTTE,

THE FOLLOWING POEM IS DEDICATED

WITH PROFOUND RESPECT, BY HER ROYAL HIGHNESS'S MOST DUTIFUL

AND MOST DEVOTED SERVANT,

ROBERT SOUTHEY,

POET LAUREATE.

PROEM.

1.

There was a time when all my youthful thought
Was of the Muse; and of the Poet's fame,
How fair it flourisheth, and fadeth not, —
Alone enduring, when the Monarch's name
Is but an empty sound, the Conqueror's bust
Moulders and is forgotten in the dust.

2.

How best to build the imperishable lay
Was then my daily care, my dream by night;
And early in adventurous essay
My spirit imp'd her wings for stronger flight;

98

Fair regions Fancy open'd to my view, —
“There lies thy path,” she said; “do thou that path pursue!

3.

“For what hast thou to do with wealth or power,
Thou whom rich Nature at thy happy birth
Bless'd in her bounty with the largest dower
That Heaven indulges to a child of Earth, —
Then when the sacred Sisters for their own
Baptized thee in the springs of Helicon?

4.

“They promised for thee that thou shouldst eschew
All low desires, all empty vanities;

That thou shouldst, still to Truth and Freedom true,

The applause or censure of the herd despise ;
And, in obedience to their impulse given,
Walk in the light of Nature and of Heaven.

“ Along the World’s highway let others crowd,
Jostling and moiling on through dust and heat ;
Far from the vain, the vicious, and the proud,
Take thou, content in solitude, thy seat ;
To noble ends devote thy sacred art,
And nurse for better worlds thine own immortal part ! ”

6.

Praise to that Power who, from my earliest days,
Thus taught me what to seek and what to shun,
Who turn’d my footsteps from the crowded ways,
Appointing me my better course to run
In solitude, with studious leisure bless’d,
The mind unfetter’d, and the heart at rest.

7.

For therefore have my days been days of joy,
And all my paths are paths of pleasantness :
And still my heart, as when I was a boy,
Doth never know an ebb of cheerfulness ;
Time, which matures the intellectual part,
Hath tinged my hairs with gray, but left untouched my heart.

8.

Sometimes I soar where Fancy guides the rein,
Beyond this visible diurnal sphere ;
But most, with long and self-approving pain,
Patient pursue the historian’s task severe ;
Thus in the ages which are past I live,
And those which are to come my sure reward will give.

9.

Yea, in this now, while Malice frets her hour,
Is foretaste given me of that meed divine ;
Here, undisturb’d in this sequester’d bower,
The friendship of the good and wise is mine ;
And that green wreath which decks the Bard
when dead,
That laureate garland, crowns my living head.

10.

That wreath which, in Eliza’s golden days,
My Master dear, divinest Spenser, wore,
That which rewarded Drayton’s learned lays,
Which thoughtful Ben and gentle Daniel bore, —
Grin, Envy, through thy ragged mask of scorn !
In honor it was given, with honor it is worn !

11.

Proudly I raised the high thanksgiving strain
Of victory in a rightful cause achieved ;
For which I long had look’d, and not in vain,
As one who, with firm faith and undecieved,
In history and the heart of man could find
Sure presage of deliverance for mankind.

12.

Proudly I offer’d to the royal ear
My song of joy when War’s dread work was done,
And glorious Britain round her satiate spear
The olive garland twined, by Victory won ;
Exulting as became me in such cause,
I offer’d to the Prince his People’s just applause.

13.

And when, as if the tales of old Romance
Were but to typify his splendid reign,
Princes and Potentates from conquer’d France,
And chiefs in arms approved, a peerless train,
Assembled at his Court, — my duteous lays Preferr’d a welcome of enduring praise.

14.

And when that last and most momentous hour
Beheld the re-risen cause of evil yield
To the Red Cross and England’s arm of power,
I sung of Waterloo’s unequal’d field,
Paying the tribute of a soul imbued
With deepest joy devout and awful gratitude.

15.

Such strains besem’d me well. But how shall I
To hymeneal numbers tune the string,
Who to the trumpet’s martial symphony,
And to the mountain gales am wont to sing ?
How may these unaccustom’d accents suit
To the sweet dulcimer and courtly lute ?

16.

Fitter for me the lofty strain severe,
That calls for vengeance for mankind oppress’d ;
Fitter the songs that youth may love to hear,
Which warm and elevate the throbbing breast ;
Fitter for me with meed of solemn verse,
In reverence, to adorn the hero’s hearse.

17.

But then my Master dear arose to mind,
He on whose song, while yet I was a boy,
My spirit fed, attracted to its kind,
And still insatiate of the growing joy ; —
He on whose tomb these eyes were wont to dwell,
With inward yearnings which I may not tell ; —

18.

He whose green bays shall bloom forever young,
And whose dear name whenever I repeat,
Reverence and love are trembling on my tongue ;
Sweet Spenser, sweetest Bard ; yet not more sweet
Than pure was he, and not more pure than wise,
High Priest of all the Muses’ mysteries.

19.

I call’d to mind that mighty Master’s song,
When he brought home his beautifullest bride,
And Mulla murmur’d her sweet undersong,
And Mole with all his mountain woods replied
Never to mortal lips a strain was given
More rich with love, more redolent of Heaven.

20.

His cup of joy was mantling to the brim,
 Yet solemn thoughts enhanced his deep delight;
 A holy feeling fill'd his marriage-hymn,
 And Love aspired with Faith a heavenward
 flight.
 And hast not thou, my Soul, a solemn theme?
 I said, and mused until I fell into a dream.

 THE DREAM.

1.

METHOUGHT I heard a stir of hasty feet,
 And horses tramp'd and coaches roll'd along,
 And there were busy voices in the street,
 As if a multitude were hurrying on;
 A stir it was which only could befall
 Upon some great and solemn festival.

2.

Such crowds I saw, and in such glad array,
 It seem'd some general joy had fill'd the land;
 Age had a sunshine on its cheek that day,
 And children, tottering by the mother's hand,
 Too young to ask why all this joy should be,
 Partook it, and rejoiced for sympathy.

3.

The shops, that no dull care might intervenc,
 Were closed; the doors within were lined with heads;
 Glad faces were at every window seen,
 And from the cluster'd house-tops and the leads,
 Others, who took their stand in patient row,
 Look'd down upon the crowds that swarm'd below.

4.

And every one of all that numerous throng
 On head or breast a marriage symbol wore;
 The war-horse proudly, as he paced along,
 Those joyous colors in his forelock wore,
 And arch'd his stately neck as for delight,
 To show his mane thus pompously bedight.

5.

From every church the merry bells rung round
 With gladdening harmony heard far and wide;
 In many a mingled peal of swelling sound,
 The hurrying music came on every side;
 And banners from the steeples waved on high,
 And streamers flutter'd in the sun and sky.

6.

Anon the cannon's voice in thunder spake;
 Westward it came; the East returned the sound;
 Burst after burst the innocuous thunders brake,
 And roll'd from side to side with quick rebound.
 O happy land, where that terrific voice
 Speaks but to bid all habitants rejoice!

7.

Thereat the crowd rush'd forward one and all,
 And I too in my dream was borne along.

Eftsoon, methought, I reach'd a festal hall,
 Where guards in order ranged repell'd the throng;
 But I had entrance through that guarded door,
 In honor to the laureate crown I wore.

8.

That spacious hall was hung with trophies round,
 Memorials proud of many a well-won day:
 The flag of France there trail'd toward the ground;
 There in captivity her Eagles lay,
 And under each, in aye-enduring gold,
 One well-known word its fatal story told.

9.

There read I Nile, conspicuous from afar;
 And Egypt and Maida there were found;
 And Copenhagen there and Trafalgar;
 Vimeiro and Busaco's day renown'd;
 There too was seen Barrosa's bloody name,
 And Albuhera, dear-bought field of fame.

10.

Yon spoils from boastful Massena were won;
 Those Marmont left in that illustrious fight
 By Salamanca, when too soon the sun
 Went down, and darkness hid the Frenchman's flight.
 These from Vittoria were in triumph borne,
 When from the Intruder's head Spain's stolen crown was torn.

11.

These on Pyrene's awful heights were gain'd,
 The trophies of that memorable day,
 When deep with blood her mountain springs were stain'd.
 Above the clouds and lightnings of that fray,
 Wheeling afar the affrighted eagles fled;
 At eve the wolves came forth and prey'd upon the dead.

12.

And blood-stain'd flags were here from Orthies borne,
 Trampled by France beneath her flying feet;
 And what before Thoulouse from Soult were torn,
 When the stern Marshal met his last defeat,
 Yielding once more to Britain's arm of might,
 And Wellington in mercy spared his flight.

13.

There hung the Eagles which, with victory flush'd,
 From Fleurus and from Ligny proudly flew,
 To see the Usurper's high-swollen fortune crush'd
 Forever on the field of Waterloo,—
 Day of all days, surpassing in its fame
 All fields of elder or of later name!

14.

There, too, the painter's universal art
 Each story told to all beholders' eyes;
 And Sculpture there had done her fitting part,
 Bidding the forms perdurable arise
 Of those great Chiefs who in the field of fight
 Had best upheld their country's sacred right.

15.

There stood our peerless Edward, gentle-soul'd,
The Sable Prince, of chivalry the flower ;
And that Plantagenet of sterner mould,
He who the conquer'd crown of Gallia wore ;
And Blake, and Nelson, Glory's favorite son,
And Marlborough there, and Wolfe, and Wellington.

16.

But from the statues and the storied wall,
The living scene withdrew my wondering sense ;
For with accordant pomp that gorgeous hall
Was fill'd ; and I beheld the opulence
Of Britain's Court, — a proud assemblage there,
Her Statesmen, and her Warriors, and her Fair.

17.

Amid that Hall of Victory, side by side,
Conspicuous o'er the splendid company,
There sat a royal Bridegroom and his Bride ;
In her fair cheek, and in her bright blue eye,
Her flaxen locks, and her benignant mien,
The marks of Brunswick's Royal Line were seen.

18.

Of princely lineage and of princely heart, [fight,
The Bridegroom seem'd, — a man approved in
Who in the great deliverance bore his part,
And had pursued the recreant Tyrant's flight,
When, driven from injured Germany, he fled,
Bearing the curse of God and Man upon his head.

19.

Guardant before his feet a Lion lay,
The Saxon Lion, terrible of yore,
Who, in his wither'd limbs and lean decay,
The marks of long and cruel bondage bore ;
But broken now beside him lay the chain,
Which gall'd and fretted late his neck and mane.

20.

A Lion too was couch'd before the Bride ;
That noble Beast had never felt the chain ;
Strong were his sinewy limbs and smooth his hide,
And o'er his shoulders broad the affluent mane
Dishevell'd hung ; beneath his feet were laid
Torn flags of France, whereon his bed he made.

21.

Full different were those Lions twain in plight,
Yet were they of one brood ; and side by side
Of old, the Gallic Tiger in his might
They many a time had met, and quell'd his pride,
And made the treacherous spoiler from their ire,
Cowering and crippled, to his den retire.

22.

Two forms divine on either side the throne,
Its heavenly guardians, male and female stood ;
His eye was bold, and on his brow there shone
Contempt of all base things, and pride subdued
To wisdom's will : a warrior's garb he wore,
And HONOR was the name the Genius bore.

23.

That other form was in a snow-white vest,
As well her virgin loveliness became ;
Erect her port, and on her spotless breast
A blood-red cross was hung : FAITH was her
name,
As by that sacred emblem might be seen,
And by her eagle eye, and by her dove-like mien.

24.

Her likeness such to that robuster power,
That sure his sister she might have been deem'd,
Child of one womb at one auspicious hour.
Akin they were, yet not as thus it seem'd ;
For he of VALOR was the eldest son,
From Areté in happy union sprung.

25.

But her to Phronis Eusebeia bore,
She whom her mother Dicé sent to earth ;
What marvel then if thus their features wore
Resemblant lineaments of kindred birth,
Dicé being child of Him who rules above,
VALOR his earth-born son ; so both derived from Jove.

26.

While I stood gazing, suddenly the air
Was fill'd with solemn music breathing round ;
And yet no mortal instruments were there,
Nor seem'd that melody an earthly sound,
So wondrously it came, so passing sweet,
For some strange pageant sure a prelude meet.

27.

In every breast methought there seem'd to be
A hush of reverence mingled with dismay ;
For now appear'd a heavenly company
Toward the royal seat who held their way ;
A female Form majestic led them on, —
With awful port she came, and stood before the Throne.

28.

Gentle her mien, and void of all offence ;
But if aught wrong'd her, she could strike such fear,
As when Minerva, in her Sire's defence,
Shook in Phlegræan fields her dreadful spear.
Yet her benignant aspect told that ne'er
Would she refuse to heed a suppliant's prayer.

29.

The Trident of the Seas in her right hand,
The sceptre which that Bride was born to wield,
She bore, in symbol of her just command,
And in her left display'd the Red-Cross shield.
A plume of milk-white feathers overspread
The laurell'd helm which graced her lofty head.

30.

Daughter of Brunswick's fated line, she said,
While joyful realms their gratulations pay,
And ask for blessings on thy bridal bed,
We, too, descend upon this happy day ; —

Receive with willing ear what we impart,
And treasure up our counsels in thy heart!

31.

Long may it be ere thou art call'd to bear
The weight of empire in a day of woe!
Be it thy favor'd lot meantime to share
The joys which from domestic virtue flow,
And may the lessons which are now impress'd,
In years of leisure, sink into thy breast.

32.

Look to thy Sire, and in his steady way,
As in his Father's he, learn thou to tread;
That thus, when comes the inevitable day,
No other change be felt than of the head
Which wears the crown; thy name will then be blest
Like theirs, when thou, too, shalt be call'd to rest.

33.

Love peace and cherish peace; but use it so
That War may find thee ready at all hours;
And ever when thou strik'st, let the blow
Be swift and sure: then put forth all the powers
Which God hath given thee to redress thy wrong;
And, powerful as thou art, the strife will not be long.

34.

Let not the sacred Trident from thy hand
Depart, nor lay the falchion from thy side!
Queen of the Seas, and mighty on the land,
Thy power shall then be dreaded far and wide:
And trusting still in God and in the Right,
Thou mayst again defy the World's collected might.

35.

Thus as she ceased, a comely Sage came on,
His temples and capacious forehead spread
With locks of venerable eld, which shone
As when, in wintry morns, on Skiddaw's head
The cloud, the sunshine, and the snow unite,
So silvery, so unsullied, and so white.

36.

Of Kronos and the Nymph Mnemosyné
He sprung, on either side a birth divine;
Thus to the Olympian Gods allied was he,
And brother to the sacred Sisters nine,
With whom he dwelt in interchange of lore,
Each thus instructing each for evermore.

37.

They call'd him Praxis in the Olympian tongue;
But here on earth EXPERIENCE was his name.
Whatever things have pass'd to him were known,
And he could see the future ere it came;
Such foresight was his patient wisdom's meed,—
Alas for those who his wise counsels will not heed!

38.

He bore a goodly volume, which he laid
Between that princely couple on the throne.

Lo, there my work for this great realm, he said,
My work, which with the kingdom's growth has grown,
The rights, the usages, the laws wherein Blessed above all nations she hath been.

39.

Such as the sacred trust to thee is given,
So unimpair'd transmit it to thy line:
Preserve it as the choicest gift of Heaven,
Always to make the bliss of thee and thine:
The talisman of England's strength is there,—
With reverence guard it, and with jealous care!

40.

The next who stood before that royal pair
Came gliding like a vision o'er the ground;
A glory went before him through the air,
Ambrosial odors floated all around,
His purple wings a heavenly lustre shed
A silvery halo hover'd round his head

41.

The Angel of the English Church was this,
With whose divinest presence there appear'd
A glorious train, inheritors of bliss,
Saints in the memory of the good revered,
Who, having render'd back their vital breath
To Him from whom it came, were perfected by Death.

42.

Edward the spotless Tudor, there I knew,
In whose pure breast, with pious nurture fed,
All generous hopes and gentle virtues grew;
A heavenly diadem adorn'd his head,—
Most blessed Prince, whose saintly name might move
The understanding heart to tears of reverent love.

43.

Less radiant than King Edward, Cranmer came,
But purged from persecution's sable spot;
For he had given his body to the flame,
And now in that right hand, which, finching not,
He proffer'd to the fire's atoning doom,
Bore he the unfading palm of martyrdom.

44.

There too came Latimer, in worth allied,
Who, to the stake when brought by Romish rage,
As if with prison weeds he cast aside
The infirmity of flesh and weight of age,
Bow-bent till then with weakness, in his shroud
Stood up erect and firm before the admiring crowd.

45.

With these, partakers in beatitude,
Bearing like them the palm, their emblem meet,
The Noble Army came, who had subdued
All frailty, putting death beneath their feet:
Their robes were like the mountain snow, and bright
As though they had been dipp'd in the fountain springs of light.

46.

For these were they who valiantly endured
 The fierce extremity of mortal pain,
 By no weak tenderness to life allured,
 The victims of that hateful Henry's reign,
 And of the bloody Queen, beneath whose sway
 Rome lit her fires, and Fiends kept holyday.

47.

O pardon me, thrice holy Spirits dear,
 That hastily I now must pass ye by!
 No want of due reverence is there here;
 None better knows nor deeper feels than I
 What to your sufferings and your faith we owe,
 Ye valiant champions for the truth below!

48.

Hereafter, haply, with maturer care,
 (So Heaven permit,) that reverence shall be shown.
 Now of my vision I must needs declare,
 And how the Angel stood before the throne,
 And, fixing on that Princess, as he spake,
 His eye benign, the awful silence brake.

49.

Thus said the Angel — Thou to whom one day
 There shall in earthly guardianship be given
 The English Church, preserve it from decay!
 Ere now for that most sacred charge hath Heaven
 In perilous times provided female means,
 Blessing it beneath the rule of pious Queens.

50.

Bear thou that great Eliza in thy mind,
 Who from a wreck this fabric edified;
 And HER who, to a nation's voice resign'd,
 When Rome in hope its wildest engines plied,
 By her own heart and righteous Heaven approved,
 Stood up against the Father whom she loved.

51.

Laying all mean regards aside, fill Thou
 Her seats with wisdom and with learned worth;
 That so, when'er attack'd, with fearless brow
 Her champions may defend her rights on earth;
 Link'd is her welfare closely with thine own;
 One fate attends the Altar and the Throne!

52.

Think not that lapse of ages shall abate
 The inveterate malice of that Harlot old;
 Fallen though thou deem'st her from her high estate,
 She proffers still the envenom'd cup of gold,
 And her fierce Beast, whose names are Blasphemy,
 The same that was, is still, and still must be.

53.

The stern Sectarian in unnatural league
 Joins her to war against their hated foe;
 Error and Faction aid the bold intrigue,
 And the dark Atheist seeks her overthrow,
 While giant Zeal in arms against her stands,
 Barks with a hundred mouths, and lifts a hundred hands.

54.

Built on a rock, the fabric may repel
 Their utmost rage, if all within be sound;
 But if within the gates Indifference dwell,
 Woe to her then! there needs no outward wound!
 Through her whole frame benumb'd, a lethal sleep,
 Like the cold poison of the asp, will creep.

55.

In thee, as in a cresset set on high,
 The light of piety should shine far seen,
 A guiding beacon fix'd for every eye:
 Thus from the influence of an honor'd Queen,
 As from its spring, should public good proceed, —
 The peace of Heaven will be thy proper meed.

56.

So should return that happy state of yore,
 When piety and joy went hand in hand;
 The love which to his flock the shepherd bore,
 The old observances which cheer'd the land,
 The household prayers which, honoring God's high
 name,
 Kept the lamp trimm'd and fed the sacred flame.

57.

Thus having spoke, away the Angel pass'd
 With all his train, dissolving from the sight:
 A transitory shadow overcast
 The sudden void they left; all meaner light
 Seeming like darkness to the eye which lost
 The full effulgence of that heavenly host.

58.

Eftsoon, in reappearing light confess'd,
 There stood another Minister of bliss,
 With his own radiance clothed as with a vest.
 One of the angelic company was this,
 Who, guardians of the rising human race,
 Always in Heaven behold the Father's face.

59.

Somewhile he fix'd upon the royal Bride
 A contemplative eye of thoughtful grief;
 The trouble of that look benign implied
 A sense of wrongs for which he sought relief,
 And that Earth's evils which go unredress'd
 May waken sorrow in an Angel's breast.

60.

I plead for babes and sucklings, he began,
 Those who are now, and who are yet to be;
 I plead for all the surest hopes of man,
 The vital welfare of humanity:
 Oh! let not bestial Ignorance maintain
 Longer within the land her brutalizing reign.

61.

O Lady, if some new-born babe should bless,
 In answer to a nation's prayers, thy love,
 When thou, beholding it in tenderness,
 The deepest, holiest joy of earth shalt prove,
 In that the likeness of all infants see,
 And call to mind that hour what now thou hear'st from me.

62.

Then seeing infant man, that Lord of Earth,
Most weak and helpless of all breathing things,
Remember that as Nature makes at birth
No different law for Peasants or for Kings,
And at the end no difference may befall,
The "short parenthesis of life" is all

63.

But in that space, how wide may be their doom
Of honor or dishonor, good or ill!
From Nature's hand like plastic clay they come,
To take from circumstance their woe or weal;
And as the form and pressure may be given,
They wither upon earth, or ripen there for Heaven.

64.

Is it then fitting that one soul should pine
For lack of culture in this favor'd land? —
That spirits of capacity divine
Perish, like seeds upon the desert sand? —
That needful knowledge in this age of light
Should not by birth be every Briton's right?

65.

Little can private zeal effect alone;
The State must this state-malady redress;
For as, of all the ways of life, but one —
The path of duty — leads to happiness,
So in their duty States must find at length
Their welfare, and their safety, and their strength.

66.

This the first duty, carefully to train
The children in the way that they should go;
Then of the family of guilt and pain
How large a part were banish'd from below!
How would the people love with surest cause
Their country, and revere her venerable laws!

67.

Is there, alas! within the human soul
An inbred taint disposing it for ill?
More need that early culture should control
And discipline by love the pliant will!
The heart of man is rich in all good seeds;
Neglected, it is choked with tares and noxious weeds.

68.

He ceased, and sudden from some unseen throng
A choral peal arose and shook the hall;
As when ten thousand children with their song
Fill the resounding temple of St. Paul; — Scarce can the heart their powerful tones sus-tain; —
"Save, or we perish!" was the thrilling strain.

69.

"Save, or we perish!" thrice the strain was sung
By unseen Souls innumerable hovering round;
And whilst the hall with their deep chorus rung,
The inmost heart was shaken with the sound;
I felt the refluent blood forsake my face,
And my knees trembled in that awful place.

70.

Anon two female forms before our view
Came side by side, a beauteous couplement;
The first a virgin clad in skyey blue;
Upward to Heaven her steadfast eyes were bent,
Her countenance an anxious meaning bore,
Yet such as might have made her loved the more.

71.

This was that maiden, "sober, chaste, and wise,"
Who bringeth to all hearts their best delight:
"Though spoused, yet wanting wedlock's solemn-ize;"
"Daughter of Cœlia, and Speranza hight,
I knew her well as one whose portraiture
In my dear Master's verse forever will endure.

72.

Her sister, too, the same divinest page
Taught me to know for that Charissa fair
"Of goodly grace and comely personage,
Of wondrous beauty and of bounty rare,
Full of great love," in whose most gentle mien
The charms of perfect womanhood were seen.

73.

This lovely pair unroll'd before the throne
"Earth's melancholy map," whereon to sight
Two broad divisions at a glance were shown, —
The empires these of Darkness and of Light.
Well might the thoughtful bosom sigh to mark
How wide a portion of the map was dark.

74.

Behold, Charissa cried, how large a space
Of Earth lies unredeem'd! Oh, grief to think
That countless myriads of immortal race,
In error born, in ignorance must sink,
Train'd up in customs which corrupt the heart,
And following miserably the evil part!

75.

Regard the expanded Orient, from the shores
Of scorch'd Arabia and the Persian sea,
To where the inhospitable Ocean roars
Against the rocks of frozen Tartary;
Look next at those Australian isles, which lie
Thick as the stars that stud the wintry sky; —

76.

Then let thy mind contemplative survey
That spacious region, where, in elder time,
Earth's unremember'd conquerors held the sway;
And Science, trusting in her skill sublime,
With lore abstruse the sculptured walls o'erspread,
Its import now forgotten with the dead.

77.

From Nile and Congo's undiscover'd springs
To the four seas which gird the unhappy land,
Behold it left a prey to barbarous Kings,
The Robber, or the Trader's ruthless hand:
Sinning and suffering, every where unblest'd,
Behold her wretched sons, oppressing and up-press'd!

78.

To England is the Eastern empire given,
 And hers the sceptre of the circling main ;
 Shall she not then diffuse the word of Heaven
 Through all the regions of her trusted reign, —
 Wage against evil things the hallow'd strife,
 And sow with liberal hand the seeds of life !

79.

By strenuous efforts in a rightful cause,
 Gloriously hath she surpass'd her ancient fame,
 And won in arms the astonish'd World's applause.
 Yet may she win in peace a nobler name,
 And Nations, which now lie in error blind,
 Hail her the Friend and Teacher of Mankind !

80.

Oh ! what a part were that, Speranza then
 Exclaim'd, to act upon Earth's ample stage !
 Oh ! what a name among the sons of men
 To leave, which should endure from age to age !
 And what a strength that ministry of good
 Should find in love and human gratitude !

81.

Speed thou the work, Redeemer of the World !
 That the long miseries of mankind may cease !
 Where'er the Red Cross banner is unfurl'd
 There let it carry truth, and light, and peace !
 Did not the Angels who announced thy birth
 Proclaim it with the sound of Peace on Earth ?

82.

Bless thou this happy Island, that the stream
 Of blessing far and wide from hence may flow !
 Bless it that thus thy saving Mercy's beam
 Reflected hence may shine on all below !
 THY KINGDOM COME ! THY WILL BE DONE, O
 LORD !
 AND BE THY HOLY NAME THROUGH ALL THE WORLD ADORED !

83.

Thus as Speranza cried, she clasp'd her hands,
 And heavenward lifted them in ardent prayer.
 Lo ! at the act the vaulted roof expands, —
 Heaven opens, — and in empyreal air
 Pouring its splendors through the inferior sky
 More bright than noon-day suns the Cross appears on high.

84.

A strain of heavenly harmony ensued,
 Such as but once to mortal ears was known, —
 The voice of that Angelic Multitude,
 Who, in their Orders, stand around the Throne ;
 PEACE UPON EARTH, GOOD WILL TO MEN ! they
 sung,
 And Heaven and Earth with that prophetic anthem rung.

85.

In holy fear I fell upon the ground,
 And hid my face, unable to endure

The glory, or sustain the piercing sound ;
 In fear and yet in trembling joy, for sure
 My soul that hour yearn'd strongly to be free,
 That it might spread its wings in immortality.

86.

Gone was the glory when I raised my head ;
 But in the air appear'd a form half seen,
 Below with shadows dimly garmented,
 And indistinct and dreadful was his mien :
 Yet, when I gazed intentlier, I could trace
 Divinest beauty in that awful face.

87.

Hear me, O Princess ! said the shadowy form,
 As, in administering this mighty land,
 Thou with thy best endeavor shalt perform
 The will of Heaven, so shall my faithful hand
 Thy great and endless recompense supply ; —
 My name is DEATH : THE LAST, BEST FRIEND
 AM I !

EPILOGUE.

1.

Is this the Nuptial Song ? with brow severe
 Perchance the votaries of the world will say :
 Are these fit strains for Royal ears to hear ?
 What man is he who thus assort his lay,
 And dares pronounce with inauspicious breath,
 In Hymeneal verse, the name of Death ?

2.

Remote from cheerful intercourse of men,
 Hath he indulged his melancholy mood,
 And, like the hermit in some sullen den,
 Fed his distemper'd mind in solitude ?
 Or have fanatic dreams distraught his sense,
 That thus he should presume with bold irreverence ?

3.

O Royal Lady, ill they judge the heart
 That reverently approaches thee to-day,
 And anxious to perform its fitting part,
 Prefers the tribute of this duteous lay !
 Not with displeasure should his song be read
 Who prays for Heaven's best blessings on thy head.

4.

He prays that many a year may pass away
 Ere the State call thee from a life of love ;
 Vex'd by no public cares, that day by day
 Thy heart the dear domestic joys may prove,
 And gracious Heaven thy chosen nuptials bless
 With all a Wife's and all a Mother's happiness.

5.

He prays that, for thine own and England's sake,
 The Virtues and the Household Charities
 Their favor'd seat beside thy hearth may take ;
 That when the Nation thither turn their eyes,

There the conspicuous model they may find
Of all which makes the bliss of human-kind.

6.

He prays that, when the sceptre to thy hand
In due succession shall descend at length,
Prosperity and Peace may bless the Land,
Truth be thy counsellor, and Heaven thy strength;
That every tongue thy praises may proclaim,
And every heart in secret bless thy name.

7.

He prays that thou mayst strenuously maintain
The wise laws handed down from sire to son;
He prays that, under thy auspicious reign,
All may be added, which is left undone,
To make the realm, its polity complete,
In all things happy, as in all things great;—

8.

That, through the will of thy enlighten'd mind,
Brute man may be to social life reclaim'd;
That, in compassion for forlorn mankind,
The saving Faith may widely be proclaim'd Through erring lands, beneath thy fostering care;—
This is his ardent hope, his loyal prayer.

9.

In every cottage may thy power be blest
For blessings which should every where abound;
Thy will, beneficent, from East to West,
May bring forth good where'er the sun goes
round,
And thus, through future times, should CHAR-
LOTTE'S fame
Surpass our great ELIZA'S golden name.

10.

Of awful subjects have I dared to sing;
Yet surely are they such, as, view'd aright,
Contentment to thy better mind may bring;
A strain which haply may thy heart invite
To ponder well how to thy choice is given
A glorious name on Earth, a high reward in Heaven.

11.

Light strains, though cheerful as the hues of spring,
Would wither like a wreath of vernal flowers;
The amaranthine garland which I bring
Shall keep its verdure through all after-hours;—
Yea, while the Poet's name is doom'd to live,
So long this garland shall its fragrance give.

12.

"Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown:"
Thus said the Bard who spake of kingly cares;
But calmly may the Sovereign then lie down
When grateful Nations guard him with their prayers.

How sweet a sleep awaits the Royal head
When these keep watch and ward around the bed'

L'ENVOY.

Go, little Book; from this my solitude,
I cast thee on the waters:—go thy ways!
And if, as I believe, thy vein be good,
The World will find thee, after many days.
Be it with thee according to thy worth:—
Go, little Book! in faith I send thee forth

NOTES.

The "short parenthesis of life" is all. — 62, p. 783

I have borrowed this striking expression from Storer.

All as my chrysom, so my winding sheet;
None joy'd my birth, none mourn'd my death to see;
The short parenthesis of life was sweet,
But short;— what was before, unknown to me,
And what must follow is the Lord's decree.

STORER'S Life and Death of Wolsey.

Let me insert here a beautiful passage from this forgotten poet, whose work has been retrieved from oblivion in the Heliconia. Wolsey is speaking.

More fit the dirige of a mournful quire
In dull sad notes all sorrows to exceed,
For him in whom the Prince's love is dead.

I am the tomb where that affection lies,
That was the closet where it living kept:
Yet wise men say affection never dies;—
No, but it turns, and when it long hath slept,
Looks heavy, like the eye that long hath wept.
O could it die,— that were a restful state!
But living, it converts to deadly hate.

Daughter of Cælia, and Speranza hight. — 71, p. 783.

IV.

Dame Cælia men did her call, as thought
From Heaven to come, or thither to arise,
The mother of three daughters well up-brought
In goodly thews or godly exercise:
The eldest two, most sober, chaste and wise,
Fidelia and Speranza virgins were,
Though spoused yet wanting wedlock's solemnize;
But fair Charissa to a lovely fere
Was linked, and by him had many pledges dear.
Fairy Queen, Book I. c. 10.

*I knew her well as one whose portraiture
In my dear Master's verse forever will endure.* — 71, p. 783

XII.

Thus as they gan of sundry things devise,
Lo! two most goodly virgins came in place,
Ylinked arm in arm in lovely wise,
With countenance demure, and modest grace,
They numbred equal steps and even pace;
Of which the eldest, that Fidelia hight,
Like sunny beams threw from her chrysal face,

That could have dazed the rash beholder's sight,
And round about her head did shine like Heaven's light.

XIII.

She was arrayed all in lilly white,
And in her right hand bore a cup of gold,
With wine and water filled up to the height,
In which a serpent did himself enfold,
That horror made to all that did behold ;
But she no whit did change her constant mood ;
And in her other hand she fast did hold
A book, that was both signed and sealed with blood,
Wherein dark things were writ, hard to be understood.

XIV.

Her younger sister, that Speranza hight,
Was clad in blue that her becomed well :
Not all so chearful seemed she of sight
As was her sister ; whether dread did dwell,
Or anguish in her heart, is hard to tell.
Upon her arm a silver anchor lay,
Whereon she leaned ever, as befell :
And ever up to Heaven as she did pray,
Her stedfast eyes were bent, ne swarved other way.
Faery Queen, Book I. c. 10.

*Her sister, too, the same divinest page
Taught me to know. — 72, p. 783.*

XXX.

She was a woman in her freshest age,
Of wondrous beauty, and of bounty rare,
With goodly grace and comely personage,
That was on earth not easy to compare,
Full of great love.

Faery Queen, Book I. c. 10.

"Earth's melancholy map." — 73, p. 783.

A part how small of the terraqueous globe
Is tenanted by man ! the rest a waste ;
Rocks, deserts, frozen seas, and burning sands,
Wild haunts of monsters, poisons, stings and death !
Such is Earth's melancholy map ! but far
More sad ! this earth is a true map of man.

Young, Night 1, l. 285.

It is the moral rather than the physical map which ought to excite this mournful feeling, — but such contemplations should excite our hope and our zeal also ; for how large a part of all existing evil, physical as well as moral, is remediable by human means !

Funeral Song,

FOR THE PRINCESS CHARLOTTE OF WALES.

In its summer pride array'd,
Low our Tree of Hope is laid !
Low it lies : — in evil hour,
Visiting the bridal bower,
Death hath levell'd root and flower.
Windsor, in thy sacred shade,
(This the end of pomp and power !)
Have the rites of death been paid :
Windsor, in thy sacred shade
Is the Flower of Brunswiek laid !

Ye whose relics rest around,
Tenants of this funeral ground !
Know ye, Spirits, who is come,
By immitigable doom
Summon'd to the untimely tomb ?
Late with youth and splendor crown'd,
Late in beauty's vernal bloom,
Late with love and joyance blest ;
Never more lamented guest
Was in Windsor laid to rest.

Henry, thou of saintly worth,
Thou, to whom thy Windsor gave
Nativity, and name, and grave ;
Thou art in this hallowed earth
Cradled for the immortal birth !
Heavily upon his head
Ancestral crimes were visited :

He, in spirit like a child,
Meek of heart and undefiled,
Patiently his crown resign'd,
And fix'd on heaven his heavenly mind,
Blessing, while he kiss'd the rod,
His Redeemer and his God.
Now may he in realms of bliss
Greet a soul as pure as his.

Passive as that humble spirit
Lies his bold dethroner too ;
A dreadful debt did he inherit
To his injured lineage due ;
Ill-starr'd prince, whose martial merit
His own England long might rue !
Mournful was that Edward's fame,
Won in fields contested well,
While he sought his rightful claim :
Witness Aire's unhappy water,
Where the ruthless Clifford fell ;
And when Wharfe ran red with slaughter,
On the day of Towton's field,
Gathering, in its guilty flood,
The carnage and the ill-spilt blood
That forty thousand lives could yield.
Cressy was to this but sport,
Poitiers but a pageant vain ;
And the victory of Spain
Seem'd a strife for pastime mean

And the work of Agincourt
 Only like a tournament;
 Half the blood which there was spent,
 Had sufficed again to gain
 Anjou and ill-yielded Maine,
 Normandy and Aquitaine,
 And Our Lady's Ancient towers,
 Maugre all the Valois' powers,
 Had a second time been ours. —
 A gentle daughter of thy line,
 Edward, lays her dust with thine.

Thou, Elizabeth, art here;
 Thou to whom all griefs were known;
 Who wert placed upon the bier
 In happier hour than on the throne.
 Fatal daughter, fatal mother,
 Raised to that ill-omen'd station,
 Father, uncle, sons, and brother,
 Mourn'd in blood her elevation!
 Woodville, in the realms of bliss,
 To thine offspring thou mayst say,
 Early death is happiness;
 And favor'd in their lot are they
 Who are not left to learn below
 That length of life is length of woe.
 Lightly let this ground be press'd;
 A broken heart is here at rest.

But thou, Seymour, with a greeting
 Such as sisters use at meeting,
 Joy, and sympathy, and love,
 Wilt hail her in the seats above.
 Like in loveliness were ye;
 By a like lamented doom,
 Hurried to an early tomb.
 While together, spirits blest,
 Here your earthly relics rest;
 Fellow angels shall ye be
 In the angelic company.

Henry, too, hath here his part;
 At the gentle Seymour's side,
 With his best beloved bride,
 Cold and quiet, here are laid
 The ashes of that fiery heart.
 Not with his tyrannic spirit,
 Shall our Charlotte's soul inherit;
 No, by Fisher's hoary head, —
 By More, the learned and the good, —
 By Katharine's wrongs and Boleyn's blood,

By the life so basely shed
 Of the pride of Norfolk's line,
 By the axe so often red,
 By the fire with martyrs fed,
 Hateful Henry, not with thee
 May her happy spirit be!

And here lies one whose tragic name
 A reverential thought may claim;
 That murder'd Monarch, whom the grave,
 Revealing its long secret, gave
 Again to sight, that we might spy
 His comely face and waking eye!
 There, thrice fifty years, it lay,
 Exempt from natural decay,
 Unclosed and bright, as if to say,
 A plague, of bloodier, baser birth,
 Than that beneath whose rage he bled,
 Was loose upon our guilty earth; —
 Such awful warning from the dead
 Was given by that portentous eye;
 Then it closed eternally.

Ye whose relics rest around,
 Tenants of this funeral ground;
 Even in your immortal spheres,
 What fresh yearnings will ye feel,
 When this earthly guest appears!
 Us she leaves in grief and tears;
 But to you will she reveal
 Tidings of old England's weal;
 Of a righteous war pursued,
 Long, through evil and through good,
 With unshaken fortitude;
 Of peace, in battle twice achieved;
 Of her fiercest foe subdued,
 And Europe from the yoke reliev'd,
 Upon that Brabantine plain!
 Such the proud, the virtuous story,
 Such the great, the endless glory
 Of her father's splendid reign!
 He who wore the sable mail
 Might, at this heroic tale,
 Wish himself on earth again.

One who reverently, for thee,
 Raised the strain of bridal verse,
 Flower of Brunswick! mournfully
 Lays a garland on thy hearse.

A Vision of Judgment.

TO THE KING.

SIR,

ONLY to Your Majesty can the present publication with propriety be addressed. As a tribute to the sacred memory of our late revered Sovereign, it is my duty to present it to Your Majesty's notice; and to whom could an experiment, which, perhaps, may be considered hereafter as of some importance in English Poetry, be so fitly inscribed, as to the Royal and munificent Patron of science, art, and literature?

We owe much to the House of Brunswick; but to none of that illustrious House more than to Your Majesty, under whose government the military renown of Great Britain has been carried to the highest point of glory. From that pure glory there has been nothing to detract; the success was not more splendid than the cause was good; and the event was deserved by the generosity, the justice, the wisdom, and the magnanimity of the counsels which prepared it. The same perfect integrity has been manifested in the whole administration of public affairs. More has been done than was ever before attempted, for mitigating the evils incident to our stage of society; for imbuing the rising race with those sound principles of religion on which the welfare of states has its only secure foundation; and for opening new regions to the redundant enterprise and industry of the people. Under Your Majesty's government, the Metropolis is rivalling in beauty those cities which it has long surpassed in greatness: sciences, arts, and letters are flourishing beyond all former example; and the last triumph of nautical discovery and of the British flag, which had so often been essayed in vain, has been accomplished. The brightest portion of British history will be that which records the improvements, the works, and the achievements of the Georgian Age.

That Your Majesty may long continue to reign over a free and prosperous people, and that the blessings of the happiest form of government which has ever been raised by human wisdom under the favor of Divine Providence, may, under Your Majesty's protection, be transmitted unimpaired to posterity, is the prayer of

YOUR MAJESTY'S

Most dutiful Subject and Servant,

ROBERT SOUTHEY.

PREFACE

THE PRESENT EDITION

THE VISION OF JUDGMENT.

Soon after the publication of this poem, the Reverend S. Tillbrook, B. D., at that time Fellow of Peterhouse, and an old acquaintance of mine, published a pamphlet entitled,

“HISTORICAL AND CRITICAL REMARKS

UPON

THE MODERN HEXAMETERS,

AND UPON

MR. SOUTHEY'S VISION OF JUDGMENT.

‘The Hexameter Verse I grant to be a gentleman of an ancient house, (so is many an English beggar;) yet this clime of ours he cannot thrive in; our speech is too craggy for him to set his plough in; he goes twitching and hopping, like a man running upon quagmires, up the hill in one syllable, and down the dale in another, retaining no part of that strictly smooth gait which he vaunts himself with among the Greeks and Latins.’ — THOMAS NASH.

CAMBRIDGE.

1822.”

The following extracts comprise the most important of Mr. Tillbrook's animadversions:—

“The Laureate says that ‘if it be difficult to reconcile the public to a new tune in verse, it is plainly impossible to reconcile them to a new pronunciation.’ But why not attempt to teach this tune on new principles? why leave the public without a guide to the accents and divisions of the Georgian hexameter? This should have been done either by—borrowing from the Latin rules—adopting those of the early prosodians—or by inventing a new metronome. It is difficult to recommend, much more to establish, any theoretical attempt upon individual authority, because practical experience is the best and ultimate test of success. After repeated trials, the enterprise in question has uniformly failed, and experience has shown that all modern imitations of the epic are unworthy of becoming denizens among our English metres. The system attempted by the Laureate is professedly an imitation of the ancient systems; but every copy is good or bad as it resembles or differs from its original. In defence of his enterprise, Mr. Southey should not have contented himself with a bare exposition of the measures of his verse, but should have actually noted the cæsuras, accented the syllables, and divided the feet. In matters of rhythm and sound, the untried ear cannot always catch the precise meaning of the musician or poet, especially where an original air is turned into a variation; and this seems precisely the case between the modernized and original epic, the difference acknowledged by the Laureate being the variation alluded to.

“A table, exhibiting the varieties which Mr. S. has adopted, and their agreement or disagreement with the legitimate hexameter, should have been drawn out. Critical experience has long ago selected and established certain canons for the iambic, sapphic, alcaic, and other metres; and Greek or Latin verses constructed according to these laws invariably excel both in rhythm and melody.—There are in the Vision of Judgment parts which may charm and delight, but they do so from no metrical effect. The reader (notwithstanding the Laureate's caution) soon finds himself in a tangled path, and gets bewildered for want of those guides which lead him smoothly through the Siege of Troy. But if he travel far with the Muse of modern epic, he will have little running, frequent haltings, some stumbling and jostling, and now and then find the good lady gaping, or sitting crosslegged in the midst of a barbarous rabble of monosyllabic particles.

“But it will be easier to show the comparative and probable sources of excellence or failure in the composition of the modern hexameter, by an analysis of the Greek and Latin languages, compared as to their literal and syllabic relations. To effect this, four separate tables have been drawn, containing the component parts and totals of eight verses of hexametrical dimensions, taken severally from the Iliad, Æneid, Vision of Judgment, and from a poem by Schiller. The divisions are calculated to show the totals of words, syllables, consonants, vowels, diphthongs, letters, and variety of final syllables. It will be seen from this tabular exposition that the Greek and Latin are nearly analogous, except that the balance of polysyllables inclines to the former. The diphthongs are more and the consonants fewer, and the total of letters and words also is less with the Greek. The conclusion therefore is, that the euphony, and syllabic power of speech, must likewise be on the side of the Greeks.

“In the English scale, the number of monosyllables is five times as great as in either of the two ancient languages, and more than twice as great as in the German. The English consonants are very nearly double those of the Greek or Latin, and the total number of words bears nearly the same ratio both to the Greek and Latin, viz. two to one. By necessity of grammar, a large proportion of these words consists of monosyllables and expletives. Neither the consonants in the German, nor the total of letters, is so numerous as in the English, and the same relation holds between the final varieties of these two languages.

“It has been before remarked that the Teutonic hexameter may be rendered somewhat superior to the English. This superiority is in a great measure to be attributed to the smaller aggregate of consonants and monosyllables which distinguish the German vocabulary. But the unprejudiced reader will draw what inferences he pleases from the comparative powers of each language, and regulate his decision according to the apparent truth or falsehood of the whole of the argument and evidence.

“‘Excludat jurgia Finis.’

“In taking leave of this question, the Writer again assures Mr. Southey of his high regard both for the private and literary life of the Laureate of the present age. The pen which has traced these Remarks, if it be not that of a ready writer, would fain be considered as that of a humble critic, actuated by no other motives than those of friendly discussions, and a desire to preserve the Epic Muse of Greece and Latium free from the barbarities of modern imitation.

“It is against the metre—the metrical association and arrangement—against the innovation, not the innovator, that the writer protests; the merits or demerits therefore of the Vision of Judgment, as a poem, he leaves to abler reviewers and to posterity. It will be read and admired by a few persons, just as the attempts of other Hexametrists have been. The experiments of Trissino, Sydney, and Spenser, produced a short-lived sensation, which perished with the sympathetic caprice of the times. The reputation of Mr. Southey may, even in the Georgian age, produce a parallel effect; but, independent of the probable causes of the failure already stated, the poem itself, being an occasional one, is on that account, also, more liable to forgetfulness.

“Via trita, viatuta, is therefore as good a password for the aspirant who would climb Parnassus, as for the humble pilgrim who plods along the beaten path of Prose. There is no necessity, indeed no apology, for attempting to revive those misshapen forms of Poetry,—those ‘immodulata poemata,’ which have long ago been laid to rest, shrouded in cobwebs and buried in the dust. Ennius may be pardoned his imaginary metempsychosis, his Somnia Pythagorea, and assumption of the title ‘Alter Homerus,’ but the world would be loath now-a-days to allow the same privileges to an English poet.

“Had there been any good chance of imitating the classic hexameter, surely he (who by distinction among our Poets was called ‘divine’) must have succeeded in the enterprise. Spenser, however, relinquished the hopeless task; and it is to be regretted that his example, in this respect at least, has not acted preventively upon his worthy successor.

"In the farrago of metrical trash which has been extracted from the modern hexametrist of different countries, what is there worthy of example or remembrance, either in the subjects or execution of their performances? Human nature is indeed so fickle in her intellectual operations, that the most absurd and impracticable speculations have ever found partisans ready to advocate their truth, and embark in the execution of them. But the career of such preposterous enterprises can neither be prosperous nor long. To wage war against the opinions of the wise and experienced, is to challenge the fate of poor Dick Tinto, who after all his ill-spent time and labor, found himself 'patronized by one or two of those judicious persons who make a virtue of being singular, and of pitching their own opinions against those of the world in matters of taste and criticism.' Ever since the Republic of Letters was established, innovators of one kind or other have endeavored to supplant the sterling writers, not only of Greece and Rome, but of every civilized country. But when ingenuity or imitation can be foisted upon true scholarship, as the representative of original genius, the taste of the public must either be sadly perverted to relish what is bad, or be already satiated with that which is good.

"There can now be little, or rather no honor conferred upon our own legitimate Muse, by an attempt to naturalize a bastard race of metre, which has been banished from the most enlightened countries of Europe. Within the last two centuries, literature, arms, and commerce have extended our vernacular tongue over a vast portion of the globe, and it is spreading still further. On this, if on no other account, it behoves the guardians of our native quarry to see that it maintains its proper excellence, and to recommend, as worthy of imitation, only such standard works of art or science, as may have received the repeated sanction of the scholar and critic. The arts are naturally imitative; they will, however, sometimes, from mistaken judgment or self-confidence, undertake to copy that which is inimitable. We cannot, under any coloring or disguise, mistake the Muse of modern hexameter for the original Calliope of Homer or Virgil.

"In the preface to the Vision of Judgment, Mr. Southey assures us that a desire to realize one of the hopes of his youth was one among the leading causes of his enterprise: to this motive might have been superadded the conscientious discharge of an official duty, and the public expression of his loyalty and attachment to the reigning sovereign. With these, or such like considerations, the imaginary apotheosis of our late revered monarch seems to have coöperated in the plan and execution of a poem, which cannot fail of giving effluence to many serious and well-meaning persons. To dive into the mysteries of heaven, and to pronounce upon the eternal condition of departed kings or others, is unquestionably a bold, if not a presumptuous undertaking. But when this is carried on under the bias of political feelings, there is greater danger of its becoming erroneous, or digressing into what some might call impiety. It must, however, be remembered, that the 'Vision of Judgment' is neither more nor less than a poet's dream. Objections of a similar kind might apply to Dante or Milton, and to the subjects of their great labors, and in short to all scriptural themes. It would be difficult, perhaps, to determine in what manner the scenes of the Vision of Judgment could have been unobjectionably portrayed. But there is no reason why a gentleman and scholar, like Mr. Southey, (who cannot, any more than the rest of the world, be deemed infallible,) should be loaded with abuse which would have been hardly justifiable had he published a series of poems as licentious as many of recent notoriety. No wonder, therefore, that the offended pride of the Laureate turns in disgust from the counsel of such unworthy rivals. When the civilities of learning cease to be cherished, admonition will become nauseous, and criticism will lose half its usefulness. It is, however, to be hoped, that no dispassionate inquirer will be ranked, even by the Laureate, among the Duncery of the Georgian age. At all events, the Writer of the present remarks had rather accept an humble place among those whom King James has styled 'the docile bairnes of knowledge.' The Writer's stock in trade as a critic is poor and homely; a little recollection of the rules of prosody, accent, and rhythm, imprinted upon early memory by rod or ferula; an Etonian master and grammar—remnants of scanning and proving—an ordinary pair of ears, and lungs no better than those of other folks. These scanty materials have been exercised in the examination of the 'Vision of Judgment,' and conclusions very different from those of its author have been deduced. And when the reader has perused the following eulogy by the Laureate upon the excellence of our blank verse, he will surely ask himself why that gentleman did not apply it in the composition of a poem, which, from the nature of its argument, embraced the terrible and sublime as well as the tender and pathetic. 'Take our blank verse for all in all, in all its gradations, from the elaborate rhythm of Milton, down to its loosest structure in the early dramatists, and I believe that there is no measure comparable to it, either in our own or any other language, for might, and majesty, and flexibility, and compass.' A host of authors might be brought in support of this panegyric upon English blank verse; but as it is against the modern hexametrist that the Writer has waged a somewhat long (though, as he trusts, a friendly) warfare, he will now draw his last shaft from the quiver of honest old Puttenham, and when he has shot it, will hang up his bow and shake hands with the Laureate. 'Now, peradventure, with us Englishmen, it be somewhat too late to admit a new invention of feete and times, that our forefathers never used, nor ever observed till this day, either in their measures or in their pronounciation, and perchance will seem in us a presumptuous part to attempt; considering also it would be hard to find many men to like one man's choice, in the limitation of times and quantities of words, with which not one, but every care, is to be pleased and made a particular judge; being most truly said that a multitude, or commonality, is hard to please and easy to offend. And therefore I intend not to proceed any further in this curiosity, than to shew the small subtilty that any other hath yet done, and not by imitation, but by observation; not to the intent to have it put in execution in our vulgar Poesie, but to be pleasantly scanned upon, as are all novelties so frivolous and ridiculous as it.' "

After thanking Mr. Tillbrook for sending me his pamphlet, and for explaining what I should else have been sorry to notice, that it contained no intimation of the personal acquaintance and mutual good will which had so long subsisted between us, I addressed to him the following cursory remarks in reply to his observations:—

"The greater part of your Treatise is employed in very ably and pleasantly supplying the deficiencies of my Preface, in points wherein it was necessarily deficient, because I was out of reach of materials. The remarks which are directed against my own hexameters appear to me altogether ill founded. You try the measure by Greek and Latin prosody: you might as well try me by the Laws of Solon, or the Twelve Tables. I have distinctly stated that the English hexameter is not constructed upon those canons, but bears the same relation to the ancient, that our heroic line does to the iambic verse. I have explained the principle of adaptation which I had chosen, and by that principle the measure ought to be judged.

"You bring forward arguments which are derived from music. But it by no means follows that a principle which holds good in music, should therefore be applicable to metre. The arts of music and poetry are essentially distinct; and I have had opportunities of observing that very skilful musicians may be as utterly without ear for metre, as I am myself without ear for music. If these arguments were valid, they would apply to the German hexameter as well as to the English; but the measure is as firmly established among the Germans as blank verse is with us, and, having been sanctioned by the practice of their best poets, can never become obsolete so long as the works of Voss, and Göethe, and Schiller are remembered, that is, as long as the language lasts.

"Twice you have remarked upon the length of the verse as occasioning a difficulty in reading it aloud. Surely you have taken up this argument with little consideration, because it lay upon the surface. It is doubly fallacious: first, upon your own principle; for if the English verse is not isochronous with the Latin, it must be shorter; and, secondly, because the breath is regulated in reading by the length of the sentence, not by that of the verse.

"Why did you bring against my trochee in the fifth place an argument just as applicable to the spondaic verse, and which, indeed, is only saying that a versifier who writes without any regard to effect, may produce very bad verses? You might as well object to the Alexandrine that it admits of twelve monosyllables. And how is it that you, who know Glaramara so well, should have made me answerable for a vowel dropped at the press?

"You have dealt fairly in not selecting single lines, which, taken singly, would be unfavorable specimens; but methinks you should have exhibited one extract of sufficient length to show the effect of the measure. I certainly think that any paragraph of the poem containing from ten lines upward would confute all the reasoning which you have advanced, or which any one could adduce against the experiment.

"But I have done. It is a question de gustibus, and therefore interminable. The proof of the pudding must be in the eating; and not all the reasoning in the world will ever persuade any one that the pudding which he dislikes is a good pudding, or that the pudding which pleases his palate and agrees with his stomach can be a bad one. I am glad that I have made the experiment, and quite satisfied with the result. The critics who write and who talk are with you; so, I dare say, are the whole posse of schoolmasters. The women, the young poets, and the docile bairns are with me.

"I thank you for speaking kindly and considerately concerning the subject of the Vision, and remain,

"My dear Sir,

"Yours very truly,

"ROBERT SOUTHAM."

"KESWICK, 17th June, 1822."

ORIGINAL PREFACE.

I.

HAVING long been of opinion that an English metre might be constructed in imitation of the ancient hexameter, which would be perfectly consistent with the character of our language, and capable of great richness, variety, and strength, I have now made the experiment. It will have some disadvantages to contend with, both among learned and unlearned readers; among the former especially, because, though they may divest themselves of all prejudice against an innovation, which has generally been thought impracticable, and might even be disposed to regard the attempt favorably, nevertheless they will, from inveterate association, be continually reminded of rules which are inapplicable to our tongue; and looking for quantity where emphasis only ought to be expected, will perhaps less easily be reconciled to the measure, than those persons who consider it simply as it is. To the one class it is necessary that I should explain the nature of the verse; to the other, the principle of adaption which has been followed.

First, then, to the former, who, in glancing over these long lines, will perceive that they have none of the customary characteristics of English versification, being neither marked by rhyme, nor by any certain number of syllables, nor by any regular recurrence of emphasis throughout the verse. Upon closer observation, they will find that (with a very few exceptions) there is a regular recurrence of emphasis in the last five syllables of every line, the first and the fourth of those syllables being accented, the others not. These five syllables form two of the feet by which the verse is measured, and which are called dactyls and trochees, the dactyl consisting of one long syllable and two short ones, as exemplified in the name of Wellington; the trochee, of one long and one short, as exemplified in the name of Nelson. Of such feet, there are six in every verse. The four first are disposed according to the judgment and convenience of the writer; that is, they may be all dactyls or all trochees, or any mixture of both in any arrangement; but the fifth is always a dactyl, and the sixth always a trochee, except in some rare instances, when, for the sake of variety, or of some particular effect, a trochee is admitted in the fifth place. One more remark will suffice for this preliminary explanation. These feet are not constituted each by a separate word, but are made up of one or more, or of parts of words, the end of one and the beginning of another, as may happen. A verse of the Psalms, originally pointed out by Harris of Salisbury, as a natural and perfect hexameter, will exemplify what has been said: —

Why do the | heathen | rage, and the | people i- | -magine a | vain thing?

This, I think, will make the general construction of the metre perfectly intelligible to persons who may be unacquainted with the rules of Latin versification; those, especially, who are still to be called gentle readers, in this ungentle age. But it is not necessary to understand the principle upon which the verse is constructed, in order to feel the harmony and power of a metrical composition; — if it were, how few would be capable of enjoying poetry! In the present case, any one who reads a page of these hexameters aloud, with just that natural regard to emphasis which the sense of the passage indicates, and the usual pronunciation of the words requires, will perceive the rhythm, and find no more difficulty in giving it its proper effect, than in reading blank verse. This has often been tried, and with invariable success. If, indeed, it were not so, the fault would be in the composition, not in the measure.

The learned reader will have perceived, by what has already been said, that in forming this English measure in imitation, rather than upon the model of the ancient hexameter, the trochee has been substituted for the spondee, as by the Germans. This substitution is rendered necessary by the nature of our pronunciation, which is so rapid, that I believe the whole vocabulary of the language does not afford a single instance of a genuine native * spondee. The spondee, of course, is not excluded from the verse; and where it occurs, the effect, in general, is good. This alteration was necessary; but it is not the only one which, upon mature consideration and fair trial, it has been deemed expedient to make. If every line were to begin with a long syllable, the measure would presently appear exotic and forced, as being directly opposite to the general character of all our dignified metres, and indeed to the genius of the English language. Therefore the license has been taken of using any foot of two or three syllables at the beginning of a line; and sometimes, though less frequently, in the second, third, or fourth place. The metre, thus constructed, bears the same analogy to the ancient hexameter that our ten-syllable or heroic line does to iambic verse; iambic it is called, and it is so in its general movement; but it admits of many other feet, and would, in fact, soon become insupportably monotonous without their frequent internixture.

* And only one of foreign derivation, which is the word Egypt. Some readers, who have never practised metrical

II.

Twenty years ago, when the rhythmical romance of Thalaba was sent from Portugal to the press, I requested, in the preface to that poem, that the author might not be supposed to prefer the rhythm in which it was written, abstractedly considered, to the regular blank verse, the noblest measure, in his judgment, of which our admirable language is capable: it was added, that the measure which was there used, had, in that instance, been preferred, because it suited the character of the poem, being, as it were, the Arabesque ornament of an Arabian tale. Notwithstanding this explicit declaration, the duncery of that day attacked me as if I had considered the measure of Thalaba to be in itself essentially and absolutely better than blank verse. The duncery of this day may probably pursue the same course on the present occasion. With that body I wage no war, and enter into no explanations. But to the great majority of my readers, who will take up the book without malevolence, and, having a proper sense of honor in themselves, will believe the declarations of a writer whose veracity they have no reason to doubt, I will state what are the defects, and what the advantages, of the metre which is here submitted to their judgment, as they appear to me after this fair experiment of its powers.

It is not a legitimate inference, that because the hexameter has been successfully introduced in the German language, it can be naturalized as well in English. The English is not so well adapted for it, because it does not abound in like manner with polysyllabic words. The feet, therefore, must too frequently be made up of monosyllables, and of distinct words, whereby the verse is resolved and decomposed into its component feet, and the feet into their component syllables, instead of being composition in their own language, may perhaps doubt this, and suppose that such words as twilight and evening are spondaic; but they only appear so when they are pronounced singly, the last syllable then hanging upon the tongue, and dwelling on the ear, like the last stroke of the clock. Used in combination, they become pure trochees.

articulated and inosculated throughout, as in the German, still more in the Greek, and most in the Latin measure. This is certainly a great defect.* From the same cause the caesura generally coincides with a pause in the sentence; but, though this breaks the continuity of the verse, it ought, perhaps, rather to be considered as an advantage; for the measure, like blank verse, thus acquires a greater variety. It may possibly be objected, that the four first feet are not metrical enough in their effect, and the two last too much so. I do not feel the objection; but it has been advanced by one, whose opinion upon any question, and especially upon a question of poetry, would make me distrust my own, where it happened to be different. Lastly, the double-ending may be censured as double rhymes used to be; but that objection belongs to the duncery.

On the other hand, the range of the verse being from thirteen syllables to seventeen, it derives from that range an advantage in the union of variety with regularity, which is peculiar to itself. The capability which is thus gained, may perhaps be better appreciated by a few readers from their own sense of power, than it is exemplified in this experiment.

I do not, however, present the English hexameter as something better than our established metres, but as something different, and which therefore, for that reason, may sometimes advantageously be used. Take our blank verse, for all in all, in all its gradations, from the elaborate rhythm of Milton, down to its loosest structure in the early dramatists, and I believe that there is no measure comparable to it, either in our own or in any other language, for might and majesty, and flexibility and compass. And this is affirmed, not as the predilection of a young writer, or the preference of one inexperienced in the difficulties of composition, but as an opinion formed and confirmed during the long and diligent study, and the long and laborious practice of the art. But I am satisfied also that the English hexameter is a legitimate and good measure, with which our literature ought to be enriched.

"I first adventure; follow me who list!"

III.

I am well aware that the public are peculiarly intolerant of such innovations; not less so than the populace used to be of any foreign fashion, whether of foppery or convenience. Would that this literary intolerance were under the influence of a saner judgment, and regarded the morals more than the manner of a composition; the spirit rather than the form! Would that it were directed against those monstrous combinations of horrors and mockery, lewdness and impiety, with which English poetry has, in our days, first been polluted! For more than half a century English literature had been distinguished by its moral purity, the effect, and, in its turn, the cause of an improvement in national manners. A father might, without apprehension of evil, have put into the hands of his children any book which issued from the press, if it did not bear, either in its title-page or frontispiece, manifest signs that it was intended as furniture for the brothel. There was no danger in any work which bore the name of a respectable publisher, or was to be procured at any respectable bookseller's. This was particularly the case with regard to our poetry. It is now no longer so; and woe to those by whom the offence cometh! The greater the talents of the offender, the greater is his guilt, and the more enduring will be his shame. Whether it be that the laws are in themselves unable to abate an evil of this magnitude, or whether it be that they are remissly administered, and with such injustice that the celebrity of an offender serves as a privilege whereby he obtains impunity, individuals are bound to consider that such pernicious works would neither be published nor written, if they were discouraged as they might, and ought to be, by public feeling; every person, therefore, who purchases such books, or admits them into his house, promotes the mischief, and thereby, as far as in him lies, becomes an aider and abettor of the crime.

* It leads also to this inconvenience, that the English line greatly exceeds the ancient one in literal length, so that it is actually too long for any page, if printed in types of the ordinary proportion to the size of the book, whatever that may be. The same inconvenience was formerly felt in that fine measure of the Elizabethan age, the seven-footed couplet; which, to the diminution of its powers, was, for that reason, divided into quatrains, (the pause generally falling upon the eighth syllable,) and then converted into the common ballad stanza. The hexameter cannot be thus divided, and therefore must generally look neither like prose nor poetry. This is noticed as merely a dissight, and of no moment, our poetry not being, like that of the Chinese, addressed to the eye instead of the ear.

The publication of a lascivious book is one of the worst offences that can be committed against the well-being of society. It is a sin, to the consequences of which no limits can be assigned, and those consequences no after-repentance in the writer can counteract. Whatever remorse of conscience he may feel when his hour comes (and come it must!) will be of no avail. The poignancy of a death-bed repentance cannot cancel one copy of the thousands which are sent abroad; and as long as it continues to be read, so long is he the pander of posterity, and so long is he heaping up guilt upon his soul in perpetual accumulation.

These remarks are not more severe than the offence deserves, even when applied to those immoral writers who have not been conscious of any evil intention in their writings, who would acknowledge a little levity, a little warmth of coloring, and so forth, in that sort of language with which men gloss over their favorite vices, and deceive themselves. What, then, should be said of those for whom the thoughtlessness and inebriety of wanton youth can no longer be pleaded, but who have written in sober manhood and with deliberate purpose? — Men of diseased* hearts and depraved imaginations, who, forming a system of opinions to suit their own unhappy course of conduct, have rebelled against the holiest ordinances of human society, and hating that revealed religion which, with all their efforts and bravadoes, they are unable entirely to disbelieve, labor to make others as miserable as themselves, by infecting them with a moral virus that eats into the soul! The school which they have set up may properly be called the Satanic school; for though their productions breathe the spirit of Belial in their lascivious parts, and the spirit of Moloch in those loathsome images of atrocities and horrors which they delight to represent, they are more especially characterized by a Satanic spirit of pride and audacious impiety, which still betrays the wretched feeling of hopelessness wherewith it is allied.

This evil is political as well as moral, for indeed moral and political evils are inseparably connected. Truly has it been affirmed by one of our ablest and clearest* reasoners, that "the destruction of governments may be proved and deduced from the general corruption of the subjects' manners, as a direct and natural cause thereof, by a demonstration as certain as any in the mathematics." There is no maxim more frequently enforced by Machiavelli, than that where the manners of a people are generally corrupted, there the government cannot long subsist, — a truth which all history exemplifies; and there is no means whereby that corruption can be so surely and rapidly diffused, as by poisoning the waters of literature.

Let rulers of the state look to this in time! But, to use the words of South, if "our physicians think the best way of curing a disease is to pamper it, the Lord in mercy prepare the kingdom to suffer what He by miracle only can prevent!"

No apology is offered for these remarks. The subject led to them; and the occasion of introducing them was willingly taken, because it is the duty of every one, whose opinion may have any influence, to expose the drift and aim of those writers who are laboring to subvert the foundations of human virtue and of human happiness.

This essay, which is full of fine critical remarks and striking thoughts felicitously expressed, reached me from Pisa, while the proof of the present sheet was before me. Of its author, (the author of Gebir and Count Julian) I will only say in this place, that to have obtained his approbation as a poet, and possessed his friendship as a man, will be remembered among the honors of my life, when the petty enmities of this generation will be forgotten, and its ephemeral reputations shall have passed away.

IV.

Returning to the point from whence I digressed, I am aware not only that any metrical innovation which meets the eye of the reader generally provokes his displeasure, but that there prevails a particular prejudice against the introduction of hexameters in our language. The experiment, it is alleged, was tried in the Elizabethan age, and failed, though made under the greatest possible advantages of favor, being encouraged by the great patron of literature, Sir Philip Sydney, (in letters, as well as in all other accomplishments and all virtues, the most illustrious ornament of that illustrious court,) and by the Queen herself.

That attempt failed, because it was made upon a scheme which inevitably prevented its success. No principle of adaption was tried. Sydney, and his followers wished to subject the English pronunciation to the rules of Latin prosody; but if it be difficult to reconcile the public to a new tune in verse, it is plainly impossible to reconcile them to a new* pronunciation. There was the further obstacle of unusual and violent elisions; and moreover, the easy and natural order of our speech was distorted by the frequent use of forced inversions, which are utterly improper in an uninflected language. Even if the subjects for the experiment had been judiciously chosen, and well composed in all other respects, these errors must have been fatal; but Sydney, whose prose is so full of imagery and felicitous expressions, that he is one of our greatest poets in prose, and whose other poems contain beauties of a high order, seems to have lost all ear for rhythm, and all feeling of poetry, when he was engaged in metrical experiments.

What in Sydney's hands was uncouth and difficult was made ridiculous by Stanihurst, whose translation of the four first books of the Æneid into hexameters is one of the most portentous compositions in any language. No satire could so effectually have exposed the measure to derision. The specimens which Abraham Fraunce produced were free from Stanihurst's eccentricities, and were much less awkward and constrained than Sydney's. But the mistaken principle upon which the metre was constructed was fatal, and would have proved so even if Fraunce had possessed greater powers of thought and of diction. The failure therefore was complete,† and for some generations it seems

* For example:

Neither he bears reverence to a prince, nor pity to a beggar.
That to my advancement their wisdoms have me abused.
Well may a pastor plain; but alas! his plaints be not esteemed.
Oppress'd with ruinous conceits by the help of an outcry
Despair most tragical clause to a deadly request.
Hard like a rich marble; hard but a fair diamond.

† That the reader may not suppose I have depreciated Sydney and his followers, by imputing to the faults of their execution a failure which the nature of the metre itself might explain, I have added a few fair samples at the end of the poem.

‡ A writer in the Censura Literaria (vol. iv. 386 †) has said, that hexameters were "much in vogue, owing to the pernicious example of Spenser and Gabriel Harvey." They were never in vogue. There is no reason to believe, that Spenser ever wrote an English hexameter. Gabriel Harvey's to have prevented any thought of repeating the experiment.

Goldsmith, in later days, delivered * an opinion in its favor, observing, that all the feet of the ancient poetry are still found in the versification of living languages, and that it is impossible the same measure, composed of the same times, should have a good effect upon the ear in one language, and a bad effect in another. He had seen, he says, several late specimens of English hexameters and sapphics, so happily composed, that they were, in all respects, as melodious and agreeable to the ear as the works of Virgil and Horace. What these specimens † were I have not discovered; — the sapphics may possibly have been those by Dr. Watts. Proofs of the practicability of the hexameter were given, about twenty years ago, by some translations from the Messiah of Klopstock, which appeared in example only incurred ridicule; and as for Spenser, the only specimen which he is known to have produced is the following Tetrasticon: —

See ye the blindfolded pretie God, that feathered arches,
Of lovers miseries which maketh his bloodie game?
Wote ye why his mother with a veile hath covered his face?
Trust me, leaste he my love happily chance to behold.

With so little knowledge of facts, and so little regard to accuracy, are confident assertions sometimes made!

Gabriel Harvey was one of the great promoters of the attempt; and Spenser, who was his intimate friend, is believed to have sanctioned it by his opinion, — certainly not by his example. That great master of versification has left only one piece which is not written in rhyme. It was printed in Davison's Poetical Rhapsodie, and is inserted in Warton's Observations on the Faery Queen, vol. ii. p. 245. The author has called it an Iambic Elegy, but neither by any rule of quantity, or violence of accentuation, can it be reduced to iambics.

* "It is generally supposed," says Goldsmith, "that the genius of the English language will not admit of Greek or Latin measure; but this, we apprehend, is a mistake owing to the prejudice of education. It is impossible that the same measure, composed of the same times, should have a good effect upon the ear in one language, and a bad effect in another. The truth is, we have been accustomed from our infancy to the numbers of English poetry, and the very sound and signification of the words disposes the ear to receive them in a certain manner; so that its disappointment must be attended with a disagreeable sensation. In imbibing the first rudiments of education, we acquire, as it were, another ear for the numbers of Greek and Latin poetry; and this being reserved entirely for the sounds and significations of the words that constitute those dead languages, will not easily accommodate itself to the sounds of our vernacular tongue, though conveyed in the same time and measure. In a word, Latin and Greek have annexed to them the ideas of the ancient measure from which they are not easily disjoined. But we will venture to say, this difficulty might be surmounted by an effort of attention and a little practice; and in that case we should in time be as well pleased with English, as with Latin hexameters." — Goldsmith's Essays, vol. ii. p. 265.

I venture to hope that this excellent English scholar will no longer think the scheme of writing English hexameters a mere whimsey. Glad indeed should I be, if my old acquaintance were to be as well pleased with the present attempt as I have been with some of his Morning Thoughts and Midnight Musings.

the Monthly Magazine, and by an eulogic, entitled The Showman, printed in the second volume of the Annual Anthology. These were written by my old friend Mr. William Taylor of Norwich, the translator of Burger's Lenora; — of whom it would be difficult to say, whether he is more deservedly admired by all who know him for the variety of his talents, the richness and ingenuity of his discourse, and the liveliness of his fancy, or loved and esteemed by them for the goodness of his heart. In repeating the experiment upon a more adequate scale, and upon a subject suited to the movement, I have fulfilled one of the hopes and intentions of my early life.

I.

THE TRANCE.

'Twas at that sober hour when the light of day is receding,
And from surrounding things the hues wherewith day has adorn'd them
Fade, like the hopes of youth, till the beauty of earth is departed:
Pensive, though not in thought, I stood at the window, beholding
Mountain, and lake, and vale; the valley disrobed
of its verdure;
Derwent, retaining yet from eve a glassy reflection
Where his expanded breast, then still and smooth as a mirror,
Under the woods reposed; the hills that, calm and majestic,
Lifted their heads in the silent sky, from far Glaramara
Bleacrag, and Maidenmawr, to Grizedal and west-ermost Withop.
Dark and distinct they rose. The clouds had gather'd above them
High in the middle air, huge, purple, pillowy masses,
While in the west beyond was the last pale tint
of the twilight;
Green as a stream in the glen whose pure and chrysolite waters
Flow o'er a selistous bed, and serene as the age of the righteous.
Earth was hush'd and still; all motion and sound
were suspended:
Neither man was heard, bird, beast, nor humming of insect,
Only the voice of the Greta, heard only when all is in stillness.
Pensive I stood and alone; the hour and the scene
had subdued me;
And as I gazed in the west, where Infinity seem'd
to be open,
Yearn'd to be free from time, and felt that this life is a thralldom.

Thus as I stood, the bell, which awhile from its warning had rested,

Sent forth its note again, toll, toll, through the silence of evening.

'Tis a deep, dull sound, that is heavy and mournful at all times, [day

For it tells of mortality always. But heavier this Fell on the conscious ear its deeper and mournfuler import;

Yea, in the heart it sunk; for this was the day when the herald,

Breaking his wand, should proclaim, that George our King was departed.

Thou art released! I cried: thy soul is deliver'd from bondage!

Thou who hast lain so long in mental and visual darkness,

Thou art in yonder heaven! thy place is in light and in glory.

Come, and behold!—methought a startling Voice from the twilight

Answered; and therewithal I felt a stroke as of lightning,

With a sound like the rushing of winds, or the roaring of waters.

If from without it came, I knew not, so sudden the seizure;

Or if the brain itself in that strong flash had expended

All its electric stores. Of strength and of thought it bereft me;

Hearing, and sight, and sense were gone; and when I awaken'd,

'Twas from a dream of death, in silence and uttermost darkness;

Knowing not where or how, nor if I was rapt in the body,

Nor if entranced, or dead. But all around me was blackness,

Utterly blank and void, as if this ample creation Had been blotted out, and I were alone in the chaos.

Yet had I even then a living hope to sustain me Under that awful thought, and I strengthen'd my spirit with prayer.

Comfort I sought and support, and both were found in retiring

Into that inner world, the soul's strong-hold and her kingdom.

Then came again the Voice; but then, no longer appalling,

Like the voice of a friend it came: O son of the Muses!

Be of good heart, it said, and think not that thou art abandon'd;

For to thy mortal sight shall the Grave unshadow its secrets;

Such as of yore the Florentine saw, Hell's perilous chambers

He who trod in his strength; and the arduous Mountain of Penance,

And the regions of Paradise, sphere within sphere intercircled.

Child of earth, look up! and behold what passes before thee.

II.

THE VAULT.

So by the Unseen comforted, raised I my head in obedience,

And in a vault I found myself placed, arch'd over on all sides.

Narrow and low was that house of the dead. Around it were coffins,

Each in its niche, and palls, and urns, and funeral hatchments;

Velvets of Tyrian dye, retaining their hues unfaded;

Blazonry vivid still, as if fresh from the touch of the limner;

Nor was the golden fringe, nor the golden broidery tarnish'd.

Whence came the light whereby that place of death was discover'd?

For there was there no lamp, whose wondrous flame inextinguish'd,

As with a vital power endued, renewing its substance,

Age after age unchanged, endureth in self-subsistence;

Nor did the cheerful beam of day, direct or reflected,

Penetrate there. That low and subterranean chamber

Saw not the living ray, nor felt the breeze; but forever,

Closely immured, was seal'd in perpetual silence and darkness.

Whence then this lovely light, calm, pure, and soft, and cerulean,

Such as the sapphire sheds? And whence this air that infuses

Strength while I breathe it in, and a sense of life, and a stillness,

Filling the heart with peace, and giving a joy that contents it?

Not of the Earth that light; and these paradisiacal breathings,

Not of the Earth are they!

These thoughts were passing within me, When there arose around a strain of heavenly music,

Such as the hermit hears when Angels visit his slumbers.

Faintly it first began, scarce heard; and gentle its rising,

Low as the softest breath that passes in summer at evening

O'er the Eolian strings, felt there when nothing is moving,

Save the thistle-down, lighter than air, and the leaf of the aspen.

Then, as it swell'd and rose, the thrilling melody deepen'd;

Such, methought, should the music be, which is heard in the cloister,

By the sisterhood standing around the beaified
 Virgin, [open,
 When with her dying eyes she sees the firmament
 Lifts from the bed of dust her arms towards her beloved,
 Utters the adorable name, and breathes out her soul in a rapture.

Well could I then believe such legends, and well could I credit
 All that the poets old relate of Amphion and Orpheus ;
 How to melodious sounds wild beasts their strength have surrender'd,
 Men were reclaim'd from the woods, and stones in harmonious order
 Moved, as their atoms obey'd the mysterious attraction of concord.
 This was a higher strain ; a mightier, holier virtue Came with its powerful tones. O'ercome by the piercing emotion,
 Dizzy I grew, and it seem'd as though my soul
 were dissolving.
 How might I bear unmoved such sounds ? For, like as the vapors
 Melt on the mountain side, when the sun comes forth in his splendor,
 Even so the vaulted roof and whatever was earthly Faded away ; the Grave was gone, and the Dead was awaken'd.

III.

THE AWAKENING.

* THEN I beheld the King. From a cloud which cover'd the pavement
 His reverend form uprose : heavenward his face was directed,
 Heavenward his eyes were raised, and heavenward his arms were extended.
 Lord, it is past ! he cried ; the mist, and the weight, and the darkness ;—
 That long and weary night, that long, drear dream of desertion.
 Father, to Thee I come ! My days have been many and evil ;
 Heavy my burden of care, and grievous hath been my affliction.
 Thou hast releas'd me at length. O Lord, in Thee have I trusted ;
 Thou art my hope and my strength !— And then,
 in profound adoration,
 Crossing his arms on his breast, he bent and worshipp'd in silence.

Presently one approach'd to greet him with joyful obeisance ;
 He of whom, in an hour of woe, the assassin bereaved us,
 When his counsels most, and his resolute virtue were needed.

Thou, said the Monarch, here ? Thou, Perceval, summon'd before me ?—
 Then, as his waken'd mind to the weal of his country reverted,
 What of his son, he ask'd, what course by the Prince had been follow'd.
 Right in his Father's steps hath the Regent trod,
 was the answer :
 Firm hath he proved and wise, at a time when weakness or error
 Would have sunk us in shame, and to ruin have hurried us headlong.
 True to himself hath he been, and Heaven has rewarded his counsels.

Peace is obtain'd then at last, with safety and honor ! the Monarch
 Cried, and he clasp'd his hands ;— I thank Thee,
 O merciful Father !
 Now is my heart's desire fulfill'd.

With honor surpassing
 All that in elder time had adorn'd the annals of England,
 Peace hath been won by the sword, the faithful minister answer'd.
 Paris hath seen once more the banners of England in triumph
 Wave within her walls, and the ancient line is establish'd.
 While that man of blood, the tyrant, faithless and godless,
 Render'd at length the sport, as long the minion
 of Fortune,
 Far away, confined in a rocky isle of the ocean,
 Fights his battles again, and pleased to win in the chamber
 What he lost in the field, in fancy conquers his conqueror.
 There he reviles his foes, and there the ungrateful accuses,
 For his own defaults, the men who too faithfully served him ;
 Frets, and complains, and intrigues, and abuses the mercy that spared him.
 Oh that my King could have known these things !
 could have witness'd how England
 Check'd in its full career the force of her enemy's empire,
 Singly defied his arms and his arts, and baffled them singly,
 Roused from their lethal sleep, with the stirring example, the nations,
 And the reflux tide swept him and his fortune before it.
 Oh that my King, ere he died, might have seen the fruit of his counsels !

Nay, it is better thus, the Monarch piously an-swer'd ;
 Here I can bear the joy ; it comes as an earnest of Heaven.
 Righteous art Thou, O Lord ! long-suffering, but sure are thy judgments.

Then having paused awhile, like one in devotion abstracted,
Earthward his thoughts recurr'd, so deeply the care of his country
Lay in that royal soul reposed; and he said, Is the spirit
Quell'd which hath troubled the land? and the multitude freed from delusion,
Know they their blessings at last, and are they contented and thankful?

Still is that fierce and restless spirit at work, was the answer;
Still it deceiveth the weak, and inflameth the rash and the desperate.
Even now, I ween, some dreadful deed is preparing;
For the Souls of the Wicked are loose, and the Powers of Evil
Move on the wing alert. Some nascent horror they look for,
Be sure! some accursed conception of filth and of darkness
Ripe for its monstrous birth. Whether France or Britain be threaten'd,
Soon will the issue show; or if both at once are endanger'd,
For with the ghosts obscene of Robespierre, Danton, and Hebert,
Faux and Despard I saw, and the band of rabid fanatics,
They whom Venner led, who, rising in frantic rebellion,
Made the Redeemer's name their cry of slaughter and treason.

 IV.

THE GATE OF HEAVEN.

Thus as he spake, methought the surrounding space dilated.
Overhead I beheld the infinite ether; beneath us
Lay the solid expanse of the firmament spread like a pavement.
Wheresoever I look'd, there was light and glory around me.
Brightest it seem'd in the East, where the New Jerusalem glitter'd.
Eminent on a hill, there stood the Celestial City;
Beaming afar it shone; its towers and cupolas rising
High in the air serene, with the brightness of gold in the furnace,
Where on their breadth the splendor lay intense and quiescent:
Part with a fierier glow, and a short, quick, trem-
ulous motion,
Like the burning pyropus; and turrets and pinna-
cles sparkled,
Playing in jets of light, with a diamond-like glory
coruscant.
Groves of all hues of green their foliage intermingled,

Tempering with grateful shade the else unendurable lustre.
Drawing near, I beheld what over the portal was written:
This is the Gate of Bliss, it said; through me is the passage
To the City of God, the abode of beatified Spirits.
Weariness is not there, nor change, nor sorrow,
nor parting;
Time hath no place therein; nor evil. Ye who would enter,
Drink of the Well of Life, and put away all that is earthly.

O'er the adamantine gates an Angel stood on the summit.
Ho! he exclaim'd, King George of England com-
eth to judgment!
Hear, Heaven! Ye Angels, hear! Souls of the Good and the Wicked,
Whom it concerns, attend! Thou, Hell, bring forth his accusers!
As the sonorous summons was utter'd, the Winds,
who were waiting,
Bore it abroad through Heaven: and Hell, in her nethermost caverns,
Heard, and obey'd in dismay.

Anon a body of splendor
Gather'd before the gate, and veil'd the Ineffable Presence,
Which, with a rushing of wings, came down. The sentient ether
Shook with that dread descent, and the solid fir-mament trembled.
Round the cloud were the Orders of Heaven—
Archangel and Angel,
Principality, Cherub and Seraph, Thrones, Domi-
nations,
Virtues, and Powers. The Souls of the Good, whom Death had made perfect,
Flocking on either hand, a multitudinous army,
Came at the awful call. In semicircle inclining, Tier over tier they took their place: aloft, in the distance,
Far as the sight could pierce, that glorious company glisten'd.
From the skirts of the shining assembly, a silvery yapor
Rose in the blue serene, and moving onward it deepen'd,
Taking a denser form; the while from the opposite region
Heavy and sulphurous clouds roll'd on, and completed the circle.
There, with the Spirits accurs'd, in congenial darkness enveloped,
Were the Souls of the Wicked, who, wilful in guilt and in error,
Chose the service of sin, and now were abiding its wages.
Change of place to them brought no reprieve from anguish;
They, in their evil thoughts and desires of impotent malice,

Envy, and hate, and blasphemous rage, and remorse unavailing, [tion, —
 Carried a Hell within, to which all outer affliction,
 So it abstracted the sense — might be deem'd a remission of torment.
 At the edge of the cloud, the Princes of Darkness were marshall'd:
 Dimly descried within were wings and truculent faces;
 And in the thick obscure there struggled a mutinous uproar,
 Railing, and fury, and strife, that the whole deep body of darkness
 Roll'd like a troubled sea, with a wide and a man-ifold motion.

V.

THE ACCUSERS.

On the cerulean floor, by that dread circle surrounded,
 Stood the soul of the King alone. In front was the Presence
 Veil'd with excess of light; and behind was the blackness of darkness.
 Then might be seen the strength of holiness, then was its triumph;
 Calm in his faith he stood, and his own clear conscience upheld him.

When the trumpet was blown, and the Angel made proclamation —
 Lo, where the King appears! Come forward, ye who arraign him!
 Forth from the lurid cloud a Demon came at the summons.
 It was the Spirit by which his righteous reign had been troubled;
 Likest in form uncouth to the hideous Idols whom India [don'd)
 (Long by guilty neglect to hellish delusions abandon'd)
 Worships with horrible rites of self-immolation and torture.
 Many-headed and monstrous the Fiend; with numberless faces,
 Numberless bestial ears erect to all rumors, and restless,
 And with numberless mouths which were fill'd with lies as with arrows.
 Clamors arose as he came, a confusion of turbulent voices,
 Maledictions, and blatant tongues, and viperous
 hisses;
 And in the hubbub of senseless sounds the watch-
 words of faction,
 Freedom, Invaded Rights, Corruption, and War, and Oppression,
 Loudly enounced, were heard.

But when he stood in the Presence,
 Then was the Fiend dismay'd, though with impudence clothed as a garment;

And the lying tongues were mute, and the lips which had scatter'd Accusation and slander, were still. No time for evasion
 This, in the Presence he stood; no place for flight;
 for dissembling
 No possibility there. From the souls on the edge of the darkness,
 Two he produced, prime movers and agents of mischief, and bade them
 Show themselves faithful now to the cause for which they had labor'd.
 Wretched and guilty souls, where now their audacity? Where now
 Are the insolent tongues so ready of old at rejoinder?
 Where the lofty pretences of public virtue and freedom?
 Where the gibe, and the jeer, and the threat, the envenom'd invective,
 Calumny, falsehood, fraud, and the whole ammunition of malice?
 Wretched and guilty souls, they stood in the face of their Sovereign,
 Conscious and self-condemn'd; confronted with him they had injured,
 At the Judgment seat they stood.

Beholding the foremost,
 Him by the cast of his eye oblique, I knew as the firebrand
 Whom the unthinking populace held for their idol and hero,
 Lord of Misrule in his day. But how was that countenance alter'd
 Where emotion of fear or of shame had never been witness'd;
 That invincible forehead abash'd; and those eyes wherein malice
 Once had been wont to shine, with wit and hilarity
 temper'd,
 Into how deep a gloom their mournful expression had settled!
 Little avail'd it now that not from a purpose malignant, [evil;
 Not with evil intent he had chosen the service of
 But of his own desires the slave, with profligate impulse,
 Solely by selfishness moved, and reckless of aught that might follow.
 Could he plead in only excuse a confession of baseness?
 Could he hide the extent of his guilt or hope to atone for
 Faction excited at home, when all old feuds were abated,
 Insurrection abroad, and the train of woes that had follow'd!
 Discontent and disloyalty, like the teeth of the dragon,
 He had sown on the winds; they had ripen'd beyond the Atlantic;
 Thence in natural birth, sedition, revolt, revolution;
 France had received the seeds, and reap'd the harvest of horrors; —

Where — where should the plague be stay'd? Oh, most to be pitied
 They of all souls in bale, who see no term to the evil
 They by their guilt have raised, no end to their inner upbraidings!

Him I could not choose but know, nor knowing but grieve for.
 Who might the other be, his comrade in guilt and in suffering,
 Brought to the proof like him, and shrinking like him from the trial?
 Nameless the libeller lived, and shot his arrows
 in darkness;
 Undetected he pass'd to the grave, and leaving behind him
 Noxious works on earth, and the pest of an evil example,
 Went to the world beyond, where no offences are hidden.
 Mask'd had he been in his life, and now a visor of iron,
 Riveted round his head, had abolish'd his features forever.
 Speechless the slanderer stood, and turn'd his face
 from the Monarch,
 Iron-bound as it was, — so insupportably dreadful,
 Soon or late, to conscious guilt is the eye of the injured.

Caitiffs, are ye dumb? cried the multifaced
 Demon in anger;
 Think ye then by shame to shorten the term of your penance?
 Back to your penal dens! — And with horrible grasp gigantic
 Seizing the guilty pair, he swung them aloft, and in vengeance
 Hurl'd them all abroad, far into the sulphurous
 darkness.
 Sons of Faction, be warn'd! And ye, ye Slanderers! learn ye
 Justice, and bear in mind that after death there is judgment.
 Whirling, away they flew. Nor long himself did he tarry,
 Ere from the ground where he stood, caught up by a vehement whirlwind,
 He, too, was hurried away; and the blast with lightning and thunder
 Volleying aright and aleft amid the accumulate blackness,
 Scatter'd its inmates accurs'd, and beyond the limits of ether
 Drove the hircine host obscene: they, howling and groaning,
 Fell, precipitate, down to their dolorous place of endurance.
 Then was the region clear; the arrowy flashes which redden'd
 Through the foul, thick throng, like sheeted ar-gentry floating
 Now o'er the blue serene, diffused an innocuous splendor,

In the infinite dying away. The roll of the thunder
 Ceased, and all sounds were hush'd, till again from the gate adamantine
 Was the voice of the Angel heard through the silence of Heaven.

VI.

THE ABSOLVERS.

Ho! he exclaim'd, King George of England
 standeth in judgment!
 Hell hath been dumb in his presence. Ye who on earth arraign'd him,
 Come ye before him now, and here accuse or absolve him!
 For injustice hath here no place.

From the Souls of the Blessed
 Some were there then who advanced; and more from the skirts of the meeting —
 Spirits who had not yet accomplish'd their purification,
 Yet, being cleansed from pride, from faction and error deliver'd,
 Purged of the film wherewith the eye of the mind is clouded,
 They, in their better state, saw all things clear;
 and discerning
 Now, in the light of truth, what tortuous views had deceived them,
 They acknowledged their fault, and own'd the wrong they had offer'd;
 Not without ingenuous shame, and a sense of compunction,
 More or less, as each had more or less to atone for.
 One alone remain'd, when the rest had retired to their station:
 Silently he had stood, and still unmoved and in silence,
 With a steady mien, regarded the face of the Monarch.
 Thoughtful awhile he gazed; severe, but serene,
 was his aspect;
 Calm, but stern; like one whom no compassion
 could weaken,
 Neither could doubt deter, nor violent impulses alter;
 Lord of his own resolves, — of his own heart absolute master.
 Awful Spirit; his place was with ancient sages
 and heroes;
 Fabius, Aristides, and Solon, and Epaminondas.
 *Here then at the Gate of Heaven we are met!
 said the Spirit;
 King of England! albeit in life opposed to each other,
 Here we meet at last. Not unprepared for the meeting
 Ween I; for we had both outlived all enmity, rendering

Each to each that justice which each from each had withholden.

In the course of events, to thee I seem'd as a Rebel,
Thou a Tyrant to me;—so strongly doth circumstance rule men

During evil days, when right and wrong are confounded.

Left to our hearts we were just. For me, my actions have spoken,

That not for lawless desires, nor goaded by desperate fortunes,

Nor for ambition, I chose my part; but observant of duty,

Self-approved. And here, this witness I willingly bear thee,—

Here, before Angels and Men, in the awful hour of judgment,—

Thou too didst act with upright heart, as befitted a Sovereign

True to his sacred trust, to his crown, his kingdom, and people.

Heaven in these things fulfill'd its wise, though inscrutable purpose,

* While we work'd its will, doing each in his place
as became him.

Washington! said the Monarch, well hast thou spoken and truly,

Just to thyself and to me. On them is the guilt of the contest,

Who for wicked ends, with foul arts of faction and falschood,

Kindled and fed the flame; but verily they have their guerdon.

Thou and I are free from offence. And would that the nations,

Learning of us, would lay aside all wrongful resentment,

All injurious thought, and, honoring each in the other

Kindred courage and virtue, and cognate knowledge and freedom,

Live in brotherhood wisely conjoin'd. We set the example.

They who stir up strife, and would break that natural concord,

Evil they sow, and sorrow will they reap for their harvest.

VII.

THE BEATIFICATION.

WHEN that Spirit withdrew, the Monarch around the assembly

Look'd, but none else came forth; and he heard the voice of the Angel,—

King of England, speak for thyself! here is none to arraign thee.

Father, he replied, from whom no secrets are hidden,

What should I say? Thou knowest that mine was an arduous station,

Full of cares, and with perils beset. How heavy the burden

Thou alone canst tell! Short-sighted and frail hast
Thou made us,

And Thy judgments who can abide? But as surely Thou knowest

The desire of my heart hath been alway the good of my people,

Pardon my errors, O Lord, and in mercy accept the intention!

As in Thee I have trusted, so let me not now be confounded.

Bending forward, he spake with earnest humility.
Well done,

Good and faithful servant! then said a Voice from the Brightness,

Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.—The ministering Spirits

Clapp'd their pennons therewith, and from that whole army of Angels

Songs of thanksgiving and joy resounded, and loud hallelujahs;

While, on the wings of Winds upraised, the pavilion of splendor,

Where inscrutable light enveloped the Holy of Holies,

Moved, and was borne away, through the empyrean ascending.

Beautiful then on its hill appear'd the Celestial City,

Soften'd, like evening suns, to a mild and bearable lustre.

Beautiful was the ether above; and the sapphire beneath us,

Beautiful was its tone, to the dazzled sight as refreshing

As the fields with their loveliest green at the coming of summer,

When the mind is at ease, and the eye and the heart are contented.

Then methought we approach'd the gate. In front of the portal,

From a rock where the standard of man's Redemption was planted,

Issued the Well of Life, where whosoever would enter,—

So it was written,— must drink, and put away all that is earthly.

Earth among its gems, its creations of art and of nature,

Offers not aught whereto that marvellous Cross may be liken'd

Even in dim similitude; such was its wonderful substance.

Pure it was and diaphanous. It had no visible
lustre;

Yet from It alone whole Heaven was illuminate alway;

Day and Night being none in the upper firmament, neither

Sun, nor Moon, nor Stars; but from that Cross, as a fountain,

Flow'd the Light uncreated; light all-sufficing, eternal,
 Light which was, and which is, and which will be,
 forever and ever;
 Light of light, which, if daringly gazed on, would blind an Archangel,
 Yet the eye of weak man may behold, and beholding is strengthen'd;
 Yea, while we wander below, oppress'd with our bodily burden,
 And in the shadow of death, this Light is in merey
 vouchsafed us,
 So we seek it with humble heart; and the soul that receives it
 Hath with it healing and strength, peace, love, and life everlasting.

Thither the King drew nigh, and kneeling he drank of the water.
 Oh, what a change was wrought! In the semblance of age he had risen,
 Such as at last he appear'd, with the traces of time and affliction
 Deep on his faded form, when the burden of years was upon him.
 Oh, what a change was wrought! For now the corruptible put on
 Incorruption; the mortal put off mortality. Rising Rejuvenescent he stood in a glorified body, obnoxious
 Never again to change, nor to evil, and trouble, and sorrow,
 But for eternity form'd, and to bliss everlasting appointed.

VIII.

THE SOVEREIGNS.

LIFT up your heads, ye Gates; and, ye everlasting
 Portals,
 Be ye lift up! For lo! a glorified Monarch approacheth,
 One who in righteousness reign'd, and religiously govern'd his people.
 Who are these that await him within? Nassau the Deliverer,
 Him I knew: and the Stuart, he who, serene in his meekness,
 Bow'd his anointed head beneath the axe of
 rebellion,
 Calm in that insolent hour, and over his fortune triumphant.

Queen of the eagle eye, thou too, O matchless
 Eliza,
 Excellent Queen, wert there! and thy brother's beautiful spirit;
 O'er whose innocent head there hover'd a silvery halo,
 Such as crowns the Saint when his earthly warfare is ended.

There too was he of the sable mail, the hero of Cressy,
 Flower of chivalry, he in arms and in courtesy peerless.
 There too his royal sire I saw, magnificent Edward,
 He who made the English renown, and the fame of his Windsor
 In the Orient and Occident known, from Tagus to Tigris.
 Lion-hearted Richard was there, redoubtable warrior,
 At whose irresistible presence the Saracen trembled;
 At whose name the Caliph exclaim'd in dismay on Mahommed,
 Syrian mothers grew pale, and their children were scared into silence.
 Born in a bloody age, did he, in his prowess exulting,
 Run like a meteor his course, and fulfil the service
 assign'd him,
 Checking the Mussulman power in the height of its prosperous fortune;
 But that leonine heart was with virtues humaner ennobled;
 (Otherwhere else, be sure, his doom had now been appointed;)
 Friendship, disdain of wrong, and generous feeling redeem'd it;
 Magnanimity there had its seat, and the love of the Muses.

There, with the Saxon Kings who founded our laws and our temples, (Gratefully still to be named while these endure in remembrance,
 They, for the pious work!) I saw the spirit of Alfred;
 Alfred, than whom no Prince with loftier intellect gifted,
 Nor with a finer soul, nor in virtue more absolute, ever
 Made a throne twice-hallow'd, and reign'd in the hearts of his people.
 With him the Worthies were seen who in life
 partook of his labors,
 Shared his thoughts, and with him for the weal of posterity travail'd:
 Some who in cloisters immured, and to painful study devoted
 Day and night, their patient and innocent lives exhausted,
 And in meekness possess'd their souls; and some who in battle
 Put the Raven to flight; and some who, intrepid in duty,
 Reach'd the remotest East, or invading the kingdom of Winter,
 Plough'd with audacious keel the Hyperborean
 Ocean.
 I could perceive the joy which fill'd their beatified
 spirits
 While of the Georgian age they thought, and the glory of England.

IX.

THE ELDER WORTHIES.

LIFT up your heads, ye Gates; and, ye everlasting
Portals,
Be ye lift up! Behold, the Worthies are there to receive him,
They who, in later days, or in elder ages, ennobled,
Britain's dear name. Bede I beheld, who, humble and holy,
Shone like a single star, serene in a night of darkness.
Bacon also was there, the marvellous Friar; and he who
Struck the spark from which the Bohemian kindled his taper;
Thence the flame, long and hardly preserved, was to Luther transmitted,
Mighty soul, and he lifted his torch, and enlight-en'd the nations.

Thee, too, Father Chaucer, I saw, and delighted to see thee,
At whose well undefiled I drank in my youth, and was strengthen'd;
With whose mind immortal so oft I have com-
muned, partaking
All its manifold moods, and willingly moved at its pleasure.
Bearing the palm of martyrdom, Cranmer was there in his meekness,
Holy name, to be ever revered! And Cecil, whose wisdom
Stablish'd the Church and State, Eliza's pillar of council.
And Shakspeare, who in our hearts for himself hath erected an empire
Not to be shaken by Time, nor e'er by another divided.
But with what love did I then behold the face of my master, —
Spenser, my master dear! with whom in boyhood
I wander'd
Through the regions of Faery land, in forest or garden
Spending delicious hours, or at tilt and tourney rejoicing;
Yea, by the magic of verse enlarged, and translated in spirit,
In the World of Romance free denizen I; — till awakening,
When the spell was dissolved, this real earth and its uses
Seem'd to me weary, and stale, and flat.

With other emotion
Milton's severer shade I saw, and in reverence humbled
Gazed on that soul sublime: of passion now as of blindness
Heal'd, and no longer here to Kings and to Hierarchs hostile,
He was assoil'd from taint of the fatal fruit; and in Eden

Not again to be lost, consorted an equal with Angels.
Taylor too was there, from whose mind of its treasures redundant
Streams of eloquence flow'd, like an inexhaustible fountain:
And the victor of Blenheim, alike in all virtues
accomplish'd,
Public or private, he; the perfect soldier and statesman,
England's reproach and her pride; her pride for his noble achievements,
Her reproach for the wrongs he endured. And Newton, exalted
There above those orbs whose motions from earth
he had measured,
Through infinity ranging in thought. And Berkeley, angelic
Now in substance as soul, that kingdom enjoying where all things
Are what they seem, and the good and the beautiful there are eternal.

X.

THE WORTHIES OF THE GEORGIAN
AGE.

THESE with a kindred host of great and illustrious spirits
Stood apart, while a train, whom nearer duty attracted,
Through the Gate of Bliss came forth to welcome their Sovereign.
Many were they and glorious all. Conspicuous among them
Wolfe was seen. And the seaman who fell on the shores of Owyhee,
Leaving a lasting name, to humanity dear as to science.
And the mighty musician of Germany, ours by adoption,
Who beheld in the King his munificent pupil and patron.
Reynolds, with whom began that school of art which hath equall'd
Richest Italy's works, and the masterly labors of Belgium,
Came in that famous array. And Hogarth, who follow'd no master,
Nor by pupil shall e'er be approach'd, alone in his greatness.
Reverend in comely mien, of aspect mild and benignant,
There, too, Wesley I saw and knew, whose zeal apostolic,
Though with error alloy'd, hath on earth its merited honor,
As in heaven its reward. And Mansfield, the just and intrepid;
Wise Judge, by the craft of the Law ne'er seduced from its purpose;

And when the misled multitude raged like the winds in their madness,
 Not to be moved from his rightful resolves. And Burke I beheld there,
 Eloquent statesman and sage, who, though late, broke loose from his trammels,
 Giving then to mankind what party too long had diverted.
 Here, where wrongs are forgiven, was the injured Hastings beside him;
 Strong in his high deserts, and in innocence happy, though injured,
 He, in his good old age, outlived persecution and malice.
 Even where he had stood a mark for the arrows of slander,
 He had his triumph at last, when, moved with one feeling, the Senate
 Rose in respect at his sight, and atoned for the sin of their fathers.

Cowper, thy lovely spirit was there, by death disenchanted
 From that heavy spell which had bound it in sorrow and darkness;
 Thou wert there, in the kingdom of peace and of light everlasting.
 Nelson also was there in the kingdom of peace, though his calling,
 While upon earth he dwelt, was to war and the work of destruction.
 Not in him had that awful ministry deaden'd or weaken'd
 Quick compassion, and feelings that raise while they soften our nature.
 Wise in counsel, and steady in purpose, and rapid in action,
 Never thought of self from the course of his duty seduced him,
 Never doubt of the issue unworthily warp'd his intention.
 Long shall his memory live, and while his example is cherish'd,
 From the Queen of the Seas the sceptre shall never be wrested.

 XI.

THE YOUNG SPIRITS.

YE whom I leave unnamed, ye other Worthies of Britain,
 Lights of the Georgian age,—for ye are many and noble, —
 How might I name ye all, whom I saw in this glorious vision?
 Pardon ye the imperfect tale! Yet some I beheld there,
 Whom should I pretermit, my heart might rightly upbraid me,
 That its tribute of honor, poor though it be, was withholden.

Somewhat apart they came, in fellowship gather'd together,
 As in goodly array they follow'd the train of the Worthies.
 Chosen spirits were these, of the finest elements temper'd,
 And imbodyed on earth in mortality's purest texture;
 But in the morning of hope, in the blossom of virtue and genius,
 They were cut down by Death. What then?—were it wise to lament them,
 Seeing the mind bears with it its wealth, and the soul its affections?
 What we sow we shall reap; and the seeds whereof earth is not worthy
 Strike their roots in a kindlier soil, and ripen to harvest.

Here where the gallant youths of high, heroic aspiring,
 Who, so fate had allow'd, with the martial renown of their country
 Would have wedded their names, for perpetua honor united;
 Strong of heart and of mind, but in undistinguishing battle,
 Or by pestilence stricken, they fell, unknown and confounded
 With the common dead. Oh! many are they who were worthy,
 Under the Red Cross flag, to have wielded the thunders of Britain,
 Making her justice felt, and her proper power upholding
 Upon all seas and shores, wheresoever her rights were offended,
 Followers of Nelson's path, and the glorious career of the Wellesley.
 Many are they, whose bones beneath the billows have whiten'd,
 Or in foreign earth they have moulder'd, hastily cover'd,
 In some wide and general grave.

Here also were spirits
 To have guided, like Cecil of old, the councils of England;
 Or, like Canning, have silenced and charm'd a tumultuous Senate,
 When to the height of his theme the consummate Orator rising
 Makes our Catilines pale, and rejoices the friends of their country.

Others came in that goodly band whom benignant fortune
 Led into 'pleasanter ways on earth: the children of Science
 Some, whose unerring pursuit would, but for death, have extended
 O'er the unknown and material, Man's intellectual empire,
 Such their intuitive power; like Davy, disarming destruction

When it moves on the vapor; or him, who, discovering the secret
Of the dark and ebullient abyss, with the fire of Vesuvius
Arm'd the chemist's hand: well then might Eleusinian Ceres
Yield to him, from whom the seas and the mountains conceal'd not Nature's mystery, hid in their depths.

Here, lost in their promise
And prime, were the children of Art, who should else have deliver'd
Works and undying names to grateful posterity's keeping,
Such as Haydon will leave on earth; and he who, returning
Rich in praise to his native shores, hath left a remembrance
Long to be honor'd and loved on the banks of Thames and of Tiber:
So may America, prizing in time the worth she possesses,
Give to that hand free scope, and boast hereafter of Allston.

Here too, early lost and deplored, were the youths whom the Muses
Mark'd for themselves at birth, and with dews from Castalia sprinkled:
Chatterton first, (for not to his affectionate spirit
Could the act of madness innate for guilt be accounted,) Marvellous boy, whose antique songs and unhappy story
Shall, by gentle hearts, be in mournful memory cherish'd
Long as thy ancient towers endure, and the rocks of St. Vincent,
Bristol! my birth-place dear. What though I have chosen a dwelling
Far away, and my grave shall not be found by the stranger
Under thy sacred care, nathless in love and in duty
Still am I bound to thee, and by many a deep recollection!
City of elder days, I know how largely I owe thee;
Nor least for the hope and the strength that I gather'd in boyhood,
While on Chatterton musing, I fancied his spirit was with me
In the haunts which he loved upon earth. 'Twas a joy in my vision
When I beheld his face. — And here was the youth of Loch Leven,
Nipp'd, like an April flower, that opens its leaves to the sunshine,
While the breath of the East prevails. And Russell and Bampfylde,
Bright emanations they! And the Poet, whose songs of childhood
Trent and the groves of Clifton heard; not alone by the Muses,

But by the Virtues loved, his soul, in its youthful aspirings,
Sought the Holy Hill, and his thirst was for Siloa's waters.
Was I deceived by desire, or, Henry, indeed did thy spirit
Know me, and meet my look, and smile like a friend at the meeting?

 XII.

THE MEETING.

Lift up your heads, ye Gates; and, ye everlasting Portals,
Be ye lift up! Behold the splendent train of the Worthies
Halt; and with quicker pace a happy company issues
Forth from the Gate of Bliss: the Parents, the Children, and Consort,
Come to welcome in Heaven the Son, the Father, and Husband!
Hour of perfect joy that o'erpays all earthly affliction;
Yea, and the thought whereof supporteth the soul in its anguish!

There came England's blossom of hope, — the beautiful Princess;
She in whose wedded bliss all hearts rejoiced, and whose death-bell,
Heard from tower to tower through the island, carried a sorrow,
Felt by all like a private grief, which, sleeping or waking,
Will not be shaken away; but possesses the soul and disturbs it.
There was our late-lost Queen, the nation's example of virtue;
In whose presence vice was not seen, nor the face of dishonor,
Pure in heart, and spotless in life, and secret in bounty,
Queen, and Mother, and Wife unreprieved. — The gentle Amelia
Stretch'd her arms to her father there, in tenderness shedding
Tears, such as Angels weep. That hand was toward him extended
Whose last pressure he could not bear, when merciful Nature,
As o'er her dying bed he bent in severest anguish, Laid on his senses a weight, and suspended the sorrow forever.
He hath recover'd her now: all, all that was lost is restored him; —
Hour of perfect bliss that o'erpays all earthly affliction!
They are met where Change is not known, nor Sorrow, nor Parting.
Death is subdued, and the Grave, which conquers all, hath been conquer'd.

When I beheld them meet, the desire of my soul overcame me ;
And when with harp and voice the loud hosannahs of welcome
Fill'd the rejoicing sky, as the happy company enter'd
Through the everlasting Gates, I, too, press'd forward to enter : —
But the weight of the body withheld me. I stoop'd to the fountain,
Eager to drink thereof, and to put away all that was earthly.
Darkness came over me then, at the chilling touch of the water,
And my feet, methought, sunk, and I fell precipitate. Starting,
Then I awoke, and beheld the mountains in twilight before me,
Dark and distinct ; and instead of the rapturous
sound of hosannahs,
Heard the bell from the tower, toll ! toll ! through the silence of evening.

NOTES.

— From surrounding things the hues wherewith day has adorn'd
them

Fade, like the hopes of youth. — I. col. 2, p. 795.

This effect of twilight, and in the very scene described, has been lately represented by Mr. William Westall, in one of his Views of the Lakes, with the true feeling and power of genius. The range of mountains which is described in these introductory lines, may also be seen in his View of the Vale of Keswick from the Penrith road.

The last pale tint of the twilight ;

*Green as a stream in the glen whose pure and chrysolite waters
Flow o'er a schistous bed.* — I. col. 2, p. 795.

St. Pierre, who is often a fanciful, generally a delightful, but always an animated and ingenious writer, has some characteristic speculations concerning this green light of evening. He says, Je suis porté à attribuer à la couleur verte des végétaux qui couvrent en été une grande partie de notre hémisphère, cette belle teinte d'émeraude que l'on aperçoit quelquefois dans cette saison au firmament, vers le coucher du soleil. Elle est rare dans nos climats ; mais elle est fréquente entre les tropiques, où l'été dure toute l'année. Je sais bien qu'on peut rendre raison de ce phénomène par la simple réfraction des rayons du soleil dans l'atmosphère, ce prisme sphérique de notre globe. Mais, outre qu'on peut objecter que la couleur verte ne se voit point en hiver dans notre ciel, c'est que je peux apporter à l'appui de mon opinion d'autres faits qui semblent prouver que la couleur même azurée de l'atmosphère n'est qu'une réflexion de celle de l'océan. En effet, les glaces flottantes qui descendent tous les ans du pôle nord, s'annoncent, avant de paraître sur l'horizon, par une lueur blanche qui éclaire le ciel jour et nuit, et qui n'est qu'un reflet des neiges cristallisées qui les composent. Cette lueur paroît semblable à celle de l'aurore boréale, dont le foyer est au milieu des glaces même de notre pôle, mais dont la couleur blanche est mêlée de jaune, de rouge, et de vert, parce qu'elle participe des couleurs du sol ferrugineux et de la verdure des forêts de sapins qui couvrent notre zone glaciale. La cause de cette variation de couleurs dans notre aurore boréale est d'autant plus vraisemblable, que l'aurore australe, comme l'a observé le Capitaine Cook, en diffère en ce que sa couleur blanche n'est jamais mêlée de teintes bleues, qui n'ont lieu, selon moi, que parce que les glaces du pôle austral, sans continant et sans végétaux, sont entourées de toutes parts de l'océan, qui est bleu. Ne voyons-nous pas que la lune, que nous supposons convertie en grande partie de glaciers très-élevés, nous renvoie en lumière d'un blanc bleuâtre les rayons du soleil, qui sont dorés dans notre atmosphère ferrugineuse ? N'est-ce pas par la réverbération d'un sol composé de fer, que la planète de Mars nous réfléchit, en tout temps, une lumière rouge ? N'est-il pas plus naturel d'attribuer ces couleurs constantes aux réverbérations du sol, des mers, et des végétaux de ces planètes, plutôt qu'aux réfractions variables des rayons du soleil dans leurs atmosphères, dont les couleurs devroient changer à toute heure, suivant leurs différens aspects avec cet astre ! Comme Mars apparôit constamment rouge à la terre, il est possible que la terre apparôisse à Mars comme une pierrerie brillante des couleurs de l'opale au pôle nord, de celles de l'aigue-marine au pôle sud, et, tour-à-tour, de celles du saphir et de l'émeraude dans le reste de sa circonférence. Mais, sans sortir de notre atmosphère, je crois que la terre y renvoie la couleur bleue de son océan avec des reflets de la couleur verte de ses végétaux, en tout temps dans la zone torride, et en été seulement dans nos climats, par la même raison que ces deux pôles y réfléchissent des aurores boréales différentes, qui participent des couleurs de la terre, ou des mers qui les avoisinent.

Peut-être même notre atmosphère réfléchit-elle quelquefois les formes des paysages, qui annoncent les îles aux navigateurs bien long temps avant qu'ils puissent y aborder. Il est remarquable qu'elles ne se montrent comme les reflets de verdure qu'à l'horizon et du côté du soleil couchant. Je citerai, à ce sujet, un homme de l'île de France qui aperçoit dans le ciel les images des vaisseaux qui étoient en pleine mer : le célèbre Vernet, qui m'a attesté avoir vu une fois dans les nuages les tours et les remparts d'une ville située à sept lieues de lui ; et le phénomène du détroit de Sicile, connu sous le nom de Fée-Morgane. Les nuages et les vapeurs de l'atmosphère peuvent fort bien réfléchir les formes et les couleurs des objets terrestres, puisqu'ils réfléchissent dans les parés l'image du soleil au point de la rendre ardente comme le soleil lui-même. Enfin, les eaux de la terre répètent les couleurs et les formes des nuages de l'atmosphère : pourquoi les vapeurs de l'atmosphère ? à leur tour, ne pourroient-elles pas réfléchir le bleu de la mer, la verdure et le jaune de la terre, ainsi que les couleurs chatoyantes des glaces polaires ?

Au reste, je ne donne mon opinion que comme mon opinion. L'histoire de la nature est une édifice à peine commencé ; ne craignons pas d'y poser quelques pierres d'attente : nos neveux s'en serviront pour l'agrandir, ou les supprimeront comme superflues. Si mon autorité est nulle dans l'air, peu importera que je me sois trompé sur ce point : mon ouvrage rentrera dans l'obscurité d'où il étoit sorti. Mais s'il est un jour de quelque considération, mon erreur en physique sera plus utile à la morale, qu'une vérité d'ailleurs indifférente au bonheur des hommes. Or, en conclura avec raison qu'il faut être en garde contre les écrivains même accrédités. — Harmonies de la Nature, t. i. 129.

"I am inclined to attribute to the green color of the vegetables with which, during the summer, a great part of our hemisphere is covered, that beautiful emerald tint which we sometimes perceive at that season in the firmament, towards the setting of the sun. It is rare in our climates, but is frequent between the tropics, where summer continues throughout the year. I know that this phenomenon may be explained by the simple refraction of the rays of the sun in the atmosphere, that spherical prism of our globe. But to this it may be objected, that the green color is not seen during the winter in our sky ; and moreover, I can support my opinion by other facts, which appear to prove that even the azure color of the atmosphere is only a reflection of that of the ocean. In fact, the floating ice which descends every year from the North Pole, is announced before it appears upon the horizon, by a white blink which enlightens the heaven day and night, and which is only a reflection of the crystallized snows, of which those masses are composed. This blink resembles the light of the aurora borealis, the centre of which is in the middle of the ice of our pole, but the white color of which is mixed with yellow, with red, and with green, because it partakes of the color of a ferruginous soil, and of the verdure of the pine forests which cover our icy zone. This explanation of these variations of color in our aurora borealis, is so much the more probable, because that of the aurora australis, as Captain Cook has observed, differs in that its white color is mixed with blue tints alone, which can only be, according to my opinion, because the ice of the austral pole (where there is no continent and no vegetation) is surrounded on all parts with the ocean, which is blue. Do we not see that the moon, which we suppose to be covered in great part with very elevated glaciers, sends back to us, in a light of a bluish white, the rays of the sun, which are golden in our ferruginous atmosphere? Is it not by the reverberation of a soil composed of iron, that the planet Mars reflects upon us, at all times, a red light? Is it not more natural to attribute these constant colors to the reverberation of the soil, of the seas, and of the vegetables of these planets, rather than to the variable refractions of the rays of the sun in their atmospheres, the colors of which ought to change every hour, according to their different aspects with regard to that star? As Mars appears constantly red to the earth, it is possible that the earth might appear to Mars like a brilliant jewel, of the color of the opal towards the North Pole, of the agou marina at the South Pole, and alternately of the sapphire in the rest of its circumference. But without going out of our atmosphere, I believe that the earth reflects there the blue color of its ocean with the green of its vegetation, at all times in the torrid zone, and in summer only in our climate, for the same reason that its two poles reflect their different auroras, which participate of the colors of the earth or the seas that are near them.

“Perhaps our atmosphere sometimes reflects landscapes, which announce islands to the sailors long before they reach them. It is remarkable that they show themselves, like the reflections of verdure, only in the horizon and on the side of the setting sun. I shall cite, on this subject, a man of the Isle of France, who used to perceive in the sky the images of vessels which were out in full sea; the celebrated Vernet, who related to me that he had once seen in the clouds the ramparts of a town, situated seven leagues distant from him, and the phenomenon of the straits of Sicily, known under the name of the Fata Morgana. The clouds and the vapors of the atmosphere may very well reflect the forms and the colors of earthly objects, since they reflect in parhelia the image of the sun, so as to render it burning as the sun itself. In fine, if the waters of the earth repeat the colors and the forms of the clouds of the atmosphere, why then should not the vapors of the atmosphere, in their turn, reflect the blue of the sea, the verdure and the yellow of the earth, as well as the glancing colors of the polar ices?”

“I advance my opinion, however, only as my opinion. The history of nature is an edifice which, as yet, is scarcely commenced; let us not fear to carry some stones towards the building; our grandchildren will use them, or lay them aside if they be useless. If my authority is of no weight hereafter, it will import little that I have deceived myself upon this point; my work will enter into obscurity, from whence it came; but if it should be, in future, of some consideration, my error in physics will be more useful to morals than a truth, otherwise indifferent to the happiness of mankind. For it will be inferred with reason, that it is necessary to regard even writers of credit with caution.”

In one point of fact, St. Pierre is certainly mistaken. The green evening light is seen as often in winter as in summer. Having been led to look for it in consequence of suspecting the accuracy of his remarks, I noticed it on the very day when this extract was transcribed for the press, (late in December,) and twice in the course of the ensuing week; and I observed it, not in the evening alone, and in the west, (in which quarter, however, and at which time, it is most frequently seen,) but in different parts of the sky, and at different times of the day.

The reader will so surely think of the admirable passage of Dante, which was in the writer's mind when these lines were composed, that I should not think it necessary to notice the imitation, were it not that we live in an age of plagiarism;

when not our jackdaws only, but some of our swans also, trick themselves in borrowed plumage. I have never contracted an obligation of this kind, either to contemporary or predecessor, without acknowledging it.

*Discontent and disloyalty, like the teeth of the dragon,

V. col. 2, p. 799.

“Our New World,” says M. Simond, “has generally the credit of having first lighted the torch which was to illuminate, and soon set in a blaze, the finest part of Europe; yet I think the flint was struck, and the first spark elicited, by the patriot, John Wilkes, a few years before. In a time of profound peace, the restless spirits of men, deprived of other objects of public curiosity, seized with avidity on those questions which were then agitated with so much violence in England, touching the rights of the people, and of the government, and the nature of power. The end of the political drama was in favor of what was called, and in some respect was, the liberty of the people. Encouraged by the success of this great comedian, the curtain was no sooner dropped on the scene of Europe, than new actors hastened to raise it again in America, and to give the world a new play, infinitely more interesting, and more brilliant, than the first.”

Dr. Franklin describes the state of things during the reign of Wilkes and liberty. He says, “There have been amazing contests all over the kingdom, twenty or thirty thousand pounds of a side spent in several places, and inconceivable mischief done, by drunken, mad mobs, to houses, windows, &c. The scenes have been horrible. London was illuminated two nights running, at the command of the mob, for the success of Wilkes in the Middlesex election; the second night exceeded any thing of the kind ever seen here on the greatest occasions of rejoicing, as even the small cross streets, lanes, courts, and other out-of-the-way places, were all in a blaze with lights, and the principal streets all night long, as the mobs went round again after two o'clock, and obliged people who had extinguished their candles, to light them again. Those who refused had all their windows destroyed. The damage done, and the expense of candles, has been computed at fifty thousand pounds. It must have been great, though probably not so much. The ferment is not yet over, for he has promised to surrender to the court next Wednesday, and another tumult is then expected; and what the upshot will be, no one can yet foresee. It is really an extraordinary event, to see an outlaw and exile, of bad personal character, not worth a farthing, come over from France, set himself up as a candidate for the capital of the kingdom, miss his election only by being too late in his application, and immediately carrying it for the principal county. The mob, (spirited up by numbers of different ballads, sung or roared in every street,) requiring gentlemen and ladies of all ranks, as they passed in their carriages, to shout for Wilkes and liberty, marking the same words on all their coaches with chalk, and No 45 on every door, which extends a vast way along the roads in the country. I went last week to Winchester, and observed that for fifteen miles out of town there was scarce a door or window-shutter next the road unmarked; and this continued here and there quite to Winchester, which is sixty-four miles.

* * * * *

Even this capital, the residence of the king, is now a daily scene of lawless riot and confusion. Mobs patrolling the street at noonday, some knocking all down that will not roar for Wilkes and liberty; courts of justice afraid to give judgment against him; coal-heavers and porters pulling down the houses of coal-merchants that refuse to give them more wages; sawyers destroying saw-mills; sailors unrigging all the outward-bound ships, and suffering none to sail till merchants agree to raise their pay; watermen destroying private boats, and threatening bridges; soldiers firing among the mobs, and killing men, women, and children, which seems only to have produced an universal sullenness, that looks like a great black cloud coming on, ready to burst in a general tempest. What the event will be God only knows. But some punishment seems preparing for a people who are ungratefully abusing the best constitution, and the best king, any nation was ever blessed with; intent on nothing but luxury, licentiousness, power, places, pensions and plunder, while the ministry, divided in their councils, with little regard for each other, wearied by perpetual oppositions, in continual apprehension of changes, intent on securing popularity, in case they should lose favor, have, for some years past, had little time or inclination to attend to our small affairs, whose remoteness makes them appear still smaller.

All respect to law and government seems to be lost among the common people, who are moreover continually inflamed by seditious scribblers to trample on authority, and every thing that used to keep them in order."

Discite justitiam moniti, et non temnere Divos. — VIRGIL.

Thou too didst act with upright heart, as befitted a Sovereign, True to his sacred trust, to his crown, his kingdom, and people.

VI. col. 1, p. 801.

I am pleased to find (since the first publication of this poem) the same opinion forcibly expressed by Cowper. "It appears to me," he says, (writing in 1782,) "that the king is bound, both by the duty he owes to himself and to his people, to consider himself, with respect to every inch of his territories, as a trustee deriving his interest in them from God, and invested with them by divine authority, for the benefit of his subjects. As he may not sell them or waste them, so he may not resign them to an enemy, or transfer his right to govern them to any, not even to themselves, so long as it is possible for him to keep it. If he does, he betrays at once his own interest, and that of his other dominions. It may be said, suppose Providence has ordained that they shall be wrested from him, how then? I answer, that cannot appear to be the case, till God's purpose is actually accomplished; and in the mean time the most probable prospect of such an event does not release him from his obligation to hold them to the last moment, forasmuch as adverse appearances are no infallible indications of God's designs, but may give place to more comfortable symptoms when we least expect it. Viewing the thing in this light, if I sat on his Majesty's throne, I should be as obstinate as him, because, if I quitted the contest while I had any means left of carrying it on, I should never know that I had not relinquished what I might have retained, or be able to render a satisfactory answer to the doubts and inquiries of my own conscience."

Would that the nations,

*Learning of us, would lay aside all wrongful resentment,
All injurious thought, and honoring each in the other,
Kindred courage and virtue, and cognate knowledge and freedom,
Live in brotherhood wisely conjoin'd. We set the example.*

VI. col. 1, p. 801.

The wise and dignified manner in which the late King received the first minister from the United States of America is well known. It is not so generally known that anxiety and sleeplessness, during the American war, are believed by those persons who had the best opportunity for forming an opinion upon the subject, to have laid the foundation of that malady by which the King was afflicted during the latter years of his life.

Upon the publication of Captain Cook's Voyages, a copy of this national work was sent to Dr. Franklin, by the King's desire, because he had given orders for the protection of that illustrious navigator, in case he should fall in with any American cruisers on his way home.

Calm in that insolent hour, and over his fortune triumphant.

VIII. col. 1, p. 802.

The behavior of Charles in that insolent hour extorted admiration even from the better part of the Commonwealth's-men. It is thus finely described by Andrew Marvel:—

While round the armed bands
Did clap their bloody hands,
He nothing common did, or mean,
Upon that memorable scene;
But with his keener eye
The axe's edge did try:
Nor call'd the Gods with vulgar spight
To vindicate his helpless right;
But bow'd his comely head
Down, as upon a bed.

Magnificent Edward,

*He who made the English renown, and the fame of his Windsor
In the Orient and Occident known from Tagus to Tigris.*

VIII. col. 2, p. 802.

The celebrity which Windsor had obtained, as being the most splendid court in Christendom, and the seat of chivalry, may be plainly seen in the romance of Amadis, which was written in Portugal, towards the latter end of Edward the Third's reign. The Portuguese in that age took their military terms from the English, and St. George came into fashion among them at the same time, as being the English Santiago.

A dispute arose between two knights, the one a Cypriot, the other a Frenchman, who were serving the King of Armenia against the Soldan of Babylon. The other Christian captains in the army determined that they should decide it by single combat before King Edward of England, as the most worthy and honorable prince in all Christendom; and the quarrel, which began in Armenia, was actually thus decided within the lists, at the palace of Westminster. It was won, not very honorably, by the Frenchman.

He, who discovering the secret

*Of the dark and ebullient abyss, with the fire of Vesuvius
Arm'd the chemist's hand. — XI. col. 1, p. 805.*

Though chemistry is one of the subjects of which I am contented to be ignorant, I can nevertheless perceive and appreciate the real genius indicated by Dr. Clarke's discovery in the art of fusion. See his Treatise upon the Gas Blow-Pipe; or the account of it in the Quarterly Review, No. xlvi. p. 466.

In referring to the Safety Lamp of Sir Humphrey Davy, I must not be understood as representing that to be the most important of his many and great discoveries. No praise can add to his deserved celebrity.

Not to his affectionate spirit

Could the act of madness innate for guilt be accounted.

XI. col. 1, p. 805.

The act of suicide is very far from being so certain an indication of insanity as it is usually considered by our inquests. But in the case of Chatterton, it was the manifestation of an hereditary disease. There was a madness in his family. His only sister, during one part of her life, was under confinement.

The law respecting suicide is a most barbarous one; and of late years has never been carried into effect without exciting horror and disgust. It might be a salutary enactment that all suicides should be given up for dissection. This would certainly prevent many women from committing self-murder, and possibly might in time be useful to physiology. But a sufficient objection to it is, that it would aggravate the distress of afflicted families.

The gentle Amelia. — XII. col. 2, p. 805.

In one of his few intervals of sanity, after the death of this beloved daughter, the late King gave orders that a monument should be erected to the memory of one of her attendants, in St. George's Chapel, with the following inscription:—

King GEORGE III.
caused to be interred near this place
the body of MARY GASCOIGNE, Servant to the Princess AMELIA;
and this stone
to be inscribed in testimony of his grateful sense
of the faithful services and attachment of an amiable Young Woman to his beloved Daughter,
whom she survived only three months.
She died 19th of February, 1811.

This may probably be considered as the last act of his life ;
— a very affecting one it is, and worthy of remembrance. Such a monument is more honorable to the King by whom it was set up, than if he had erected a pyramid.

SPECIMENS, & c.

THE annexed Specimens of Sir Philip Sydney's hexameters will sufficiently evince that the failure of the attempt to naturalize this fine measure in his days, was owing to the manner which the attempt was made, not the measure itself.

First shall fertile grounds not yield increase of a good seed,
First the rivers shall cease to repay their floods to the ocean :
First may a trusty greyhound transform himself to a tyger.
First shall vertue be vice, and beauty be counted a blemish ;
Ere that I leave with song of praise her praise to solemnize,
Her praise, whence to the world all praise hath his only beginning :

But yet well I do find each man most wise in his own case.
None can speak of a wound with skill, if he have not a wound
felt :

Great to thee my state seems, thy state is blest by my judgment :
And yet neither of us great or blest deemeth his own self,
For yet (weigh this, alas !) great is not great to the greater.
What judge you doth a hillock show, by the lofty Olympus ?
Such my minute greatness doth seem compar'd to the greatest.
When Cedars to the ground fall down by the weight of an Emmet,

Or when a rich Rubie's price be the worth of a Walnut,
Or to the Sun for wonders seem small sparks of a candle :
Then by my high Cedar, rich Rubie, and only shining Sun,
Vertues, riches, beauties of mine shall great be reputed.
Oh, no, no, worthy Shepherd, worth can never enter a title,
Where proofs justly do teach, thus matcht, such worth to be nought worth ;

Let not a Puppet abuse thy sprite, Kings' Crowns do not help
From the cruel headach, nor shoes of gold do the gout heal ;
And precious Couches fall oft are shak't with a fever.
If then a bodily evil in a bodily gloze be not hidden,
Shall such morning dews be an ease to the heat of a love's fire ?

Sydney's pentameters appear even more uncouth than his hexameters, as more unlike their model ; for, in our pronunciation, the Latin pentameter reads as if it ended with two trochees.

Fortune, Nature, Love, long have contended about me,
Which should most miseries cast on a worm that I am.
Fortune thus 'gan say, misery and misfortune is all one,
And of misfortune, fortune hath only the gift.
With strong foes on land, on sea with contrary tempests,
Still do I cross this wretch what so he taketh in hand.
Tush, tush, said Nature, this is all but a trifle, a man's self
Gives haps or mishaps, even as he ordereth his heart.
But so his humor I frame, in a mould of choler adusted,
That the delights of life shall be to him dolorous.
Love smiled, and thus said ; what joy'd to desire is unhappy :
But if he nought do desire, what can Heraclitus ail ?
None but I work by desire : by desire have I kindled in his soul
Infernal agonies into a beauty divine :
Where thou poor Nature left'st all thy due glory, to Fortune
Her vertue is sovereign, Fortune a vassal of hers.

Nature abasht went back : Fortune blusht : yet she replied
thus :

And even in that love shall I reserve him a spite.
Thus, thus, alas ! woful by Nature, unhappy by Fortune ;
But most wretched I am, now love wakes my desire.

Sydney has also given examples in his Arcadia of Anacreontic, Phaleucian, Sapphic, and Asclepiad verse, all written upon the same erroneous principle. Those persons who consider it ridiculous to write English verses upon any scheme of Latin versification, may perhaps be surprised to learn that they have read, as blank verse, many lines which are perfect Sapphics or Phaleucians. Rowe's tragedies are full of such lines.

The Censura Literaria supplies me with two choice samples of Stanihurst's Virgil.

"Neere joyntlye brayeth with rufflerye * rumbold Ætna :
Soomtyme owt it bolcketh † from bulck cloudz grimly be-dimmed

Like fyerd pitche skorching, or flash flame sulphuris heating .
Flownce to the stars towring the fire like a pellet is hurled,
Ragd rocks, up raking, and guts of mounten yrented
From roote up he jogleth : stoans hudge slag ‡ molten he rowseth,

With route snort grumbling in bottom flash furie kindling.
Men say that Enecladus, with bolt haulf blasted, here har-
brought,

Ding'd § with this squising ¶ and massive burthen of Ætna,
Which pres on him nailed, from broached chimny's stil heateth ;
As oft as the giant his brold ¶ syds croompeled aldreth,
So oft Sicil al shivereth, therewith flaks smoakye be sparkled."

"T'ward Sicil is seated, to the welkin loftily peaking,
A soyl, yeleapt Liparen, from whence with flounee fury fling-
ing,

Stoans and burlye bullets, like tampounds, maynelye betowring.
Under is a kennel, wheare chymneys fyrye be scorching
Of Cyclopan tosters, with rent rocks chamferye sharded,
Lowd rub a dub tabering with frapping rip rap of Ætna.

In the den are drumming gads of Steele, parchfulye sparkling,
And flam's fierclye glowing, from fornace flashye be whisking.
Vulcan his hoate fordgharth, named eke thee Vulcian Island.
Down from the hev'nlye palace travayled the fyrye God hither.
In this cave the rakel's yr'ne bars, bigge bulked at hamring,
Brontes and Steropes, with baerlym swartie Pyraemon.
These thre nere upbotching, not shapte, but partlye wel ou-ward,

A clapping fier-bolt (such as oft with rounce rebel hobble,
Jove to the ground clattreth) but yeet not finished holye.
Three shows wringlye wrythen glimmering, and forciblye
soweing,

Thre watrye cloudz shytring to the craft they rampired hizz-
ing,

Three wheru's fierd glystring, with south winds ruffled huffling.

Now doe they rayse gastly lightnings, now grislye reboundings
Of ruffe raffe roaring, mens harts with terror agrysing,
With peale meale ramping, with thwick thwack sturdilye

Stanihurst's Virgil is certainly one of those curiosities in our literature which ought to be reprinted. Yet notwithstanding the almost incredible absurdity of this version, Stanihurst is entitled to an honorable remembrance for the part which he contributed to Holinshed's Collection of Chronicles.
None of our Chroniclers possessed a mind better stored, nor an intellect more perpetually on the alert.

Sydney, who failed so entirely in writing hexameters, has written concerning them in his Defence of Poesie, with the good sense and propriety of thought by which that beautiful treatise is distinguished. Let me not be thought to disparage this admirable man and delightful writer, because it has been necessary for me to show the cause of his failure in an attempt

* Ruffling seems to be turbulent noise. A ruffler was formerly a boisterous wherein I have now followed him. I should not forgive myself were I ever to mention Sydney without an expression of reverence and love.

“Of versifying,” he says, “there are two sorts, the one ancient, the other modern; the ancient marked the quantity of each syllable, and, according to that, framed his verse; the modern, observing only number, with some regard of the accent; the chief life of it standeth in that like sounding of the words which we call Rhyme. Whether of these be the more excellent, would bear many speeches, the ancient, no doubt, more fit for musick, both words and time observing quantity, and more fit lively to express divers passions by the low or lofty sound of the well-weighed syllable. The latter likewise with his Rhyme striketh a certain musick to the ear; and, in face, since it doth delight, though by another way, it obtaineth the same purpose, there being in either sweetness, and wanting in neither majesty. Truly the English, before any vulgar language I know, is fit for both sorts; for, for the ancient, the Italian is so full of vowels, that it must ever be cumbered with elisions: the Dutch so, of the other side, with consonants, that they cannot yield the sweet sliding fit for a verse. The French, in his whole language, hath not one word that hath his accent in the last syllable, saving two, called Antepenultima; and little more hath the Spanish, and therefore very gracesly may they use Dactyls; the English is subject to none of these defects. Now for Rhyme, though we do not observe quantity, yet we observe the accent very precisely, which other languages either cannot do, or will not do so absolutely.

“That Casura, or breathing-place, in the midst of the verse, neither Italian nor Spanish have; the French and we never almost fail of. Lastly, the very Rhyme itself the Italian cannot put in the last syllable, by the French named the Masculine Rhyme, but still in the next to the last, which the French call the Female, or the next before that, which the Italian call Sdrucchiola: the example of the former is Buono Suono: of the Sdrucchiola, is Femina Semina. The French, on the other side, hath both the male, as Bon Son; and the Female, as Plaise, Tuise, but the Sdrucchiola he hath not, where the English hath all three, as Duc, True, Father, Rather, Motion, Potion, with much more, which might be said, but that already I find the trifling of this discourse is too much enlarged.”

The French attempted to introduce the ancient metres some years before the trial was made in England. Pasquier says, that Estienne Jodelle led the way in the year 1553, by this distich upon the poems of Olivier de Maigny, “lequel,” he adds, “est vrayement une petit chef-d'œuvre.”

*Phæbus, Amour, Cypris, neut sauver, nourrir et orner
Ton vers et chef, d'umbre, de flamme, de fleurs.*

Pasquier himself, three years afterwards, at the solicitation of a friend, produced the following “essay de plus longue haine.”—

*Rien ne me plaist sinon de te chanter, et seroir et orner;
Rien ne te plaist mon bien, rien ne te plaist que ma mort.
Plus je requiers, et plus je me tiens seur d'estre refusé,
Et ce refus pourtant point ne me semble refus.
O trompeurs attraiets, desir ardent, prompte volonté,
Espoir, non espoir, ains miserable pipeur.
Distours mensongers, trahistreur oeil, aspre cruauté,
Qui me ruine le corps, qui me ruine le cœur.
Pourquoy tant de faveurs t'ont les Dieux mis à l'abandon,
Ou pourquoy dans moy si violente fureur?
Si vaine est ma fureur, si vain est tout ce que des dieux
Tu tiens, s'en toy gist cette cruelle rigueur:
Dieux patrons de l'amour bannissez d'elle la beauté,
Ou bien l'accouplez d'une amiable pitié;
Ou si dans le miel vous m'eslez un veuemeux fiel,
Veuillez Dieux que l'amour r'entre deilans le Chaos:
Commandez, que le froid, l'eau, l'Esté, l'humide, l'ardeur:
Brief que ce tout par tout tende à l'abisme de tous,
Pour faire ma douleur, pour finir cette cruauté,
Qui me ruine le corps, qui me ruine le cœur.*

*Non hélas que ce rond soit tout au sans se rechanger,
Mais que ma Sourde se change, au de face, ou de façons:
Mais que ma Sourde se change, et plus douce t'escoute les voix,
Vout que je seme criant, voix que je seme, riant.
Et que le feu du froid desormais puisse triompher,
Et que le froid au feu perde sa lente vigueur:
Ainsi s'assopira mon tourment, et la cruauté
Qui me ruine le corps, qui me ruine le cœur.*

“Je ne dy pas,” says the author, “que ces vers soient de quelque valeur, aussi ne les mets-je icy sur la monstre en intention qu'on les trouve tels; mais bien estime-je qu'ils sont autant fluides que les Latins, et à tant veut-je que l'on pense nostre vulgaire estre aucunement capable de ce subject.” Pasquier's verses were not published till many years after they were written; and in the mean time Jean Antoine de Baif made the attempt upon a larger scale,—“Toutesfois,” says Pasquier, “en ce subject si mauvais parrain que non seulement il ne fut suivy d'aucun, mais au contraire discourgea un chacun de s'y employer. D'autant que tout ce qu'il en fit estoit tant despourveu de cette naïfcté qui doit accompagner nos œuvres, qu'aussi tost que cette sienne poésie voit la lumière, elle mourut comme un avorton.” The Abbé Goujet, therefore, had no reason to represent this attempt as a proof of the bad taste of the age: the bad taste of an age is proved, when vicious compositions are applauded, not when they are unsuccessful. Jean Antoine de Baif is the writer of whom Cardinal du Perron said, “qu'il étoit bon homme, mais qu'il étoit méchant poète François.”

I subjoin a specimen of Spanish Hexameters, from an Eclogue by D. Esteban de Villegas, a poet of great and deserved estimation in his own country.

*Licidas y Coridon, Coridon el amante de Filis,
Pastor el uno de Cubras, el otro de blancas Ovejas,
Ambos a dos tiernos, mozos ambos, Arcades ambos,
Vicado que los rayos del Sol fatigaba al Orbe,
Y que vibrando fuego fréz la Cunicula ladra,
Al puro cristal, que erio la fuente sonora,
Llevados del són alegre de su blando susurro,
Las plantas veloces mueren, los pasos animan,
Y al tronca de un verde enebro se sientan amigos.*

*Tú, que los erguidos sobrepujas del hondo Timaro
Peñones, generoso Duque, con tu inclita frente,
Si acaso tocáre el eco de mi rústica avena
Tus sienes, si acaso llega a tu fértil abono,
Francisco, del acento mio la sonora Talla,
Oye pio, responde grato, censura severo:
No menos al caro hermano generoso retratas,
Que al tronco prudente sigues, generoso naciste
Heroe, que guarde el Cielo dilatando tus años:
Licidas y Coridon, Coridon el amante de Filis,
Pastores, las Musas aman, recercorete desean:
Tu, cuerdo, perdona entretanto la bárbara Musa,
Que presto, inspirando Pean con amigo Coturno,
En trompa, que al Olimpa llegue por el ábrego suelta,
Tu fama llevarán los ecos del Ganges al Istro,
Y luego, torciendo el vuelo, del aquilo al Austro.*

It is admitted by the Spaniards, that the fitness of their language for the hexameter has been established by Villegas; his success, however, did not induce other poets to follow the example. I know not whom it was that he followed, for he was not the first to make the attempt. Neither do I know whether it was ever made in Portuguese, except in some verses upon St. Ursula and the Eleven Thousand Virgins, which are Latin as well as Portuguese, and were written as a whimsical proof of the affinity of the two languages. I have met with no specimens in Italian. The complete success of the metre in Germany is well known. The Bohemians have learnt the tune, and have, like their neighbors, a translation of the Iliad in the measure of the original. This I learn accidentally from a Bohemian grammar; which shows me also, that the Bohemians make a dactyl of Achilles, probably because they pronounce the χ with a strong aspirate

OLIVER NEWMAN:
A New England Tale, with other Poetical Remains.

TO WILLIAM AND MARY WORDSWORTH,
 THE OLD AND DEAR FRIENDS OF ROBERT SOUTHEY,
 THESE LAST PRODUCTIONS,
 THE IMPERFECT "AUTUMNAL FLOWERS," OF HIS POETICAL GENIUS, ARE INSCRIBED, WITH FILIAL REVERENCE AND AFFECTION,

BY THE EDITOR.

PREFACE.

THE principal Poem of this volume, OLIVER NEWMAN, was well known to many friends of the late Poet Laureate: and it is presumed that those persons at least, who have heard him read portions of it, with his peculiar and highly expressive intonation, will welcome with pleasure, not however unmingled with melancholy, this his last poetical work, imperfect as it is. Oliver Newman was not a rapid production: the first idea of it seems to have arisen in his mind in 1811; it was commenced in January, 1815; and having been continued at different intervals, amid the pressure of more urgent business, received its last additions in September, 1829. Although this is not the place to speak critically, one observation perhaps may be pardoned—that this poem seems to possess in a considerable degree a quality which some of the Author's other poems were judged by several critics to be deficient in, viz., a human interest: we feel that we are among persons of a like nature with ourselves, and their sufferings touch the heart. A general account of the story upon which it is based, and the intended plan, has been drawn up from the Author's notes, and printed as an APPENDIX. It was thought better to do this, than to leave the reader entirely without information: yet the sketch is presented with considerable misgivings; because it is likely, that to some persons, notwithstanding that the Author's own words are used wherever it is possible, the dry bones of a poem may seem not only uninteresting, but even repulsive. Neither can such a sketch be certainly a true representation of the mere story of the perfect work; because, even of the few particulars there noted, several might, in the working out of the poem, be altered or expunged.

Of the other pieces here collected, the "Fragmentary Thoughts occasioned by his Son's Death," and the "Short Passages of Scripture," are printed as much for the purpose of giving fresh proof of the purity and elevation of his character, as for their own intrinsic beauty. His son Herbert—of whom he wrote thus in the Colloquies, "I called to mind my hopeful H——— too, so often the sweet companion of my morning walks to this very spot, in whom I had fondly thought my better part should have survived me, and

'With whom it seem'd my very life
 Went half away'—

died 17th April, 1816, being about ten years old, a boy of remarkable genius and sweetness of disposition. These Fragments bear a date at their commencement, 3d May, 1816, but do not seem all written at the same time. The Author at one time contemplated founding upon them a considerable work, of a meditative and deeply serious cast. But, although he, like Schiller, after the vanishing of his Ideals, always found "Employment,* the never-tiring," one of his truest friends,—yet this

* Schiller's "Die Ideale," Merivale's translation, p. 61.—

"Thou too, his mate, with him conspiring
 To quell the bosom's rising storm,
 Employment—thou, the never-tiring,
 Who toilsome shap'st, nor break'st the form."

particular form of employment, which seemed at first attractive to him, had not, when tried, the soothing effect upon his feelings which was needed; and in March, 1817, he writes, that he "had not recovered heart enough to proceed with it."

The "Passages of Scripture" are found in one of his latest note-books: they were evidently not written with any view to publication, but arose simply from the pure pleasure which he took in marking down, after his own fashion, verses that attracted his poetical taste, either by the force of some peculiar idea, or by the musical harmony of the words in our English version. Moreover, these passages seem illustrative of the structure and choice of language in some of his poems; for they lead us to observe in them also the effects of habitual study of the Holy Scriptures, evidenced not only by the references, which are frequently given, but also, which is more important, by the apparently unconscious use of a diction borrowed from the poetical and imaginative portions of the Bible.

It was natural that a writer of so energetic a mind as the late Poet Laureate, would leave many unfinished projects. Besides the Fragments here published, he had commenced a poem on "Robin Hood," the manuscript of which is not among his other poetical papers. He had also thought of a series of "Inscriptions in honour of English Poets, the notice of which, as it is short, may be here inserted, for the use of those who may take pleasure in cultivating that style, of which Akenside is the prototype.

"Tuesday, 6th Sept., 1814.

"INSCRIPTIONS for the Poetical Ground of these Kingdoms; i. e., a tribute of respect to all those poets who deserve it. This, I think, would be a worthy task.

Chaucer—at Woodstock? Blenheim will become an empty name, and that palace a pile of ruins, while he remains.

Malvern — Piers Ploughman.

Lydgate — at Bury.

Spenser — by the Mole.

Surrey—this a place of burial, if that be known; otherwise, at the chief seat of the Howards.

Amwell — Warner and Walton and Scott.

T. Warton — by the Cherwell.

Rokeyby—Mason and Scott and Morritt himself.

Davenant—Cowes Castle.

Sylvester—Donnington; buried at Middleburg."

Lastly, it may be not unfitly recorded, that some notes exist, preparatory to a poem in honour of her Majesty Queen Victoria. During the first years of this reign, severe reflections were from time to time made upon the Poet Laureate, for his silence. Now, the solemn events which have happened since that time, allow us to suppose that the Spirit of Poetry was then too dead within him, to permit him to undertake this new labour.

It only remains to be said, that these poems are printed as he left them; and that, as none of them had received his final corrections for the press, there may be defects of language which he himself would have removed. At the same time it is honestly avowed that, deservedly high as his reputation, both as a poet and a man, has stood among the writers of his generation—now, alas! fast departing from us,—a strong confidence is felt that this small volume will in no way derogate from it; and in this hope it is committed to the world.

FUNERAL AT SEA.

THE summer sun is riding high
Amid a bright and cloudless sky;
Beneath whose deep o'er-arching blue
The circle of the Atlantic sea,
Reflecting back a deeper hue,
Is heaving peacefully.

The winds are still, the ship with idle motion
Rocks gently on the gentle ocean;
Loose hang her sails, awaiting when the breeze

Again shall wake to waft her on her way.

Glancing beside, the dolphins, as they play,
Their gorgeous tints suffused with gold display;
And gay bonitos in their beauty glide:

With arrowy speed, in close pursuit,
They through the azure waters shoot;

A feebler shoal before them in affright
Spring from the wave, and in short flight,

On wet and plumeless wing essay

The aerial element:

The greedy followers, on the chase intent,
Dart forward still with keen and upturn'd sight,
And, to their proper danger blind the while,

Heed not the sharks, which have for many a day
Hover'd behind the ship, presentient of their prey.

So fair a season might persuade
Yon crowd to try the fisher's trade;
Yet from the stern no line is hung,
Nor bait by eager sea-boy flung;
Nor doth the watchful sailor stand
Alert to strike, harpoon in hand.

Upon the deck assembled, old and young,
Bareheaded all in reverence, see them there;
Behold where, hoisted half-mast high,
The English flag hangs mournfully;

And hark ! what solemn sounds are these
Heard in the silence of the seas ?

“ Man that is born of woman, short his time,
And full of woe ! he springeth like a flower,
Or like the grass, that, green at morning prime,
Is cut and withereth ere the evening hour ;

Never doth he continue in one stay,
But like a shadow doth he pass away.”

It was that awful strain, which saith
How in the midst of life we are in death :
“ Yet not for ever, O Lord God most high !
Saviour ! yet not for ever shall we die !”

Ne'er from a voice more eloquent did prayer
Arise, with fervent piety sincere.

To every heart, of all the listening crew,

It made its way, and drew

Even from the hardy seaman's eyes a tear.

“ God,” he pursued, “ hath taken to himself

The soul of our departed sister dear ;

We then commit her body to the deep ;”

He paused, and, at the word,

The coffin's plunge was heard.

A female voice of anguish then brake forth
With sobs convulsive of a heart oppress.

It was a daughter's agonizing cry :

But soon hath she repress

The fit of passionate grief,

And listening patiently,

In that religious effort gained relief.

Beside the gray-hair'd captain doth she stand ;

One arm is linked in his ; the other hand

Hid with the handkerchief her face, and prest

Her eyes, whence burning tears continuous flow.

Down hung her head upon her breast,

And thus the maiden stood in silent woe.

Again was heard the preacher's earnest voice :

It bade the righteous in their faith rejoice,

Their sure and certain hope in Christ ; for blest

In Him are they, who from their labours rest.

It rose into a high thanksgiving strain,

And praised the Lord, who from a world of pain

Had now been pleased to set his servant free ;

Hasten thy kingdom, Lord, that all may rest in thee !

In manhood's fairest prime was he who pray'd,

Even in the flower and beauty of his youth.

These holy words and fervent tones portray'd

The feelings of his inmost soul sincere ;

For scarce two months had fill'd their short career

Since from the grave of her who gave him birth

That sound had struck upon his ear ;

When to the doleful words of “ Earth to earth”

Its dead response the senseless coffin gave :—

Oh ! who can e'er forget that echo of the grave !

Now in the grace of God dismiss'd,

They separate as they may,

To narrow limits of the ship confined :
Nor did the impression lightly pass away,
Even from the unreflecting sailor's mind.
They pitied that sweet maiden, all bereft,
Alone on shipboard among strangers left.
They spake of that young preacher, day by day
How while the fever held its fatal course,
He minister'd at the patient sufferer's side,
Holding of faith and hope his high discourse ;
And how, when all had join'd in humble prayer,
She solemnly confided to his care,
Till to her father's hands she could be given,
Her child forlorn,—and blest him ere she died.
They call'd to mind, how peaceful, how serene,
Like one who seem'd already half in heaven,
After that act she yielded up her breath ;
And sure they wish'd their end like hers, I ween,
And for a comforter like him in death.

II.

THE VOYAGE.

THE maiden on her narrow bed

To needful solitude hath fled ;

He who perform'd the funeral prayer

Leans o'er the vessel's head, and there

Contemplating the sea and sky,

He muses of eternity.

The captain paces to and fro

The deck with steady step and slow,

And at his side a passenger,

Conversing as they go.

Their talk was of that maid forlorn,

The mournful service of the morn,

And the young man, whose voice of heartfelt faith

Breathed hope and comfort o'er the bed of death.

“ Captain,” quoth Randolph, “ you have borne,

Ere this, I ween, to Boston's shore,

Saints by the dozen, and the score :

But if he preach as he can pray,

The Boston men will bless the day

On which you brought this treasure o'er :

A youth like him they well may call

A son of thunder, or a second Paul.”

Thereat the captain smiled, and said,

“ Oh hang the broad face and round head,

Hard as iron, and heavy as lead !

I have whistled for a wind ere now,

And thought it cheap to crack a sail,

If it sent the canting breed below.

Jonah was three days in the whale,

But I have had fellows here, I trow,

With lungs of brazen power,

Who would not fail to preach a whale

Dead sick in half an hour.

One Sunday, when on the banks we lay,

These Roundheads, think ye, what did they ?

Because, they said, 'twas the sabbath day,
 And hallow'd by the Lord,
 They took the fish, which their servants caught,
 And threw them overboard.
 Newman is made of different clay ;
 He walks in his own quiet way :
 And yet beneath that sober mien
 Gleams of a spirit may be seen,
 Which show what temper lies suppress'd
 Within his meek and unambitious breast :
 He seemeth surely one of gentle seed,
 Whose sires for many an age were wont to lead
 In courts and councils, and in camps to bleed."

Randolph replied, " He rules his tongue too well
 Ever of those from whom he sprung to tell :
 Whatever rank they once possess'd
 In camps and councils, is, I ween, suppress'd
 In prudent silence. Little love that pair
 Could to the royal Martyr bear,
 Be sure, who named their offspring Oliver.
 You have mark'd that volume, over which he seems
 To pore and meditate, like one who dreams,
 Pondering upon the page with thought intense,
 That nought, which passes round him, can from thence

His fix'd attention move :
 He carries it about his person still,
 Nor lays it from him for a moment's time.
 At my request, one day, with no good will,
 He lent it me : what, think ye, did it prove ?
 A rigmorole of verses without rhyme,
 About the apple, and the cause of sin,
 By the blind old traitor Milton ! and within,
 Upon the cover, he had written thus,
 As if some saintly relic it had been,
 Which the fond owner gloried in possessing :
 ' Given me by my most venerable friend,
 The author, with his blessing ! "

CAPTAIN.

Sits the wind there !

RANDOLPH.

Returning him the book,
 I told him I was sorry he could find
 None who deserved his veneration more
 Than one who, in the blackest deed of guilt
 That blots our annals, stands participant,
 A volunteer in that worst infamy,
 Stain'd to the core with blessed Charles his blood,
 Although by some capricious mercy spared,
 Strangely, as if by miracle, he still Lived to disparage justice.

CAPTAIN.

And how brook'd he
 Your reprehension ?

RANDOLPH.

With his wonted air
 Of self-possession, and a mind subdued :
 And yet it moved him ; for, though looks and words
 By the strong mastery of his practised will
 Were overruled, the mounting blood betray'd
 An impulse in its secret spring too deep
 For his control. By taking up my speech,
 He answered with a simulated smile :
 " Sir, you say well ; by miracle indeed
 The life so fairly forfeited seems spared ;
 And it was worth the special care of Heaven ;
 Else had the hangman and the insensate axe
 Cut off this toil divine." With that his eyes
 Flash'd, and a warmer feeling flush'd his cheek :
 " Time will bring down the pyramids," he cried,
 " Eldest of human works, and wear away
 The dreadful Alps, coeval with himself :
 But while yon sun shall hold his place assign'd,
 This ocean ebb and flow, and the round earth,
 Obedient to the Almighty Mover, fill
 Her silent revolutions, Milton's mind
 Shall dwell with us, an influence and a power ;
 And this great monument, which he hath built,
 Outliving empires, pyramids, and Alps,
 Endure, the lasting wonder of mankind."

CAPTAIN.

This is stark madness.

RANDOLPH.

Or stark poetry,
 Two things as near as Grub Street and Moorfields.
 But he came bravely off ; for, softening soon
 To his habitual suavity, he said,
 Far was it from his thought to vindicate
 Ill deeds of treason and of blood. The wise
 Had sometimes err'd, the virtuous gone astray :
 Too surely in ourselves we felt the seed
 " Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste
 Brought death into the world and all our woe :"
 His friend, like other men, had drawn a part
 Of that sad heritage ; he loved in him
 His wisdom and his virtue, not his faults.

CAPTAIN.

Well said, and manfully, like one who speaks
 The honest truth.

RANDOLPH.

Why, so it sounds, and seems.

CAPTAIN.

And we must needs admit, he hath not left
 His native country in that piggish mood
 Which neither will be led nor driven, but grunts
 And strives with stubborn neck and groundling snout,
 Struggling through mire and brake, to right and left,
 No matter where, so it can only take

The way it should not go. One of that herd,
Rather than read the service, would have seen
The dead thrown overboard without a prayer.

RANDOLPH.

Yet he hath freaks and follies of opinion ;
The bubbles of a yeasty mind, that works
As it would crack its vessel.

CAPTAIN.

They are ever
The sweetest nuts in which the maggot breeds.

RANDOLPH.

But, once fly-stricken, what avails their sweetness ?
Only to feed a pamper'd grub, that leaves
Nothing but dirt and hollowness behind it.
Tainted the young man is, and deeply too,
I fear, by birth and breeding : I perceive it
With sorrow, seeing on how fair a stock
The unlucky graft is set.

CAPTAIN.

Why then, alas
For that poor Annabel, if she must have
This farther cause to rue our baneful factions.
The wretched strife already hath entail'd
Upon her luckless family the loss
Of fair possessions, friends, and native land !
And now a chance hath offer'd, which to her,
I trow, might largely make amends for all :
It would be hard indeed, when all things seem
To square so well—youth, opportunity,
Their fortunes one, the natural dower of each
So equal, and so bountifully given,
A dying mother's blessing to crown all—
It would be hard indeed, should loyalty
Forbid the banns.

RANDOLPH.

I know her father's temper,
True as his own Toledo to the cause
Wherein they both were tried. Nor will neglect,
Ingratitude of courts, and banishment,
(For a grant in the American wilderness
Only calls exile by a fairer name.)
Subdue his high-wrought virtue. Satisfied
At last, by years of painful proof,
That loyalty must find in its own proud sense
Its own reward, that pride he will bequeath
His children as their best inheritance,
A single heir-loom rescued from the wreck,
And worth whate'er was lost.

CAPTAIN.

'Tis well the youth
Thinks less of earth than heaven, and hath his heart
More with the angels than on human love :
But if such thoughts and hopes have enter'd it,
As would some forty years ago have found

Quick entrance, and warm welcome too, in mine,
His ugly baptism may mar all, and make him
Breathe maledictions on his godfathers,
Though old Nol himself were one.

RANDOLPH.

Howbeit 't will win him
Worship and friends in the city of the saints ;
And, to the ears of sober Boston men,
Oliver will be a name more savoury
Than Tribulation, or Stand-fast-in-the-Lord,
Increase or Nathan, Gershom, Ichabod,
Praise-God, or any of the Barebones breed.
They rise upon the oak-holyday with faces
A full inch longer than they took to bed :
Experienced nurses feed their babes that day
With spoons, because the mother's milk is sour ;
And when they mourn upon the Martyrdom,
'Tis for the expiation, not the crime.
Oh they love dearly one of the precious seed !
Tyburn, since Sixty, in their secret hearts
Holds place of Calvary. For saints and martyrs,
None like their own Hugh Peters, and the heads
On the Hall your only relics ! Fifteen years
They have hid among them the two regicides,
Shifting from den to cover, as we found
Where the scant lay. But earth them as they will,
I shall unkennel them, and from their holes
Drag them to light and justice.

CAPTAIN.

There hath been Much wholesome sickness thrown away, Sir Randolph
On your strong stomach ! Two sea voyages
Have not sufficed to clear the bile wherewith
You left New England !

RANDOLPH.

Nay, it rises in me
As I draw near their shores.

CAPTAIN.

Why then, look shortly
For a sharp fit ; for, if the sky tell true,
Anon we shall have wind, and to our wish.

So spake the Captain, for his eye,
Versed in all signs and weathers,
Discerned faint traces in the eastern sky,
Such as a lion's paw might leave
Upon the desert, when the sands are dry.
The dog-vane now blows out with its light feathers ;
And lo ! the ship, which like a log hath lain,
Heavily rolling on the long slow swell,
Stirs with her proper impulse now, and gathers
A power like life beneath the helmsman's will.

Her head lies right ; the rising breeze
 Astern comes rippling o'er the seas ;
 A tramp of feet ! a sound of busy voices !
 The cordage rattles, and the topsails fill ;
 All hands are active, every heart rejoices.

Blest with fair seas, and favourable skies,
 Right for her promised land
 The gallant vessel flies ;
 Far, far behind her now
 The foamy furrow lies ;
 Like dust around her prow
 The ocean spray is driven.

O thou fair creature of the human hand !
 Thou, who wert palsied late,
 When the dead calm lay heavy on the deep,
 Again hast thou received the breath of heaven,
 And, waking from thy sleep,
 As strength again to those broad wings is given,
 Thou puttest forth thy beauty and thy state !
 Hold on with happy winds thy prosperous way,
 And may no storm that goodly pride abate,
 Nor baffling airs thy destined course delay,
 Nor the sea-rover seize thee for his prey ;
 But minist'ring angels wait
 To watch for thee, against all ill event
 From man, or from the reckless element.
 Thou hast a richer freight
 Than ever vessel bore from Ophir old,
 Or spicey India sent,
 Or Lisbon welcomed to her joyful quay
 From her Brazilian land of gems and gold ;
 Thou carriest pious hope, and pure desires,
 Such as approving angels might behold ;
 A heart of finest mould,
 A spirit that aspires
 To heaven, and draws its flame from heavenly fires ;
 Genius, Devotion, Faith,
 Stronger than time or Death,
 A temper of the high heroic mood,
 By that strong faith exalted, and subdued
 To a magnanimous fortitude.
 The blossom of all virtues dost thou bear,
 The seed of noble actions ! Go thy way
 Rejoicingly, from fear and evil free :
 These shall be thy defence,
 Beneath the all-present arm of Providence,
 Against all perils of the treacherous sea.

III.

CAPE COD.

DAYS pass, winds veer, and favouring skies
 Change like the face of fortune ; storms arise ;
 Safely, but not within her port desired,
 The good ship lies.

Where the long sandy Cape
 Bends and embraces round,
 As with a lover's arm, the shelter'd sea,
 A haven she hath found
 From adverse gales and boisterous billows free.

Now strike your sails,
 Ye toil-worn mariners, and take your rest
 Long as the fierce north-west
 In that wild fit prevails,
 Tossing the waves uptorn with frantic sway.
 Keep ye within the bay,
 Contented to delay
 Your course till the elemental madness cease,
 And heaven and ocean are again at peace.

How gladly there,
 Sick of the uncomfortable ocean,
 The impatient passengers approach the shore ;
 Escaping from the sense of endless motion,
 To feel firm earth beneath their feet once more,
 To breathe again the air
 With taint of bilge and cordage undefiled,
 And drink of living springs, if there they may,
 And with fresh fruits and wholesome food repair
 Their spirits, weary of the watery way.

And oh ! how beautiful
 The things of earth appear
 To eyes that far and near
 For many a week have seen
 Only the circle of the restless sea !
 With what a fresh delight
 They gaze again on fields and forests green,
 Hovel, or whatsoever
 May bear the trace of man's industrious hand ;
 How grateful to their sight
 The shore of shelving sand,
 As the light boat moves joyfully to land !

Woods they beheld, and huts, and piles of wood,
 And many a trace of toil,
 But not green fields or pastures. 'Twas a land
 Of pines and sand ;
 Dark pines, that from the loose and sparkling soil
 Rose in their strength aspiring : far and wide
 They sent their searching roots on every side,
 And thus, by depth and long extension, found
 Firm hold and grasp within that treacherous ground :
 So had they risen and flourish'd ; till the earth,
 Unstable as its neighbouring ocean there,
 Like an unnatural mother, heap'd around
 Their trunks its wavy furrows white and high ;
 And stifled thus the living things it bore.
 Half buried thus they stand,
 Their summits sere and dry,
 Marking, like monuments, the funeral mound ;
 As when the masts of some tall vessel show
 Where, on the fatal shoals, the wreck lies whelm'd below.

Such was the ungenial earth; nor was the air
Fresh and delightful there:

A noisome taint upon the breath it bore;
For they who dwelt upon that sandy shore,
Of meadows and of gardens took no care;
They sow'd not, neither did they reap:
The ocean was their field, their flocks and herds
The myriad-moving armies of the deep;
The whale their mighty chase, whose bones bestrew'd
The sandy margin of that ample bay,
And all about, in many a loathly heap,
The offal and the reeking refuse lay,
Left there for dogs obscene and carrion birds a prey.

Oliver, as they approach'd, said thoughtfully:

"It was within this bay
That they, into the wilderness who bore
The seeds of English faith and liberty,
First set their feet upon the shore.
Here they put in, escaping from the rage
Of tempests, and by treacherous pilotage
Led, as it seem'd to fallible men, astray:
But God was with them; and the Providence
Which errs not, had design'd his people's way."

"A blessed day for England had it been," Randolph exclaim'd, "had Providence thought
good,

If the whole stern round-headed brotherhood
Had follow'd, man and woman, great and small;
New England might have prosper'd with the brood,
Or seas and sharks been welcome to them all."

"Alas, how many a broken family
Hath felt that bitter wish!" the youth replied;
And, as he spake, he breathed a silent sigh.

"The wounded heart is prone to entertain
Presumptuous thoughts and feelings, which arraign
The appointed course of things. But what are we,
Short-sighted creatures of an hour,
That we should judge? In part alone we see,
And this but dimly. He, who ordereth all,
Beholdeth all, at once, and to the end:
Upon His wisdom and His power,
His mercy and His boundless love, we rest;
And resting thus in humble faith, we know,
Whether the present be for weal or woe,
For us whatever is must needs be best."

Thus, while he spake, the boat had reach'd the land;
And, grating gently, rested on the sand.

They step ashore; the dwellers gather nigh:
"Whence comes the vessel? whither is she bound?"
Then for Old England's welfare they inquire;—
Eager alike for question and reply,
With open lips and ears attending round;—
What news of war, and plague, and plots, and fire?
Till satisfied of these, with cheerful care
The board and bowl they hasten to prepare;
Each active in his way,

Glad of some lawful business, that may break
The tedium of an idle Sabbath-day.

But, from the stir of that loquacious crew,
Oliver meantime apart from all withdrew.
Beyond the bare and sapless pines, which stood
Half-overwhelm'd with sand,
He pass'd, and entering in the wood,
Indulged his burthen'd heart in solitude.
"Thou Earth, receive me, from my native land
An unoffending exile! Hear my claim!
In search of wealth I have not sought thy shore,
Nor covetous of fame,
Nor treading in the ambitious steps of power;
But hiding from the world a hapless name,
And sacrificing all
At holiest duty's call,
Thou barbarous Land, of thee I only crave—
For those I love—concealment and a grave."

Thus he relieved his breast; yet did not dare
Allow himself full utterance, even there:
To part he gave a voice; and then, in fear,
Shaped with his lips, inaudibly, the rest:
With that the very air
Might not be trusted; and he look'd around,
Alarm'd, lest human ear
Had caught the unfinish'd sound.
Some tears stole down his cheek, now not repress'd,
And, kneeling on the earth, he kiss'd the ground.

Unbidden thoughts then took their course, and drew
The future and the past before his view:
The haunts, the friendships, and the hopes of youth—
All, all forsaken;—no dear voice,
Ever again to bid his heart rejoice!
Familiar scenes and faces
Only in dreams should he behold again;
But, in their places,
The wilderness, wild beasts, and savage men!

Soon from that poignant thought
His soul upon the wings of hope took flight;
And strong imagination brought
Visions of joy before his inward sight.
Of regions yet by Englishmen unsought,
And ancient woods, was that delightful dream,—
The broad savannah, and the silver stream.
Fair bowers were there, and gardens smiled,
And harvests flourish'd in the wild;
And, while he made Redeeming Love his theme,— Savage no longer now—
The Indians stood around,
And drank salvation with the sound.
One Christian grave was there,
Turf'd well, and weeded by his pious care,
And redolent of many a fragrant flower
And herb profusely planted all about.

Within his bower
An old man sate, in patience and in peace,

While the low sands of life ran out,
Awaiting his release.

That old man laid his hand upon his head,
And blest him daily, when the day was done ;
And Heaven was open to him, and he saw
His mother's spirit smile, and bless her son.

Thus to the voluntary dream resign'd
He lay, while blended sounds of air and sea
Lull'd his unconcious mind
With their wild symphony.

The wind was in the pines, awakening there
A sea-like sound continuous, and a swell
At fitful intervals, that mingled well
With ocean's louder roar,
When the long curling waves,
Reach after reach in regular rising, fell
Upon the sandy shore.

Long might he there have lain, but that, in tones
Which seem'd of haste to tell,
Once, twice, and thrice pronounc'd he heard his
name :
Too sweetly to his ears the accents came,
Breathed from the gentle lips of Annabel.

With hurried pace she comes, and flush'd in face,
And with a look, half-pity, half-affright,
Which, while she spake, enlarged her timid eyes :

" O, sir ! I have seen a piteous sight !"

The shuddering maiden cries ;

" A poor wild woman. Woe is me ! among
What worse than heathen people are we thrown ?
Beasts, in our England, are not treated thus,—
Our very stones would rise
Against such cruelties !

But you, perhaps, can reach the stony heart,—
Oh come, then, and perform your Christian part."

She led him hastily toward a shed,
Where, fetter'd to the door post, on the ground
An Indian woman sate. Her hands were bound,
Her shoulders and her back were waled and scored

With recent stripes. A boy stood by,
Some seven years old, who with a piteous eye
Beheld his suffering mother, and deplored

Her injuries with a cry,
Deep, but not loud,—an utterance that express'd
The mingled feelings swelling in his breast,—
Instinctive love intense, the burning sense
Of wrong, intolerable grief of heart,
And rage, to think his arm could not fulfil
The pious vengeance of his passionate will.

His sister by the door
Lay basking in the sun : too young was she
To feel the burthen of their misery ;
Reckless of all that pass'd, her little hand
Play'd idly with the soft and glittering sand.

At this abhorred sight,
Had there been place for aught
But pity, half relieved by indignation,

They would have seen that Indian woman's face
Not with surprise alone, but admiration :
With such severe composure, such an air
Of stern endurance, did she bear
Her lot of absolute despair.

You rather might have deem'd,
So fix'd and hard the strong bronze features seem'd,
That they were of some molten statue part,
Than the live sentient index of a heart
Suffering and struggling with extremest wrong :
But that the coarse jet hair upon her back
Hung loose, and lank, and long,
And that sometimes she moved her large black eye,
And look'd upon the boy who there stood weeping
by.

Oliver in vain attempted to assuage,
With gentle tones and looks compassionate,
The bitterness of that young Indian's rage.
The boy drew back abhorrent from his hand,
Eyed him with fierce disdain, and breathed
In inarticulate sounds his deadly hate.
Not so the mother ; she could understand
His thoughtful pity, and the tears which fell
Copiously down the cheeks of Annabel.
Touch'd by that unaccustomed sympathy
Her countenance relax'd : she moved her head
As if to thank them both
Then frowning, as she raised her mournful eye,—
" Bad Christian-man ! bad English-man !" she said :
And Oliver a sudden sense of shame
Felt for the English and the Christian name.

IV

THE CAPTIVES RANSOMED.

OLIVER.

I pray you, sir, who owns the Indian woman
That is chain'd in-yonder hut ?

CAPE'S-MAN.

What ! you have seen them,
The she-wolf and her whelps ?

OLIVER.

She hath indeed
A strange wild aspect, and the boy appears
Of a fierce nature. I should think her owner
Would find her an unprofitable slave.

CAPE'S-MAN.

Why, sir, you reckon rightly ; and, methinks,
Without a conjuror's skill you well may think so :
Those fetters, and the marks upon her skin,
Speak her deserts. On week-days with the whip

We keep her tightly to her work ; but thus
Her Sabbath must be spent, or she would put
The wilderness between her and her owner.
An honest dealer never paid good money
For a worse piece : and for that boy of hers,
He is a true-bred savage, blood and bone,
To the marrow and heart's core.

RANDOLPH.

I warrant him !
No mother like your squaw to train a child
In the way she would have him go ; she makes him subtler
Than the sly snake, untameable as bear
Or buffalo, fierce as a famish'd wolf,
And crueller than French judges, Spanish friars,
Or Dutchmen in the East. His earliest plaything
Is a green scalp, and then, for lollipop,
The toasted finger of an Englishman !
Young as he is, I dare be sworn he knows
Where is the liveliest part to stick a skewer
Into a prisoner's flesh, and where to scoop
The tenderest mouthful. If the Devil himself
Would learn devices to afflict the damn'd
With sharper torments, he might go to school
To a New England savage.

CAPE'S-MAN.

I perceive, sir,
You know them well. Perhaps you may have heard
Of this young devil's father ;—he was noted
For a most bloody savage in his day :
They call'd him Kawnacom.

RANDOLPH.

What ! Kawnacom,
The Narhaganset Sagamore ?

CAPE'S-MAN.

The same ;
A sort of captain, or of prince, among them.

RANDOLPH.

A most notorious villain ! But I left him
At peace with the English ?

CAPE'S-MAN.

And you find him so,—
Under the only bail he would not break ;
A bullet through the heart is surety for him.
You have not learnt, I guess, what dreadful work
There is in the back country ?—Families
Burnt in their houses ; stragglers tomahawk'd
And scalp'd, or dragg'd away that they may die
By piecemeal murder, to make mockery
For these incarnate devils at the stake.
Farms are forsaken ; towns are insecure ;
Men sleep with one eye open, and the gun
By their bed-side. And, what is worst, they know not

How far the league extends, nor whom to trust
Among these treacherous tribes. Old people say
That things were not so bad in the Pequod war.

RANDOLPH.

What then, have we been idle ?

CAPE'S-MAN.

Hitherto
But little has been done. The evil found us
Lapp'd in security, and unprepared :
Nor know we where to strike, nor whom, so darkly
The mischief hath been laid.

RANDOLPH.

Strike where we will,
So we strike hard, we cannot err. The blow
That rids us of an Indian does good service

OLIVER.

That were a better service which should win
The savage to your friendship.

CAPE'S-MAN.

You are young, sir,
And, I perceive, a stranger in the land ;
Or you would know how bootless is the attempt
To tame and civilize these enemies,
Man-beasts, or man-fiends,—call them which you
will,—
Their monstrous nature being half brute, half devil,
Nothing about them human but their form.
He, who expends his kindness on a savage
Thinking to win his friendship, might as wisely
Plant thorns and hope to gather grapes at vintage.

OLIVER.

Look but to Martha's Vineyard, and behold
On your own shores the impossibility
Achieved—the standing miracle display'd
In public view, apparent to all eyes,
And famous through all countries wheresoe'er
The Gospel truth is known. Many are the hearts
In distant England which have overflow'd
With pious joy to read of Hiacoomes,
Whose prayerful house the pestilence past by ;
And blind Wawompeck,—he, within whose doors
The glad thanksgiving strain of choral praise
Fails not, at morn and eve, from year to year ;
And the Sachem, who rejoiced because the time
Of light was come, and now his countrymen,
Erring and lost, no longer should go down
In ignorance and darkness to the grave ;
And poor old Lazarus, that rich poor man,
The child of poverty, but rich in faith,
And his assured inheritance in heaven.

RANDOLPH.

Young sir, it is with stories as with men ;

That credit oftentimes they gain abroad,
Which, either for misluck or misdesert,
They fail to find at home.

OLIVER.

Are these things false, then?
Is there no truth in Mayhew's life of love?
Hath not the impatient Welshman's zeal, that blazed
Even like a burning and consuming fire,
Refined itself into a steady light
Among the Indians?—and the name of Williams,
The signal once for strife where'er he went,
Become a passport and a word of peace
Through savage nations? Or is this a tale
Set forth to mock our weak credulity;
And all that holy Eliot hath perform'd
Only a fable cunningly devised?

CAPE'S-MAN.

He comes out qualified to lecture us
Upon our own affairs!

RANDOLPH.

The things you talk of
Serve but with us to comfort our old women,
Furnish an elder with some choice discourse
For a dull synod, and sometimes help out
Sir Spintext at a pinch, when he would think it
A sin did he dismiss his hungry flock
Before the second glass be fairly spent.
Much have you read, and have believed as largely;
And yet one week's abode in the colony
Will teach you more than all your English reading.

OLIVER.

Sir, I am easy of belief, for that way
My temper leads me,—liable to err;
And yet, I hope, not obstinate in error;
But ready still to thank the riper judgment
That may correct my inexperienced years.
You paint the Indians to the life, I doubt not:
Children of sin, and therefore heirs of wrath,
The likeness of their Heavenly Sire in them
Seems utterly defaced; and in its stead,
Almost, it might be thought, the Evil Power
Had set his stamp and image. This should move us
The more to deep compassion; men ourselves,
In whom the accident of birth alone
Makes all this awful difference! And remembering,
That from our common parent we derive
Our nature's common malady innate,
For which our common Saviour offers us
The only cure,—oh! ought we not to feel
How good and merciful a deed it were
To bring these poor lost sheep within his fold!

RANDOLPH.

Sheep call you them, forsooth! When you can gather
Bears, wolves, and tigers in a fold, hope then
To tame such sheep as these.

OLIVER.

What is there, sir,
That may not by assiduous care be won
To do our will? Give me a lion's cub,
Torn from the teat, and I will so train up
The noble beast, that he shall fondle me,
And lay his placid head upon my knees,
And lick my hand, and couch my bed-side,
And guard me with a dog's fidelity.

RANDOLPH.

Behold a litter ready to your wish!
Our friend, if I mistake not, will afford
An easy purchase, dam and cubs. What say you,
My lion-tamer?

CAPE'S-MAN.

You shall have them cheap, sir!
A bargain that may tempt you; come, for half
That they would fetch in the Barbadoes market.
I meant to ship them thither, but would rather
Sell at a loss than keep that woman longer.

Thus had the jeer grown serious, and it drew
Into the young man's cheek a deeper hue.
Moments there are in life,—alas,—how few!—
When, casting cold prudential doubts aside,
We take a generous impulse for our guide,
And, following promptly what the heart thinks best,
Commit to Providence the rest,
Sure that no after-reckoning will arise,
Of shame, or sorrow, for the heart is wise.
And happy they who thus in faith obey
Their better nature: err sometimes they may,
And some sad thoughts lie heavy in the breast,
Such as by hope deceived are left behind;
But, like a shadow, these will pass away
From the pure sunshine of a peaceful mind.

Thus feeling, Oliver obey'd
His uncorrupted heart; nor paused, nor weigh'd
What hindrance, what displeasure might ensue;
But from his little store of worldly wealth,
Poor as it was, the ready ransom drew.
Half-earnest, half-sarcastic, Randolph now
Sought him from that rash purpose to dissuade;
While the hard Cape's-man, nothing nice,
Counted the money, glad to get his price.

V.

THE PORTRAIT.

At length the adverse gales have ceased ;
 The breath of morn is from the east,
 Where, burnishing with gold the restless sea,
 Uprose the sun in radiant majesty.
 Unfelt that breath upon the seas,
 Unheard amid the silent trees,
 It breathes so quietly :

Yet have the seamen, on their way intent,
 Perceived the auspicious sign. The sails are bent,
 The anchor raised ; the swelling canvas now
 Fills with the fresh'ning breeze ; the Cape recedes,
 Its sandhills and its pines
 In distance fade away.
 Steady she holds her course ; and still the day
 Is young, when lo ! the haven is in sight ;
 And ere from his meridian height the sun
 Declines, within that haven's gentle breast,
 From the long labours of her weary way,
 The vessel comes to rest.

Scatter'd within the peaceful bay
 Many a fair isle and islet lay,
 And rocks and banks which threaten'd there
 No peril to the mariner.
 The shores which bent around were gay
 With maizals, and with pastures green,
 And rails and hedge-row trees between,
 And fields for harvest white,
 And dwellings sprinkled up and down ;
 And round about the cluster'd town,
 Which rose in sunshine bright,
 Was many a shelter'd garden spot,
 And many a sunny orchard plot,
 And bowers which might invite
 The studious man to take his seat
 Within their quiet, cool retreat,
 When noon was at its height.
 No heart that was at ease, I ween,
 Could gaze on that surrounding scene
 Without a calm delight.

Behold upon the quay a press
 Of business and of idleness,
 Where these new-comers land.
 Kinsfolk with anxious questions meet ;
 And friends and light acquaintance greet
 With jocund shake of hand :
 The idlers ask the crew of what
 Upon their way befell ;
 And all, and more than all they know,
 The wondering sailors tell.

From tongue to tongue the tidings ran ;
 The lady's death,—the strange young man ;
 His moody ways, his gift of prayer,
 The maid committed to his care,
 His destined bride, they nothing doubting deem'd ;

And how, by sudden fit of pity moved,
 From slavery he redeem'd
 The children and the wife of Kawnacom,
 (An act that all admired, but none approved.)
 And to their savage tribe, they fear'd,
 Reckless of counsel, would conduct them home.
 All marvell'd at the tale ; the many jeer'd :
 " Mad as the Quakers !" some exclaim'd ; and some Pray'd that his rash and unenlighten'd will Might cause no after-troubles in a state
 Pester'd with errors and new fancies still.
 Some shook their heads ; the more compassionate
 Observed, that where so kind a heart was found,
 Pity it was the wits should not be sound.

" It is a madness which the world will cure,"
 Leverett, the Governor, said, " too soon, be sure."
 Randolph had risen to leave him, when the youth
 Enter'd the Governor's door. " Come, let me play,"
 Quoth he, " the usher !" in his wonted way,
 Mingling with sportive speech sarcastic truth.
 " Your Excellency here beholds the Man !
 The Quaker-Church of England-Puritan,
 Knight-errant, preacher, and we know not what,
 So many things he is, and he is not ;
 A hero, certes, if he would but fight ;
 A Solomon, if his notions were but right.
 Should he into a lion's den be thrown,—
 Look at those arms and eyes, and you might swear
 That he would act the London 'Prentice there ;
 But trusting to the mind, forsooth, alone
 He'd take the cubs, like lambkins, to his breast,
 And, Daniel-like, by faith subdue the rest.
 Then for the harder task of savage-quelling
 He hath a talent which exceeds all telling.
 Two full-bred devilings he has taught to greet him,
 And kiss as lovingly as they would eat him ;
 And he hath bought their mother squaw, to teach
 That pleasant lingo the Six-nation speech ;
 Words, which would choke a Dutchman or a Jew,
 Dumfound Old Niek, and which from me or you
 Could not be forced by ipecaeuanha,
 Drop from his oratoric lips like manna.
 So fine withal his temper proves, that it
 Hath borne unhurt the file of my rough wit ;
 This to his honour I am bound to tell ;
 Would that he took true counsel half as well !
 And now, sir, as your favour may befriend him,
 To that in right good earnest I commend him !"

" A man of caustic speech !" the Governor said,
 Following him with his eye, as forth he went :
 " Yet hath this humour no unkind intent ;
 His commendation, sir, shall have its weight,
 The rest we take as it is meant."

The youth
 To that urbane accoil, with grateful eye,
 And gentle motion of the bending head,
 Return'd a mute reply.
 There was a troubled meaning in his look,

And o'er his brow an ashy paleness spread,
As forth he took

A little casket, and, with trembling hand
Presenting it to Leverett, said :
" Thus I discharge my mother's last command ;
On her death-bed she told me I should need
No other friend with you in my behalf to plead."

The Governor's countenance changed, as he received

That message from the dead ;
And when he open'd and contemplated
The sad bequest,
Tears fill'd his eyes, which could not be repress'd.
It was a woman's picture, in her youth
And bloom portray'd by Cooper's perfect skill.
The eyes, which death had quench'd,
Kept there their life and living lustre still ;
The auburn locks, which sorrow's withering hand,
Forestalling time, had changed to early grey,
Disparting from the ivory forehead, fell
In ringlets which might tempt the breath of May ;
The lips, now cold as clay,
Seem'd to breathe warmth and vernal fragrance
there ;

The cheeks were in their maiden freshness fair.
Thus had the limner's art divine preserved
A beauty which from earth had pass'd away ;
And it had caught the mind which gave that face
Its surest charm, its own peculiar grace.
A modest mien,
A meek, submissive gentleness serene,
A heart on duty stay'd,
Simple, sincere, affectionate, sedate,
Were in that virgin countenance portray'd :
She was an angel now ; and yet,
More beautiful than this fair counterfeit,
Even in heaven, her spirit scarce could be,
Nor seem from stain of ill, and evil thoughts, more free.

Time was, when Leverett had worn
That picture like a relic in his breast ;
And duly, morn and night,
With Love's idolatry
Fix'd on its beauties his adoring sight,
And to his lips the precious crystal prest.
Time was, when, in the visions of his rest,
That image of delight
Came with sweet smiles, and musical voice, to bless

His sleep, and all his dreams were happiness.
And still, though course of time, and fatal force
Of circumstance, grave thoughts, and worldly cares
(Ah ! how unlike the blissful hopes of youth,
From which it had been worse than death to part !)

Had fortified as well as heal'd his heart,
That vision, in her beauty and her truth,
Sometimes would visit him ; and he,
With a confused but conscious faculty,

Knowing full well
That this, which seem'd, too surely could not be,

Struggled against the spell.
Unchanged and unimpair'd by thirty years,
Her image came, but only to distress
The heart she wont to bless,
Till from the painful unreality
He woke, disturb'd in spirit, and in tears.
But he was master of his waking soul,
And could control
All unbecoming passion, and all feeling
That needs repressing or concealing.
Howbeit he sought not to restrain
His deep emotion now, nor turn'd aside
His natural tears to hide, which freely fell ;
But wiping them away a moment, eyed
Oliver's pale countenance and anxious brow,
Perusing there his mother's lineaments :
Then took his hand, and said, " Thou need'st not tell
Thy hapless name and perilous secret now,
I know them but too well."

VI.

FUTURE PROSPECTS.

LEVERETT.

Why hast thou ventured hither ? With what hope
Or end hath natural piety betray'd thee
To this forlorn attempt ? If to escape
Had offer'd chance enough to tempt despair,
The desperate effort had ere this been tried.
Besure, it hath been meditated oft,
And bravely ; and, had life been all the stake,
Life had been cheaply set upon the die,
To lose it being gain.

OLIVER.

They must forego,
The dear desire of e'er revisiting
Their native land,—and in my mother's grave
That hope, I ween, will now be laid at rest :
Nor could they safely seek a resting-place
In Europe, even if we reach'd a ship,
And left these shores behind us. Oft and well
Have I perpended this, devising ways
For flight, and schemes of plausible disguise,
Such thoughts in disappointment ending alway ;
Till having offer'd up in fervent faith
A disciplined and humbled heart to Heaven,
A better hope arose. The wilderness
Is open to us ! Thither will we go,
Far in the wilds, where foot of Englishman
Hath never trod. The equal elements
Will not deny our portion : Mother Earth
In unappropriated freedom, there
Holds forth her liberal lap ; her springs, her fruits,
Her creatures of the land and air and stream,

To her free children freely offering,
 Hid from the world, a double duty there
 May I perform, to God and man discharged,
 Serving my human and my Heavenly Sire ;
 There, treading in your saintly Eliot's path,
 Guide the poor Indian in the way to Heaven !
 And, in the foretaste of its joys assured,
 Receive mine own exceeding great reward.

LEVERETT.

Oh pitiable lot
 Oh poor humanity,
 When virtue thus can wrong the heroic heart,
 And blind the noble intellect ! Thou drest
 Of peopling some Arcadian solitude
 With human angels, —ignorant, alas !
 Of time, place, circumstance, and men, and things,—
 The Indians, and thy father, and thyself !

OLIVER.

Myself at least I know, prepared to act
 Or suffer, with a soul for all events
 Resign'd.

LEVERETT.

To suffer, rightly thou may'st say ;
 Easily we screw our courage to that point,
 The issue being remote, and hope and chance
 Between us and the event.
 But how prepared to act ? Ere thou couldst hold
 With these Red tribes the commonest discourse
 Of needful things and every-day concerns,
 Years of laborious pupilage must pass,
 Unless the cloven flame upon thy head
 Should light, and loose thy speech by miracle.
 But wherefore with the show of difficulties
 Should I dissuade thee from an enterprise
 Impossible to attempt ?

OLIVER.

A poet, sir,
 In whose dark sayings deeper wisdom lies
 Than ancient oracles enounced, or statesmen
 Appear to reach in these ignoble times,
 Hath taught me to believe, " impossible
 Is but the faith of fear."

LEVERETT.

Are poets, then,
 Thy teachers ? O, young man, their flattering lore
 But ill prepares the spirit for the uses
 Of ordinary life !

OLIVER.

They best prepare it,
 Who warn the heart against its own illusions ;
 And, strengthening it with patient hope and faith,
 Arm it against all issues. To such teachers
 My inexperienced youth by Providence

Was mercifully led. Penn hath allow'd me
 To call him friend, in no sectarian use
 Of words ; and I have sat at Milton's feet
 A reverential listener.

LEVERETT.

Milton's friendship
 Will neither hurt nor help thee in a land,
 Where they, who stiffliest hold his errors, lift not
 Their thoughts above the earth to follow him,
 When his strong spirit mounts upon the wing,
 Beyond their grovelling vision. But well is it
 Thou hast not from Penn's dangerous fellowship
 Learnt his sectarian speech, and other follies
 Wherewith that formal informality
 Provokes the law. New England writes her statutes
 In blood against the Quakers. Thou hast 'scaped
 Their clownish and uncivil usages ;
 But if there be an inner taint, take heed
 To keep it hidden : openly I must not Allow the violation of our laws.

OLIVER.

Oh we have trespass'd largely on your goodness ;
 Generous beyond example, as thou art,
 Too largely have we tax'd it ; and the cause,
 The dreadful cause alone can palliate
 Conduct like ours towards thee. Not for worlds
 Would I do aught that might displeasure thee,
 Best earthly friend ! whom my dear mother never
 Named without tears, and holiest gratitude,
 Such as will surely bring upon thy head
 The blessing that it pray'd for. I come here,
 Not wilfully and madly to provoke
 Intolerant laws, nor farther to presume
 Upon thy noble nature ; but to thank thee,
 In her dear name, for all which thou hast done ;
 To tell thee, as she charged me, that in death
 She bless'd thee for thy goodness ; and, performing
 Her latest wish and will, to take the burthen
 Of our unhappy fortunes on myself.

LEVERETT.

Her latest wish and will !

OLIVER.

It was a thought
 Which added to her griefs, that you should stand
 In jeopardy for us ; howbeit, she said,
 She hoped and felt and trusted that you knew
 Her inmost mind, and Heaven would recompense
 A true affection, too severely tried.

LEVERETT.

Thus it was ever with her gentle heart,
 By some strange fortune fated still to prove
 That in her strength alone the root
 Of her sole weakness lay.
 Poor heart ! a victim always at the call

Of fancied duty ; only then unjust,
 Only then obstinate, when offering up
 Itself a bleeding sacrifice ! I know,
 And understand, in what devoted mood
 Her acquiescence to thy dreams was given ;
 Such as aspiring saints desire, and martyrs
 Reach in their triumph, when they clasp the stake.

OLIVER.

'Twas in no height of feverish exaltation,
 In no delusion of the heated mind,
 That her consent was given : but mutually
 Our hearts received, as I believe, from Heaven
 The impulse. By the test of prayer we tried,
 And in the balance of the sanctuary
 Weighed it ; and having taken our resolve,
 Partook that inward peace, wherewith the Spirit
 Doth set the seal to its authentic acts.
 Shake not thy head thus mournfully, nor thus
 In disapproval knit the incredulous brow !
 The purpose, which at first was entertain'd
 With doubtfulness and fear, increased in strength,
 While long infirmity and wasting pain
 Consumed her mortal mould ; and at that hour,
 When it is no illusion to believe
 That the departing soul hath sight of heaven
 Opening before its happy flight, and feels
 The expansion of diviner faculties
 Than this gross earth unfolds, her looks and tokens
 Confirm'd the injunction of her latest voice,
 And bless'd, and for obedience strengthen'd me,
 Betide what may.

LEVERETT.

For me, then, it remains
 Only to show what obstacles impede
 The perilous course from which I must not farther
 Essay to turn thee. Thou, who art not less
 In mind than lineaments thy mother's image,
 Judge for thyself if they be superable.
 Thy grandsire lives, indeed,—if it be life,
 When the poor flesh, surviving, doth entomb
 The reasonable soul defunct. Below
 The reach of grief and danger he hath sunk.
 The tale of his dear daughter's death to him
 Will be like baptism to a chrysome babe,
 Something that means he knows and recks not what.
 Safely in court might he hold up the hand,
 Now trembling and unconscious, which subscribed
 The fatal warrant : even the sword of law
 Would, in his pitiable estate, acknowledge
 The visitation of a higher Power,
 And turn away its edge. But as thou canst not,
 Encumber'd with a twichild man, pursue
 Thy purpose, it must of necessity
 Be laid aside, at least till death remove
 The impediment not else removable.

OLIVER.

So be it. We must patiently await
 The hour of his release. With time and death
 Sure reckoning may be made.

LEVERETT.

That hour in truth
 Cannot be long delay'd. But what shall make
 Thy father to thy dreams defer his own ?
 If in his corporal uses man becomes
 The slave of habit, stronger are the chains
 In which the mind is bound, a willing thrall.

OLIVER.

I understand you not !

LEVERETT.

You do not know
 Your father.

OLIVER.

Only by report, alas !
 As England in his years of fortune knew him ;
 Religious, faithful, excellently skill'd
 In war, and in his single person brave
 To all men's admiration.

LEVERETT.

Yet I think
 Enthusiast as thou art, thou needest not
 Learn with how much alloy the richest vein
 Of virtues is too often found combined.
 'Tis the condition of humanity,
 Frail and infirm at best ; and they who boast
 Sinless perfection for their privilege,
 By the proud folly of the claim, confute
 Their own insane pretension.

OLIVER.

Surely, sir,
 My father hath not in the school of Christ
 So poorly profited, nor lived so long
 A stranger to himself and his own heart,
 That he should hold this error.

LEVERETT.

Glad I am
 Thou seest it erronous. Other notions
 He holds too near akin to it, the breed
 Of those pestiferous and portentous times
 Wherein his lot had fallen. Even yet he thinks
 The kingdom of the saints shall be in strength
 Establish'd ; finds in whatsoever occurs
 The accomplishment of some dark prophecy ;
 Interprets, and expounds, and calculates
 That soon he shall be call'd to bear his part
 In setting up again the broken work

Left incomplete by chosen Oliver.
Thus he in one continuous dream of hope
Beguiles the tedious years.

OLIVER.

Herein I see not
What should impede my purpose. In the forest,
The sense of freedom and security,
Healing a wounded spirit, may restore
To health his mind diseased.

LEVERETT.

But if the patient
Reject the means of cure? He will not leave
A place of refuge which the Lord prepared
For him in his distress; and where full surely
He trusts the call will reach him, to come forth
And fight the battles of the good old cause,
For which he doth endure contentedly
This living martyrdom. Thy father thus
Would answer thee; the malady is rooted
In him so deeply now. It is become Essential in his being: long success,
Beyond the most audacious of his thoughts,
Fed and inflamed it first; long suffering since
Hath as it were annealed it in his soul
With stubborn fortitude, bewilder'd faith,
Love, hatred, indignation, all strong passions,
The bitterest feelings, and the tenderest thoughts,
Yea, all his earthly, all his heavenly hopes.
And Russel—for such sympathy alone
Could influence him to harbour long such guests—
Fosters the old delusion which he shares,
And ministers to it, even in his prayers.

OLIVER.

My father will not be persuaded then,
You think?

LEVERETT.

I know he will not. There are minds,
The course of which, as of some slow disease,
Known by its fatal frequency too well,
We see with helpless foresight, hopelessly.
But, if he listen'd to thy moving words,
What would it now avail? The wilderness
Affords no shelter while the Indians,
Fiercer than beasts, and wilier, are in arms.

OLIVER.

I have a passport for the wilderness
Safer than statesmen could accord, or states
Enforce with all their strength. The Indian woman,
Of whom Sir Randolph in his mockery told thee;
She and her children will be my protection
Among the wildest tribes.

LEVERETT.

And was this thought, then,
Thy motive for the act?

OLIVER.

I will not say
It had so much of forethought: but the ways
Of Providence open before me now.
The impulse, which appear'd like foolishness
To worldly censure, and which tremblingly
I follow'd, for this issue was design'd:
Oh doubt it not! And had I disobey'd
The inward and unerring monitor
That hour, infirm of faith, how had I then Disherited myself of this fair hope!

LEVERETT.

A Narhaganset woman, is she not?
The widow of a Sagamore, who fell
In the outbreak of these troubles?

OLIVER.

So they told me;
A noted savage, Kawnacom his name.

LEVERETT.

Something, methinks, I see in this, wherein
Our purposes may square, and my straight path
Of policy with thy eccentric course
Fall in and meet at the end. But, understand me,
Rather would I for thine own sake dissuade thee,
And for the sake of that dear Saint in heaven,
From an adventure of remotest hope
And imminent peril: but if thy resolve
Be obstinate against all reason, blameless
Then may I, both in her sight and in thine,
Betide the issue how it will, promote
The purpose which in vain I disapprove.
One trust we have; all-able Providence
Will overrule our ways, and haply too,
Knowing the upright intention, rectify
Our erring judgments. Let the matter sleep
Till I have taken counsel with my pillow
And this night's waking thoughts. See me tomorrow
As early as you will, before the stir
Of business hath begun: and now farewell.

VII.

THE INDIAN WAR.

With many an anxious thought oppress,
From busy sleep more wearying than unrest,
Hath Oliver arisen;

And from his bed of feverish care,
 Glad to respire the cool fresh morning air,
 Gone forth as from a prison.
 The wakeful governor received his guest ;
 And ere the morning board was placed,
 They to and fro the garden paced
 In earnest talk, while Leverett told
 How mutual injuries of old,
 And mutual fears, the envenom'd will,
 Suspicious still conceal'd but festering still,
 And policy that shrunk from nothing ill,
 (Savage or civilized—oh shame
 To man's perverted power!—in this the same,)
 Youth's fiery courage, and old's rooted hate
 Had brought the danger on, which now assail'd the state.

The times were fearful ; wheresoe'er around
 Among the Indian tribes he turn'd his view,
 False friends, or open enemies, were found.
 How wide their league he rather fear'd than knew.

But this was understood,
 That feuds deliver'd down for many an age,
 From sire to son in sacred heritage,
 Wherewith their very nature seem'd imbued,
 Had been with dread solemnities forsworn
 And secret rites accurst, in fell intent
 That they should root the English from the land,
 And the last white man's blood
 Be of their bond the seal and sacrament.

In truth they were a formidable foe ;
 Compared with ours, their numbers made them so ;
 Crafty, deceitful, murderous, merciless :
 Yet with heroic qualities endued :
 Contempt of death, surpassing fortitude,
 Patience through all privations, self-control
 Even such as saints and sages scarce attain,
 And a sustain'd serenity of soul,
 Which Fortune might assault or tempt in vain,
 Not to be moved by pleasure or by pain.

OLIVER.

Alas to think they have not long ere this
 Been link'd with you in Christian fellowship !

LEVERETT.

Look at divided Christendom !—at England ;
 Her wounds, inflicted by sectarian rage,
 Open and festering,—never to be heal'd !
 Look at thy father's house ; a threefold cord
 Of brotherhood trebly parted there ;
 Then tell me, where may Christian fellowship
 In this wide world be found ? Alas, my friend,
 I see it only in the Promised Land.
 From Pisgah's summit, through the glass of Faith,
 Far in the regions of futurity.
 Yet something we have done, which—though I own it
 Far short of what true policy requires,

And in the scale of national duty weighing Lighter than dust—may show we are not wholly
 The slaves of Mammon. Fretted as we have been
 By schisms, by rampant heresies disturb'd,
 And by that spiritual pride possess'd, whose touch,
 With influence lethal as aspic's tooth,
 Numbs the life-blood of charity, this England
 Hath sons, whose names, if there be any praise,
 Shall have their place with saints of primitive
 times
 Enroll'd, true heroes of humanity.

OLIVER.

Oh doubt not that their virtue and their prayers
 Will in this time of trial speed you more
 Than all your carnal strength !

LEVERETT.

That faith might better
 Beseem thine uncle of the seminary,
 The Oratorian, than thy father's son.
 A monk may put his trust in beads and sackcloth ;
 But Oliver's saints wore buff, and their right hands
 Wrought for themselves the miracles they ask'd for.
 Think not, young man, that I disparage prayer,
 Because I hold that he, who calls on Heaven
 For help against his temporal enemies,
 Then with most cause and surest hope prefers
 His supplication, when he best exerts
 The prudence and the strength which God hath given him.

OLIVER.

There is a strength in patience which exceedeth
 All other power ; a prudence in the Gospel
 Passing, as needs it must, all human wisdom.
 That Gospel teaches passiveness and peace.

LEVERETT.

Patience he needs, Heaven knows ! who hath to deal

With one enamour'd of a young opinion,
 And like a giddy amorist pursuing
 The passionate folly, reckless where it leads him.
 Remember that you come not here to teach :
 Remember too, that something like respect
 Is due to years, and something to experience ;
 Some deference to our station ; some attention—
 And this at least will be allow'd—to one
 Who at all hazards has approved himself
 Thy mother's friend, and would no less be thine.

Abash'd at that reproof severe
 Stood Oliver, unable to abate
 The rising glow of shame that fired his cheek,
 Or check the starting tear.
 But then the Governor's eye compassionate
 Even in reproof,—the pause he interposed,—
 The low relenting tone wherein he closed

His stern though fit authoritative strain,
Temper'd the needful pain.

“ O best and kindest friend,
O friend revered, I feel and own,
Whether I spake in error or in truth,
That thy rebuke is just,” replied the youth :
“ Forgive me ! and no more will I offend ;
But listen, and in all things, that I may,
Humbly and zealously obey.”

LEVERETT.

Hear then, and patiently, while I instruct thee
Of things as yet unchronicled in books,
But bearing on this crisis, and the knowledge
Whereof in thine adventure will be found
Specially needful. When the English laid
The poor foundations of our colony,
(For poor indeed they seem'd ; and yet I ween
In happy hour a corner-stone was placed
That ne'er shall be removed !) they found the land
Contested sometimes, and sometimes possess'd
In captious peace, between three powerful nations,
Or rather families of tribes. Omitting
The minor distributions (which are many
And barbarous all), suffice it to name these
In order of their strength ; the Pequods first ;
The Narhagansets, unto whom belong
Thy ransom'd captives ; lastly, the Moheagans,
Who occupied the immediate territory
Whereon our sad adventurers set foot.
With Massasoyt, chief Sachem of the latter,
A league was made, of mutual benefit ;
For, under Providence, his only friendship,
In the first hardships of the settlement,
Saved them alive ; and their alliance proved
A shield against his enemies. This being
The end to which he look'd, who was a man
Advanced in years, far-sighted, honourable,
And of a spirit, which, if he had sway'd
An European sceptre, might have blest
The people over whom its rule extended,
The league was faithfully on both sides observed ;
And ere his death the old man solemnly
Renew'd it for his sons, who for themselves
In their own persons ratified the engagement.

But men and times were changed, when the elder youth
Succeeded to his sire ; for the Colonists,
Now well acquainted with these Indian neighbours,
Loath'd their unseen usages, abhor'd
Their most incredible cruelty, despised
Their easy ignorance, — and practised on it.
I seek not to conceal our own offences :
Compared with other nations, — even with England,
Such as corrupted England long hath been, —
We are a sober, yea, a righteous people :
But Trade, which in the mother-land is one
Of many wheels, bearing a part alone,

And that too but subordinate, in the movements
Of a complicate and wonderful machine,
Is in our simple order the main-spring
That governs all. And where 'Trade rules, alas !
Whatever name be worshipp'd in the temples,
Mammon receives the heart's idolatry,
And is the god of the land.

Our Indian friends
Too soon had reason to abate their friendship :
And politic interests, which had held them to us,
Were loosen'd, when they saw their ancient foes,
The dreaded Pequods, by our arms pursued
In vigorous war, and rooted from the land,
Till the name alone remain'd, with none to own it.
This Alexander, so the youth was called,
Finding that cheek removed, and being also
By his father's death set free from all control,
Plotted against the English, in resentment
Partly, no doubt, because strict pains in teaching (Less wise than well intended) had been spent
On his indocile and unwilling spirit ;
But having injuries also to provoke
A haughty courage. Ere his schemes were ripe
He was, on sure intelligence, arrested ;
And disappointed malice, joined with anger,
Raising a fever in his heart and brain,
Deliver'd him from our restraint by death.
He left a brother, who inherited
His rights and wrongs, — that Philip who is now
The scourge and terror of the colony.

Think not that these were names imposed in baptism :
Upon that point the heart of Massasoyt
Was harden'd ; and his sons, like him, regarded
With mingled hatred and contempt a faith
They failed to understand. But it is held
A mark of honour to bestow, a pledge
Of friendship to receive, new appellations ;
Which here too, among savages, import
Something of peerage, of deserved esteem,
Or of imputed worth, the commonalty
(Strange as such custom may appear) being nameless.

My predecessor, with too true presage,
Fix'd on these names, less for the Christian sound
Which use hath given them, than because he saw
In the one youth an enterprising temper,
Ambitious of command ; and in the other,
More to be fear'd, a deep dissembling spirit,
Which, if the time required, could brook its wrongs,
And in all outward patience chew the while
The cud of bitter thoughts. He being yet young,
The station, which his sire had filled, devolved
Upon a chief, who was alike approved
In council and in war ; the right remaining
For Philip to succeed in course of years,
If years should validate the acknowledged claim
Of birthright ; for that claim, among the Indians,
Is held defeasible by ill-desert.

During this lapse of time, old rivalries
 Revived between the two remaining tribes;
 Whom ere the Pequods' power was crush'd, the sense

Of danger from that common enemy
 Restrain'd in peace. Not to prolong my tale
 With details not required for thy instruction,
 The sum was this, that, as by treaty pledged
 And justice bound, (for the right cause was theirs,
 And interest also led us to uphold
 The weaker side,) we aided the Moheagans,
 Our first allies; and, when they took in battle
 The hostile leader Miantonnimo,
 He suffer'd death, by our advice and sanction;
 Being however, at our instance, spared
 From all those customary cruelties,
 Which make the Indians odious in the sight
 Of God and man. Seem I to speak severely,
 Beyond what truth or Christian charity
 May warrant? Soon, my friend, thou wilt have cause

To give that sentence thy convinced assent;
 God in his mercy grant thou may'st not buy
 The sad conviction dearly!

For awhile

The hatred which this left between those nations
 Was our security; albeit we knew
 That, in the offended party, the desire
 Of vengeance would outlive the gratitude
 Due for our help, from those whom we had suc-cour'd.

The sense of injury in the human mind
 Is like a drug upon the offended palate,
 Clinging when bitterest most abidingly:
 The benefits, which men receive, they take
 Like wholesome food, that leaves no tang behind it.

We found it thus: for now these Tribes, foregoing
 Their mutual hatred, as of lesser moment,
 Have leagued against us. Philip is the head
 Of the confederacy: his crafty brain
 Combines, provides, prepares and plans the mischief.

And yet his venomous will and strong desire
 Draw him to this, against his better judgment,
 Possess'd not more with wise prudential fear
 Than with a strange religious awe, so weighty
 That, politic as he is, he hath not sought
 Even from his own people to conceal
 Its dark forebodings. What he wants in hope
 His new ally the Narhaganset Sachem
 Supplies but all too well: for this Canonchet,
 Son of that Miantonnimo whose death
 He charges on our counsels, is the heart
 Of the league. Insidious, resolute, inhuman;
 Brave, both in passive and in active courage,
 Almost beyond belief; implacable
 In malice; wily as a snake to wind
 His silent way unseen, when time requires
 Concealment; furious as a hungry wolf,

When opportunity allows the indulgence
 Of his fierce hatred,—this man is accomplish'd
 To the height of savage virtue.

Need I tell thee,

That, as in civil, so in barbarous states,
 The course of action takes its bias less
 From meditation, and the calm resolve
 Of wisdom, than from accident and temper,
 Private advantage at all costs pursued,
 Private resentments recklessly indulged,
 The humour, will, and pleasure, of the leaders,
 The passions and the madness of the people.
 Under all climes, and in all forms of rule,
 Alike the one, the many, or the few,
 Among all nations of whatever tint,
 All languages, these govern every where;
 The difference only is of less or more,
 As chance, to use the common speech, may sway;
 In wiser words, as Providence directs.

The bond wherein these hostile tribes are knit
 Against us, policy cannot untie,
 Nor the sword cut. No easy conquest ours,
 Such as the Spaniards found in Mexico,
 Or Eldorado's priestly monarchies,
 Or the well-order'd Incas' rich domains;
 They could cope there with multitudinous hosts
 Drawn forth in open field, and kings whose will,
 Even in captivity, was through the realm
 Religiously obey'd. But we must wage
 Wars that will yield the soldier neither gold
 Nor glory. In the forest and the swamp
 Have we to seek our foes; and if the shield
 Of the good Angel be not over us,
 On all sides from safe cover with sure aim
 The death-shots whiz. Would we then clear the land,

It is not to be done by victories;
 But head by head must they be hunted down,
 Like wolves; a work of danger and of time;
 And in this region wild of endless woods,
 Possible only to the inveterate hatred
 Of tribe for tribe. We tried the extremity—
 Inhuman as it is—against the Pequods;
 And, with the ferine help of such allies,
 Pursued it to the end. All whom the sword
 Spared, or our mercy interposed to save
 From torments, to the Sugar Isles were sold;
 And in the daily death of bondage there
 The race hath been consumed. But what hath been
 The issue? Why, the tribes which aided us
 To root them out, stand on the hostile part
 Against us now the more audaciously,
 Because they feel themselves in union strong,
 And see us in the land without allies.
 The hope thy hazardous adventure offers
 Is this, that, if the die, whereon thy fate
 For life or death is set, fall favourably,
 And thou shouldst gain access among the elders,
 The exasperate mood, which would too surely else
 Repel our proffer'd terms of amnesty,

May toward thee be soften'd. For these people
Act sometimes upon impulse, like thyself;
A generous action wins them, whom no fear
Can touch, nor pity move; and they will trust,
Like dogs and children, to a countenance,
Wherein, as if instinctively, they read
Fair testimonials from the unerring hand
Of Nature, patent there. And if one tribe,
One chief, unto thy words of peace incline
A willing ear, the league in all its parts
Will feel its ill-compacted strength relax:
Once loosen'd, it dissolves.

The Governor

Paused then; and fixing on the youth a look
Benign though mournful, "Mark me, Oliver,"
He said; "I call upon thy mother's soul
To witness—if the spirits of the dead
Are cognizant of what is done below—
That I have sought in all sincerity
To turn thee from thy purpose! If the event
Be fatal, before thee, and her, and Heaven,
Shall I stand unreprieved; and with my sorrow
No self-reproach will mingle. But if still Thy purpose holdeth firm, God speed thee! Go
In hope! I would not that my words should prove
A load to weigh thy buoyant spirit down.
It may be thou may'st render to the state
Some eminent service in this time of need.
And thus—O son of an unhappy house,
Born to a sad inheritance! it may be,
That in this other England, this new world,
Thou may'st recast thy fortunes; may'st acquire
Such honour as consists with peace of mind
In the end; and for thy children's children gain
In this good land a goodly heritage."

VIII.

PARTING WORDS.

SON of a hapless house!
What were the thoughts which then within thy breast,
At thy true friend's concluding words, arose?
Doth that quick flush disclose
A feeling thou hast labour'd to control,
And hitherto repress
In singleness of heart and strength of soul?
A light, which like a sudden hope might seem,
Kindled his cheek, and brighten'd in his eye:
But it departed like a gleam,
That for a moment in the heavy sky
Is open'd when the storm is hurrying by;
And then his countenance resumed
Its meek serenity.

Nor did that sad composure change,
When of the gentle maiden Leverett spake,
Whom to his charge her mother's dying prayer
In Christian confidence consign'd.
And yet it was a theme which well might wake
Oppugnant feelings in his inmost mind;
For with a hope upon that mother's heart,
Implied, though not express'd, the solemn care
Was given; and therefore in the young man's heart
Uneasily it lay,
As if he were unjust,
And had received a trust
He could not, must not, did not dare—
And yet would fain—repay.

"That trust I could not choose but take," he said;
"And all that I stand pledged for to the dead
Is soon discharged; it will not from my way
Detain me long, nor lead me far astray."

"'Tis but the easy distance of a day
From Hadley," quoth the Governor; and he spread
A map before them, rudely drawn, wherein
Wild forests stretching far and wide were seen,
Rivers whose inland course was unexplored,
And infant settlements, as yet ill-stored,
Few, and with dreary intervals between.
"Here in the vale of the Connecticut,"
Said Leverett, "Willboy's allotment lies:
A part from our immediate enemies
Remote, and, if reliance might be put
On distance, safe. From hence it bears due west
Some five day's travel through the woods; and now
The least frequented path will be the best,
That thou may'st leave behind thee on the left
The troubled country. Here thou see'st it south,
About these creeks and inlets and the mouth
Of Providence river, and the region wide
Of lakes and swamps in woodland interspersed,
That darkens o'er the land on every side.
This then will be thy course, to render first
The damsel to her father's hands; then seek Thy fortune with thine Indian company
In the Narhaganset lands. If it fall fair,
Thou wilt among their people leave them there,
And to that painful interview proceed,
Which of thy dearest hope, full well I know,
Must undeceive thee. It shall be my care
To the Connecticut thy way to speed;
From thence, alas! I can but follow thee
With anxious thoughts in spirit and in prayer.
But I will suffer no ill bodings now:
The Lord is merciful, and thy intent
Is righteous, and to him we leave the event."

Thus having ended, to the board he led
His guest: too full of care were they
For appetite or easy talk that day.
"This caution let me give thee," Leverett said,
"That Willoby is a high old Cavalier!"
"Fear not lest I should jar upon his ear

With ill-attuned discourse," the Youth replied.
 " He bore a part, a brave one too, I hear,
 In those unhappy times, and may look back
 Upon the strife with passion and with pride:
 My soul abhors the ill deeds on either side,
 Even if it had not cost me all too dear.
 Likelier it is that in my Father's sight
 I may appear degenerate, and excite
 Sorrow or sterner notions in a heart,
 The which, albeit with piety imbued,
 Is to a Christian temper unsubdued:
 But this too I can bear. Oh what a strength
 For sufferance to the patient soul is given
 When, wholly humbled, it hath placed at length
 Its only hope in Heaven."

" Nay," answer'd Leverett, " earth, I trust, hath yet
 Good hope for thee in store,
 One day with fair performance to be crown'd:
 For one who doth so well discharge the debt
 Of filial duty, will not Heaven fulfil
 The eternal promise which it made of yore?
 Happy, and long, I trust, thy days shall be,
 Here, in the land which the Lord giveth thee."
 And then, as if with such discursive speech
 To draw his mind from gloomy thoughts away,
 Did Leverett reach

His lifted hand towards the town and bay,
 Bright in the morning sunshine as they lay
 Before them: " Is it not a goodly land,"
 He cried, " where nought is wanting that may bless
 The heart of man with wholesome happiness?
 Summer subdues not here
 To sloth the dissolute mind;
 Nor doth the rigorous year
 In long inaction bind
 His icc-lock'd arm and torpid faculties.
 But changeful skies
 And varying seasons, in their due career,
 Bring forth his powers; and in the vigorous frame
 The human spirit thrives and ripens here!
 Where might the sober mind,
 Which Heaven with temperate desires hath blest,
 A land of happier promise find?
 Where might a good man fittier fix his rest?
 Where better might he choose a burial-place
 For him and for his race?
 Where wiselier plant the tree
 Of his posterity?"

The smile wherewith the youth received his speech
 Was cold and feeble, — one in which the heart
 Too plainly had no part;
 Constrain'd it came, and slowly past away.
 " Truly thou say'st, O friend!"
 He said; " and well are they
 Who, far from plagues and plots, and from the rage
 Of faction, for their children may prepare
 A peaceful heritage.
 For me, if other end

Await me, fall my fortune as it may,
 A comfort and a strength it is to know
 That wheresoe'er I go,
 There is the same Heaven over me on high,
 Whereon in faith to fix the steady eye;
 The same access for prayer;
 The same God, always present, every where;
 And if no home, yet every where the bed
 Which Earth makes ready for the weary head.

" But wherefore should I talk of weariness
 Thus early in the day,
 And when the morning calls me on my way?
 In brightness and in beauty hath it risen,
 As if the eternal skies
 Approved and smiled upon our enterprise!
 Now then farewell! That we shall meet again,
 True friend! we know; but whether among men
 Or angels who can tell? It is not ours
 To choose, or to foresee;
 Such choice or foresight would but ill agree
 With man's imperfect powers,
 Enough for him, that what is best will be."

IX.

JOURNEY THROUGH THE FOREST.

THEY are on their way, and they have enter'd now
 The forest that from earliest time hath stood,
 By human culture unsubdued.
 Strangelier assorted company
 Than this, which through that ancient wood
 Their solitary course pursued,
 No errant knight might chance to see,
 Wandering, in good King Arthur's days,
 Through Faery or Loegria land,
 Where most adventures were at hand.
 Liken'd the gentle Annabel might be
 To sweet Serena, ere the blatant mouth
 And cankerous tooth
 Had with their venom stain'd her harmless youth.
 And he who paced beside her steed
 Might seem, in form, and strength, and manly grace,
 Like Calidore, when he had laid aside
 His glorious thoughts and martial pride,
 And, as a shepherd, in the sylvan shade,
 Woo'd Pastorella for his bride,
 Contented to forego for her the meed
 Of high desert; and with true love
 How largely for ambition overpaid!
 Such Oliver might seem, and such the maid.

But lighter hearts, I ween, of yore
 The errant knights and damsels bore,
 In ages when the shield and lance
 Gave law through all the realms of Old Romance ;
 Who roam'd at hap, or on adventure bent,
 Searching the seas, the isles, and continent ;
 When they, in bower, in hermitage, and hall,
 Were welcomed every where by all,
 Or underneath the greenwood tree
 Took up their inn contentedly.

For in that pensive maiden's mien
 Had recent sorrow left its trace,
 And plainly too might there be seen
 A present trouble in her face :
 She fear'd the melancholy meeting,
 When grief would mar her father's greeting ;
 And hardly less, I ween, the pain
 With which she soon must part
 From one whose image would remain
 The inmate of her heart.
 For wishes, from herself till now conceal'd—
 Conceal'd, if not repress—
 And thoughts, to which the will had not consented,
 Forlornly as she felt them now reveal'd,
 Her secret soul unwillingly confess'd,
 Unwillingly repented :
 And hopes, that had arisen she scarce knew how,
 Were first acknowledged when they fail'd her now.

Think not that Oliver was free
 The while from painful sympathy :
 What more had he required his lot to bless,
 Than in the depth of those clear eyes was seen—
 The modest, meek, confiding gentleness,
 That soften'd while it sanctified her mien ;
 Those looks, devoid of art,
 Whose mild intelligence he loved to meet ;
 The voice, that, varying still, but always sweet,
 Still found a chord responsive in his heart ?
 If ever at his fate he half repined,
 If ever o'er his calm and constant mind
 The doubt, the trouble, and the cloud, were brought,
 'Twas at the thought,
 That cruel circumstance two souls must sever,
 Whom God, he surely felt, would else have join'd
 for ever.

Uneasy now became perforce
 The inevitable intercourse,
 Too grateful heretofore :
 Each in the other could desery
 The tone constrain'd, the alter'd eye.
 They knew that each to each could seem
 No longer as of yore ;
 And yet, while thus estranged, I deem,
 Each loved the other more.
 Hers was perhaps the saddest heart ;
 His the more forced and painful part ;
 A sense of proper maiden pride
 To her the needful strength supplied.

Then first perhaps the Virgin thought
 How large a dower of love and faithfulness
 Her gentle spirit could have brought
 A kindred heart to bless ;
 Herself then first she understood
 With what capacities endued ;
 Then first, by undeserved neglect
 Roused to a consciousness of self-respect,
 Felt she was not more willing to be won
 Than worthy to be woo'd.

Had they from such disturbant thoughts been free,
 It had been sure for them
 A gladsome sight to see
 The Indian children, with what glee
 They breathed their native air of liberty.
 Food to the weary man with toil forespent
 Not more refreshment brings,
 Than did the forest breeze upon its wings
 To these true younglings of the wilderness :
 A happy sight, a sight of hearts content !
 For blithe were they
 As swallows, wheeling in the summer sky
 At close of day ;
 As insects, when on high
 Their mazy dance they thread
 In myriads overhead,
 Where sunbeams through the thinner foliage gleam,
 Or spin in rapid circles as they play,
 Where winds are still,
 Upon the surface of the unrippled stream :
 Yea, gamesome in their innocence were they
 As lambs in fragrant pasture, at their will
 The udder when to press
 They run, for hunger less
 Than joy, and very love and wantonness.
 Nor less contentment had it brought
 To see what change benevolence had wrought
 In the wild Indian mother, whom they first
 Had seen, her spirit strong
 Madden'd by violence of wrong,
 For vengeance in her inmost soul,
 With natural but with ferine rage, athirst.
 That soul unhop'd-for kindness had subdued :
 Her looks, and words, and actions, now combined,
 Express'd, in that composure of the mind
 Which uneffaceable sorrow had left behind,
 A lively ever-watchful gratitude.
 Oliver seem'd to her a creature
 Less of this earth than of celestial nature,
 And Annabel as well
 Had won from her a love like veneration ;
 (So goodness on the grateful heart can gain ;)
 Though charms of European tint and feature
 No beauty to an Indian eye convey,
 Regarded with disdain,
 As if they were the original stamp and stain
 Of an inferior clay,
 Proved in some earlier, inexpert creation,
 And then, for degradation,
 When the red man was fashion'd, put away.

Pamya was troubled now, for she had seen
 Their alter'd mien :
 Some change there was, she knew not what, nor why,

Some infelicity ;
 Which yet she might descry
 Rose not from wrath nor alienated will ;
 For in their converse still
 The tones were such as meet
 The ear of love, and still
 The smiles they interchanged, though sad, were sweet :

Yet plainly she could tell, all was not well.
 They too could read in her observant eye
 Its apprehension and its sympathy :
 And surely she, had but her speech been free,
 Had prest, how earnestly ! for explanation,
 And sought to bring about
 The full and perfect reconciliation
 Dearly desired by both, she did not doubt.
 Their hearts were merciful and meek she knew,
 And could not to each other but be true :
 But on her tongue the curse of Babel hung,
 And when the eager wish her breast was swelling,
 Eye-speaking thoughts were all she could impart,
 Intelligibly telling
 The deep indwelling yearnings of the heart.

Four days they travell'd through the endless wood,
 Measuring their journey still to reach at eve
 Some settler's home, and sure of their receiving
 Such hospitality, sincere though rude,
 As men who felt no want, and had no vice
 Of chilling avarice,
 In their plain kindness found a joy in giving.
 The fifth morn rose, and with the morn rose they,
 That they might reach that day
 Their journey's end ; and through the forest wide
 Did they their weary way
 Hold on from early dawn till eventide ;
 But ere the light of eve
 Began to fade, their guide,
 Accustomed to descry
 With instantaneous eye
 The slightest trace of man, a smoke espied,
 Staining a little space of open sky :
 " Yon is the place we seek ! " he said ; nor knew
 What a cold feeling, at the words, ran through
 The veins of Annabel, and Newman too.

OH, what a happy meeting had been here,
 Willoby thought, in anguish, when he prest
 His daughter to his widow'd breast ;

If that dear hope which served so long to cheer
 His patient labours in the wilderness
 Had wholly been fulfill'd, as now in part :
 After so many storms and troubles past,
 Here had the faithful partner of his heart
 Rejoiced to reach the quiet port at last.

APPENDIX

OLIVER NEWMAN.

THE following sketch of the story intended to be worked out in this poem is, with the exception of those passages otherwise appropriated by references, drawn from very brief and sometimes contradictory notes in Mr. Southey's handwriting.

In the published letters from Mr. Southey to Mr. W. Taylor of Norwich, there is a passage, written in Jan. 1811, which records the earliest germ of this poem in his mind. " In reviewing Holmes's American Annals, I pointed out Philip's war as the proper subject for an Anglo-American Iliad. I have now fallen in love with it myself, and am brooding over it with the full intention of falling to work as soon as Pelayo is completed. The main interest will fix upon Goffe, the regicide, for whom I invent a Quaker son, a new character you will allow for heroic poetry. This Oliver Goffe, however, is to be the hero." The poem itself is in the first draught called Oliver Goffe.

The facts relating to those regicides whose fate is alluded to in the poem are as follow : * " When the restoration appeared inevitable, Colonel Goffe, with his father-in-law, Colonel Whalley, seeing that their life was in danger, left the kingdom, and arrived in America on the 27th of July, 1660. For some time they resided at Cambridge, four miles from Boston, attending public service, and being received with respect and hospitality by the inhabitants. But when the Act of Idemnity, out of which they were expressly excepted, arrived at Boston, in November, the magistrates withdrew their protection, and Whalley and Goffe retired to New Haven. Here they were forced to conceal themselves, and eventually to fly to a retirement, called Hatchet's Harbour, in the woods, where they remained two nights, till a cave in the side of a hill was prepared to conceal them. To this hill they gave the name of Providence, and remained some weeks in their hiding-place, sleeping, when the weather was tempestuous, in a house near it. They behaved with great honour to their friends: and when Mr. Davenport, the minister of New Haven, was suspected by the magistrates of concealing them, they went publicly to the deputy-governor of New Haven to offer themselves up; but he refused to take any notice of them, suffering them to return again to the woods. The pursuit of them afterwards relaxing, they remained two years in a house near Milford, where they frequently prayed and preached at private meetings in their chamber; till the king's commissioners coming to Boston, they were again driven to their cave in the woods. Here some Indians discovered their beds, which obliged them to seek a fresh refuge: and they went to Hadley, 100 miles distant, where they were received by Mr. Russell, the minister, and remained as long as they lived, very few persons knowing who they were. Whalley's death took place about 1679. They confessed that their lives were "miserable, and constant burdens to them;" especially when their fanatical hopes of some divine vengeance on Charles II. and his advisers were perpetually disappointed. The fidelity and affection of Goffe's wife to her husband were remarkably displayed in her letters."

While they were at Hadley the Indian war broke out, which was particularly disastrous in that part of the colony.* "The following story has been traditionally conveyed down among the inhabitants of Hadley. In the course of Philip's war, which involved almost all the Indian tribes in New England, and amongst them those in the neighbourhood of this town, the inhabitants thought it proper to observe the 1st of September, 1675, as a day of fasting and prayer. While they were in the church, and employed in their worship, they were surprised by a band of savages. The people instantly betook themselves to their arms, which, according to the custom of the times, they had carried with them to the church, and, rushing out of the house, attacked their invaders. The panic under which they began the conflict was, however, so great, and their number was so disproportioned to that of their enemies, that they fought doubtfully at first, and in a short time began evidently to give way. At this time an ancient man, with hoary locks, of a most venerable and dignified aspect, and in a dress widely differing from that of the inhabitants, appeared suddenly at their head, and with a firm voice, and an example of undaunted resolution, reanimated their spirits—led them again to the conflict—and totally routed the savages. When the battle was ended, the stranger suddenly disappeared; and no person knew whence he had come, or whither he had gone. The relief was so timely, so sudden, so unexpected, and so providential; the appearance and the retreat of him who furnished it, were so unaccountable, his person was so dignified and commanding, his resolution so superior, and his interference so decisive, that the inhabitants, without any uncommon exertion of credulity, readily believed him to be an angel sent by Heaven for their preservation. Nor was this opinion seriously controverted until it was discovered, several years afterwards, that Goffe and Whalley had been lodged in the house of Mr. Russell. Then it was known that their deliverer was Goffe, Whalley having become superannuated some time before the event took place." The latter part of Goffe's life seems not to be known with certainty. Dwight says, immediately before the passage above quoted, "After Whalley's death, Goffe quitted Hadley, went into Connecticut, and afterwards, according to tradition, to the neighbourhood of New York. Here he is said to have lived some time, and, the better to disguise himself, to have carried vegetables at times to market. It is said that having been discovered here, he retired secretly to the colony of Rhode Island, and there lived with a son of Whalley during the remainder of his life."

Goffe's was a divided family—one of his brothers being a clergyman of the Church of England, while another was become a Roman Catholic priest. To this division allusion is made in Leverett's conversation with Oliver. Of the other persons introduced, the following are historical: Leverett the governor, who succeeded Bellingham, in 1673; he had been a Cromwellian, and is sobered into a rational Conformist; he knew where the regicides were, and connived at their concealment, as he is represented doing in the poem: and Randolph, of whom the people of New England said "that he went up and down to devour them." Also the names of the Indian chieftains, and the general account of the war, are matter of history.

The hero Oliver himself is therefore a purely imaginary character: he was originally intended to be a Quaker; but it would appear that the author afterwards considered that the noble points of character and of principle intended to be exhibited—viz. zeal for the Christian faith, inflexible truth, peacefulness, and endurance—were not exclusively belonging to that sect whose operations and whose sufferings in New England he had been contemplating; and at the same time, that some features of their character were both unmanageable in poetry and distasteful to his own mind. There was also another reason for the alteration, namely, that he found it necessary for his plot, that, at least in one instance, Oliver's usual mode of conduct should bend to circumstances; and such a compliance would be morally, and therefore poetically, probable in a person swayed only by a reasonable principle, but not so in one governed by an absolute rule of life. The following notes will explain the intended bearing of this character upon the story.

1811. "A son of Goffe, a Quaker, gone after his mother's death to seek his father. He, by converting one of the principal Sachems, weakens Metacom's party so materially as to decide the contest; and with that Sachem he retires into the interior. He and his father are discovered, and he will not lift his hand in defence. A party of Indians take them all, he still passive; hence his influence begins with their astonishment." "The points on which Oliver's Quakerism is put to the test are, in not denying his father's name, and in not lifting a hand to defend him."

1814. "Oliver must be so far instrumental in terminating the war as to obtain security for his father; and this instrumentality must be effected wholly by means conformable to his peculiar opinions. But those opinions must yield where they are wrong."

* Dwight's Travels in New England, vol. i. p. 317. London. 1823.

Imperfectly as the latter part of the story can be ascertained, it has been thought better to sketch it out, however rudely, from the author's hints, than to leave an entire blank.

X. Oliver at Willoby's House.

They remain awhile at Willoby's, that Pamyra may be their protection. When some Indians appear, she goes out, and finds among a party of Indians one of her own tribe. After her story, the calumet is smoked, and the door of Willoby's house painted with marks indicating that it was under their protection. Then they venture to depart. A sort of half-confidence has first been made to Willoby in consequence of his wife's letter, and a sort of half-engagement formed. Willoby had known one of the Goffes. His moral reasons for leaving England,—on account of his sons, seeing the character of the times, and that all that we pray in the Litany to be delivered from, was come upon the country—blindness of heart, pride, vain-glory and hypocrisy, envy, hatred and malice, false doctrine, heresy and schism, sedition, privy conspiracy, and rebellion, &c.

XI. The Wounded Indian.

Oliver journeying with Pamyra and her children through the forest, finds a wounded Indian, by whom they stay till a party of his countrymen see them. This is the Mohawk, whom Philip had meant to kill, and not scalped, to create a belief that he had been killed by the English. (An historical fact, and represented as not of unfrequent occurrence.) Many hints for forest scenery, which are noted down, would probably belong to this canto. At night Oliver is seen reading by firelight in the wood.

XII. Whalley's body.

The Indians conduct the party to their Sachem: on the way they meet with Whalley's body being conveyed somewhere for interment. Oliver knows it by a mutilated hand. Likeness of Whalley to his daughter [Oliver's mother]; that family character of face which the infant brings into the world, and into which the countenance settles in old age, when the character which individual pursuits and passions have induced fades away, and the natural lineaments recover their primary cast. The death of Whalley sets Goffe at liberty. They reach the encampment of Indians, and Pamyra is restored to her own friends, the Narhagansets.

XIII. The Affair of Hodley.

A renegade (in one place named Joshua Tift, the English savage and traitor,) being among the Indians, calls Oliver a spy, insults and strikes him. This Oliver endures patiently, making no retaliation. This fellow relates the affair of Hadley, "the most disastrous day that ever befell New England," and especially the marvellous apparition of one during the conflict, who was really Goffe, Oliver's father.

XIV. Reasoning with the Sachems.

The interest of this scene is to turn chiefly upon two points: the effect for good which Oliver's words have upon an old Indian chief, who has formerly been impressed by Eliot or R. Williams, and who now puts himself under Oliver's guidance. This man belongs to the tribe of Sakanets, who are probably connected with the Narhaganset stock. It would have been contrary to history to make the Narhaganset chieftain himself influenced at this time by Oliver. The other point is, the peculiar character of Philip, composed of hatred and vindictiveness against the English, united with gloomy forebodings about the issue of the war.

These may be some of his words, or rather the more hopeful Canonchet's:

The forest and the swamp are our allies;
Have we not with these giants of the wood
A sacred immemorial brotherhood?
The land itself will aid her proper children.

XV. Oliver reaches his Father.

When Oliver mentions the wilderness, Goffe replies, it is not there that he must prepare the way of the Lord, but in the streets of London.

XVI. The Arrest.

A party sent by Randolph, with Willoby the cavalier at their head, surprise them.—Willoby offers to let them go, if Oliver will declare that this person is not Goffe. Meeting with Randolph.

XVII. Rescue.

The whole party are surprised by the Sakanets.—Goffe and Willoby escape.—Randolph and Oliver are taken, and carried to the encampment of the Sachems.—Oliver is recognized and welcomed.—Randolph is to be burnt, but Oliver obtains his life and safe dismissal: they separate.

XVIII. Defeat of the Indians.

Goffe meanwhile has rallied some stragglers, who attack and defeat the Sakanet party, and take some; for whom Oliver intercedes, engaging for them that they shall commit no more hostilities.—He then goes with these Indians to negotiate with their tribe.

XIX. Annabel a Prisoner.

While this discussion is going on, Annabel is brought in a prisoner by the renegade: in the dispute which ensues, Oliver kills him. This is the point in which Oliver's passiveness is to give way to a just wrath. Before he knocks out the fellow's brains he stands "trembling, but not with fear."

XX. Peace.

The Sakanet tribe make peace with the English; Oliver going with the chiefs to the English headquarters to sign it.—The Mohawk, whom he had saved in the forest, meets him there, at the head of his party.

XXI. Death of Philip.

Oliver's services are now clearly seen.—Randolph solicits for him a grant of land.—Willoby gives him his daughter, and Russell marries them.—Pamyra's children baptized.

Miscellaneous Poetical Remains.

FRAGMENTARY THOUGHTS

OCCASIONED BY HIS SON'S DEATH.*

THY life was a day, and sum it well, life is but a week of such days,—with how much storm, and cold, and darkness! Thine was a sweet spring holy-day,—a vernal Sabbath, all sunshine, hope, and promise.

and that name
In sacred silence buried, which was still
At morn and eve the never-wearying theme
Of dear discourse.

playful thoughts
Turn'd now to gall and esel.

He to whom Heaven in mercy hath assign'd
Life's wholesome wormwood, fears no bitterness
when
From th' hand of Death he drinks the Amreeta cup,

Beauties of nature,—the passion of my youth,
Nursed up and ripen'd to a settled love,
Whereto my heart is wedded.

Feeling at Westminster, when summer evening sent a sadness to my heart, and I sate pining for green fields, and banks of flowers, and running streams,—or dreaming of Avon and her rocks and woods.

No more great attempts, only a few autumnal flowers, like second primroses, &c.

They who look for me in our Father's kingdom
Will look for Him also; inseparably
Shall we be so remembered.

* Letter to Mr. W. Taylor, March, 1817. "I have begun a desultory poem in blank verse, pitched in a higher key than Cowper's, and in a wiser strain of philosophy than Young's; but as yet I have not recovered heart enough to proceed with it; nor is it likely that it will be published during my life."

The Grave the house of Hope:
It is the haven whither we are bound
On the rough sea of life, and thence she lands
In her own country, on the immortal shore.

Come, then,
Pain and infirmity—appointed guests,
My heart is ready.

My soul
Needed perhaps a longer discipline,
Or sorer penance, here.

A respite something like repose is gain'd
While I invoke them, and the troubled tide
Of feeling, for a while allay'd, obeys
A tranquillizing influence, that might seem
By some benign intelligence dispensed,
Who lends an ear to man.

They are not, though,
Mere unrealities: rather, I ween,
The ancient Poets, in the graceful garb
Of fiction, have transmitted earliest truths,
Ill understood; adorning, as they deem'd,
With mythic tales things erringly received,
And mingling with primeval verities
Their own devices vain. For what to us
Scripture assures, by searching proof confirm'd,
And inward certainty of sober Faith,
Tradition unto them deliver'd down
Changed and corrupted in the course of time,
And haply also by delusive art
Of Evil Powers.—

SHORT PASSAGES OF SCRIPTURE,

RHYTHMICALLY ARRANGED OR PARAPHRASED.

JEREM. VI. 4.

Woe unto us!
For the day goeth down,
For the shadows of evening
Are lengthen'd out.

JER. IX. 23—4.

Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom,
Let not the rich man glory in his riches,

Let not the mighty glory in his might,
But in only this let him that glorieth, glory,
That he knoweth the Lord, the Lord of infinite mercy,

Who exerciseth on the earth
His loving-kindness and his righteousness.

JER. XIII. 16.

Give glory to the Lord your God!
Lest, while ye look for light,
He bring the darkness on,
And the feet that advanced
With haughty step,
Marching astray in their pride,
Stumble and fail
In the shadow of death.

JER. XLVII. 6, 7.

Sword of the Lord! how long
Ere thou be quiet? O thou sword, how long?
Put up thyself
Into thy scabbard,
Rest and be still.

JER. XLIX. 7.

From the prudent hath counsel departed?
Is wisdom no more in the land?
Hath it utterly perish'd?
Is it vanish'd and gone?

JER. I. 25.

. . . the Lord
Open'd his armoury, and brought forth
The weapons of his wrath.

JER. I. 15.

Ye nations, shout against her round about;
Take vengeance upon her.
It is the vengeance of the Lord,
As she hath done, do unto her,

LUKE, III. 5.

When every valley shall be filled,
And every mountain be brought low;
The crooked be made straight,
The rough ways smooth.

LAMENTATIONS, III. 44.

The Lord
Covered himself with a cloud,
That the prayer should not pass through.

HOSEA, X. 12, 13.

Break up your fallow-ground,
Sow to yourselves in righteousness, and reap
In mercy; it is time to seek the Lord.
Ye have plough'd wickedness, and ye have reap'd
Iniquity: the fruit of lies hath been
Your harvest and your food.

DANIEL, IX. 7, 8, 9. 18.

To Thee belongeth righteousness, O Lord!
Confusion and shame to us;
To our kings and our princes,
Our priests and our rulers,
Ourselves and our children,
Because we have sinned against Thee.

But mercies and forgivenesses belong
To Thee, O Lord our God,
Rebellious though we be.

Incline thine ear, and hear;
Open thine eyes, and pitifully see
Our sins, our miseries,
The impending punishment,
Too long, too much deserved.

AMOS, V. 8.

Who calleth for the waters of the sea,
And poureth them in seasonable rain
Upon the face of earth.

NAHUM, I. 3—8.

The Lord hath his way in the whirlwind,
The Lord hath his way in the storm,
The clouds are the dust of his feet,
And darkness shall pursue his enemies,

NAHUM, III. 15. 17.

There shall the fire devour thee,
The sword shall cut thee off.

Make thyself many as the canker-worm,
 As the locusts make thyself many.
 Thou hast multiplied thy merchants
 Above the stars of heaven!
 But the canker-worm spoileth,
 Then fleeth away,
 And his place is not found.

1 KINGS, VIII. 23. 27. 30.

Lord God of Israel!
 There is no God like Thee,
 In heaven above, or on the earth beneath,
 Who keepest covenant
 And mercy with thy servants, when with all
 Their heart they walk before Thee.

. . . . will God indeed
 Dwell on the earth? Behold, the heaven, and heaven
 Of heavens, cannot contain Thee; how much less
 This house that man hath builded!

. . . . hear Thou in heaven, thy dwelling place;
 And when Thou hearest, O Lord God, forgive!

ISAIAH, XXV. 1. 4. 7.

Thy counsels, Lord, of old,
 Are faithfulness and truth.

A strength to the weak hast thou been,
 A help to the poor in his need,
 A refuge from the storm,
 A shadow from the heat.

The covering that is cast
 Over all people shall be then removed,
 And the veil that is spread
 Over all nations be taken away.

ISAIAH, XXVI. 3. 5. 8.

Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace
 Whose mind is staid on Thee.

He bringeth down them that dwell on high;
 The lofty city he layeth it low,

He layeth it low to the ground,
 He bringeth it down to the dust:
 The foot shall tread it down,
 The feet of the poor and the needy.

In the way of thy judgments,
 O Lord, have we waited for thee.

ISAIAH, XXVIII. 15. 17, 18.

They have made lies their refuge,
 And under falsehood have they hid themselves;
 Their covenant is with death, with hell
 The agreement wherein they trust.
 O fools! O miserables!
 The covenant shall be annull'd,
 The agreement shall not stand.
 By the storm shall their refuge be swept away,
 Their hiding-place
 By the flood be overflown.

ISAIAH, XXVIII. 16.

In Zion the foundation hath been laid,
 A precious corner-stone, a sure foundation.

ISAIAH, XXXI. 3.

When the Lord shall put forth his anger,
 Then both he that helpeth shall fall, and he that is holpen.

ISAIAH, LVII. 1.

The righteous perisheth,
 And none layeth it to heart!
 The merciful man
 Is taken away
 From the evil to come.

EZEKIEL, VII. 5, 6, 7. 12.

An evil, an only evil,
 Behold, is come! an end
 Is come,—the end is come!
 It watcheth for thee, behold it is come.
 The time of trouble is near,
 The morning is gone forth;
 Behold the day is come.
 Let not the buyer rejoice,
 Nor let the seller mourn,
 For wrath, the wrath of God,
 Is upon all the multitudes thereof.

EZEKIEL, XXII. 7, 8. 14.

In thee have they set light
 By venerable age,
 By natural piety.
 In thee God's holy things have they despised,
 God's sabbaths have profaned.
 Oh can thine heart endure,
 Or can thine hand be strong,
 When God shall deal with thee?

LITTLE BOOK, IN GREEN AND GOLD.

Little Book, in green and gold,
 Thou art thus bedight to hold
 ROBERT SOUTHEY'S Album rhymes,
 Wrung from him in busy times :
 Not a few to his vexation,
 By importune application ;
 Some in half-sarcastic strain,
 More against than with the grain ;
 Other some, he must confess,
 Bubbles blown in idleness ;
 Some in earnest, some in jest,
 Good for little at the best :
 Yet because his daughter dear
 Would collect them fondly here,
 Little Book, in gold and green,
 Thou art not unfitly seen
 Thus apparell'd for her pleasure,
 Like the casket of a treasure.
 Other owner, well I know,
 Never more can prize thee so.

Little Book, when thou art old,
 Time will dim thy green and gold.
 Little Book, thou wilt outlive
 The pleasure thou wert made to give :
 Dear domestic recollections,
 Home-born loves, and old affections,
 Incommunicable they :
 And when these have passed away,
 As perforce they must, from earth,
 Where is then thy former worth ?
 Other value, then, I ween,
 Little Book, may supervene,
 Happily if unto some
 Thou in due descent shouldst come,
 Who would something find in thee
 Like a relic's sanctity,
 And in whom thou may'st awake,
 For thy former owner's sake,
 A pious thought, a natural sigh,
 A feeling of mortality.

When those feelings, and that race,
 Have in course of time given place,
 Little worth, and little prized,
 Disregarded or despised,
 Thou wilt then be bought and sold,
 In thy faded green and gold.
 Then, unless some curious eye
 Thee upon the shelf should spy,
 Dust will gather on thee there,
 And the worms, that never spare,
 Feed their fill within, and hide,
 Burrowing safely in thy side,
 Till transfigured out they come
 From that emblem of the tomb :
 Or, by mould and damp consumed,
 Thou to perish may'st be doom'd.

But if some collector find thee,
 He will, as a prize, re-bind thee ;
 And thou may'st again be seen
 Gayly drest in gold and green.

LINES WRITTEN IN THE ALBUM OF ROTH A Q.

ROTHA, after long delays,
 Since thy book must cross the Raise,
 Down I sit to turn a stave,
 Be it gay or be it grave.

Wiser wish than what thy name
 Prompts for thee I cannot frame ;
 Nowhere find a better theme
 Than thy native namesake stream.
 Lovelier river is their none
 Underneath an English sun ;
 From its source it issues bright
 Upon hoar Hellvellyn's height,
 Flowing where its summer voice
 Makes the mountain herds rejoice ;
 Down the dale it issues then ;
 Not polluted there by men ;
 While its lucid waters take
 Their pastoral course from lake to lake,
 Please the eye in every part,
 Lull the ear and soothe the heart,
 Till into Windermere sedate
 They flow and uncontaminate.

Rotha, such from youth to age
 Be thy mortal pilgrimage ;

Thus in childhood blithe and free,
 Thus in thy maturity,
 Blest and blessing, may it be ;
 And a course in welfare past,
 Thus serenely close at last.

IMAGINATION AND REALITY.

THE hill was in the sunshine gay and green,
 The vale below could not be seen ;
 A cloud hung over it,
 A thin white cloud, that scarce was seen to fly,
 So slowly did it flit ;
 Yet cloud methinks I err in calling it,
 It spread so evenly along the sky.
 It gave the hills beyond a hue
 So beautiful and blue,
 That I stood loitering for the view :
 Loitering and musing thoughtfully stood I,
 For well those hills I knew,
 And many a time had travell'd them all o'er ;
 Yet now such change the hazy air had wrought,
 That I could well have thought
 I never had beheld the scene before.
 But while I gazed the cloud was passing by ;
 On the slow air it slowly travell'd on,
 Eftsoon and that deceitful haze was gone,
 Which had beguiled me with its mockery ;
 And all things seem'd again the things they were.
 Alas ! but then they were not half so fair
 As I had shaped them in the hazy air !

MADRIGAL,

TRANSLATED FROM LUIS MARTIN.

[This poem is selected for publication from a small volume of translations, because, having been printed before in a newspaper, it attracted the attention of Mr. D'Israeli, who has inserted it in the "Curiosities of Literature," as a beautiful specimen of a kind of extravagance characteristic of Spanish poetry. It seemed, therefore, worth while to place it among the poems of the Translator.]

Ox the green margin of the land,
 Where Guadalhorce winds his way,
 My Lady lay.
 With golden key Sleep's gentle hand
 Had closed her eyes so bright,
 Her eyes—two suns of light,
 And bade his balmy dews
 Her rosy cheeks suffuse.

The River God in slumber saw her laid.
 He raised his dripping head
 With weeds o'erspread,
 Clad in his watery robes approach'd the maid,
 And with cold kiss, like Death,
 Drank the rich perfume of the maiden's breath.
 The maiden felt that icy kiss ;
 Her suns uncloused, their flame
 Full and unclouded on the intruder came.
 Amazed, the bold intruder felt
 His frothy body melt,
 And heard the radiance on his bosom hiss ;
 And forced in blind confusion to retire,
 Leapt in the water to escape the fire.

February, 1799.

MOHAMMED ;

A FRAGMENT, WRITTEN IN 1799.

CLOAK'D in the garment of green, who lies on the bed of Mohammed,
 Restless and full of fear, yet semblant of one that is sleeping ?
 Every sound of the feet at his door he hears, and the breathing
 Low of inaudible words: he knows their meaning of murder,
 Knows what manner of men await his outgoing,
 and listens
 All their tread, and their whisp'ring, till even the play of his pulses
 Disturbs him, so deep his attention. The men of the Koreish
 Fix on the green-robed youth their eyes ; impatiently watchful
 Wait they the steps of his rising, the coming of him whom they hated.
 He rises and makes himself pure, and turning towards the Caaba,
 Loud he repeats his prayer: they hear, and, in ca-
 gerness trembling,
 Grasp the hilts of their swords—their swords that are sworn to the slaughter.
 But when the youth went forth, they saw, and behold ! it was Ali !
 Steady the hero's face: it was pale, for his life was a blessing ;
 It was calm, for in death he look'd on to the crown of the martyr.
 Dark as they were of soul, and goaded by rage disappointed,

They shed not the blood of the youth, but remember'd their chieftain his father,
Abu Taleb the good, and respected the virtue of friendship.

Baffled, and full of wrath, through Mecca they scatter the tidings:

"He has fled, has discovered our plans, has eluded our vengeance.

Saw ye the steps of his flight? Where lurks he, the lying blasphemer?

Now to the chase, to the chase; seize now the bow and the quiver;

Now with the sword and the spear, ye stubborn of Mecca! pursue him;

Seek him now to the north and the south, to the sunset and sunrise;

Follow, follow the chosen one's flight!" They rush from the city:

Over the plain they pursue him, pursue him with cries and with curses—

Sounds that rung over the plain, and rung in the echoing mountains;

And Mecca received in her streets the din of their clamorous uproar.

But the voice of the Moslem, the silent prayer of the faithful,

Rose to the throne of God; and tears of the heart overflowing

Interceded for him whom they loved and believed his apostle.

"Where is the blasphemous fled?—the lying disturber of Mecca?

Has he journey'd to Tayef? Under the shield of his uncle

Lurks he for safety there?—or to Yathreb, the credulous city?

Or seeks he the Ethiop's court, where the earlier runaways shelter?"

Lashing their steeds, they pursue; to the east and the dwelling of Abbas

Hasten the thirsty for blood; to the north they hurry, to Yathreb;

Some to the shore of the sea, lest haply a bark might await him,

And the waves should become his protectors: impetuously rushing,

Drive they in fury along; beneath the hoofs of their horses

Sparkles the rock of the valley, and rises the dust of the desert.

Others the while, more cool in wrath, and thoughtful in fury,

Over the town search sedulous: they in the Hashemites' dwellings

Seek for the man proscribed; in the dwellings of Hamza and Omar,

Ali, Abubeker, and Saad, and Abu Obeidah;

All whom the Prophet loved, who believed in the son of Abdallah.

Every house they search in the populous city, whose threshold

Ever his feet had trod: thus vainly through Mecca they seek him;

Then, unassuaged of hate, of rancour and wrath unabated,

They to the mountains turn, to seek in their dens and retirings

If from the death he lurks: they enter the cavern of Hira,

Place of his fasting and prayer; the cavern of Hira is lonely.

Not in the depth of the cave, and not in the mountain retirings,

Not in their hollows and glens, can they track the steps of his going.

So through the day they sought; and still, when the sun was descending,

They were among the hills: then faint, disappointed, and weary,

Turning their faces homeward, they journey'd slowly and sullen

Down their rough mountain path; but often paused, and around them

Linger'd with prowling eyes: a little wide of their pathway,

Thus as they paused, they saw in the side of the stony mountain

A cave-mouth, narrow and high: the hill had the hue of the evening

Rich on its rugged sides, and the chasm was distinct in its blackness.

Thither turning, they sped; and one who forewent his companions

Came to the cavern's mouth: disturb'd by the noise of his footsteps,

From her nest, in the side of the chasm, a pigeon affrighted

Fled. The advancing pursuers heard the whirr of her pinions,

And he who was first exclaim'd, "There is none in the hole of the mountain;

For lo! a pigeon fled from her nest at the sound of my coming,

And the spider hath spread his network over the entrance."

Then from the cave he turn'd.

Was thy spirit shaken, Mohammed,

When in the depth of the rock thou heardest the voice of the Koreish?

He who was with thee trembled; the sweat on his forehead was chilly,

And his eyes in alarm were turn'd towards thee in the darkness.

Silent they sat in the rock; nor moved they, nor breathed they; but listen'd

Long to the tread of the feet, that, fainter and fainter sounding,

Died in the distance now: yet still they were silent, and listen'd.
 Abubeker first, as his fear gave faith to the echo,
 Fresh in his sense alarm'd—"Hark! hark! I hear them returning;
 They are many, and we but two!" he whisper'd, in terror.
 'There is a third!' aloud replied the son of Abdallah—"God!"

So the night came on, and they in the place of their refuge
 Silently sat. And now in hope they listen'd, awaiting Sound of approaching feet—of trusted friend or disciple,
 Bringing them food and tidings, now that the darkness had settled.
 Slow past the expectant hours: nearer the mouth of the cavern
 Eagerly now they drew. The sound of the wind that was passing
 Took from their hope its tone; and now in its distant murmurs
 They heard the tread of feet; and now despairingly argued Danger was yet abroad, and none could venture towards them.
 Midnight came; and a step was heard—distinctly they heard it:
 Heavier it comes,—and now in the rock—and a voice—it is Ali.
 He in the cave laid down the water-skin that he carried,

And the figs wrapt under his robe: then told he his tidings.
 Low was his voice, for he spake in fear: "The peril is pressing,
 Prophet of God, I saw thy foes return in the twilight:
 Sullen they came from their toil, and talk'd of the search on the morrow.
 The Idolaters joy in thy flight, and grieve at thy safety:
 God shall remember their joy, and that grief, in the day of his judgment.
 They shall feel in their evil load! A price is appointed
 His who shall shed thy blood: but keep thou close in the mountain;
 God will confound their plots."
 He paused; so suddenly checking
 Words on their way, as one who tells but half of his errand,
 Loth to utter the worse remainder, that yet must be utter'd.
 Sure if Mohammed had seen his eye, he had read in its trouble
 Tidings of evil to come. At length to the son of Abdallah, Telling his tale of woe, spake Ali the first of believers:
 "Prophet, there is grief in thy dwelling: Cadijah, in sickness Lies on her bed of pain: for death she is stricken, I fear me."
 Mohammed heard; and he bow'd his head, and groan'd for his exile.
